Next, the minister charged that the judicial process is unfair. It is very noteworthy that he said that only the poor are convicted of murder and the rich buy their way out of trouble with money and influence. Is that the reason the government is so reluctant to bring matters which have interrupted the normal proceedings of the House for so long now before a judicial inquiry? Should the government not be responsible for correcting that situation, rather than reacting to it? Do the judges in Canada, who are appointed by politicians, really receive telephone calls from influential people in public life, and do some of them respond favourably to suggestions made to them? This is what the Solicitor General is implying, and I see no clause in this bill or in Bill C-83 which would offer a remedy to that situation.

It is alarming to me, to the people I represent and to all Canadians that this form of government patronage still exists, particularly when dealing with the judiciary.

The other day the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) made a statement in Vancouver to which the press throughout the country reacted. One of the major newspapers in my constituency telephoned me and asked for an interview. They wanted a list of the lawyers who represented Central Mortgage and Housing and government agencies in the city of Prince George. I telephoned the managers of these agencies in the city but was told that the list could not be given to me; it was confidential. There really was no problem. I suppose there must be a number of lawyers who support my political cause in the city, but none of them have complained to me. They are kept very busy and they do not get any business from CMHC or IDB.

• (1220)

I told the managers that if the list was secret I had to suspect there was something to hide. I telephoned the minister and he admitted that instructions are given to the managers in the various regions about which legal officers they should use in their business dealings. He was kind enough to send me a list of the solicitors who work exclusively for Central Mortgage and Housing in Prince George. As it happens, one of them was my Liberal opponent in the last election. He is a good and diligent lawyer, so I have no quarrel with that. Four or five of the lawyers on the list are known Liberal fund-raisers and supporters. This is the kind of thing that Canadians object to in 1976, Mr. Speaker, and the kind of thing that has to be corrected if we are ever to have a greater degree of respect for the political process.

The minister says that civilized society which respects, above all, the human dignity and life of every individual cannot allow itself to consider the cost of enforcing our laws and the incarceration of criminals. I, for one, would applaud that argument if the government could demonstrate to me that this civilized attribute of charity applies equally to the criminal and the victim. It costs the taxpayers of this country up to a quarter of a million dollars to bring to account a person who deliberately challenges the institution which is the guardian of our law and standards of moral conduct. It costs up to $20,000 annually to keep a person incarcerated and isolated from the community. I, for one, cannot applaud that argument. Is it not fair to make a comparison between that and what we as a civilized society afford ourselves in the way of social services?

Are we making restitution to the victims of crime? Do we apply the same degree of generosity to our senior citizens, the handicapped, the socially deprived and the children who in our country go to bed hungry every night? Of course not, Mr. Speaker. Our charitable human instincts only surface when people confront the establishment out of sheer frustration and deprivation. The more violent the confrontation, the more understanding we become.

I cannot help but respond to the letters I get from my constituents who compare the contract killer who has killed a young policeman, with his widow, who is living on a meagre welfare income of $260 per month, trying to bring up two children and provide them with the means of competing in society when they grow up. We must consider what it costs to bring a person to justice and keep him incarcerated. This degree of charity is evident even inside our prisons. The murderer and hardened criminal is interviewed by the press and examined by the "head-shrinker". He receives the attention of every do-gooder who has ever dissected a pickled frog and has discovered he can grow whiskers. The prisoner who is a guest of the taxpayer for just a minor offence and strives to build merit points to support his parole application gets hit over the head with a lead pipe in the ballpark and lives in protective custody without colour television and most of the other essentials of modern-day prison life.

Mr. Speaker, many of my colleagues speak about whether or not capital punishment is a deterrent to murderers. I do not think that is the question which should concern us at all. I do not even think that we need to apply the term "punishment". The only thing we need to consider is the right and responsibility to protect ourselves against those who show wanton disregard for our traditional values, and no respect for human life.

The Solicitor General told me on one occasion, privately, that he actually considers capital punishment an incentive to murder. It would take quite a measure of imagination to think that to a conclusion. He reasons that the murderer has no regard for his own life and that is why he confronts the establishment: therefore, he dares the system, by his violent act, to put him out of his misery or, on the other hand, attach some meaning to his existence—a headline and a picture in the paper on the morning of his execution. The conclusion to this argument is, of course, that if society fails him he must continue to try to get our attention with an even more violent act. I cannot help but wonder in how many cases of the murder of prison guards and policemen this may have been the motive.

Mr. Speaker, I advocate the retention of capital punishment because we cannot condone having the ultimate value of living peaceful and fulfilling lives threatened. We have a right to protect ourselves against subversive and dangerous elements not just from outside our borders but also from within. The Solicitor General is right, execution is final—the condemned murderer will never kill again—and this has nothing to do with revenge or punishment. It has to be viewed as the removal of a cancer which cannot be allowed to exist in a healthy system once it has been identified as incurable.

Many of my colleagues have drawn comparisons between ourselves and countries which have already abolished the supreme penalty. None of their arguments hold water. Invariably they are making these comparisons with countries which have evolved social structures much more advanced than our own. For instance, Belgium—a country which has repeatedly been quoted—can trace the beginning of a cultural evolution back 2,000 years. Unlike our country, all people there are indigenous. The Belgians have two official languages, as we have, but their ethnic groups are not separated by a vast geographical expanse and economic disparities.

Mr. Speaker, what is more important is the fact that in Belgium, as in most other countries which have abolished capital punishment, it was done because the people themselves, not their governments only, were ready to have it abolished—and that is good. In most cases, referendums were held and the behavioural attitudes of their citizens were closely monitored. Superficial comparisons are, for that reason, not fair. One has to make an assessment of the attitude of the people and measure the degree of intellectual maturity of a society with which comparisons are made.

We have in our country today still a small percentage of illiteracy. I know this shocks a lot of people, but unfortunately it is true. In Belgium this has not been a problem for 150 years. This can be demonstrated in other areas as well. Why, for instance, is it that Germany has the lowest rate of labour disputes in the world, whereas we have the highest percentage of man-years lost as a result of industrial strikes and disputes? I suggest the reason is the adversary system to which we adhere in this country but which other countries in part have overcome.

● (1230)

Certainly, this fact alone cannot be attributed to the utter incompetence of the present government, even though it is a key factor. It must be viewed in the light of a fundamentally different approach to work and the work ethic, an approach different from that of our own industrial society. Just as our unions and business managers are not sufficiently mature to consider more advanced methods of labour relations, so 80 per cent of Canadians are not prepared to afford themselves the luxury of trading-off an element of protection inherent in the imposition of capital punishment against extended prison terms.

One would think, Mr. Speaker, that our government should direct some of its attention to the need to accelerate the evolutionary process of which I spoke. It is also interesting to speculate to what extent the government should get involved in setting the direction in which our own distinctive culture should evolve. Do we wish to assimilate the "good guy-bad guy, happy-ending" society which dominates our neighbour to the south, or should we espouse deeper, more realistic values of human behaviour? These questions would come into play if we concerned ourselves more with preventing crime in the first place instead of only reacting to the effects of criminal acts.

In my opinion, we should examine closely the effects violence on television has or will have on future generations. We should subject our educational system to close scrutiny. Is our teaching process attuned to the contemporary need of our times, or are we offering our young citizens an utopian dream instead of preparing them for the society of today? Certainly, the post-war period, which brought with it modern teaching techniques, did not produce a society which is more rational in its relationship with the rest of the global community. We have not been able to make fundamental changes to the adversary system which dominates, not just our judicial system and industrial relations process but the political process as well.

Indeed, I feel that having less of the adversary system in this very chamber would be a step in the right direction. I feel that our Fathers of Confederation settled more of their differences in a consultative fashion than we are able to do today. The law reform commission made reference to and recognized this fact in its report tabled in the House just a few days ago. We have, as a nation, not become more charitable, nor are we using a more compassionate approach in our dealings with underdeveloped countries. The reason for this is, in part, that our own country is still underdeveloped, not just in an industrial but in a human sense.

Just as we still arm our military personnel with weapons not only of defence but of aggression, just as we still consider it our right, indeed our duty, to defend our country and the interests of our friends against aggression in a territorial as well as a political sense, and just as we are still prepared to kill the aggressor without an evaluation of the innocence or guilt of the individual whose life we are taking, so do we have the responsibility to protect our society from the fear of death inflicted on it by the criminal elements within our borders. I do not say it is right and proper that this should be an ongoing process, but this is the reality of 1976, the reality of the times.

I have the greatest respect for my colleagues who do not agree with me and whose conviction is not altered by political expediency. I, too, wish the world would be a better place to live in, a place without fear of war, hunger and suffering. But, Mr. Speaker, it is not. I, too, wish medical science and the science of human psychology were advanced to the point where remedial action were possible to deal with sick and criminal minds. But it is not.

My colleague, the hon. member for Yukon, our party's critic of the Solicitor General's department, and a retentionist, spoke earlier in the debate about war. He spoke of his own experience as a bomber pilot over enemy territory discharging death and destruction on innocent people. He spoke of the fear he suffered in valuing his own life, and the deterrent the fear of death was to his making another trip. It is no secret to my colleagues that I, as a young boy, was on the receiving end of what was discharged from the aircraft in which my friend was a passenger. What a crazy world this is! Surely it would have been a source of comfort to me then, at the age of 12 when the war ended, to know that Erik, too, was scared—although I do not believe that he was nearly as scared as I was, because I have much grey hair and he still looks much younger than I do. To understand how Erik and I feel about all that today, one would have had to experience what we went through. But it should not be too difficult to understand why we both feel that if it were only possible to identify individuals who cannot be taught to conform with the norms of human justice, such individuals ought to be dealt with before they learn to operate in groups. God only knows what sort of a world we would have today if someone had had the fortitude to deal with Adolf Hitler before his rise to power.

It is true that society as a whole is partly to blame for its mistakes which often result in the dissidence of some of its members. But no society is truly free unless it is prepared to work diligently to correct its mistakes and prevent them from recurring. I also sympathize with the person who would have to make the final decision and put his signature to the execution order if capital punishment were returned. But surely this has to be one of the burdens he must bear if he competes for his mandate and the trust and confidence of the people who elect him to his office.

Today, Mr. Speaker, 80 per cent of people throughout Canada wish to retain some form of capital punishment. The reason is that they feel insecure and cheated by their political leaders who demand one thing of them and do another thing themselves. Canadians have been told too many untruths. They fear that the government is not really serious in its attempts to tighten the judicial process and restore the principle of law and order. The 25-year mandatory sentence provision could be rescinded next year once capital punishment is abolished. That is how some people feel. After all, this very government, in 1974, fought an election of the issue of wage and price controls. It said that we did not need such controls in the free society in which we live. Once the government was elected, it brought these controls in—and some people think the program will not work. People have lost faith and confidence in the group of individuals who sit opposite. They do not think they are really serious about tightening our bail provisions and doing those things which will restore peace, order, security and trust in our system.

The people have lost confidence. Between 85 per cent and 90 per cent of our people are worried. It worries me, as it does the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Solicitor General, that we should be part of a society of so-called barbarians who want to kill people. I, too, would like to abolish capital punishment. But we cannot, because society is threatened and 85 per cent of the people of Canada have lost faith in the system. For that, the government is partly to blame.

The peace and security package is only a charade, as the "just society" was and as the "free vote" the Prime Minister has promised will be. Most members of the cabinet will not be guided by their conscience or by the direction given to them by their constituents; they will be guided by their political ambitions. Even ambitious Liberal backbenchers will fall in line. There is, however, a provision, and I advance that to my colleagues across the way.

● (1240)

Mr. Caccia: How about your colleagues who will vote for the bill?

Mr. Oberle: You, my friend, will have a chance to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member address the Chair and get back to the subject of Bill C-84.

Mr. Oberle: With all respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that I have departed too far from the text. If the hon. member opposite will live by Your Honour's ruling, I will not be very much longer. I was saying that Liberal backbenchers will also fall in line when the free vote is taken—the free vote promised for Bill C-84 which is the subject under debate. There might, however, be an incentive for some of them to defeat the bill, if for no other reason than the fact that the Solicitor General would have to resign. That would create a vacancy in this shaky cabinet: one of the trained seals across the way might then fall into the slot.

Canadians in all parts of our country will learn, from the results of the final vote on Bill C-84, not only the extent to which our system will protect them from violent criminals, but also the extent to which our present government has removed itself from the popular demands and the will of our citizens.

[Translation]

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, as far as I can see, today's debate seems to have become some sort of a tradition established by this government. Indeed, I was listening to my colleague, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) and many others. They had the opportunity to take part in three debates on capital punishment since they received their mandate as representatives of their constituents.

As for me, Mr. Speaker, it is the first opportunity I have to speak on a bill to abolish the death penalty. Since the last debate dates back to 1973 and I was elected at the 1974 general election, I imagine that all hon. members who were able to speak during all those debates must find it utterly ridiculous to keep harping on the same issue. The Canadian people do not elect and pay their member to see him start considering all over again the same old bill without ever coming to a final solution in keeping with the feelings and the wishes of the majority.

Although I did not take part in the previous debates, because, as I said earlier, I was not the member for Villeneuve, I cannot help finding utterly ridiculous the situation in which we find ourselves today, because of the stubbornness and the obvious lack of goodwill and common sense showed by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). One thing is clear: he is consistent. In some people, it may be a quality, but the stubbornness of the Solicitor General of Canada verges on monomania and obsession and he is bent on abolishing capital punishment. Failures do not stop him.

Year after year, election after election, he introduces a bill to abolish the capital punishment. Although he knows full well that most Canadians are against abolition, what does he care. All the members of the House have refused up to now to abolish capital punishment, for it is obvious that the constituents all across Canada will lose faith in their members should they dare go boldly against their wishes. But all that, Mr. Speaker, does not refrain the Solicitor General from coming back once again with yet another bill. It must be recognized that, this time, he was well prepared along with his colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). They are beginning to be called the "Laurel and Hardy" of Parliament, Mr. Speaker. They came along with their peace and security package which is a mixture of thousands of all kind of provisions among which we can find, if we look closely, the abolition of capital punishment.

Why is it that the minister did not come openly and directly with a bill advocating abolition of capital punishment? Why did he feel obliged to devise a colossal joke such as the so-called program on public peace and security instead of simply trying to abolish capital punishment outright? In our opinion, it is merely because the minister knows that the great majority of Canadians are in favour of maintaining capital punishment. Consequently, he is using hypocrite methods and diverted means to impose his will to the people.

Mr. Speaker, is that democracy? The minister's position is shocking. He does not care at all about the opinion of Canadians. It seems to us that the minister is so intelligent that he can decide what is good for everyone, without taking into consideration the views of the people. This is the philosophy that prevailed in the days of the cave-man when the law of the mighty was the law of the land. However, with civilization, we have discovered the concept of democracy which means, in our opinion, that the voice of the majority must determine the course to be followed. The minister does not believe in that. Even when the majority of Canadians, even when most Canadians, believe that the death penalty should be imposed, he himself believes that his views must take precedence and that the death penalty should be abolished.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot have confidence in the Solicitor General now in office, because his credibility has shrunk to 20 below zero. Indeed, if you remember, in 1973, he succeeded in having a legislation passed restricting the death penalty to people killing policemen and prison guards.

● (1250)

This same minister, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has not even been able to implement his own 1973 legislation up to this day. He has systematically prevented the law from being applied to people who had murdered policemen and prison guards. Today, Mr. Speaker, the same minister is back again. He stands before us as if nothing had happened and he is asking us to have faith in him and to pass this bill he has introduced. I say to him, Mr. Speaker, that if he wants our confidence, he has to show his mettle first and implement the existing legislation. How can he hope to gain our support when it is a well-known fact that he does not have the guts to implement the laws voted here by the people's representatives?

The Solicitor General announced recently that he would resign, and we cannot even be sure of that. We can no longer believe what he says. Once he asked that we support him on something and then he turned around and did the very opposite. He told us: "We will hang only those who will have murdered policemen or prison guards". And later, this same minister refused to apply the law.

Mr. Speaker, the death penalty issue is much simpler than some would have us believe. As regards our duty as legislators, is is obvious: we must respect the will of the people. The true issue is not to manipulate statistics the way we like. It is well known, and even hon. members opposite know, that figures and statistics can be made to say almost anything.

As far as we are concerned, what must guide us today in this debate is not our personal opinion or that of the Solicitor General but rather that of most Canadians. That is why many times have asked the minister for a referendum and I ask him again today. A referendum should be held on the issue of capital punishment. The government refuses to allow such a referendum in spite of all the representations to that effect from all parts of the country and all groups of citizens. Why do they refuse? Simply because the government has no intention of listening to the majority. I quite agree: there are Liberal members who are willing to listen to the majority of the people they represent, and I congratulate them for it. However, most of them and especially the Solicitor General, know that the vast majority of Canadians want the death penalty reinstated; but they have no intention of respecting the wishes and aspirations of that majority.

The Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker, reminds me of a soldier on parade with his regiment. His mother, standing amidst the crowd, is saying: "Look at my son on parade. Do you see, he is the only one marching in step?" As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General has the same kind of reasoning. The vast majority of Canadians call for reinstating capital punishment, but the Solicitor General, the only one in authority, says: "I am the one who is right. I am abolishing the death penalty though no one agrees with me". Mr. Speaker, as we say back home, a fellow like that is "bull headed".

I have here, Mr. Speaker, letters that came to me from my riding. As the hon. member will notice, there is quite a pile of them, and I have others in my office. Then, Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General of Canada may have an idea what reaction his bill is provoking in my riding. It is too bad, Mr. Speaker, that he is not here in the House now. He may not be as blind as he seems to be deaf. He might see that people from Villeneuve—like all Canadians, for that matter—do not agree at all with his attitude when it comes to capital punishment. Mr. Speaker, if I read all the letters I have received, the Solicitor General would undoubtedly be retired, perhaps he would be drawing his old age security pension by the time I got through reading them.

Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to mention that the Federation of the Chambers of Commerce of Abitibi-Témiscamingue, through its chairman Mike Amadio, sent me a letter on May 15 last to ask for a referendum on capital punishment. That is why a few days later I came in the House to advocate a referendum on the matter because, in my opinion, the Chamber of Commerce represents a vast majority of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, I can give you another example. I received a letter concerning capital punishment from one of my constituents. Mr. Wellie Rossignol from Louvicourt, who proposes that members of parliament ask the residents of their ridings to express their opinion on capital punishment. He also suggests—and I find it very clever on his part—that only those who call for the abolition of capital punishment pay themselves for the support of murderers. That way, abolitionists will have to bear the full consequences of their vote. It is not logical that those who agree with capital punishment be obliged to pay for the support of gangsters who are kept alive simply because of those who oppose capital punishment. Logically, Mr. Speaker, those who do not agree with capital punishment should take it upon themselves to pay for keeping murderers alive. Here is another example of letters I receive. This is a questionnaire I sent to all voters in my riding to know about their view on capital punishment. I have received thousands of letters in response to those questions. More than 93 per cent of those who answered have decided in favour of retention of capital punishment. Those figures are clear and, in my opinion, my mandate is clear and is to oppose the passing of this bill. Mr. Speaker, some hon. members make confused speeches, like the one made by the Solicitor General a few weeks ago, to explain that the issue is complicated, that the crime problem will not be solved by resorting to capital punishment and that there is no easy solution. In my opinion, they are wrong.

For any member or minister, the issue of capital punishment should not be complicated. We are not sociologists who split hair or play with statistics to make them say what suits us. No. The member of Parliament has only one way to follow, that is the one indicated by people who have elected him to represent them. Otherwise, there is no democracy. Mr. Speaker, there are and there always will be people who think they are more intelligent than others, people who think they alone possess the truth, people who are always right whereas everybody else is always wrong.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, there will always be people who think they are wiser than others, that they are the only ones to be in step, that they are always right while all others are wrong. Mr. Speaker, they should not sit here in Parliament. Here we represent the people who elected us and we give a voice to those people who trusted us.

Our duty is to reflect as faithfully as possible the wishes and the expectations of those who rely on us and this is why, Mr. Speaker, the question of capital punishment is simple for a conscientious member of the House. All there is to do is to consult—as several members did—their constituents and act accordingly. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this is the role of a member of the House. Otherwise, there is no democracy.

We must admit that Parliament allows the Majority of Canadians to have legislation corresponding to their aspirations and wishes. Hon. members who do not agree with their constituents are facing a very simple problem. It is not difficult at all. If in spite of their disagreement with the wishes of their constituents, they are prepared to represent faithfully those clearly expressed wishes, for them, there is no problem either. On the other hand, if the hon. member is unable as a matter of conscience or ideology to act according to the wishes of his constituents, he only has to resign. It is very simple.

Mr. Speaker, I am fed up with those book worms who are trying to alter the basis of the problem by saying that capital punishment retention is a difficult and frightening issue which is not easy to resolve. It might be true as it is not easy to determine from a laboratory or an office by playing with figures if capital punishment can or cannot deter a criminal from committing a sordid crime. For the conscientious member, capital punishment is simple issue. For me, Mr. Speaker, and the people who elected me, the question is the following: Do they want or not the abolition of capital punishment? Sociologists and criminologists can continue to scrutinize statistics and do research to establish if capital punishment really has a deterrent effect.

For us, what is important is not what a sociologist believes or thinks, but what the majority of Canadians think and what they desire and ask. The solicitor general has many friends among sociologists and it is quite normal. He is their best client as he is always commissioning studies on capital punishment, and giving them subsidies of $1,000 here, $1,000 there, no problem. There is an old maxim that says, Mr. Speaker: Tell me who pays you and I'll tell you who you are.

The Solicitor General is the milk cow which feeds those criminologists who do not know what to do with their ten fingers. Do you think that guys like that would take the chance of making the Solicitor General of Canada angry? In my view, Mr. Speaker, these criminologists are not stupid. He is the one who feeds them, who enables them to live and consequently they prepare the reports he wants, reports which supposedly prove beyond any doubt that capital punishment is not a deterrent to crime.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is what they say in all these learned studies made at the back of dusty offices, far from reality. Meanwhile, policemen who are in direct contact with criminals are calling for the retention of capital punishment because they believe that criminals would think twice before killing if they know that they forfeit their own lives. Mr. Speaker, like all other hon. members, I received last week a letter from the executive director of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, Mr. Bernard Poirier, in which he says:

> We remain categorically and unequivocally opposed to the abolition of capital punishment.

This testimony has to be taken into account since it comes from our policemen, from people who are responsible for the protection of citizens against criminal activities. I also received a letter from Mr. Brown, Chairman of the Association of Metro Toronto Policemen. In his letter, he emphasizes that members of parliament must respect the will of people who have elected them as their representatives.

And he indicated that according to a survey by their own association, more than 87 per cent of Canadians favour capital punishment. These association presidents and police officers therefore urged that capital punishment be retained. So there we have the views of a responsible individual, familiar with criminals because he has met thousands of them. His business is fighting the murderers who endanger the lives of innocent citizens. He has a different knowledge of these criminals than a criminologist such as Ezzat Fattah, beloved child of the Solicitor General. Fattah is typical of the worst, the most dangerous group in social sciences. As I said, he thinks he knows better than the others, than 90 per cent of Canadians. He decided capital punishment is not an adequate deterrent. Police officers familiar with criminals, the people who want to be protected from those criminals, and every retentionist were wrong. He is that kind of a soldier, as I said, who alone walks in step, and so is the Solicitor General. He is the sort of guy who dares say that legislators should not heed the voice of the people.

This is more or less what that fathead stated in his study titled "Canadians and capital punishment", which was financed by the Solicitor General in person, of course. That guy is dangerous because he does not believe in democracy. He thinks the government should listen to him and not be concerned with what Canadians may think. It is with that kind of guys that people wake up in a dictatorship. They believe they are more intelligent and better qualified than every one else to decide what others should do.

In my name, and in the name of all my colleagues, I protest these insulting and ridiculous statements by Fattah the Fantastic who, in an attempt to give more weight to his criminology paper, does not hesitate to suggest people in favour of retaining capital punishment are less educated than abolitionists. But somewhere else, he states there are now more people in favour of capital punishment than 10 years ago.

Then the question arises whether he means that people are now less educated than they were 10 years ago? This of course is utterly ridiculous. People go to school longer. His statistics are based on a bunch of nonsense, just as Mr. Fattah is. People today have easier access to education than before, and this does not prevent them from favouring capital punishment, in spite of what he says.

Anyway, Mr. Speaker, I know people with PhD's as long and as fat as Mr. Fattah, who cannot even tell the difference between a gun and a murderer. They cannot even tell which one of the two is responsible for the murder. The present Solicitor General also belongs to that category of pseudo intellectuals who believe themselves more intelligent than 90 per cent of Canadians. Fortunately there happens to be some Liberals who are a little more intelligent than he, as they are for capital punishment.

Mr. Speaker, people like that who think they know better are a threat to freedom and democracy. Since we are living in one of the most developed countries on earth, what should matter is liberty and respect for the views of most Canadians. I am sure that Canadian taxpayers would be indignant to hear that their tax money is being squandered by the Solicitor General to pay a fat salary to a guy like Fattah who advocates that the government disregard what the people think. This is the icing on the cake. Not only are we paying taxes, but the money from these taxes is used so that people may tell the government to ignore what Canadians think and want.

This government will not get out of it so easily. The mandate it received in the 1974 elections did not include abolition of capital punishment. Mr. Speaker, I saw the Trudeau Express. I saw the smile of beautiful Margaret, but I never heard the right hon. Prime Minister or one of the government members say during the election campaign that the Liberal party wanted to abolish the death penalty. Yet, the government has now introduced a bill to abolish capital punishment. Despite surveys which show that more than 80 or 90 per cent of Canadians want the death penalty to be maintained, despite the thousands of letters which we receive daily in our offices and in parliamentary offices, to try to make us swallow this bill more easily, the government says that there will be a free vote on the issue.

Mr. Speaker, I want to issue a warning to hon. members who always support blindly their own party. They will have to answer to their voters if they put faithfulness to their party before respect for the wishes of the people they represent or are supposed to represent. As I said earlier, for the members of this House, the issue of the death penalty is not complicated, it is not a moral for a theological or a conscience issue, it is first and foremost a question of respecting one's voters. If the voters, the constituents of a member say that they wish the death penalty to be maintained, the member should vote for the retention of the death penalty. If some members do not understand this, they should not be sitting in this House.

For my part, and I think that this is clear, my fellow citizens of the Villeneuve riding have written to me, and, as I said earlier, I have received thousands of letters from people asking me to oppose firmly the bill introduced by the Solicitor General of Canada, which we are now considering.

If my constituents, as most Canadians, are opposed to the abolition of capital punishment, it is because they are fed up seeing criminals slaughtering with impunity innocent citizens because the law is not severe enough to have a really deterrent effect. Mr. Speaker, these honest citizens, who abide by the laws and who respect their fellow beings, witness horrible and sordid crimes and they know that their children, their spouses could be the next victims of some bloody murder. They also know that, with the death penalty, the murderer can only be a threat to society.

Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General himself recognized this fact in his report published in March 1975 when he said that it is just as obvious that the death penalty definitely eliminates the threat that an individual can pose to society. Canadians are not blind. They can see that criminals are not afraid of the law. If they kill, they are sent to prison for three, four, five or ten years and then they are let free and can go on working havoc. We know that about 300 horrible crimes have been committed in Canada since last year.

I have here an article published in the February 13, 1976 issue of the Ottawa Journal. In this article, it is said that the 19-year-old murderer who killed a 16-year-old gas station operator during an armed robbery asked the police: "Does it really matter even if I killed him? I am 19 years old, even if I am sentenced to life imprisonment, it won't last more than 20 years because life imprisonment in Canada is imprisonment for a maximum of 20 years. And, if I am lucky, I will be freed on parole much before that".

That is what murderers are saying, Mr. Speaker: Why worry? The worst that can happen to me is life imprisonment. Life imprisonment never means more than 20 years, and often less than 10.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians are tired of risking their lives while the same Solicitor General fusses around with philosophy. Canadians want the criminal to put his life on the line. If he takes the life of an innocent, he looses his. Capital punishment opponents often say that life is too valuable for society to execute killers. Those people seem to forget that the lives of the innocent victims are as valuable as those of the assassins. What can we do?

And what can we do to protect and force the killer to put his most valuable asset on the line? That is what justice demands. That is what Canadians demand. That is why, Mr. Speaker, we must take our responsibilities and respect the clearly expressed will of the great majority of our fellow citizens and reinstate capital punishment. When the people have spoken, the government only has to obey. That is the message, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to convey today on behalf of the people of my constituency of Villeneuve.

[English]

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, since the start of this debate about 34 speakers have participated in the discussion of the bill before us, and in making a quick calculation I find the breakdown is as follows: one NDP member has spoken, which is somehow a disturbing silence on the part of that party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There have been two speakers from this party.

Mr. Caccia: Also, one independent member, 14 Liberals and 13 Conservatives. Of those who have spoken so far, about 12 have spoken in favour of the bill, namely, in support of the abolition of capital punishment, and about 22 have spoken against, namely, in support of retaining capital punishment. I know that several members are undecided on this very important matter, and it is for that reason that those of us who have made up our minds feel it is worth while to participate in this debate.

Those who are against the abolition of capital punishment can be divided into two groups, those who have strong personal beliefs, and those who follow the results of a questionnaire that has been circulated in their ridings. In the first group, those who are in favour of retaining capital punishment have so far failed to prove that capital punishment is a deterrent. So far in this debate no one has come up with any evidence to prove that. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the onus is on the retentionists because it is they who propose to take a life in return for a murder. I challenge them to come forward with the proof that the penalty is a deterrent or is an effective preventive measure.

This morning, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) said, if I understood him correctly, that he considers the question of whether or not the death penalty is a deterrent as irrelevant, that it does not mean anything to him, that it is not part of the consideration which we should include in arriving at a conclusion. Instead, he considers illiteracy as a relevant criterion. I reject that argument because it implies that people with better education are less prone to commit murder. I believe it has to be substantiated by facts before this strange thought is put forward for our consideration. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has sent me a correction—for which I thank him—saying that so far two NDP members have spoken in this debate and a third one is to come.

The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River went on to say that he considers it more important to deal with the question of the adversary system in labour relations, that if we had less of the adversary system in this chamber it would be a step in the right direction. I invite the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River to speak to his leader and his frontbenchers to see whether they will heed his advice, but I do not think these considerations are relevant to the question whether in Canada, in 1976, we should continue to have the death penalty on our books.

The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River proceeded by saying that really this is not going to be a free vote, and that it will be a kind of alignment of backbenchers on the government side just to vote for the bill because of our personal political ambitions. I should like to draw to his attention that it has already been demonstrated by interventions on the part of hon. members of his own party that there will be a free vote. Frontbenchers and backbenchers of the Conservative party will be voting for this bill, and therefore they will demonstrate with their vote that this is, and was meant to be a free vote—and quite rightly and understandably so.

Before going on, I should like to be allowed to quote from a book written 200 years ago by a man who was born in the same town in which I was born. In 1764 he published a book about crime and punishment, and this passage translates as follows:

> The death penalty cannot be useful, because of the example of barbarity it gives men. If the passions or the necessities of war have taught the shedding of human blood, the laws, moderators of the conduct of men, should not extend the beastly example, which becomes more pernicious since the inflicting of legal death is attended with much study and formality. It seems to me absurd that the laws which are an expression of the public will, which detest and punish homicide, should themselves permit it, and that to deter citizens from murder, they order a public one. Which are the true and most useful laws?

That is the question which Cesare Beccaria asked. He was a writer, philosopher and thinker 200 years ago who put what I just read down in a book. He also argued as follows:

> The objective of the penal system . . . should be to devise penalties only severe enough to achieve the proper purposes of security and order—

I doubt very much if there are many in this chamber who disagree with this conclusion. He went on to say:

> The effectiveness of criminal justice depends largely on the certainty of punishment rather than on its severity. Penalties should be scaled to the importance of the offence.

He continues:

> Beccaria was the first modern writer to advocate the complete abolition of capital punishment and may therefore be regarded as a founder of the abolition movements that have persisted in most civilized nations since his day.

Why have so many countries since then done away with the death penalty? If we look at the western world, who is left amongst the countries which apply the death penalty? To the best of my knowledge, in the western world they are France, Spain and some southern states of the United States, because there that is a provincial responsibility.

If the death penalty were the answer, why is the murder rate higher in some countries where the death penalty is practised than in some countries where it has been abolished? The answer to this question must come from the retentionists, from those who want the death penalty, because, as I said before, the onus is on them to prove that it is a measure which does deter. Perhaps the retentionists, following this intervention, might wish to address themselves to this question.

There is another question. Looking over what has happened in the history of humanity, when the death penalty is involved, who is really affected? Is it the rich, the poor or those somewhere in between? We really have not been able to find, in the records of those who have been executed, cases of people who have had the means to pay for a good defence and all possible means at their disposal to protect their lives. However, there is a long list of people who could be considered the weakest elements in society, who could not afford to do so, who were the victims and who were executed because of lack of a sufficient and adequate defence.

I was intrigued by the intervention of an hon. member a couple of days ago when he said that perhaps, instead of carrying out the death penalty by hanging, we should still have the death penalty but we should have it, as he put it, in a gentle manner. It was not elaborated upon, but one could imagine—if we were to have things that way—that perhaps the person to be executed would find a pill served with his breakfast, discreetly covered by a napkin, and a note saying, "Whenever you are ready, please help yourself. We will take care of the funeral expenses, of course". That is the kind of thinking going on in the minds of some hon. members who feel that we should still have the death penalty, but that we should change the way we are to put it into effect.

I know this is a rhetorical question, but what can be done to bring back the lives of those people who are executed in error? Some people say there are not any, or only very few, but even if there were only one it should be sufficient cause for us to pause and think. However, it is more than that. The records of Sing-Sing which have been kept since 1890, prove that 12 per cent of the lives which were taken there were taken in error—12 per cent, or 50 people, who afterwards were discovered to have been innocent. Who is going to bring back those lives, I ask hon. members of this chamber who want to retain capital punishment? Obviously, the answer is no one, because it is too late.

I should like to discuss for a moment the kind of punishment in our society which would stand as the one we would consider to be preferable. Which one is more likely to be remembered; in other words, when life is taken or freedom is taken? Let us consider the following situation in which a life is taken. We have all read about it. It is in the early hours of the morning. It is cold and damp. There is a priest following the man to be executed, saying the last prayers. There is the director of the prison, one reporter, a doctor who has to pronounce the man dead once he has been hanged; there is the executioner waiting there, and next to him there is a strong and heavy person. That is the person who is supposed to throw his weight and hang from the legs of the executed person until they are sure he is dead.

Is that the kind of scene we would like to see happening again in Canada? I ask this question seriously. Surely we do not, and the majority of Canadians do not. If the majority of Canadians were to see a scene like this, they would want to do away with that kind of approach.

What kind of punishment is society more likely to remember and to be impressed by as a measure whereby the state is effective and efficient in catching up with those who have committed a crime? That is the case when freedom is taken away. When a man is kept in an institution for 5, 10, 20 or 30 years of his life, he is daily a physical example, of one who has been taken away. All those who live in that region, who drive by, who read the news, know that he has been taken and continues to receive steady punishment. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) said the other day, these people rot away in the prisons. Other members have said the same thing. This should be a cause of concern to us because such treatment is not human. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, it is not a reason for supporting the retention of the death penalty in Canada.

The second category that I wish to deal with is all those people who have spoken before me and who are supporters of the death penalty because of questionnaires. When listening to them, I ask myself whether they really believe in making up their minds through means of a questionnaire. It should be remembered that ten years ago Canadian public opinion was in favour of the abolition of the death penalty. Would they have supported that? Suppose that ten years from now Canadian public opinion should swing again in favour of abolition. Where would they stand then? How will they account for the lives taken in the meantime? Will they say, "I go as the wind blows. If it blows from the east, I will vote one way; and if it blows from the west ten years later, I will vote the other way"? Is that the position they will take? I am sure it is not, Mr. Speaker. Are they certain that elected representatives are to be void of ideas on this vital subject? Is that the indication, that they are empty inside and their opinion is formed as the result of a questionnaire? Is that the thesis they put to this House? I doubt it very much.

We all receive letters in the mail which accuse the cabinet of having acted outside the law when it commutes the death penalty. I think it is important in this debate to put on record that cabinet does not act outside the law when it commutes a death sentence. Section 684(1) of the Criminal Code, approved by this parliament, gives the power to cabinet to commute death sentences. This matter has been raised in many public meetings in Davenport and I have received the question, in the form of letters, from many parts of the country as well.

A debate of this kind would not be complete without some remarks devoted to rehabilitation of inmates in our prisons and the prevention of crime in our communities. It seems to me a system of flexibility and of incentives would permit the rehabilitation of the convicted person. The shortcoming that exists in this bill is that the fixed, rigid terms for murder do not offer any ray of hope, even with the best performance and behaviour. The convicted person will have to wait a fixed number of years for release, regardless of the quality of his conduct in the penitentiary. I would ask for the removal of fixed terms in order that those who deserve it may benefit from the rehabilitation process. I hope that this desirable flexibility will be introduced at committee stage, and if not then, at a time when an atmosphere of better understanding prevails.

I was very impressed when I attended a public meeting in St. Jean, Quebec, organized by a group called ARCAD. This group had held public meetings throughout southern Quebec with the intention of bringing together members of the community and prison inmates with the co-operation of the penitentiary service and the Secretary of State. A lot of tough questions are asked at the meetings, and interesting answers are given in an educational process which raises the perception and understanding of all who participate.

Prevention is a subject that deserves a full debate in itself. From what I know, much needs to be done with the young, particularly those growing up in our large cities. Community workers are necessary in cases where guidance and direction are missing. We should be particularly concerned with the growing number of youngsters placed in the care of foster homes. That is not to say that all foster homes do not offer an adequate environment; most probably do. But there remain a certain number of young people who do not receive adequate attention and grow up according to the rules of the street. Eventually they may drift, picking up bad habits and ending up in deep trouble.

Another question we should ask ourselves in this debate is whether, once a person has been convicted and stored away in one of our maximum security penitentiaries, we can really expect, considering the conditions that prevail in most penitentiaries, that he will again become self-reliant and able to function properly after many years of imprisonment. In view of what seems to be going on in our high-security penitentiaries today, I am sure particularly in places like Laval, that the quality of our penitentiary service needs to be improved.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I offer a challenge to members of this House who really believe in the death penalty to come forward in this debate with the proof and the facts that will support their thesis that society will be better off, better protected, by its retention. The onus is on the members who are advocating the taking of human life by the state in retaliation for murder; it is on those who want the state to reply to a murder with a coldly calculated kill. If members who believe in the death penalty will not come forward with the facts and the information in support of their stand — and so far they have not — they will have failed to demonstrate the validity and the merits of the stand they are taking in the name of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that Canadians can be better protected by means other than the death penalty—by adequate penalties and punishment for murder, for assault, rape and other forms of violence, with better penitentiary services, by improving the rules governing the release of inmates on full parole, day parole and temporary absence, through crime-prevention measures, through improved social services and with the help of youth workers in the community. Hon. members know that the tendency toward crime starts long before the crime takes place. We have to go to the root of the problem, Mr. Speaker—and the death penalty does not!

The bill before us is a step in the right direction, and I support it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate today I wish to say that I do not do so with any sense of pleasure or elation. I venture to say this feeling is shared by a great many members, if not all, of those taking part. Rather, it is a sense of responsibility that causes many of us to participate in a debate of such importance. I am sure all of us are aware of the fact that Canadians are alarmed at the breakdown in the administration of justice in this country. They are very anxious for something definite and concrete to be done in order to reverse the trends we now find in society.

● (1450)

A short time ago the House considered Bill C-83, which was designed to reduce the incidence of violent crime. Now we are considering the other bill in the package, Bill C-84, which deals with capital punishment. This is the fourth major debate on capital punishment in which I have participated. As I read the speeches made back in 1966, 1967 and 1973, and compare them with the speeches delivered to date in the debate of 1976, I cannot help but wonder what the government has been trying to prove in consistently bringing this matter before the House.

I made the point in my speech of 1973, which my hon. friend for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) raised as for back as 1967, that the government is using the capital punishment debate as a diversionary tactic to divert public attention from our economic problems. That is one element I wish to bring to the attention of the House, although I am sure many hon. members are perceptive enough to recognize that fact. The second element I wish to bring to the attention of the House is this: regardless of what we in this House decide about this legislation, and particularly if we reject it, the government will still continue on its present course. This government has made up its mind that no one is going to be executed, and regardless of what parliament says it will have its own way.

The government disregarded the will of parliament in 1966 by introducing a new bill on capital punishment in 1967. It has disregarded the will of parliament since that time by automatically commuting the death sentence of every person convicted of capital murder. When parliament, in 1973, extended the partial ban on capital punishment, the government completely disregarded the will of parliament by procrastination and the postponement of justice. In Canada today we have 11 individuals under sentence of death.

So I say, again, that this debate is a diversionary tactic. Why else would the government pursue a course which permits 100 speakers or so to participate in debate on the issue? What they say will not influence the direction the government is taking. If this bill passes, I imagine nothing will change. It will make it easier for the government to do what it has been doing in the past. If this bill is defeated, the government will continue to act against the intent of the law as it stands until the economic situation reaches a stage some time in the future where the government will need another diversion. Then, without doubt, we shall have another debate on capital punishment—and it could take place as early as next year if this bill is defeated.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that people are skeptical about the bill. I am skeptical, because it is difficult to be anything but skeptical when we consider the actions and performance of this government. I state that at this moment I am against the abolition of the death penalty and it is my intention to vote against this bill. Nothing I have heard in the three previous debates on this issue or in this debate has made me change my mind. I have listened to all the arguments, including the argument of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), even though he has accused individuals who hold views opposite to his as lacking intelligence, and although he may question our intelligence I can suggest one thing: I know many individuals of the same persuasion as me, but if they were in the position of the Solicitor General and had to implement a law in which they did not believe personally, they would resign. That minister has chosen to ignore the intent of the law, he has talked, in all seriousness about lack of perspective and "stumbling blocks to an intelligent and informed public discussion of the real problem." The latter comment appears on page 13088 of Hansard for May 3, 1976.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Solicitor General himself is lacking in perspective, otherwise he would have resigned long ago because of his views on capital punishment and refusal to carry out the present intent of the law. Furthermore, if the minister wants to talk about stumbling blocks, I say that he and the government are the major stumbling blocks to a reasonable and rational system of justice and administration of justice in this country.

I speak for an area of Canada which has the misfortune to contain possibly as many as 13 penal institutions, including the Matsqui institution in which are housed serious offenders, including a number of those convicted of the crime of murder. I believe that the increase in lawlessness in this country, and particularly the increase in violent crime in my area, dates from the time the former solicitor general stated in the House that from then on the emphasis of the government would be on the rehabilitation of the criminal, rather than the protecting of society. The minister opposite can quote all the statistics he wants, but he, his predecessor and the government must share the blame for the deterioration in the administration of justice in this country.

I have stated on a number of occasions that I am not against the rehabilitation of the criminal. I believe that this rehabilitation is essential. It should be one of our major responsibilities and prime objectives. But I do not believe that it should be done at the expense of the citizens of this country.

Mr. Caccia: Nobody said that.

Mr. Patterson: I listened intently to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) when he spoke, and I heard his interjection. I suggest that his interjection hardly corresponds with some of the statements which have been made. As I pointed out, the major objective, or the main emphasis, will be the rehabilitation of the criminal rather than the protection of society. If the hon. member challenges my interpretation of the minister's remark, he may look it up for himself.

As we consider the situation in which we find ourselves today, I am sure we shall recognize and acknowledge the fact that rehabilitation is of vital importance. We have been living in a period of permissiveness in society which has shown itself not only in juvenile delinquency but in the lack of ethical conduct on the part of government—I am speaking generally now—which is indicated by charges laid against some in the business community with respect to kickbacks and bribes. It has shown itself in practically every area of our society. You have minor crime and major crime. I believe that this directs our attention to one thing, Mr. Speaker. If we are to solve the problem of crime in Canada, it will have to be done by a redirection of our society. If not, I am afraid the future will be rather bleak, to say the least.

I wish to refer briefly to an article that appeared in the Ottawa Journal of Saturday, April 10, 1976, headed "Delinquency Casebooks: 'Sick' Facts", written by Journal reporter Ian Haysom. I am sure that all members have read the article so I will not put on the record more than two or three paragraphs. I quote:

● (1500)

A disturbing number of Ottawa teenagers—

We could substitute "Canadian teenagers".

—are dwelling in a world of sex, crime, drugs and violence—and many are encountering deep emotional difficulties as a result, according to social agencies in the city.

Teenage prostitution—sometimes involving girls as young as 13 and 14—is becoming increasingly evident . . . He—

That is referring to a social worker.

—identifies the main problem areas in Ottawa as juvenile prostitution; under-age drinking (and subsequent alcoholism); teenage depression and other psychological problems; promiscuity (leading to venereal disease and unwanted babies, especially among 14 and 15-year olds); crime (especially vandalism and breaking and entering); the emergence of gangs in certain areas of the town; drug-taking and pushing; and a general trend towards teenage violence.

[Mr. Patterson.]

When we consider this in light of the problems we are facing in Canada, the problems do not just concern the teenagers and juveniles. It is a failure on the part of society down through successive generations, the last several generations in any event, to face up to the responsibility in which justice prevails, honesty and uprightness are characteristics to be desired, and righteousness is exalted above the iniquity we see about us.

While believing very strongly in the principle that in the final analysis we, as individuals, are responsible for our own actions and must suffer the penalty for wrongdoing, I do not hesitate to say that in trading off moral and spiritual values for the seeming benefits of crass materialism and secularism, successive generations are providing the climate in which selfishness, disrespect for the rights of others, and naked violence find ready expression. Spiritual laws have been repudiated, the old-fashioned virtues have been replaced by the so-called new morality, and situation ethics have taken the place of the principle of right and wrong. To the extent that this development has been promoted or countenanced by society, we share in the guilt of those whose activities we are now attempting to curb.

Therefore, one of our main responsibilities is the rehabilitation of those who have been caught up in these trends and circumstances. Instead of elevating and challenging our young people to the highest principles and motivations of life, we have allowed them to drift aimlessly, caught up by these influences that are working for the degredation of human society.

I just give that as background to the main issue before us today. I have pointed out that even though we believe it is important and necessary to retain a system for severe penalties and crime, we must recognize that we have a responsibility wherever we can to salvage, assist, and rehabilitate those caught up in these situations.

I should like to briefly comment on the question of deterrence that the minister likes to talk about so much. He and the government claim categorically that the death penalty is not a deterrent to murder.

I would like to put on the record a couple of quotations from a study of "Punishment: its Severity and Certainty", by Bailey and Smith, published in the "Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science", December 1972. I quote from page 531 of this study:

The lesson to be learned from capital punishment is not that punishment does not deter, but that the improper and sloppy use of punishment does not deter or rehabilitate.

This of course makes sense to everyone but the government. The government since 1962 has seen fit to ignore the law and not administer capital punishment, and yet when he wants to quote statistics the minister uses the period since then to back up his claim that capital punishment does not deter. This is the folly of the minister's reasoning.

Severity of the punishment is an important element in deterrence theory, but of equal importance is the certainty of the punishment. It is not enough to have a severe penalty like capital punishment on the statute books. The penalty must be used or it is no longer a penalty.

I quote again from the study:

Deterrence theory suggests that the severity and certainty of punishment are additive factors. That is, when punishments are severe and administered with certainty, maximum deterrence results. Inversely, when punishments are slight and uncertain, deterrence will be minimal. Common sense as well as some evidence, would seem to support these assertions.

Because of time I shall only quote one piece of evidence from a study of crime in the United States in 1968, recorded in the same article:

The average homicide rate of states with low levels of certainty and severity was found to be three times the average for states with high levels of certainty and severity. Eighty-one per cent of the states with both low values of severity and certainty had homicide rates above the nation's average, while only 9 per cent of states high on both severity and certainty had rates above the average.

These facts are very enlightening in view of the many statements the minister and other members of the government have been making on the subject of deterrence. As one last thought on this subject, I would like to point out that we do not hear of many people who would go to the Solicitor General or some police officer and state, "I had intended to kill someone, but I changed my mind when I thought about the punishment."

Several years ago, and this was referred to in some of the previous debates, a man who had been incarcerated for murder and was either on parole or had escaped got into another situation in which the police were involved. When asked why he did not shoot the policeman, he replied that he knew that he could face the death penalty. Regardless of what the minister or anyone else says, there was a deterrent as far as that individual was concerned. We do not know how many others were called upon to make a decision in light of that fact. In reality we do not know how much of a deterrent capital punishment, or any punishment, for that matter, has been. Most people just will not admit, or the occasion will not arise for them to admit, that they have been deterred from committing a crime.

I would recommend the article to which I have referred as good, enlightening reading for the Solicitor General and other members of the government, together with another article published in the journal of the same name in December, 1973, and entitled, "The Impact of Certainty and Severity of Punishment on Levels of Crime in American States: an Extended Analysis," by George Antunes and A. Lee Hunt.

The minister has made much of the so-called provision in this bill which would substitute a mandatory 25-year prison sentence for capital punishment. May I say I do not believe the government has any intention of putting anyone in prison for 25 years. It has no more intention of sending anyone to prison for that length of time than it has of executing anyone should this bill be defeated. I say this because the bill contains at least one great loophole in this respect—I refer to the provision for review of a sentence after 15 years. If any hon. members remain uncommitted after this debate I hope they will look closely into this aspect.

The bill has been publicized as replacing capital punishment with a mandatory 25-year sentence. I submit that this is misleading. The 25 years is really a maximum sentence; in practice it will more likely be 15 years and perhaps something less than 15 years if the government can find a way to make this possible. This provision can be compared with the measure the government introduced in 1967, and again in 1973, when it wanted the unrestricted abolition of capital punishment. To pacify its own backbenchers it attached to these measures a provision for capital punishment in cases where prison guards or policemen were murdered. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the government had any intention of executing anyone: that provision was attached merely to enable it to get the support of its own members many of whom were opposed to abolition. Similarly, I do not believe the government has any intention of sending anyone to prison for the stated period of 25 years.

I should like to quote from the report of the Law Reform Commission of Canada entitled "Dispositions and Sentences in the Criminal Process." If hon. members have been reading these reports carefully they will understand quite clearly the source from which the government is deriving its ideas. On page 26 we read:

A prison sentence for the purpose of protecting society by separation should not be for more than twenty years.

Elsewhere in the report is an indication that it ought to be a lot less than 20 years, in the opinion of the Commission, so I hope hon. members will not be taken in by this tough talk about 25-year sentences. I would point out that Bill C-83 itself says parole can be considered after 15 years.

In conclusion, may I say that I abhor capital punishment and I abhor murder, but I believe it is necessary for society to maintain the ultimate sanction in order to protect itself. Nevertheless, I am of the opinion that some other method of sanction should be considered in place of the present method. I should like to see a society in which punishment was not necessary, a society in which we did not need jails, and in which people could live in peace. I believe Canada, under the present situation, has gone further away from that goal. It is unfortunate that this should be happening, because until we reach that goal we must live in a society where jails, punishment and, indeed, capital punishment, are necessary facts that face us.

I should like now to refer to two or three letters I have received. I do not intend to read them all, but they were forwarded to me just the other day, together with petitions from my constituents. One of them is directed to me as the member for Fraser Valley East, and to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). It states:

We, citizens of Abbotsford District and Matsqui Municipality, located in the central Fraser Valley of British Columbia, are living in the midst of thirteen penal institutions with an inmate population of approximately 2,500 prisoners. Because of the increasing frequency of violent crimes committed by prisoners who have been granted passes and parole, and by persons released on bail awaiting trial, we believe our personal and public safety is seriously threatened by your present system.

Therefore, we petition the Department of Justice:

(1) to refuse to grant parole or temporary absences to prisoners guilty of murder, rape or drug trafficking.

(2) to refuse to grant such persons bail while awaiting trial.

(3) that these policies be instituted as law throughout Canada and enforced by the Department of Justice.

The other letter is addressed to myself and to the Solicitor General. It is along the same lines but it has to do with capital punishment. The petition reads:

Therefore, we petition the cabinet and the Attorney General's Department that for all persons convicted of murder the death penalty be maintained and enforced within the shortest time possible.

Appended to each of these letters are between 1,500 and 2,000 signatures, indicating the grave concern felt by the people of my own constituency where, as hon. members know, there are some 13 criminal institutions within a small area. Attached to the petitions was a letter from the person who had circulated them. I want to read this letter.

Mr. A. B. Patterson, M.P.,

Dear Sir:

Enclosed herewith are two petitions signed by a large number of residents of this area for presentation to yourself and Hon. Ron Basford, Minister of Justice, and Mr. Warren Allmand, on the following matters:

1. Refuse parole or bail to persons awaiting trial on charges of murder, rape or trafficking.

2. Maintain death penalty for all persons convicted of murder and penalty enforced in shortest possible time.

On March 22nd, Council unanimously passed the following resolution:

MOVED by Alderman (Dr.) K. A. Boulton

SECONDED by Alderman Hougen that we endorse petitions presented for submission to Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

CARRIED:

Yours very truly,

JOHN K. HOCKING

MUNICIPAL CLERK

I put this on record to show that I am not speaking only from personal conviction when I say I believe we should retain this ultimate sanction so as to make it clear we shall not tolerate cold blooded murder, but that I am speaking on behalf of a great many of my constituents, including those who signed these petitions which are in themselves an indication of the predominance of support for capital punishment which exists across this nation of ours.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I suppose in a way that this long debate on abolition or retention of the death penalty can tempt any of us to a certain amount of cynicism and boredom. After all, the issue has been debated in so many countries, including our own, so many times that we all despair of throwing any new light on such a complex and emotional question.

The one thing of course that all of us agree on, whether we are abolitionist or retentionist in any form, is a respect and reverence for any human life. No matter where we get this from, whether from an innate moral, natural law, child training and or indoctrination or whatever, there is a paradox in this debate in that, although arguments may be heated, each side assumes a reverence for life and a need for protection of society. These are wanted by all.

The abolitionists generally argue that capital punishment is not an effective deterrent to crime and bring supporting arguments from social science studies, including those done by specialists in the field of criminology, as a sub-branch of sociology or social psychology. They likewise point to the evidence of states in the United States that are retentionist, or abolitionist, or countries of western Europe, to show that capital punishment cannot be proven to have any perceptible effect on the murder rate.

The retentionists generally argue on this point that deterrence can be interpreted in various ways; incidentally on this point so can the opinion polls for which some MP's seem to have an unwarranted adulation. This is especially true of their own made up private opinion polls which, without the use of proper methodology, can be easily abused. The abuses can be done subconsciously through the way questions are stated, the size and nature of the sampling process, and a whole series of pitfalls that are inherent in the process and known to anyone who has done research and methodology studies is sociology or social psychology. It is even so when trained specialists draw up these questionnaires and polls.

These polls can easily be used on such touchy questions as abolition and abortion for a member to escape from his or her responsibility to put their conscience first. I reject the notion completely that we are delegates here of the people. We are their representatives, and when they put us here they presumably did so deciding that our concern, understanding, and judgment would be brought to bear on these issues, not on what pseudo-scientific opinion polls suggest the majority of Canadians want. They, the people, through the ballot box are ultimately our judges.

The retentionists also argue that the threat of execution has an impact not provided by the threat of very long sentences of even life imprisonment. On the other hand, in 1954 Hugh G. Christie, then of Oakalla prison in Burnaby, B.C., told a special parliamentary committee that executions convinced other prisoners that they were hated, whatever their offences.

The retentionists argue that sometimes murderers are known to have broken out of jail, threatening society all over again. They also argue that the economic cost of maintaining society's most antisocial and threatening members is very high. Why should all Canadians have to maintain such a criminal for the rest of his or her life? The abolitionists reply that the judicial system can make mistakes, that once a person has been executed in error the mistake cannot be corrected. They also maintain that there seems to be a good deal of truth that executions deepen and maintain the violent instincts that are obviously predominant in our culture today, as for example in such popular art forms as movies.

I personally think there is a good deal to this argument, even though I consider its expression by some abolitionists as somewhat one-sided. One of the reasons that I am opposed both to abortions and the death penalty is that I think there is a "fall-out" on people's attitudes which tends, subtly but insidiously, to undermine the special regard we have traditionally held for human life in this country.

I also think that there is a good deal of truth for saying, and a considerable amount of systematic studies among criminologists to show, that juries tend to acquit when conviction means execution, whether by hanging or some other means. The retentionists argue that retribution is part and parcel of human nature and of every society. In fact our whole social and legal system is based on it.

The ultimate form of retribution is execution and social anthropologists have found it used in all societies at one time or another. Some retentionists, as every MP knows form his or her mail, point to its acceptability in the Bible, especially in the Old Testament, and they refer us to Genesis 9, verse 6.

Many of the latter are strictly biblical fundamentalists, regardless of what denominations they belong to. They seem either to be unacquainted with, or will not accept, modern Biblical scholarship, and while accepting certain hardcore teachings as fundamental to a Judaeo-Christian concept of life, put much of the scriptures in the cultural context of the times in which they were written. I respect the right of these people to favour the death penalty for premeditated murder. I must say, though, that when some of them use the name of Jesus Christ in support of capital punishment, I see red. If there is anything that all Christians share, and I also include here most Jews as well as Christians, about Christ and his teaching, it is that love, mercy, forgiveness, and compassion are the essence of his life and doctrine.

Granted that we need retribution against murderers for the sake of the safety and cohesiveness of society; that does not argue for the death penalty. I am in favour of the 20 or 25 year imprisonment for premeditated murders, as long as there is judicial review after 15 years and we get some built-in guarantees in the legislation that more of the medical resources of psychiatry, and more and better trained clinical psychologists, are attracted to the prison system by market and other types of incentives.

This decision is a vexing problem for all of us. We have to decide how we will vote in the privacy of our conscience, even if it does not seem to be the popular thing to do now, when pressure groups and opinion polls seem to be trying to persuade us that we should not exercise that precious right but should give in to some vague concept of "collective consciousness" in Canada.

It is obvious to us, Mr. Speaker, that one of the most important duties of government in any society is to protect its citizens against the effects of crime. The only possible reason, as I see it, for a member of parliament to vote for capital punishment would be its proven ability as a protection against murder. I cannot, in my conscience, accept the evidence for this proof as presented by retentionists, and I therefore intend to vote for the abolition of the death penalty in Canada.

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it has seemed to me that since coming to this Chamber your title, Sir, has an ironic twist, for though it is your duty to preserve order in this Chamber it is we who are the speakers, and we whose duty it is to give voice to the region we represent.

Contrary to public opinion it is not rare that we who are parliamentarians have the opportunity to deal with the synthesis of a wide variety of opinions expressed and even unexpressed, together with our own best judgment, but this is called a "free" vote. I submit, Sir, that every vote is a free vote, for every person here is free, due in part at least to the work of succeeding generations of parliamentarians and our democratic process. We are free to reflect in legislation our best judgment in our time, and in my case with a government which understands what liberalism really means in expressing philosophy.

The statute books of this nation at this time retain a law pertaining to capital punishment implemented in 1967, a law which has been de facto abolition. This law states in part that capital punishment is officially and legally suspended except for the murder of a law officer or any prison guard. This law was a product of a time which honestly believed it was on the road to abolition. Like the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) we were all confident that our nation would undergo the basic social changes necessary which would make the death penalty unnecessary.

An hon. Member: Then we got a Liberal government.

Mrs. Campagnolo: If the hon. member has a question, Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to entertain it.

Succeeding governments have commuted these penalties on examination of jury recommendations for mercy or otherwise by Her Majesty's right of clemency. Each time this action was taken by succeeding governments, Mr. Speaker, I submit it was done in the earnest expectation that indeed and at last "just around the corner" a new world, where abolition would be possible, would surely evolve. In my opinion that world, so devoutly desired, has not yet arrived and a decision must now be rendered at last.

The succeeding moratoriums have failed. "All the words have been said"—I quote my dear friend and colleague, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin), from the last debate in 1973, and who would be speaking today if she were here. We have basic changes to make in this world of ours and it is to this that our House should address itself before we can consider abolition of the death penalty as a move toward the security of all Canadians.

The most basic areas of change which I foresee as being paramount to a society in which abolition could be adopted are in parenting, child care, education, the media, and penal reform. I will amplify each of these only briefly, since again I am sure hon. members have heard it all before. For instance we blithely assume that, like the animals of nature, human beings are natural parents. Most are not. Parenting is an untaught art in our society, that unique distillation of love and discipline and example which can create in its best evolution a security for children to grow in knowledge of their place and role and responsibility to civilization as a whole.

Child care in our nation is yet another area largely unlearned. The fostering of children, our own or others, can be a richly rewarding service to humanity. But in our world we find neglect and mistreatment of children. We find adult selfishness intervening in the full development of a child's potential. We find children without rights or hope, and without a future.

Today's education seems stubbornly bent, at worst, on reteaching lessons for a world that is past, or in teaching for a world that is only here today and gone tomorrow. Education is an ongoing flow where one is taught not facts but rather the ability and capacity to constantly learn. In an ever-changing kaleidoscopic world of multi-data, all our citizens have a right to know how to think, to organize their lives, and to remain mentally agile enough to accommodate their lives to an increasingly altered and flexible lifestyle. Without such adaptability human beings are under a strain which is intolerable.

Another needed basic alteration appears self-evident. The media in general, and television in particular, that medium so powerful and all pervading that it can induce a consumer to choose one type of dog food over another, has profoundly changed our lives. But we refuse to come to terms with this fact and with this threat.

I ask members to cast their minds over recent television programs they have observed. Violence, death, and destruction dominate our "entertainment". In one average month on our own CBC there are more numbers viewed in this country than actually occur in the nation in a year. But let us examine those murders more closely. Our home screens portray actors dying quickly, cleanly, and without undue pain. Do hon. members know, let alone young impressionable minds, that television actors must portray violent death without undue anguish, blood, or even without taking too much time in synthetic dying? No wonder our society regards killing as of little lasting importance and believes life is expendable.

Then we look at penal reform. It has been infinitely stated in this debate, and in those that have preceded it, that until this nation is prepared to invest in the rehabilitation process for criminals and violent people in our society we will remain a criminal and violent society. I submit we will be faced, as a result, with taking on the responsibility of deciding the fate of those who so severely transgress our laws as to be non-reformable. Further it must be admitted there are sociopathic personalities who simply cannot distinguish between right and wrong, good and evil and what is acceptable social behaviour. There is no cure for these humans. What is our answer to the problem they represent?

It has been widely stated across our nation that members should vote as their constituents demand. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, contrary to I am sure what most constituents believe, on this particular matter constituents do not speak with one voice but with hundreds and thousands of voices. Parliament is being asked to decide. "Make a decision" is the outstanding theme of almost all who have joined in this national debate. Although an overwhelming majority do indeed desire retention of the death penalty it is true, the variations and gradations of the manner of that retention is a veritable babble of contrasts, and there is no consensus or no clearly defined direction. The option members have, is to follow their own judgment.

I would ask constituents everywhere to consider the words of Edmund Burke who stated, "Your representative owes you not his industry only but his judgment and he betrays you instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion."

In addition to what I consider our social unpreparedness to accept abolition of the death penalty, it is my opinion that it would be both illogical and inconsistent for me to vote for Bill C-84 for the following reasons. I arbitrarily accept that life commences at the moment of conception, a premise which I grant is not universal. In spite of this I endorse our law for therapeutic abortion. This, Mr. Speaker, is the taking of life, and I would refer to my speech in this House on that subject last May 29.

Similarly, although this House has not yet dealt with the ethical-moral problem of the unnatural extension of life by artificial means, and here I must state I consider euthanasia a misnomer although it must suffice as language is imprecise. This so called "life", artificially extended beyond clinical death over a protracted period of time, is abhorrent to me personally, and I believe not in the best interests of our society. If it were me or someone I loved in such extremity, I pray that the artificial "life" would be humanely terminated.

Feeling as I do on these other matters, it is not in accordance with my philosophy and judgment to deny the retention of our current law which should be duly enforced. Indeed in the case of those who so gravely transgress the laws of our society as to take the lives of those assigned by our society to be our protectors, I endorse the retention of the death penalty within the current law of our nation as one of the admittedly imperfect answers in our search for a secure society.

I submit that we are defining the shape of our national character in this debate and, although some of us might not like what we see, I regret that my idealism does not extend to acceptance of this as the moment in time to acknowledge that we have reached a sufficient level of civilization to allow us to abolish the death penalty, even though I am confident that the day will come when basic changes in our society will make such extreme punishment unnecessary.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, although I intend to speak in favour of retaining the death penalty in Canada at this time, I look forward to the day when it will not be necessary in our country. However, the government must accept the responsibility for the rising demand by the public for retention. Certainty of punishment is the best deterrent to crime we know.

The present laws have just not been enforced in a satisfactory manner—in effect, the government is seen to have shirked its responsibility in this matter. Hon. members have already pointed out that the actual time served in prison by 42 murderers paroled between 1968 and 1974 averaged just over 13 years, and that in 1974 alone over 1,000 temporary absence permits were issued to inmates convicted of capital murder. Surely at this time we would be well advised to retain the death penalty in limited cases of murder rather than to ram this bill through and further diminish respect for the law.

I have the greatest respect for the many constituents who have telephoned and written to me favouring abolition; however, I feel that I represent the apparent majority of my constituents who wish to have the death penalty retained.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This can only be done with the permission of the hon. member because it takes away some of his allotted time. Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I thank the hon. member. I want to preface my question with the remark that I respect whichever position he holds on this contentious issue. I would like to ask him a simple question. Since this is to be a free vote, how can he state in the House, without at least smiling, that anyone is trying to ram the bill through the House?

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I do not consider that all of us will be allowed to have a free vote in the House. We will on this side, but I have my doubts about the other side.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) misses the whole point about the trust delegated by the Canadian people to elected representatives. Those who put themselves forward for positions of civic responsibility cannot opt out of that responsibility by claiming it is too heavy for them. We are placed here in Canada to manage our day to day affairs, and short of divine intervention we must uphold our laws.

To say that there is not the slightest guarantee that by executing murderers violence will be decreased, is to beg the question. There may be cases where the knowledge that a murderer, if caught, would forfeit his life, far from having a deterrent effect might have the reverse effect.

Yet there are others—as, for instance, armed men or hunted criminals, not yet guilty of murder, threatening to kill hostages unless their outrageous demands are met. The knowledge that their own lives would be forfeited for certain if they carried out their criminal threat would be far more likely to induce them to avoid committing such a crime. Terrorists are ready enough to risk their lives in taking those of others, so long as they themselves have a sporting chance of surviving. But it takes an exceptional man to act in such a way as to condemn himself to death.

It seems to me that we have to keep the death penalty for certain kinds of crimes. We now have in our federal prisons people who have committed more than one murder, and there is no further punishment that can be meted out. In effect these people have a licence to murder. Take another case of a man who is threatened with life imprisonment for a crime he has already committed. What reason has he not to kill the arresting officer in an attempt to escape? His punishment would be the same. In short, there are many cases where the death penalty is the only penalty available that could possibly deter.

Anyone who takes another's life should know that he thereby forsakes his own and does not just suffer the inconvenience of being put into prison for some time.

Life imprisonment now really means anything, but even if it meant real life imprisonment its deterrent effect would never be as great as that of the death penalty. It is because it is irrevocable that it is the one people fear most, and because it is feared most it is the one most likely to deter. We have all read reviews, such as the one recently printed in the American Economic Review, which state that over the period between 1933 and 1969 an additional execution per year may have resulted, on the average, in seven or eight fewer murders.

If you assume the evidence for the deterrent effect of the death penalty is not clear, you face two risks. The first one is that if you impose the death penalty and it does not have an additional deterrent effect, you have possibly lost the life of a convicted murderer without adding the deterrent and thereby sparing future victims. The second risk is that if you fail to execute the convicted murderer and execution would have an additional deterrent effect, you have failed to spare the lives of a number of future victims. Between these two risks I would much rather execute the convicted murderer than risk the lives of innocent people who could have been saved.

Our system of punishment is based not just on deterrence but also on what is called justice, namely, that we feel a man who has committed a crime must be punished in proportion to the seriousness of the crime, and since the crime that takes life is irrevocable, so must be the punishment. Once we make it clear to a person that if he deprives someone else of life he will suffer only minor inconvenience, we have cheapened human life, and we are at that point today.

We hear the argument that the death penalty is legalized murder because it inflicts on the criminal the same situation he has inflicted on his victim, yet most punishments are designed to inflict on the criminal what he inflicted on the victim. The difference between the punishment and the crime is that one is a legal measure and the other is not. As for the brutalizing effect, I think that people are more brutalized by their daily TV fare, and probably are more brutalized by our failure to punish brutal acts seriously.

There is no question that there will be a demand for discipline in penal matters. Some of the shocking murders in Canada of late may well make it impossible for the government to hold out against the demand for restoration of capital punishment. I am sure the change in the trend of opinion is there for everyone to see. Even convinced abolitionists are changing their minds, and have come to believe that terrorism is a type of crime for which death cannot be a deterrent available to one side only. There is a strong public reaction present which must precede any general restoration of discipline in our society.

Surely the purpose of criminal justice should be the protection of society, rehabilitation of the offender, and compensation for the victim. Our present system of criminal justice is dominated by the treatment approach, the idea that criminals can be rehabilitated and thus prevented from returning to crime. That is a basic notion of the government, and it is under strong attack.

Our correctional system is not working. Present methods have little effect on the tendency of criminals to return to jail. The basic elements of our probation and parole system were both designed years ago, primarily to handle what we would now really consider mild criminal types. However, we are now dumping serious criminals into this system. We now have a set up operated on the principle that some young fellow with a master's degree in social work can actually treat 75 or more hard bitten convicts over the telephone, or during a half hour interview per month.

No wonder people think it is a farce. What they really do is force convicts to be fakes. Convicts know they must prove to the Parole Board that they are trying to improve themselves if they are to get out. They figure if they have to take a reading course, or physiotherapy, or get up in group counselling, or denounce themselves, or anything else, they will do it. They want out.

Capital Punishment

Of course we all know that it is far better to prevent crime than to put people in jail after they have committed a criminal act. Therefore the main thrust of our society should be in the area of crime prevention. We must appreciate that the most effective and essential tool in crime prevention is to reduce people's leaning toward crime, and to develop a stronger national disposition toward observance of the law. This approach must start from the grass roots level. Every institution in our society has a responsibility to bring its influence to bear on this problem, including the home, the church, the school, the media, and all institutions which instil, build, and fortify character and self-discipline.

Without going over all the arguments, perhaps we could look at one reason behind the existence of capital punishment. The historical reason for the death penalty is that in earlier days it was the only way in which the state, that is, our organized society, was able to prevent the perpetual and self-perpetuating orgy of killing. The state took over from the injured individual the avenging of a relative's murder, and imposed the sentence of death itself on the murderer. No longer could the relatives or friends of the murdered man avenge his death by themselves committing murder, but in return for abstaining from doing so the Crown or state assumed the responsibility for seeing that justice was done, and of course the result was that there was a great decrease in the number of private killings.

The abolitionist claims that capital punishment is not a deterrent to would-be murderers. This is an empty argument and completely beside the point. There is no way to determine how many murders were not committed by those who wanted to commit the act but did not through fear of execution.

The question should be, does the supreme crime demand the supreme penalty? In effect, do we place the highest possible value on the life of the victim? There have been some grim pictures brought to mind in this debate about the condemned man going to say his last prayers before execution, and so on. All I can say in reply is that his victim seldom has a chance to say his last prayers.

The abolitionist movement, which has grown so strong in recent years, is not based on any moral grounds, regardless of its claims to the contrary. It is propagated mainly by those who feel that it is somehow the fault of society that men are criminals and that therefore they should not be held fully responsible for their actions. I do not think we should allow capital murder to be passed off as the sin of someone's environment. What I hope to see in our country is people striving to expand the moral factor of our society and relying less and less on excessive regulation.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have complete respect for the opinions on all sides of the House, regardless of which side of the question they support. This is the first time I shall have spoken on this issue, but I have listened very carefully to those who are possibly of a different frame of mind, and I must say that in the first instance I had two speeches prepared because I tried to listen to both sides. Fortunately, I have been able to prepare a third, and since it is almost four o'clock I would appreciate it if I could call it four o'clock and reserve my time so that hon. members might at least hear my speech in its entirety and so that there can be some continuity.

[Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek).]

Mr. Nowlan: I would have finished my speech by four o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure hon. members will agree and give consent, and by next Monday perhaps the hon. member will have made up his mind on which speech he will make.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I point out that he has until Tuesday to make up his mind.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it four o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, through the usual channels we have agreed that—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Where is the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert)?

Mr. Blais: I understand that the hon. member for Vaudreuil was persuaded by the latest argument I presented. The agreement is that we will deal with notice of motion No. 45 standing in the name of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), listed at page 60 of Monday's order paper.

Mr. Paproski: That is agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we stand all notices of motions appearing before No. 45 which is in the name of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, and proceed with No. 45?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I suppose that includes the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) who is waiting for the report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. By consent we will proceed to motion No. 45.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

HIGHWAYS

SUGGESTED COST-SHARING IN SHUBENACADIE RIVER CROSSING AND HALIFAX TRAFFIC TUNNEL, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider entering into the necessary agreements with the other levels of government concerned to (a) cost share in construction of a crossing over the Shubenacadie River and in completion of other missing links in the Fundy Trail (b) share in guaranteeing the financing of a toll traffic tunnel under the Northwest Arm in Halifax.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I must say that probably this motion should have been seconded by both the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) because while the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (myself) will not be running next time in a constituency quite as large as that which includes the Northwest Arm bridge, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley will probably be running at least at one end of the Shubenacadie River crossing.

I shall begin by dealing with both matters. If I may I will devote ten minutes to each, and hopefully my seatmate, who comes from a part of British Columbia, will remind me with dispatch when I have reached the end of 10 minutes so that I can turn to the other matter.

First I shall refer to the Shubenacadie River crossing. When I first became involved with East Hants which, by the way, started out life in this parliament with representation by the Hon. Joseph Howe, I timidly ventured into its waters and was told that we should not concern ourselves with the perhaps larger issues which were involved with the tidal power which could be developed in the Bay of Fundy. I think we should be concerned—and that is probably the royal "we"—about the crossing between Truro and Windsor on the Shubenacadie River. I fought three elections in my constituency, perhaps not brilliantly but with some success, and I promised the people that I would raise this as a major issue. I have kept that promise, Mr. Speaker.

There has been an earlier debate in this parliament about the possibility of federal participation in providing a crossing on the Shubenacadie River. Such a crossing would complete the transportation link through the south-northwestern part of Nova Scotia connecting the town of Truro with the Annapolis Valley. That was my view when I first represented the area in 1968 and I have not had reason to change my mind.

Even without resort to all the statistics and studies available to us, it seems very obvious to me that East Hants can best be served by a crossing over the Shubenacadie River. It would serve to open up an area that was famous in the days of old wooden ships and iron men, and the whole history of Atlantic Canada. It goes back that far, Mr. Speaker, but it also has very real importance in the present day.

I make no apology for raising the issue again, Mr. Speaker. It has been brought up two or three times in the past eight or nine years, and even then maybe I could have brought it up oftener. I have the satisfaction, however, of having prompted an hour of debate some years back when members from Atlantic Canada raised their voices in support of my motion.

There are several reasons why there should be a crossing over the Shubenacadie River, Mr. Speaker. It is an integral part of the Fundy trail proposed by the Department of Public Works. Many Americans visit this part of our country and want to travel right around the Bay of Fundy. At the present time they have to start near the port of Saint John, then go through Albert country, through Cumberland County, and by some magic means get to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. The missing link is the problem of crossing the Shubenacadie River, and that is my first point, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members may ask why the federal government should be interested in a bridge or a causeway or a tunnel to circumvent the river. Mr. Speaker, the federal government has paid substantial sums of money to make river crossings possible for Montreal and for Vancouver. That being the case, surely the same can be done for Maitland, Nova Scotia, or Shubenacadie, Nova Scotia; or Truro, Nova Scotia. If anything is to be built surely it should be approved by the federal government. I am sure the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East would agree that the concept of the Fundy trail has been approved. The issue has been argued in this House by the former member for Saint John-Lancaster, Mr. Bell, and by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates), the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, and myself.

As you and I know, Mr. Speaker, lots are drawn to determine the allocation of time for private members' business. When I drew number 45 I thought it would be next year before I had a chance to present my motion to the House. The government decided that the session should keep going, however, and all of a sudden my motion was called. Not only that but I think it was called on four occasions when I was not here. In that regard I want to apologize to and for the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) who has waited patiently, with a great long speech prepared, to take part in the debate. Unfortunately he had to be out of town today and asked me to convey his apologies to you, Sir. I hope when the matter comes up again we will both be able to congratulate somebody for having built the crossing over the Shubenacadie River.

Mr. Patterson: That is the first lesson; now give us the next ten minutes.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, my genial seatmate is familiar with both the old and the new testaments; he knows when a message should be broken off and the new message begun.

This I think will be my last chance to speak in this Chamber on behalf of the people interested in the Shubenacadie River crossing. They have given me much encouragement and I know that in the future they will be incorporated in another constituency. I wish them well, Mr. Speaker, and wish that I had been able to do more for them in this matter. When I instituted the debate on the subject two years ago I thought I had proved, brilliantly and beyond all reasonable doubt, that a crossing of some sort would make a great deal of difference to western Nova Scotia.

My seatmate reminds me again, Mr. Speaker, that I said I would divide my remarks into two parts. I will now proceed to the matter of a crossing under instead of over the Northwest Arm in Halifax.

As you may have gathered, my constituency is rather large. Part of it includes a portion of the old city of Halifax; a rather large portion includes the new city of Halifax, the spill down the southeastern part of the Northwest Arm in Halifax. At one time the member of parliament could come here from Halifax to try to explain the situation in terms of wartime conditions, but that is no longer possible in the modern House of Commons. I shall therefore try to address myself to conditions and circumstances as they exist nowadays when making my plea for this particular venture.

My colleague from Dartmouth-Halifax East and I have shared the responsibility of representing all of that growing area since 1968. Since then, after the revision of powers, so to speak, we have gone our separate ways.

I think my colleague will agree with me that if Halifax is to be made a viable city, one of the major areas for action must be in the field of transportation. The most obvious need in the city of Halifax, as I see it, is to provide some kind of transportation link between the downtown core of old Halifax, which represents perhaps 80,000 people, and the outer part on the other side of the Northwest Arm, which represents perhaps up to 40,000 people. That corridor at least should lead to growth.

We know that the central parts of old cities rarely grow much after they have finished their initial growth. The inner core tends to stabilize in size. As I said, I think about ten years ago in the House of Commons, one of the crazy facts of life of the area is that for every person who enters the downtown area, one person must leave. That is still a fact of life. Actually the cartoonist working for the Chronicle-Herald or Mail-Star back in those times drew a cartoon showing a baby being carried out by the stork while a car was entering the city. These conditions still hold true. I leave this matter to more competent commentators, including the urban affairs critic on my side of the House and the minister in charge of urban affairs—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson).

Mr. McCleave: Yes, who is the hon. member for York North. In any event, I have digressed. I was trying to argue that there should be some kind of crossing which will help the development of the city of Halifax reach its maximum potential. The old Halifax existed on a peninsula. One of the classic problems to do with old Halifax was peoples difficulty in getting to work. One could go by way of what we call the Armdale rotary. A short-term solution advanced by many, including the former member representing this area of Halifax who is a colleague of mine, involved specific traffic controls and traffic lights, which can control traffic using the Armdale rotary. I thought it was an excellent short-term solution, and an awful lot of money was spent on that idea. But the long-term solution must come with the building of another exit out of the city of Halifax.

I do not think all traffic should come off one corner of a boot, as it were, and the traffic pattern there resembles a boot. I do not know if hon. members can imagine traffic streaming forth on either side at the end of the boot; or else the traffic can go off by bridges which radiate out from the instep of the boot. But we are stuck with this situation in Halifax. We must do something in order to siphon traffic off in a different direction altogether; otherwise the city will be paralyzed, and the people mortified.

I wish to propose a solution. I know it is not endorsed by the present administration in Halifax, and not endorsed by the columnist who is the be all and end all when it comes to suggesting things which should be done in Halifax. I will make my proposal now, because I may not be here as the representative of the people of the area another time. I think it would be good if we could spend money to develop Halifax from its end, to the northwest. I think the link should go under, rather than over or on the Northwest Arm of Halifax. It would be tragic to build a great bridge across the Northwest Arm of Halifax, one of the most beautful areas I have seen in the world. It is residential and has no great commercial mix. I realize others can say the same about their own constituencies. I suggest that we could make mistakes, architectural or otherwise, and they should be buried underground.

Let me say this in my final minute or two. About five years ago the Government of Canada was good enough to pledge itself to providing a $25 million fund for what was called the Metropolitan Area Growth Investment Company. But to this day the Metropolitan Area Growth Investment Company has not provided jobs for many people, except those who are trying to find out what the hell the damned thing can do—pardon my vulgarity, Mr. Speaker.

May I suggest that the company use the $25 million to build a nice tunnel under the Northwest Arm of Halifax, which at least would have the virtue of allowing people to travel from one point to another. Possibly the company could charge for the use of the tunnel, and the money collected could repay the Metropolitan Area Growth Investment Company. That way the Metropolitan Area Growth Investment Company will probably be around to haunt the future hon. member for Halifax-East Hants or whoever dares to represent that constituency 150 years from now.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, knowing that I shall speak against the hon. member's motion, much though I admire the hon. member, I hesitate to rise and speak in this debate. But I do not admire the motion and therefore oppose it.

Mr. Forrestall: Why is the hon. member involving himself in the debate? This is a local Halifax matter.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I wish to speak on both parts of the motion, Mr. Speaker. From the point of view of regional economic expansion the fact is that the activities of DREE in Nova Scotia, as in all other Atlantic Provinces with the exception of Prince Edward Island, are carried out largely in accordance with a General Development Agreement with the province. The General Development Agreement with Nova Scotia was signed on September 12, 1974. Its purpose is to facilitate joint federal/provincial co-operation in initiatives for the economic and socio-economic development of Nova Scotia in pursuit of certain broad objectives and in accordance with a strategy for development answered to the General Development Agreement. This strategy provides the framework within which DREE operates. It is subject to review, of course, and does not preclude other joint or separate actions. Nevertheless, at this early stage of the implementation of the General Development Agreement, the bulk of DREE actions is directed toward implementing the strategy originally set forth.

The specific sectorial and geographic approaches mentioned in the GDA strategy include certain development aspects, as such, of the Halifax/Dartmouth metropolitan area; the development of the economic and social opportunities of the tourism-recreation and related sectors; and more generally, the funding of infrastructure required to support identified development opportunities.

Thus the General Development Agreement is an enabling agreement. Under it, individual sub-agreements are negotiated which will permit a comprehensive or package approach to the solution of specific development constraints or problems. However, isolated infrastructure projects are not undertaken simply for their own sake. They are supported only in pursuit of some broader development opportunity. Through negotiation with the provincial government, the federal government tried to develop an approach which will enhance the entire economic development of an area or a province. This is carried out through the signing of the special sub-agreements I referred to a moment ago.

Accordingly, as a matter of principle, the two specific actions covered by the motion would be considered by DREE only within the context of their relevance to a comprehensive development approach, whether sectorial or geographic. Thus far these projects have not been isolated, either by the provincial government or in DREE's own analytical work, as being sufficiently high priority to warrant immediate further attention. Now let us look specifically at the proposal in the hon. member's motion.

DREE, in co-operation with other federal agencies, including the Canadian government office of tourism, is now in the process of working with the province of Nova Scotia to develop a mechanism for federal/provincial co-operation in tourism.

Tourism is an important economic factor in the province. In 1974, for example, the estimated expenditure by visitors during the tourist season was approximately $76 million, yielding some $13.5 million in tax revenue.

The over-all goal of a tourism development program should be to improve the quality of life of Nova Scotia residents, not only economically but socially and environmentally as well. In this regard the tourist industry can add not only dollars to the economy but also make Nova Scotia a good place in which to work and live, which indeed it now is. Industrial and other development is enhanced by a healthy and agreeable environment which provides recreational possibilities for people. Such a situation is becoming increasingly important on this continent.

The nearness to a large population market, an abundance of historic attractions, the attractive resource base of the province compared to the deterioration of the environment elsewhere, add strength to Nova Scotia's ability to attract even greater numbers of visitors in the future.

Federal-Provincial Cost-Sharing

Much effort has gone into the promotional aspects of tourism, resulting in yearly increases of approximately 5 per cent in the numbers of tourists entering the province. More attention must be paid to the development aspect which can increase the economic impact through longer stays and higher dollars per day expenditures.

The non-economic aspects of tourism are difficult, if not impossible to measure quantitatively. Yet they cannot be ignored. There is evidence throughout the world, more particularly in Europe, the United Kingdom, and the United States, that concentration on the economics of tourism to the exclusion of other considerations can lead to environmental deterioration, with negative effects on the quality of life and a consequential backlash of public opinion. Nova Scotia is not immune from this danger, and already there have been public expressions of concern about it by individuals and groups.

Consequently in pursuing the developmental opportunities inherent in tourism, Nova Scotia's basic general aim is to exploit the economic potential of the industry to the fullest extent consistent with the preservation and ultimately the enhancement of a social, cultural, and physical environment that traditionally has been attractive to residents and visitors alike.

Considerable background work has already been done by the province. The provincial strategy provides for the concept of tourism travelways which are being established by utilized already-established trails, extending and rerouting some of them, and designating new ones. The Fundy Trail was originally proposed as a trail extending from Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, to St. Stephen, New Brunswick.

In establishing a route for the proposed Fundy Vocation Trail, field investigations were conducted to determine the extent to which the location of existing highways was considered to be suitable and the locations where new construction would be required. Factors taken into consideration included the proximity of existing highways to the shoreline, scenery available along existing highways as compared with that available with relocation of the highway, and the extent to which the proposed trail would serve local traffic as well as tourist and other through traffic.

Based on the selected route and design standards, the estimated cost to establish the 887 mile-long Fundy Vacation Trail is as follows: Phase one, $37,700,000; Phase 2, $12 million; Phase 3, $16,800,000; Phase 4, $39,500,000; for a total of $106 million.

The Shubenacadie River crossing and completion of other links in the Fundy Trail in Nova Scotia are part of the Glooscap Trail. From the New Brunswick border the Glooscap Trail goes to Minudie and Joggins, and with the comletion of highways upgrading will proceed along the coast to Apple River, Parrsboro, Five Islands, and via the Shubenacadie River crossing will follow the Noel shore and terminate at Blomidon.

The provincial department of highways has work in progress on sections of highway between Apple River and Joggins and hope eventually to upgrade all sections of the Glooscap Trail. It has also started work on the substructure of the Shubenacadie River crossing. The total cost of this structure is estimated to be in the order of $7 million and plans call for cast-in-place concrete construction having a clear centre span of 700 feet and a total length of approximately 1,450 feet. Construction time is estimated to take 18 months.

While it is quite possible the province may wish to pursue the possibility of DREE assistance toward these projects in the future, we have not been requested to share the cost of their construction.

Let me now turn to financing of a toll traffic tunnel under the Northwest Arm in Halifax. Under the special areas and highways legislation, consideration assistance was provided to the Halifax/Dartmouth area as a special area requiring special measures to facilitate economic expansion and social adjustment. Under this program financial assistance was made available to the metropolitan area, by way of grants and loans, for specific infrastructure projects such as roads, water and sewer systems, schools, etc. required to make this key centre more attractive as a site for future industrial and population growth. Much of this work was identified through the efforts of the metropolitan area planning committee whose task was to formulate a Halifax/Dartmouth regional development plan.

One of the objectives of this plan was "to create an effective regional transportation system, including an efficient highway system and the development of an effective transit system which will provide a viable alternative to the use of the private automobile". A task force under the metropolitan area planning committee was established to develop a total plan for urban transportation. Various possibilities were considered during the preparation of this plan. Initial studies projecting the current trend of population growth and development indicated excessive transportation costs by 1991. A third harbour crossing south of the existing two spans at an estimated cost of $100 million was a necessity. It was agreed, therefore, that a careful selection of the areas to be permitted to develop must be made. To this end, an urban form known as Scenario No. 14 was agreed upon.

The outstanding features of this scenario are that the expensive third harbour crossing is eliminated, the required size of the Northwest Arm crossing is eliminated, the required size of the Northwest Arm crossing was reduced to four lanes, and the necessity for an expressway through the central business district was removed. Road requirements increased slightly along the less expensive land routes such as the Bi-Centennial Highway. To achieve this urban form there must be a careful selection of the areas that are permitted to develop. The Bedford/Sackville and Cole Harbour areas are to be first priority residential, with the Burnside area of north Dartmouth between these two population centres to be commercial and industrial.

The south mainland Halifax area or Spryfield was second priority residential with in-fill only for the short term. The regional plan incorporating Scenario No. 14 was approved by the province in April, 1975. To facilitate traffic movement from this area to peninsula Halifax, the provincial department of highways is constructing Northwest Arm Drive between Spryfield and Bi-Centennial Drive. Completion of this highway, coupled with the improvement under way at the Armdale rotary will improve traffic flows to peninsula Halifax and to other points via the new Dunbrack Street which is also under construction at the present time.

A general feasibility study of Halifax peninsula access carried out under the DREE special areas agreement in 1972 noted that the early construction of the Northwest Arm crossing introduces a high cost project which in the short term is then under-used and causes a significant and undesirable shift in route usage within the area of the isthmus. The "back-lag" or feeder route connections should be constructed first, with the Northwest Arm link scheduled for approximately 1981. Concurrent with the initial phase road construction would be extensive up-grading of the public transportation system with consideration being given to a "buses only" lane on the Arm crossing.

Various studies directly related to this Northwest Arm link have been carried out. One in the early 1960's made reference to a tunnel being a satisfactory solution to the physical impediment imposed by the Northwest Arm. No detailed investigation, to my knowledge, was pursued at that time, probably because of the obvious topographical constraints imposed by unfavourable land contours adjacent to the Arm. Since that time, with the construction of the Halifax Container Pier the feasibility of a tunnel is even more remote. The solution recommended in more recent studies of the problem suggests an aesthetically pleasing bridge structure as the most appropriate alternative. Costs of such a structure would be in the order of $15 million. In view of the recommendations of the approved regional plan, I am not aware that the province intends to proceed with any crossing over the Northwest Arm nor have I any reason to believe that it is a very high provincial priority for cost-sharing at this time.

The motion before us and its source surprise me somewhat, for two reasons, Mr. Speaker. We on this side of the House are constantly being lectured by the Tories for intruding into provincial jurisdictions. Yet they are constantly putting forward motions such as the one before us which would involve even greater intrusion into the provincial domain. Indeed it was only this morning that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was waxing indignantly, if not very knowledgeably, about that very topic.

Second, the opposition is constantly decrying the increase in federal spending. But its members have no hesitation in putting forward proposals to increase spending further. They would then be the first to condemn the government if it did just that.

Finally, while I can understand the hon. member's desire for such a development I personally cannot lend my support to this type of glamour project at a time when the basic transportation needs of the entire Atlantic area have yet to be fulfilled.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I notice that at least one continuing Nova Scotian still wishes to speak in this debate, so this Nova Scotia descendant will not cut into his time. However, I would like to commend the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) for putting this motion before the House. It is, of course, worded in the way such motions must be worded, that is to say, it expresses the opinion of the House that the government should give consideration to the advisability of carrying out the projects set out in the resolution, and even after the details given us by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) it still seems to me that the two ideas which have been put forward ought to be considered. I refer to the Shubenacadie crossing and to the idea of a tunnel under the Northwest Arm rather than a bridge above it.

It seems to me that the government is committed to two principles which support the position taken by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. It set up a Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and in doing so it has taken the position that we should do something at the federal level to get rid of regional disparities, at least to some extent, and I therefore support the assistance for an area like the province of Nova Scotia.

The other principle the government favoured strongly in the month of June, 1974, was greater concern about the quality of life in our cities. To the extent that the hon. member's second proposal aims at doing something about the traffic problems in the great city of Halifax, I think it should be considered. I recognize, and in this I agree with the hon. member across the way, that we cannot decide this afternoon which of various proposals would be the best, but I believe the two proposals set out in this motion should receive consideration and support. With these words, I yield to the continuing Nova Scotian.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the twilight hours of this parliamentary week it gives me a great deal of pleasure to take part in this private members' debate on the bill put forward by my good friend and colleague, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). For the benefit of members who are not altogether aware of what this bill is doing, may I point out that earlier, opening the debate, my hon. friend said the bill was divided in two between the Shubenacadie River crossing and the Westarm tunnel.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is not a bill; it is a resolution.

Mr. Nowlan: In view of the fact that the resolution, as it has to be according to parliamentary form, is in resolution form, I am not going to take much of the time of the House talking about the Northwest Arm tunnel because that has been gone into and explained at very good length. But I am going to talk about the Shubenacadie River crossing and in particular hopefully answer, in a most constructive, reasonable, logical way, two of the complaints raised by the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne).

Before I get into the content of the resolution I would commend the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, who has been trying, not during this time of government restraint but ever since 1968 when he sat in this House as the member for Halifax-East Hants, by question and/or resolution, to get the federal government to move on something that, Mr. Speaker, has always been as perpetual as those tides that sweep in and sweep out of the Bay of Fundy.

My riding takes in a good part of the Bay of Fundy, Mr. Speaker, and the tides that sweep in and sweep out with 55 foot crests are just about equal to the promises that have been made on the Shubenacadie River crossing by members in this House on the government side.

I agree with my hon. friend from Northumberland-Miramichi that obviously this is a joint federal-provincial matter. The premier of Nova Scotia, a former constituent of mine from the county of Hants, which would be so well helped and advanced by a Shubenacadie River crossing, more than two years ago promised that tenders would be called, and most likely tenders have been called this year.

We on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, know that whether we have times of restraint or whether we have times of expansion it takes a lot of hard, detailed, dogmatic, determined work by any member to try to focus the government's attention on something that seems to be so remote from this lovely capital of this lovely country. I agree Nova Scotia is miles away. For any of you who do not understand what is going on, just put out your left hand and extend your thumb, pretend your thumb is a sort of a joint to New Brunswick and that the curvature between the thumb and the forefinger is the Bay of Fundy. The Fundy Trail comes across the isthmus, the neck that joins Nova Scotia with New Brunswick, goes around the curve of the thumb and up the forefinger.

Because there is no Shubenacadie River crossing, for those of you here who are married, who were liberated many years ago and wear wedding rings, just project the path you now have to take. You cannot follow the Bay of Fundy—taking the inside of the angle of your thumb and forefinger—and see the beautiful scenery and go through some of the lovely villages along that shore without a Shubenacadie crossing at a certain point of the river. You have in effect to go up to your wedding ring where you have some fingers with little inlets. They do not run quite that way, but one of those inlets is the Shubenacadie River. Therefore you have to make such a diversion and take such a detour that the whole concept of the Fundy Trail is almost forgotten. You have to wend your way way inland, and then finally come back to the Bay of Fundy.

That is one of the reasons why this has been such a constructive, concrete proposal that has been advanced by my hon. friend. With all respect to my very fine colleague from Northumberland-Miramachi, the eminent parliamentary secretary of a department that needs much eminence, by the way, obviously this matter is in the provincial domain. An integrated effort is required by DREE and/or federal Public Works, along with the department in Nova Scotia.

The parliamentary secretary talks about spending restraints today. Separate and apart from the tourist potential that a Shubenacadie River crossing would give to western Nova Scotia—and my riding is western Nova Scotia—it would be of fundamental help to the economy of western Nova Scotia to get that crossing in place, so that traffic that comes from New Brunswick and central Canada into Nova Scotia does not have to take this wide detour almost across Nova Scotia and then double back to start servicing parts of western Nova Scotia.

Certainly we on this side of the House appreciate restraint. At this hour on a Friday no one is going to be in a very partisan mood and I am not going to talk about the reasonableness and efficacy of the estimates of this government. But my hon. colleague, in checking with Nova Scotia and/or this government after all the years since 1968, still cannot find one little grain of sand of an estimate, in the federal estimates or the provincial estimates, to show that there is some planning, some surveying, some core taking, to get the structure started, let alone to complete the crossing.

The tourist industry, Mr. Speaker, quite logically is one of the industries in Nova Scotia which must be helped. I am not one of those Nova Scotians who believe that we can have the Pittsburghs in Nova Scotia. I believe that we have to develop an industrial base that is compatible with the area.

In western Nova Scotia we have agriculture and I think the type of industrial development we have there has to be related to our agricultural potential. We make mistakes when we try to transplant on barren soil some kind of industrial technique that is not complementary to the surrounding countryside or complementary to the labour force we have there. But tourism in Nova Scotia and the Fundy Trail are very much a potential that I think should be developed, and should receive the favourable attention of this House. As I have already said, Mr. Speaker, we could alleviate some of the bottlenecks in transportation that are along the Fundy shore by the initial workings.

I am certainly not the one who is going to talk out my colleague's bill. Because the parliamentary secretary has already intervened, I know there is not likely to be objection on the other side of the House. The mood of the House on this lovely May afternoon—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It's raining outside, Pat.

Mr. Nowlan: —is such that we might just take one little step forward, so that people in Nova Scotia and certainly western Nova Scotia would finally appreciate that Ottawa and hopefully those in Halifax are at least starting work on something that can be such benefit to western Nova Scotia.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I welcome an opportunity this afternoon to participate in this particular discussion, first of all because of the nature of the hon. gentleman who moved the motion. I take his suggestions and his arguments very seriously. I think we always regard the comments that he makes and the motions he puts forward with seriousness, and we always examine the very worthy ideas that he presents to the House.

I am also pleased to have the benefit of the comments of the other members who have participated, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) who has just taken his seat and who adds in a colourful way to the discussion, and my hon. friend from Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), who earlier in a very learned and detailed way put on the record certain of the aspects of this particular problem with which the federal government is concerned, particularly in relation to the work and terms of reference of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

In all of the measures we have talked about this afternoon I think we can boil the discussion down to one of economics and developmental opportunities. The economy of Nova Scotia is generally a diversified one amongst its major sectors, and I think it is fair to say that some progress toward the reduction of disparity has been made in recent years. Of course we all know there is a great deal more to be done in the Atlantic region, in Nova Scotia and in other parts of the country, to continue working upon that challenge of economic disparity in Canada.

Measures indeed are under way, by this government and in conjunction with other governments, provincial and local across the country, to ensure continuous progress and indeed acceleration of improvements as they relate to economic opportunities in all parts of Canada, and toward the elimination so far as is possible in this land of the economic disparities which exist between regions. The measures, and I think it is useful to bear them in mind in any discussion of this kind, include encouraging the expansion or maintenance of viable long-term employment opportunities and optimum quality of life, within Nova Scotia in this particular case, increasing the earned incomes of the people of the province, and assisting in development of a dynamic and creative provincial economy which will encourage the growth and stability of economic activity in the province.

I know that the hon. gentleman who moved the motion this afternoon who is from Annapolis Valley, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence, the former Nova Scotian from Winnipeg North Centre, and others share those general objectives, so I hope hon. members will not take what is said perhaps specifically in terms of opposition to any individual idea as opposition to any of the general principles that are involved, because certainly that general opposition is not intended.

I think the specific measures to which I have referred briefly could be described as broad, general objectives which have the co-operation of the federal, provincial and municipal governments jointly pursuing a consistent and co-ordinated course of action involving specific sectoral and geographic approaches. This I think was the gist of the argument that was presented to the House earlier today by my friend from Northumberland-Miramichi, that is, the need to approach the developmental challenges in any particular region of the country in a co-ordinated, consistent and co-operative way so that the actions of one level of government or the projects of one particular area of government do not act in competition to or in conflict with the work being undertaken by another area of government.

The areas of developmental opportunity really are numerous. I think I would like to take a moment of the time of the House to highlight them. I think of the development of new or expanded employment opportunities throughout the province by the identification and implementation of appropriate developmental opportunities; the design and implementation of urban and rural developmental measures required to support and really promote economic and socio-economic opportunities as they are found to exist; the development in the Atlantic region of the resource industries of fishing obviously, agriculture, forestry, and mining through measures to improve their efficiency, productivity and optimim resource utilization, including intensified research and the further processing of their primary products. Then there is the development, specifically as my friend from Northumberland-Miramichi said, of the Halifax-Dartmouth metropolitan area with special emphasis on high technology industries, communication, distribution, and transportation related industries, and a wide range of business and personnel services consistent with its evolution as a major business and service centre.

Next we have the continued growth of the primary and secondary processing of imported and domestic raw and semi-finished materials in the Strait of Canso area, including such industries that may be associated with or in any way dependent upon its existing base of petroleum refining and related services and secondary industries. We have the fostering of economic and social opportunities associated with tourism and recreation and other related sectors. This is a very relevant factor in connection with at least the Fundy Trail part of the proposal in the motion today. There is a provision of special interim assistance required to eliminate impediments which might threaten the retention and maintenance of otherwise viable opportunities and industries. Further, Mr. Speaker, there is the development of spin-off opportunities related to the supply, service, exploration, extraction, and distribution of off-shore oil and gas.

What I have tried to provide to the House is a partial list. The list could go on, but I have provided at least a partial list of some of the fundamental concerns and developmental opportunities in the Atlantic region, particularly in the province of Nova Scotia, which present to a provincial government, to municipalities, and to the Government of Canada a range of opportunities for action.

Of course the challenge or really the dilemma before any government, either at the provincial level or at the senior level, is really sorting out among all those authorities what really can be acted upon in an urgent sort of way, what has priority attention, and really what must be left in terms of priority for a later time and for further consideration. At the present moment in time I believe it is fair to say that both in the assessment of the provincial administration and in the view of the various involved agencies of the Government of Canada, a number of other areas of challenge and opportunity really must at this stage have a higher priority than the two specific programs which are mentioned in the motion before us this afternoon.

As you will know, Mr. Speaker, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has signed three subsidiary agreements with the province of Nova Scotia under the provisions of the General Development Agreement which generally covers the province. Taken together they call for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to spend a total of $104 million on developmental schemes. For the information of the House, Mr. Speaker, these agreements include the metropolitan Halifax-Dartmouth area developmental agreement, the Strait of Canso area development agreement, and the Canada-Nova Scotia subsidiary agreement on mineral development.

I could take some considerable time to run through the various aspects of these programs which are extremely important because they demonstrate a concern at both the federal and provincial level for the developmental and economic challenges and opportunities that are present in the Atlantic area. I think it would be useful for the House to have that detailed kind of explanation on the record because it is an encouraging one, one which looks toward the future and really holds out some substantial optimism and encouragement for the developmental prospects of the Atlantic region, particularly the province of Nova Scotia. Unfortunately time does not permit.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to devote a brief word or two to the question of transportation per se, I suppose most particularly on the Fundy Trail aspect of the motion before us. We of course have not had in the past a generally co-ordinated suggestion, argument or proposal from the Atlantic provinces about a general program of highway or road improvement as we have had for example, in the case of some of the western provinces. Indeed in the west we have a comprehensive strengthening program for highways in the western provinces. Recently of course we have had the benefit of some views presented by the four Atlantic ministers of transportation or highways as they presented to the Government of Canada a detailed report, which report presently is under study by officials of the Ministry of Transport.

I hope the analysis of that report will lead to some constructive and positive conclusions which will be of benefit to the province of Nova Scotia, particularly the area which the hon. member has so dedicatedly worked for over the past many years in connection with the proposal now before the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Some hon. Members: Question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONDEMNATION OF RECOGNITION OF PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION—SUGGESTED DEBATE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That this House expresses its strong condemnation of the government's decision announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and contemptuously of parliament in that it was made outside the House, of the recognition by Canada of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which cannot but be harmful to the State of Israel and to world peace, it having been made clear by the Prime Minister of Israel last Thursday that Israel will not negotiate with the Palestine Liberation Organization, as he said: 'its prime aim is to strangle the Jewish state. They want the destruction of the State of Israel. It is the essence of their philosophy and policy.'

And further, that the practice, followed by three prime ministers who held office before the present Prime Minister, of making provision on government days for debate of international affairs in each session be restored, in place of the practice of the past eight years of having foreign affairs virtually undiscussed in the House, as if action on the major subject of survival of mankind and peace itself was a monopoly privilege of the Prime Minister, the minister and cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED REVIEW OF INCREASE IN PARKING FEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43. A short while ago the parking fee at the National Arts Centre for evening performances was $1. This was raised to $1.25, but because making change slowed down the egress of cars, the charge has been raised to $2 an increase of 100 per cent over what it was a short time ago. Believing that the Anti-Inflation Board is concerned about price increases and not just wage increases, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):—

● (1410)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That this House calls on the Anti-Inflation Board to review and roll back the 100 per cent increase in the amount charged by the National Arts Centre for underground parking during evening performances.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can only be presented to the House with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONGRATULATIONS TO MONTREAL CANADIENS FOR WINNING STANLEY CUP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter of national and international significance.

In view of the outstanding victory of the Canadiens who once again last night won the Stanley Cup, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner):

That congratulations be sent to the management, coach and the players of the Canadiens for their well-deserved success and the brilliant way in which they have contributed to the international reputation of Canada in a field where their renown has become proverbial.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Since the House agrees unanimously, I shall put the motion. Seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie) moves:

That congratulations be sent to the management, coach and players of the Canadiens for their well-deserved success and the brilliant way in which they have contributed to the international reputation of Canada in a field where their renown has become proverbial.

Does it please the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PROPOSED REVISION OF EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM FOR YOUNG PEOPLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the high rate of unemployment and recent statistical data to the effect that unemployment is highest in Quebec, affecting mostly young people from 18 to 30 years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That this House urge the government to revise immediately full range of employment programs, particularly those affecting people of 18 to 30 years of age.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Such a motion moved pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion may not be put.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSITION OF CANADIAN BANKS ON FINANCING—LEGALITY OF PROPOSED CONTRACT—POSSIBLE CONSIDERATION OF ALTERNATIVE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Could he confirm to the House that at least one of Canada's major banks has withdrawn its participation from the financing of the LRPA contract and that others now are, to put it mildly, soft on the deal and also that the current scheme on which the minister's own personal position and reputation in this House is very much at stake—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —is in fact collapsing around him?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can—

An hon. Member: Yes or no.

Mr. Richardson: —confirm to the House that the decision the government of Canada made last November to purchase 18 long-range patrol aircraft from the Lockheed Company has not been changed. I expect to make a full announcement and statement in the House tomorrow.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it is curious that the minister is drawn to make statements on matters that have not changed. I wonder if he can tell the House whether one of the major chartered banks has in fact withdrawn from any participation—has let the government know it will not participate in any financing of the LRPA contract. Will he also tell the House whether the government's legal advisers in the Department of Justice have convinced the minister or his colleagues that the contract the government is proposing to sign with Lockheed does not meet the legal and administrative requirements of the government? If so, will he tell the House now or tomorrow what changes he is proposing in the contract to bring it within the legal requirements of the government?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the contract is still in escrow. I will reply to that question, in fact, to all other questions, when I make the statement tomorrow.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. My understanding is that we now have a commitment from the minister that his statement tomorrow will include information as to the position of banks in the country relative to this matter, and will include also an indication of the information given to the minister by the legal officers of the Crown relative to the original administrative proposal which was made. I would now ask the minister if he can tell us whether he and his colleagues are actively considering now some other practical alternatives, to ensure that Canada's armed forces obtain the new long-range patrol aircraft which we so urgently require, in case the Lockheed matter does not proceed?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear the support of the Leader of the Opposition for the Canadian Armed Forces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: I think the House will be well pleased by the statement, when it is made tomorrow.

Mr. Paproski: Are you going to resign, Chrétien?

ALLEGED PLAN TO CO-OPERATE WITH AUSTRALIA IN BUYING MILITARY EQUIPMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister considering an alternative which will enable him to repair one of his broken promises, as stated in Flight International of September 27, 1973. According to that publication:

The Canadian Minister for National Defence, Mr. James Richardson, has formally announced that Canada and Australia have agreed to co-operate in buying long-range patrol aircraft and other military equipment. It could save both countries millions of dollars said the minister . . .

Would the minister now consider saving these millions of dollars by re-opening that alternative?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with that statement. We did at one time have discussions with the Australians concerning the possibility of joining together for a purchase, but those discussions between the two countries have long since been abandoned.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR DEBATE OF ANY GOVERNMENT GUARANTEE OF LOAN

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister may I direct my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board? Would the President of the Treasury Board assure the House that any guarantee to the Canadian banks or to Lockheed concerning the LRPA loan or loans, which are on the face of it on behalf of the Government of Canada, will be subject to debate and approval by the House of Commons, in compliance with the Financial Administration Act?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, when the announcement to be made tomorrow by the Minister of National Defence is known, I hope that the hon. member will have a satisfying answer.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—SUGGESTION UNITED STATES BANKS HAVE FIRST CLAIM ON COMPANY'S ASSETS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence as well. It concerns the Lockheed deal but is not related to an announcement confirming a deal of some sort, which I take it the minister made some minutes ago and will elaborate on tomorrow. My question is this: Would the minister or his officials confirm that if the Lockheed Corporation goes belly-up in the U.S., the first claimants on the more than $600 million it owes will be the 24 U.S. banks in the United States it now owes money to?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we have, as we have indicated on a number of occasions, assurances from the United States government which will be tabled tomorrow with my statement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That was a belly-up answer.

Mr. Broadbent: The answer, indeed, was belly-up. Is the minister saying that part of the package which he will announce tomorrow will contain assurances by the U.S. government about the economic viability of Lockheed Corporation?

Mr. Richardson: That is what I said, Mr. Speaker.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—ADVICE OF JUSTICE DEPARTMENT ON WHETHER GOVERNMENT OWED ANYTHING PRIOR TO SIGNING OF $16 MILLION CONTRACT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a final supplementary question to the Minister of Justice? Can the Minister of Justice now answer a question put to him previously? As I recall, he said he would look into it. Just before the Government of Canada signed the contract last month committing ourselves to giving some $16 million to the Lockheed Corporation, no matter what happened, can he tell us if he had his officials look into any commitments, which may have existed prior to the signing of that commitment last month? Would we have owed Lockheed any money at all if we had not signed that commitment a month ago?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Supply and Services have throughout been supplied with legal advice as to their possible positions in this matter.

AIR TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED BROADENING OF TERMS OF REFERENCE OF INQUIRY INTO SAFETY OF BILINGUAL AIR-TO-GROUND COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the prospect of a nationwide strike, will the minister use his influence and good office to impress upon the Minister of Transport the necessity of broadening the terms of reference of the public inquiry in order to provide maximum latitude in assessing safety implications for all procedures with respect to bilingual air-to-ground communications, specifically IFR and VFR?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the government is anxious to avoid a strike by air traffic controllers and, therefore, we will do our best to avoid it. I think that the inquiry proposed by the Minister of Transport was a solution which was quite acceptable; it would have enabled the public to know both sides of the medal. However, I think we have nothing to win by making this debate more controversial and as far as the terms of reference are concerned if there is something to change, we would be prepared to do so. On the other hand, we must not ignore the purpose of the inquiry which is to find a reasonable solution and not to launch a useless debate.

[English]

THREATENED STRIKE OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS—REASON TREASURY BOARD IGNORED CONCILIATION BOARD RECOMMENDATIONS ON LANGUAGE AND WAGES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): While the minister and his government may be anxious to avert a nationwide strike, as are we on this side of the House, will he advise why Treasury Board chose to ignore the principal contents of the conciliation recommendations, namely those aspects dealing with the language question and the wage offer?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we negotiate the questions of the salary levels. I think that the government measures on bilingualism are based on the legislation passed by an act of Parliament and that this legislation is not negotiable at the negotiation table.

AIR CANADA

ALLEGED UNPLEASANT REMARKS OF MR. KENT DAVIS TO EMPLOYEES

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary to the President of the Treasury Board.

I would first like to tell him that I do not agree with the advisability of this inquiry, and I would like to know whether the government will require Air Canada Vice President Kent Davis to give some explanations concerning unpleasant remarks he made towards French-speaking civil servants of the Crown corporation.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, civil servants have bosses within their agencies and if any disciplinary measures are to be taken, they must be taken by directors in every department or agency. I am not aware of any unpleasant remarks, but I will convey this question of the hon. member to the Minister of Transport.

EDUCATION

ALLEGED MISLEADING ESTIMATES OF PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES—BASIS OF PRELIMINARY REQUESTS BY PROVINCES

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State. It refers to one I put to the minister on Friday asking him to justify the $111 million mistake in federal estimates of post-secondary education costs. He replied that it was not a mistake and I accept that. It is much worse. Can he now justify the deliberate tabling of misleading estimates designed to show restraint in the federal government's spending program when he knows that final payments under this program for 1976-77 will be much higher and that what he is trying to pass off as restraint is in fact a deferred payment of an expenditure mandated by law?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to do so, I shall answer this question because estimates fall under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Board. I must say that the action taken by the Treasury Board, on presenting the estimates, is quite legitimate. We had, under the law, the privilege of postponing payment of certain debentures to show to all levels of government that we are serious about our restraint program and indirectly encourage them to do likewise. Those expenditures will be settled when the government deems it opportune.

[English]

Miss MacDonald: Is the President of the Treasury Board prepared to say the amount of the preliminary estimates submitted to him by the Secretary of State? Was this preliminary request for funds based on the provincial estimates of operating expenditures for 1976-77, as required under the Fiscal Arrangements Act?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said in my previous answer that the legislation allowed a certain flexibility as far as payments are concerned and we took advantage of that.

[English]

Miss MacDonald: A final supplementary—I should like to address it to the Prime Minister but he is absent. I will direct it to the President of the Treasury Board. Does the minister consider that this obvious example of lack of integrity in dealing with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements provides the proper climate for co-operative approach to the renegotiation of post-secondary financing at the first ministers conference in June?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think this would be quite appropriate and will give the provinces a chance to realize that the government is very much concerned by the level of public expenditures and trying to bring them under control, as the official opposition is pressing us every day to do.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBILITY OF ARRANGEMENTS TO FACILITATE OPERATIONS OF NORANDA MINES IN CHILE

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that Noranda Mines, a Canadian company, is about to start operations in Chile, has the Canadian government made any arrangement, commitment or contract with this company to facilitate its establishment in that country?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question, and perhaps it will be possible to answer it later during the day.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question also directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, of which the Parliamentary Secretary could take notice. I will ask it in English.

[English]

Has Noranda Mines received or been promised any financial assistance from the Canadian Export Development Corporation or is it under any contract or negotiating any contract with the Canadian International Development Agency?

[Translation]

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I am taking notice of the question.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION INTO ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. It is my understanding that the ongoing investigation into the SIU has assumed two forms, one into possible criminal aspects and another into non-criminal aspects. Can the minister state whether he has received a report with respect to the non-criminal aspects of the investigation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I believe the minister responsible for the RCMP is the minister to whom any questions dealing with these investigations should be directed.

Mr. MacKay: I must say that in view of the interest the Minister of Labour has in this matter I thought he would be informed. However, may I address the question to the Solicitor General?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): I have checked with the RCMP on a periodic basis with respect to this investigation. They tell me it is very wide and comprehensive, that it is still under way and that it will take some time. No final report, or, indeed, interim report, has been issued.

REQUEST OF EGG MARKETING AGENCY TO BE SOLE IMPORTER—JUSTIFICATION OF MINISTER'S SUPPORT

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In the last few days the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency has asked, with the support of the Minister of Agriculture, for authority to be a direct importer of eggs and for sole receivership rights in respect of eggs imported into Canada. CEMA has asked that the situation be clarified immediately. Can the minister tell us when the situation will be clarified, and can he assure the House that any change in policy will be in the interest of Canadian consumers as well as of the egg producers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Anything we decide on will be in the interest of both the consumers and the producers; that is the intent of national marketing—both have to be in a healthy position. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is attending a meeting today in Dallas, Texas. As soon as he returns we shall be discussing this problem. We want it settled. We want a decision made as soon as possible, also.

Mr. Grafftey: On many occasions the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has stated that in no circumstances would he support a policy which gave CEMA sole receivership rights in respect of imported eggs, and that is government policy at the present time. How does the Minister of Agriculture justify his position of advocating the exact opposite from one end of the country to the other?

• (1430)

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, if I recall correctly what the minister said in the House previously, he is against a monopoly. CEMA does not have a monopoly on egg production in Canada at the present time. There are many producers with 1,000 or 500 laying hens that are not under the control of the provincial marketing board; they can market their eggs at any price. As the hon. member I am sure is aware, there are other groups in Canada that have control over imports. The Canadian Wheat Board has control over the importation of wheat, oats and barley; the Canadian Dairy Commission has control over the importation of butter. I am sure that the hon. member would not suggest that this authority should be taken away from them.

BELL AEROSPACE—POSSIBILITY PLANT WILL CLOSE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE CONTINUED OPERATION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, can I address my question to the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in the absence of the minister, or to the Acting Prime Minister. Is the minister aware that Bell Aerospace, a subsidiary of Textron, a United States corporation which produces air cushion vehicles which are of great importance for various purposes in Canada, such as ice breaking, flood control and transportation on rough terrain, has reduced its staff of employees at the Canadian plant at Grand Bend from 78 to 19 and proposes to close down its Canadian operations?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was personally aware of this story that appeared in the newspapers. I would be glad to pass the question on to the minister for an answer when he returns the day after tomorrow.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, would the Acting Prime Minister also refer the following supplementary question to the minister. Would the minister inquire into this situation and discuss with the company how this valuable industry, which has been financed by the federal PAIT program to the extent of $4 million, can be carried on, especially in light of the fact that the U.S.S.R. has expressed interest in Canada's leading technology in this field and that the U.S. army is also testing the machines?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that the discussions he suggests are already underway.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

AVAILABILITY OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS FOR LOW COST HOUSING IN QUEBEC

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Further to the question I asked him on May 13 on the way the Quebec Housing Corporation is spending the funds allocated by the federal government for the purpose of building low cost housing for senior citizens, has the minister checked the facts put forward on May 13 and can he inform the House on the use or availability of such funds, as the promoters of such projects are still refused money from the government from Quebec on the grounds that the federal government has not done anything yet?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say I have checked into this. Funds have been allocated under our public housing, non-profit housing and limited dividend housing programs, I think in the area of $56 million. Arrangements are still to be made by the province of Quebec for delivery of these programs, but the funds are available, plus other programs in regard to which the province of Quebec has not made appropriate arrangements.

URBAN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION MUNICIPALITIES SHARE TAX POINTS UNDER INCOME TAX ACT—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs responsible for housing. Has the minister had discussions with the executive or the president of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, and was the sharing of tax points with the municipalities under the Income Tax Act discussed with the municipalities?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the tri-level task force on public finance has made its report to the three levels of government. There has been a meeting between the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities and the provincial minister representing the other provincial ministers. This matter has not been discussed recently. We have received the report and we hope to be able to discuss it jointly in the not too distant future. There are difficulties in arranging those discussions, but certainly there is agreement between the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities and the federal government that such discussions would be productive, and we would be happy to enter into such discussions.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Do the minister and his colleagues in the federal government intend to pursue this matter with the provinces before the meeting of the CFMM, which is to take place in Vancouver in June?

[Mr. Drury.]

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether that would happen. The Hon. Brian Peckford of Newfoundland, who is representing the provincial ministers in this regard, is in contact with his provincial counterparts but he is unlikely to get agreement from all provinces to have such discussions before that meeting. As a matter of fact, it is increasingly difficult to get agreement to have such discussions at all.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR FILING REPORTS ON PROFESSIONAL FEES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and relates to the Anti-Inflation Board. As the board requires that compliance reports on professional fees and income be submitted within 90 days of the year end, and as the report forms and other related material have only recently been sent out by the board to those affected, will the minister extend the due date for these reports to August 15, to give the required 90 days?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the point as expressed by the hon. gentleman seems to be reasonable and I will discuss it with the board.

Mr. Scott: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As there are approximately 40,000 people affected, how soon can the minister make the decision known in order that those people will have a chance to negotiate with their accountants in different fields?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I will discuss that concern with the board as well.

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH POSITION OF CHIEF FINANCIAL OFFICER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the recommendation implied by the Auditor General in his report for the year ended March 31, 1975, and later enunciated by him before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, would the minister give very careful consideration to the establishment of the position of chief financial officer within the framework of the Public Service of Canada, the position to have express responsibility for overseeing matters relating to the adequacy of financial accounting and control measures over the some $40 billion of annual revenues and expenditures involved in the current operations of the government?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows, we studied thoroughly the Auditor General's recommendations which we all accepted, except two. As concerns the position mentioned by the hon. member, I am prepared to consider it favourably. There is a problem of organization within the government. We strongly intend to establish the required mechanisms to the satisfaction of the Auditor General, and I think that with respect to this particular matter, the Treasury Board and the Auditor General will finally find a common ground. However, it is a problem of governmental organization and we may not be able to meet all the requests of the Auditor General, but if we can meet them in a proportion of 98 per cent, as we did until now, I think it is a good average.

AUDITOR GENERAL

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION IMPLEMENTING RECOMMENDATIONS OF REVIEW BOARD

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the hon. gentleman. He and I have exchanged a few words before on the issue of bringing in legislation to implement proposals made by the independent review board on the office of the Auditor General. I think the minister has already promised seven times to introduce legislation before the end of the session. Would he make the promise for the eighth time and make us happy?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will make the promise at a time other than today; I hope to give this matter a very prominent place in the Speech from the Throne that will be presented in the fall.

KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF MANIFESTO ISSUED BY CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN INSTITUTIONS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Despite the withdrawal of labour from ongoing committees comprised of labour, government and management, can the minister advise whether, in his recent talks with officials of the CLC, he had been given notice that a manifesto of labour demands would be issued by the CLC; and has the minister discussed the items contained within the manifesto in any of the bilateral discussions with the CLC which he has been advising the House have been taking place? Or does it come as a complete surprise?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was not given notice of the precise form of the manifesto that will be presented. I must advise the hon. member, however, that the CLC was approached in respect of entering into discussions with the government pertinent to a post-control period, and what policies it would like developed in this regard. We wanted to have the CLC's views and that type of approach was made, to which the CLC was receptive. Certainly I was aware, as I think the government was, that there was thinking going on within the CLC relative to the post-control period.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, reports of the manifesto indicate the following:

Logic draws us to the conclusion that the government is moving into a new era in which the institutions of this country are going to change.

I would ask the minister whether he agrees with that CLC statement, and whether, in any of the recent talks with the CLC, the minister has given the CLC reason to justify that statement?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, that all depends on how you want to interpret "institutions". Certainly the CLC has been, and I think will be in the future, co-operating with the government and with the business representatives on the Canadian Labour Relations Council—the tripartite council with which the hon. member I am sure is familiar—in reforming and changing some of the institutions that we have found not to be working too satisfactorily, not only from a labour point of view but from the point of view of the country generally. I am referring to the free collective bargaining system and the work that labour has done in that area in terms of the concept of broader base bargaining and other innovations that will, indeed, improve and necessarily change the institutions.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, it would appear the minister has had some discussions in some depth with the CLC, and my question is, when the CLC says that "logic drives us to the conclusion that the government is moving into a new era in which the institutions of this country are going to change", is it the minister's understanding from his discussions with the CLC that this refers only to matters of labour-management relations, or is this something which goes much further than that?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think our institutions are always in a state of change. I think that primarily the CLC is concerned, and the manifesto to a degree reveals this, with what will happen in respect of collective bargaining and their rights under collective bargaining. The CLC is very concerned about that. We have indicated to the CLC that through the tripartite relationship we hope to improve the system, not to deny rights, but rather to reduce the adversary element within the system to the benefit of the CLC and everybody else concerned. That is the major concern of the CLC, and I believe that is what is referred to in the particular paragraph of the manifesto quoted by the hon. member.

MANPOWER

PORTION OF UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS ATTRIBUTABLE TO STRIKES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and is related to reports that indicate that up to 3 per cent of the recently announced unemployment statistics can be attributed to strikes, not only in private industry but also in essential public services. Would the minister advise the House to what extent his department has the capacity to evaluate these statistics to see whether these reports are justified, and will he indicate what his department intends to do about this?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that type of analysis is more appropriately focused within the Department of Labour. We pool such specialized information in that area with the Department of Labour.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGATION TOURISTS FROM UNITED STATES NEED PASSPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might respond to a question addressed to me the other day on an important matter regarding the alleged requirement for United States visitors to Canada to have passports or birth certificates. I want to clearly indicate that such is not the case. This was a result of somewhat erroneous information and has been clarified with all our immigration posts. The fact is that we will not be requiring United States visitors to Canada to have passports or birth certificates, but simply the ordinary identification they have been presenting.

SUGGESTED DEVELOPMENT OF MULTI-UNION BARGAINING SYSTEM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Since it is quite obvious that many recipients of unemployment insurance are either directly or indirectly involved in strikes, some in essential public services, has he had any discussions with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration as to the advisability and the benefits that could be derived from the development of a multi-union bargaining system in our country so that one firm is not bargaining with eight unions, in which case if one goes on strike the rest receive unemployment insurance?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, just to make things perfectly clear, and I do not know whether the hon. member does not understand this proposition—

Mr. Oberle: I understand it very well.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The fact is you cannot get unemployment insurance while you are on strike, to which I believe my colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, will attest. However, in answer to the hon. member's general question, yes, this is one of the essential concepts that labour, management and government, the tripartite council, have been endeavouring to develop the concept of broader base bargaining. Following the adoption of this concept, then, if one union exercises its right to strike in a case where an employer has eight or nine bargaining agents to deal with in coming to settlements, the whole place will not be shut down, denying the opportunity of employment to those employees belonging to other unions. It is hoped we can change this type of thing through the concept of broader based bargaining, and there has been some progress along these lines.

INCOME TAX

PROHIBITION OF CERTAIN ACTIVITIES OF ORGANIZATIONS DESIGNATED CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS UNDER ACT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue and is in respect of a question raised a week ago concerning a dangerous precedent which had been established by officials regarding the possible change in the tax exemption status of charitable organizations. I wonder whether the minister has yet had an opportunity to consider the situation with regard to the more than 30,000 charitable organizations presently enjoying this tax benefit status in Canada, and whether he has yet come to any conclusion concerning the appropriateness of such a decision by people in his department prohibiting certain activities of these organizations?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Interestingly enough, but maybe not surprising, "charitable purpose" is not defined in the act so we had to turn to the courts for an interpretation. They have indicated that "for charitable purposes" includes relief of poverty, advancement of religion, advancement of education and an obscure clause, of general benefit to the community. So, first and foremost, when we are defining what charitable activity is we must look to those engaged in other activities. "Political activity" again has no definition in the act. It has been indicated in the courts that "engaged in political activity", is an adjunct to political activity and does in fact void the charitable aspect. We in the department have no wish to be unduly restrictive. In point of fact, the department has taken the position that presenting a viewpoint does not in fact void the charitable status. This is an area where I do back up my officials. They had to depend on the only precedent they had in this particular instance, that is the jurisprudence of the land, and because of that, and the difficulties this might make for many organizations, I am asking my officials to look at it in more depth.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN CEILING ON CASUAL EARNINGS FOR THOSE ON ALLOWANCE

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the $1,500 ceiling on casual earnings allowed veterans on war veterans allowances, or their spouses, has remained fixed for the past three years, whereas average earnings have risen some 40 per cent, and federal minimum wages have risen by 50 per cent, a situation causing hardship to veterans and their families, will the Minister of Veterans Affairs undertake to increase the $1,500 ceiling on exempt casual earnings to bring this into line with higher levels of average earnings, as was done in the past, in order that these casual earnings will be worth as much today as they were three years ago?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): In answer to the hon. gentleman's question, Mr. Speaker, we are presently doing this in the department. Negotiations are being carried out and we hope to be successful in this endeavour.

SUGGESTED PROVISION OF PRO-RATED PENSION FOR WIDOWS OF PENSIONERS WHOSE DISABILITY WAS LESS THAN 48 PER CENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I too, have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and I am glad he is in an affirmative mood. Now that Bill C-92, which provides compensation for Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war, is in effect, will the minister and his department study the possibility of bringing in legislation to implement one of the recommendations of the Seventh Report of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs which was not included in Bill C-92, namely, the provision of pro-rated pensions for widows of veterans where the veteran's disability pension was less than 48 per cent?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker we are constantly reviewing this and many other aspects and necessities in our department. This will be also under study but how soon it can be brought forward I cannot tell the hon. member at this time.

POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF WORLD WAR I PRISONERS OF WAR IN PROVISIONS OF BILL C-92

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister, at the same time, review the possibility of including veterans of World War I who were prisoners of war under the provisions of Bill C-92?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this will be given due consideration, but I must remind members of the House that when the POW legislation was prepared and presented to the House of Commons the people who worked on it considered that prisoners of war in the first world war were treated quite differently from prisoners in the second world war.

MANPOWER

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO REPLACE LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, to whom I gave advance notice of it.

Considering that local initiatives projects are coming to an end within a few weeks and following the question I asked him on January 29, 1976, which can be found at page 10428 of Hansard, can the minister tell the House whether he is now ready to make a statement in that regard and if not, when he will be able to inform the House of the implementation of similar projects to replace the local initiatives projects in constituencies with a high rate of unemployment?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to say that I appreciate the notice which the hon. member sent me. The Local Initiatives Program funding for the fiscal period 1975-1976 is, as the hon. member has noted, due to end within a few weeks and $150 million in funds were allocated for that purpose for that period. No decision has been taken to extend that program beyond the termination date of the projects presently underway although, as I have indicated in the House, $100 million has been allocated and will be sought in supplementary estimates for 1976-1977 for this fall and winter. The details of that program will be made available to hon. members as soon as we have finalized some of the changed criteria.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ACCOUNTING OF HOW MONEY WAS SPENT IN CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question? Will he be providing to the House an accounting of how the money was spent in every constituency in the final analysis.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): It has been standard practice to table the allocation of funds broken down by constituency since we introduced that degree of distribution. I am not sure what the hon. member wishes to know with regard to the details of how every dollar was spent in the constituencies. We will certainly show the funding allocation.

SUSPENSION OF CLEARANCE SERVICES AT REGINA AND SASKATOON AIRPORTS—PRECLEARANCE AT CALGARY AND EDMONTON

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. My colleague from Regina asked him last week about the abandonment of customs and clearance services at the airports in Saskatoon and Regina. I hope he will be in a position to answer that question today.

And while he is on his feet would he also advise us, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, of the state of negotiations with regard to customs preclearance in Calgary and Edmonton, a matter which has been outstanding now for some 18 months to two years?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): With regard to the first part of the question I have the same difficulty as the hon. member. I want to discuss the matter with my colleague, the Minister of Transport. Normally, we provide the personnel after consultation with the Department of Transport on whether the traffic load warrants it. The facilities are not provided there because the traffic pattern apparently is not sufficient to warrant the services of customs officials. However, I want to be certain before I give an unequivocal answer to the hon. member.

With respect to the other matter, negotiations are proceeding. I cannot give the hon. member a positive answer.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With regard to the preclearance in Calgary and Edmonton and the apparent desire of the Minister of Transport to make sure that the airlines pay for the service, would he also look at the equity of those people who use those airports paying a user tax and yet not getting facilities to which they are entitled at other airports?

Mr. Cullen: In light of the fact that the representation comes from such an august member of the House, I will give it my careful consideration.

PROPOSED CAMP HILL COMPLEX AT HALIFAX—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs and it arises out of questions I asked some months ago about the negotiations between the provincial government of Nova Scotia and his department concerning the future of the proposed new structure on Camp Hill hospital site in Halifax. Are these negotiations reaching a final conclusion and, if so, can the minister indicate briefly just what it is?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken with the minister of health in Nova Scotia. My officials have been down to Nova Scotia and discussions are being carried on with regard to this transfer. With regard to giving the hon. member the final conclusion, I would like to tell him that from past experience I find it is not a good idea to state conclusions before something is clearly established. Therefore, I would prefer not to do it at this time.

GRAIN

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF ADDITIONAL STORAGE SPACE ON PACIFIC COAST—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It has to do with the Canadian Wheat Board incentive program to encourage the construction of an additional 14 million bushels of storage space at the Pacific seaboard. I wonder whether the minister intends to support this program by constructing additional storage at the government elevator at Prince Rupert.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the policy is good and we are hopeful it can be used at Prince Rupert.

CUSTOMS

SUGGESTION BORDER OFFICERS BE TAUGHT GOOD MANNERS

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): My question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue who has been questioned earlier today about customs agents. In view of the fact that the minister himself has been known during his service in parliament for good manners, and with the influx of tourists to Canada, especially in view of the Olympics this year, would the minister go out of his way to make sure that officials of his department, Department of National Revenue employees at the borders, who are not known for the best manners in the world, might be given a crash course in politeness to welcome visitors into our country?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I categorically deny that presumption by the hon. member. We deal with some 75 million visitors to Canada. Considering the limited number of complaints we get, I think they are doing a crack-a-jack job. It does not mean that it cannot be better, but most assuredly I dissociate myself from the hon. member's comment.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

ALLEGED FUTURE GAP BETWEEN BENEFITS AND CONTRIBUTIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As Canada Pension Plan benefits will exceed employer-employee contributions in about three years and from then on it will be all downhill unless the government subsidizes the plan or abruptly raises the contributions of those still paying, would the minister indicate if his department has done a fresh appraisal of the magnitude of this coming gap and, if so, would he indicate what it is likely to be?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): The department has under scrutiny the question of the expected crossover of the Canada Pension Plan payments, that is to have them moved to a position where the contributions will no longer exceed the payments out. This was in contemplation right from the start in the Canada Pension Plan, and for this particular purpose we have been having some discussions with the provincial governments. Indeed, at the last finance ministers meeting the province of Ontario responded with a lengthy brief on the question, as did other provincial finance ministers in oral terms. In short, this is a question which has been under examination. I would not like to make a statement at this time as to the possible future course, but in view of the important role the Canada Pension Plan has had in terms of financing provincial governments as well as protecting individual Canadians, clearly this is a matter which will be extensively discussed in a year or so.

USE OF RESOURCES BY COMPANIES NOT PERMITTED TO EXPORT

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the report last week, I should like to ask the minister whether the Canadian government will force companies which are not permitted to export to use the same resources to supply the domestic market. Is that going to apply only to findings in the Northwest Territories and the northern part of Canada or will it also be applied to the provinces?

● (1500)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should have liked to be able to give the hon. member a full and complete answer at this time, but I have indicated to him and other hon. members that we will be making a full statement with respect to the new oil and gas land regulations, and I think it has now been agreed that the time for that will be on Wednesday of this week.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT FROM ONTARIO COMMISSIONERS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State. Can the minister inform me whether pursuant to section 22 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act he has received a representation order from the representation commissioners of the province of Ontario?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check into that.

NUMBER OF CATTLE AND SHEEP DESTROYED UNDER BLUE TONGUE CONTROL PROGRAM

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister inform the House how many cattle have been destroyed under the new blue tongue eradication program, how many sheep have been destroyed and how he plans to control the disease in wild game?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that detailed information ought to be sought in another way.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF JUSTICE MINISTER HAIM ZADOK OF ISRAEL

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw to the attention of the House the presence in your gallery of a representative of Israel with whom we maintain close and friendly relationships, His Excellency Haim Zadok, the Minister of Justice of Israel, and his charming wife, Mrs. Zadok.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. While I have no objection to going through the exercise of standing to be recognized—and I recognize the fact that there are many other hon. members who must be recognized—I should like to point out one fact which disturbed me last Friday and today. Conveniently or otherwise, ministers who could have been questioned have had occasion to leave the House during the question period. I noticed that after the question put by the hon. member for Central Nova to the Minister of Labour there was consultation between the Minister of Labour and the Solicitor General. I do not say that consultation was pertinent, but I noticed that immediately afterwards the Solicitor General left the House. I also noticed that the minister's parliamentary secretary enjoyed his peregrinations behind the curtain for the entire balance of the question period. I find it indeed frustrating, as must other hon. members, to be recognized when ministers and their parliamentary secretaries do not sit regularly in the House.

It should be noted that some ministers and some parliamentary secretaries are very faithful to the question period and recognize the urgency of the need for hon. members to determine what the facts are, but there are some who very seriously abuse the purpose of the question period. As a backbencher, I simply want to voice my serious objection to this abuse of the question period by both ministers and parliamentary secretaries. Quite frankly, I am fed up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

1. How many members of the RCMP were stationed in the Yukon Territory in (a) 1970 (b) 1971 (c) 1972 (d) 1973 (e) 1974 (f) 1975 (g) 1976?

2. How many were responsible for (a) general management (b) training (c) law enforcement?

3. How many were (a) French speaking (b) English speaking (c) bilingual?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Note: Parts 1 and 2 refer to authorized establishment whereas Part 3 refers to actual strength. The reason for the discrepancy between the authorized strength and the actual strength is that the statistics were taken from March figures. The new year increases which came into effect April 1 accommodate the overages. 1. (a) 62; (b) 68; (c) 71; (d) 75; (e) 80; (f) 82; (g) 88.

CANADIAN DOMESTIC CHEESE PRODUCTION

Question No. 4,993—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is Canadian domestic cheese production adequate in quantity to meet domestic demand?

2. What proportion of the wholesale distribution of domestically produced cheese is marketed by (a) Canadian-controlled (b) foreign-controlled enterprises?

3. Of the 50 million pound cheese import quota for 1976-77, what is the (a) distribution by country (b) total allowable quota from the European Common Market countries?

4. What is the estimated level of price support for industrial milk in the European Economic Community?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. The Canadian domestic cheese industry has the manufacturing capacity to supply domestic demand for the major cheeses consumed in Canada such as cheddar, colby, brick and mozzarella. In the case of variety cheeses, Canada only manufactures about 60 varieties while we import 210 varieties. There is no Canadian production capability to manufacture all the varieties of cheese required to satisfy consumer demands.

2. While statistics are not available on cheese distribution by firms, it is estimated that about 25 per cent of domestically produced cheese is marketed by Canadian-controlled firms and about 75 per cent by foreign-controlled companies.

3. (a) The 50 million pound cheese import quota for 1976-77 is a global quota. The quota is allocated to importers based on their 1975 quota entitlements and importers are free to source their cheese imports from any country except Rhodesia. (b) Quotas are not allocated by country and, therefore, there is no quota allocated to European Common Market countries.

4. The European Economic Community's target support price for industrial milk, effective March 15, 1976, is estimated to be $9.16 per hundred pounds.

2. Did any department rent office space from the Company in (a) 1971 (b) 1972 (c) 1973 (d) 1974 (e) 1975 and, if so, in each case (i) which department (ii) what was the annual rent?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): 1 and 2. The Department of Public Works has not rented office space from this Company for this department or any other government department or agency.

3. On each date, what was the (a) interest bearing unmatured funded debt together with the annual interest payable on these amounts expressed in dollar and percentage terms (b) interest bearing other liabilities together with the annual interest payable on these amounts expressed in dollar and percentage terms (c) non-interest bearing other liabilities (d) contingent liabilities?

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, for those who might have paid attention to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West a short time ago relating to the presence or absence of ministers, all ministers who are not in the House are busy on official business elsewhere, and I think the comments of the hon. gentleman are absolutely unfounded.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT FAILURE TO INSTITUTE INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its lack of an industrial strategy which (a) has resulted in falling production, job losses and uncertainty, as in the cases of Westinghouse, Microsystems, Dunlop Tire and others, and (b) is a major cause of today's unemployment rate of 7.4 per cent, which means that 761,000 Canadians are without jobs, a situation that calls for immediate action.

He said: Mr. Speaker, our purpose in bringing this motion to the attention of the House is to indicate what we think is probably the most important cause of unemployment in Canada, that is, the lack of an industrial strategy on the part of the government, to try to make some specific references and to draw some lessons from those references as to why we have failed to create jobs in this country. It takes some kind of perverse genius for a government to create a disaster in a land as fortunate as Canada, with all its resources both human and material.

The people on the other side of the House must have to try very hard to give us probably the highest level of unemployment in the western world, a rate of 7.4 per cent: they really have to work at it. It is not that the problem of an industrial strategy and its effect on unemployment has not been studied in this country. If we are good at anything at all, it is studying things. While we may not have much of a military strategy, we certainly have a "navel" policy in the sense that we keep looking at our own all the time. However, nothing seems to do much good. We have had all these studies going back to the royal commission of Walter Gordon. It seems hardly a year goes by that something is not studied. Occasionally work is found for the other place, and its members throw in a study. We have set national objectives. It is not as if we do not know what sort of policies we want to have.

We started off with the objectives of the Economic Council of Canada for an industrial and economic approach. We went on to the approach of the Science Council. Then a number of years ago the government brought out a foreign policy review paper which was supposed to set down the kinds of objectives this country wanted to achieve in terms of social and economic policy. If we go back even further than that, we find that a man who was not very prone to do any planning at all had his own kind of review policy. Following the Second World War, Mackenzie King in fact had a study commissioned to see what we could come up with in terms of a strategy.

We do not need to do any more studying. There are studies all around us. What we need is a government which is determined to do something from what has been studied until now. I can appreciate that planning is not an easy thing to do, that there are difficulties in a country like Canada, and that there are differences between provinces and differences between various groups in our society which have to be reconciled.

Of course, it is very easy for a government to simply ignore the problem and take the attitude that if they do nothing about it, perhaps it will go away. For years and years they were able to live off the resources of this country, not doing anything, and the problem tended, if not to go away at least to go underground. We are reaching a new stage in our development, however, where that is not going to be so easy. We are no longer as rich as we were. We can no longer count on the bounty of nature, the oil under the ground or the minerals that were easy to obtain, in order to be assured of our future. We will have to start thinking about where we are going and about conserving our resources. While the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talks about a new society, there is no evidence that his government has dealt with the old society, let alone know what they are going to do with the new one.

To demonstrate some of the points I wish to make, perhaps we should look at what might be called a Tale of two Cities. One is the city of Hamilton, and the other the city of Whitby. One has to do with appliances, and the other with tires. Their experiences demonstrate why we have not been able to create enough jobs in Canada, and the shortsightedness of our government in developing strategy. Recently, the leader of my party received a letter from Mr. William Love, president of local 494 of the United Rubber Workers Union, in which he expressed concern about what has been happening in the Whitby plant that was bought from Dunlop by Firestone.

Briefly, the history of the plant shows that it was formerly owned by Dunlop Canada Limited and was sold to Firestone Tire Company in August, 1974, when it was given the name Whitby Tire Limited. Since October, 1975, the name has been changed to Dayton Tire Canada Limited. That company has laid off approximately 120 employees indefinitely and has lost another 70 employees due to those who quit or retired and have not been replaced. There had been 530 members of the bargaining unit under Dunlop, and when Firestone bought the plant they promised to increased employment by 200 or 300 people. Production at the plant has dropped from an average of 6,000 passenger and truck tires per day to the present level of 3,000 tires per day. There does not seem to be any plan to increase production above 3,000 tires a day for the balance of the year, and the union is worried that there will be further lay-offs.

I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) if he would look into conditions at this company. Firestone can no longer use the "Dunlop" name because there was a three-year agreement that they would manufacture tires under the Dunlop licence and then start to manufacture an unbranded line. Dunlop was going to continue production of tires, but in the United States where they could take advantage of the "Dunlop" trade name. They would then sell the tires to Canada. We received information that Dunlop were setting up warehouses, or encouraging distributorships by assuring them that there would be tires of every size and line shipped to them from the United States.

When we approach the government and point out that jobs are being lost in this country, they generally reply that it is because of a soft market in the United States. They always give that reason, instead of the reason being their own soft heads. In this case, however, we are talking about the Canadian market. What happened was very convenient for Dunlop. There was a great fuss three years ago when Dunlop closed down operations in Canada, but it was pointed out that Firestone was taking over and production in this country would continue. But it seems, now, that Firestone used that time to organize the transfer of production from Canada to the United States.

The rubber industry is an example of one of the things that is wrong with this country's industrial organization. Because of a foreign ownership pattern of setting up branch plants in Canada, we have a miniature replica of the American market, and to some extent the British market. Every major brand name is represented in Canada. If one is missed, the government goes out and encourages a French manufacturer to come in.

It does not take much knowledge or business to see that if we cannot handle the number of brands and options we already have in a market one-eleventh the size of the United States market, that it is impossible for us to get the long runs necessary for the efficient production we need to allow us to compete. That, coupled with the fact that some of these companies set up plants, then go back to the United States and export to Canada, cuts our market into pieces. The government talks about plans to step up exports and invade other markets; but, Mr. Speaker, before we can take other markets we must be able to look after our own. In many instances we have failed to satisfy our own market, and therefore we have a weak industry.

A radio interviewer spoke to me this afternoon before I came into the chamber. He wanted to know whether I intended to talk about productivity. I told him that was not the main theme of my discourse and I would speak about it only indirectly. He asked if worker productivity is the problem. I replied that when people talk about productivity they assume it is directly related to the worker. Mr. Speaker, a worker can only be as productive as is permitted by the industrial structure in which he works; he depends on the tools and machinery that are supplied. He cannot produce tires just by sweating; he needs technical organization, marketing expertise and, in general, a rational industry—which this industry is not.

Studies show that this country employs more capital per worker than any other, including the United States, yet our workers are not as productive. That is not because they do not work as hard; it is because industry is organized in such a way as to make it virtually impossible to get high productivity in this country while providing the number of jobs needed. When workers in this country ask for parity of wages with their counterparts in the United States because they claim they work as hard, the companies tell them that they are only interested in cheap labour in Canada and do not wish to give them parity because it will price them out of foreign markets. When the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) speaks he will give some examples of this from his own riding.

I remember when there was a strike at Massey-Ferguson, in the Brantford area, and a consultant was hired by the company to explain to the workers why they could not receive parity with American workers. The argument he put forward was that the company had concentrated its labour-intensive production in Canada, and if they had to pay the same wages here as in the United States they might as well move to the United States. That was not a foreign company, Mr. Speaker, but a Canadian company.

What had happened to the free trade that was supposed to be the panacea to all Canada's industrial problems was that a great Canadian company transferred all its high technology to the United States. Its capital-intensive production was concentrated there, and it left little more than assembly-line plants in Canada. In effect, it was telling workers in Canada that if they wanted even this kind of employment, they would have to accept a lower standard of living than their counterparts in the United States. That kind of argument could hardly be accepted by the workers.

I have spoken about Dunlop and what happened there. The work was transferred to Firestone, because Dunlop has the name, can export to Canada, does not need a plant in this country, has built up consumer confidence in its name and has used the deductibility of advertising, which should have been a capital consideration rather than a deductible one, to enhance its position. Now the employment will take place in another country, but the market will be in Canada.

In Hamilton, the same situation faces us. In that city an industry producing white goods, Westinghouse, is up for sale. A Canadian manufacturer, GSW, wants to buy this industry. They thought a sale would take place and that the name "Westinghouse" would go with the sale. To their surprise, the parent of Westinghouse said, "No, you have no right to the name and cannot use it in the white goods industry." The Canadian company said that if they could not use the name or make some arrangement to use the Westinghouse name, the American company could simply move in with exports from the United States which would compete with the product of the Canadian company, products manufactured by the assets the Canadian company had acquired.

What has happened? FIRA has turned down the American application to buy out Westinghouse. Presumably, it has not said anything about the Canadian application, because the Canadian application is not before FIRA and FIRA does not have to rule on a take-over by a Canadian company. There seems to be a fair amount of sympathy on the part of FIRA for the Canadian company to take over Westinghouse. The recommendation has gone to cabinet.

It seems, from all we hear that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is sympathetic to the recommendation of FIRA. But this has been going on since last August and there has been no decision from cabinet on the matter. We have heard complaints from the Canadian company, GSW, which is a reputable company. It says it thought it understood what the Canadian government wanted; it thought it understood Canadian industrial strategy, which was aimed at rationalizing the white goods industry. At one time there were as many manufacturers of refrigerators in Canada as in the United States—an impossible situation. The company thought that the government intended to rationalize industry. Although this government has never had an industrial strategy, it has brought in sectoral policies which deal with one industry or another.

At any rate, GSW was under the impression that the Canadian government had such a policy and would welcome a Canadian company taking over a foreign company in Canada for the purpose of rationalizing. Their position seemed strong. It was reinforced by the union which wrote to the Canadian government and said, "We prefer the GSW take-over rather than the White Industries' take-over." They recognized that White Industries have not been a positive influence. White Industries were in London; they closed the plant down as soon as they bought another. Their attitude to labour-management relations leaves much to be desired. So you have the unions supporting the GSW company. On top of that, the Committee for an Independent Canada also supported the GSW take-over. Therefore, FIRA was against the American take-over; there has been positive support for the Canadian company, but the matter has been in abeyance before cabinet since last August. Why?

I will tell you one reason, Mr. Speaker. The government is afraid of the United States, afraid to make this kind of decision and afraid of being accused of favouring a Canadian company. I wonder why that is the government's attitude in matters of industrial strategy, matters which involve the jobs of people and the future livelihood of this country. Why is the government so afraid? Evidently there was no such fear in the case of Time magazine—although there was at one "time". Excuse the pun. But the government changed its attitude. It is hard to know why the government has not made a decision on this amalgamation or take-over, whichever way you want to look at it.

It seems to me that it is vital to establish a strong Canadian industry, whether publicly or privately-owned. In our view, we need a strong Canadian industry. It seems to me that the cabinet should have made its decision a long time ago. Failing that, it should at least make its decision now. That decision should be in favour of GSW, the Canadian company, rather than in favour of an American company.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: It has the support of FIRA, the support of Canadian unions and the support of the Committee for an Independent Canada.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Will the hon. member for Cambridge-Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) accept a question?

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to receive a question later. I should like to continue my argument at this time. May I ask which hon. member wishes to ask a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik).

Mr. Cafik: I should like to correct what the hon. member just said.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): He wishes to correct a statement the hon. member just made.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) does not mind, before I sit down I will be happy to accept his question. The question of trademarks is involved in this matter. I must underline the importance of trademarks as they are a factor which make it virtually impossible for Canadians to compete. There are many weaknesses among Canadian capitalists. On the other hand, the Canadian capitalist who must compete with the American giant and the advantages of American capitalists faces many difficulties.

In the case of Dunlop, how does one compete? Firestone sets up a plant which will produce unbranded lines. Dunlop has the name, has set up its distributorship system and can take advantage of overflow advertising. This has been going on over the years. Tires are a bit of a mystery to most people. The government has not adopted any adequate way whereby the public can be told, "This is a good tire. That is a bad tire." There is no comparative testing, and tires need not conform to any standards except the manufacturing standards. Therefore, the consumer is placed in the position of not knowing and must depend on the brand name. When you have a brand name, you have a stranglehold on a particular market. The point is that all the brand names in this country are American brand names, and as long as American firms can use those brand names in Canada they have a stranglehold on the Canadian market unless we break it.

I have had discussions over the years with members of the government who have said that perhaps we should act unilaterally in the case of Westinghouse and do something about the brand name. What they do not see is that it would be wrong to do this with one specific company. By doing this you would be arbitrary and discriminatory and the government might have a tough time if it were taken to court. No government, particularly a Canadian government, has the right to behave in that way. If it wants to bring in a policy, it must apply it to everybody. It must have a general policy on brand names. Brand names are becoming a problem—a problem concerning FIRA in cases of the Canadian take-over of American industries. This is probably the most serious impediment to rationalizing the Canadian industry and the ability of Canadians to take over American industries, and the government must do something about it. They say, "No other country has disallowed brand names or the use of brand names."

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No other country has the same degree of foreign ownership of its industries.

Mr. Saltsman: No other country has the same degree of foreign ownership of its industries. It is no good behaving like Boy Scouts. Boy Scouts are well and good, but not when you are involved in these kinds of enterprises. We are living next to the United States and they have a stranglehold on our economy. I do not blame the Americans for anything; I have never blamed the Americans. The only person you should blame for being stupid is yourself. This government and governments before it have been stupid in permitting the degree of foreign ownership which has grown up in this country. They must do something about that now. I know that there are cabinet committees trying to deal with this business of trademarks. They will have to find a way whereby if a Canadian industry or company takes over a foreign industry or company, the use of certain foreign trademarks used by the company in this country will be a matter of national interest. We are the only country in the world with this problem.

I know that there are international conventions on trademarks and that suggestions in this field are not to be made lightly. Some of these matters are settled in international agreements, and I am generally in favour of international agreements. But when something this big is involved, when we are concerned about what has happened in the country because of historical developments, I think the rest of the world will understand if we act. We are not trying to take anything away; we are not trying to take any right away; we merely wish to say that certain trademarks will not be allowed to be used in this country.

I have said that the use of manufacturers' brand advertising and trade marks is, in many cases, one of the reasons we cannot reduce costs and achieve more effective production units. Even if we in Canada wanted to limit selling costs—and it has been proposed that we should limit them as a deductible item—there is too much huckstering going on; it would not do much good. This is pointed out by Canadian advertisers. All you would do is ensure an even larger share of the Canadian market to the Americans because their overflow advertising dominates this country. Every attempt at national policy would be frustrated in this area because we have permitted them to take advantage of a name that has been built up in another country. There was a time when trade marks and brand names provided important reassurance to the consumer about quality. That was a time when butchers had heavy fingers, scales were not weighted, crackers came in big barrels and were not packaged—but that day has passed.

Mr. Broadbent: Look at Ford.

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, even the trade mark is no longer a guarantee of quality. The public, of course, needs some kind of reassurance. They need something better, in the way of reassurance, than brand names. Why should not gasoline be sold by octane rating or some other definable quality, in the same way meat is sold by definable quality, rather than by brand? There would be much better assurance to the consumer. It would certainly be much less costly in terms of advertising.

We see now that there is a growth of unbranded lines in Canada. People are in fact moving to reliable dealers and substituting confidence in the retailer for confidence in the brand name. That sort of thing should be helped along. There is some question that FIRA has the power to deal with brand names. That is not at all certain. If FIRA does not have power, it should be given it. I have watched the activities of FIRA. I know there has been a lot of criticism of the Foreign Investment Review Agency. Some think they are doing too much, and others not enough. I have come to the conclusion that they are trying very hard to do a job.

In some cases, FIRA is usurping the authority that properly belongs to the politician. In the committee hearing the other day I asked the vice-president of FIRA whether he found the absence of an industrial strategy was creating difficulties for himself in terms of trying to make decisions about what was of advantage to Canada. With a little laugh he said, "Well, we make it up as we go along", or words to that effect. He was not going to comment on whether it was an industrial strategy. Because there is not political decision of industrial strategy, and because there has been no intelligent sitting down and determining what should be our strategy in Canada, agencies like FIRA are making decisions. I am not going to condemn FIRA for making that decision, because somebody has to do something, but surely it is wrong for policy to come in by this back door way.

I hear members of the government criticize the bureaucracy, the civil service, for usurping power unto themselves. When that happens in the civil services it is because the political leaders have failed to make the decisions even though they clearly have that power. Decisions are going to be made. If they are not made by the elected representatives of the people, they will be made by the captains of industry or the bureaucrats. Somebody will come to some conclusion. The proper people to do it are the representatives of the people, and the logical place for decisions to be made is here in the House of Commons. Members of parliament can be judged. If people approve of the decisions we make, we return: if not, they elect those who will make decisions of which they do approve.

My time is drawing to a close. There are a great many things to be said in this area. I have only touched very briefly on the problem. There is a question I would like to receive. This is a serious matter in terms of an industrial strategy. The government can now start, at least in a small way, to worry about employment in this country by seeing that the GSW take-over is approved and by strengthening the hand of FIRA to deal with industrial property, as well as planning with regard to the state of economy and how to create more employment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Ontario may now ask the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge a question.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). I may not have fully understood what he said. However, I believe he indicated the cabinet had not made a decision in connection with the FIRA application respecting White Consolidated. If that is what he said, I wish to draw to his attention that the cabinet did make a decision on this question some weeks ago. I thought the hon. member would have known that, before spending so much of his time criticizing the government for not making a decision it had already made.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I have to agree with the hon. member for Ontario to this extent: a cabinet decision to do nothing is still a cabinet decision. I suppose a cabinet decision is anything that shows up as a minute of cabinet. That is the kind of decision they have made. They have not made a decision regarding trademarks. The take-over has not been completed. There is no "go ahead"; it is away up in the air. What they have done is temporize, and a decision to temporize is not a decision worthy of government.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I wish to start by apologizing on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson), for whom I am pinch-hitting. He had to honour a long-standing and significant commitment he had made in the west. I want to convey to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) the minister's personal regret at not being present for the debate, and assure him that the comments made will be passed on to him in detail.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge covered a number of specifics and also generalized in the whole area of industrial strategy. While I will not be able to deal with many of the specifics in terms of local issues or particular cases, I want to spend a little time trying to get into focus the kind of industrialized performance of this country to which we are addressing ourselves when we talk about the need for an industrial strategy of some comprehensive nature. Before I do that, I want to point out that in the case of the White and GSW issue, this matter has not been neglected nor cavalierly treated. As the hon. member well knows, it involves some very complex issues, particularly the issue of trademarks.

There has been a great deal of consideration about it. I think the hon. member implied in his comments—in a quiet way, anyway—his recognition that there is a potential breach of a long-standing arrangement and the honouring of trademarking internationally. He also suggested that he recognized this could not be treated lightly when making a decision. Of course, that is at the very root of the GSW-White-Westinghouse dilemma.

Getting back to the more generalized approach, before we try and get at what an industrial strategy should or should not be we should get our sights clear on where we stand now with regard to performance in Canada. During the early 1970s the industrialized world experienced a boom of unprecedented proportions which led to a number of structural maladjustments and distortions—rapid and large changes in energy prices, food shortages, and other supply-demand imbalances. With this situation, economic adjustment and consolidation became inevitable.

The recession of 1974-75—and this is something I believe we often lose sight of—has been a worldwide phenomenon not peculiar to Canada, and although we may score points by emphasizing our own problems here, policy responses cannot be made in isolation. Unemployment rates and unused productive capacity in the major industrialized nations rose during the first half of 1975 to levels unprecedented since the end of the Second World War. For OECD countries combined, the real growth in the national product declined at a rate of about 5 per cent during the first half of the year. After that, economic conditions began to pick up.

The figures show that in comparison to other major industrialized countries, and with the OECD group in particular, Canada did not perform too badly. It experienced, during that period, a positive growth. The actual figure is .2 per cent, which is not one we would ordinarily boast about, but the fact is that every other country, with the exception of Japan, did worse. In the United States, it declined by 3 per cent; in France, it declined by 2 per cent; in Germany, by 3.5 per cent; and in Italy, by 4.5 per cent. As I say, Japan was the only other country within OECD to show positive growth, with an increase of 1.5 per cent. So we did not do so badly there.

In other words, the slackening of economic activity in Canada was much less severe than in most other nations. This is particularly true in comparison with the United States. We use such a comparison very often because, after all, the U.S. is our major market; it is close to us and there is a general similarity in our approaches to industry. Our real growth in 1975 was 3 per cent higher than in 1973, as against a decline of 4 per cent in the United States during the same period. The volume of industrial production in Canada declined by about 2 per cent between 1973 and 1975 but, again, one must compare this experience with a drop of over 9 per cent in the United States. The average unemployment rate in Canada for the three-year period was 5.9 per cent of the labour force, compared with 6.3 per cent in the United States.

More encouraging still, Mr. Speaker, economic activity in Canada has been advancing on a broadening front since the second quarter of last year. For example, output by industries which are producing goods was 3.2 per cent higher, on a seasonally adjusted basis, in January, 1976, than for the first quarter of 1975. Canadian employment in April, 1976, at 9.3 million, was 3 per cent above the total for the same month a year earlier. Exports for the first quarter of 1976 were 13 per cent higher than for the comparable period in 1975. Changes in export markets had been, in fact, the single most important factor in the slowdown of the Canadian economy.

Industrial Strategy

The principal cause for the decline in the volume of goods exported in 1975 was the recession in the United States, our principal market, particularly in housing and automobiles, coupled with the modest level of recovery achieved in that country by the year-end. Another factor which contributed to the reduction in the volume of Canadian exports was the decline in the other OECD economies during the first half of the year and their sluggish recovery thereafter. These were circumstances which no strategy within Canada on a short-term basis could seriously affect.

Other factors include lower oil exports—made necessary for reasons which no doubt hon. members opposite understand—and based, really, on a shifting of policy rather than on market considerations. Our exports of pulp, paper and asbestos also suffered. One offsetting element came in the form of increased exports to OPEC countries. With the improvement in world economic activity now gaining strength, particularly in the United States, it is now our expectation that Canadian exports will expand and lead to a further strengthening of domestic economic activity.

Even though recorded unemployment for April, at 769,000, accounted for 7.4 per cent of the labour force, the Canadian experience in recent months has been better than in the United States. Moreover, it should be noted that the significance of any particular rate of unemployment is no longer the same in terms of economic hardship associated with a temporary loss of work, as was the case even five or ten years ago. Part of the reason for this is the substantial upgrading in the scale and extent of unemployment benefits.

Then, again, a much larger proportion of the unemployment total represents people who are in a position to change jobs, enter into or withdraw from the labour force at frequent intervals. Also of significance is the fact that despite an international recession, nearly 1½ million more people were employed in Canada in 1975 than was the case at the start of this decade in 1970. This does represent a considerable achievement, given the fact that Canada has experienced the most rapid labour force growth among the industrialized countries of the world.

A great deal of attention is now being paid to Canada's productivity performance. The dominant factor in this area in 1974 and 1975 was the economic recession and, more recently, the beginning economic recovery. Statistics which purport to show that Canada's productivity performance in manufacturing has deteriorated are really only revealing the obvious, which is that favourable productivity depends in large measure on the stage of the business cycle. It is certainly true that during a business recession productivity is normally inferior because, in the face of a slackening in demand for durable goods which is reflected in industrial production, it is difficult to obtain good productivity performance in a situation where men and machines are underemployed and producing in well below optimum conditions. This is the stage at which Canada, along with nearly all the industrialized nations, found itself throughout most of 1974 and 1975.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, if we look at the facts we find that Canada's productivity in the manufacturing field has been relatively favourable. During the decade 1964-1974, output per man-hour increased by close to 4 per cent per year, compared with an increase in the United States for the same period of only 3 per cent. We know that in 1975 our output per man-hour was virtually flat. On the other hand, in the United States it registered a decline of nearly 1 per cent.

In the initial stages of an economic slump, employers are loth immediately to lay off workers as demand declines, and this is reflected in relatively poor productivity. On the other hand, when the economy is coming out of a slump, then at least in the early stages of an uptrend large increases in output are registered, with very little increase in the work force. It is sad that in a way the growth of employment lags behind economic growth, but there is a gain in terms of productivity. I think it is important not to win debating points; rather, we should try to develop a proper policy response and should put these matters, in this case productivity, in their proper perspective. Productivity in both Canadian and United States' manufacturing should show a very marked improvement this year as the economic recovery gets well under way.

For several reasons, care should be taken in interpreting recent cyclical productivity changes and trends. First, statistical estimation has been unusually difficult because of rapid changes in the inflation rate. Unquestionably, these will be subject to later revision under the statistical base that we are using. Second, unusual changes have been taking place in the structure and use of the labour force, and these may have reduced the aggregate productivity trend in recent years. These changes include factors such as the increased use of part-time workers; particularly in this country, the sharp rise in the number of young people coming on to the labour market; and we are also attracting women into the market and seeing an increase in their participation rate. Finally, and regrettably, there was the relatively high level of strike activity in 1974 and 1975.

That gives the House the background to the situation, Mr. Speaker. Since we in this country tend to uncover, exploit, elaborate and dwell upon doom and gloom, I think it is also useful to look at some of the strengths of our economy, to put them all together in an attempt to reach some better policy response. We should not concentrate on overstressing gloom, or indulge in too much optimism about the good things; we should try to achieve a balance.

The government recognizes that continuing improvement in the levels of Canadian productivity is necessary and vital to enable the expectations of all our people to be fulfilled, as well as to ensure that Canadian industry remains relatively and competitively strong. Government policy has fairly consistently placed high priority on measures to sustain business investment in Canada, with particular emphasis on the manufacturing industry. Measures that were taken to achieve this aim have not always found favour with the opposition. I refer in particular to the budget measure of June, 1975, in regard to which the minister said this:

> It is well known that our policies have sought to encourage a strong manufacturing sector. We have provided long-term tax incentives to assist our manufacturers and processors to compete in domestic and foreign markets.

So let hon. members not tell us that there has not been a strategy or a tactical approach. They might disagree and would put it another way, but that is a matter of program implementation, not necessarily policy disagreement. As I recall it, the then minister of finance went on to say that if our economy is to remain productive and competitive and capable of providing jobs, we must ensure that we have modern capital facilities with which to work and we must guard against any slowdown in investment. The budget of June, 1975, introduced an investment tax credit as a temporary extra incentive for investment in a wide range of new productive facilities. Hon. members will be familiar with the details.

Another element in the government's policy is to work, we hope increasingly closely and in more detail, with industry, provincial governments and labour. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has established a much more comprehensive consultative mechanism with industry to provide a systematic and structured framework for consultation. To date, seven industry sector consultative committees have been established, each of which is made up of a dozen or so executive officers of the industry who have been chosen as being able to make a positive and personal contribution to a better understanding by ourselves and industry of the performance of the particular sector concerned. These industry sector consultative committees are designed to act as a forum to review developments in industry, to ensure that the government is fully informed about matters affecting the health and viability of the particular industry, to identify emerging opportunities as well as clearly to establish constraints. This will enable us to have realistic policy and program development.

They are also designed to serve as a first-line sounding board for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and other federal departments against which tests may be made on industrial policy initiatives with either selective or across the board impact. They also have the objective of assisting in the identification of the need to develop specific sector policies and, as appropriate, to assist in the establishment of specific sector committees as well as to assist the government in communicating government policies to industry.

Committees are also in place for the chemicals, machinery, iron and steel, furniture and forestry products industries. In addition, five special sector committees have been established which will, on an ad hoc basis, provide advice and input on sector opportunities and constraints and options available to deal with them. More specifically, the special sector committees will assist the department in developing an in-depth analysis of the sector structure and performance in the domestic and international environment; in evaluating the current and future prospects for the sector, taking account of regional, national and international advantages and constraints. They will also identify the contribution that the industry can make to the national economy in terms of industrial development goals and outline the constraints that might inhibit achievement of these goals. They will propose policy initiatives which the government can take to assist industry in increasing its contribution to national objectives.

These and other initiatives are in keeping with developments and are in addition to the ongoing consultation and discussion that takes place with industry and between federal and provincial governments at various levels. I think the record shows a consistent emphasis on measures to promote the development of an internationally competitive manufacturing and processing industry in Canada, with emphasis on improving our industrial efficiency.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I regret my colleague had to be away. He would very much have preferred to change his arrangements, but that was impossible. We will take note of all the points that are made by various speakers. The minister's parliamentary secretary is here as well, and between the two of us we will convey to the minister the constructive points that are made, and try to debate and answer those that might not, in our opinion, be so constructive.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate which has been introduced by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). I should just like to make reference to what I think is the key word in his motion. The motion commences:

That this House condemns the government for its lack of an industrial strategy—

I think we should focus on the word "strategy"; certainly that particular word was missing in the response of the minister. In responding to the opening speech in this debate, the minister said that part of the difficulty we are in today is caused by world wide inflation. He excused the government on the ground that energy costs so much in Canada today. He went on to say that we only had a .2 per cent increase in the gross national product, and took some pride in the fact that Canada at least had some increase while many other nations showed a decrease. What we are missing in this whole position is recognition, by the tone of what the minister said, of the fact that there is no strategy within Canada relating to incentives to industry and industrial development in this country.

● (1600)

The minister went on to point out some projects the government is attempting to implement, such as the incentive investment tax credit. What this really means, when we think of the semantics of the word "strategy", is that we do not have an over-all approach but, rather, something that is growing like Topsy. We have the handling of one problem when it arises or surfaces in a crisis situation. Then the government opts to handle the next most important crisis as it comes along. I think this is unacceptable for a country such as Canada, with one of the greatest natural resource bases of any country in the world, a country with one of the greatest human resources and a country with very substantial energy resources. This country has energy resources far beyond its fossil fuels, oil and natural gas. We have energy resources in this country in the form of vast basins of hydrocarbons—and I mean our coal deposits. We also have a tremendous undeveloped source of energy in this country, and I think of water tidal power and wind power.

The suggestion that we are in the situation we are in at the present time because of the increase in the number of women entering the work force is really an admission by the government that it is not prepared to cope with the situation. That kind of excuse is unacceptable from the government. What it really means is that this government has not paid full attention to the fact that it is not only considered a right, but a normal situation of life in the 1970s that there should be adequate jobs for females entering the labour market. It is an admission by the government that it is not prepared to gear up to the kind of society which allows full participation of both females and males in the work force of this nation.

The government talks about the sluggish market in the European Economic Community and the decrease in our exports of oil and other products. All I can suggest is that if we take that kind of approach for not being at the industrial level we ought to be at in this country, all we are really saying is that we are puppets of the international economy, being manipulated by forces outsides our own control. This, then, is a full admission that Canada as a nation does not have an industrial strategy. That is exactly what this motion is all about.

In listening to the response by the minister—which was a listing, cataloguing or a detailing of excuses the government has for the situation in which we find ourselves—it all added up to one simple conclusion, that is, that the motion is certainly accurate. Indeed, there is certainly no industrial strategy when one considers the meaning and the perspective of that word.

If we are talking about military strategy in time of war, we are talking about the whole effort in terms of strategy; how all the forces knit together in terms of attempting to reach an ultimate conclusion. The ultimate conclusion for Canada, in terms of industrial strategy, is the development of full employment. We did not hear, in the response by the minister, anything about what is to be included in the forthcoming budget, or anything about what is going to happen in 1976 and 1977 in the way of some new thrust or policy toward a strategy that in this country would lead to a position of full employment. This simply underscores the whole need for a motion such as the one put forward today. The motion simply points out, in fact, that in this nation there is no industrial strategy, and a full admission of that fact by the government today.

I should like to take some time to detail how serious is this lack of industrial strategy in our country today. The unemployment situation in April, 1976, was nothing less than atrocious. It has reached a level higher than any other since 1961; it went from 6.6 per cent in January of this year to 7.4 per cent in April. This means that since January until April of this year there were 80,000 more Canadians unemployed.

It is difficult to get a proper perspective of this unemployment situation and what it means to have 80,000 people unemployed. What it really means is that double the number on the voters' list in my constituency are now unemployed. I think this begins to point out the degree to which we have not addressed ourselves to providing full employment in this country, and how serious this fact is. Last year, between January and April, we had an increase in the number of unemployed of 65,000.

Another way of looking at the seriousness of unemployment and the damage it causes society is through a comparison of expenditures under the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Last year these expenditures increased by 90 per cent. When we consider this 90 per cent increase in expenditure through unemployment insurance, we must realize that this was in the first couple of months of the year when this nation had almost stable employment.

What has been the government's record in that period of time? We have had a 15 per cent increase from that period when the employment rate was stable. We now come to the month of April and note a tremendous upsurge in the unemployment rate. When we realize the tremendous increase in cost when the employment rate was nearly stable, we can see that this obviously means we are going to experience something astronomical in terms of increased cost. Let us look at the figures in actual terms of cost. Total pay-outs under unemployment insurance a year ago amounted to $3,175 million. What this really boils down to is an admission to Canadians that not only do we have to suffer the pangs of not being able to find adequate jobs in this country, but very often of not being able to find jobs of any kind. In addition, the people who are working are having to carry a tremendous burden, mainly because this government has not developed any kind of industrial strategy that allows a full degree of employment. As the amount of unemployment increases throughout the country, one thing becomes obvious, and that is that the individual who is working must carry a greater burden and pay for this additional cost. It is out of his pay cheque that these increased payments are made. As a result, these increases in unemployment and the resulting increases in unemployment insurance benefits are devastating.

What is more important than the statistical increase in the number of unemployed is the fact that for the first time in recent years we find that the people who are unemployed are those in the 25-year age group and older. Historically, the increase in unemployment has occurred when students graduating from high schools and universities have come into the labour force. That is not now the case. We are finding that those who have had jobs over the years are now becoming unemployed because of the decreasing number of jobs. People in this bracket normally were not vulnerable to unemployment. These were the people who were starting their families and for whom there was never a scarcity of employment. Traditionally, unemployment has increased when these young people have not been able to find their first job. But that is no longer the case. It is those people who have had jobs who are now becoming unemployed as a result of this general unemployment situation.

However black the picture might be painted, the fact is that we have just started to see the tip of the iceberg in the horrible situation of unemployment in this country. The fact is that we have coming into the labour market, in a month and a half, a tremendous influx of students who will not be able to find jobs. If we take the historical record of the last couple of years, we find there will be about one million students entering the labour force this year, most of whom will not find suitable employment. If we put that into percentage figures, it would give us this year between a 13 per cent and 15 per cent unemployment rate by the end of May or the start of June. That puts Canada into one of the most embarrassing and inexcusable situations for a country with our kind of resources both natural and human. It means that an additional 130,000 people will be unemployed. If we look at a fact pointed out by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), namely, that this year, when one million students will be coming on to the labour market, only 12,000 are likely to find jobs, we find that we have underestimated the seriousness of the situation and how much it means to Canadians. This government must begin a program of incentives to encourage the private sector in our society to regain its faith and trust in the traditional enterprise systems and to get the economic show on the road again. We find that the cost of unemployment insurance is skyrocketing.

I would like to diverge for a moment because I think that as this debate carries on today we will hear many statistics relating to the number of unemployed people in percentages and on the basis of historical records. I want to place on the record an argument that is not often put forward regarding how devasting unemployment can be in the social sense. I want to point out how disheartening it can be to people with families, and how we all as Canadians end up one way or another paying for these costs associated with unemployment in additional social costs incurred by people who experience stress as a result of unemployment. A person's job is the person. We are the image of what we do. If we do nothing, our identity is shaken. Because of that we must recognize how serious it is for a person to lose his job. The ramifications of high unemployment are vastly underestimated. I should like to quote from a study which was carried out regarding the effects of unemployment and its effect on human mentality. I refer to a study carried out by Braginsky and Braginsky, who state:

> Jobless men feel small, and talk the language of insignificance. Even if a new job patches up self-esteem, they still hurt from a gut-level cynicism about society.

This points out the fact that when people are unemployed in a society such as ours, they lose their self-esteem and self-respect and they also tend to blame society. We are in the midst of a debate on capital punishment, and recently we have debated law and order and violence. One thing we ought to recognize is the close correlation between the increase in violence in our society and the high unemployment rate. The study to which I referred also states the following:

> Regardless of how a person becomes surplus, he or she is socially transformed. Lifestyle, expectations, goals, roles and appearance all change, and the higher one's status to begin with, the greater the impact of the social transformation. The trauma leaves a permanent scar, our research shows, long after the victim moves out of surplus status and back into the social mainstream.

This simply states that the higher one's status, the more the scar is felt at being unemployed. What is the situation in Canada today? The majority of unemployed people at present come from among those who have had jobs, not those entering the labour market for the first time. Let us look at an important factor in terms of real social harm as related to what is happening due to lack of jobs. Researcher Berkeley Rice has noted that there is a direct relationship between unemployment and suicide rates. Further, the number of calls received at suicide prevention centres greatly increases during periods of high unemployment. Let us look at what I think is a fairly important statement to which we should address ourselves more directly. It reads:

> Not surprisingly, economic fear builds a boom in mental illness, alcoholism and suicide. The news is that government planners don't worry enough about the psychic and medical costs of recession . . .
> In the economic crunch, millions of American citizens worry about jobs, bills, taxes and the cost of meat. Congressmen, columnists and economists worry publicly about economic trend indicators on unemployment and inflation. But no one seems to worry much about the effect of all the worrying . . .
> Among the early findings of psychiatric epidemiologists was a definite inverse relationship between socio-economic status and mental illness: the lower the economic level in a given population, the greater the incidence of mental illness.

Later on, Berkeley Rice continues:

> To test the relationship between economic conditions and mental illness, Brenner compared employment figures in the U.S. from 1922 to 1968 with first admissions in state mental hospitals during the same period. The results show a clear inverse relationship that holds up even for minor declines in all regions of the country: as employment drops mental hospital admissions rise. The relationships holds true whether we use employment or per capita income as the economic indicator.

This points out very clearly that it is not just a case of analysing whether we have a 6.8 or 7.4 unemployment rate, but that we should think of it in terms of the percentage of people in Canadian society who have lost jobs. We have to recognize there is a spillover. While I try to document one or two areas of the spillover, I think the cost to society is far greater than just high unemployment insurance figures, far greater even in terms of those who are under stress because they feel insignificant and have lost self-esteem because of the fact that the job is the person. When you lose your job, you lose much of your personal identity. The government, not just for economic reasons but because of its social conscience, has the obligation to society to work continually to retain a system which permits the highest rate of employment possible.

I look at Canada and ask myself what is so different between Canada and West Germany. Why is it that with our resources and human ingenuity, the kind of energy resources we have, we cannot attain full employment as do some European countries which have a much denser population than we do and whose resources are certainly no greater than ours? We have a real obligation, not just in terms of taking a look at these figures and noting that the rate of unemployment is rising or falling, but in terms of recognizing that the government has a moral obligation to society because of the stress that is placed on people when they are without jobs.

I should like to state, in conclusion, that we should address ourselves to trying to change the situation. First, we should stabilize some of the fluctuations that have occurred recently in the taxation of small business and industries. One of the feelings which I sense amongst my constituents is continual frustration—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. Is there consent to allow him to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Malone: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will conclude my remarks. It is too bad that so many problems will be left to be dealt with at the end of my remarks. I believe this country should address itself to establishing a taxation system which would not entail a whole succession of rapid changes. Business people find it most frustrating because each year there are a tremendous number of changes in the taxation system. I also think that small businesses which are subject to the anti-inflation program are frustrated because of the amount of paperwork they have to do, which is reflected in their hesitation to hire people.

Another thing we must do is reassess our Unemployment Insurance Commission and its approach to paying out unemployment insurance. Surely there should be some kind of incentives program so that people are at least encouraged to work and so that welfare and unemployment insurance do not become a way of life. As long as we have a system where there is an option to work, surely we are doing nothing except being as naïve as people in government who allow a system to go on in which people can remain unemployed simply by adapting to a new lifestyle.

Not wanting to extend my time beyond the normal privilege, I will close simply by saying that the question of unemployment and lack of an industrial strategy is not just a question of charts and graphs but a question of social conscience. What is happening in Canada is that there are many people who are suffering stress, anxiety and all the ramifications which come about because jobs are so closely associated with a person's self-esteem. Living in Canada, we should have the right to high self-esteem.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). At the conclusion of his remarks I addressed a question to him seeking to find out whether he realized that the cabinet in fact had made a decision with respect to the White-Westinghouse application before FIRA. In his remarks, as I understood them, he indicated that he was not aware of that and was criticizing the government for not having taken a stand, but in response to the question I raised I thought he dodged it a little by agreeing that, yes indeed, they did make a decision—which was made public on March 25, 1976—but that in fact that decision did not really transfer the ownership over to General Steel Wares.

That is quite right, but the government was not considering whether GSW should or should not buy the Westinghouse firm. The application really dealt with whether in fact White Consolidated should have been allowed to take over Westinghouse, and in fact that was the second time an application had been made for that purpose. The first application before FIRA was rejected on August 6, 1975, and the second rejection was on March 25, 1976.

Subsequent to that decision by the cabinet to refuse the White take-over of Westinghouse, it had been expected by many people, including myself, that this would have resulted in a rather precipitous take-over by General Steel Wares of Westinghouse. To date, that has not taken place, and as a matter of fact I have been in almost constant daily communication with the officials of General Steel Wares to find out what the problems are in this regard. I should like to speak about that for just a moment.

[The Acting Speaker.]

It seems that the basic problem which existed at the beginning, and which prevails even to this time, is the problem about the trademark. A trademark is a registerable item under the registrar of trademarks in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. There is also another aspect; it could be viewed as a trade name as distinct from a trademark. As I understand it, a trade name is a common law right of Westinghouse Canada flowing from its use of the name "Westinghouse" in Canada and not relating to the trademark per se, which is a registerable item. It so happens that in the sale of the appliance division of Westinghouse in the United States to White, the trademark was sold. That trademark was sold in the United States on a worldwide basis. In Canada, when the application to take over was made before FIRA, it was felt that that application dealt with bricks, mortar and goodwill as spelled out in the act, and not specifically with the trademark.

I have contended all the way through in this argument that that really is not true and that the law does not really read that way, and I should like to explore this for a moment to find out whether an application before FIRA covers the whole operation which is being considered for a take-over or only part of that operation. Section 3(3)(a) of the Foreign Investment Review Act deals with all, or substantially all, of the property used in carrying on business in Canada, etc. The term "property" is dealt with in the definition section of the act, and under that definition "property" used in carrying on a business includes goodwill in connection therewith. It seems self-evident to me that the goodwill of a corporation is intrinsically tied up with the use of the name of that corporation. It seems to me that to deny that is to deny any goodwill at all to a major corporation, because the goodwill flows from the relationship which it has established over many years in dealing with consumers and the goodwill which is associated with the name draws people to buy that particular kind of product.

I think I would be right in a court of law in maintaining that goodwill in this particular case means the trade name. If there is a distinction—and I contend that there is—between the trade name and the trademark, then Westinghouse has the right to sell that trade name because the trade name has been rejected by FIRA along with all the other assets Westinghouse has in Canada. I think that is abundantly clear. The confusion in this case is that White Consolidated and Westinghouse—originally Westinghouse, U.S.A.—made a joint application before the registrar of trademarks for the registration of the name White-Westinghouse. That had not been dealt with at the time of the FIRA rejection and now a new application has gone forward on behalf of White-Westinghouse, but in this case the Westinghouse is Westinghouse Canada as distinct and different from the Westinghouse which co-operated in that earlier application.

It is alleged by some that the fact that Westinghouse Canada participated in the application before the registrar of trademarks might in some way erode the legal value which is attached or was attached to the use of the trade name itself. This particular problem has given rise to the delay in any take-over by GSW of Westinghouse in Canada.

GSW, when making its representations to myself—and I have dealt with this question rather extensively in the past number of months—maintained that it did not want the government of Canada to indulge in any legal shenanigans or adjustments in the law which would transfer the rights to the name or the trademark to GSW. GSW simply wanted the government to do two things: first, to reject the FIRA application—and that has been done—and, second, it expressed the desire to have the government make a public statement that the government did not believe the acceptance of the application before the registrar of the trademark "Westinghouse" in the name of White was in the broad public interest and that in fact that would lead to confusion in the marketplace, which is one of the normal criteria used by the registrar in arriving at such a decision. Up to this date the government has chosen not to make that statement. I am inclined to believe that the registrar, in light of all the facts and representations which are proposed to be made to him by the employees of Westinghouse, GSW and others, will reject that application anyway.

The government is in a very difficult position, however, particularly in light of the discussion that took place over the so-called judges' affair. I gather it is really the will of parliament that the government does not express its views respecting a judicial body lest it seem to try to influence what it might or might not do. The registrar of trademarks finds himself in at least a quasi-judicial role, so I would conclude that some, if not all, members of the opposition would object if the government were to pursue the objective proposed in a convoluted way by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge.

I have no such concerns, Mr. Speaker. I think that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Mackasey) or the Attorney General (Mr. Basford) should indicate that if the white application is rejected through FIRA, then it is inappropriate to have two users, one with the trade name Westinghouse Canada and the other, a foreign company in the United States, with the trademark Westinghouse. I would not hesitate to recommend that we make representations to the registrar of trademarks that he reject that application. In that way the whole problem of the Westinghouse deal would be solved.

I had not intended to spend too much time on this matter, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is important. The position taken by the government illustrates that the sector approach for our economic strategy to try and achieve greater Canadian ownership of our own industries is consistent, otherwise the rejection of FIRA would not have taken place because we felt it was not of significant benefit to Canada.

I should now like to deal with some other aspects of this problem. Part of our industrial strategy is our anti-inflation program. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) dealt with this at some length. There is no question that our anti-inflation program is designed to make our industries very competitive in order to save jobs in Canada. Although some people may argue the program is not effective, I believe we are now beginning to see results. But I think we have to reduce our own expectations and demands on the economy as well, and there is some evidence of success in this respect.

Although there seems to be a feeling that labour is being treated badly by the program, I would point out that they fare not too badly when compared with the business community. Increases in wages of from 8 per cent to 12 per cent are allowed, and historical relationships or special considerations are taken into account. In the business community there is no such generous guideline. Only increases in cost that can be justified can be passed on to the customer, and only 95 per cent of the previous five-year pretax profits are allowed. The program is a lot tougher on business than it is on labour. That effect is not well known, however, because it takes longer to become visible. We are just now beginning to see its effects.

I have been a member of a trade union for many years, Mr. Speaker, and I have a great deal of respect for unions; but I hope they begin to appreciate that we need the kind of restraint and responsibility that has been shown in England. Labour unions there got together and reduced their demands to 6 per cent, which is below the rate of inflation. This means that very realistically they are prepared to settle for less. In Canada we are not being asked to tighten our belts in that way; we are simply being asked for a reasonable, responsible approach. The most significant thing that could happen to assist our industry and to create jobs would be for labour, management and government to co-operate.

Our economic strategy has placed increased emphasis on exports and trade links. The government has taken initiatives in connection with the Pacific rim countries, Russia, China, the Common Market and Latin America, in an effort to establish appropriate trade links. Considerable progress has been made toward increasing our exports of fully and semi-manufactured goods. In 1970 we exported $11½ billion of semi and fully manufactured goods; in 1975, we exported close to $20 billion—so the trend is in the right direction. These figures would be more impressive if we went back prior to 1970 and the institution of the auto pact, because it shifted considerable emphasis toward finished goods. If we went back even further, the increase would be much greater than the figures I have just given. I think it is important to realize we are moving in the right direction in this area of activity.

In the area of non-renewable resources, it was announced recently that more emphasis would be placed in this area of activity to promote exports of processed extracted materials as opposed to raw materials. This will take time to show benefit, but it is indication that we are following the correct policy.

The government's determination to become self-supporting through oil production is an important part of an industrial strategy. Unless we do this, in time we will become the victim of the high prices set by the countries from whom we have to buy. This, of course, places our industries and our workers in a poor position. We need to take out some insurance to guarantee the future development of oil, the new pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal, a delivery system and a capacity to produce our own fuel, which is a key element in any reasonable industrial strategy.

We should also consider the question of Canadian ownership of our resources and industries. In this connection may I allude to the activities of the Foreign Investment Review Agency which has been of some help. When one considers the establishment of Petro-Canada, Canada Development Corporation and similar corporations, one will see that the government is acting on all fronts to making certain we become more self-reliant and exercise ever more control over our own economic destiny. It is important to note this.

● (1640)

May I say a word about the Canada Development Corporation, which is a public corporation in which Canadians will be allowed to purchase shares and so participate in the development of the nation. At this point the company's capital stock is $565 million. There are 100 million class A shares, 322 million common shares, 142 million class B voting shares; retained earnings at this moment total $42 million, and the surplus of the Canada Development Corporation stands at $51 million. It is a healthy corporation which has invested in Polysar and Connaught Laboratory holdings, both of which it owns to the extent of 100 per cent. It has bought into Petrosar to the tune of 20 per cent, and Texas Gulf to the tune of 30 per cent, and owns 100 per cent of CDC oil and gas.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, whose allotted time has expired. He may continue if he has unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members. I will not be long and will deal with but two or three other highlights. As we are talking of industrial strategy, it would be inappropriate not to draw to the attention of Parliament our new competition policy, phase one of which is already being implemented. It goes a long way to ensuring genuine competition in society. Further steps must be taken, but what has been done is particularly important to businessmen. Many people look on competition policy as important to the consumer, which it is; but it is also important to small and medium-sized businessmen: it will make sure they are not put out of business by the large, multinational corporations. The government's policy in this regard is a giant step forward in the right direction in terms of economic strategy. Other steps will be taken when phase two of the competition policy is introduced. These, too, will be found helpful in the area of activity with which we are concerned.

May I mention briefly the new Canadian corporations' legislation which has done much to protect the investors of this country and will encourage our investors to invest in Canadian corporations. The legislation provides the minimum protection needed and will ensure that Canadians may invest with confidence in Canadian enterprises. The legislation has cut out much red tape in the incorporating of federally-incorporated businesses. That will help the businessmen of this country. Perhaps we should go further, to remove some of the impediments or some of the negative aspects, let us say, concerning Canadian businessmen. I refer, for example, to the multiplicity of forms to do with UIC, social insurance, and so on, which take up the time of businessmen. I feel that the departments of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Industry, Trade and Commerce and others should get together and see what can be done to minimize the numbers of forms, etc., which businessmen are required to complete, so that instead of providing this free service to the government our businessmen can spend more time increasing productivity.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is involved with many programs of research and development which will enhance productivity. I spoke about these at some length a couple of days ago in the House of Commons. Also, we must do what we can to help the businesses of this country compete with international businesses or corporations based in other countries.

Lastly, may I draw the attention of the House to programs of manpower retraining, on-the-job training, and so on, which the federal government instituted in an attempt to match the capabilities of our work force with the requirements of the business community. Such programs are most important. One cannot consider unemployment and industrial strategy without taking into account the necessity of upgrading the skills of our work force and matching those skills with the needs of society.

I thank the House for its indulgence, Mr. Speaker. I wished to say more but will not as I do not wish to abuse the privilege granted to me. I conclude by saying that an industrial strategy we need, and an industrial strategy we have. If we implement that strategy broadly—and I have dealt with some of the possibilities—we shall do something worth while for industry and the workers of this country and solve some of our immediate difficulties.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), a member of the NDP, for bringing forward the motion we are considering on this allotted day. The subject is timely and appropriate. It is timely to talk about Canada's industrial strategy. Certainly, the subject is not new, but old. If my recollection is correct, the issue of industrial strategy arose late in the 1960s. We heard about industrial strategy from a previous Liberal government. Responding to criticisms being levelled at it in connection with tight money and the difficulties besetting certain sectors of the economy, the government of that day said conditions would improve because it was working on an industrial strategy. It was to bring forward an industrial strategy which would solve this nation's problems. After the phrase caught the ears of the media and the people of the country, the government became squeamish. In the throne speech debate of January, 1973, the then minister of industry, trade and commerce, now the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), did his best to dissociate himself from that phrase. As reported on page 151 of Hansard for May 10, 1973, he said in part:

> I am simply being a little more realistic when I talk about the government's so-called industrial strategy as being directed more toward the development and elaboration of a coherent set of industrial policies for Canada rather than the almost impossible task of producing a master plan.

Evidently the government of that day had abandoned the goal of drafting a master plan for Canadian industrial strategy. Instead, it wanted to develop what the minister called a coherent set of industrial policies. He outlined the government's program during that debate and later elaborated on the development of this so-called coherent set of industrial policies. The minister emphasized three areas which he, then as minister of industry, trade and commerce, would treat as being of top priority. They were trade, aid to small business, and foreign investment.

Let us consider what has happened. What progress did the minister make in pursuing his three priority goals? Consider the question of foreign investment. As the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge said earlier, and other speakers agreed with him, Canada is in the unenviable position of being the nation in the world with the largest proportion of its industries foreign-owned. That is a sad situation which concerns the majority of Canadians. But it need never have come about. The government said it would take firm action in this area. What did it do? It created the Foreign Investment Review Agency, that is all. Thus far, as I see it, the main accomplishment of this agency has been the creation of a new industry. It has created work for lawyers, a new specialty in law. For a law firm to call itself established or competent it must have within its ranks an expert on the Foreign Investment Review Agency, in the same way that it must have experts on tax, estates, and so on. A whole new area of work has been created for lawyers and accounts, but little else.

Any dispassionate examination of the percentage of Canadian industry which is foreign-owned shows nothing has changed. If anything, it has become worse. It is not surprising that anything should happen. Our high degree of foreign ownership is a direct consequence of previous Liberal administration industrial strategies. There was the strategy of C. D. Howe when he was minister of trade and commerce—and I guess minister of everything which was to encourage foreign investment. The policy of the government was to encourage foreign investment. That was the way to create jobs in this country. That was the way the government foresaw that we could import the foreign technology which we needed. It must be obvious to even the most simple mind that if you are going to alter the consequence of this policy which has been in effect for many years, you must do more than just put up obstacles to increased foreign investment; you must take positive steps to encourage replacement with Canadian investment.

C. D. Howe's policy was designed to create jobs. That job creation is even more necessary today when we have record levels of unemployment. The Canadian people have stated emphatically that they do not want to gain this increased employment solely through the importation of foreign branch plants because in the long run the costs are too large. Has this government done anything in a positive way to bring about the Canadian investment necessary to create these jobs? If so, they have disguised it very well because it is certainly not evident.

This government has brought in things which have had the opposite effect. One example is the capital gains tax. What incentive is there to invest in Canada? There is another side of the argument to capital gains tax. That is equity of taxation. There is no question about it. I hope that someone on the opposite side is at least looking at the possibility of indexing that taxation for inflation. The combination of inflation and capital gains means that investment in the stocks of Canadian companies is simply not worth while. It is the foolish investor indeed who puts his money in that investment vehicle.

The second big item of priority that the minister talked about is aid to small businesses. He said this was going to be given priority consideration by his ministry which spends some $240 million a year. He talked about six new initiatives: increased financial help to small businesses through the Industrial Development Bank, other granting programs, counselling for small businesses, stronger regional offices in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, aids to facilitate technology transferred to small business, and special emphasis on tourism.

One could go into a great deal of discussion about each of those six initiatives. However, I would be willing to bet any amount that for every small businessman in Canada who has been helped by these government programs, it is possible to find ten small businesses that have been hurt, and hurt badly, by this government through its programs. Every member of parliament has a file full of letters from small businessmen in their constituencies complaining about the detrimental effects upon them as a result of one or another of the government's programs.

The third area, and this was given first priority by the minister in terms of the initiatives this government would take in the years following the 1973 throne speech, related to trade. This area was going to be given top consideration. The government was really going to get after the question of trade. In 1973 they had a surplus, or favourable trade balance of $1,327 million. After the enhancing activity by this ministry and government, and after priority consideration being given to it, our trade balance went from plus to minus—$2,440 million overall.

If you look at the high technology, manufactured goods which fall within the purview of this minister, in other words eliminating agriculture and raw materials which are Energy, Mines and Resources, the performance is far worse. In 1973, for example, we had a high technology trade deficit of over $5 billion. In 1975 this had gone to over $8 billion. That was the disastrous performance after three years of this government saying they were going to give it very high priority.

Those sectors of the economy that have not been given high priority should be thankful. They should be grateful that this government has not given them high priority as they, too, may have suffered as badly as our high technology industries. Performance has deteriorated tremendously since the minister announced this coherent set of industrial policies. Our unemployment rates are at a record high, trade represents a record deficit, foreign ownership has become worse, regional disparities are worse, and there are record losses due to strikes. No industrialized country has lost more time due to strikes than Canada. The gross national product is up. However, Canada used to have the highest GNP per population, the so called standard of living. We are now sixth in the world. Under this government we moved from first to sixth. That is performance!

It is comparatively easy to articulate all the problems and mistakes of this government. They are obvious and many. Canada is well blessed with several independent bodies outside of government which examine Canada's economy. There are groups such as the Economic Council, the Conference Board, the C. D. Howe Research Institute, the Chambers of Commerce, the Canadian Association of Independent Banks, and so on. Virtually every one of these bodies, looking at Canadian industry, has reached the conclusion, in contrast to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who is standing in this afternoon for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson), that all is not well. Things are not as rosy within Canadian industry as that minister has described them. Government policies are not exclusively at fault in this regard, but they certainly are not helping to cure the problems. In many instances they are directly causing them.

● (1700)

For example, one of the common themes in analyses of Canada's economy by groups outside government is a call for more innovation, more productivity from Canadian industry. Increasing productivity, as the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge has pointed out, is not a question of getting labour to work harder; it comes from better ways of doing things, better organization, improved technique, better technology. What has the government done in terms of increasing productivity? Well, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has indicated several times during the question period that he has some kind of brains trust locked away in this office looking into the question. Apart from that, I know of nothing else which has been done to improve Canada's record in this field.

Increased productivity, as we all know, results from better management and improved technology. As the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) has pointed out, management in Canadian business is beset with government bureaucracy, with forms and with demands upon its time. Five or six years back, one of the leading Canadian business magazines carried out a survey and reached the conclusion that 35 per cent of executive time is spent dealing with government, filling out forms, answering questionnaires, accommodating demands made upon them by the civil service. Since then the situation has undoubtedly become worse. I need only call attention to the demands of the Anti-Inflation Board, the Unemployment Insurance Commission and Statistics Canada, which is day by day requiring more and more information so as to employ the 4,000 or 5,000 people who are to occupy that building across the river.

Mr. Blais: Let us do away with it, then, as we did with Information Canada.

Mr. Andre: There are some positive notes to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais). In general, far from being aided by government programs, Canadian business management is being severely hampered. As for improved technology, only last Thursday there was a full-scale debate in this House during which speakers from all opposition parties were in agreement that the government had done nothing worth while to improve the productivity of Canadian industry in the field of technology. Yet in the long run that is the only answer.

[Mr. Andre.]

Let us see how other government policies have worked out. Supposedly, as part of a coherent industrial strategy, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was set up to broaden the base of industrial development across the country. Compare the policies of this department, in the course of whose development vast sums of money were spent, with the policy followed by the Department of Transport and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to say nothing of the Department of Supply and Services. One gets the impression, Mr. Speaker, that they are adversaries working in completely opposite directions.

In conclusion, may I say that no country in the world has the combination of resources which we in Canada enjoy. We have the natural resources, we have a well-educated people, we have a truly democratic system of government, and we have a free enterprise system. It would be a tragedy for Canada and for the world if we failed to meet our potential. There is no need to fail. A coherent set of industrial policies, an industrial strategy which while interfering less would provide incentives for Canadians, permitting them to pursue the goals they chose, would in itself be almost sufficient to ensure success. It is tragic to see a government, apparently with good motives, being so wrong-headed, so persistent in pursuing, on an ad hoc basis, the measures it has adopted, thereby denying Canadians the type of country they all desire and which they are capable of achieving.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to take part in the debate today. In the past few weeks we have been discussing issues of conscience, such as capital punishment, which in the long run really involve some six or seven persons a year under the definition of first degree murder. Today I am indebted to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) for introducing what I consider to be a motion reflecting one of the most important issues confronting our society, one which affects not just a few people but many millions. I refer to lack of a national industrial and employment program.

Since this country was founded, and even before it officially became a nation, the predominant economic theory, indeed, the predominant practice, was that of laissez-faire. Perhaps in those far off days it worked, though I am still not sure that it did. But I believe we must put the motion before us into some sort of historical perspective. I should like to go back to the post-civil war era in the United States, the era of reconstruction in which the Americans sought to rebuild their country and indeed did so most successfully, but based upon a different kind of economic system. It was capitalist, no doubt about that, but when they went to the money markets in Europe and Great Britain and asked for capital for their canals, their railroads, their telegraph lines, their manufacturing industries, they included a proviso: it had to be bond capital—in other words, non-voting capital. They succeeded. They got the money from Europe, but since it was in the form of bond capital they were able to control the way in which the money was used.

What happened in Canada from the time of John A. Macdonald, with his tariff policies and transportation policies, with the development of manufacturing in the east and primarily farm production in the west, was that we did not get bond capital so as to maintain control over our future development in economic terms. They were willing to take anything, and successive governments accepted equity capital, which meant control over our economy passing to outside interests. So at the outset of these remarks I should like to put the historical situation into perspective. I wish to state at the outset, also, that the economy here developed differently from that of the United States in another sense. It developed as a combination of public and private enterprise. I suppose we really have not had a national policy on industrial growth and development since John A. Macdonald in the late 1800s. Unwittingly—and I am not blaming our first rate prime ministers—this tariff wall created a branch plant economy in this country. Instead of trying to knock down this wall, they jumped over it and built industries in this country that served the people and investors of the United States to a far greater degree than the people of this country. All during the 1880s, 1890s and up to the First World War, and indeed after the First World War when we finally became a country in substance as well as in name, this kind of equity capital domination continued through successive Conservative and Liberal governments, and I think it is a problem from which we are still suffering today.

The second thing I should like to put into perspective is the hue and cry that has gone out across the country about the negative effects of unemployment insurance. I have very mixed feelings about the UIC. In fact, I would not mind a bit if private insurance companies got together and ran the whole thing themselves. Of course, hon. members know what would happen then; premiums would triple or quadruple and benefits would be halved, because they would have to make a profit. Are the unemployed, especially the 80 per cent of our unemployment who have no job through no fault of their own but, rather, because the government over there does not have a full employment policy, to be blamed for unemployment? That is the first question.

The other matter that bothers me about unemployment resulting from not having an employment and industrial development policy is that the stop-gap social assistance programs are, in effect, institutionalizing poverty. This institutionalization of poverty, with all its handouts, is making capitalism respectable and acceptable. On the one hand, corporations grab every cent they can from the government. But who is to be blamed for the failure of our social assistance programs? It is not the con artists in the boardrooms of this country, but the little con artists who are trying to rip off our social assistance programs. To me this is reprehensible and unacceptable.

We must take a more appropriate approach to those who work in our industrial complex in this country. Who really makes the major decisions affecting our economy and industries? Is it those who have been laid off temporarily, or is it those who work for eight weeks and then try to rip off the Unemployment Insurance Commission? How many of the 761,000 people who are unemployed today in this country are unemployed because they want to be unemployed? People come to my constituency office Saturday after Saturday and ask me to find them a job, Mr. Speaker. They have gone to Manpower but have been unsuccessful. Employers go to Manpower and are also unsuccessful. I suggest to the members of this House that those responsible for unemployment in this country include, to begin with, the Department of Finance, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks and corporate boardrooms of this nation. These are the people with the economic and political power to act.

What has been the record of this government over the past several years? It has been pretty dismal. It is true we are producing jobs, but as we produce them more and more fall outside the labour market. Probably half of the 761,000 people out of work now will never find gainful employment again. I heard a member a moment ago say that the answer to this problem is the rationalization of industry and employment, that with increasing technological change we should modernize equipment. That may be true, but in the long run, what does it do? It puts more people out of work. Let me give the House an example that occurred a few weeks ago in southwestern Ontario. The CNR ran its turbotrain at a speed somewhere in the neighbourhood of 140 miles an hour.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That was in eastern Ontario.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, I believe between Toronto and Montreal. I realize energy is not touched on in the motion, but when they ran this train at 140 miles an hour, the CNR employed their own workers to stand at underpasses or overpasses along the route to warn cars as the train went whistling through. Yet at the same time the government claims we cannot afford to build overpasses, underpasses, subways or whatever you want to call them. This was a perfect example of how we could put unskilled people to work and pay them a decent wage rather than putting them on unemployment insurance. These people are waiting for a job that is probably not there for them.

This motion relates, at the moment indirectly, but I feel within the next few weeks or months will relate most directly, to a major industry in the city of Brantford which I have the honour to represent. The situation I am about to relate is not an isolated one but is similar to other cases which my hon. friend and colleague from Waterloo-Cambridge mentioned in his speech earlier this afternoon. In the city of Brantford there is a farm implements manufacturing company known as White's Farm Equipment. It is a subsidiary of the White Motor Corporation of the United States. For the last couple of years it has been further and further under. Indeed, in its last quarterly report for 1975 it was $60 million belly up. A man named Ed Reddick is chairman of the board of White Consolidated Industries, which has nothing to do with White Motors; it just happens to have the same name. Reddick has a history of buying out corporations that are about to go broke or which at least are in very serious financial straits. As reported in the American Press, his reputation includes that of stripping subsidiaries, closing down sales offices, firing sales personnel and at least minimizing, if not totally eliminating, scientific research. He boasts about this.

On May 3, White Consolidated Industries was to have a directors' meeting. Everything was laid out in the press that he was about to buy out White Motors, of which the White Farm Equipment Company of Brantford, the Euclid Earth Moving Equipment Company, and I do not know the exact name of it, of St. Catharines, and White Trucks, I believe of British Columbia, are subsidiaries. He boasts about the fact that he can, in his terms, rationalize industries. As far as I am concerned, this means buying them out, dismantling them for what he can get out of it and then moving on to some other corporation nearly bankrupt.

Fortunately for the White Farm Equipment Company of Brantford, Mr. Reddick took ill the night before, on May 2, and as far as I know he is still in the hospital. At the shareholders' meeting of WCI his argument to buy out White Motors, so I am told, lost by a bare two votes. Somebody might say in opposition that this is hypothetical because it has not happened. The point is that it is all there in black and white. This was his intention. White Farm Equipment in Brantford employs 600 to 700 employees. In 1969 or 1970 Reddick pulled the same trick. It was not the Canadian government that made him renege and go back and not buy out White Motors Industries in the United States. It was the United States government that said he could not do it even after the deal had gone through. It was not our tough guys over there—no way. It was the United States government that said he could not go ahead with it.

Unfortunately, while he had control of the White Motor Company and its subsidiaries in Canada, people were laid off. Workers at what was then called White Cockshutt in Brantford were laid off, and some of them had seniority back to 1947. I might add that Cockshutt, White-Cockshutt and now White Farm Equipment in Brantford, has had excellent relations with their employees. They have not had a strike, to my knowledge, since just after the Second World War.

At the time Mr. Reddick was trying to implement the buying out of this corporation, the buying out of the subsidiaries and stripping them for what he could get out of them. He would cut out the science and technology end, or the creative and technological end, and to hell with the Canadian workers. The fact that a small town in southwestern Ontario with a population of 65,000 was losing 700 jobs did not make any difference to a man like Reddick. He runs his empire from the United States, or it could be from Japan, Great Britain, France or West Germany. What I am really saying, and I hope I am distilling it to the one incident, because I think this one incident encompasses what the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge said in his opening remarks today, is that without a national industrial strategy over which Canadians have control, this is the kind of thing that can happen.

Without this kind of industrial strategy for government, private enterprise and public enterprise, this kind of White Consolidated Industries attempted take-over will continue—and we cannot afford that in this country. We do not have to be rabid nationalists, saying we do not like Americans and we do not like American capital or capital from any other part of the world. What we need is some control over the destiny of our future economy. If we do not have this—and we do not at the present time—there is something wrong not only with the government but with every member of this House.

I do not think you have to be a Liberal, a Conservative, a New Democrat or a Creditiste to stand on your feet and say that the global village is getting smaller and we have to co-operate. Interdependence among nations is becoming a most important aspect of life itself. But at the same time we have the right to speak for ourselves in economic and industrial matters. This is the important thing. Otherwise we will be looked upon and laughed at as the second or third cousins of the most powerful nation in the world. That is not an anti-American statement. It is our own governments over the years which have allowed this to happen.

I only heard part of the speech of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) and I am subject to correction in respect of what he said. He mentioned that one of our problems in respect of unemployment today resulted from the number of women in the employment market. If we had a economy in this country and a national industrial strategy that provided enough jobs so we had full employment, and so those who work, whether in factories or offices, received a decent income on which they could live comfortably, not luxuriously, I daresay half those women would not have to be part of the unemployed work force today or, indeed, the 2 per cent I believe the minister said who are working. We would not need that, and we would probably have a better social climate in this country in which mothers would stay home and raise their families. It is precisely because of our lack of a national industrial policy that these women and mothers have to go out to work. I do not see how the minister's argument is valid.

I see that my time has pretty well run out. I would simply like to reiterate what I said a few minutes ago. Unless FIRA begins to act, and unless part II of the bill becomes operative in an effective way, particularly in the energy field, we are not going to have a kind of economy in this country in which we can exercise an independent posture and an enlightened posture in the world force.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT FAILURE TO INSTITUTE INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Saltsman:

That this House condemns the government for its lack of an industrial strategy, which (a) has resulted in falling production, job losses and uncertainty, as in the cases of Westinghouse, Microsystems, Dunlop Tire and others, and (b) is a major cause of today's unemployment rate of 7.4%, which means that 761,000 Canadians are without jobs, a situation that calls for immediate action.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I find it somewhat ironic and amusing that the last speaker, a member of the NDP, in his closing remarks should have used the expression "what we need are controls." The opposition argument on the motion which we are debating today, dealing with industrial strategy, has dealt extensively with recession statistics and trends in an attempt to paint a gloomy picture. Inflation and unemployment at current levels are cause for concern. Nevertheless, arguments should be kept in perspective.

Is it imagined that Canada, one-tenth the size or the power of the United States, could have come through unscathed when the world economy is going through its worst upheaval since the Second World War? The year 1975 was, without doubt, the most difficult year for the government and the country since the end of the war. In a country dependent on imports for one third of its needs, and needing to export a similar proportion of its goods and services to maintain its standard of living, it is surely remarkable that we in Canada have been able to avoid the acute hardships that the recession has caused in other countries.

This dependency on other countries for exports and imports makes it impossible for us to immunize ourselves from world influences. Our situation has been aggravated more recently on the domestic front by the reluctance of corporations, union leadership, and various levels of government to accept the effects of recession. The demands, not just to maintain the status quo but to obtain improvements over their positions in previous years, have exerted tremendous pressures on those not able to join together to form a pressure group. Federal government action, however reluctant, to control inflation, became inevitable when a voluntary consensus was so bluntly refused. Surely 1975 was not the year to demand the highest increases in prices and salaries.

The key to beating inflation was and still is productivity. The mover of the motion complains that it is not the fault of the worker that productivity falls. Does he seriously suggest that those same companies that he accuses of profit motivation would not be happy to see increased productivity as a balancing factor to decreasing demand and falling prices?

One of the easier ways to alleviate the effects of recession is for everyone to minimize lost time by strikes and to improve efficiency by two or three percentage points.

However, it is important to maintain a reasonable perspective. Economic conditions in Canada are certainly a cause for concern and deserve the full individual attention of the government. Nevertheless, having illustrated the world influence on the Canadian economy, it is appropriate to make comparisons with conditions elsewhere.

Unemployment rates and unused productive capacity in the major industrialized countries rose during the first half of 1975 to levels unprecedented in the post war period. For OECD countries combined real GNP declined at an annual rate of about 5 per cent during the first half of 1975, the third consecutive half year of decline, with the low point reached about mid-year.

For example, while the percentage change in real GNP for 1975 as compared with 1974 increased in Canada by 0.2 per cent, there was a decrease in France of 2 per cent, in Germany of 4 per cent, in the United Kingdom of 2 per cent, and in the United States of 3 per cent.

If we take in consideration the effects of inflation, it seems that the Canadian economy reached a peak during the first months of 1973 beginning a slight recession since 1974 up to the end of 1975. Of course, Canadian productivity has been clearly below normal between 1973-75, but we should compare our conditions with those of the United States. That country is by far our most important trading partner and the cyclical behaviour of the Canadian economy normally closely follows the American economy.

The comparisons are based on production, employment, unemployment, costs and prices, foreign sector, capital expenditures and development of the GNP per inhabitant. It follows that the United States experienced a much more serious recession than Canada between 1973-75, as shown by the comparative movements of real production, employment, unemployment and investments. At the same time, the Canadian experience was less propitious in two important sectors: first the unit costs of labour in manufacturing and, second, the foreign sector.

If the productivity of American manufacturers was still less propitious than that of their Canadian counterparts since 1973, this disadvantage has been substantially offset by smaller salary increases. There clearly results a temporary degradation at least of the competitive status of the Canadian manufacturing industry as to the unit costs of manpower compared with those in the United States. Canada has experienced since 1973 a quick degradation of its merchandizing and current accounts while the contrary was true in the United States which is mostly due to a greatly reduced demand from abroad.

[English]

The period since 1973 has seen a closer convergence in per capita GNP in Canada and the United States. Between 1973 and 1975 Canada's GNP output in current dollars climbed by about 29 per cent, or nearly twice as fast as in the United States. In 1975 per capita GNP in Canada has climbed to within about 3 percentage points of that in the United States, compared with a gap of about 11 per cent in 1973. In real terms, Canada's GNP output advanced by about 3 per cent. This is well below the normal growth rate of at least 9 per cent in an average two year period. However, in the U.S. real GNP was actually 4 per cent lower in 1975 than in 1973.

The GNP price deflator, the broadest measure of over-all price change in the economy, advanced by 25 per cent over a two year period in Canada, or somewhat faster than the 19 per cent increase in the United States during the same period of time. The volume of industrial production declined by somewhat more than 2 per cent in Canada between 1973 and 1975, compared with a decline of 9.4 per cent in the U.S.

Retail sales in Canada climbed by 32 per cent in the two years ending in 1975, compared with an increase of half this rate in the United States. Housing starts declined by 14 per cent in Canada during the last two years, compared with a 43 per cent drop in the United States. The Canadian labour force climbed by about 8 per cent in the past two years, a rate nearly twice as fast as the 4.4 per cent advance in the United States. Total employment growth in Canada advanced by 6.4 per cent despite the economic slowdown in the past two years. In the U. S. it climbed by less than half of one per cent.

As far as the manufacturing sector is concerned, the decline in the volume of Canadian manufacturing of about 2.5 per cent was only one third as steep as the decline in the United States. There was also a sharper drop off in the average weekly hours in U.S. manufacturing. Output per man hour in Canadian manufacturing advanced by 3.3 per cent between 1973 and 1975, or nearly three times the rate experienced in the United States. However, average hourly earnings in Canadian manufacturing climbed by more than 31 per cent in the most recent two year period, compared with only 18 per cent in the United States. The result was that unit labour costs in Canadian manufacturing advanced by 27 per cent compared with 16.5 per cent in the United States as the comparative advantage in Canadian productivity was more than matched by a steeper climb in wages.

As I pointed out earlier in my remarks, a more responsible attitude in relating wage and salary demands to productivity rather than to anticipated increases in the inflation rate could have moderated, to a considerable extent, the high inflation which necessitated the anti-inflation legislation.

I shall conclude my remarks with a reference to one of the improving sectors of our economy, the growth of Canada's consulting and technical service industries in international markets. Consulting and technical service industries contribute more than $1 billion annually to the Canadian economy; over $150 million in fees alone was earned from foreign contracts in 1974.

Capital equipment exports follow where our Canadian consultants have contracts. Canadian technology is in great demand abroad, and frequently our expertise parallels the needs of developing countries. This consulting expertise is in a multitude of fields, including communications, transportation, forestry, resource development, and power development. The industry is largely Canadian owned; it is aggressive and entrepreneurial. The Canadian consultant is taking the lead in the pursuit of capital project business abroad.

In closing, whilst one cannot be surprised that during a slowdown period in the Canadian economy the purveyors of doom come out in force, a more balanced assessment of the true picture would indicate that we in Canada have performed relatively well in comparison with the rest of the world. Certainly we always have a need to improve, but a more positive attitude and a little more pride in our accomplishments will help us to attain our common objectives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, we are grateful for the opportunity provided by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) today with respect to the subject matter of unemployment which, if anything, has been a consistent concern of hon. members of this House on all sides.

There has been a continued recurrence of high unemployment throughout the country. However, those of us who come from the Atlantic provinces, when faced with either statistical figures or with the latest reports on unemployment, realize that this is not something new but something we have long experienced in our part of the country. Indeed it has been recognized for quite a number of years, certainly since the early 1960's, that the federal government has a basic responsibility with respect to the continuing high levels of unemployment which have existed in certain areas of the country, those areas which have, to use the popular phrase, suffered from regional economic and social disparity.

While the motion before us today refers specifically to the general unemployment situation which exists, a rate of 7.4 per cent—or in terms of actual Canadians without jobs, some 761,000—I think it is incumbent upon us in this debate to realize that the problem has been particularly acute in two areas which I want to mention quite specifically. One area comprises the four Atlantic provinces which have traditionally experienced unemployment in rates at sometimes double and, in a number of instances, triple that of the national average. It is a situation which no member or minister should want to accept happily for one moment, but I think we have to be frank and recognize that the general experience to date in attempting to deal with this problem has not been overly satisfactory.

I did not hear the minister when he made his comments with respect to the problems of unemployment as he saw them from his perspective as Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), but from what I have learned about his speech it strikes me that it was a speech which generally tried to make excuses for what presently is the situation rather than to give some suggestion or indication as to what steps the government will be taking to alleviate this problem.

Surely it is not something which was sprung on the government as brand new information with the last report from Statistics Canada. It seems to me that for as long as this minister has been in office, and certainly since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been in office, it has been an almost constant complaint that the problem of unemployment in Canada has not been dealt with satisfactorily.

However, the two specific groups which concern me today and which have suffered unduly due to the lack of an industrial strategy are undoubtedly the people who live in areas of economic and social disparity such as those in the Atlantic provinces, part of the province of Quebec, certain parts of northern Ontario, and northwestern Canada.

I also think particularly of a group which is equally important but not quite so easily identifiable, the young people in our society, in terms of the long term damage which we have done with respect to the most important resource which exists for Canada, and that is their future positive attitude and ability to participate in the ongoing life of this country.

If there is a major and compelling criticism above all else which can be made about this government in the employment field, it is, quite frankly, the betrayal of an opportunity for employment which should be, but has not been, available for many thousands—indeed, hundreds of thousands—of young people in our society. I know this only too well because during my times here as a member I have had the opportunity to consider in detail some of the specific responses the government has made with respect to youth unemployment.

Many years ago on the occasion of one particular bad set of published statistics, or a report from Statistics Canada with respect to the high percentage of unemployed young people, those under the age of 24, the Prime Minister indicated to me in an answer that he too was concerned about the problem, and for that reason the government at that time established a high powered interdepartmental committee which was to take seriously the problem of the long term high incidence of youth unemployment.

What have been the results of that self-professed interest in this serious social problem? The results have been nil. Of course there have been experiments with respect to the Opportunities for Youth program, but that program has gone the way of all flesh. The government announced it as an interim measure to deal with what it perceived to be a very serious situation. One is not sure that it was attempting to deal with the reality of that situation or merely the seeming politics of it, but Opportunities for Youth is no longer in existence.

A program which was introduced by the Prime Minister's predecessor as a Canadian response to the then popular American Peace Corps was the Company of Young Canadians. The Company of Young Canadians had its difficulties, and no one would disagree that it was instituted at a time of very serious social unrest. However, I think hon. members on either side who have looked at the work which was done, particularly in latter years, by the Company of Young Canadians, have to be impressed both by the dedication of the young people who were involved and by the extent to which they were actually able to assist in the development of self-help programs in a number of disadvantaged communities across the country, and for a very small price, I might add, because as hon. members know the budgetary item for the Company of Young Canadians was quite small in comparison with many activities funded by the government. What was the response to this particular innovation? It was given the axe. One opportunity for channeling some of the energy and idealism and even the anxiety of young people was destroyed. They could have been a positive force in the real social and economic development of the country.

As I said in another place on another occasion, the government is somewhat like its present energy program—it has run out of gas. I suppose the obvious thing to say is that the sooner it can be replaced, the better. An enormous number of young people have become very cynical and frustrated by what they perceive to be the government's lack of interest in their problems of employment and effective participation in our society.

I see one hon. member shake his head. I am not sure whether he is opposed to dealing with the chronic, high unemployment that faces our young people or whether he is sharing in the collective fatigue that exists in this administration. Either is an extreme condition and should not be tolerated any longer.

I am amazed at the government's lack of sensitivity, its lack of an industrial strategy or indeed any strategy to deal with the employment of such a resource as the young people of this country. This aspect of the matter deserves much more time, Mr. Speaker, but I want to deal with another aspect of unemployment which I consider equally grave, and that is the situation in the Atlantic provinces.

It is perhaps a fact of our experience as representatives that, because we have been faced with high unemployment figures so consistently in the last few years, we have ceased to be alarmed by the extent of unemployment in our own communities. Recently I saw the latest published unemployment figures for the Atlantic provinces. It was interesting to compare the reports from the Manpower offices to see how closely they checked with the figures published by Statistics Canada.

The national unemployment rate is 7.6 per cent. In Newfoundland, it is 16.3 per cent; in Prince Edward Island, 13.4 per cent; Nova Scotia, 10.3 per cent, and New Brunswick, 13.2 per cent. This means that in the Atlantic provinces unemployment is running at double the national average.

On a year to year basis a comparison of the number of people registered with the Manpower Centres in the Atlantic provinces is quite shocking. In March last year 4,196 people were registered with the Manpower Centre in Charlottetown; this year the figure jumped to 5,600. In Summerside 4,200 people were registered in March of last year as actively looking for employment; this year the figure climbed to 6,007, a growth of 43 per cent. These are not figures that one can accept in a sanguine manner when one realizes the hardship and heartbreak experienced by heads of households who must report to their families week after week that there is still no job available. It is difficult for us to identify with a figure in the hundreds of thousands of unemployed. But when I meet people in my constituency who are denied productive employment, Mr. Speaker, then I know the tragedy of the lack of an industrial policy on the part of the government.

It is incredible that in the Atlantic provinces the government should masquerade behind a program of regional expansion. In 1969, when various programs and policies were put together to create a department that was going to deal directly with the under-employed and unemployed in specific regions, we were optimistic. In 1976, however, the department only administers patchwork programs that basically do nothing about the unemployment problem in the Atlantic provinces. In Charlottetown last week the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) said—and I hope I quote him closely enough not to misrepresent him—that during a time of restraint we must not expect that anything can be done effectively to offset that with respect to regional economic programs and policies. He has said similar things in the House in reply to questions about rate increases of 100 per cent on the main ferry link to the mainland and the repeated requests from the Canadian National Railways for an increase in basic freight rates, which of course would effect the cost of moving basic goods out of our region.

It is incredible that the government would establish a department to alleviate regional disparities and then have its own energy and transportation policies, tariff policies, and restraint policies go totally against it and undermine any achievement it might have gained. What kind of credibility can this establish with respect to an industrial policy for the country or for areas where the government has an important and special responsibility?

I may need to say a few additional words at eight o'clock because I think this is a very important subject. At this time, however, I would respectfully call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being six o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that before we adjourned for supper I was trying to deal with what I perceived to be two of the most consistent and offensive areas of high unemployment which have existed in this country for a number of years, almost totally during the time the present government has been in office. One has to do with the shockingly high numbers of young people unemployed, more than 14 per cent at last count; and the other has to do with consistent and chronically high unemployment in areas like the Atlantic provinces where, on a regional average, unemployment is at well over 14 per cent.

I will not repeat, for which hon. members on all sides will be grateful, what I said before supper, but I want to emphasize that, as the motion suggests, there is indeed no industrial strategy to counteract the very serious and high unemployment which exists today. In fact if there is any one criticism I have of this motion, it is that it does not go far enough.

I believe that if we are to deal with the problem of regional unemployment the time has long since passed when we should realize that it is not sufficient to have a series of particular programs or, indeed, one department trying to carry and develop matters of responsibility in this particular area. I mentioned before the supper adjournment the failure to introduce consistent and supportive policies in areas of tremendous importance to the Atlantic regions, areas such as energy and transportation. I will not go into detail, but it seems to me that there has been a tremendous deterioration in that there has been a lack of support from the department in dealing with both energy and transportation. Indeed much if not all that is being attempted under regional disparity programs sponsored by DREE is undermined by the lack of consistent and co-ordinated programs in the totality of federal government intervention in the Atlantic provinces.

At present it seems to me that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is indeed a prisoner of the government, unable to make its weight felt fully in the activities of other departments when dealing with the problems of unemployment and under-employment in the Atlantic provinces.

On the question of young people it seems that our approach has not been comprehensive. It is a well known fact that the provinces have a vital stake in the whole question of youth opportunity, and employment, but there has been literally no effective consultation with the provinces on this question. The relationship existing between education, manpower training, and job opportunities for young people has been totally ignored by the government.

As I said, if I have any criticism of the motion presented today by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge it is that it only deals with industrial strategy affecting employment. It seems to me that we need, in real terms, a totally new economic and social policy, one whose basic commitment is to full employment. I remember a few years ago when the late president of Queen's University, a man of tremendous stature, Dr. John Deutsch, told a parliamentary committee that we would need to look closely at developing new national economic and social policies, ones which would provide young Canadians, and Canadians in regionally disadvantaged areas, with the knowledge that they would be given the opportunity for full and meaningful employment. Unfortunately that situation has not come to pass under this government and that opportunity, even that concern, does not exist today.

I thank the hon. member who introduced this motion for giving us this brief opportunity to remind the government again that it has basic, fundamental responsibilities, one of which must be the establishment of policies and programs leading to full employment both for the young and for those in regionally disadvantaged areas.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to thank the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) for giving us today the opportunity to deal with an issue of much concern to us: the employment situation in Canada, a sustained economic prosperity and the involvement of Canadians in this prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, even though this motion is negatively formulated since it must comply with the rules of this House for supply motions, it is positive on several counts. This motion says in a general way that we blame this government for its lack of an industrial strategy making for a planned economy that would give short and particularly long-term results and enable Canadians to enter the labour market and ensure their future.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has no industrial strategy as such. We run the economy, this country on a day-to-day basis, haphazardly, according to the mood of the moment, nothing more. The problems are faced on an ad hoc basis, but there are no long-term plan aimed at maintaining the employment level, at fighting inflation or preventing those two goals from working against each other. On that score, Mr. Speaker, it is sad to realize it and endure it but it is an actual fact in this country: we have no employment strategy in Canada.

A few years ago, this government announced specific job-creating programs, among others the local initiative programs and opportunities for Youth. In another case, for instance, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was created. Today, in 1976, those local initiative programs have been abolished. For what reason? Monetary restrictions. The same is true of opportunities for Youth.

Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned with that kind of administration not because it comes from the Liberal party but because of that philosophy we have. I am deeply concerned by that. One day, a minister stands up and says to the House: The government has developed a very specific job creation policy; we intend with this strategy to generate a number of job opportunities and for that purpose we invest a few millions. Some time later, the government announces the implementation of another program which is not necessarily related to the previous one, and there we go, as the wind blows.

And finally, because one day the government decided to fight inflation, which it refused to advocate during the election, suddently we have to tighten our belts and forget about creating jobs in Canada or maintaining the rate of employment, since all of a sudden, one fine morning, the government decided that it was important to fight inflation.

Mr. Speaker, the result is, as the motion says, that according to the latest official data of Statistics Canada, the average seasonally adjusted unemployment rate is 7.4 per cent. In Quebec, we hold the record once again, that is 8.3 per cent. Mr. Speaker, as I said previously, I am deeply concerned by this, because with this government we do not know what to expect during the next month, the next three or six months, or the next year. The first point of the motion emphasizes the lack of long-term and short-term planning; it relates this lack of planning, and I agree with this, to the fall in production.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker. First of all, industries themselves, small- and medium-sized businesses in particular, because they do not know what short or long range policies the government will put forward, restrain their investments and their growth, and this is how their employment rate has leveled off so to speak, because of this lack of concern. Second, and it has already been said in this House, our labour legislation, as regards jobs covered by both the federal and provincial codes, our laws and bargaining process are quite outdated, which means once more that small- and medium-sized businesses are the victims of slow negotiations, inefficient employer-employee dialogue and finally, this is another major reason for the reduction of our per capita gross national product.

I refer once more to the official statistics of the Department of Labour of Canada, which indicate the number of strikes and lock outs in Canada and show again that our bargaining process is not only slow, inefficient, obsolete and outdated but moreover, that it creates in a way endless and very costly disputes between labour and management. Statistics in this regard speak for themselves, Mr. Speaker, and it is not necessary to quote them here.

In this relatively dark picture—and I think this is the actual situation and I am not pessimistic in saying so—there are some elements of hope or spark plugs that come to light at a given time everywhere in Canada. Let us mention in particular the experience of a company named Tricofil, which was completely on the decline, as a result of textile imports, just as it happened in the footwear industry in Canada and in the province of Quebec in particular, where this industry was prevailing. All this happened as a result of government inaction, because of a government strategy which encouraged more imports than any policy designed to support the endeavours of our own industries. We are waking up, Mr. Speaker, with a footwear industry that has disappeared, together with these jobs. In the case of textile, exactly the same type of crisis exists.

Recently, I asked a question of the minister on this subject. He replied that a Canadian textile commission had been established, that many studies are being done on this subject and that we are starting to understand the problem pretty well. No solution has yet been found. We are content to judge dumping cases, but we do not ensure employment protection in our country, and especially in the Eastern Townships, Mr. Speaker, where the problem has taken tremendous proportions.

As an example, I would mention Victoriaville, my own city, where there is an industry called Robin Company and another one called UTEX Company. These plants now operate at only 40 per cent of their production capacity. Why? Because we are unable to face the foreign competition that this government, and I repeat, this government, is importing because of its lack of legislation to protect the Canadian industry and its lack of Canadianism spirit which would make us give first and foremost to Canadians the opportunity to produce themselves the products that we can manufacture locally before importing them.

For political or financial reasons of which I am not aware, the government prefers to encourage imports from countries where the manpower rates are, of course, much lower than ours. This is why the Robin Company, Mr. Speaker, is laying off 200, 300, and 400 people, heads of households, who have been working for 10, 15, 20, 22 or 25 years, who are Canadians like you and me and who can suddenly find themselves in the lower echelons or simply laid off. This is how our whole system of social security in general, especially unemployment insurance, which is a negative program, a disincentive for the worker and because of which we can now say that unemployment competes against work, and this is how you have people with no urge to work or who are discouraged. It is a real drama to lose one's job after 20 years in a factory just because imports are not controlled.

When the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) asks for an overall industrial strategy to keep the employment level up, and especially the production level, it means, first, that we are going to impose very strict controls on our importation of products. The same situation prevails in the dairy industry; we import from foreign countries the butter and the cheese that we are able to produce here in Canada. Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that it is because of this particular factor, and many others, that we have overproduction and the government has no other choice but to penalize our own producers. This is some kind of collective discouragement. However, the government is primarily supposed to encourage and support the initiatives of individuals and of businesses.

Mr. Speaker, the consequence is a serious and important loss of jobs which, at the regional or local level, may mean the end to the development of a city or a region or the beginning of that development. This is the case of Victoriaville with Robin and Utex.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make another remark on this matter. Why did the government abandon the Local Initiatives and Opportunities for Youth Programs? Why? We are told that it is because of monetary cutbacks. So, which reason does the government put forward and how will these programs be replaced? What are we going to do with the students this coming summer? I know that the government will answer that they are going to create 10,000, 15,000 or 20,000 jobs throughout the country. But which industrial strategy does this fit in? Not a political strategy. In which industrial strategy? I fully agree that these programs be abandoned if they do fit into a particular industrial strategy. But this is not the case.

Mr. Speaker, the private sector must be helped rather than hindered. When we meet heads of small and medium industries, they complain of too much administration work to be done to meet government requirements. They tell us this has become extremely complex, and I know this for a fact, because I have gone through that experience personally. Sometimes two, three, or even four full-time professional accountants would be needed, simply to meet the requirements of all government departments such as DREE, Industry, Trade and Commerce, Revenue, and so forth.

What is needed for small and medium businesses is experts, specialists, advisors to help us improve and modernize. Also needed is new labour legislation ensuring efficient negotiations, rather than the kind of legislation that puts us in a confrontation situation from the start.

Work must be encouraged in Canada, rather than unemployment. More stringent and more efficient control of monopolies is needed in the food industry, in the basic materials industry, in the insurance industry or any other field, so that small and medium businesses can breathe and meet genuine competition.

In a number of industries, we face the kind of competition supposedly existing in those supposedly capitalist systems, since there is no genuine competition any more in a number of industries in Canada, because of those pervading monopolies either in the investment property field or in the money business through chartered banks that create money and are responsible for higher interest rates, or again in the extraction or manufacturing of essential materials.

This is why the cost of living is going up, employment going down, and small and medium firms can no longer compete. We have no anti-monopoly legislation, or if we do have it is collecting dust, as so many other things.

Mr. Speaker, it is one of two things: either we open our ears and work together in support of an employment strategy in Canada, especially for those aged 18 to 35 that are coming into the labour force, who have the necessary skills, who went into debt to complete their studies, and who face nothing else in the immediate future than a service and prolonged period of unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, I think those factors are important. An effort will have to be made above all, once this problem of industrial strategy is recognized, and I think that in that respect the motion of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) is right on, in that the government will have to recognize that the premise of the motion is absolutely true. If it is false the government only has to stand up and say what strategy it intends to draw its inspiration from for the months to come to really restore the confidence of Canadians in their economy.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I will refer to a brochure published not by my political party but by the government of Canada and entitled "Canada 1974", English version, published by Statistics Canada. It was prepared in the Yearbook Division, Statistics Canada. At page 203 of that wonderful brochure one learns extraordinary things. That brochure which is supposed to be given is sold to Canadians so they will know about the policies and how the government of this country works. Those are not general notions that are being transmitted to citizens and particularly immigrants.

So here are the pearls one finds at pages 202, 203 and following concerning the industrial strategy, the creation of employment and the fight against inflation. It will be understood there, Mr. Speaker, that the government of Canada made a choice the day it introduced that anti-inflation legislation. It decided by that legislation to break the process of collective bargaining. Indeed, there is no point in bargaining—you ask for 10 per cent, you get it; you ask for more, it is cut down to 10 per cent, or 12 per cent in certain exceptional cases.

Of course, that does not stop insurance companies from tripling their premiums in one year; nor does it stop the provincial government of Quebec or Ontario from increasing school and municipal taxes at exaggerated and abusive rates but it gives them a mouthful. There is a fight going on against inflation and workers are told: You will limit yourselves to 10 per cent. The whole process of collective bargaining is thus broken. An arbitrary judgment is finally arrived at. So much for that. That is the kind of industrial strategy being offered by the government.

Secondly, the government put an end to programs that were creating temporary employment, such as the Local Initiatives Program and Opportunities for Youth, but at least this meant occasional jobs, it was better than nothing at all. This is abolished. Finally, Mr. Speaker, this same government increases bureaucracy that governs small enterprises and does not do anything against monopolies that stifle small and medium enterprises. I did not invent this, Mr. Speaker, I am referring to this brochure which reads:

The present state of economic knowledge suggests that there would be absolutely no trouble curing unemployment if it were not for the related problem of inflation.

There is the point. I continue to quote:

Unhappily many of the policies designed to increase spending and employment will also tend to exert an upward pressure on prices.

This is the third article on the unemployment inflation pattern.

There is no easy solution to this quandary. There is an inverse relationship between inflation and unemployment. Years of significant price increase are years of relatively low unemployment.

I invite my colleagues to read that; it is delightful, Mr. Speaker. The government starts out with the idea it cannot check both unemployment and inflation. There is but one strictly political alternative: fight inflation or fight unemployment. As the elections are far away, as they were won over the Progressive Conservative issue of a price freeze, the government says, to have a pleasant taste in its mouth: we will wrestle inflation to the ground. And it does so on the back of Canadian inflation, producers, employees and workers.

Here if what is said on pages 204 and the following, and I quote:

Economists are beginning to suspect—

—they are not sure, they are government economists—

... are beginning to suspect that sustained periods of rising prices may create expectations of further price increases which get built into business and wage contracts. The result is that ...

... because, they, the Liberal economists, suspect ...

... The result is that it will require ever-increasing amounts of unemployment ...

... I did not say that, Mr. Speaker, ...

... it will require ever-increasing amounts of unemployment to hold the rate of inflation to a given level.

And the economists who suspect something want to be so specific that they add the following in brackets, and I quote:

(In economic parlance this is referred to as an outward shift in the Phillips curve, which is just another name for the curve or function that shows the trade-off relationship between unemployment and inflation.)

That shows us, Mr. Speaker, how deep we are in obscureness. We live from day to day, which proves once and for all that this government has really no industrial strategy and that it governs from day to day depending on the number of votes it can get. Mr. Speaker, I hope this government will benefit from this debate and consider its position to help Canadian workers to actually build our country.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Would the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) allow a question?

Mr. Fortin: Yes.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of his speech, the hon. member for Lotbinière said that our collective bargaining system within labour relations was obsolete and at the end of his speech he deplored that the Anti-Inflation Act counteracted this system he finds obsolete. I listened to his speech with interest and to this part dealing in particular with those labour relations he finds obsolete. I would like to know what his party or himself considers as non obsolete or as appropriate, given the circumstances, to change the collective bargaining system.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I shall be as brief as possible, considering that my time is over, but the question of the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard) is very interesting; it is also very complex. For a long time, on this side, we have stated and maintained that an arbitration policy with a labour court where the employees, the employers and a person totally independent could really lead to a decision on this kind of conflict. And we have always upheld the view that it was about time to have in Canada a permanent collective bargaining system and not one whereby bargaining can take place only when the former agreement, has run out, which means it may take one year for the new contract to be signed.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, granted that one cannot draw many conclusions from one brief answer but what we advocate is a labour court with both parties equally represented and a permanent collective bargaining system. This court could take care of the grievances and problems would be settled as they arise rather than at the end. This is in a way what is now taking place in Quebec. In this manner, Mr. Speaker, solutions would be arrived at or at least the situation would be improved upon.

Right now, it is enough to look at the Quebec public sector where there is no permanent collective bargaining system and where there is not that kind of labour court or compulsory arbitration. You see immediately the kind of mess that province is in. Sick people are not allowed to stay in hospitals, children are kept away from school, teachers cannot teach and all that is proving very expensive.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the solutions I advocate are not ideal. In answering to the question put by the hon. member for Drummond, I will say that these are only elements of solutions, and that if we can devise a lot of technical things today in our society, certainly we can, as intelligent people, find out positive means allowing people to work.

[English]

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take too much of the time of the House on the motion that is before us today. That does not mean, of course, that what I say succintly will not be right. The motion criticizes the government really in two areas; first of all for its failure to develop an industrial strategy, and then it goes on to point out that this lack of an industrial strategy has resulted in severe problems of location for Canadian workers and industry.

In developing any kind of industrial strategy it is fundamental that you have some control over your economy.

This control has to be in two areas in particular, and I want to deal with each separately. First of all, you must have some control over foreign ownership; secondly, and just as important, you must have some control over competing forces within the economy, and this includes both labour and business. Some form of control or consensus or social contract must be arrived at so you can develop an acceptable strategy for the future.

It is getting a little boring to go through a whole litany of figures showing the extent to which Canada is foreign owned, but I still think they bear repeating. For example, 99.9 per cent of the petroleum industry is foreign owned. The figure is 97.7 per cent in the automobile industry, 62 per cent in mining, 83 per cent in the rubber industry, 77 per cent in the electrical apparatus industry, 90 per cent in the computer industry, and 92 per cent in the aircraft and aircraft parts industry. You cannot develop an industrial strategy, or control your own economy, or reduce inequity in society until you get a handle on this major problem of foreign ownership.

If your economy is foreign owned and the country of the parent companies suffer a recession, then workers of subsidiary companies are the first fired and the last hired. The Canadian subsidiary of an American company like Bordens Milk and subsidiaries of any number of other foreign companies are bound to suffer when the parent company decides that it is in the company's best interest to phase out its Canadian operation and thereafter takes the easy route of manufacturing the product at the location of the parent company and shipping it into Canada.

This has happened many times, but one of the examples specified in the motion is Dunlop Tire. The right to manufacture Dunlop tires in Canada is going to be withdrawn by that company. These tires will now be shipped in from the United States, meaning a loss of Canadian jobs and Canadian business. We will have to buy something called the Dayton tire which will compete with the Dunlop tire. Whoever heard of the Dayton tire, and who will find that it can be a successful competitor with a tire that is known and has been patented throughout the world? It is the trademark that has the value as well as the advertising of the name. Because we lack an industrial strategy and a meaningful foreign ownership policy in this country, thousands of Canadian workers are going to be put out of work.

The case of Microsystems is also referred to in the motion. The government allowed a subsidiary of Northern Electric to be closed down after you, Mr. Speaker, I, and the taxpayers of Canada had pumped $40 million into it. This company had developed a very unique and excellent process for building complex microprocessors. There was really no indication that the government knew what that company was doing. As a result, a new Canadian technology that could have been quite successful in world terms went down the tubes.

We will see what are the government's intentions when we examine the Pratt & Whitney situation at Longueuil. Here again the Canadian subsidiary of Pratt & Whitney has a chance to enter into a contract with Rolls Royce to undertake the research, development, and manufacture of a new small jet engine which will be the engine of the 1980's in terms of civil and military jet aviation. It seems that the U.S. justice department found this offensive.

When Pratt & Whitney, a large U.S. aircraft company, locks itself into a contract with Rolls Royce, from an American point of view it looks like a violation of their anti-trust laws. Because of the action of the U.S. justice department, a Canadian subsidiary stands to lose about 1,000 jobs, a large contract for the future and, perhaps just as important, the expertise and talent that go with the aircraft industry.

Canada used to be a world leader in the field of aviation. We pioneered bush piloting and transportation over great areas of this country. We had a lot to show the world. But what has the Liberal government done over the years, Mr. Speaker? It has allowed our aircraft industry to go completely down the tubes. It has allowed all that technology and expertise to go south of the border, leaving us even more as drawers of water and hewers of wood, shipping out our raw materials and our jobs.

An hon. Member: And even the shipping is done in foreign ships.

Mr. Leggatt: That is right. That is what has happened to our aircraft industry. We have not had the courage or the guts as a country to stand up and be independent and take pride in the developments and the technology we have. We used to lead the world, but where are we now? We are going down to the United States to pick up $18 billion worth of Lockheed Orions developed entirely in the United States. All we are going to do is manufacture a few components. It does not take that much in terms of research, expertise or engineering.

● (2040)

We are continuing to ship our best people south of the border, which is a discredit to this country. We will suffer in the long run. We will suffer as we lose the talent and brains this country is capable of developing. What Canadians need is pride in themselves, and they will not get that pride if the government continues to take a hangdog attitude about what we are and are not capable of doing. I say that Canadians can produce the finest aircraft in the world and they should be given the chance to do it.

An hon. Member: It is not very often I agree with you, but you are right.

Mr. Leggatt: I am happy to hear that hon. members are going to support this excellent motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: But they haven't read it yet.

Mr. Leggatt: Dealing with another aspect of what we term the lack of an industrial strategy, one of the classic pieces of legislation brought in was the Foreign Investment Review Act. That was an attempt to redress the massive problem of foreign ownership. This is something that Walter Gordon in a sense lead for many years. He lead the fight in terms of trying to repatriate the Canadian economy.

An hon. Member: And look what happened to dear old Walter.

Mr. Leggatt: Yes, look what happened to dear old Walter. He could not stand his companions in the cabinet and he had to leave. To his credit he left, and he left a gap on that side of the House because they have not been able to get anybody to come back and take that position in the cabinet, that is, somebody with some sensitivity for this question of foreign ownership.

An hon. Member: What about the empty seats on your side?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: There are a few empty heads over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: Some of the seats that are sat in over there are still empty.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) has the floor and I suggest we should listen to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. To get back to the Foreign Investment Review Act for a minute, it really is not legislation, it is a welcome-wagon arrangement for foreign capital to come in and take over segments of the Canadian economy it should not be allowed to take over. Another example is the Foxborough Cheese Company down in Belleville, Ontario. Foreign investment was allowed to come in because the company was going to create all kinds of new employment down there. The ex-mayor of Belleville, who is a well respected member of this House, is very conscious of this particular problem in Belleville. Under this wonderful foreign investment review legislation the Cow & Gate Company was allowed to come in and buy out Foxborough Cheese, with the promise of all kinds of jobs. It then shut the company right down. What did FIRA do in that respect? Where was the monitoring in that regard? Where are the charges that should have been laid because of the failure to meet certain commitments? Last, but not least, what were the commitments?

I have about 145 questions on the Order Paper asking for some simple information that the people of Canada are entitled to have. What are these commitments that foreign corporations are making in order to get into the Canadian economy? I am told that this is secretive and sensitive information. Almost everything you ask of the government is secret. Apparently we should not be allowed to know what is going on. Obviously the Canadian people are not mature enough to be able to accept the kind of sensitive information these companies are handing out.

The only time we get information about commitments is when it is about something like the Lockheed deal. The government told us in this case about the wonderful jobs this would create and the good things it would do for Canada. Why does the government not tell us about the other things which are approved? Not once was information given in respect of a question on the Order Paper in terms of commitments that these companies make when they are allowed to take over, or in terms of the monitoring. There are no experts on the monitoring staff of the Foreign Investments Review Agency. There is no strategy development to monitor the companies after the takeover. The government relies on the information provided by the takeover companies regarding what is being done, and monitoring is a complete farce under Foreign Investments Review.

The legislation is meaningless because not a single charge has been laid against a company that came into Canada and did not meet its commitments, which in the first place were the reason the company was given permission. Surely the minister will wake up to the fact that his legislation is a farce. The Canadian people know it is a farce, and if the minister does not do something about it soon he will himself be considered a farce.

An hon. Member: You don't think that kind of talk will get you anywhere?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: You are still using the same old speech.

Mr. Leggatt: I use the same old speech because it is the same old problem, and no one does anything about it.

Mrs. Holt: The same old partnership.

Mr. Leggatt: For the benefit of my friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt)—

An hon. Member: Oh, you are friends?

Mr. Leggatt: Always. She being from British Columbia, I should like to give a couple of examples in that province about which she will be aware and sensitive. First let me remind her of the Fraser Valley Cannery. The Fraser Valley used to have one of the finest cannery industries in Canada. We all know what happened to it. It was bought out by the American Can Company and then immediately shut down. They found it was a lot cheaper to process the food across the border and ship it into Canada in cans.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Leggatt: We used to have an excellent company in British Columbia that developed a special skill saw. This group of Canadian entrepreneurs had an excellent skill saw. It received a takeover bid from the Skil Saw Company of the United States. They were told the company just wanted to run this organization a little more efficiently. Skil Saw was going to send its experts in, but what happened? They shut the company down and shipped skill saws into Canada from the United States. There went our Canadian jobs, and there went the B.C. economy.

That is what happens when you have a country that is owned, dominated, and controlled by large foreign corporations. We must reduce our dependence on these companies.

Mrs. Holt: They priced them out of their jobs.

An hon. Member: Did you people discuss this on your trip east?

Mr. Leggatt: That is absolutely untrue. The hon. member who spoke is, without exception, entertaining if not enlightening. In that particular case the Canadian saw was marketed at a price lower than the United States saw. That is why the United States company came in and took it over. It was such good competition the U.S. company could not afford to have the Canadian saw on the market. Therefore it took the company over, shut it down, and shipped its own saws in. This was a marvellous setup. Unless we have some industrial strategy this country is going down the tubes in terms of controlling its own destiny.

Let me go to the second heading on the question of an industrial strategy. We have to develop a social contract or an internal consensus within the country in order to have any kind of meaningful industrial planning. As a fundamental to that we must take a look at western Europe and its move into an industrial democracy in which the people working in industry have some participation in the decision-making process. The workers have some representation on the boards of directors and there is a whole theme involving the workers in the productivity of their jobs. We are ignoring this in Canada because we are still fighting the 19th century class war in terms of industrial strategy.

I am not one of those who think collective bargaining is something that is cast in tablets of stone. I do not happen to agree with Joe Morris that collective bargaining is something we can never change.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Leggatt: I thought there might be some response if someone says he does not agree with Joe Morris. I do not think collective bargaining is cast in stone. I cannot stand in this House as a socialist and suggest we should have totally free enterprise in planning the economy. If labour leaders want to make that kind of a speech, that is fine. As a matter of fact they are making it in their own interests. That is a different segment of society. We want those members in this House who represent business rather than labour to be just as objective in advocating the prerogatives of business.

● (2050)

Mr. Leggatt: I wanted a little objectivity, and all of a sudden everybody is upset about the fact that they are looking after one segment of the society and not the other.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member has only a couple of minutes left, so I suggest he continue his speech.

Mr. Leggatt: In any event, Mr. Speaker, in terms of an industrial strategy I have one last point to make. By the way, British Columbia now has just about the highest unemployment in the country, in terms of the increase. We are up to 9.7 per cent.

Mr. Paproski: They are all former members of the NDP.

Mr. Leggatt: And they are about to lay-off 400 workers on the B.C. ferry system, which will not help the unemployment rate and will not help the economy of B.C. one bit.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

That is the kind of industrial strategy that I am urging upon this government: do not lay-off people because you see the bottom line. It is important that we keep all segments of our society working. If you do not have them working, then they will refuse to go along with any social consensus, and they have a perfect right to do that. You talk about redistribution of wealth in Canada. Since 1951 we have not seen anything changed. The bottom 20 per cent still get 4 per cent of the income in this country, and the top get 20 per cent.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You are out of order. You are not speaking from your place.

Mr. Leggatt: To wind up this thing, whatever it is—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member he has 30 seconds in which to wind it up.

Mr. Leggatt: The point I was making is that since 1951 we have been talking in this House about redistributing income, about making society fairer for all. The statistics are overwhelming. There has been no change—the richer have become richer, and the poorer have become poorer. If at least the government showed some sense of social justice, if at least it were willing to see some meaningful—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I have to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Leggatt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to thank the House for its kindness and I will make sure I speak from my place in accordance with the time honoured rules of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: Your whole speech is invalid.

Mr. Leggatt: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At least he did not speak with blue tongue.

Mr. Leggatt: —I did want to say that no industrial strategy—no matter which party puts it forward—will work in this country unless you develop a social contract. Have a look at what has happened in western Europe. There they have told the workers that if they limit their wage increases, they will redistribute wealth, they will see that at the bottom end of the tax structure inflation will not take away the well earned gains of the workers.

I do not see any proposal like that from our government. I do not see any proposal which attempts to accept, for example, the magnanimous gesture of the Canadian Labour Congress today asking to participate on an equal basis with the government and business in terms of planning the economy. Do not keep kicking the outstretched hand of labour in this country. Do not do it because, if you continue to do it, we will have social chaos. Nobody wants that kind of emergency to develop. Give some consideration to the people who work with their hands and who have low incomes in Canada. Give some consideration to developing a real social contract so that we can get together as a nation and fight inflation, redistribute wealth, and end what could happen in this country, namely, a flying apart of the various competing groups in a state which we cannot control.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when I read the motion before us today which says that the government has no industrial strategy, I have the impression that those who introduced it are surely unaware that we now have an industrial strategy.

It is perhaps imperfect or inadequate, according to some members, but I think that those who suggest there is no industrial strategy are insinuating that Canadian history begins with themselves, with the hon. member who introduced this motion. However, I must congratulate the hon. member on this motion which allows us to explain once more all the characteristics of the industrial strategy. During the oral question period or on the adjournment motion some questions were raised which appear again in the motion concerning Westinghouse and Dunlop. I think that the minister answered the questions which were asked but in this debate, it enables us to dwell more at length on the industrial strategy.

Let us first establish the areas of industrial activity and to that end, let me divide it into three sectors. We must first know what we are talking about in order to lay the foundations of an industrial strategy. So, there is the primary sector, which is the resources sector which includes renewable resources. In the primary sector, I would mention renewable resources, and I would also say that in the Western world, among industrial nations, Canada has a unique position in that it is self-sufficient as regards energy and raw materials. The secondary sector is composed of the two following groups of industries: the processing and the manufacturing industries. The tertiary sector is our industries and services sector. Over 50 per cent of jobs in Canada are in that sector, and half of it produces expendable items while the other half includes in about equal proportions personal and public or governmental services. Let us now state the objectives to be sought in planning the future development of our industries.

Then, we must fix the six key goals for the future development of our primary, secondary and tertiary industries. First, we must develop manufacturing and secondary processing industries which would be efficient and competitive at the international level to face the competition in Canada and even outside. Second, we must achieve a situation of full employment in Canadian industry to meet the present and future increase in manpower. Third, we must increase the national revenue and at the same time promote a regional economic expansion which would lessen the disparities between the various regions. Fourth, we must expand the processing of our natural resources in Canada to get the maximum profit out of them. Fifth, we have to establish better control over the Canadian economy and take action so that our future industrial development may be done by Canadians and for Canadians, and I believe that the hon. member who spoke before me mentioned the policy on foreign investment, which is one of the priorities. We must contribute to improving the quality of life in Canada, as certain hon. members said today, by reducing the unfavourable effects of industrial activities on our natural environment and social contacts.

Now, without going into the details of those objectives, I would like to mention a few programs which will support these objectives, these key point that I mentioned earlier. We can recognize at least 10 or so major programs which form the heart of the industrial strategy, that is our tax policy, our tarif and trade policy, our industrial support policy, our regional development policy, our labour policy, our competition policy, our foreign investment policy, our mining and energy resource policy, our transportation and communication policy and our environment policy.

I would like to mention a few concrete examples to show to what point it is not a question of developing today an industrial policy and to show to what point we have for several years had a true industrial strategy with specific objective, such as those that I mentioned. If you allow me to do so, I would like to mention certain instruments used to help the industry promote certain products, to expand on the domestic or export markets. I would like to mention also the equipment industry productivity program. We have a new program which allows the Canadian industry to benefit from all types of subsidies, the Industrial Design Assistance Program, which gives financial support aimed at reinforcing the competitives status of Canadian industry.

I will mention the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act, the SPACE Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology. The department is usually sharing 50 per cent of the costs of new and improved products and commercial processes development projects.

I will also mention the regional development grants. This is presently a very useful program, so necessary as an economic incentive for the areas where the industry would not establish itself. I could also mention the Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology, whose objective is to help industry—improve its technology, its innovation process, by subsidizing specific products and processes development and improvement projects. And contributions in this case may rise up to 50 per cent of the costs.

I will also mention the Industrial Research Assistance Program, which I have already alluded to. Then there is the Program for Export Market Development. This program has had a large popularity, considering that in 1975, the Export Development Corporation's contribution, through loans, insurance and guarantee, rose up to $2 billion, compared with $1.7 billion for the previous year, that is a 20 per cent increase.

I would like to mention that in respect of foreign investment guarantees, we have recorded a considerable increase. I would like thus to point out that this Export Development Corporation has been quite successful if we consider that in 1975, 40 agreements on loans were signed with foreign borrowers in order to support some Canadian exports. These agreements, including participation by banks, amounted to $1.135 billion which is a record since the creation of the corporation 30 years ago, and an increase of 72 per cent over last year's record of $659 million.

It is, therefore, another tool which can be used to assist industrial expansion. I could mention also another program, CASE, whose purpose is to help the management of small enterprises which often, because of rather rudimentary administrative structures and lack of resources, cannot secure expert services. So there is an assistance program to help small businesses. Some were already mentioned this afternoon. I want to refer to the performance of small businesses last year, in the light of the loans made by the Federal Business Development Bank. But before doing that I would like to say that last year since the CASE program was set up we helped scores of businesses, and over 325 last year.

In the area of assistance loans to small businesses, to which the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) was referring, I will say that if one considers the distribution of loans by provinces, there again the department also has an industrial strategy policy to help small businesses. I note, for example, the votes in effect on September 30, 1975. And in considering the number of businesses that benefitted from loans made by the Federal Business Development Bank—previously the Industrial Development Bank—one notes that in Quebec 4,899 businesses benefitted from loans; in Ontario, 7,255 businesses benefitted from loans; so the relative amounts are $680 million and $861 million which are the votes authorized for the period going from November 1, 1944 to September 30, 1975. There again is a policy, an element of our industrial strategy to help small businesses and make them more efficient.

Reference was made earlier to aeronautics, and I think in that respect I would refer hon. members to the statement by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) about the purchase of Canadair Ltd. from General Dynamics Corporation, of St. Louis, at the cost of $38 million. The minister stated at that time, and I quote:

> . . . that this way there will be excellent possibilities of restructuring the aircraft industry in Canada and getting a stable industry more controlled by Canadians, of developing excellent capabilities in the area of specialized commercial aircraft . . .

I will also mention the creation of about 3,000 new jobs by 1983. There again, you see that the department is actively looking after the aircraft industry.

I would also like to mention the famous Turnkey Projects. Policies are set up for Turnkey Projects Centres to improve Canadian participation in annual markets estimated at between $20 million and $50 million.

We now have a very good experience in the field of transports, forestry and airports. Here again, we can recognize that last year the Canadian companies have tendered for many Turnkey projects, whose foreign markets are presently estimated at more that $100 million. Before, Canadian bids on such projects were rather rare.

I would also like to mention one of our very interesting experiences in the manufacturing of trains; as far as the contract with the LRC is concerned, these trains are now built at the Bombardier factory in Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière.

[Mr. Roy (Laval).]

[English]

I should like to mention the gowth and importance of Canada's consulting and technical service industries in international markets. During the past 10 years the consulting and technical service industries have played an increasingly important role in Canada's international trade activities. It is estimated that this sector of the service industries which contribute more than one billion dollars annually to the Canadian economy consist of some 8,000 firms and export approximately 150 million dollars annually. During the period from 1970 to 1975 their exports have increased approximately 300 per cent. Their impact on Canada's international trade is not only reflected in the services they export but the role they play which leads to the export of manufactured products.

● (2110)

For example, in virtually every case it is the consulting engineer or management consultant which takes the lead in promoting the sale of large capital projects abroad. In 1972 actual Canadian equipment orders for projects on which Canadian consultants were involved totalled $90.3 million. Potential equipment orders were estimated at $343 million.

Mr. Speaker, I think that all these policies have contributed to underline the importance of this aspect and to give the most encouraging results, if we take into account that from 1965 to 1970 we created more than 1,200,000 new jobs, a fact which the minister for Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) mentioned during the debate this afternoon, and if we take into account the number of new jobs created in Canada, about 1,500,000 jobs for the last five years. I think that these figures indicate that Canada has an industrial strategy policy. If we go on implementing this policys, we will contribute to the development of the Canadian economy.

I am very grateful to the hon. member, and I do congratulate him, for proposing this motion which gave us the opportunity to study the present situation, which will help putting new pressures for the development of new measures.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling).

An hon. Member: Now we will get the truth.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Now we will get the truth, yes.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) for putting this motion on the Order Paper today. It is certainly a subject that should be talked about although we have already covered it many times already in the question period and in committee. The unemployment figures of today, the disastrous balance sheet, and the global prospects that we foresee, make it imperative that this type of debate should take place.

The key words in the motion are "lack of an industrial strategy", "job losses", "falling production", "uncertainty" and "761,000 Canadians are without jobs". I could not help but feel when listening to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Roy) that he must have used the Canada Year Book to put his remarks together. If we were to take what he said as gospel we would not have so many unemployed people, we would not have the disastrous trade balance; instead we would have a buoyant economy.

I might say at this point, Mr. Speaker, that although the minister is not here tonight he had the courtesy to call and explain that he had a prior engagement, in Vancouver, I believe, and apologized for not being here. I wish to thank him for that courtesy.

Mr. Blais: No curve?

Mr. Kempling: What we are really concerned about is the lack of an industrial strategy. We have heard the minister who occupied the portfolio of industry, trade and commerce in the twenty-ninth parliament and the present minister claim that it is impossible to put forth an industrial strategy for Canada. I am sure the present minister has said that at least 15 or 20 times in committee before he changed his tune and said we are developing a sectoral strategy and may have 15 or 20 different strategies for Canada.

We have had eight years of government led by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and in that time we have had talking, waffling, programs, studies, seminars, and meetings, but the net result is that we are in the worst trade position we have ever been in; we have the highest interest rates in the western world and the highest mortgage rates in the western world. All we get from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce are alphabet programs and slogans, while the trade deficit grows and the minister forecasts another deficit for next year. We see no strategy, only a retrenchment and a discouraging picture for people involved in industry.

I used to have a great deal of respect for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the people who work there. For years I have defended them and said I thought they were some of the most expert people in government in the western world in regard to trade. When we look at what has happened, however, they must shoulder their share of the blame. They are charged with the responsibility of putting these programs together, although I will admit they have not had very good direction. The former minister of industry, trade and commerce had made a total disaster of the portfolio of science and technology as well; now he is in the energy portfolio and it is in a mess. It seems that they move him in everywhere there is a disaster. As his present department states in its television advertising, if I may paraphrase it, the problem is that he is not part of the solution, he is the problem.

I sometimes wonder what we should do with people in the department who bring forth these programs which fall apart. Perhaps we should hire them on a five-year contract. If they are to be charged with the responsibility of directing industry and the so-called industrial strategy then perhaps you should put them on the same basis as industry. In industry if you do not produce you are out. Maybe that is what we should do here; have these people on a five-year contract and say, "Produce or get out". They should be charged with the responsibility of bringing forth these programs, but should they have all this security?

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) on a point of order.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, it seems peculiar to me that since it was the New Democratic Party that called for an opposition day today, they should only have one member in the House to support their motion.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

● (2120)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members seem to be concerned as to who is in the House. I do not think that helps the debate; and when hon. members count the members present, that does not help the image of this House. Perhaps hon. members will remember this.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. For the sake of the record—I know the hon. member would not want the record to be incorrect—I point out that three of our members are present. One of them is consulting with one of his colleagues on an important matter. Because he is on the side opposite to me and the hon. member can only see the back of his head, I suggest that the hon. member should see his eye doctor.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I also note that three or four committees are meeting this evening and some hon. members who would normally be in the House are attending those committee meetings.

I was talking about the staff of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and saying that perhaps we should put them on the same footing as we put industry. In other words, let us make contracts with them. Then, if they do not produce good programs and implement them properly, we can replace them. In other words, they should either produce or get out. That is the way it is in the business world; perhaps we should explain that to them.

Jobs are created when someone has an idea for a product or service. A person identifies a market. Then he needs money, people, plant, and equipment, to bring the product to the market. He needs the motive of a profit, and confidence that the economy will not fall apart. But he also needs to know that the government is in touch with reality, and is concerned about inflation and foreign trade. And what has happened today?

At present we have 761,000 Canadians unemployed. And what do we hear the government say? We hear the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) making his PR-type announcements to the effect that Canadians do not know their own identity, and so on. Let me tell him that those 761,000 unemployed Canadians know who they are. They are not concerned about the type of identity about which the minister is concerned. They want jobs today; they want pride, something to hold on to; they want to hold their heads up in society and be part of the economic scene.

The young people I have talked to want a job, a home, a car, a cottage in the north—

Mr. Gillies: And a change of government.

Mr. Kempling: They want a change of government. That is right. You know, the final arbiter of this debate will not be the House of Commons; it will be the people of Canada. The 761,000 unemployed are part of the population of Canada and will cast their votes accordingly.

I am about to talk about the government's budgets and the spending estimates, but as the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Drury) has entered the chamber, let me say a few words about a subject which concerns him. We had an interesting debate the other day on science and technology. His department is part of the problem. We heard the parliamentary secretary talking about the development of Canadian industry. He ought to talk to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) about the effects of section 12 of the AIB regulations on research and development. Will the minister do something about that particular section? I hope he will, and I hope he will talk to his colleagues about it because at present it is a disaster.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: If we are concerned about what is happening to our industry we should be concerned about cutbacks in research and development at the university level. Just look at the programs the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has cut back. It has cut back several industrial and research development programs.

The parliamentary secretary spoke at length about the loans the federal business development bank is giving businessmen. Let's not kid ourselves. Those loans are granted at up to 3 per cent above the going rate the banks will charge, if they lend the money. The federal institution is not giving our businessmen any gifts. Look at the Small Business Loans Act and think of the anguish people go through trying to get a loan under the Small Business Loans Act. Then look at the MOSST report on venture capital in Canada. I suggest hon. members should read what it says.

In a few days the government plans to bring down a budget which will look ahead about ten months. You know, other western countries bring down budgets which look two, three, even five years ahead but we are content to look between ten and 12 months ahead.

Profit is the greatest incentive to investment; inflation and uncertainty are the greatest disincentives to investment. We should reflect on that, because when you go out into the real world and talk to people with money to invest you will find that many have put their money in the short-term money market or savings accounts. Why do they not invest it? They have no confidence in the future. There are too many uncertainties, too many year-end philosophizing statements by the Prime Minister on where the "new" economy will go. We must straighten these things out if we are to develop an industrial strategy in this country.

I am particularly annoyed about the attitude of some people who are given responsibility for some industrial programs. Sometimes after a committee meeting I have walked out of the committee room behind some of the departmental people who have attended the meeting, and heard comments made about "snivelling businessmen," those being "snivelling businessmen" who appeared before the committee. I say that attitude is absolutely disgraceful.

[Mr. Gillies.]

The big battle, which will come sooner than later in this country, will be between people who produce taxes and people who consume taxes. Sooner or later those who are operating businesses, working, and paying taxes, and those who are consuming those taxes will meet head on and, let me tell you, it will be one awful battle.

When I consider the government's so-called industrial strategy one of the things that strikes me is what appears to be the complete absence of co-ordination between the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, DREE, and the Department of Finance. Let me put some examples on record.

The Department of Transport has set up a consortium which is to work with the shipping people in Canada to build a series of vessels. The motor vessel Arctic is now under construction at Port Weller. A certain Canadian company submitted a bid on some deck cranes with which the vessel was to be equipped. What happened? They submitted their bid; there were no specifications. After they had put their bid in they told the shipping people that the cranes were of 85 per cent Canadian content. The people who make the decisions in Canada Steamship Lines said to them, "Don't mention Canadian content; that will be a mark against you." The crane people said, "Our cranes are of 85 per cent Canadian content." The shipping people said, "Don't mention that."

And what happened? The government people ended up giving the order to a company in Norway. Ten of these vessels are to be built, and all sorts of merchant vessels are being built in the United States which will use this equipment. The Canadian company developed a market for its product. Although this was an opportunity to introduce a new product which had never before been manufactured in Canada to the Canadian scene, despite the fact that there was a chance to get in on the ground floor, the order was given to a company in Norway.

When the people I talked to looked into this matter, they were flabbergasted, astounded. They were told that the company in Norway will supply a crane using low pressure hydraulics, because that is necessary. That, I submit, was a bunch of garbage. My own company just finished a series of tests on some cranes mounted on crawler tractors which are to be used in the high Arctic. The particular crane in question was chosen because it uses a high pressure hydraulics system, which, in our cold weather tests and in our cold weather environment, is much more efficient than a low pressure system.

That is the only reason they gave. Price was not a factor. It was not a case of low bid or anything else. The prices were relatively close. There was no specification whatsoever.

There is a case of a small manufacturer in my area. He makes, of all things, clay pigeons. Some hon. members may have read about this recently in the paper. There are 35 million clay pigeons consumed in Canada yearly. Searle Industries manufactures 25 million of these. The balance is made in British Columbia, and by another small company in Hamilton. The industry is actually in a position today of oversupply. This person has approximately 10 million clay pigeons in stock.

What do you think has happened? The Department of Regional Economic Expansion gave a $65,000 grant to a company from France which is going to put up a clay pigeon manufacturing plant in Quebec. Here we have a company in Hamilton whose employees are on half time, or unemployed and drawing unemployment insurance, and we will now have a new plant that is going to supply a market that is already in an oversupply situation. What sort of nonsense is that?

When we talked to the regional people at DREE, they said that seven new gun clubs are starting up and that will look after this industry. That is a lot of nonsense. With the automated plant now in operation, they can turn out these clay pigeons.

For the Olympics they will not be using clay pigeons made in Canada. They will be imported from France, even though this man has ten million in inventory. How ridiculous can we get!

There is no coordination between DREE, Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the Department of Finance. We have had on-again off-again capital cost allowances. Where does that leave us? I wonder whether some of the people in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce have ever had anything to do with business or whether they simply came out of the academic world into government and decided to tell how everything is to be done.

When you are planning and developing a business, time is a very important factor. It takes time to develop a market, time to develop sources of capital, and time to train people. What our business people really need is a development policy that will give them time. They need a span of years in order to put together the various ingredients that make up a business.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, listening to interventions by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) it seemed as though they were looking so closely at the trees they lost their capacity to see the forest. One wonders where they have been for the past 30 years. When preparing their speeches they did not look at what has happened in the past 30 years.

In the past 30 years there has been a rapid increase in our industrial growth. We have developed a strong steel industry, as well as pulp and paper, chemical, oil and gas, plastics, synthetic fibre, plate glass, aluminum, electronics, to mention just a few. We are now manufacturing different types of heavy industrial equipment as well as a very wide range of consumer and durable goods which we export.

Today manufactured goods account for 40 per cent of our total exports as compared to about 10 per cent 20 years ago. As for minerals, we are now processing and refining more of these here in Canada before exporting them. For instance, in the past we used to export raw iron ore; now we process this into iron ore pellets. The same applies to copper and nickel, as well as forest products.

Canada participated in the Kennedy Round of negotiations to remove tariff barriers to world trade in progressive stages. Canada depends on exports and it is to our advantage to have world markets open to us.

We signed the auto pact with the United States to ensure that more of the manufacturing of the cars we buy is done in Canada. This pact has resulted in the growth of our auto parts industry. The pact accounts for a significant portion of our finished exports.

We modernized our ports and went in for container shipping to maximize the advantages of our St. Lawrence Seaway. We are now manufacturing 2,000 new rail cars to transport our wheat and other bulk export products. We established Panarctic to own outright the major share of any future development of our northern resources. We established the CRTC which has resulted in the growth of a Canadian radio and television program industry. We now rank third in the world in the production of musical records. Our government has considerably increased the amounts of money available as loans to small companies, as well as the grants for research.

We formulated a foreign policy clearly aimed at expanding the scope of our export markets. We signed trade agreements with the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China which led to huge sales of grain. Because of our bilingual character we not only have an affiliation with the British Commonwealth countries but we have an affiliation with the French-speaking nations of the world. During the past few years our trade with the Francophone nations almost doubled, and in the future we can look forward to a steady growth in these markets.

We established the Export Development Corporation in 1969. This was very well described by the parliamentary secretary. This was done to put an emphasis on exports. It is essential because Canada depends on exports to maintain our high standard of living and our jobs.

We established the Canada Development Corporation, described earlier by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik), to finance new Canadian industries and buy shares in existing Canadian companies that are expanding. As recently as last week there was a report that the United States government was about to place an order with Bombardier for highly industrialized products in the amount of $36 million. This is possible because of the technology and know-how developed in Canada over the years.

There are two other areas, perhaps of lesser importance, but significant for cultural and aesthetic reasons. We have done extremely well in the field of developing Canadian fashions and the sale of Canadian books, particularly in Europe.

There are areas in which we have to improve our performance, making sure that we keep up with changing technology and the very keen and competitive production in other nations. However, it seems to me we have laid a sound base for our present and future growth.

We do have to deal with the difficulties which are characteristic of the seventies, of course. First, we have to keep in mind that automation is replacing manpower at a faster rate than in past decades; we must therefore intensify our efforts to retrain workers as some industries become obsolete and others offer new opportunities. Then again we have to take into account the existence of stiffer competition for export markets. We must also give thoughtful consideration to the rapid depletion of our environmental resources.

I notice that the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) is to speak next. I know that in his usual way he will make a learned and well-documented speech based upon the facts and upon solid information. If he does this, I am sure he will be bound to reach the conclusion that the Government of Canada has done well for the nation.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) for indicating I might do some of those things, but I am afraid I shall have to disappoint him.

I am surprised that so little has been said in this debate by other government spokesmen or the official opposition about their attitude toward an industrial strategy for Canada. One of the things for which the New Democratic Party took some credit in the last parliament was the development of a review board to assess foreign take-overs. We, in that minority parliament, were proud of our contribution to this policy; we thought that an industrial strategy would develop as a consequence—a strategy of making sure that if any further foreign industry were allowed into Canada the industry concerned would be serving a purpose of value to the Canadian people. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the government, as has been the case so often in the past, took a very good idea and failed to follow through. The intention was to enable the Canadian public to have the benefit, whenever possible, of the gains which could be expected by allowing certain American companies to enter this country.

We might have used this system to make sure that U.S. companies coming to Canada did something for Canadians for a change, rather than for themselves. We might have made it possible for Canadian citizens to participate in the ownership of those companies. But what has happened? There have been no reports forthcoming as to the concessions Canada has made when allowing U.S. take-overs. My hon. friends have documented cases involving Dunlop, Firestone, White Industries, and a number of other companies to show that once again we have sold out the Canadian public for the sake of the introduction of U.S. capital into this country and the experience which may flow from it. But, Mr. Speaker, such industry is always used for the benefit of Americans; it seldom does much more than provide menial jobs at the lower end of the activity in Canada.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I heard a number of hon. members deploring the worsening in our relationship between industry and labour and consequent loss of production through work stoppages. Some of them referred to the number of days which had been lost as a result of strikes. They referred sadly to the fact that we may have lost 10 million man-hours in strikes last year.

An hon. Member: Eleven million man-hours.

Mr. Peters: I stand corrected. And because of this, certain members of the House would scrap the whole of our procedures in the field of labour relations, the whole of the grievance procedure, everything we have built up in this area over the years. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that those who complained so bitterly about the loss of those man-hours were weeping crocodile tears. Nobody who has any brains in this House really believes that those 11 million lost hours matter a damn.

Let me draw attention to the fact that at the present time 7 per cent of our population is unemployed. In numerical terms this amounts to some 750,000, and some of them have been unemployed for years. Two thousand hours make up an industrial man year. If we multiply 2,000 man-hours by 750,000 we come up with a figure of 1,500 billion. That is the number of man-hours we have lost over a year because of unemployment. Those who weep crocodile tears over the 11 million man-hours lost through strikes forget about the other 1,489,000,000 which have been lost because of unemployment.

It is a sad thing for this country to find itself controlled by a government which has for years suffered from a C. D. Howe philosophy. His philosophy was to engineer a deal, engineer any deal which would cause a flow one way or the other—it didn't matter as long as there was a flow. But the flow has almost invariably been in the wrong direction. It is true we have expanded our steel industry, it is true we have increased the scale of our manufacturing. Which country in the world has not? Italy, which is almost bankrupt, has done so. And so has England. We sure as hell do not want to get into that group just because we want to put our achievements in a good light. Just think how much better off we could be, how much richer we could be, if we could use those 1,500 billion man-hours lost through unemployment, if we could find gainful occupations for these people.

We have heard talk about the fight that will take place between those who are paying taxes and those who are receiving the benefits of those taxes. I hear statements also that unemployment insurance is being abused. It is being abused. It is being abused by the government mainly. It is being abused by a large section of industry which is operated at 60 per cent capacity; it is also being abused by a very few people who are recipients of it. But I know that most of the people who are receiving unemployment benefits and who come to my office are anxious to get a job; if a job were available they would prefer to take it. But no job is made available.

Anyone who considers the regional transportation arrangements made in this country must wonder what has happened to national industrial strategy. We have continued to bring people to the cities rather than take jobs to the people.

Members on the other side have referred to trade missions. I have talked to many people who have travelled across the world representing Canada on trade missions and they are not proud of our trade representatives overeas. Our trade people do not know whom they should talk to in the various business fields. Our ambassadors are eunuchs when it comes to developing trade and assisting our representatives travelling abroad. Let us start using the good people that we have.

Tomorrow we are going to make one of the most stupid expenditures we have ever made, Mr. Speaker. We are probably going to tell Lockheed in the United States that we will back the U.S. government if the U.S. government will back Lockheed in building us 18 Orion aircraft. Why do we want these aircraft? It is for military prestige. They are prestige aircraft. These aircraft are not worth a damn when it comes to saving sailors lost at sea or for supervising our 200 mile coastal limit. And let us not forget that we have the longest coastline in the world. What is more, Mr. Speaker, I am sure we do not have enough fuel to fly these aircraft at 500 or 600 miles an hour at 40,000 or 50,000 feet along our coastline. This operation can be done by satellite and it will not require the expenditure of any money.

We once had the potential in this country to build one of the best aircraft ever made. I have had some experience of the aircraft industry over a number of years, both in the air force and in aircraft factories, including those in Montreal and Toronto. It is my opinion that when we built the Arrow the mistake was not in the building of it; the mistake was made by the government of the day in that it did not blackmail all the other NATO countries, as they do us, into placing orders for the aircraft. We could not get any orders for the aircraft and so we could not make up our mind whether it should be a light bomber, a fighter aircraft, or what. As a result we built a kind of utility plane that required so much equipment to fly it that we could not fly it very far.

That plane was way ahead of its time and, in my opinion, the Arrow could still out-compete most of the aircraft in the world today. The trouble was that we did not have the ability to sell it. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we had no industrial strategy.

The government never made one sale of that aircraft. It built the damned plane but did not know what to do with it, so the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), because he did not like the president of the company, cut it up with a torch. I do not think there is one left in Canada today to give an indication of our former potential and in the aeronautical field.

Certainly we do not need the Orion. With 18 Orion aircraft we are not going to save Europe. Neither are we going to supervise our 200 mile coastal limit. However, with the technology we have in Canada we can still build aircraft. We could build an aircraft along the lines of the Otter and the Lear jet that we are going to build for Mr. Lear. This would be a plane that would meet our requirements and leave us with some money to build ships and equipment to save sailors lost off our coasts, fishermen who are in dire need of protection and have not been getting it.

I am surprised that government members should only speak of what they have accomplished. In these days of austerity, which is more apparent outside than inside the House, I am sure the government is planning things it would like to accomplish if it had the wherewithal. I am equally sure the government is considering developing further our industrial potential. However, we cannot compete with a highly industrialized country like the United States. How in the hell do we think we will ever get into that market?

Mr. Railton: Really, what language.

Mr. Peters: I think there are some people in the Nipissing area who might understand that kind of language rather than the pussyfooting we have heard about in the House today from some government members.

Surely the government has some kind of program for developing a national industrial strategy. It should be able to tell us why it has not been able to make the Foreign Investment Review Act work. Some of the regulations under the act have not yet been passed, and I doubt whether some parts have even been proclaimed.

Mr. Blais: Of course it has been proclaimed.

Mr. Peters: There are other acts that the government has not yet got around to proclaiming. Whether I refer to this act or to other acts, they are not working. I should like to see them all in operation and being effective.

It seems that we are rich enough for the government to regard 7 per cent unemployment as normal. I suggest we should tell municipalities which say a lot of people on unemployment insurance should be made to work that if these people were not getting unemployment insurance this country would be bankrupt. I say that unemployment insurance is a Godsend and is a stabilizing factor for many municipalities in this country. At a time when we see ourselves going back to long skirts and playing music like the Charleston of the 1920's, I am sure Liberal and Conservative members must think it is difficult to develop a national industrial strategy that will transform us, from being hewers of wood and drawers of water, into an industrial nation.

Mr. Andras: The word is "hewers".

Mr. Peters: Well, Mr. Speaker, if I have left out a line I am sure the Hansard reporter will put it in.

It seems that over the next two or three years things are not going to get any better. Unemployment will continue to be a major problem, and it looks as though the government is sitting back and waiting for the next war. The Liberals and Conservatives know that this would end unemployment, as it did before. It will start up the factories, as it did before. But we of the New Democratic Party say we must have a better industrial strategy than one that is geared for war. Rather it should be geared to peace. We should be working hard to provide jobs for all Canadians and we should quit pussyfooting around with United States industry, which we have allowed to control a large portion of our industry and energy resources. I say a national industrial strategy can be developed that would provide jobs for all Canadians, one that will bring along Canadians toward further progress in the twentieth century, as I am sure they want to be brought along.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being ten o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to section (11) of Standing Order 58 proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—STUDY OF FUNDY TIDAL POWER—DATE OF COMMENCEMENT

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on November 28, 1974, the then minister of energy, mines and resources, our present Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), issued a joint statement with the premiers of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia announcing that a study program would be undertaken to review, update, and extend the Atlantic tidal power programming board's report released in October, 1969, entitled "Feasibility of Tidal Power Development in the Bay of Fundy".

● (2200)

Despite repeated requests from my colleagues and myself it was not until March of this year, 16 months later, that the initiation of this study was announced. On June 2 of last year the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Foster) told me, as recorded at page 6370 of Hansard, that federal and provincial officials would meet within a week to "allocate specific study work projects and arrange for their execution". Yet it was not until nine months later that the study was announced. The federal government has been dragging its heels on the matter of Fundy tidal power.

When the announcement was made in the press release, the first phase of studies was announced and they were very accurately identified. On page 4 of the news release, in the first paragraph we find the following:

> Other aspects of the first phase studies include consideration of socio-economic and environmental aspects which will be carried out concurrently with the foregoing major task studies. These aspects are now in the process of being defined and it is anticipated study contracts will be arranged shortly.

That was two months ago today.

As a result of this shortsightedness by the government, we in the Atlantic region find ourselves facing staggering energy costs. It is not my intention to repeat earlier speeches I have made pointing out the advantages Fundy power would have energywise and industrially, not just for the Atlantic region but for the entire country.

It is also my hope that the gravity of the situation is well understood by the government following the recent debate on energy in the Atlantic provinces. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) summed up my feelings so ably that day by stating that Canada does not prosper unless all of Canada prospers.

Maritimers cannot help but note the contrast between the alacrity with which the federal government has leaped into an investment of $300 million, or more, in the Syncrude project in Alberta and the indifference it displays to tidal power development possibilities of the Bay of Fundy. The two situations have much in common. In a world increasingly conscious of an impending energy shortage, both represent the possible development of very large quantities of energy now lying dormant. The difference is that the Alberta tar sands, vast though their extent may be, contain a fossil fuel as their active ingredient. Like conventional oil wells or coal deposits, they are subject to depletion and eventual exhaustion. The Fundy tides, on the contrary, represent a permanent source of energy which, barring a global catastrophe, are as likely to be as productive a million years from now as they could be today.

There are other differences, of course. Fundy is located in a region of Canada to which Ottawa's traditional attitude is one of indifference. We are not opposed to getting all the oil we can from the tar sands of Alberta. We have seen some ominous forecasts of serious energy shortages rushing upon the world. Canada is blessed with abundant energy sources of a number of kinds. We would be in default if we neglected to utilize any of them, whether tar of tides. We should get busy on both.

Had Fundy proceeded in the late 1960's it would be well under way by now. Costs rise every day as money loses purchasing power every day. The price of Fundy in 1969, far from being expensive, was cheap relative to the price of Fundy in 1976.

Ineptitude, wedded to confusion and knee-deep in indecision and procrastination, mark this program like so many others that are essential to the region and national purpose. There are people in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and DREE who are capable, willing, and who desire to get on with the assigned task. Surely it is time that the people who can and will do the job were allowed to get on with it.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I wish to respond to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie).

The joint federal-provincial feasibility study on the development of tidal power in the Bay of Fundy commenced during this past year. The study is being carried out under the direction of a federal-provincial management committee in accordance with an agreement between the Government of Canada and the governments of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

The management committee awarded contracts involving nine major engineering consulting firms in specific task areas relating to the design of tidal power plants, optimization of tidal power schemes, and the marketing and transmission of tidal power in accessible marketing areas.

In addition, arrangements have been made with the ocean and aquatic sciences branch of the federal Department of the Environment to acquire special data relative to the tidal phenomenon in the Bay of Fundy and to develop a mathematical model to analyse the effects that one or more major tidal power developments in the Bay of Fundy would have on the tidal regime.

Contractual arrangements are also being developed to carry out preliminary studies on socio-economic and environmental aspects of developing tidal power in the Bay of Fundy area.

It is expected that the phase I element of the current study will be completed in the early months of 1977.

I understand that the first stage will be completed early this summer and the second stage will then be carried out during the later half of 1976.

Since tidal power is primarily an energy-oriented matter it is appropriate that the federal responsibility for the current joint study program remain with the federal Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In regard to physical presence in the area, it is pointed out that both the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are represented in all aspects of the study as well as the over-all review board by senior personnel from the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission and the Nova Scotia Power Corporation. Hence there is every opportunity for input of local knowledge and provincial considerations in respect to both electrical energy supply and industrial development considerations on this most important project.

AGRICULTURE—COW-CALF STABILIZATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ALBERTA PROPOSAL—POSSIBLE DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the question with which I wish to deal arises out of one of the series of questions which I have posed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) over the last six to eight months. This one was specifically put on January 30. The questions were put in an attempt to badger the minister into doing something for the very hard pressed cow-calf sector of the beef industry, to do something, I might add, which the minister had promised not only on his political haymaking excursions into western Canada but indeed here in the House of Commons and to the press.

The question I posed on January 30, as recorded at 10480 of Hansard, was as follows:

> Can the minister advise the House whether a federal-provincial cow-calf stabilization program is being developed and whether any progress has been made in efforts to shore-up this badly shaken industry?

The minister replied that he was still having discussions. He stated:

> A program will start on January 1, 1976 and terminate at the end of December, 1976, covering the calendar year for beef in Canada.

It is now the end of May, going into June. We have no beef stabilization program and it appears obvious that the cow-calf producers can expect absolutely nothing—zilch. Quite frankly, the period in which any aid or assistance could be given to them is pretty well passed inasmuch as the serious impact on the cow-calf industry was in the fall and in early winter.

The minister has viewed every conceivable ploy imaginable to blame for his failure to come through and fulfill his commitment. He has blamed the Canadian cattlemen, the stock growers, and the provinces, but he himself has not accepted any blame or responsibility. We know that the intervention by the federal government in bringing forth a beef policy which varied around 29 or 30 times over a period of 18 months had a lot to do and contributed immeasurably to the plight of beef producers, but particularly the cow-calf producer.

All we had in terms of support for the cow-calf industry were empty promises. The actions of the minister in this regard constitute a litany of broken promises.

We started with the Agricultural Stabilization Act, which we debated in this House about a year ago. It was given Royal Assent on July 31. It was heralded as a major advance in national farm policy. What did this do for the cow-calf industry? It did absolutely nothing, but there was much hot air from the minister's mouth. On September 19 an article by Armin Hecht in the Edmonton Journal read in part as follows:

● (2210)

> A federal cow-calf stabilization program will be announced in two weeks at the earliest, federal Agriculture Minister Eugene Whelan's office said Thursday.
> The plan will be similar to the federal government's stabilization plan for fat cattle.
> Officials in Mr. Whelan's department are working feverishly at the program, a spokesman in the minister's office said. Things are complicated because it will be the first time two separate plans will cover the same commodity.

This kind of fever only produced convulsions from the minister, as far as I am concerned. The article went on to say:

> Officials in Mr. Whelan's office said if there is anyone who can make a cow-calf subsidy program workable, it will be Mr. Whelan.
> The minister is fully aware of the depressed state of the industry and is concerned that the plan is not yet in operation, his office said.

His concern can only be categorized as much less than genuine.

On December 20, 1975, again quoting from the Edmonton Journal:

> Alberta Agriculture Minister Marvin Moore is optimistic that long bogged-down talks to create a cow-calf income stabilization program may soon result in success.
> After meeting with federal Agriculture Minister Eugene Whelan and his provincial counterparts, Mr. Moore said he expects an early decision by Ottawa on a proposal to salvage the badly shaken industry.

It went on to say:

> A cow-calf assistance program would be available very quickly—if it were up to federal Agriculture Minister Eugene Whelan.
> He is very happy with the Alberta proposal, provincial Agriculture Minister Marvin Moore said Friday.

It has been the same old litany of broken promises.

Then on January 29 a headline in the Edmonton Journal read, "Aid for cow-calf operators 'slim' ". The article stated in part:

> Chances that Ottawa will still come up with a cow-calf support program are pretty slim, a source in federal Agriculture Minister Eugene Whelan's office has indicated.

So there we have it. We can only gather from those statements in the press that if the minister ever had any clout in the cabinet he has lost it. It is obvious he cannot convince his cabinet colleagues to come forth and assist in shoring up a badly shaken industry, and I do not know why the minister has not come clean and told the producers of this country that he cannot do anything for them, rather than beating around the bush with this political garble. The minister is, and has been guilty of misleading the cow-calf producers of this country into believing that something was going to be done while he knew all along that nothing could be done. He searched for excuses. His answers in the House have been evasive and flippant, almost to the point of being devious at some times.

In the end the minister has betrayed the cow-calf producers, and he should be and shall be reminded of this at every opportunity. He has not acted in good faith with the producers. He has failed to accept his rightful responsibility and obligation to the cow-calf producers, and from here on we will have suspicions about the minister's motives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translations]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, during the three years and a half I have been sitting in this House, I have seldom heard such nonsense.

[English]

Mr. Pelletier: The Agricultural Stabilization Act names cattle as one of the named commodities. Cattle, of course, was a named commodity in the original stablization act, and this was not changed in the amendments last year. As the House knows, the minimum mandatory support for named commodities under the amended act is 90 per cent of the average price of the last five years adjusted for changes in production costs in the current year as compared with the average production costs of the last five years. Ever since the original 1958 legislation "cattle" has been interpreted to mean slaughter cattle. We continue to consider that the named commodity, cattle, is represented by slaughter cattle. The same principle is applied to hogs and to sheep with the named commodity being market hogs and market lambs.

There has, of course, been considerable discussion about the desirability of having a stabilization program for the cow-calf sector of the beef industry. Some of the provinces have implemented such programs. As I have indicated on earlier occasions, we have also considered providing support for this sector as a designated commodity under the act. This is a complex issue because of the nature of the industry, the conflicting views of cow-calf producers as to the desirability of having a program, and due to the fact that some provinces now have individual programs.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words to the official answer of the department and respond to some of the hon. member's allegations which I think are absolutely inconceivable. The Progressive Conservative members are the first to say that if we want to carry out a national program, we must consult. When we do so and they do not agree, we must reach a consensus; it takes time and if we acted unilaterally, they would be the first ones to complain about it. The hon. member referred to a few articles in the Edmonton Journal in which the minister is quoted as saying he is ready to develop a cow-calf program. Of course, the minister is ready. Now, are the provinces ready as well? Alberta wants one thing. Quebec, British Columbia want something else, Ontario wants yet another thing. They must come to an agreement. If we are to develop a national program, all provinces must be in agreement.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the answer is very simple. This program, after some discussion, is still at the experimental stage, there are some problems with a few provinces at present but as soon as they are solved, the government will carry out a national program that will satisfy all provinces.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 2 o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.19 p.m.

REQUEST IMPORT OF TEXTILES BE REGULATED TO PROTECT EMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

Considering the enormous decrease in the employment level in the textile industry in Canada and considering that this is one of the most important industries, in particular in the eastern part of the country because of the policy concerning textile imports which affect our own jobs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau):

That this House urge the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to take position openly in favour of the Canadian people who are in the textile industry and to propose to the House a new set of regulations governing textile imports, the first objective being to protect jobs in Canada and have Canadians consume Canadian rather than foreign products, so that our own investments are protected by our legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There being not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

REQUEST FOR STUDY TO FIND ALTERNATIVE METHOD OF DESTROYING SPRUCE BUDWORM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

Considering the massive use of chemical insecticides in eastern Canada, especially in Quebec, to control the spruce budworm thus seriously threatening the ecological balance and giving rise to disastrous effects since the infestation of our forests by the budworm is increasing in spite of all the efforts made, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the House discuss at once that problem and order that a thorough study be made and published on present conditions to take the necessary decisions to preserve the environment while controlling that evil by other means such as biological insecticides.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR DELAY IN ANNOUNCING DETAILS OF FINANCING—POSSIBILITY GOVERNMENT WILL PROVIDE FINANCING

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Following yesterday's cabinet meeting the Minister of National Defence said on four occasions in the House that he would be making a statement today on the LRPA contract. Our understanding now is that no such statement will be made. I should like to find out just what profound reason has forced the minister to break that commitment. I should like the Prime Minister to tell the House whether he was directly a party to yesterday's decision and is the decision taken yesterday, which the Minister of National Defence said he would announce today, now under review by the government?

● (1410)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, essentially, what happened is this: the financing of the purchase of the long-range patrol aircraft from Lockheed was planned with the banks acting as intermediaries. We heard over the weekend that the banks could not put this financing together and the government is presently looking at other methods of proceeding with its plan to participate in NATO and other general defence areas with the purchase of the long-range patrol aircraft.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the government has changed its mind yet again on this matter between yesterday and today. Can the Prime Minister say whether a decision was taken yesterday that the government itself would provide interim financing on this matter, and whether that decision taken yesterday, the announcement of which was promised today, is now again under review?

Mr. Fairweather: It is in escrow.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on the matter of finding the necessary funds for purchasing this aircraft, it was decided by cabinet yesterday that the government would try alternative schemes to borrowing money from the banks. Such schemes have not been produced yet. We are still looking at the proposition.

Mr. Clark: Was the statement the Minister of National Defence promised to make today simply to be a statement that the government was looking at other means of interim financing, or—and I am sorry to repeat myself but we have not had an answer—had a decision been taken yesterday to the effect that the government itself would provide the interim financing on this matter? If that decision was taken, was the Prime Minister himself party to it and has there now been a change in that decision?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the decision had been that the government would provide the interim financing in ways which had to be arrived at and put together. That has not been done yet.

Mr. Clark: So that we might put a stop to what is rapidly becoming a Marx Brothers comedy on the other side—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —can the Prime Minister tell us why the government was in a position to make a decision yesterday about an announcement, or why the minister said that a sufficient but firm decision had been taken that there would be an announcement today, and now there is not to be an announcement. What has changed overnight?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition should realize that to put together a package of a few hundred million dollars is not as easy as he assumes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): How about smiling Jim Richardson? Did he think it was easy?

Mr. Paproski: Where is he, back on the reservation?

[Mr. Clark.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, either the opposition wants a serious discussion of this subject or they do not. If they do, I suggest they should listen; if they do not they will continue interrupting.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I cannot believe my ears.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, what changed overnight?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying in my answer a few minutes ago, the government is determined to live up to its commitment to NATO and our other partners, and to proceed with the purchase of the long-range patrol aircraft.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Because of our restraint program, Mr. Speaker, the decision was made—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Here is the Defence Minister now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Are you still smiling, Jim?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should wait for a supplementary question.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR TABLING ASSURANCE OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT OF VIABILITY OF COMPANY

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Minister of National Defence repeated the commitment of the Prime Minister to table assurances by the United States government about the economic viability of Lockheed Corporation. Will the Prime Minister now table these assurances so that this House can make a careful assessment of how solid the ground is for whatever decision the government ultimately makes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, I missed part of the question. If it concerns the purchase of the long-range patrol aircraft from the Lockheed aircraft company, let me say we told the House that when the deal is signed, sealed and delivered, the government would table the relevant documents in the House. I am trying to get the opposition to understand that it had become apparent over the weekend that the money which was supposed to be forthcoming from the Canadian banks will not be forthcoming.

An hon. Member: They are smart.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that the hecklers on the other side are indicating we should not buy this long-range patrol aircraft.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You will not get away with that one.

Mr. Fairweather: I would rather be a heckler than a hyena.

Mr. Trudeau: In the case of some hon. members, they are both.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON BANKS WOULD NOT PARTICIPATE IN FINANCING

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of National Defence. I would like to point out that this side of the House does not object to cabinet ministers looking foolish, either singly or collectively, but this has reached the stage where they are making the country look foolish.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: Will the minister inform the House if the Canadian banks backed out because of the financial risks involved with Lockheed, or because they were uneasy about the government's apparent readiness to circumvent the Financial Administration Act?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations were between the banks and the Lockheed Company. Therefore, it would be for either the banks or the Lockheed Company to explain why they backed out.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON SOME CABINET MEMBERS ALLEGEDLY AGAINST GOVERNMENT FINANCING

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put this question to the Minister of Supply and Services. In answering, he might tell us if that contract has been signed, sealed and taken out of escrow because of the well-known objections of some of the cabinet against government financing of the Lockheed deal which are based on the fact that if Lockheed goes bankrupt at the worst possible time, just before completion of the 18 aircraft, it is true that the Canadian taxpayers will have paid some $375 million and have nothing to show for it.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, this question is very hypothetical. It is obvious that if Lockheed were ever to go bankrupt we could consider various possibilities to make sure that the contract is completed. We must consider that Lockheed is not a small company, that Lockheed has some very important defence contracts with the U.S. government which would surely look after its own interests. In the eventuality of a contract from the Canadian government, we would see to it that we get the best guarantees from the U.S. government in order that our interests be protected. Having said this, we do not have for the moment any contract with Lockheed which would prevent us from putting an end to this project under its present form.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF FINANCING WITH PUBLIC FUNDS—ALLEGED FAILURE OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT TO GIVE GUARANTEE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Prime Minister. If the banks, which are experienced financial institutions, find that this particular $1 billion deal is something they do not want to assist or take part in, why does the government not take this advice, or does the government propose to finance this particular deal out of public funds?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot interpret the feeling of the banks as has the hon. member. I was not at the negotiations with them. I understand the reason they do not want to finance this particular deal is that they do not feel they have the same type of guarantee from the Lockheed Company as the United States banks have from the Lockheed Company. The hon. member is free to draw from their refusal the inference he wishes. I cannot speak for them.

Mr. Brewin: Is it not also a fact that the United States government has failed to give the guarantees sought for in respect of this particular deal?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in so far as the United States government is concerned, they have been very forthcoming and co-operative with the Canadian government. They, of course, have not been asked for any form of financial assistance. The guarantees they have given are of a different order. It is one of seriousness in their support of their intention to buy from Lockheed and to see that Canadians are treated just as well as they, the United States government, are treated should some failure occur in the Lockheed industry. Certainly, the United States government has given us every cause to proceed.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—SUGGESTED CONSIDERATION OF ALTERNATIVE TO "ORION"

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): In view of all these circumstances and the fact that the option to purchase these Orion aircraft has, I presume, expired, will the government, bearing in mind that the role of the Orion is one which is completely out of line with the defence policy announced by the government a few years ago, reopen the whole subject and consider whether refitting the Argus and perhaps purchasing Dash-7 aircraft at half the price of the Orion deal does not constitute an option which should be taken?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member has put forward a possible course of action should we not proceed with the LRPA Lockheed deal. I am explaining to him that we are now in the process of trying to follow up yesterday's cabinet decision to see whether we can proceed with the Lockheed deal without the help of the banks. Using the hypothesis that we should not succeed, we should consider other alternatives such as those suggested by members of the House.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CANADIAN BANK LOAN NOT USED TO PAY DEBTS IN UNITED STATES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Could the Prime Minister reassure the House that the money that could be advanced by a consortium of Canadian banks will not be used by Lockheed to reimburse debts to the American government, but rather for implementing the eventual contract that could be made between Canada and the United States? In other words, did Canada get a formal assurance that money that might be advanced eventually will be used only for the purposes of the contract and not for the reimbursement of debts?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member on this point, since the money earmarked for this eventual contract would not come from Canadian banks.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—AMOUNT OF BANK LOAN AND INTEREST RATE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I want to put another supplementary question. What is the amount of money and the interest rate considered?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I just explained to the hon. member that it is now excluded that the banks finance the undertaking; therefore, no amount of money or interest rate is under consideration.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TRIPARTITE DISCUSSIONS ON ECONOMIC REFORM—ROLE OF LABOUR

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour. Yesterday the minister told the House, and I quote—

> The CLC has been and I think will be in the future co-operating with the government and with the business representatives on the Canadian Labour Relations Council in reforming and changing some of the institutions which we have found not to be working too satisfactorily . . . I am referring to the free collective bargaining system.

Since Mr. Morris has referred to the CLRC as a "Mickey Mouse" institution, is it still the position of the minister that the CLRC will fulfil the reform of the economic order which the CLC envisages for labour, government and business interests?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I do not believe the hon. member is quoting me correctly in the context within which the question was asked by the labour critic for the Conservative Party. That hon. member expressed concern about the emphasis on the change of institutions and I indicated that the CLRC, with which labour co-operated, was endeavouring to change the institution of free collective bargaining and that was the context in which the answer was given.

To answer the question in terms of my own views as to whether labour is going to participate in some tripartite fashion, perhaps it is too early yet to say whether it will be through the Canada Labour Relations Council, but the manifesto issued the day before yesterday clearly indicates that labour itself does wish to participate more fully with government in social and economic decision-making. We in the government have been encouraging such a position and we interpret that as a hopeful sign.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. To press the matter a little further, the special committee of deputy ministers set up to advise the cabinet on post control policies reportedly wants to promote tripartite talks on economic efficiency and productivity. Can the minister advise the House what form these tripartite talks will take and the role to be played by both himself and his department, given Mr. Morris' predilection for the leaders of governments, especially this government and industry.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could best indicate the form that the talks will take by repeating what has already been said in the House. It is our hope that the Prime Minister and certain members of the government will be meeting with the CLC some time in June; the precise date is yet to be determined. We will no doubt be discussing the recent manifesto and position with respect to post controls and other items that will be developed by the government prior to that time as matters for discussion. Other colleagues in the government are carrying on and will be carrying on discussions with the business community over the course of the next month or so.

PARTICIPATION OF LABOUR IN FINDING METHOD OF AVOIDING STRIKES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The anti-inflation white paper indicated that the CLRC had been established to improve labour-management relations, including the critical aspect of strikes in essential services. Will the minister advise what progress has been made in resolving the problem of strikes in essential services and how he intends to reach such a solution in conjunction with labour, since its withdrawal from the CLRC seems assured for at least three years?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday in the House, the CLC has not resigned from the Canada Labour Relations Council. It has withdrawn. The president of the CLC himself has emphasized that distinction. If and when he feels it is appropriate, since his option is open by the CLC withdrawing rather than resigning, it will be up to him to rejoin. In the meantime certain things have been accomplished by this body. For example, there is the broader based bargaining concept which hopefully will reduce the incidence of strikes both in essential services and the private sector generally. This concept was endorsed and agreed upon both by labour and by management through the aegis of the Canada Labour Relations Council at a time when labour was participating.

I would also indicate that we hope to have discussions of this nature on a broader basis in the context of the discussions that we are having in June with the Canadian Labour Congress. I imagine this question will be brought up along with other matters across the whole broad front of social and economic considerations.

HUMAN RIGHTS

DATE OF RATIFICATION OF UNITED NATIONS COVENANT

Hon. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, last week I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs about Canadian ratification of the United Nations covenant on human rights which is now ten years old. He replied that he had sent a telegram to the last of the provinces requesting agreement to this ratification. I wonder whether he would now report on any answer to that telegram and confirm whether or not Canada can now finally ratify that covenant?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the House that consultations with all provinces have now been completed and that Canada's instruments of accession to the international covenant on economic, social and cultural rights, the international convention on civil and political rights and to the latter's optional protocol will be deposited with United Nations headquarters in New York tomorrow, Wednesday, May 19.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, may I just add that our becoming party to these extremely important international human rights instruments will enable us to play a still more active role internationally in the human rights field and will moreover strengthen our credibility in urging other states also to become parties and to implement their provisions.

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF PROVISION ABOLISHING CAPITAL PUNISHMENT FOR TREASON AND OTHER OFFENCES FROM BILL C-84

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Everyone knows my view respecting capital punishment for murder. The bill that is before the House, on which we can get no answers while it is before us, provides not only for abolition of capital punishment for murder, but added thereto as well is abolition of capital punishment for high treason, for killing or attempting to kill Her Majesty, and other offences such as using force or violence for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Canada or of a province. In view of the security situation at the Olympics, which must be serious when the estimated expenditure by Canada is to be some $90 million, and this would indicate that security there is regarded as very insecure, will the Prime Minister consider removing these sections from the bill that is before the House, namely Bill C-84, because to remove the punishment for offences to which I have referred could not be but an inducement to the commission of lawlessness during the Olympics?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am passing this on most seriously as I know that many members are deeply concerned that those sections regarding treason and the violent offences should not be dealt with at this time, but the law should remain as it is now in that regard until December 31, 1977.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the number of various amendments which can be proposed when this matter reaches the committee would include the one suggested by the right hon. member. I put it to him that many abolitionists in general would be retentionists in particular, and this is the case with much of the correspondence I have received from people who do not like capital punishment but feel it should be kept in this or that case. In the case of the right hon. gentleman, he is concerned, and rightfully so, with the overthrow of the government of the nation, and he added, by unlawful means.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Other people are concerned with other forms of crime which, to use his words, would be induced by the abolition of capital punishment. Surely, that is the essence of the debate. On this side we have taken the position, in so far as this bill is a government bill to be voted on freely, that you are an abolitionist or you are not, and if you are an abolitionist you should not start making particular exceptions, because the list would grow indefinitely.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: In answer to the Prime Minister I would say this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, such frivolity is scarcely in keeping with the seriousness of this subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I suggest this to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. No matter what amendments take place in the committee, the bill that will be voted on on second reading is the one that is before the House and it includes these terms. I suggest that in order to make it possible for a clear vote that these particular sections be removed, particularly in view of the danger—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

An hon. Member: Get to the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are, after all, getting into representation as opposed to a question. If the right hon. gentleman has a supplementary question I would ask him to put it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have heard the preamble to my question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the Prime Minister this. Speaking from conscience, will he not remove these particular sections to which I have made reference in connection with security so there can be a clear vote, with those of us who believe in doing away with the death sentence for murder being able to vote for the bill? As it is, with all the rest of provisions therein, that is almost impossible.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in order to answer that question completely I would have to know whether the right hon. gentleman is speaking on behalf of his party.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

An hon. Member: It is a free vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It is a free vote on this side, Mr. Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: But we don't know about your side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: You better be careful; you need a few of us.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not need a few of you. Perhaps those people who might be hanged need a few of you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Yes, you do need a few of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You will have to resign.

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, in order to answer—

Mr. Fairweather: You don't need us? Well, that is an announcement we will remember. Wait until second reading.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Fundy-Royal is grumbling a bit too loudly.

Mr. Fairweather: I am grumbling because it is a free vote, and you need every vote you can get.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Have you lost touch?

Mr. Trudeau: I am surprised that the hon. member—

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

An hon. Member: Warren can't talk to his boss. He hasn't got his leather jacket on.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In view of the comments on both sides of the House it is impossible to hear the right hon. Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: You are not missing a whole lot.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member for Fundy-Royal is going on a personal question rather than on the question of the issue as I think the issue is much more important. As to the question of the right hon. gentleman, I repeat that it would be interesting to know if he is making representations on behalf of his party—

An hon. Member: Oh, get off it.

Mr. Trudeau: —or is he speaking on behalf of a group of members of the other side who might be either abolitionists or retentionists according to whether or not we accept the suggestion. My question to him is a serious one, because the government—

An hon. Member: You are not asking questions.

Mr. Trudeau: —the government's position is that it wants to see this bill voted on freely and passed, and we obviously cannot begin to make exceptions to it.

An hon. Member: No exceptions.

Mr. Trudeau: Now the right hon. gentleman says "no exceptions". He has just been asking for an exception in his question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

GUIDELINES FOR DEALING WITH MEMBERS' COMPLAINTS ABOUT PRICES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and concerns the report released today that the Anti-Inflation Board is inviting consumer complaints and placing a form in supermarkets and financial institutions for this purpose. Considering the record of the AIB in respect of letters from members of parliament which are not being replied to when we bring price complaints to the attention of the board, and that the best we receive is a phone call saying everything has been looked after without our really knowing what has happened, may I ask the Minister of Finance what guidelines have been laid down by the AIB regarding members' complaints about price increases? If the AIB does not have such guidelines, does the minister have some? What action will the minister take to assure the House that today's announcement is a serious attempt on the part of the AIB to deal with prices and listen to complaints rather than just being another public relations job?

● (1440)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the guidelines with regard to price increases of course have been set out at length before parliament and are incorporated in the regulations. They will depend directly upon the nature of the business dealings carried on by the firm. But in general with regard to the distribution business, they are related to the gross profit margin of those businesses. With regard to the hon. gentleman's complaint that his letter has not produced a letter, I wish to reflect on that. It seems to me the more important occupation for the Anti-Inflation Board should be in scrutinizing the price questions the hon. gentleman has raised rather than engaging in correspondence.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I sort of anticipated that the minister might be assisting the AIB in its public relations job. I am not interested in the AIB sending out letters or making phone calls. The information I am interested in getting from the minister is whether the Anti-Inflation Board will follow through in some serious way with the complaints that are laid before it or whether it will get some lady or young man on the telephone with a nice voice saying: "Don't worry about it; everything is under control; you can trust us". That is all we have been getting up until now. In asking my question the purpose is not to increase the correspondence between the AIB and members of parliament but to get some documentary evidence of good faith on the part of the AIB that it is following through with suggestions placed before it and is handling them.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am confident that the board is following through, particularly with regard to particular patterns of price increases which indicate a practice in this regard. Indeed, there have been a great many investigations of this kind.

PENITENTIARIES

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NEW BRUNSWICK NOT A HAVEN FOR INMATES WHO TAKE HOSTAGES

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of what occurred at Laval Penitentiary after recent negotiations would the Solicitor General care to clarify a statement he made on February 23, 1976 in this House when he gave his assurance that the province of New Brunswick would not become a haven for those individuals who tend to hide behind hostages?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat that commitment. As I said in answer to a later question, from time to time the penitentiary service breaks up cliques and gangs in a penitentiary and distributes them to other penitentiaries around the country but always at the same security classification; in other words, maximum security inmates go to maximum security penitentiaries. This will have to be done and will continue to be done in the future.

THREATENED STRIKE OF COAL MINERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the imminent shutdown of the entire coal industry in British Columbia and Alberta, and in view of the fact that their contract calls for only 4 per cent over the AIB guidelines, will the minister seek an early meeting with the management of the coal industry, the AIB and representatives of the United Steel Workers, ACTE, and the United Mines Workers in order to prevent this imminent shutdown of the industry in those provinces.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if that is a representation on the part of the hon. member, certainly if the employers or the unions in question want to approach the Department of Labour or myself so that we might become familiar with their concerns and make any useful suggestions, we have been and will be very ready to do so particularly in the instance to which the hon. member is referring.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

ALLEGATION COMINCO HIDING BEHIND GUIDELINES DURING NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Minister of Labour for that responsible answer. Now, I shall turn to the Minister of Finance. I wonder whether he will come up with a similarly responsible answer. In view of the small percentage of 4 per cent over the AIB guidelines and in view of the fact that COMINCO will not negotiate for any amount over the AIB guidelines, will the minister examine the charge of labour that COMINCO in fact is hiding behind the guidelines and report his conclusions to the Anti-Inflation Board, to labour and to management as well as the Minister of Labour.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Parliament has created the Anti-Inflation Board for the purpose of exercising scrutiny in particular cases and for carrying out the regulations that are provided which incorporate the guidelines. It seems to be a course of common sense for both management and labour everywhere in the country to obey the guidelines which have been set down by law. In particular, it is the role set out for the Anti-Inflation Board to apply those guidelines. Under the circumstances, the notion that I might examine and dictate a course of action to the AIB would seem clearly to be contrary to what Parliament has decreed the board should do.

Oral Questions

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR ENLARGEMENT OF TERMS OF REFERENCE OF INQUIRY INTO SAFETY OF USE OF BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my questions are directed to the Minister of Transport. They are related to the air traffic control inquiry and against the background of a possible strike this week of the air traffic controllers. In view of the minister's announcement on May 12 to the effect that the Public Commissioner would be asked to inquire into "the safety implications of the introduction of bilingualism into air traffic control under IFR conditions in the Province of Quebec", and the apparent contradiction to that in his statement of the same date and in view of the reply given by his colleague the President of the Treasury Board yesterday to a question on this matter in which he said,

> ... as far as the terms of reference are concerned if there is something to change, we would be prepared to do so.

My question for the minister is, is the minister prepared to consider enlarging the terms of reference of the commissioner so as to include all aspects of the matter as recommended by the conciliation board and thereby place safety as the prime consideration for the inquiry?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the apparent contradiction to which the hon. member refers really is related to the fact that so far as I was concerned all aspects of safety which were in any way at issue were in fact before the commissioner. If there is a real desire to have those words broadened to make sure that all aspects of safety are before him, I am certainly willing to consider that. I say that I considered all aspects at issue were before him because there really has been no controversy or issue over the extension of VFR bilingual controls at five airports. It was clear from my statement that any possibility of VFR extension to such airports as Dorval and Mirabel required the first establishment of satisfactory procedures with regard to IFR. Therefore, I thought the thing was clearly covered. But I am certainly prepared to consider extensions if that is required.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, one of my supplementaries concerns the statement to the effect that the commissioner was to inquire into the implications of the procedures and methods being developed by Transport Canada and the Canadian aviation community. Part of the aviation community does not seem to be in agreement with the minister at the present time. I am wondering what part of the Canadian aviation community is developing these methods.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the statement went on in rather more detail to list them including the Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, the Canadian Transportation Association and a couple of others and indicating in addition that CALPA and CATCA had both indicated that they were prepared to co-operate with the simulation exercises and therefore I consider we have the sensible co-operation of the whole of the aviation community in connection with the exercise.

POSSIBLE CHANGES IN ICNAF REGULATIONS—CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES—DECLARATION OF 200-MILE ZONE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Article 16 of ICNAF states that at any time after the expiration of ten years from the date of entry into force of this convention any contracting government may withdraw from the convention on December 31 of any year by giving notice on or before the preceding June 30 to the depository government which shall communicate copies of such nature to the other contracting governments. Since ICNAF will be meeting in Havana, Cuba, June 6 to June 24 and the United States will have a 200-mile limit by March 1, 1977, is it the minister's intention to soon meet with U.S. delegates to see whether a common front can be established concerning how ICNAF may be changed?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the question is very relevant. I did have a discussion with Dr. Kissinger on the common position we might adopt at ICNAF, and the necessity of relating very closely, in the course of that meeting.

Since my meeting with Dr. Kissinger I understand that there have been further recent meetings between Canada and United States officials on the broad question of fisheries. That collaboration will continue with respect to the meeting of ICNAF at Havana, and I believe that before that meeting opens it will be possible to state more explicitly the positions the Canadian delegation will take at the meeting. I believe a statement to that effect will be made in the House of Commons.

Mr. Crouse: Is it the intention of the government to set the over-all quotas in its 200 mile zone, allot the required amount for Canadian fishermen and have ICNAF allot to the foreign nations the remainder of the quota which is surplus to Canada's needs? If so, when can we expect Canada to declare its authority over its own management zones?

Mr. MacEachen: The first part of the question obviously is a matter which will have to be discussed and upon which detailed instructions must be given to the delegation at the meeting. Before the meeting takes place, as I indicated, information along those lines will be given to the House.

With respect to the second question, I have nothing further to add to the statement I already made, that this year is the year of decision for Canada with respect to extended jurisdiction.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED POLICE RAID ON QUEBEC LIBERAL PARTY OFFICE

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Considering that following the revelations made by former RCMP officer Samson last March concerning the raid on APLQ premises in Quebec, the Solicitor General had committed himself on April 2 to report to the House the findings of an inquiry he proposed to order, and considering that he has had the opportunity to meet with the Quebec Solicitor General to determine the parts played by the Quebec Police Force and the Montreal police in the affair, can the Solicitor General tell the House whether in fact such an inquiry was ordered, who took the initiative of organizing the raid on the APLQ offices and what was the role of the RCMP in all that?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP did give me a full report with respect to their role in this particular raid, but following my meeting with the solicitor general for Quebec, Mr. Lalonde, he, in his role as the minister in charge of law enforcement in Quebec, asked if he could not deal directly with the RCMP to determine whether something illegal had taken place and whether further action should be taken. As a result, I have asked the RCMP to co-operate fully with the law enforcement officers and the minister in Quebec, and Mr. Lalonde in Quebec will be taking action following the completion of his investigation.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REASON FOR USE OF PACIFIC RIM MANAGEMENT TO HIRE WORKERS FOR ALASKA HIGHWAY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. The minister is aware that a contract was awarded to a company by the name of Pacific Rim Management of Vancouver for $602,000 by the Department of Supply and Services to hire Yukon residents for work on the Alaska Highway. In view of the fact that this company has since made arrangements with the Canada Manpower Centre in Whitehorse to do its hiring, will the minister say why this was done by Canada Manpower, since the private firm was contracted to perform these duties and thus has violated its contract?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. In fact, through this contract this company will supply the government with survey crews for the proposed construction of highways in Alaska. The company has also been asked to go through Manpower Centre to recruit and select the best candidates available, who will be chosen in the area where the work will be performed.

[English]

PUBLIC WORKS

REASON FOR USE OF PACIFIC RIM MANAGEMENT TO HIRE WORKERS FOR ALASKA HIGHWAY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Public Works, and I would like him to respond. In view of the fact that this contract was awarded to a Vancouver firm which did not even have an office in the Yukon, will the minister say why this was done, why an outside firm had to be contracted when Canada Manpower apparently had the resources and the experience to do the hiring?

In addition, perhaps the minister would be good enough to tell us whether, in the words of one of his officials, it was a way in which the Department of Public Works could get around the government freeze on hiring, and if this is the case, will the minister say what he intends to do about it?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to have the name of the individual—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: A former Grit.

Mr. Drury: —who has been misinforming the hon. member. That was not the purpose nor the intention. I think the hon. member will be as well aware as I am of the shortages of surveyors and quantity surveyors in the Yukon, and it is necessary for the accomplishment of this work to go outside the Yukon. In the past, the Department of Public Works endeavoured to do this recruiting, assisted by the Department of Manpower and Immigration, and we have come to the conclusion that contracts can be more efficiently and more economically arranged by this agency than by the staff which would have to be taken on by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Bawden: I would like to ask the minister what capabilities this particular firm and these private firms have that the Department of Manpower and Immigration does not have.

Mr. Drury: I think probably there is an expertise in this particular field—

An hon. Member: They have never done it before.

Mr. Drury: —which is perhaps beyond the generalized qualities of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. As the hon. member knows, the Department of Manpower and Immigration tends to be a responsive rather than a recruiting agency in itself.

OLYMPIC GAMES

REQUEST THAT SECURITY MEASURES BE TAKEN

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General if he is acquainted with the Jack Henderson Report recently published in the Washington Post and if he can assure hon. members and the Canadian people that every possible step will be taken to ensure the security of all those who want to attend the 1976 Montreal Olympic Games, so as to avoid the damages incurred in similar circumstances in the past, which some people fear in certain quarters?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we have no evidence to support or to justify the allegations made by Mr. Anderson in the Washington Post. On the other hand, the RCMP and all the other security agencies are taking every measure of precaution against any type of terrorism which might take place at the Olympics.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Solicitor General. Are the Royal Canadian Mounted Police taking steps to make sure that no weapons enter Canada from abroad before the games are held or even after?

[English]

Mr. Allmand: That does not appear to be necessary at the present time. As I said, every precaution is being taken by the four agencies—the RCMP, the Quebec Provincial Police, the Montreal police and the armed forces—to provide a strong security team, and we are gathering intelligence on any threat, but so far there is no threat as described by Mr. Anderson in the Washington Post.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN D-DAY CEREMONIES IN FRANCE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Would the minister advise if Canada will be participating in D-Day anniversary ceremonies in France on June 6, and if not, why not?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the landing committee is now studying the situation for June 6, and my information is that Canada will be represented by our ambassador in France.

Mr. Marshall: In view of the fact that this is the golden anniversary of the Canadian Legion, I wonder if the Minister could indicate if any veterans organizations or legion organizations have approached the minister about a visit to commemorate the thirty second anniversary of D-Day; and, in view of the shortage of time, would he ensure that the ambassador is contacted to make sure that this day is recognized by Canadians and those in Europe for Canadians?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I understand it will be recognized by Canadians in Europe and also people who have a desire to go.

I would like to add that the main ceremony will be held in the American sector this year, and that is one of the reasons Canada is not playing a leading role. With regard to veterans organizations or legion commands across the country, if they desire to send representations to this very important function, they can very well do so.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, on May 13 the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton and the hon. member for Yukon alleged that I had improperly made certain changes in the Hansard "blues". That is not correct, and in accordance with your request I should like to provide information for the House. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton referred to my answer to him on May 12 at page 13440, where I said:

> The reason for the warrant was not because we wanted to find out the contents of the letter—obviously we had copies of it—but to get the exact copy that was sent to the Toronto Sun so that we could get evidence as to where it was produced, how it was produced and who might have sent it.

The hon. member alleged that I had said "whether" it had been produced, rather than "where" it had been produced, and that I had changed the "blues" from "whether" to "where". I should like to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and the House that it is true I changed the "blues" from "whether" to "where" because I had in fact said "where". In the context, "whether" would not have made any sense. We knew that the letter had been reproduced but we did not know where it had been reproduced. So I did change Hansard, but I changed it to say what I had in fact said in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: On the other point, Mr. Speaker, hon. members said that I had changed my answer on page 13441 where I said "that the letter might have been destroyed". They said this had been changed to "had", and then back again to "might have". Again, Mr. Speaker, when I got the "blues" on that day, someone had written in—I do not know whether it was done in the Hansard office or not—the word "had" over the typewritten words "might have", and since I had said "might have" I changed it back to the original text. Again, I made the final version of Hansard correspond with what in fact had been said.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should also like to correct something I said yesterday in answer to the hon. member for Central Nova. He had asked me about a report from the RCMP with respect to the SIU investigation. I said that there had been no final report or interim report. I was incorrect in that. There had been an interim report, but it had not said much more than I said in the House, that is, that this would be a long investigation and there was much more work to be done. But there had been an interim report which said more or less that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Solicitor General for making a statement outlining the historical aspects of this matter. We are grateful for it, and I want him to know we accept it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should add only that, as I indicated to the House the point was first raised, I would seek—and I have now received—a report from the editor of Hansard. That report conforms in every way with the description of the events that has just been given by the Solicitor General. The fact is that editorial changes were suggested by the editor in respect of the language that was used in attempting to make it conform with what was the impression of the editor. Those copies were returned to the House, and therefore the initial change in respect of the words "might have been" as opposed to "had" were made in the editorial office. It is true that the Solicitor General changed those words back to the language he had used in the House. The same thing seems to apply to the second change that was made, and indeed that does appear to conform in every respect to the description that has been given by the Solicitor General.

It would not appear, therefore, that any point of order arises in respect of this matter.

Nuclear Relations with India

ENERGY

STATEMENT ON NUCLEAR CO-OPERATION WITH INDIA

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the House that the government has decided that further nuclear co-operation with India is not possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The decision has been difficult. It has challenged the government, as indeed it has challenged all thinking Canadians, to review a number of fundamental principles.

Canada's nuclear co-operation with India began in the context of the Colombo Plan. It has, as its basis, the belief that nuclear power could be vital to the equitable economic growth of a number of developing countries. The energy crisis and the serious dislocations it has brought with it have tended to reinforce this belief, and the genuine success achieved by Indo-Canadian co-operation in the development of nuclear power for energy, agriculture and medicine has proved the practicality of this approach.

India's detonation of a nuclear explosive device in 1974 made it evident that Canada and India have taken profoundly differing views of what should be encompassed in the peaceful application of nuclear energy by non-nuclear weapons states. Canada is one of the earliest and most vigorous proponents of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. A basic element of the treaty, which guides Canadian policy in the field of nuclear exports and safeguards, is that it recognizes no technical distinction between nuclear explosives for peaceful and non-peaceful purposes.

Canada has forgone the possible benefits of developing so-called peaceful nuclear explosions on the basis that, pursuant to the NPT, nuclear explosive services would be available from a nuclear weapons state at such time as need and feasibility are demonstrated. India, however, does not accept what it views as discrimination between the nuclear powers and other states and insists that all countries should be free to use all phases of nuclear technology for whatever they view as peaceful purposes.

Notwithstanding these differences, both countries agreed to explore together a negotiated termination of nuclear co-operation. These negotiations had, earlier this spring, reached a point where both sides decided that governmental decisions were required. The decision now taken by cabinet takes into full account the issues that I raised when I spoke in the House on March 23. Canada has insisted that any co-operation in the nuclear field be fully covered by safeguards which satisfy the Canadian people that Canadian assistance will not be diverted to nuclear explosive purposes. This Canadian objective could not be achieved in these negotiations.

Both sides have made a concerted effort in good faith to reach a basis for agreement. However, the Canadian government has decided that it could agree to make new nuclear shipments only on an undertaking by India that Canadian supplies, whether of technology, nuclear equipment or materials, whether past or future, shall not be used for the manufacture of any nuclear explosive device. In the present case, this undertaking would require that all nuclear facilities, involving Canadian technology, in India be safeguarded. We would be prepared to reach agreement with India on this basis only. In view of earlier discussions, however, we have concluded that the Indian government would not be prepared to accept safeguards on other than the RAPP reactors, which are already under international safeguards.

In making this statement regarding our nuclear co-operation with India, I should like also to refer briefly to the other aspects of our relationship. There is no question that our nuclear differences are profound; nevertheless, nuclear affairs form only one part of what has been a broad and important relationship. The decisions reached by the government relating to one aspect of our relations are not intended to preclude the pursuit of other elements of mutual interest in our over-all links with India. The Canadian government remains prepared to review these elements and to pursue our common objectives in both bilateral and multilateral fields because we feel that our ties with this important developing Commonwealth nation must not be allowed to lapse through any lack of will on our part.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement today is one small step toward a world policy of nuclear sanity, and for this reason we welcome it. Our party, and indeed many Canadians from all walks of life, believe that a moratorium on the export of nuclear technology is imperative until such time as world conditions are more stabilized and countries are willing to accept the authority of a transnational institution with the power to protect the global environment. The Canadian government has by no means implemented such a policy today. But we must hope that the cancellation of the nuclear agreement with India will lead to a reassessment of our current and prospective agreements with other nuclear purchasers.

We need to know precisely why the negotiations with India were terminated and we call on the government to table the relative papers. Without them we cannot judge the real reason for the breakdown. On March 23 the minister posed the dilemma that Canada faced in these terms:

> Would it be better for us to suspend completely the nuclear negotiations with India, or should we go on to complete current negotiations, applying to the prospective deal the strictest sanctions possible—

We believed then, and we believe now, that the moral dilemma was falsely posed by the government. For as General E. L. M. Burns, the respected head of Canadian disarmament teams has said so often, it is the Canadian government's duty to do nothing which may lead to the proliferation of nuclear weapons, and that this obligation—which is explicit in article III of the non-proliferation treaty—takes precedence over Canada's desire to assist, through nuclear technologies, the underdeveloped nations of the world.

I think that the many members who have initiated debate from this side of the House can take some credit for this decision. In particular, this House owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) who has for the last two years pressed home this matter in parliamentary debate and in the question period. No one should be under the illusion that this decision has been achieved without much effort both on the part of members of this House and individuals outside it. Yet while we applaud this first step we must realize that it is only that. This decision does not, in itself, form a moral policy with regard to nuclear sales. We still have far to go before our policy measures up to current United States legislation in this area.

Mr. Gillies: And British legislation.

Mr. Wagner: Parliament still has no control over sales, as does the U.S. Congress. Parliament is not even consulted; it is merely informed. Unlike Congress, which has had the opportunity to mould the formation of U.S. policy on safeguards, parliament has been pushed aside. As William Epstein, a Canadian who formerly served as chief of the United Nations secretariat on disarmament, said:

> Canada, as is its practice, held no public inquiry or committee investigation into the problem. It heard no experts other than its own government employees with no opportunity for them to be heard in public. The debate in parliament was all too short and of insufficient depth for such a serious and complicated matter.

I might add that debate was called by the opposition making use of the scarce resources of parliamentary time available to it. I can only quote the leading saint in the Liberal pantheon, Mackenzie King, who nearly 50 years ago—

Mr. MacEachen: You were in that pantheon.

Mr. Wagner: And I quickly got out of it. Mackenzie King said, nearly 50 years ago:

> Parliamentary approval should apply where there are involved political considerations of a far-reaching character.

Those words are in Hansard for April 12, 1928. What could be more far-reaching than nuclear proliferation, a horror undreamed of at that time?

We must also recognize that although this decision will, hopefully, have very far-reaching moral implications, it will have little impact on India's nuclear program. I understand that the RAPP II station is 85 per cent complete and that the Indian department of atomic energy will be able to finish it, albeit behind schedule. India is now completely self-sufficient in nuclear power; therefore, we are a decade too late to change that.

I should like to close with a few questions for the hon. gentleman. Will he now release the agreement initialled by Mr. Head in India? How will this decision affect the rest of our nuclear exports program? Finally, what was the precise point of difference between India and Canada which could not be resolved?

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my party also welcomes the government's decision. We think it is a fairly small step in the direction of nuclear sanity, to use some of the words of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). I suppose one can say that there is more joy in heaven if but one sinner repents.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Ask Mackenzie King.

Mr. Leggatt: There may yet be hope. The decision is a small step in the direction of a sane over-all nuclear policy.

The decision, as the minister said in his statement, has challenged all thinking Canadians to review a number of fundamental principles. Yet we are concerned since other fundamental principles have not been reviewed; they have been given only cursory consideration. The present decision relates to only one arrangement with India. That is not enough to give the Canadian people any confidence in a nuclear policy which does not lend itself to an appalling proliferation.

● (1520)

We have had two years to examine the problems of India. However, within that time we have also had the opportunity to agonize over South Korea, Argentina, Pakistan and Taiwan. What this decision really shows is the impossibility of preventing diversion, short of some absolute control process, short of an international agreement in which there is a minor degree of the surrender of sovereignty so that an international agency has the power to enforce an international agreement. Anything short of that does not give reassurance to the nations of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: Canada has an opportunity to provide moral leadership on this subject. It should be the first nation to go to the United Nations and make that kind of an offer in order to try and snowball other nations to move in the direction of internationalism. There would then be some confidence that the awesome risk of terrorism or unstable governments having control of the nuclear trigger would be reduced or eliminated.

As the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe said, the moral dilemma that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) posed is phony and false. I want to add some support to that. The United States called for a special study in terms of the nuclear program under the energy research and development administration. I want to quote from that study in terms of the need for less developed countries having the nuclear option. This is what they found after very extensive research:

> There are no truly compelling economic reasons for a vast commitment to nuclear power in lesser developed countries. There are other ways to develop more consistent with the history, their culture, economics, that are just as efficient. Military power and national prestige are the big causes of the nuclear choice for the LDC.

Therefore, it is not a moral dilemma that we should risk the question of proliferation against the need to peddle peaceful nuclear reactors in the way we have been peddling them. We have been peddling them like used cars, without any sense of responsibility in terms of a peaceful world. I want to again quote General Burns. This is a recent quote from the Globe and Mail:

> Once CANDU reactors are built, and producing plutonium, there will be nothing to stop an Argentinian or South Korean government abrogating the inspection agreement, and proceeding on the road to "peaceful nuclear explosions".

That is exactly the dilemma we faced with India, and exactly the dilemma we will be faced with in spite of the agreement with South Korea. In spite of all the pieces of paper the minister can table in this House, those agreements can be abrogated. There is not a sanction in the world to prevent it. Once they are abrogated, these countries can go into what they euphemistically call peaceful nuclear explosions. They then become a part of the nuclear problem, having the nuclear trigger in their hands.

It is time for a nuclear policy that says no more sales abroad, a total moratorium, and a meaningful offer at the United Nations as the first country willing to give up a piece of sovereignty in terms of a world of sanity and safety.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, obviously the only role a country such as ours can play is to set an example for peace and thus prevent anything that could be interpreted as military action. Of course, we agree with the decision contained in the minister's statement because we cannot participate, particularly directly, in any endeavour which might have dire consequences.

Mr. Speaker, that reminds me that as a country dedicated to bring peace in the world we should stop any trade which could be the cause of conflicts or wars. And one of the examples we should set is to avoid arming ourselves.

Of course, we should finally understand that given Canada's low density of population spread over such a vast territory as ours, it is quite ridiculous to arm ourselves as much as we do. And it is also ridiculous to see that such huge amounts of money are spent for our national defence.

So not only should we refrain from supplying arms to other countries but we should also seriously think of reducing significantly our expenses for our defence.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions for the minister. Because this is, as the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe indicated, a belated and very hesitant step to sanity on the part of the government—and I am sure it came about only as the result of representations made in this House by the opposition—would the minister indicate if he and the government are now completely re-examining the projected deals with both South Korea and Argentina? I ask this question in view of the opinions held by many people, even within the nuclear association of Canada, that the Canadian nuclear industry is going to have its hands full over the next few years in supplying the technology and the facilities in Canada alone for domestic needs. Will the government indicate whether the South Korean deal and the Argentinian deal are being re-examined by the government?

Mr. MacEachen: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lawrence: Because India has boasted, and still is today, that the two reactors being built in and near Madras are being built completely on the Canadian design and the Canadian system, is the government taking any steps to protect the obvious Canadian interest in both the international design and the international CANDU system in respect of those two reactors and other reactors in India?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it was because of our failure to reach an agreement with India on the application of safeguards to the Canadian-supplied system in India that we decided that further nuclear co-operation was not possible. Of course, one of the items involved is the transfer of technology. I want to make careful inquiries on the precise character of the situation with respect to the transfer of technology. However, it is my understanding that that technology is now available to India. It is because we were unable to safeguard all installations, including the Madras reactors, the Cirus reactor and a further new reactor proposed by India, that we decided we could not go further.

It is clear from my statement that India was prepared to accept safeguards on the Rajasthan reactors, but in our view that was not consistent with the broad policy that is supported by the government and, as is obvious, supported by every spokesman for opposition parties today.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, may I clarify my last question because I think there has been a misunderstanding. I do not think the minister understood. As I understand it, India is building two separate reactors, one in Madras and one just outside Madras, completely using her own resources. India has boasted that she is building those projects to the Canadian CANDU design and in accordance with the Canadian CANDU system. There are international legal safeguards protecting a propriety interest in matters such as this, and I am asking the minister whether he will consider the legal remedies which are open to the government of Canada to protect our interests in these systems and designs.

Mr. MacEachen: I now understand more clearly the point of the question. I will follow it up.

Miss MacDonald: I should like to tell the minister that while I welcome the decision he has announced today, I very much regret his further comment that he is not prepared to undertake a review of all the nuclear commitments Canada has made abroad. I think that is a sad state of affairs.

When this subject was raised some time ago, on March 5, I posed a question to the Acting Prime Minister about negotiations which were taking place, and the Acting Prime Minister said on that occasion:

The government has every reason to want full disclosure of all the facts.

Given that statement, would the hon. gentleman be prepared to tell us to what extent his change of heart, since the position he took a month ago during the debate initiated by the opposition on the subject, has been influenced by restrictions placed on Canada by the nuclear exporters' consultation group in London? Did these restrictions have anything to do with the decision announced today? Could full disclosure be made of the circumstances surrounding this particular aspect?

Mr. MacEachen: I do not believe I have had a change of mind.

Miss MacDonald: I said "a change of heart".

Mr. MacEachen: Since March 23 maybe I have had a change of heart, but not a change of mind. I think it was perfectly clear, from my comments in the debate, that with respect to India I was gravely concerned about the implications involved in the decision which has now been announced. Obviously, the contribution made by hon. members during that debate was one of the factors in reaching our decision. But I would add that the decision taken by the Canadian government in the case of India was an independent decision, arrived at on our own, and it was not forced on us in any way by other members of the London club.

Miss MacDonald: It is because of the secrecy which surrounds the discussions which have been going on with the London group and decisions reached there that I raise this question. Would the minister make a point of tabling, on motions, far more detail with respect to the arrangements which have been agreed to by this group, so that we could determine whether they apply to the nuclear commitments Canada has undertaken with regard to Argentina and South Korea? It is of great concern to many of us to know whether any enforcement procedures have been worked out by the London group to ensure that all members comply with the safeguard system which has been agreed to. We cannot determine this until we know all the details of the decisions taken by that group.

Mr. MacEachen: The statement which I made on March 23 was a serious attempt to disclose fully the terms of the commitment which we voluntarily notified to other members of the London group, in the same way as each member has voluntarily notified its own adherence. I will examine the transcript of my statement again to see whether it could be expanded or made more detailed in the sense of indicating more precisely what undertakings Canada did make.

Miss MacDonald: One final supplementary. I refer the Secretary of State for External Affairs to a statement made by the Prime Minister on May 4 in response to a question by the hon. member for Egmont. He said, then, that part of the London group's agreement was reached in secrecy on the understanding that no one country would make its terms public, but that if the terms were made public in a general way he was sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs would not object to making it public here. The Prime Minister undertook to ask the hon. gentleman to do that. That is really what I am asking the Secretary of State for External Affairs to do. Would he look into this matter and make sure that if possible we can be told the terms of the agreement in relation to this country's nuclear commitments to South Korea and Argentina?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have undertaken to look at the record of Hansard for March 23 to see whether more detail can be provided. But I assure the hon. member that our safeguard agreements with both Argentina and South Korea are certainly consistent with the London club arrangements—probably a slight step above.

Mr. Speaker: With the approval of hon. members, in order to conclude the questioning on this subject I propose to recognize the hon. member for Greenwood, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I would put this question to the Minister. In view of the fact that David Lilienthal, a very famous scientist who had a great deal to do with the original production of nuclear weapons and who was later president of many important organizations such as the TVA in the United States, together with our own General Burns—who has been twice mentioned here already—have both expressed the view that the very best safeguards we have devised are inadequate and that they can be evaded fairly easily, would the hon. gentleman accept the principle put forward by my hon. friend from New Westminster that Canada should be willing to limit its sovereignty by accepting, as far as CANDU is concerned, complete and effective international inspection and control of all nuclear installations?

Mr. MacEachen: I believe that in terms of the nuclear proliferation treaty Canada has done precisely that. All nuclear installations in Canada are under the inspection system of the International Atomic Energy Agency. We have limited our sovereignty. Under the terms of the treaty we have renounced the undertaking of explosions, so to speak, and we have opened all our facilities to NPT inspection. It seems to me there comes a point at which any particular country, after making some solemn undertaking—as we have done—can, acting on its own, abrogate those undertakings. That applies to all forms of international law. The world has not yet devised a system of enforcement that will overcome the problem posed by any country that abrogates its international undertakings. Nothing the hon. member for New Westminster said provided a solution to that problem.

To undertake to limit your sovereignty is binding for the duration of the period that you live up to your commitment and not a moment beyond. We have no international force that I know of that can enter a country with armed forces and say, "You must now live up to your international commitment". Is that what the hon. member is advocating?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I will leave it to the hon. member for New Westminster to speak for himself.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the minister acknowledged the contribution made by members on this side of the House on March 23 as one of the factors in the government's decision in this matter. In order that we may continue to make a contribution to a sane policy in this regard, would the minister table in the House the relevant documents in connection with the proposed Canada-India agreement, so we can study precisely the points on which there was a breakthrough and make a judgment as to whether existing and prospective agreements with other countries will lead to the same situation?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have grave doubts about the desirability of tabling documents which have not been accepted but are purely negotiating papers ad referendum. I have explained quite clearly the basic difference between us and India on this question. The ad referendum paper referred to safeguards solely on RAPP and to no other part of the Canada-India supplied nuclear system.

Mr. Roche: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister consider tabling the documents initialled by Ivan Head early in March when he was conducting preliminary negotiations, and were the negotiations being conducted with the authority of the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the documents I have been referring to are the ad referendum documents initialled by the Canadian authorities.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasant change to have the minister ask me a question rather than the reverse. If I can briefly respond to the question, Canada's initiative does not deal merely with the obvious position under NPT with inspection of our facilities. It also means we have to move in terms of accepting sanctions as a result of failure to meet the commitments made under NPT which are not inherent in that agreement, and consequently in doing so we initiate the beginnings of the kind of police force that will provide the only safety that will be effective.

The minister might respond to this question, Mr. Speaker. Is he willing to say that Canada will submit to an international police force, and the sanctions inherent therein in terms of inspection of its own nuclear facilities, provided other countries will do the same in regard to their facilities, so we can take the matter one step further?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite clear what the hon. member has in mind in mentioning sanctions. It seems to me that the existence of the London club of nuclear suppliers and the possible addition of other members is a very effective method of applying sanctions, because if all suppliers agree on the same standards and are willing to enforce them, a very important sanction comes into play—the withdrawal of supplies and materials. That, to me, is an extremely major sanction to apply and is, indeed, the purpose behind the suppliers' club.

With respect to the question about an international force, I hope the hon. member will give more thought to this and make a more detailed proposal at a later date, hopefully before the General Assembly of the United Nations meets so I can have the benefit of his further reflections.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary question. I understand Canada has been in negotiation with Pakistan in regard to supplying that nation with a reactor. Would the minister advise the House what effect the decision relating to India has had on the proposed sale of a reactor to Pakistan?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that it is bound to have an effect on the negotiations. Certainly, I am not clear at the moment what the effect will be, but it was open to Pakistan to conclude an agreement with us prior to this particular announcement and that did not take place. Obviously, this particular decision is bound to affect the Canadian attitude on further negotiations with Pakistan, but I am not precisely clear how. I am quite clear in my own mind, but I have no authority since the matter must be considered by my colleagues at an early date.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, I express my pleasure at this announcement. Although further co-operation with India has been refused on the basis that a moral obligation with regard to nuclear proliferation has not been met, I feel Canada is taking a strong moral position of which we can be proud. I also suggest we must be careful to see that this strong position is not eroded. It may well be interpreted as being hypocritical and discriminatory unless it is universally applied by all nations. I hope this is just the beginning of that moral stance.

In discussing the matter earlier today, reference was made not only to safeguards and to nuclear proliferation but to another important area, namely, the environment. Storage and disposal of nuclear waste remains a problem. Is the minister accepting, in his statement, the moral obligation and responsibility to ensure that in future agreements adequate safeguards will be provided to protect the environment from the proliferation of nuclear waste material such as plutonium 239? Would the minister also refer the question of Canada's policy on the sale of nuclear reactors abroad either to the external affairs committee or to a special joint committee?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the application of Canadian policy is non-discriminatory. We have been able to secure the same provisions in our negotiations with India that we secured in the agreement with, for example, the Republic of Korea. We have been able to continue our nuclear co-operation. I believe the case of India is extraordinary because it is the only case where an explosion took place using Canadian-supplied materials and technology, contrary to the understandings we had reached with India. However, I will let my statement stand. I do accept an obligation toward the environment with respect to nuclear transfers.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions through the usual channels and there is consent by all parties to reverting to routine proceedings at eight o'clock this evening in order to receive a statement from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). With consent, I would request a House order to the effect that the House shall revert to routine proceedings at 8 p.m., May 18, 1976, in order to permit the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to make a statement and table a document.

● (1550)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations, as my friend has indicated, and we are agreeable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Beaudoin: D'accord.

Mr. Speaker: Such an order can be made at this time, of course, with the unanimous consent of the House. I take it there is unanimous consent that such a motion be put, and that it is the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Wenman.]

Mr. Speaker: Carried, and it is so ordered that the House shall revert to routine proceedings at eight o'clock later this day in order to permit the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) to make a statement and table a document.

IRISH MOSS MARKETING AGENCY

Question No. 3,841—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

Has any agency or department conducted a feasibility study on the creation of a single marketing agency for Irish Moss in (a) Prince Edward Island (b) the Maritimes?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of the Environment and Regional Economic Expansion as follows: No.

PEI—FISHING SECTOR

Question No. 3,847—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

With reference to the fishing sector of the Prince Edward Island Comprehensive Development Plan, has any cost-benefit analysis been done for the programmes in Phase 1 and, if so (a) for whom (b) by whom (c) on what date (d) will it be made public?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of the Environment and Regional Economic Expansion as follows: No. Cost-benefit analysis is just one of a number of tools for the analysis and evaluation of development projects. In the case of the fishing sector of the Prince Edward Island Comprehensive Development, Plan, the need to build up a more detailed community information base and the importance of non-quantifiable social factors has led to the conclusion that a cost-benefit analysis would be of little value at this stage.

2. For each such grant to what (a) location was it directed (b) what was the amount (c) what was the year it was granted?

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: See Table following.

CBC RADIO NEWS—VANCOUVER, B.C.

Question No. 5,032—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Is the 10.00 p.m. news, CBC Radio, produced out of Vancouver to be cancelled as of April 1, 1977?

2. Will this Vancouver produced news which is presently geared to the whole Pacific Region be replaced by a news cast out of Toronto?

3. Who in CBC made the decision that as of April 1, 1977 the only news worth reporting in British Columbia should come from Toronto?

4. Will CBC Radio news staff in British Columbia be reduced because of this move?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The format of the 10 p.m.

radio news will be changed on April 1, 1977, and it will become a truly national program instead of being distributed, as is now the case, in the following pattern: Toronto production for the Atlantic provinces and central Canada; Winnipeg production for the CBC's Prairie and Alberta Regions; and Vancouver production for British Columbia.

2. The 10 o'clock news will be lengthened, and a section on sports news will be added. The program will make use of the extensive facilities of the CBC Radio central newsroom in Toronto: it will have international and national news prepared by network staff and regional news prepared by staff in the appropriate locations. The British Columbia news will be provided by Vancouver, Victoria and Prince Rupert news staff.

3. No such decision was made. The English Services Division of the CBC decided that the resources available in the British Columbia Region would be better devoted to improving British Columbia newscasts and British Columbia contributions to national newscasts than to the largely editing job involved in the present 10 p.m. news.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: The Federal Housing Action Program was announced in 1975, and covered Assisted Home Ownership, Assisted Rental, municipal grants and loans for water treatment facilities and mains. The first two have been in operation during the past year, and data reflecting this activity are shown in the following table. The last two had not become operative by the end of 1975.

LOANS GRANTED IN CONSTITUENCY OF CHAMPLAIN UNDER THE FARM IMPROVEMENTS LOANS ACT

Question No. 5,245—Mr. Matte:

1. Has the Department of Finance ever granted loans under the Farm Improvements Loans Act to farmers in the Constituency of Champlain and, if so, how many?

2. What was (a) the minimum and maximum amount (b) the maximum rate of interest?

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1 and 2. Under the Farm Improvement Loans Act which is administered by the Department of Finance the government offers guarantees for loans provided by banks. The banks decide whether an applicant qualifies and are required to take the same care that is required of a bank in the conduct of its normal business and to use normal banking practices in drawing up agreements and servicing the loans. Statistics respecting such loan guarantees are not maintained on a constituency basis.

NATIONAL DEBT

Question No. 5,400—Mr. Beatty:

1. What is the total national debt for 1976?

2. What will be the total amount paid in 1976 for carrying charges on the national debt?

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. The gross public debt was $69,111 million as at December 31, 1975. The net debt on the same date was $22,312 million. During the year the gross debt will vary as outstanding debt is retired, new debt issued and as the balances in the superannuation accounts and other liability accounts change.

2. Gross public debt charges are recorded in the budgetary accounts and are forecast in the Main Estimates on an accrual basis. The difference between the amount paid during a year and the charges accrued, depends on the timing of interest payments to the holders of government securities. In the case of Canada Savings Bonds, the timing of interest payments is dependent upon the public's timing of bond and interest coupon redemptions. The Main Estimates forecast of gross public debt charges for 1976-77 is $4,650 million while tabled estimates for 1975-76 amounted to $3,930 million.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There was discussion at one time about the document which is sent to the official opposition and others covering the answers to questions and containing the names of the members to whom the particular questions pertain. I have the document here today, and it does not contain—

Mr. Blais: It is on the second page.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I beg your pardon. I am sorry; I stand corrected.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Friday, May 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I had just begun my few remarks concerning this bill. I intend to be fairly brief. I have listened very carefully to many other members who have preceded me, many of whom have had a great deal of experience in this House and others who are here, as I am, for the first time following the last election. Let me say I have respect for all sides of the question. I have found little I can criticize, and I am not prepared to challenge others for their points of view as to whether capital punishment should be restored or should be abolished. It is necessary for me, I believe, to answer this question for myself in a free and open way, and it is for me to state my case so that those in my riding will have a clear understanding of what I have to say on this issue. I do not intend to question the statistics put forward by others, and in no way do I wish to call them into account. I am sure all hon. members have attempted to be honest and fair in their approach and in informing their constituents of the facts as they see them and as they have researched them.

I found it very difficult, as I imagine other members did, to answer the tremendously important question: Do I represent myself, or my constituents who elected me, in the free vote on this bill? Indeed, it will be a free vote on this side, and I think that will be evident when two people who work as closely together as myself and the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) vote differently on this matter, as I am sure we will. This will clearly indicate that no instructions have come from the whip on this side, nor from the leader of our party. We have been enjoined to review the situation and to vote as free members of this House on the basis of conscience.

As to the matter of representing my constituency, I have taken this very seriously. It is an honour to attempt to follow the example of many other members of the House, particularly those of my own area around Hamilton, Brantford and the Pensula municipalities, whether they be members of the Liberal party, the Conservative party or the NDP. I have noted how carefully and how sincerely they have made their decisions and showed an interest in the feelings of their ridings. I have tried in some way to imitate them because I do feel that imitation is the most sincere form of flattery. If I come out of this as well as they have in making up their minds, I will feel honoured and will at least be able to look at myself in the mirror.

The constituency I represent is a very interesting one. I have asked myself how my constituents think in respect of this issue. I have done all the normal things, including sending out surveys. I made certain my constituents received an every-constituent mailing which indicated to them the details of the peace and security package, without any editorial comment, just the details of the bill. At the same time, I assured them I would listen to them at open meetings, would meet with them in supermarkets, as I came out of the church, on the streets, and at sporting events: I would listen to what they had to say to me on this matter.

I set the stage for them to comment by setting forth the peace and security package of this government which contained the bill which first of all attempted to give peace of mind to the Canadian public, a public which at this moment seems to be very fearful of what is happening on our streets. The peace and security package indicated that our law enforcement agencies are important and that it may be unfortunate that we send people to prison, but that we felt we must in some way give the Canadian public adequate protection. Also, in proposing the legislation concerning the licensing and holding of guns we attempted to say, not that we could deal with the criminal element but at least in some way we might prevent some of the tragedies which occur because of the possibility that people handling weapons might use them in a way to hurt those they love.

It is my belief that through bail reform and our efforts to deal with prisoners, rehabilitation and parole—making certain parole is earned, and not automatic—we are saying to the Canadian public that this is the moment we are strongly behind our law enforcement agencies which serve us so well, and this is the moment we are strongly behind our courts in an attempt to give adequate security to the people.

If it is correct that we are providing this kind of security to Canadians, then at this time we recommend this bill which would once and for all put aside the death penalty as a means of punishment in respect of capital murder, substituting instead a penalty which would confine the convicted person to prison for a period of time to ensure that he or she will not be a danger on our streets. This is the context in which we have talked about abolishing capital punishment.

The bill concerning the peace and security package is now before the committee, where amendments can be made if it falls short of what we require and is not acceptable to certain people in Canada. We are now debating the principle on second reading of the capital punishment issue. I have heard from the people in my riding, having received about a 14 per cent reply to my survey and having listened to the people on the street, but I cannot say only what was contained in those replies to my survey. I cannot say just what somebody said to me in the supermarket. I cannot say just what somebody said to me coming out of church. I have now to reply in some informed way concerning what I believe is the best way I can serve my constituency and the Canadian public for the benefit of all concerned at this moment in casting my vote.

I believe that when I talk about my constituency it is like holding up a mirror. I have to hold a mirror up to them to indicate to them what they see themselves as. If I hold up the wrong image, then they will say that I do not know my constituents. What is the image I see: what do I see in that mirror of Hamilton Mountain? I see a group of people who enjoy living in a community which is part of the larger community of Hamilton and is part of a large province, Ontario, which is a province of Canada. But although they are citizens of the world, they feel very much part of Hamilton Mountain as an area served by its own small newspaper, served by its own cable TV, and an area that has its own junior Fincups although they were for all of Hamilton in the Memorial Cup.

This is an area which has its own recreational areas, its own churches and its families living and joining together among the various ethnic groups. This is the Hamilton Mountain I know. I know there are some people there who would say that we must retain capital punishment because this is the only way we can deal with the ultimate crime. I know there are others who would speak out and say no, who would say they are for the right of life theory, the theory of the right of children, the right of man and woman, the right of the aged, and therefore the right to life. So when I hold up the mirror, all those images come forward and now I must try to interpret how I can best serve all my constituency, remembering that included with that fine community, ultimately, is Ontario, Canada and possibly the world.

We must remember that poisonous weeds bloom well in prison air. We have to remember the simple thought that the people in prison sometimes nurture the foulest and most evil thoughts. Very little good grows within prison. When those who are in prison see the person who is described as the one who killed the thing he loved, knowing that all hope is taken from this person, knowing that this person now must indeed dance the dance that has no floor, knowing that this person will have his life taken, they find that quite often something dies in them, too. Something in them dies in respect of their feeling for society. Something in them is completely gone when they think about a society which will not take upon itself responsibility for the evil that exists and which will not accept its own face in the mirror, but will take a life and say, "There; it is solved and gone".

I have to say, for my side of it, that I cannot believe that. I believe that all men in some way kill the thing they love. Some, as it is said, do it with a bitter word, some use flattery, and some use a kiss. All of us share in any crime that exists in society. There is no need to ask for whom the bell tolls, for indeed it always tolls for thee or me. I am involved in mankind. I have no right to be a peninsula, sitting all alone. I am part of a society which kills. I am part of a society which takes life. I do not want a state which decides it will use that right. I do not want capital punishment to be legalized, even if criminals use capital punishment on one another.

I make it clearly emotional. I make it clearly straightforward. I claim no statistics to back up my argument. I have no desire to argue concerning whether or not it is a deterrent. I have to stand so that I represent in some way that constituency so that they can take a clear look at me. This is what they will do, and this is what they will see—a person who believes that those in his constituency of different persuasions have a right to state their case and be respected for it. But for my side I will stand firmly for realizing that when, indeed, we decide to take life, then we have decided to go the same route as the person we are condemning. I still feel there will be those who might think that this is the soft way, that this is a way which will not serve us well.

I feel that if we were, indeed, to take lives and were to hold at our disposal the power to do that, then we would have done nothing but commit capital punishment which is what those people had committed. I cannot feel that this is correct. I cannot believe it is right. I will not accept that the only resort we have is to turn to the ultimate taking of a life and to admit that in our society we have to say it is all over, that if we get rid of that weed we will get rid of the next one that grows up.

I have heard it all before. They take the young and send them off to war. But killing does not stop killing. I think that must be said in very strong terms. I really am not interested in the comments of those who want to take life. I am really not interested in saying that they are right or wrong. I am interested in telling you that I believe I represent my own riding, the Canadian people, the young and the old, the young who represent our future and the old who represent our past. I say no Canadian government should ever again take life in the name of legality. Therefore, I will support the bill and strongly support the abolition of capital punishment.

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I am taking part in this debate today on behalf of the constituents of Hochelaga who elected me six months ago already. It is my first opportunity to take part in a very important debate. I shall express the views of my constituents on this very important issue, capital punishment. At the outset, let me say that I consulted the people in my riding in a sort of referendum to find out whether they favour the abolition or the maintenance of the death penalty. Out of 24,000 questionnaires sent out, I received more than 2500 replies. You will note, Mr. Speaker, that when the vote will be taken, I shall vote according to the wishes of the majority of my constituents because, to my mind, it is a way for them to take part in such an important decision.

Mr. Speaker, through my intervention, I would like to make two points: first, without repeating what all my colleagues have already said, it will of course be the matter of upholding the death penalty, but with the possibility of commuting this penalty to life imprisonment.

The second point I will deal with is prevention which in the long run will have concrete results. Of course, if we should adopt the principle that capital punishment should be maintained for the time being, such a decision would surely curb the impulses of certain individuals who will have to think about it twice before committing a crime. But, on the other hand, what might solve the problem in the long run is the second point I have just mentioned, namely prevention, but I will come back to that.

Before going any further, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote a remark of one of constituents when he answered my referendum. That person is a retentionist who would agree to a possible commutation to life imprisonment. I will quote what he said and it should be noted with due respect for the opinions of all other colleagues who could have a different view:

> The abolitionist trend points to human dignity; the abolitionist trend seems to ignore, alas, that not only criminals but also victims are human beings and that citizens should be entitled to maximum protection since we claim to be civilized; let us see this happen in reality without being naïve about it.

That is the way, Mr. Speaker, I will deal with the subject.

Let us look at the first part of my speech, that is the upholding of capital punishment. Of course, my conscience says I will not kill but perhaps we should ask ourselves the following question, namely if the one who killed asked himself that very same question. I do not know whether he asked himself that question, yet he commited a crime. So, Mr. Speaker, our first duty in this House is to make sure all Canadians have the maximum protection possible. An individual who goes into a bank or elsewhere with a gun and deliberately kills someone, knew beforehand that if he were in a difficult situation he would shoot. So we must take all appropriate means that is drastic means to protect society, just like the criminal takes drastic means to achieve his purposes. And the immediate means is the upholding of capital punishment, not in all cases, of course.

When you consider passionate crime or second degree murder, there are of course some lower degrees to consider. If someone has killed someone else, that does not necessarily make him an habitual criminal. But in many cases, he is a criminal.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians are presently in some way held as hostages by a minority of citizens we call criminals. I will give here some examples not to repeat what the previous speakers have said. There is the manager of a jewellery or of some business on his way to the bank for a deposit: he is attacked, shot down and falls to the ground; his assaillant shoots him once more to make sure he will move no more. This criminal has had no thought for the respect of human life. Let us consider the child who gets killed by a bullet when a criminal gets hold of a school bus and races through a town; after a while, a shot is fired, a child is hit and killed; yet that child was not responsible, and yet he has been killed. Has this individual stopped to wonder whether to the best of his knowledge and belief he would not kill? Yet, those are things which happen and are often seen. Several examples could be found.

I can quote here also from another of my constituents and I shall read more of these comments in the course of my speech. He says this:

"A member of my family, a father of eight children, was horribly murdered for a mere $88."

Mr. Speaker, when things get so bad that people can, for minimal sums of money, take the lives of our fellow citizens, it is our duty here in this House to ensure maximum protection to the people of our country. Of course, I am willing to respect the views of those who would rather abolish capital punishment. But unfortunately, we know very well that things are pretty bad. We need only think, for instance, of organized crime. We have seen the inquiry of the Québec Police Commission, how drugs are given to young people, how they are lured, caught and how they become total wrecks. That is crime and it is just as criminal, in my opinion, as killing somebody.

Capital Punishment

Mr. Speaker, when I was working in a hospital in Montreal before my election to the House of Commons, within six months I saw two young people of about 20 dying from absorption of mescaline. Who had supplied them that drug? It seems to me that this also is a crime, but in this case, the criminal kills by inches. Nevertheless, that criminal, the one who provides the drug, when caught, is sent to the penitentiatry for 10, 15 or 20 years maybe, but he knows he will be able to get out of there. However, he killed some people, but this is not taken into consideration. Mr. Speaker, these criminals are guilty of killing these victims of drugs. These are the ones who supplied them and I think they would deserve being hanged. Unfortunately, they are convicted for several years of mprionmnt, when we manage to catch them.

Mr. Speaker, we must bear in mind that a few years ago, when the government amended the law, we could read: "Anyone killing a policeman or a prison guardian will be hanged." Never did it happen so far. These are comments made to us by the population. They tell us: "We do not trust the government. It will not keep them in, not even for 25 or 35 years." Anyway, Mr. Speaker, what does he have to lose, the one who is convicted for 25 or 35 years, without any chance of being paroled? Killing one more person, two more, three more? He has nothing to lose. He will not feel uneasy if he gets a few extra years. This criminal has absolutely nothing to lose. Therefore, he will start again and the hazard will still be the same, and the population will no longer have any guaranty of protection.

At this stage, I would also like to mention some of the remarks made by my constituents, in my inquiry. I quote this one who is in favour of the retention of capital punishment and who says this: "Lets us get rid of hardened criminals before you and me are the next victims." Another tells us: "Now justice is encouraging crime more and more, at the expense of honest citizens who will soon have to take the law into their own hands."

Mr. Speaker, these few remarks lead one to think, and we see that people tend to have a feeling of insecurity. Today, when we go to a restaurant or elsewhere, we do not know any more if we will come out of it alive. An individual can come in, make a holdup, fire at those who are in this restaurant or elsewhere, and make a few innocent victims. However, these victims are innocent. We must consider those things and be consistent. It is our duty to warn potential murderers, through this legislation, to think it over before they decide to take another person's life, for it is up to them to choose whether they want to take the chance of being hanged. It is their own risk and their own life which will be at stake. In my view, if we elect by majority vote to retain the death penalty, we are giving the would-be criminal a warning and if he does not heed it, that is too bad for him.

Mr. Speaker, I would like now to quote from a letter which was sent to me last week by an inmate of a maximum security penitentiary. Here is what he says:

> Really, I would rather be hanged ten times than serve 25 or 35 years here but on the other hand it does not make sense to me that I should get 25 years or the death penalty for murdering a policeman and only a few years for a private citizen.

[Mr. Lavoie.]

Mr. Speaker, that is the testimony of a person now in detention who talks about himself. There is also the other side of the problem, that of prevention: it is the one that, in my view, should have been adopted, however, the one for which I would have voted. On the other hand, I will give my reasons later on. But before discussing that, it might be appropriate to ask each of my colleagues whether they have wondered why an individual has reached this degree of criminality. How did he get to that point? And certain examples should be given.

I am not saying that all those who are in prison have committed murders or thefts, what we call in general terms a crime, but rather I will give here an example of how a young person can come to juvenile delinquency and, eventually, to criminality, while keeping in mind the environment where he lives.

Let me give you as an example the head of a family who may be 40 or 45 years old, who has no formal education to speak of, who has just lost his job and lives off unemployment insurance while trying to find work. He cannot find a job because he does not have any diplomas, or else he is told he is too old.

Consequently, having exhausted his unemployment insurance benefits, he ends up at some point living off social welfare. That man just has to ask for welfare, and his request is complied with. He has children who are going to school and, at some point, as we know, with the high cost of living we are all aware of, the wife, who manages the family budget fairly efficiently, finds that the bills are too high for the money she gets. In time, she becomes nervous, irritable and rightly so. All of a sudden, all hell breaks loose in the family. The wife starts nagging her husband. And what does the husband do? In some cases he goes to the tavern to drown his frustrations, his problems and everything else, and the home continues to fall apart.

The child who lives in that atmosphere may be 15, 16 or 17, or even less. He goes to school and then comes a day when he wants some pocket money. What will he do? He will quit school to find work, to get a job. At some point or other, for some reason or other, he loses his job, tries to get a new one and then realizes that he does not have enough schooling. But for him going back to school is useless for he would rather work to earn some money.

Then, if he is no longer eligible for unemployment insurance, he will go to the welfare office. As soon as he gets the chance, this youngster will begin stealing here and there and he will finally get caught. Then he will be sent to prison and from that moment, mixed with habitual criminals, he will become a true criminal. This is one of the aspects of the problem. Instead of paying about $14,000 a year for a prisoner, if we had given $1,000 and $2,000 more a year to this family, not only would we have saved money, but we would have saved an individual who, instead of living an abnormal life behind bars could have lived like anyone else in society an honest and ordered life.

Mr. Speaker, we must review our social and economic policy, particularly as regards families which, in unprivileged classes, are the victims of this system. Parents cannot always be held responsible for the present situation and they did not want their children to end up that way.

Yet we have reached this point due to circumstances. Of course, Mr. Speaker, everything will not be solved overnight, but I am satisfied that through a review of our social legislation, we could substantially reduce juvenile delinquency and crime rates within the next five, ten or fifteen years. We must nevertheless be honest to the worker who is honest. Those who work for minimum wages, for instance, will be deprived of electricity or gas if they do not pay their bills. Yet the inmate does not face such problems. I do not say he is living like a king in jail, not at all.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to another case on the human view point. What the individual has done is obviously illegal but what prompted him? A few years ago, a married man, the father of a number of young children who was living on welfare with a minimum income, decides at a given time to register with the Canada Manpower Centre because he does not have the education level that is usually asked for. Therefore, he gets by during a few years. He receives both welfare benefits and allowances from the Canada Manpower Centre for a retraining course.

His goal in doing so is to improve his situation, but at the same time, of course, to provide his family with a basic income of about $125 a week. Of course, after a few years, he is caught, prosecuted and accused like a vulgar criminal, being sentenced to two years for defrauding social welfare and two years for cheating the Department of Manpower and Immigration. That is four years altogether, two consecutive years for each charge, though he has only been convicted nothing more than getting payments by cheating and lying.

This individual had, of course, obtained the necessary diploma but when he was caught he was put in jail where he did a number of months and was released on parole for his good behaviour. This individual cannot find a job because he has a record so now he lives on social welfare.

Mr. Speaker, it has cost more to the state to convict him and support him in a penitentiary than if he had been forced to reimburse or to pay the fine. Of course I do not want to review the trial, because it is an example I am giving, a living example which is, in my opinion, inhuman, and for that reason I wanted to point out to what extent our social laws can sometime create circumstances in which someone is likely to commit that kind of offence and then encourage him to return to crime and live in it. Fortunately, this very individual did not go back to crime. So, Mr. Speaker, we will have to review our criminal system because there again, we can find examples which can help us understand why some individuals cannot be rehabilitated. There are several reasons for that. Even if he is rehabilitated, why is it in our present system, he has to return to crime.

I remember a former inmate told me once that the first time he went to prison, a big guy introduced himself and greeted him with both fists, stating he was the boss and not the inmate. That kind of welcome to prison certainly does not lead the way to rehabilitation. Of course I do not imply by that that all those looking after inmates act the same way, I suppose this is only a minority and I would not like to generalize.

There is also the matter of parole. There are individuals who went out on parole, committed another offence, came back to prison and got a second parole, while another who committed one offence only, is almost rehabilitated, offers every safeguard as far as job and family are concerned without any apparent problem, he has everything to live a normal life in society but is denied parole. It is discouraging for a young fellow almost rehabilitated, when he knows another inmate goes out on parole after a second offence.

There is also the matter of parole, and I am quite familiar with that. Here is an individual who stole a car some ten years ago. After all this is not such a serious offence, he did his time, or least part of it because he went out on parole, and since then he has never committed another offence. He asks for pardon. He is married with growing children, he is an honest citizen, he wants to get a better job to ensure his family's future with higher wages, but for unknown reasons the pardon officials constantly delay the decision. Why? Mr. Speaker, in cases where offenders who are fully rehabilitated without any question meet with refusals for so small an offence, they being are being marked, they are prevented from living a decent life, they are pushed back on the way to crime. Those organizations should absolutely not be tolerated. They should be reformed, and the sooner the better in the interest not only of inmates that can be rehabilitated, but also of our institutions and the Canadian people as a whole.

There is another point that I would like to make. In certain areas, youths purchase glue in restaurants or stores. These are the youths who may become juvenile delinquents, and later on criminals. We must put a stop to this. Of course, I am not saying that tradesmen do this consciously. Young people may need glue for their school work, but I say that the government should control the glue market immediately to prevent our young people from continuing to sniff glue to drug themselves. Of course, Mr. Speaker, there will always be criminals, but when I speak about prevention and results which will be felt in five, ten or fifteen years, this is a fact, and I am certainly not alone in thinking and saying this.

If we want to considerably reduce the crime rate, prevention must start with our young people. We must invest the sum required in these young people and the groups that truly want to help young people and prevent them from becoming delinquents, to show them something different from hanging on street corners in the doorway of certain restaurants, either to smoke drugs or sniff glue or what have you.

Mr. Speaker, instead of thinking about building prisons for future needs, we should think of our youths as the men of tomorrow instead of as the criminals of the future who will fill these prisons. Mr. Speaker, before closing, I would like to tell the House that I shall vote for the retention of the death penalty, not because I want to take the life of someone else; far from it, Mr. Speaker. My first duty is to protect the majority of citizens, and to do so, I must maintain my position.

Moreover, the great majority of my constituents are for retention, and I shall vote according to the wishes of my fellow citizens, whom I am proud to represent. I shall close on a comment of one my constituents who favours abolition of the death penalty. His comment supports what I said earlier about improving our social legislation on the one hand, and improving our penitentiary system on the other hand.

I would like to close, Mr. Speaker, by quoting the words of one of my fellow citizens from Hochelaga: The death penalty is not the only way to kill a man, he can die of a sick society.

[English]

Mr. William Andres (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity this afternoon to take part in the controversial debate on capital punishment, a subject we are debating while our country goes through serious times. Let me make one thing clear: I am not taking part in this debate just to let my constituents know my position, because they know my position very well. They sent a delegation to the House this afternoon. Actually, some of my younger constituents are in the gallery this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andres: Much has been said about capital punishment. Members have argued in favour of outright retention, retention for certain offences, and outright abolition. We have heard many statistics mentioned. You can prove almost anything with statistics. But I take another position, a position on which our constitution is based. Mr. Speaker, our constitution is based on Christian principles. I maintain that we should consider the Christian principles on which our consitution is based and see what the Scriptures have to say. Members have based their arguments on what the Scriptures say. The House has heard arguments about the deterrent aspect of capital punishment, about the need to protect society, and so on. We all want to protect society: there is no argument in that regard.

Some members have talked about punishment and retribution. To support their arguments they have quoted from the Bible passages such as: "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth," and "Whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." Still another passage quoted is: "He that smiteth a man so that he die, shall be surely put to death." Mr. Speaker, I insist that members who rely on the Scriptures to make their argument have not gone far enough. They stop short, not telling the House all that the Scriptures say. If one is to base one's position on what the Scriptures say, one should cite all 16 instances in which the Scriptures prescribe capital punishment as punishment for an offence. The Scriptures prescribe death for such things as adultery, cursing one's parents, false worship, and working on the sabbath—and which one of us is not guilty under at least one of these offences?

Therefore, if members want to rely on passages in the Scriptures, let them quote all pertinent passages; let them not be selective. Too often people will quote passages from the Scriptures because those passages support their position. Such people say to themselves, "This passage meets my criterion; therefore I will quote it."

[Mr. Lavoie.]

We must consider the moral aspect of the question. In the end, the murderer is responsible to his Maker, his God. He is also responsible to society and the state. The state must deal with the murderer and with the criminal. The question is, how shall the state deal with the criminal, and what are the responsibilities of the state in relation to the criminal? Also, can responsibility be laid at the feet of society. I suggest that yes, society has a responsibility. We are all guilty. Therefore, let us consider the alternatives to death.

All the retentionist arguments I have heard are reminiscent of revenge. I submit that vengeance cannot be regarded as a solution to violence. True justice is devoid of any element of revenge. Unfortunately, judging from what I hear and read in the media and from what various people have said, the element of revenge colours people's thinking. I do not believe in revenge, yet constantly one hears arguments smacking of revenge. I have heard arguments about deterrence. You can support your arguments on the deterrent aspect of capital punishment with statistics, which have been used. You can talk about countries which have abolished the death sentence and compare their murder rates with the rates of countries which have retained it and, no doubt, recite most interesting figures. But I have not been able to find conclusive proof showing that the death penalty is a deterrent. I submit that it is not a deterrent. Many factors influence the murder rate in a society, factors such as our present social instability, the influence of TV-depicted violence and the increased pressures of coping in a fast-moving, technologically complex society.

The use of drugs and alcohol is a crutch when we are unable to cope. There is also the aspect of overexpenditure and gambling. You can bring all this together. When society is not able to cope, it turns to violence. The deterrent aspect has never been proven. Sir Robert Mark, commissioner of metropolitan police in London, England, spoke in Toronto recently and said:

> The best deterrent to crime is the likelihood of detection followed by the certainty of conviction, rather than reliance on savage penalties unlikely to be applied in many cases because of a proper finding of guilt prevented by the operation during investigation and trial, of safeguards rightly designed to protect the innocent from a sentence of death.

He further stated:

> —the continuance of the death penalty prevents the reforms necessary to increase the effectiveness of criminal justice.

I do not believe that our citizens are looking for blood. They are looking for the protection of society. As I listened to the arguments to both sides of this question I found that everyone is looking for the protection of society. We need this protection today even more than before. However, the death penalty is not a solution for the protection of society. Protection can be better achieved through revamping our judicial and penal systems. We must promote speedy arrests, certainty of arrest, speedy trials and severity of punishment. Stronger and more rigid enforcement of sentences, bail and parole laws will work better for the protection of society. This will also allow for the possibility of reform and more equitable justice than the mere act of retribution.

The protection of society can be better served by facing the problems that breed crime and violence in our society. Society will be better protected when we all face our responsibility for the type of society we have and for the elements perpetuated therein. Juries are often reluctant to convict if the death penalty is retained. They are more likely to acquit the offender. That is another reason why abolition is of greater protection to society.

We must take a positive approach. The death penalty is final and does not allow for any chance of reform or rehabilitation. Capital punishment is an irrevocable decision without any hope of redemption. A mistaken verdict can mean an irrevocable tragedy, and judicial error is always possible. This means that ultimate injustice could be performed by the state. We would be naive to believe it is very rare to sentence the innocent. Between 1889 and 1927, 50 of the 406 persons sent to Sing Sing for execution were found, upon reconsideration, to have been sentenced in error. We have moved from that day, but we still have error. Error still creeps in because we are human.

The possibility of such costly error must make one question the morality of capital punishment. There are verifiable inequities in the application of the death penalty. More often than not it is the wretched of the earth, made more pitiable by the despicable crime of murder, who become the victims of capital punishment. The well-to-do, the educated, the respectable who commit capital offences rarely forfeit their lives. While it is difficult for a rich man to get into heaven, it seems even more difficult to get him into the hangman's noose.

We have a responsibility. Imposing the death penalty avoids our responsibility and does not offer a solution to changing and correcting the problems in our society which are the source of crime and violence in the first place. Criminal behaviour is a cry for help. Society is not answering the needs; it barely hears the cry. It does not have time. We are all too busy doing our own thing and are not concerned about our fellowman. In fact, in many ways we step on him. We in society all have a responsibility for the values we adhere to and for what takes place within our human community. To simply say "yes" or "no" to capital punishments shirks our responsibility to face the problems and underlying questions of why there is crime, what are the sources or root causes and what can we do to ensure and work toward improving these conditions and preventing violence?

We must look into our homes. There is instability in our homes where our children are growing up. There is disrespect between the parents, between the parents and the children, and vice versa. We must look into our communities, school and institutions. There is disrespect for authority. This is the kind of environment in which our children are growing up. What can we expect? We can take this a little further into our employer-employee relationships. Everyone has heard the expression "work to rule". People don't seem to have any pride in workmanship any more. Where are the values that we once held so true and dear? These are some of the problems our children are facing. We must take a serious look at this and accept our responsibility. There is disrespect for law, order and authority. Each of us must examine his own responsibility. It is easy to point the finger at the family next door—but we must look at ourselves. Are we accepting our responsibility?

What are the alternatives? There is penal, judicial and parole reform, as already mentioned, advocating strict punishment but in a more positive and productive framework. There is the question of how a criminal must pay back his debt to society. Punishment can be viewed in a more positive way by providing alternate means. A penal system must be developed where productivity and positive values are encouraged as an alternative to the negative approach to violence by sanctioning the death penalty.

The question is often asked, "What about the victim? Much has been said about the criminal, but what about the victim?" I am too practical to really worry about the victim. In fact, I say there is nothing we can do for the victim at this point. It is a fact that has been completed. As much as I might have sympathy or compassion, there is very little that can be done for the victim at this point.

But what about the families? Here is where we come in. Here is where society can help. We can offer compensation to the families affected. They should be given encouragement and assistance. Society as a whole must provide special comfort and service to the afflicted so that we all absorb the effect of the violence. We can all share in it. We can try to prevent such tragedies happening again by ensuring that the criminal is removed from society and confined appropriately, again stressing the steps to be taken to improve society and restrict those elements which harbour or perpetuate crime. Legal imposition of the death penalty does not redress the wrong done and offers no positive answer to society. Moreover, it denies any hope for the reform and rehabilitation of the criminal.

I challenge my colleagues to consider seriously the responsibility which rests upon society, which rests upon each and every one of us, and to review the decisions they have taken to date and consider supporting this bill for the abolition of capital punishment.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth time I have taken part in and listened to debates in the House on this subject. It is not an easy decision to make. I think everyone has to ask himself: What is my position? He should then set it out immediately. My position is somewhat refined, in a sense, since I am a partial retentionist. I believe some form of capital punishment should be retained, and I ask hon. members to bear with me when I say "some form". Too often the principle is confused by consideration of the method of execution for planned, premeditated murder where conviction is based on direct evidence rather than on circumstantial evidence. There are many such cases and I shall refer to them.

With regard to this type of offence, I say there should be no exception. On the other hand, the Criminal Code provides for commutation in certain circumstances, and in exceptional cases where there is doubt or where any uncertainty arises at the trial—and it is always difficult to get a new hearing—it is possible for the cabinet to commute sentences, but this procedure should be used properly and always in accordance with the law.

I have in the past supported the idea that the death penalty should apply in the case of the murder of a police officer or prison guard. I also support the idea that it should apply to all persons convicted of premeditated, planned murder in cases where the verdict is based on direct evidence. Under the former terms of the Criminal Code there is a division between capital murder and non-capital murder. From my experience, I can say that defence counsel would tell the jury, before any evidence had been presented either by the Crown or by the defence, that much of the evidence to be presented would be circumstantial in nature, and in such cases the accused would be tried only on the charge of non-capital murder. I believe that system worked very well. I believe the death penalty should also apply in cases where a person is found guilty of treason, by which I mean treason in its real sense, the undermining of the country by unlawful insurrection, and that it should also apply in the case of the assassination of the monarch.

This afternoon, my right hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) directed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with reference to the abolition of capital punishment for treason, the unlawful overthrow of the government of Canada, or the assassination of the monarch. He stated in the preamble to his question that it might be very difficult for some abolitionists to vote for a bill which contained no provision for capital punishment in such cases. I do not think anyone who knows my right hon. friend would question his philosophy on this subject—we all know where he has stood with regard to it over the years. But this is an aspect which he has questioned.

I would call the attention of the government to the fact that we are living in times when violence is on the increase, when it does seem that violent groups can get together. I do not know whether the stories we have read recently with respect to threats to the Olympics is an exaggeration or not, but we do know what happened on another occasion when the Olympics were held. I suppose the answer given by the Prime Minister was the best he could do under the circumstances. He said, to paraphrase his words, that there should not be exceptions made in particular cases. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would remind you and other members of the House that on the three occasions in recent times when this subject has been discussed in the House, he himself voted for the provision of exceptions; he voted in favour of the application of capital punishment in particular cases. In other words, on those three occasions the issue before the House was not complete abolition; it was partial abolition and partial retention.

The government undertook to give that arrangement a trial for five years. Now, 2½ years later, we are at it again. I would point out, though, that the right hon. gentleman has commuted all the sentences passed by the courts since he became minister of justice and prime minister of the country. The situation in Canada has been one of abolition de facto, if not de jure. Members of the government have flaunted the law which they themselves developed and which was agreed to upon a vote in this chamber.

The position of the Progressive Conservative party, without any evasion or equivocation whatsoever, is that all our members will have complete freedom of thought and action in respect of this highly controversial and emotional matter. There will be no direction given to our members by our leader. All of us will speak freely as individuals and will vote freely. On the other hand, when asked whether members of the Liberal party will be given the opportunity to vote freely, both the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) wiffle and waffle before finally admitting that though the whip will not be on as far as ordinary members of parliament are concerned, it will certainly be on for members of the cabinet.

The excuse given is that since this is a government bill, it must be supported by the cabinet. Let us consider this proposition. The government could easily make it clear that whatever way the vote should go—in particular, should it go against the government, in support of retention—it would not constitute a vote of non-confidence in the government. Then Liberal members of the cabinet as well as those on the backbenches could vote freely. Not only is there control in the sense that 27 members of cabinet will not be allowed a free vote, but influence is effectively used in other ways. In an article written during the days when this party formed the government, the prime minister talked about the power to appoint parliamentary secretaries. They were told to toe the line.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is five o'clock. I will continue my remarks after supper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard)—Health; the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke)—Post Office; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Education.

It being five o'clock, pursuant to order made on Friday, February 27, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper.

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there has been the usual consultation and all parties agree we shall be dealing with order No. 55 in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is so ordered.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

COMMUNICATIONS

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH A UNIVERSAL EMERGENCY TELEPHONE NUMBER

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved that Bill C-255, to establish a universal emergency telephone number, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

● (1700)

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to debate this bill today. When I first came to this House—

Mr. Blais: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, might the table indicate whether the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) has spoken previously on this particular bill, in view of the fact that I understand this is not the first time that we have debated it?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I am advised by the officers at the Table that this is the first time it has been debated.

Mr. Blais: Then I stand corrected, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, if the parliamentary secretary had let me speak a minute longer he would have realized why we are debating the bill a second time, because I was going to say that when I came to this House in 1972, the then hon. member for Surrey-White Rock had this bill on the order paper. I remember talking to him about it a number of times, and when he retired from the House I telephoned him and asked whether I could have the privilege of putting it on the order paper in my name, and he agreed.

At the same time, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) had the foresight to do the same thing, and by the luck of the draw he got his bill on—I think it is Bill C-252 or C-253—and had it debated in the House before I did. However, I think this is a very worthwhile idea. I wanted to make sure that the former hon. member for Surrey-White Rock, Mr. Mather, who has now retired and who was an excellent member of the House of Commons—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reynolds: —was given credit for raising this matter previously.

Mr. Blais: Was he left-wing or right?

Mr. Reynolds: I really do not think it matters whether a member is left-wing or right-wing in private members' hour; we should try to put this sort of bill through more quickly so they can be passed into law. However, I know for a fact—and I might as well say this before I get into the content of the bill—that this afternoon the government is prepared to talk the bill out again, and this does disturb me greatly.

When the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore brought his bill before the House on Friday, March 26, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), a member of the NDP, talked about the bill and its merits and said it should go to committee. Then the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the House leader for the Conservative party, made a speech and also wished it to be sent to committee. Four Liberals then spoke and talked out a bill that one of their own members had put before the House.

Mr. Paproski: Shame.

Mr. Reynolds: They all agreed it was an excellent idea, but as we know, Mr. Speaker, this government does not want excellent ideas to be sent to committee. I hope that today some of the backbenchers opposite who have been asked to make speeches will just freeze in their seats and let this bill go to committee.

Mr. Paproski: Question.

Mr. Reynolds: I am quite prepared to let the bill go forward in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, if that is better for them. I just think it is the type of issue that should get to committee.

The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to amend the National Transportation Act by adding immediately after section 22(1)(i)(j) the words "provide for the establishment by all Canadian telephone companies of a universal emergency reporting telephone number". I feel a bill of this nature has a great deal of merit in light of the growing amount of emergency calls placed through the three regular means of emergency services.

A most recent example is one that took place in my constituency last Thursday. Viewers of the CBC "National" on Thursday night, May 13, will recall a clip of a shocked lady, a burned house and a demolished light plane, partially in the woman's kitchen and the rest in the backyard. This was by no means a humorous scene and it was not meant to be. One of the men in the plane was killed, the other was injured. The woman was in shock, but she managed to keep her wits enough to dial the operator. However, the line was busy. So was the police line. Finally she got through to the operator, but by that time she was very upset and could not make herself understood. Coupled with the fact of the plane crash was the woman's initial inability to get through to the operator, and by the time she did frustration had set in.

It would, of course, be presumptuous to think that a life would have been saved in this instance if an emergency telephone number had existed. What I am questioning, Mr. Speaker, is the process one faces in reporting emergencies in this country, and the subsequent delays on many occasions. Hypothetically, what if the woman's life was at stake? Would fate have waited until she had got the operator? The fact is that in many instances lives would have been saved in this country if the reporting procedure of emergencies was expedited.

The woman's major complaint after this incident was the delay in getting through, and then relying on the operator to contact the proper emergency service. It is the sheer frustration that makes these critical matters worse. I firmly believe that an emergency telephone number would alleviate some of the trauma of such incidents.

This incident in Richmond, B.C., is but one isolated case; we all appreciate the fact that many more occur every day, in most cases of a more severe nature where life and death situations exist. Nearly every Canadian is aware of the British "999" exchange, while in most parts of Canada we must rely on the "0" for operator, hope the line is not tied up, and rely on her to place the appropriate call for us. This practice is not only frustrating and time-consuming, but outmoded in light of the technology the phone companies have at their disposal.

I realize that problem of jurisdiction arises in properly implementing this service. I also realize that merely making "911" an emergency number does not solve the reporting aspect of emergencies. An entire co-ordinated system is needed, and so is total agreement among involved agencies to accept the same exchange. I fully realize that boundaries of emergency agencies seldom coincide with telephone exchange boundaries or municipal boundaries. Of course, it would be imperative to have all three major services included, police, fire and ambulance.

In the interest of saving human lives and preventing disaster, I cannot foresee any hesitancy on the part of these agencies, and surely not on the part of the telephone companies. The hurdles to be cleared in instituting such a number are minimal. I think the only reason for not implementing such a number would be out of sheer disinterest and lack of compassion, not out of inability to invent the proper machinery to handle this task.

An argument against the use of an emergency telephone number is the possibility of false alarms and errors in reporting an emergency. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the telephone companies have advanced their technology to the point where there is little chance of mistake. An example is "call, hold and trace", which holds up the line the "911" caller uses. This allows the emergency bureau to ring back the caller for verification. This ensures the proper use of this number and, above all, its expeditious use. Expediency is the end goal, a character which is so sorely lacking in our present emergency system.

The 911 number is not an esoteric one. It will be used at one time or another by all Canadians in one sort of an emergency or another. The 911 number has a broad sphere of influence and I think the public will support such an innovation. More than 45 million Americans are now being served by this 911 number. Last year, in the United States, some 6.5 million calls were placed to the 911 number in New York city. It has been considered a ringing success, and the interval required for a call to be relayed to an on-scene patrol car has dropped from two minutes to 35 seconds, and in a priority call situation to less than ten seconds.

Of course, abuses will occur along the way, as they have in the U.S., and that is part of the system. But surely the positive points outweigh the negative aspects: people will, over time, acquire confidence in the system, learn to use it wisely and only in times of emergency. The co-operation of municipal authorities will be needed, but since these same municipalities are the constitutional responsibility of the provinces, the two can get together, talk about the use of such a number and arrive at a logical and mutually agreeable arrangement.

We now have before us two other bills aimed at the protection and preservation of human life. I am sure each member is aware of the two I am referring to. Without overstating the case, I think that an emergency telephone number would have the same redeeming social value. The purpose of the bill is implicit: its sole purpose is to ensure that, if at all possible, human lives or tragedies will receive prompt attention in the face of adversity. Surely the social need for such a number overrides the jurisdictional argument.

It takes three seconds to dial 911 and over ten seconds to dial a seven-digit number. In a life or death situation, with a co-ordinated system and the 911 exchange this difference of seven seconds can in fact mean the survival of a human being. It would be a shame not to implement such a number when all the resources for such a service are at our disposal. Researchers all agree that a three-digit number can be learned and remembered by any child in the face of a crisis, but not too many will give good odds on the chances of remembering a seven-digit number. Even seven-digit numbers we dial regularly can escape us on occasion, and the chances of forgetting a long number in the face of a crisis or emergency are far greater.

Bell Canada and B.C. Telephone have both agreed to co-operate with municipalities. As for this jurisdictional and constitutional argument, no legislation is ever passed in these chambers without there being some jurisdictional difficulties. However, I hope the weight is not placed on that argument against such a number. I think those considerations should be secondary, if not tertiary, in debating the relevance of this bill.

The consequences of not implementing such an emergency telephone number in the near future, in face of the increasing rate of accidents, drug overdoses, poisonings and natural disasters, are self-evident. The gravity of this situation is too extreme to overlook the possibility of implementing such a number any longer and I would, therefore, urge hon. members of this House to allow this bill to proceed as quickly as possible to the committee so it can be discussed and passed in this House.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North-Nipissing East): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for following tha persistence of others in bringing forward a bill to establish a universal emergency telephone number. However, I am not going to spend almost three minutes of my speech talking about how other members are going to talk this bill out, as the hon. member did in talking his own bill out of the beginning of his speech.

I note that in the series of events the first reading of the hon. member's bill took place on October 15, 1974. The bill presented by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) also received first reading on October 15, 1974. The other bill referred to by the hon. member who is sponsoring this bill was presented to the House for first reading on January 15, 1973, by Mr. Mather. Bill C-252, an act to establish a universal telephone number, was introduced by the hon. member and read the first time on October 15, 1974. The other bill was identical to the bill before us today in the name of the hon. member. These private members' bills suggest that a section be added to the National Transportation Act to provide for the establishment by all Canadian telephone companies of a universal emergency reporting telephone number. Similar bills were introduced in 1973 and 1974, and the most recent debate on this subject was in 1975.

The idea of a universal emergency telephone number appears, in theory at least, to be a very worthy one. There are a number of practical problems with the bills, however. The bills appear to be redundant in that the principal telephone carriers subject to federal jurisdiction, Bell Canada and British Columbia Telephone, have already expressed willingness to supply the service and to co-operate with municipalities in this regard. In light of the demonstrated willingness of the telephone companies to design and install a system to meet the requirements of any particular municipality, legislation would probably serve to elicit an undesirable reaction from the carriers concerned.

As drafted, the bills purport to apply to all Canadian telephone companies, whereas all the major telphone companies except Bell Canada and British Columbia Telephone are presently subject to provincial regulations.

In his speech of March 26, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore said:

> My purpose for proceeding with Bill C-252 this afternoon is not so much in the expectation that the bill will be passed, a rare occurrence in this House for legislation initiated by private members, but rather in the hope that hon. members will see fit to allow the subject matter of the bill to proceed to committee for detailed study and discussion.

He then went on to say later in his speech:

> The establishment of a single emergency number through which people can summon police, fire or ambulance help in any city, not only in Canada but in all of North America, and progress in the United States has been very impressive, would be a very important step in the field of public safety. The idea is not new.

A community cannot establish a "911" emergency telephone service by simply changing over to a new telephone number. First, municipalities must be prepared to meet a number of requirements that range from resolving boundary disputes to organizing their major emergency agencies and establishing a central answering bureau. The number "911" is designed to be used for direct reporting of emergencies to an answering bureau serving a given area. The three-digit code 911 has been reserved as a universal emergency number because it is compatible with the long-range numbering plans and switching configurations of the telephone companies.

Jurisdictional boundaries of emergency agencies seldom coincide with either telephone exchange boundaries or municipal boundaries, and to avoid confusion agencies must be prepared to serve all those within an individual exchange or in exchanges having local calling with a core exchange where they may not have jurisdiction. Also, for the 911 service to be effective all three emergency services, police, fire and ambulance, should be included.

Emergency Telephone Number

Mr. J. D. Cunningham, director, provincial government relations, for Bell Canada said that where telephone boundaries and community boundaries do not coincide, Bell Canada will take part in discussions to work out solutions between the affected communities. He also suggested that when a decision is made to go ahead with 911, Bell Canada will do whatever it can to assist a contracting municipality in its efforts. This could range from assistance in the development of a publicity campaign to help in training 911 operators who staff the answering bureau.

There are now seven operational 911 systems in Canada. They are operating in St. John's, Newfoundland; Fredericton, New Brunswick; London, Ontario, and in four Alberta communities. Now there is an additional one in operation in the regional municipality of Waterloo, Ontario.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You missed Winnipeg and Brandon.

Mr. Hopkins: I am informed that I missed two. If they have them, I am glad for their sake. I might say that if we did have an emergency number which requires rapid attention, there is one number I would not hesitate to call, and that is the House of Commons number 2-4618, the number of the hon. member opposite.

I have before me a series of questions and answers that delve into this subject in a very concentrated manner. They are as follows:

1. Why was "911" selected for the universal emergency number?

   911 was selected for the universal North American emergency number because it is a brief and easily-remembered code.

   It is compatible with long range numbering programs and central office switching configurations. It is also a unique number, never having been authorized for assignment as a central office or area code. In addition it is consistent in format with other System service codes such as 411 for information and 611 for repair service.

2. What is the intent of having one universal emergency number 911?

   The emergency number has been offered to assist local public safety agencies in protecting the life, property and safety of the general public at the local level. It is the intent and hope that the one number 911 would apply to all emergency calls of a public safety nature in the area served since the advantages to the public depend on the universality of its use.

● (1720)

   It should be made clear however, that the 911 number will not replace existing 7-digit emergency numbers assigned to such services as police, fire and ambulance. These regular numbers will be retained along with the facility to dial "O" operator in the event of an emergency and receive the same assistance as at present.

3. Is Bell Canada prepared to work with key public officials in appropriate levels of government who indicate an interest in the introduction of 911 emergency service?

   Yes. Bell Canada is prepared to begin working with the various municipalities and agencies who indicate an interest in planning for the introduction of the 911 emergency number. Telephone Company advice and assistance is available as required in establishing an emergency calling arrangement which effectively meets the needs of safety agencies organized to handle emergencies on a community basis from a common answering bureau.

4. What factors should be considered in planning for the introduction of 911 emergency service?

   As Company representatives begin working with the various agencies and municipalities in planning for this new emergency service, many factors which may influence the type of facilities provided, the method of operation and service dates must be taken into account. Some of the primary considerations are:

   1. the number and types of agencies to be served.

2. the number of exchanges or central office areas involved.

3. the method used by the bureau to answer and dispatch emergency calls.

4. the agencies' communications requirements for routine and administrative business.

5. To qualify for the 911 service offering must a minimum number of specific emergency agencies agree to co-operate in establishing a common answering arrangement?

Yes. As a minimum requirement, emergency calls for the local police, fire and ambulance services would be included in the basic 911 service requirement.

6. Would the central answering bureau be responsible for handling other emergency calls?

Yes. Additional emergency traffic such as medical assistance, poison control, rescue squads, etc., should also be handled through the central answering bureau. The bureau responsible for receiving 911 calls must be prepared to handle all emergency traffic from these services either by referral or transfer of the call.

The responsible agency should also agree to an appropriate method for handling any calls of non-participating agencies which may be misdirected to the 911 emergency number.

7. Are there any special considerations necessary as to what agency, office or public official has the authority to order a 911 service arrangement?

Yes. Since 911 service required the cooperation of the local agencies such as police, fire, ambulance and others who agree to participate, the primary customer is considered to be the local or community government itself. Therefore, authority to order the service will be considered to be the governmental offices with the overall responsibility for the emergency agencies which will be included, e. g. Mayors, City Manager, Directors of Public Safety. In some cases authority may be established by acts of legislation or by resolution.

8. In contacts with public officials and in public information programs, what are the basic points to be emphasized?

In contacts with public officials, representatives of emergency safety agencies and other interested parties, the following principles should be appropriately emphasized and demonstrated:

1. Bell Canada is interested in providing the public with the fastest and easiest way to call for help in an emergency.

2. A single, universal emergency number which provides direct access to an agency operated switchboard organized to handle emergencies on a community wide basis best meets this need.

3. Bell Canada is prepared to cooperate and work with the various safety agencies and municipal officials in planning for the establishment of 911 service.

4. Bell Canada will continue to provide "back up" emergency assistance through our highly trained operators just as we have always done.

9. Is there a charge to the calling party for calls to the 911 emergency number?

No. In case of public telephones, a coin is presently required to obtain dial tone to complete the call. The coin is returned on completion of the call. Ideally, public telephones should be equipped to operate without the requirement that a coin be necessary to activate the dial tone. However, further work in research, design and manufacture is required to enable us to modify the range of equipment we have in service. It is therefore unlikely that we will be in a position to make a significant start on the conversion program before the end of 1970. Over 50,000 public telephones are involved.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that that research has largely been completed.

10. What is the Bell System position on 911 emergency service?

All Bell System companies are prepared to establish circuits that will bring 911 calls directly to a central emergency switchboard. The switchboard will be staffed and controlled by the local emergency agencies which will be responsible for making whatever response is required or appropriate to the calls. The 911 system will be supplementary to existing telephone systems and will not support either the individual telephone numbers of the various local agencies or the service of telephone company operators when they are called upon for help in an emergency.

[Mr. Hopkins.]

11. In communities where 911 service is not yet established will Bell Canada provide for operator handling of all misdirected 911 calls on an intercept basis?

It is anticipated that the need for special 911 intercept will probably vary considerably across our territory. In some locations there may be a need to provide for it while in other instances the requirements of the municipality may be adequately met through the use of the normal vacant or re-order tones. As cost considerations will be a major consideration in the final decision together with the local requirements that will exist, specific plans will have to be developed and tailored to meet local needs.

12. How many communication paths are required between the central office and the centralized answering position to establish a 911 community wide emergency system?

Pending the availability of local data, the number of communications paths or trunks required to initially provide 911 service will have to be determined in consultation with municipal representatives. This evaluation would give consideration to the present number of PBX trunks to police, fire, ambulance and other emergency agencies to expected emergency call volumes; to the time involved in handling typical calls; to delay at the bureau in speed of answer during peak periods, etc. Also, the municipal authorities may request separate groups of 911 trunks to assist in identifying sectors of the city placing calls.

Once the emergency bureau is activated there should be periodic review to assure that there are sufficient trunks terminating at the bureau so that on a day to day basis fully satisfactory service is provided at all times.

Will 911 service place an additional cost burden on public safety agencies?

No. Many communities are already equipped to expertly handle emergency calls from the public. The advent of 911 should not noticeably increase the volume of calls now coming in over 7-digit emergency numbers and from dial "O" for operator. Looking at the total community budgets it may be possible to save dollars by consolidating the answering functions. This has been the trend in industries that handle a large volume of calls from the general public, i.e. department stores, airlines and utility companies. Coupled with the trend toward centralization in the larger cities to accommodate more elaborate command and control systems it would be difficult to precisely evaluate the cost effect of 911.

If requested, will hold and trace or calling number identification features be available to a centralized emergency answering bureau?

Safety agencies do not now have the capability of holding on directly dialed incoming calls for tracing to determine the calling number; only calls routed through "O" Operator can be so held.

For the immediate furure, the capability to "hold" a connection to 911 for tracing is feasible . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, whose allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to take part in this debate this afternoon on private member's Bill C-255, introduced by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). This is indeed a unique opportunity, having just two months ago spoken on my Bill C-252, which is exactly the same.

Mr. Paproski: And your colleagues talked it out.

Mr. Robinson: Unfortunately at that time my bill was talked out, but this afternoon we are provided with another opportunity to see if we cannot make some progress in what I consider to be a very important area.

The fact that this exact same bill has been debated three times in less than three years underlines a very real concern which many hon. members have about the need for a universal emergency telephone number. I believe by now all hon. members are fully aware that it was the former member for Surrey-White Rock, Barry Mather, who originally introduced this proposed legislation.

When I spoke during second reading of my bill on this subject, I pointed out the progress which was already made in the implementation of the three digit 911 emergency number in North America. I mentioned that most of this progress has been made south of the border in the United States where there are now more than 900 911 systems ranging in size from 2,000 to 8 million telephones operating and serving an estimated 30 million people.

In Canada progress has been steady, but certainly not spectacular. Winnipeg became the first North American city, in 1959, to use a three digit emergency reporting system when it cut over to 999. Brandon also uses the 999 code, but both of these communities have plans under way to convert to 911, so I am advised. At present there are eight operational 911 systems in Canada, and I mentioned those in my previous remarks.

The advantages and values of a universal emergency telephone number have been pointed out already by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta and others during debate on my bill, Bill C-252. I see no point in taking the time of the House to repeat them; however, perhaps I could read a brief note I received from a constituent who wrote to me concerning my bill. I have received quite a bit of correspondence since I tried to get the bill through, and this is just a random sampling. I will be very brief; it is just a short quote. The letter says:

> I along with thousands of others, no doubt agree with this bill, and it is shameful that such necessary legislation gets kicked around by some incompetent members who have not the slightest idea of what this means or what it can afford to so many areas of this vast country. Give them—

The next word is hard to read; it starts with an H and ends with an l.

I also have an expert from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce annual statement of policy for 1971/72 which reads as follows:

> Universal Emergency Reporting Telephone Number
> Since the early 1960's there has been active awareness in many communities throughout Canada of the need for a universal emergency reporting telephone number system. Indeed, some cities (for example, Winnipeg) have instituted such a system. Recognizing that the development and adoption of such a system at a national or North American level has, as yet, many unresolved problems as well as considerable expense, it is believed, nevertheless, that the need justifies and warrants its development and adoption.

Accordingly there is a recommendation which follows from this in an excerpt from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce Annual statement, which reads as follows:

> That affiliated boards and chambers urge all authorities who have jurisdiction in this matter to implement a universal emergency reporting telephone number system, such as 911 on the local, national and North American level as soon as possible.

I believe both these statements, one from an ordinary citizen and one from a highly respected business organization, say a lot about the need for the type of legislation which both Bill C-252 and Bill C-255 propose.

It is important to note the attitude of the Canadian Telecommunications Carriers Association toward the 911 emergency telephone system, and I have here a copy of that association's position statement dated June 5, 1974. With the permission of hon. members I would like to read it, as follows:

> UNIVERSAL EMERGENCY NUMBER (911)
> 1. The telephone company members of the CTCA will work with any municipality or public safety agency within Canada that is interested in establishing a centralized emergency telephone reporting centre.
> 2. These member organizations believe that the development and improvement of emergency communications is in the public interest. For the sake of simplicity, effectiveness and uniformity in developing emergency reporting systems, the "911" service code is now being progressively reserved by Canadian telephone companies for this purpose.
> 3. These member organizations believe that the municipality or local agency must assume the responsibility of establishing and operating the centralized emergency system. The telephone companies would be prepared to assist the local agency with technical planning and would contract to carry out the engineering and installation of the required equipment and facilities.
> 4. Telephone company operators will continue to give assistance in placing emergency calls if the caller dials zero.

There are, no doubt, some real problems with regard to enacting Bill C-252 and Bill C-255. Perhaps the greatest of these problems is obtaining the necessary co-operation of the municipalities, which is basic if any universal emergency telephone number system is to be successful. However, I urge hon. members at least to agree to send the subject matter of this bill to committee for further study.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was before parliament in the name of Mr. Barry Mather, the former member for Surrey-White Rock, we supported it. When it was before us in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), we supported it. Today when it is before us in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds)—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You support it.

Mr. Stanfield: What about you, Joe?

An hon. Member: Joe is against everything.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —we support it. The former leader of the opposition has asked the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) where he stands. He seconded the bill when it was brought in by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, so that means he supports it, and I hope that means he will facilitate our getting either the bill or its subject matter to committee.

The very speech we heard today at some length from the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins) proved that there is enough material now available to provide for a good discussion of the matter in committee, and made it clear that that is what ought now to take place. I therefore urge hon. members to support the suggestion which has already been made, that if we cannot give the bill second reading and send the bill itself, that at least we send the subject matter of the two bills to the appropriate standing committee.

● (1740)

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in endorsing the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and also the remarks of the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins), as well as the remarks of the sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds).

The hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East expressed concern about the pay telephones that have to be engineered that do not necessarily require a coin but later in his address he seemed to realize that research on this aspect has already been done and such telephones exist.

Both the British Columbia Telephone Company and Bell Canada Limited have been mentioned. I would suggest that if B.C. Tel were interested in the implementation of the 911 number it should do something about providing pay telephones in the Okanagan Valley. Perhaps I am digressing by expressing the frustration experienced when trying to get through to an operator, or even to get a telephone to function in the Okanagan Valley. If I want to make a call from Grand Forks to Okanagan Falls it sometimes means I have to try four pay telephones before I find one that works.

Some members on the other side have expressed concern about the question of jurisdiction, and about whether a fire department can be co-ordinated with a police department that can be co-ordinated with an ambulance service. I do not think such concerns are valid as I believe the communities concerned are more than prepared to iron out any problems that might arise in this regard.

I hope that hon. members opposite will not feel that they should talk this bill out simply because it has been introduced by a member of the opposition who wants to get something done. It has been clearly demonstrated that the purpose of the bill is valid and Mother Bell, B.C. Tel, and other companies have shown that they are prepared to co-operate.

It is all very well to say that some companies are under the control of or are governed by provincial legislation. That is nothing new and there is, of course, always the opportunity to change existing provincial legislation. Ample precedents exist to demonstrate that this has been done before.

With the exception of a few members of this House who seem to have excellent recall, I suggest that most would find it difficult to recite the telephone number of the police department in their community or the number for the ambulance in their community.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In Winnipeg it is 999.

Mr. Brisco: The hon. member is lucky. I doubt if any members, unless 999 or 911 is the number in their area, could tell the numbers for the police department, the ambulance, and the fire department. In view of what has been said already in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any need for me to continue except to urge that the bill be moved to committee.

Mr. Roger Young (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I join this debate as one who is extremely interested in the whole area of the provision of emergency service to the public. If hon. members opposite will bear with me, I do not intend to prolong this debate but just to speak on general aspects of the matter.

I am extremely interested in how far we have come in the provision of emergency service in this country and in how far we have to go. Of course it is the latter question which is becoming more and more important.

I am a little sad, however, that in the sense of the management of the business of the House we find ourselves today debating exactly the same bill in exactly the same wording as was before us a few weeks ago. If we are to use our time wisely in private members' hour we should attempt to cover a new subject.

Mr. Brisco: If it is valid, why change it?

Mr. Young: Rather than have double debate on this particular point we should perhaps have expressed an opinion—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We should have passed the other one.

Mr. Young: The hon. member says we should just have passed the other bill—because he believes in it. But maybe some of us in this House wish to participate in the democratic process, and express a few comments on the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young: I am surprised—

An hon. Member: Are you not disappointed too?

Mr. Young: I am surprised that a member of the New Democratic Party who believes in freedom of speech should try to cut another member off.

Mr. Brisco: He would rather cut you up than cut you off.

Mr. Young: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, we would be better off to cover some new subject. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) explained his point in putting forward a similar bill and discussed whether the property was really his or was Mr. Mather's, or was even that of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson). If we stretch that point to its logical conclusion we could have 100 private members' bills which we could debate, day after day, but we would not then debate some of the other subjects we want to get at.

An hon. Member: It would be a great improvement.

Mr. Young: It has been demonstrated that there are still members in this House who wish to express an opinion. If some of them do not wish the bill to go to committee at this point, their opinion can be studied. Whatever we have done or do when debating private members' bills I think we should cover a little more ground, and that is what I shall try to do in this area of emergency care.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All right. Now give us your opinion.

Mr. Young: Whatever we have been or are doing in this country through emergency service, much more is going to be done in the years ahead through the citizens' band radio broadcasting, through land mobile radio transmission, through transmission of medical data, and biotelemetry. If some hon. members are familiar with the American television program "Emergency" they will know what I am referring to. Our neighbours in the United States are far ahead of us in methods of transmitting information from the scene of an accident to the hospital.

An hon. Member: That has nothing to do with 911.

Mr. Young: It has a great deal to do with it. If the hon. member knew the whole coverage area of the emergency medical service he would know the object is to get the equipment out into the field and transmit the medical data from the accident scene. But before you get the equipment into the field you have to get hold of it. Some people have expressed reservations about 911. First, I submit, the equipment must be available in the field. We have not become involved in this area in a major way, although moves have been made in British Columbia and parts of southern Ontario to make transmission equipment available in the field. This type of equipment should have been available long ago and we are far behind in our efforts to secure it.

● (1750)

We ought to be far ahead of our present position with regard to radio frequency management; we are lagging far behind in efforts to delegate bands on the radio spectrum for emergency services and in allocating frequencies for emergency uses. Also, horrendous problems can arise by virtue of the many applications of users. These we should try to avoid.

If I may return to the original point I was making before being so well led astray by hon. members opposite, I wonder if this bill is not redundant and if parliament really has power to do what the bill would purport to do. I am of opinion that the bill is redundant as telephone companies have already indicated their willingness to design and instal those systems and co-operate with municipalities and provinces in doing so. There is some question in my mind. Suppose parliament passes this bill, I wonder if it could not be found ultra vires because it purports to govern all telephone companies in the country and, with the exception of Bell Canada and B.C. Telephone, the federal government has no authority over telephone companies. The other telephone companies are all subject to provincial legislation. I think it is open to question if you can enforce this as mandatory legislation governing all telephone companies.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Young: This is a debatable matter, Sir, which will be decided one way or another shortly. Surely there is no question as to this bill being ultra vires in its broad scale application.

Let me say a word about the mechanics of the bill. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta suggests that all this could come under the National Transportation Act; but that act dealt with powers, duties, and functions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) has the floor. I suggest that the House should give him a hearing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young: In the light of the new and comprehensive telecommunications legislation which it is expected will authorize the governor in council to issue directives to regulatory bodies, I submit that this kind of legislation will not be necessary. There will be authority to issue directives which will coax, as it were, the telecommunications industry to provide the type of service contemplated in this bill.

I now return to the point raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco). I do not disagree with the provision of the 911 telephone service. I know that there would not be any great technical difficulty in providing it and that the telephone companies have shown their willingness to design and instal such a system. The difficulty will be administrative. I tell hon. members that various people in the country have brought to my attention their concerns and doubts on this question. Some disagree with the installation of the 911 system. To my knowledge not everyone is in agreement with installing such a system. First we must consider questions such as manpower, staffing the central agencies which will administer the 911 system, training people in the proper operation of the system, and cost. Those questions are relevant in these times of restraint.

There is another difficulty which I think no one has mentioned, the difficulty of mistaken directions being given from a centrally administered system. For instance, in some areas cities and towns have grown up close to one another and, through accidents of history, districts and streets in different towns bear the same names. Bear in mind the difficulty which could arise. The people sitting at the central desk must give precise directions to field units. They must tell them precisely where to go. If, in two or three neighbouring towns, you have streets or neighbourhoods known by similar names, you run the great risk of sending the fire truck or ambulance to the wrong street in the wrong town. Such mistakes can be serious because you could lose an hour, whereas local units would know exactly where to go.

I have heard no one talk of volunteer services, volunteer fire companies and volunteer emergency service brigades which now serve in local areas but are not professional. People in these organizations do this work in their own time. Can people in small towns afford to pay for a central service, or are you to impose it on them? Are you going to cut off all the local volunteers and ignore their initiative? This work is important to them. I know of local volunteer fire companies which can respond to a fire in a nearby area in one minute 30 seconds. If you are to use the 911 system you will phone into the central agency, which will redirect your message to a field unit, and it is possible that the central agency will waste five minutes in trying to tell the fire truck from the neighbouring community where to go in an area it does not usually cover.

As I said, we must consider the question of financing and the acceptance by municipalities, especially smaller ones served by volunteer groups. I am referring to smaller municipalities which feel that if you impose this sort of system they will lose the services of a volunteer group, that it will take more time to respond to calls, and that the benefits of local knowledge and service will be lost.

In looking over some notes for this debate—

An hon. Member: Which civil servant gave you those notes?

Mr. Young: No civil servant gave me these notes, as an hon. member opposite alleges. I consulted copies of Hansard and read debates which took place in 1973 and 1974. Some excellent speeches were made in the past and cogent points were raised. I will not read from those speeches, although if I wanted to use up time I could. Some excellent suggestions were put forward.

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As one who comes from a 911 area, who supports this bill and the position put forward by people like Barry Mather, the former NDP member, and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), I should like to know if we are to be given an opportunity to discuss this bill. The inherent value of this bill ought to be obvious as the 911 service is already being used in nine or ten Canadian communities. In the case of Kitchener-Waterloo, despite what the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) suggests—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest that is a point of debate, not a point of order.

Mr. Stanfield: Question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Young: I want to assure my friend and colleague that I was not challenging the system. I see that it is six o'clock. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. The hour set aside for the consideration of private members' hour having ended, I now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to order made earlier this day, the House will now revert to Routine Proceedings, specifically to the tabling of documents and statements by ministers in order to permit the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) to table documents and make a statement.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

SETTING OF PRICES FOR OIL AND GAS

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the government has today reached certain major decisions concerning crude oil and natural gas prices and I wish to communicate them to the House.

The current arrangements for oil and gas pricing expire on June 30. For some months past the government has been in the process of discussion and negotiation with provincial governments, seeking to reach agreement on the prices which should prevail under new arrangements to come into effect on July 1. Among the various efforts to reach agreement have been the federal-provincial conferences on energy on December 12 and March 5, the meeting of first ministers on May 6, and numerous bilateral contacts at ministerial and first ministers level.

Since the meeting of May 6 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has spoken personally with nine of the premiers and with the deputy premier of Saskatchewan. The announcements I am about to make are in large measure the result of these intergovernmental efforts to find the best possible solution.

As hon. members are aware, the single price for crude oil in Canada has, since last July, been held at $8 per barrel. This is about $4.50 below the international price which now prevails. As I said in the House on April 27 when I tabled the document "An Energy Strategy for Canada—Policies for Self-Reliance", Canada has been more fortunate than most countries. Because we have domestic reserves we have been able to cushion the effects of higher international prices. However, as I also pointed out, our reserves of oil and natural gas are declining and we now import more crude oil than we sell abroad. Finding and developing new reserves will cost far more than in the past, and we will have to pay higher prices now to bring about the exploration necessary to achieve self-reliance in the future.

At the energy ministers conference in March I suggested that the lowest increase in crude oil prices that could be considered would be $1.05. That is the amount by which international prices rose last year, and an increase of that amount in Canada is needed simply to restore the differential between Canadian and international prices which had been worked out and agreed upon by the Government of Canada and the producing provinces a year ago. But I also suggested that an upper limit be set, of not more than a $2 increase, bearing in mind the effects any increase has on inflation and on the capacity of Canadian industry to compete in world markets. Within that range from $1.05 to $2 I stressed the continuing policy of the government that the Canadian price must over time move toward international prices if our long-term energy objectives are to be met.

In the discussions with the provinces it has been natural for the producing provinces, which own the resources, to press for higher prices for oil and gas to ensure themselves the best possible revenues to compensate them for the loss of their depleting assets. At the same time they have recognized the effects of price increases on the economy of all of Canada.

Governments of consuming provinces have, naturally, been mindful of the effects the price increases would have on their consumers. At the same time they have had to consider the claims of producing provinces for recognition of their rights as owners of the oil and gas. The Government of Canada has had to keep all of these factors in mind, and particularly that most difficult dilemma, the fact that price increases in these major commodities would add to inflation but, at the same time, the fact that if we did not increase prices we would be jeopardizing our future energy supply.

In the light of all these considerations, the government has now reached the following conclusions: first, there should be a standard "freeze" period on petroleum product prices of 60 days across Canada which would run from the date of any increase in crude oil at the well-head. Prices to consumers would not, therefore, rise until 60 days from the date of the authorized increase in the prices producers receive for crude oil.

Second, the price of crude oil in Canada should rise by $1.05, that is to say, from $8 to $9.05 on July 1, 1976, and by a further 70 cents to $9.75 on January 1, 1977. Consumers would not begin to feel the effects until after 60 days from these dates.

Third, the price of natural gas should rise by 15.5 cents at city gate Toronto, that is, from $1.25 to $1.40.5 per million B.T.U's on July 1, 1976, and by a further ten cents to $1.50.5 on January 1, 1977. I should note that with these price increases natural gas will continue for an additional year to retain its approximate 85 per cent commodity price relationship with crude oil.

Fourth, export prices on natural gas will also increase. The government is now reviewing a report on this subject from the National Energy Board and is discussing the situation with representatives of the government of the United States. We hope to be able to make an announcement concerning the amount and timing of the increase within a month. For the three producing provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, we think we can get agreement but will have to await their response. That response may well be influenced by the conclusions which are reached in the next few weeks concerning export prices. The decisions I have just reported to the House would seem likely to carry with them, therefore the acceptance not only of the federal government but of the majority of producing and consuming provinces in Canada.

In making this announcement I would like to confirm that despite differing views among the provinces as to the ideal "freeze" period, all have accepted the 60-day period that will now be adopted in connection with the coming increases.

Oil and Gas Prices

On the vital question of oil and gas prices, we do not have full agreement between all governments across Canada. A few provinces cannot bring themselves to acknowledge the need for these higher prices but we believe, based on our discussions, that a good majority will do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his statement on oil pricing. It comes as a result of a great deal of discussion and argument between producers and consumers and there is little doubt as to the winner of that particular debate for it is apparent that, having obtained the $9.75 price per barrel this year, the government will go on to the $13 barrel in a very short space of time, with related increases in the price of natural gas in both the domestic and export markets.

First, let there be no question that this is one increase of $1.75, not two smaller increases, as far as the inflationary impact is concerned. At a time when wages and salaries are being held back it will be hard to justify what is in reality an arbitrary price increase to the Canadian public. To people locked into existing patterns of energy consumption, often through no fault of their own, it will be a bitter pill to swallow.

The problems faced by many who live in Atlantic Canada are especially germaine. In Nova Scotia for example, electricity prices have gone up during the past year by rates in the order of 70 to 80 per cent. Another 10-20 per cent is sure to cause hardship. No one denies the need to help people locked into this crushing spiral except the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). Today he has followed up his now notorious statement of May 4 with yet another blow to their well being. Let us hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in his budget next week recognizes their problem by introducing meaningful tax relief for low income groups, or some other type of special compensation.

It has become clear with the release of the energy strategy document that the government has only one energy policy, and that is price. There is no real policy on energy conservation. There is no real policy on the development of renewable resources of energy. There is no real policy of federal-provincial energy relations—this unilateral increase demonstrates that in no uncertain fashion.

Since the price is to rise, it must be to increase revenues flowing to exploration. The record shows that in the past this has not happened. Between March, 1974, and November, 1974, the price rose by $2.70 cents; the industry share decreased by 8c. Between November, 1974, and the present day the price rose by another $1.50; the industry share rose by 43 cents. The rest went in tax, which today accounts for two thirds of the price of domestic oil.

The fact is that the government's pricing of oil, outside as it is of any coherent energy policy, has nothing to do with energy—only with increasing the federal government tax take. The tragedy which faces all the people of Canada who are now locked into an outdated, punitive, ill advised process is that the government has yet to recognize that it is the rate of return on investment—not prices—which is critical for the generation of oil exploration in this nation.

Filling the coffers of a profligate government surely ought not to be the cornerstone of a rational energy policy.

The Minister has said that if exploration proceeds according to plan 50 cents of each dollar increase will go to the development of our energy reserves. If the energy strategy is not to become just one more piece of dubious government optimism it may well have to cede a greater part of its oil revenue to the producers.

We in the opposition cannot accurately judge the efficacy of this latest move in the absence of the information available to the planners at the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to release the data behind his projected exploration cash requirement? Will he explain the macro-economic impact of his proposed hike and let us know the current estimated cost of developing all frontier energy resources? Will he inform us as to the effect of a price hike in qualitative terms on energy conservation?

In addition, we must have detailed information about the price freeze which the government intends to impose. In the so-called energy strategy document, a number of freezes on product prices are discussed. The government's own recommendation was for 45 days; the commissioners of the province of Ontario recommended 30 and 40 days during the last price hike. Why is 60 days now suggested?

Once again Canadians are treated to an ad hoc, uncorrelated statement on energy. The credibility of the government in this field when judged by almost every standard seemed to reach an all-time low when a former minister of energy, mines and resources stated in a famous speech at Denver, Colorado, a few years ago that Canada had enough oil to last for centuries. The present minister, with his recent statement on energy strategy and his inability to work out an integrated energy program with the provinces, is surely challenging his predecessor's record of ineptitude.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, ever since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) announced that it was the government's intention to move toward the world price of oil the public of Canada have been expecting there would be periodic increases. However, a punch in the jaw does not hurt any less simply because one has seen it coming. One of those blows was struck tonight in the announcement the minister has just made increasing the price by $1.75 a barrel.

The two increases, which must be taken together, represent a very serious imposition on Canadian consumers. The higher price means that those who are driving cars will have to pay an additional 5 cents a gallon. Of course this could be offset if the government were prepared to cancel its 10 cents a gallon excise tax when the budget comes down. But assuming the government is not in such a generous mood, this increase of 5 cents a gallon will mean an extra $40 or $50 a year for the average family.

The increase in the price of natural gas is to be 25 cents per thousand cubic feet which, if one is heating a home with gas, represents some $43 or $44 a year in additional cost, and about $42 per year if one is heating a home with oil.

The impact of the increase in the price of oil alone will add to the burden on Canadian consumers to the extent of some $1,300,000,000 a year, and the increase in the price of natural gas will create a substantial additional burden.

These increases that the minister has just announced will boost the consumer price index in Canada by at least two percentage points. At a time when the cost of living is still rising, when the workers of this country are being urged to exercise restraint, I would ask the House how long the people of Canada can be expected to accept this growing acceleration in the cost of operating their cars, heating their homes, operating their farm machinery, and running their fishing boats. This is particularly so today when the government is seeking to hold down the incomes of the working people.

One must recognize that with our diminishing supply of oil and gas resources it is necessary to face the fact that prices must move upwards. On behalf of the New Democratic Party may I say we see no justification at all for any increase in the price of oil and gas unless there is an iron clad assurance that the increased revenue will go into exploration for oil and gas in order to assure the Canadian public of supplies of these commodities in the future. To date the government has given no such iron clad guarantee.

Every time that the minister and any of his colleagues make a speech about the necessity for increasing the price of oil and natural gas, they put forth the argument that the oil industry must have an increased cash flow. In other words what they are saying is that the consumer must not only pay for the barrel of oil that he or she buys, but must also put up the money to find another barrel of oil or gas to take its place. This is what I have characterized as the "pay now and then pay later" syndrome.

I think the Canadian people would understand and accept the argument that it is necessary to increase the price of oil in this country so as to accumulate the necessary capital to find more oil, provided they could be assured, first of all, that this money would be used to find oil, and secondly, that when oil was found they would be able to buy it at reasonable prices, not at whatever price the oil cartel chooses to charge them. The fact is, of course, that there has been no such assurance. In the last three and a half to four years the price of oil has moved steadily from $2.75 a barrel to $8, not so much because the cost of production has gone up but because it has been argued that the oil companies needed the additional money to do exploration work.

What are the facts, Mr. Speaker? The facts are that the amount of money spent on exploration as a percentage of the oil companies' earnings has declined, not increased. At the present time any increase in the price of oil will go to the treasuries of provincial and federal governments and to the oil industry. There is no guarantee that either levels of government, federal or provincial, or the oil industry will use this $1.75 a barrel increase on oil exploration—which is the only justification there can be for increasing the price.

The members of this party have been arguing, as has the government of the province of Saskatchewan, that any increase in the price of oil should be put into a national resources fund. This money will go to the oil companies, as well as into the federal and provincial treasuries, whereas the entire $1.75 a barrel and any other increases that follow should go into a national resources fund. The money could then be paid out to those oil companies that actually do some exploration. Money could also be made available to provincial governments that are prepared to use a government agency to do exploration and development. It could also be used to finance Petro-Canada to do a genuine job of exploration and development in Canada, so that the people of Canada might own an oil company that will explore for and produce oil at a reasonable figure, instead of being held up, as they have been for all the years that most of us can remember, by the international oil cartel.

We therefore regret that the government has decided to raise the price of oil in two jumps to $9.75 a barrel without bringing in any program whatever to assure Canadian consumers that the additional $1.3 billion that is going to be taken out of their pockets will be used to find oil for the years ahead. Unless the government is prepared to take steps to assure the Canadian people that the extra revenue that they will have to put up is going to be used for exploration and development, I think the Canadian people will look upon this increase as just another attempt at the kind of rip-off that we have ever since the price of oil has gone from $3 to $8 a barrel.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, before opening my remarks on the minister's statement, I would like to emphasize a point that we have made many times but which does not seem conducive to tangible results. I think it should be realized once and for all that we are fed up with playing second fiddle, which means that when a minister has a statement to make, he should have the decency to table copies of it in both French and English, simultaneously. The excuses which are regularly presented are nothing more than a balm poured into a wound which keeps being inflicted on us. This being said, Mr. Speaker, we hope the matter is stettled. To come back to the declaration as such, let me first state that we are not sure of the provinces' response to the government's decision.

I say this because a direct agreement among the provinces might be a better answer than this unilateral decision made by the minister.

I also wish to mention the very important and very surprising contradiction in the attempt made to justify higher oil prices. They justify this increase by saying it is to avoid a shortage, to encourage a continuing oil production.

Mr. Speaker, let them explain how rising oil prices will increase our supplies. I do not dig it. This phenomenon should be explained to us once for all. I should like to understand. How does a higher price for a barrel of oil increase the oil energy potential in Canada? I wish to get a good explanation because, as the previous speaker just said, every oil company in Canada spends—and always did—a good part of its revenue for the discovery of new fields and new wells. It is something normal. We do not have to supplement their effort in that field. If they do not do it, they do not perform their duty.

But we agree to help in some ways to encourage exploration. However, Mr. Speaker, I think they are going too far when they try to convince us that Canadians ought to pay more if we are to increase our oil supplies. It is inaccurate. It is absolutely wrong. And furthermore each time we talk about energy we are told that oil and natural gas supplies are diminishing. If it is true will it be different with an oil price increase? I ask for proof. And the fact is that we now import more crude oil than we sell to foreign countries.

It is always ridiculous when a government, a minister tells us at the same time that our oil supplies are dwindling and that we are selling oil abroad. It is stupid. Our reserves are declining and to develop them, we have to pay a higher price for a barrel of oil. We wonder how this can happen, but indeed, this is what the minister tells us.

And moreover, we import more oil than we sell. But how stupid and ridiculous it is to go on selling if our reserves are running out; the government should have stopped long ago selling oil to foreign countries, with the threat of a shortage of oil in its own country. There are discrepancies that must be rectified. When the minister says, at page 3 of the declaration I have before me:

> ... the Canadian price must over time move towards international prices if our long-term energy objectives are to be met.

What a pity! If those are long term objectives we want to achieve, that is, bring by miracle or whatever means more oil than we now have in Canada through our own natural resources, then once again we have to know exactly what this means. We are therefore against purely artificial increases, just for the sake of increasing, on the grounds that this will bring more oil into Canada.

We do not accept that. We would like to have a lot more details. We are in favour of producing provinces having a more adequate, greater income. But then I say it is a lot less the role of the federal government than of the provinces among themselves. Let there be agreements between Quebec, for example, and Alberta for the purchase of items Quebec needs, let the two provinces do it directly at a mutually agreed price.

I think that would be more normal than the intermediary role set for the federal government, particularly when one thinks about the arguments put forward, stupid arguments, saying we are going to save our oil by raising prices, saying there is a shortage which will disappear if the price is increased. That, Mr. Speaker, we are not prepared to accept. We will have to be given a little more scientific and truer arguments to believe that. In the meantime, we are quite simply opposed to any artificial increase in prices.

If Canada can have energy at a cheaper price than elsewhere it is up to us to avail ourselves of that opportunity, to glorify Providence for it and not run after an escalation in prices on the pretence of reaching international prices. We must be mature and adult enough to act responsibly, even if the Constitution is still in London.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister relating to a sentence which appears on page five of his short statement, which is:

> For the three producing provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Alberta, we think we can get agreement but will have to await their response.

The minister seems to indicate that in fact these provinces have not agreed to this price increase régime. Could the minister verify whether that in fact is the intent of that statement? Have they not agreed? Possibly he could enlighten the House as well as to the nature of the disagreement?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think all I can say at the present time is what I have said in my statement. They are reserving their opinions. We expect to receive their response shortly. It may be their response will be conditioned by their anticipation of the price on the export of natural gas, but it is their move next.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I regret I do not have the act here as I cannot recall the exact clause, but the Petroleum Administration Act provides for federal government agreement with the producing provinces in respect of the introduction of an increased petroleum price régime across Canada, and only when such agreement cannot be arrived at does the act provide the latitude for the federal government unilaterally to set a new régime. Therefore I wonder under what basis the minister is making this statement tonight. Is it simply a proposition he is laying before the House which has yet to be negotiated with the producing provinces, or is it a new funny kind of negotiation, citing this as the federal position, like it or lump it; if you agree, fine we will do it under clause "B", but if you do not then we will impose it under clause "C"? Could the minister possibly straighten me out if my reasoning is incorrect in this regard?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, there has been a great deal of negotiation and discussion with the consuming and producing provinces. We believe the decision the federal government has taken in respect of price to be a decision which meets the test of a reasonable price, and we expect agreement from the producing provinces. We cannot say categorically at this moment that we have it. On the assumption that we do not get it, clearly the avenue open to the federal government will be the use of the Petroleum Administration Act.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary and again it is in relation to the question of agreement or non-agreement of the provinces. I do not have the minister's statement in black and white before me, but I was listening fairly carefully and I thought he indicated that a majority of the provinces had agreed to the statement he made tonight. If we have three of the producing provinces which have not yet agreed, and I assume we have two or perhaps even three of the major consuming provinces which have not agreed—I assume I am correct in that and I would appreciate the minister correcting me if I am wrong—then how many provinces does the minister believe exist in this country of ours?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated my belief that a good majority of the provinces support the increase I have announced tonight. I have good reason to believe that is their position.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he is now in a position to put before the House, or table at a convenient time, the proposition put before the Government of Canada by the government of Nova Scotia with regard to oil prices and their relationship to the generation of electric power in that province? I ask this question because this increase in the price of oil which has been announced by the minister tonight will obviously be a matter of concern to the government and the people of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked me a question a short while ago in the House about tabling the proposal from the province of Nova Scotia. My office checked with the office of the Premier of Nova Scotia seeking permission to make the proposal public. I did indicate, as he may recall, that we would have no objection that I could see. The response we received back from his office was that it was a confidential document and should be so regarded at the present time.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister, with brevity, a question in two parts. Does the United States pay the world price for exports from Canada to the United States and, if so, where does the money represented by the differential between $9.75 and the world price go; is it used to subsidize the provinces now forced to buy offshore oil at the world price?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the United States does pay the world price determined by the National Energy Board as a just and reasonable price. The differential between the Canadian wellhead price plus transportation to the border and a just and reasonable price identified as the world price in the United States market is the export charge. That amount is allocated notionally toward the cushion used to subsidize the consumers of imported oil in eastern Canada.

Perhaps I might take this opportunity to reassure members who make comparisons between Canadian and American prices and assume that these new prices will put Canadian industry at some disadvantage vis-à-vis the United States. I can assure hon. members that the increase, that is to say $1.05 on July 1 and the additional 70 cents on January 1 next year, will ensure that Canadians will not only be paying a lower price than the industrialized countries in the world but it will be significantly below the United States price as well. It will be roughly on average $1 lower than the United States price during that same period.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister could tell us if that money is used to subsidize the consumers in eastern Canada, which is a very small part of Ontario, Quebec, and the maritimes. How much a gallon is paid as a subsidy to the consumer and how is it determined? This is wishy-washy. The minister says it is substantial but we do not know the amount to the consumer.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would do his homework he would very quickly find the answer. The hon. member should know that the export charge just about balances in number the cushion which has been running at around $4.60 per barrel. That is the situation. The excise tax which was referred to by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) is used to make up the additional amount of money which is required to provide that cushion. We are importing more than we are exporting. The point is that by the middle of this year we will have provided the Atlantic provinces of Canada with just about $1 billion in the form of a subsidy to cushion them against the very much higher international prices. The consumers in Atlantic Canada will have lower prices for their oil than consumers anywhere among the industrialized nations of the world.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister from Ontario not agree that the people of Ontario are getting rather similar prices to those for the people from the Atlantic provinces, and while the machinery is provided to subsidize the price in the Atlantic provinces it comes to the taxpayer while in the case of the people of Ontario it is in the form of a controlled price? Is the minister suggesting that the people of the Atlantic provinces are getting any more benefit per capita than the people of Ontario, whom he represents?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think people all the way across Canada are getting the benefit of the government's policy. I think it is very important to emphasize that point. I believe it is important that the consumers in Atlantic Canada understand this, because I do not think that the opposition members have been telling them they are receiving a subsidy which enables them to enjoy a price significantly below the world price.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister what will be the division of the $1.75 between federal government, the provincial governments, and the oil companies. The second question is: what commitment or what assurance, if any, has the minister that the oil companies will use their portion for purposes of exploration in Canada?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, in respect of the first question concerning the division of the proceeds of the incremental increase I would draw the hon. member's attention to "An Energy Strategy for Canada—Policies for Self-Reliance." He would find in that document a good run-down. It has just come to my attention that the page reference is page 36. The important point here is that the federal government tax system is keyed to an incentive for exploration.

If the producers do not re-invest at all the company share would be roughly 25 per cent of the increase while the federal government's share would be 27 per cent of the increase and the provincial government's share would 48.4 per cent. That is on page 36, figure 2. If they, for their own interest in order to minimize the tax bite, increase exploration and development by reinvesting 50 per cent of that dollar, the federal government would give up virtually all its tax take, that is to say, it would reduce its tax take to 3 per cent, and the provinces' share would be 44 per cent. The point I want to make is that when hon. members opposite accuse the federal government of putting through an increase so that the federal government can increase its share of the tax take, they really have not done their homework.

If they look at the system they will realize there is a very substantial incentive for re-investment in exploration and development, and quite clearly that is why we are supporting the increase in order to bring forth further supplies for Canada. Hon. members know they are declining. Unless we have additional exploration and development we will not get those new supplies.

In the second part of his question the hon. member asked how we can be sure that these moneys in fact are being re-invested, and what proportion will be re-invested. My answer to him is, as I stated on another occasion, that we will be introducing legislation in the next session of parliament to make it mandatory for the oil and gas producers to declare specifically what their cash flows are, and what proportion of them are in fact being devoted to exploration and development in Canada.

Mr. Gilbert: The formula is so complex that the minister has to read it from the book. I do not know how the Canadian public can understand the operation of the formula if the minister cannot explain it without having to read it from the book. However, I wonder what measures the minister intends to take with regard to cushioning the increase of prices which, as set forth by the hon. member from my party, would result in a 2 per cent increase in the cost of living index. What steps does the minister intend to take to cushion that increase with regard to the people of the different provinces?

Mr. Gillespie: The point I thought I had made when I announced the price earlier was that we have tried to balance a number of different interests. We have tried to balance the interests of consumers all across Canada in terms of the effects of inflation. We have tried to balance the legitimate interests of the producing provinces which say they have a depleting resource and that they should be able to receive a fair return for that depleting resource, which is now being sold substantially below international prices. We have tried to balance those two things with the need to increase the price to provide incentives and a cash flow for additional exploration and development in Canada which, in my view, and in the view of the government, Canada so desperately needs in the years to come. That is the balancing act.

I think the hon. member will appreciate that the way this price increase has been structured—that is to say, the minimal increase of $1.05, which puts us in the same position, in terms of the differential, as we were in a year ago—does not close the gap on July 1. It brings us back to where we were a year ago. We delay the increase on the balance until January. Surely the hon. member can appreciate that this is an effort on the part of the government to try to moderate the effects of the increase on the CPI.

One further point I might make is that the critic of the hon. member's party rather overstated the effect on the CPI by, I would say, a significant amount.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We'll see.

Mr. Gillespie: It will be significantly below 2 per cent over the period we are talking about.

Mr. Gilbert: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I propose to grant the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) a final supplementary and then conclude the questioning by recognizing those who have been attempting to seek the floor from the very beginning—the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin), then the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden), the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone), and then the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne).

Mr. Gilbert: I would like to ask the minister what special measures the government is going to take to help people on fixed and low incomes with regard to the impact of the increases, because they will be hit hardest. Just what special measures is the minister going to take?

Mr. Gillespie: I have already indicated that the government's approach is to move forward in as slow and as measured a way as we can. We will continue the cushion—that is to say, the export charge and the excise tax on the one hand and the compensation funds on the other—so that Canadians will be able to continue to enjoy prices which are significantly below world prices.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, will the minister say to the House whether the government has considered establishing two prices, one for domestic consumption and one for exportation, given the fact that Canadians know there will be oil operations in this country for some years to come, and given the fact that people who buy and sell stock are largely responsible for having given the corporations still in business the means to discover and prospect for new oil reserves?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: We do, of course, have such a system. The domestic wellhead price of oil on July 1 will be $9.05. We will be selling our oil on the export markets at the international price, whatever that international price may be. At the present time it is delivered to the east coast and into the United States market in the order of about $13, so we do in fact have a two price system, that is to say, a lower price for Canadians, and we are enjoying the higher price in the export market.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, my question to the minister is this: in view of claims that oil companies have requested and obtained the price increase announced this evening, could the minister indicate whether the request for a price increase came from the producing provinces only, or whether the oil companies also demanded the price increase which was announced?

Mr. Gillespie: I do not think the oil companies are in any position to demand any increase in price. I think that some of the oil company presidents might have indicated in their annual reports that it would be a useful move on the part of the government from the point of view of exploration and development, but quite clearly the only major push for a higher price came from the producing provinces. I think hon. members know that when I met with the producing provinces in March, they asked for $2 more per barrel for crude oil, and the whole discussion and negotiations have been to try to work out a price which would catch the Canadian position up vis-à-vis the international price in a way which would be acceptable to the producing provinces which own the resources on the one hand, balanced with the interests of consumers all across Canada. That price would also be balanced, of course, from the point of view of the generation of funds needed for new exploration and development in Canada.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I have two questions. On page 1 of his announcement the minister stated the following, "Among the various efforts to reach agreement have been the federal-provincial conferences of energy on December 12 and March 5, the meeting of first ministers on May 6 and numerous bilateral contacts at ministerial" and first ministers level". My first question on that point is, how many of the provinces are in agreement with the announcement the minister made tonight, and which ones are they?

My second question relates to page 2 of his announcement where the minister states, "In the discussions with the provinces, it has been natural for the producing provinces, which own the resources, to press for higher prices for oil and gas to ensure themselves the best possible revenues to compensate them for the loss of their depleting assets". In view of the fact that some oil companies have avoided Atlantic Canada as a source of exploration potential because of uncertainty in federal-provincial legislation, is there any indication that the dispute involving the Atlantic provinces, namely, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland, will soon be settled so that action can be taken by the oil companies to get on with exploration activities, which hopefully will lead to oil and gas discoveries and which will be beneficial to Atlantic Canada, where the ocean and its resources are the birthright and the heritage of the people residing in this area?

Mr. Gillespie: I am sure the hon. member will appreciate it when I tell him that I am not in a position to identify the particular provinces which favoured the increase and those which were opposed to it.

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Epp: Come on, gutsy Gillespie.

Mr. Gillespie: If the hon. member would reflect a moment he would realize that these discussions took place on a confidential and private basis between first ministers. I am not in a position to divulge their names, but I can assure the hon. member that, in the words I used in my announcement, there is a good majority which we have reason to believe will accept these higher prices.

As to the second point raised by the hon. member, the question of reaching agreement with the Atlantic provinces on the exploration and development of the offshore resources of Atlantic Canada, I can tell him that I am more hopeful now than I was, quite frankly, six months ago. I have had discussions with the Premier of Newfoundland and my officials have had discussions with officials from the maritime provinces as recently as last week. It appears we may be able to come to an understanding with respect to a federal-provincial arrangement for the administration and sharing of the revenues from the resources found off the east coast. I sincerely hope we can move that forward expeditiously. It is a very important priority of this government.

I hope we will be able to work with the provinces with respect to the development of hydro-electric energy and its distribution, as well as other forms of electrical generation in the Atlantic provinces, to help put them on a much sounder footing in the future.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, the minister forgot to answer my first question. I asked how many of the provinces have accepted. I should like to know the names of the provinces and how many of them have accepted the proposals he made in his announcement.

An hon. Member: Two.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that it was a good majority, which means something over six.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, in his usual fashion the minister has skated around questions put by members on this side of the House. I should like to ask him for some precise information. He spoke about all the time that has been taken to arrive at these conclusions. Surely tonight he can tell the House precisely how much of the total of $1.75 per barrel that oil is to be increased by the end of this year will go to government and how much to industry? Precisely how much is going to industry, and thus to added exploration? Perhaps at the same time he will explain whether this will provide the necessary "cash flows", as he calls them, that are desperately needed now? Will this increase achieve his goals?

Can the minister also tell the House whether foreign capital will still be required and to what extent will it be important in his capital projections for the future supply about which he is so desperate?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member a precise number. I am sure he will understand that as I believe he is one of the better informed members.

Mr. Bawden: You worked that out ahead of time, surely?

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member will recognize that three different tax regimes are involved. Saskatchewan is different from Alberta, and so is British Columbia. There are three different types of royalty systems. There is also the difference between Crown lands, Crown reserves, and freehold land. There is the difference between old gas and new gas.

Mr. Lawrence: He understands that you cannot answer the question.

Mr. Gillespie: I am sure he understands there are quite a number of such areas, even though some of his associates do not. I am therefore forced to give him an average, and that is what the energy strategy paper does. It deals with an average because you have to roll them all together.

I have indicated that if the companies reinvest 50 cents of a dollar increase they would be able to obtain 3 per cent plus that 50 cents, which gives 53 per cent. If he would like to apply that 53 per cent to $1.75 he would see it is theoretically possible that there could be funds for the companies of somewhere between 80 cents and 90 cents. Each company will have to look at it from its own point of view.

On the question of whether we will continue to require foreign capital, I think it is quite clear that in this industry substantial capital funds will be required. In many instances, as far as exploration and development are concerned, they will be generated from existing producers in Canada. Once exploration has been shown to be successful, as I hope it will be in a number of instances, we may well require to borrow significant foreign funds to support projects like pipelines, additions to Syncrude, and that kind of major activity.

Perhaps I might be permitted one observation, Mr. Speaker. Like many other hon. members, I am sure, I have been looking for some indication of whether the Conservative party thinks the price increase is too high or too low.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't give us that nonsense.

Mr. Gillespie: It seems to me they are more interested in trying to do a balancing act without giving this House and the country any indication of whether they feel—

Mr. Lawrence: If you can't do your job, quit.

Mr. Gillespie: —that these prices are reasonable or unreasonable. I invite them to state their position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister knows that the government has obtained most of its good ideas from this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bawden: He is also aware that the very tragic situation he finds himself in which was left by the former minister, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), is the reason we can project all the problems ahead in the oil, gas and energy supply business.

I should like to ask him again about the capital shortage. He did not answer my question as to whether this increase will provide the exploration funds required to meet his goal. Could he also tell us whether he has any plans to provide incentives for Canadians to invest in this industry, which is another one of the tragic failures of the government and which is one of the reasons why Canadians do not own a greater share of the mineral resources of the country?

May I just throw in one further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that one of the great reserves in our country is the Alberta oil sands, perhaps the minister could tell us whether he has any plans to improve what is now a nil prospect? Does he intend to do anything about it, or is he going to wait until 1980 and then tell us we have a further desperate problem?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated to the House that I will be making a statement tomorrow with respect to the new oil and gas land regulations. That statement will deal with a number of new measures and incentives. Some measures will have particular relevance to Canadian companies that wish to expand their exploration activities in federal lands. I welcome this question because it gives me an opportunity to point out that the price increase relates to the whole strategy for energy in Canada over the next ten years.

Oil and gas land regulations which will be forthcoming tomorrow will fill a number of gaps and demonstrate the importance of a new regime for exploration. Was there one other question?

An hon. Member: Athabasca.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, on the matter of the tar sands, I think if the hon. member were to read the business section of the Globe and Mail today he would see that the federal government's commitment made in Winnipeg on February 3 last year—that is to say, to make royalties tax deductible, expressed in tax terms as a remission order—provide not just for the production for the first 125,000 barrels per day, which is the size of the plant right now, but would cover an additional billion barrels of production if the province of Alberta does not change its royalties regime in a way which would adversely affect the partners in the Syncrude project.

● (2110)

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, since it became clear from the answer given to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) that there is no negotiated guarantee to make certain that any increase to the companies will go toward increased exploration, can the minister say what portion of the industry's take will be used for an increased searching out and development of sources of energy other than hydrocarbon? Also, when will we arrive at the position at which greater oil prices will in some way be reflected in the government's increased involvement in the development of new sources of energy for this country?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the federal government is already heavily committed with public funds through Petro-Canada.

An hon. Member: Ha!

Mr. Gillespie: I hear a big laugh from the Tories.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Gillespie: Petro-Canada, I realize, is something the Tories stood against. They tried to defeat the bill.

Mr. Bawden: Tell us about the dry holes.

Mr. Gillespie: The people of Canada realize Petro-Canada will be important to their future, even though it will not be important to the future of hon. members opposite.

Mr. Bawden: Tell us about the dry holes.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, before debate on the bill was interrupted by private members' hour I said that I was in favour of capital punishment for some offences. I favoured its retention in cases of planned, premeditated murder where the conviction was based on direct evidence rather than circumstantial evidence. I also suggested it should be retained for treason, and spoke about unlawful attempts to overthrow the government, insurrection, and assassination of the monarch. In all those cases we ought to consider imposing capital punishment.

According to certain newspaper reports the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has indicated to certain backbenchers that they had "better get with it", meaning that they had better support the bill, or else! I hear and suspect that the cabinet will vote en bloc in favour of the bill, and that parliamentary secretaries too will vote en bloc. They are all looking for promotions, for appointments to judgeships, and so on. The Prime Minister made his meaning clear to backbenchers. The plums are there, to be given out as appointments. The retentionists will not be given the plum posts, the judgeships, the highly paid positions on regulatory boards, and so on. This is understood among hon. members opposite.

Let me say a word about convicted murderers of policemen and prison guards now serving time. The list in my hand goes back to June, 1973. Who are these men who have been so convicted? They include John Francis Connearney, who was convicted of killing a police officer in Quebec; John Harvey Miller, convicted of killing a police constable at Surrey, British Columbia; René Vaillancourt, convicted of killing Constable Leslie Maitland of Toronto; Réal Chartrand, convicted in November, 1972, of killing a constable in Quebec. It also includes George Joseph Peloquin, who was convicted of killing a carpentry instructor at Stony Mountain penitentiary. It includes James Lawrence Hutchison and Richard Joseph Ambrose, who were convicted of killing a police constable and a corporal at Moncton, New Brunswick; Elery Steven Long, who was convicted of killing a staff-seargeant at Delta, British Columbia; and Gilles Hébert, convicted of killing a prison guard at Archambault Institution. I can recite many more names, Mr. Speaker. The list in my hand says little about the victim. We hear little talk of the victim but hear much talk about convicted men.

Let me now deal with the Solicitor General's (Mr. Allmand) speech and consider his arguments. He told us that he has participated in three previous debates on capital punishment, and said that hon. members who have been here for ten years, as he has been, will be participating in their fourth full-scale debate on capital punishment. On three previous occasions the Solicitor General voted in favour of partial retention, that is, retention for certain offences only; each time the government had proposed the bill, and each time the government persuaded dissident backbenchers to support it.

The Solicitor General went on to talk about the question of objectivity. He said that if we consider this question objectively then we must, from a logical, ethical and public policy point of view, conclude that capital punishment must be abolished once and for all. I ask what are these logical, ethical, and public policy points of view? If it was unethical to vote for partial retention last time and twice before that, is the Solicitor General admitting that he voted against his own ethics, his own ethical inclinations? Remember, Mr. Speaker, the definition of public policy is always subject to interpretation. If it means public concern and public will, I think every constituency in Canada would vote overwhelmingly in favour of retention of capital punishment for some offences, particularly at this time when murder and violence are on the increase.

Let me illustrate what I mean. I sent out about 38,000 questionnaires asking people if they are in favour of capital punishment in cases of planned, premeditated murder. Of those who replied, 6,320 were in favour of retaining capital punishment for some offences; only 676 voted against capital punishment. I submit that any accurate report of the feelings of constituents all over the country would show that most of them would vote in the same way as those who answered my questionnaire. If polls could be taken in Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, Halifax or Moncton, the results would be much the same, I submit, as in my survey.

The Solicitor General maintains that the death penalty is no deterrent to the commission of murder. But he has no evidence to support his argument. Let him explain to the House why reported murders increased from 315 in 1968 to 545 in 1974, an increase of almost 60 per cent. This increase has occurred while the Solicitor General, and the government he supports, have been playing yo-yo with the subject in parliament.

In one year, 1974 to 1975, the murder rate increased 18.8 per cent, or at about the same rate as inflation. I point out that just recently Dr. Fattah was paid a big fee to produce a report on the subject of capital punishment. I do not criticize him; he is a professor, and was an abolitionist when he obtained his doctorate. He remained on abolitionist when he was hired to write a report. He produced a report which argues in favour of abolition. And what does that mean? It means nothing at all. It simply means that when he wrote the report, he followed his conscience and argued that the death penalty should be abolished. But he ignored the increase in murder.

Let me quote some figures to illustrate the recent murder rate. They are interesting. There were in 1961, 185 murders; in 1968 the figure jumped to 315, and by 1974 to 545. As I said previously, in a very short space the murder rate increased 60 per cent. The population did not increase by 60 per cent in the same period. And, as I said, in the 1974-75 period the murder rate went up more than 18 per cent. How can the Solicitor General maintain his position?

The practical question is not whether the death penalty would deter the would-be murderer, but whether it would deter him more than life imprisonment would deter him. Giving a capital murder convict 25 years in a penitentiary is certainly not going to deter murder. It is going to endanger the lives of every warden, police officer, and person in the correctional service in Canada. That is what it is going to do. Once you have been sentenced to 25 years, what do you have to lose? I might just pause here.

When these two tourists from Vancouver, one charged with murder and the other attempted murder, came to Calgary, they robbed a credit union, shot a police officer, and then holed up in a house with two girl hostages. They said to the police through their communication that they had nothing to lose.

We talk about humanity, but if a man 52 years of age is sent to jail for 25 years, he will not get out until he is 77. During that time will he be kept in solitary confinement in order to protect all the officers, guards, and wardens? I predict that if the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) stays in that position long enough, he will revert to the old system where such prisoners are let out on parole. We already know of people who have committed murder for the second time. It does not matter if they do it three or four times again, they cannot get more than 25 years.

An hon. Member: They will not stay there.

Mr. Woolliams: I agree. Then there is the argument that there is more sympathy and more feeling for the person who commits deliberate murder than there is for the victim. The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) talked about a fellow who shot a policeman in the arm. When the policeman fell down by a car, the fellow said that he had everything to gain from shooting him and then shot him through the eyes. That is the kind of psychology there is today.

I have a lot of experience as a defence lawyer. What concerns me is that murder is becoming socially acceptable. No one gives much thought to a person who commits a petty theft such as shoplifting. That is almost acceptable. Therefore you kill somebody.

I listened to an hon. member speaking this afternoon. He said, "What can you do about the victims; they are dead and buried." The murderer may have on his record more people who are dead and buried. What protection is there for society? Canadians are concerned.

The Solicitor General said it is more difficult to get a conviction when we have the death penalty. In my opinion, and I do not want to be unkind to him, that statement bears no relationship to the facts. I question whether he has had a jury trial on a capital murder case. I find that a jury will take the facts, whether they be from direct evidence or circumstantial evidence, weigh them, and come to a conclusion. In my formula, of course, I would not use the death penalty on circumstantial evidence. If it is circumstantial evidence the jury will likely go the other way.

Is the minister suggesting that we get rid of the death penalty because it is hard to get a conviction? Is he suggesting he wants a conviction in order to put these people in jail for 25 years? Is that his position? I listened to him on the Monday night, but I still do not know.

There is talk about judicial error. Under the old law, judicial error was a valid argument. However, today, murder is divided into capital murder and non-capital murder. Capital murder was always interpreted under the Code before it was moved, changed, repealed, and amended. The judge who would draw the charge of capital murder would instruct the jury that they could find a reference of non-capital murder. Therefore the question of judicial error is not an argument. It might have been an argument 25 years ago before the amendments were made to the Code.

We have the security package. Part of the security package is the gun control law which seems to get more airing than the last part, and legalizing provincial inquiries which the Supreme Court of Canada says are already legal. They are now bringing in amendments to undo what they did in reference to wire tapping. No notice is necessary. I have said over and over again that if a police officer is not going to give notice to the subject that his telephone will be tapped, he should get leave from a judge, and then only under exceptional circumstances. Police officers I have talked to admit that they have not really tried a judge in this regard and therefore cannot say whether they have faith in that system.

All this was done for one purpose, to get people off the track. It always puts you in mind of a political tactic. When you go to a pond in the spring, you may see some mallard ducks. If the female has some ducklings, instead of swimming away she will make it appear as though she has a broken wing or leg in order to lead you away from the slough. This is what the government is trying to do, take people's minds off the economics of the country and the problems facing us today.

When you are dealing with the control of crime you need three things; quick detection, swift apprehension, and proper punishment. I used this example on other occasions when dealing with the question of deterrents.

When there is talk about whether the death penalty is a deterrent I often use this illustration. There is a rock in a harbour and upon it a lighthouse is placed to warn ships of the danger. One hears about the ships that run upon the rock in the fog, or during a storm, but one never hears of the ships that passed by in safety.

In a day in which we have high unemployment, inflation because of over-extravagant spending by the government, coupled with almost an illegal increase in the amount of currency, wage and price controls, threats by the national unions of Canada that they will organize and have a national strike from coast to coast, an increase in crime in every field, the government, within two and a half years of debating capital punishment, brings it in again to distract the minds of the Canadian people from the real problems and, above all, fails to carry out the death penalty.

A former prime minister used this quote. I dug it up to use it today. This is what Cromwell said about a parliament. This quote was used by the late Lester Pearson when he was Leader of the Opposition. He said to the then government, and I quote:

[Mr. Woolliams.]

You have sat there too long for the little good that you do. It is time to make way for better men. In the name of God—go.

For following the tactics it is using, that is what I say to this government.

An hon. Member: Where are the "better men"?

Mr. Woolliams: I quote prime ministers from all sides of the House when they have said something I accept. I accept it for members opposite because I know that many of them do not want to follow what they are forced to do in order to maintain their positions as parliamentary secretaries. In any event, I see my time is up. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your forebearance.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, clearly, the trend in Canada for many years has been toward abolition of capital punishment. Back in the peak year of 1931 when 22 murderers were convicted hanging was still on the books, obviously not a very effective deterrent. Then from 1936 to 1962 an average of only eight offenders per year were hanged. However, in the six year period 1957 to 1963 the Conservative government commuted 52 of 66 death penalties. From 1963 to 1972 the Liberal government commuted all cases, including killers of policemen. The NDP have also supported abolition while only the Social Credit Party has en bloc favoured retention.

A five-year trial period from 1967 to 1972, which abolished capital punishment except for killers of policemen and prison guards, was established by the present government to test the alleged deterrent effect, or absence of it. A special study concluded that there was no increase in criminal homicide due to the suspension of capital punishment.

Since 1972 the trial period has been continued by order of parliament, again with no death sentence carried out. We are now again debating the abolition of capital punishment, this time replacing capital punishment with mandatory life imprisonment for 25 years with no parole for those convicted of first degree murder. Canada thereby may join a growing number of enlightened nations in which de facto abolition of capital punishment has been achieved.

By 1975 at least 35 countries had either abolished it entirely or limited its use to wartime or offenders against martial law. It is retained by most African, Asian and Iron Curtain countries, and by France and Spain. It was abolished by Russia earlier but reinstated by the communist government, societies quite different from Canada. By contrast, it is being relegated to the past by many western European and English-speaking countries such as our own.

Research statistics from the U.S.A., Canada, and Europe indicate that murder rates are not significantly lower in the presence of capital punishment. As a matter of fact the lowest murder rates are found in Sweden, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Rhode Island, and Maine where it has been abolished for a long time. On the other hand some of the highest murder rates are found in France, Spain, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Georgia where capital punishment has been continuously in effect for a long time.

What is the situation with respect to convicted murderers in Canada? From 1920 to 1974 182 persons were granted parole from commuted death sentences. Only 14 had their parole revoked for misbehaviour, and only nine of these had committed an indictable offence.

Between 1867 and 1975, in the entire history of our country, only one who had his death sentence commuted committed a second murder. Thus recidivism—the repetition of the crime of murder—is extremely low. On the other hand our people want to know how long these murderers have been kept in prison as just punishment and to protect society. From 1961 to 1968, 28 served an average of 12 years before being paroled, and from 1968 to 1974, 42 served an average of 13.4 years before parole, longer than for any other type of offence. Many were not paroled at all.

With respect to temporary passes issued only to carefully selected cases, just one out of 1,019 inmates convicted of capital murder failed to return on time, and only six out of 2,016 inmates convicted of non-capital murder failed to return on time. Thus the behaviour of convicted murderers compares surprisingly well with that of other types of criminals. Furthermore, the process of releasing a murderer is a very involved and careful one involving both the National Parole Board and the cabinet.

Even more important than punishing criminals, Mr. Speaker, are the many possible approaches available to protect the public by the prevention of violent crime. But I will not review them here. Nonetheless many arguments have been put forward in favour of capital punishment. It is said to be a deterrent. Scientific studies from many countries indicate that not only is it not a deterrent but that the opposite effect is achieved in some cases. Some people are actually motivated toward crime by the danger involved. It is obviously true that a person can never murder again after he is executed, but he rarely does so anyway when not put to death. However, those from his section of society who identify with him might well be embittered enough over his fate to avenge his death with further crime and violence. Capital punishment does brutalize and polarize society into class warfare.

Some people claim that capital punishment is a form of just retribution to which society is entitled. Or is this only legalized revenge? It cannot undo the crime, not does it always satisfy the victim's loved ones. Some quote the Bible to justify capital punishment, but at least as many quotations can be found to support mercy and abolition. Imprisonment at $18,000 per prisoner per year is admittedly more expensive than capital punishment. But civilization is never cheap. Society's challenge is to make confinement productive, self-supportive, rehabilitating, and humane.

Reports have recently suggested that murder and other violent crimes are increasing rapidly due partly to less severe punishment and partly to sensational coverage by the media. But most cases are spontaneous rather than premeditated. Some regions show an increase while others show a decrease under the same conditions of punishment during the same time period. And authorities in the field trace the real causes to tragic social conditions.

Capital punishment is not always free of discrimination either. The rich and influential seldom hang; it is usually the poor and the weak who pay that penalty. Members of minority groups are sometimes disproportionately sentenced to death. For example, between 1930 and 1974, 54 per cent of the persons sentenced to death in the United States were black although they represented only 12 per cent of the total population. Almost universally, juries are more sympathetic to women on trial than they are toward men on trial.

Nor is capital punishment without its horrors. One woman was inadvertently decapitated. Two convicted murderers who had attempted suicide were kept alive by a doctor and two nurses until they could be executed. One convict was delivered to the gallows in a wheelchair. Slow, writhing death from hanging has been described by Ben Malkin and others.

The Ottawa Citizen editorial of May 11, 1976, reminds us that juries often choose to avoid imposing the death penalty when it is on the law books. What, then, are the alternatives? Life imprisonment, Mr. Speaker, fulfils all the purposes of any legal penalty, that is, deterrence, punishment, rehabilitation, and the protection of society. It is then up to society to design some form of confinement which is humane and productive.

Mr. Arthur Trono, the Regional Director of Prisons in Ontario, with 13 institutions under his control, complains that our prisons do not reform and often make prisoners worse. Meanwhile a Toronto lawyer, Mr. Clayton Ruby, suggests a cheaper and better approach might be to expand special work communities in isolated areas such as the far north, with families optional, or remote prison-type universities for rehabilitation.

Prevention is still better for everyone than correction and punishment, and tighter gun controls should help prevent all those common crimes of passion commmitted with easily available guns, if not criminal shooting. Unfortunately there are lobbyists willing to spend time and money to prevent such logical legislation. So, how do we settle this gnawing problem? Some suggest that informed members of parliament should decide. Others say the members of parliament should vote according to what they perceive public opinion to be.

There are special sources of information, too. Most editorials favour abolition for a variety of reasons; for example, the Ottawa Citizen, the Globe and Mail, and the Montreal Gazette. The churches, too, are opposed to capital punishment; I might mention the Canadian Council of Churches (Protestant and Anglican), and the Roman Catholic Bishops through the Canadian Catholic Conference.

Volunteers who work with criminals, including members of the John Howard Society and the Elizabeth Fry Society, support abolition. The celebrated criminologist, Professor Ezzat Fatah of Simon Fraser University, rejects capital punishment passionately as being "vindictive, retributive and bloodthirsty".

The Canadian Civil Liberties Association through its general counsel, Mr. Alan Borovoy, has congratulated the government for its stand on abolition and said the national organization "is going to work like hell to get MPs across the country to support it".

Dr. Guy Richmond, a prison doctor for many years in England and Canada wrote a book recently documenting the case for abolition. Al Baldwin, an ex-convict who spent many years in prison and two years on death row for killing a prison guard who he claims double-crossed him, brands the death penalty as brutal and senseless. Police Chief Harold Adamson, the President of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, has endorsed the federal government's peace and security proposals as being "a very sensible approach" even though police feel the death penalty is necessary in some cases.

While recent public opinion polls indicate a majority in favour of retention, private questionnaire surveys by MPs are usually only answered by a minority of constituents—10 per cent in my own riding of Halton. As well many people seem to qualify their position after discussing the issue. Polls, public opinion, and the incidence of crime change from year to year, while the law once passed must remain more stable. Another recent Gallup poll, moreover, indicated that 61 per cent of the people place the blame for crime and violence on our social environment rather than the individual, an increase from 52 per cent in five years. Many people now feel that our laws should be brought into line with reality, while some concede at least that hanging is too brutal and must be stopped.

In government there is a higher law than the law of parliament, and that is the royal prerogative of mercy, a time honoured privilege predating Canada's capital punishment law and taking precedence over it. Exercised by cabinet, it is not only embedded in the criminal law but recognized in the Criminal Code which parliament approved directly. Commonplace in the last 13 years, it has established a string of precedents not easily broken.

The Senate too has had its share of abolitionists, including the late Conservative, Senator Grattan O'Leary.

In the final consensus the individual MP faces the free vote and his own responsibility. Some will decide according to the dictates of their own consciences, others under the pressures of public opinion. But historically, legislation in Canada is not always based on public opinion and requires the guidance of specialists. For example, foreign policy and tax laws are not decided by referendum.

David Chandler is his book "Capital Punishment in Canada" concluded that MPs will vote for abolition when they come from culturally diversified regions, as many in Canada are. The classic historical reference usually quoted on the function of members of parliament, however, is that of Edmund Burke:

> Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices to your opinion.

This quotation has been repeatedly referred to with approval in the Canadian parliament. Burke's actual words appear in a section of "Beauchesne's Rules and Forms of the House of Commons of Canada." Thus with a controversial subject such as capital punishment the issue is not just what is the right answer, but how it should be decided.

Personally, as a physician who has come to know life from birth to death, I believe that babies—and I have delivered hundreds of them—are born innocent and not criminal by nature. I also believe that anyone who murders has become insane, either temporarily or permanently, just as is anyone who commits suicide.

[Mr. Philbrook.]

As an MP, I do not believe that we were sent to parliament by our fellow citizens to make laws which take lives, even the lives of those who have themselves murdered, however much we respect the views of our constituents. I believe that capital punishment is neither moral, effective as a deterrent, nor necessary in the light of alternatives. I consider it my duty, Mr. Speaker, to vote to abolish it.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, although the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated today that he did not need those of us on this side who happen to favour the abolition of the death penalty, I am going to take a chance and assume he did not really mean that, and I hope my colleagues who do support Bill C-84 will not mind if I inflict myself on them for a minute or two.

An hon. Member: You're welcome.

Mr. Fairweather: Although I feel welcome I do not really appreciate the remarks of the Prime Minister on an extremely sensitive and difficult issue that will require the fairness and understanding not only of the government but of a good many people in the opposition. I think this debate will only succeed and that the result will only be what the government wishes if all of us are enlisted in a cause that many of us have espoused for some time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: I ask my colleagues if night must fall again in Canada. Must all the engines of ritual murder be strarted up after 14 years of disuse? Must members of parliament surrender to our constituents our undoubted duty, one that has been restated and repeated just a minute ago in eloquent terms, to use our own reason, and to use it well?

I have had to ask myself, Mr. Speaker, having taken part in capital punishment debates since coming here 14 years ago, if there is anything more that one can say. Is it not an imposition to ask my colleagues to listen and to heed one more time? I remain a convinced abolitionist. I will vote for this bill. Silence seems to me to be cowardly, Mr. Speaker, to say nothing of it being too easy. With the greatest respect to those of my colleagues who take another way—that is, who abdicate their responsibilities because of the result of some poll—I say that I respect them but I do not honour them.

I want capital punishment removed from the national agenda. I believe that for far too long it has absorbed the mind, the heart, and the spirit of this place. I have the greatest respect and compassion for the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) who I believe, through a period of extreme difficulty in this country, has served us all very well. I believe that the Solicitor General of Canada should have more things on his agenda than responding to the cry for vengeance because, I am sorry to say, there can be no other reason for the reinstitution of the death penalty in Canada. I want the subject of crime prevention and crime detection to be free of what I conceive to be a veritable albatross of hanging.

Hanging a few prisoners will not end violence in this country. Executing the ten who await the outcome of our deliberations will not save the life of one policeman. Hanging is not a substitute for good police work, and we delude ourselves if we tell the public otherwise.

Even as the bombs exploded in London in the autumn of 1974 the British House of Commons turned back by a majority of 172 votes one more attempt to reinstate the death penalty in that country. The home secretary reminded the House that the Commissioner of Police for London and six of his senior officers were opposed to the return of capital punishment. In their judgment, the home secretary said, the most effective deterrents to terrorism are the likelihood of detection followed by the certainty of conviction for the guilty.

That debate, Mr. Speaker, took place during a period when England was not a very happy place. Inflation was rampant, sterling was falling in value, and stringent fuel conservation measures were in force. England was no longer Tennyson's place, "Compassed by the Inviolate Sea", or Somerville's "Happy Britain, Highly Favoured Isle". Yet tabulating the votes on capital punishment surely anyone must admit that there are certain values that, even in adversity, Britain scorns to yield. I suggest, and I hope very much that this country can join Britain and many others in the civilized world which have values that we refuse to yield, and that for once this issue which beclouds relationships between colleagues and beclouds discussion of crime and its prevention, and presents us with irrelevancies and, as many members have pointed out, with the most horrible and blood curdling definitions in Biblical texts that I for one have ever heard, can be settled.

I see it is approaching ten o'clock, but I will take another few minutes, if I may, to go on and suggest this to my colleagues. Perhaps they have noticed it. When people quote the Bible advocating capital punishment, the quotations always seem to be either in red ink or red typewriter ribbon. I have never understood, and perhaps some sociologist could do a paper for us on this, why it is that those who wish to hang people have to tell us so in red ink. There may be something Freudian there, but I will leave that to hon. members to work out.

I am delighted that the name of a dear friend of many of us, the late Grattan O'Leary, was mentioned just a minute ago. One of the last speeches made by Grattan O'Leary in the Senate was made on April 30, 1975, on this very subject. A good many people who were in the Senate that day could not help but be moved by this brave old man once again coming to the defence of those who wish to remove this law from our statute books. Senator O'Leary, then a very ill man, said among other things, as recorded in the Senate Hansard for Wednesday, April 30:

—the civilized world has been looking at this question for more than half a century and it has come to the conclusion, with the evidence almost overwhelming, that capital punishment is not a deterrent. I would be against capital punishment even if it were a deterrent; but there is nothing on earth, no evidence anywhere by anyone, to show that capital punishment does deter the further commission of such crimes.

The Senator went on to say:

The retentionists say that we must have law and order. "Law and order," my friends, has been the war cry of nearly every tyrant in history. "Law and order" was the cry of Hitler, when he assassinated nearly six million Jews.

He then stated:

"Law and order" was the cry of the infamous Stalin when he reddened the soil of Russia with his purges.

There is always law and order in a graveyard. Yes, "law and order" was the cry of the spawn of Attila the Hun and of Genghis Khan when with fire and sword they laid waste the fairest part of Europe. This has always been the cry of people who want to commit violence against others—the violence which breeds violence.

I am as certain as I stand here that this really is the core of the issue. This violent act by the state surely is—the verb I seek does not come to mind rapidly, but the violence colours the state's activities through the whole criminal justice system. I can recall very well when I had the privilege of being a minister in a government of New Brunswick. One of the last executions took place there, and the guards at the small jail had to seek a leave of absence after the execution took place. They had been confidantes; yes, friends, guards who had shared the aspirations during the whole judicial process of the condemned person, and then the state suddenly said, "Now you have brought this man bread, you have shared his agony, you will witness his death by the state." The request came to me, and who could deny it, so that two people in question got leave of absence. The effect was too much for any person to accept.

That is why I believe the whole trapping—I called it earlier in my speech the whole engine starting up this clanking machinery of death after 14 years—must be an unbearable prospect for those who are in the seats of power.

Others have mentioned brave people who have taken part in raising public feeling about this issue. I have great pride in mentioning another in my own province of New Brunswick, the Archbishop of Moncton, Donat Chiasson, who had the unique obligation, I think the word is, of preaching the sermon at the funeral Mass for the two policemen in Moncton who were savagely murdered a little over a year ago.

The Archbishop did not duck the issue. The Archbishop of Moncton on that occasion did not preach a sermon espousing revenge. How could one expect him to? He chose to preach a sermon of forgiveness, and by that act of churchmanship and of courage he sent a signal, it seems to me, to many people across this country who devotedly espouse the cause, which he does in ecclesiastic terms, and the rest of us do in our ordinary occupations here in parliament.

The Archbishop of Moncton just recently this year, February 23 as a matter of fact, sent a letter to the Prime Minister of Canada, and once again in most eloquent terms supported the cause of abolition of capital punishment.

Perhaps this would be a good time to interrupt this speech and remind hon. members that the second edition will take place at some occasion tomorrow. I am a convinced abolitionist, and I am anxious that those of us who feel the way we do are able to make their positions clear.

HEALTH—ALTERNATIVES FOR TREATMENT IN VIEW OF CLOSING OF HOSPITALS—POSSIBILITY DOCTORS ALLOWED MILEAGE CHARGE

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to deal with a question that is recorded in Hansard for February 16 at pages 10957 and 10958, which I directed to the minister as follows:

In view of the anguish, fear and dismay caused by the proposed closing of several hospitals, particularly in rural areas, I would like to ask the minister if health care centres or other facilities are being planned to look after those needing care and, also, if any provisions are being made to look after the approximately 5,000 people who will be unemployed.

The minister said he had met with his provincial counterparts in April after he had initiated negotiations with the provinces last year, and he offered at that time to share the costs of certain services. Let me suggest that if private enterprise had run its business like the federal government had run national medicare for seven years, and took seven years to observe before correcting its errors, it would have gone bankrupt a long time ago.

The government has the bankroll of the Canadian people, but it is getting thin. First the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) tells his provincial colleagues that the government is not going to go 50-50 any longer. Then the provincial ministers say the same thing to the municipalities.

I asked the minister what provisions or programs he had in mind to relieve the situation which existed over the last seven years. I asked him what provisions have been made to relieve the situation in respect of the backlog of people who remain in active hospital treatment beds longer than they should because there is no extended care home to which they can go. What round the clock provisions are there for these people who could be treated at home who require a certain amount of nursing care similar to that obtained in the extended care program? Why have no figures been published on how costs can be cut in hospitals? There is much experience of hospital administration costs, and also eight years experience of medicare.

How does the minister intend to assure the public that the quality of health care will not be downgraded by the moves now being made? In other words, will a physician call on people under a home health care program, or will there ever be one? What happened to the para-medical personnel program that was discussed a few years ago whereby a nurse practitioner could see people in their homes in most cases, as well as the doctor? This practice is carried out in the north. The nurses treat the patients, and whenever they require further specialized help obtain the same through the use of long distance radio, or a doctor flies in. What is being done to build up a para-medical personnel program? In the case of RNA's, would they be allowed to give a hypo? What has been done about this? What would be the limitations?

These are the questions on which we would like to be enlightened because people are being affected by the closing of hospitals which is disturbing and upsetting, going even into the courts. There is no way the government can avoid the responsibility for its shared cost programs and the chaos it has gotten into on the cost point of view.

I do not blame the present minister of National Health and Welfare for this because other ministers have been involved. In 1967 the spending estimates for Ontario were $358 million. In 1975-76 the estimates will be around $2,913,000,000. In 1967 the province of Ontario had its own medical insurance and demonstrated how well it could work. However, as the government well knows, universal federal medicare was introduced.

The parliamentary secretary who is present tonight will recall very well that at that particular time John Robarts, Premier of Ontario, stated that universal federal medicare would be excessively expensive, out of line with certain other priorities, and inflexible. Some of the other priorities include housing, transportation, and energy. The medicare plan in Ontario at that time was both public and private and competition was keen, which helped to keep down health care costs. Physicians' Services Incorporated was one such company and its administrative costs were held to 5 per cent. This covered 95 per cent of Ontario residents. Federal medicare calls for 90 per cent to qualify for federal subsidies. This plan, which I advocated that the federal government use, was free to the poor, subsidized those on low incomes, insured those with high health care costs because of age or chronic illness, and left the person with the average or high income to pay his own. This, in many cases, provided better coverage than we have today.

We have come full circle, and we are in trouble. We are alarming people. We are closing hospitals and putting many people out of work. Many of those people will not find jobs and will go on unemployment insurance benefits where there will be no services given for the money collected.

It is an amazing thing that the government can think that it can turn off the tap on health care costs. It just cannot be done, and the government knows it. I have reminded the minister on many occasions that there are going to be more and more chronically ill people as our population ages. The care now is not adequate for our geriatric people.

I would therefore like the minister to state what provisions he has made and what plans are being offered. Will there be a health care program for those who could remain in their own homes? Is there going to be a para-medical personnel program? Are there going to be health care centres? What has the minister got to offer to cope with these problems and to right these wrongs so that the quality of medical care will not go down across Canada?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those occasions when it is obviously better to have seven minutes to ask perhaps a hundred questions than it is to have three minutes to try to give some kind of answers to them.

It is true that Ontario had a good medicare program in place in 1967, but it did not cover everybody and everything, and it was obvious from a national point of view that there could not be a national medicare program, one which would cover other, poorer provinces, unless Ontario was part of it. I think all Canadians are proud of the decision to have a national medicare program which could offer a standard to all Canadians, and I do not think the people of Ontario regret that they are part of it. I also do not think that our program costs more today than it would have if they had continued the program they had, which even the hon. member has admitted did not provide the coverage the national program does.

We began in 1967 with an open ended program. We were ready to write cheques for half the liability incurred by provinces in establishing their systems. It did not have the kind of guidelines or ceilings on it which the hon. member, with a hindsight argument, says it ought to have had, but let us look at it as it was then. We wanted the program to grow rapidly. We wanted to bring in the many thousands of Canadians who were not getting adequate medical attention. We wanted hospitals to be built all over the country in places where there never had been hospitals. We wanted a new quality of medical service for our people, and we got it.

A point came—and perhaps it came over the past few years when the hospital side of that program was mature—when there were more or less an adequate number of hospital beds provided across this country, with some regional misallocation, I grant. The problem then was to control the rate of growth, and the federal government turned its attention to that, not just this year and not just with the announcement in the recent budget that there would be new hospital shared cost arrangements after 1980.

This was not just begun by the federal government recently. It was begun several years ago in negotiations and efforts to try to make the provinces realize that the rate of growth was excessive, and was not something which could be sustained by this country.

We had a partnership in the building of these hospitals. The partnership was that the provinces would decide where the hospitals would go, how big they would be and how much they would cost, and the federal government would write the cheques for half. Now the provinces are finding that they have to close hospitals. I insist that they are not closing hospitals because of the federal program. That program continues until 1980, and if Ontario, for example, wanted to double its hospital budget until 1980, the federal government would pay exactly half the cost, as it has done in the past.

The point is that the provinces have realized on their own that the rate of growth is unacceptable and that we have to turn to low cost alternatives. Ottawa has offered to support a range of low cost alternatives which the provinces could begin today if they wanted to. They have not yet done so. They have until October 1, but as far as the federal government is concerned we wish they had come in on them long ago.

Mr. Rynard: You guaranteed the quality of medicare.

POST OFFICE—LETTER URGING PITNEY BOWES CUSTOMERS TO BUY OLYMPIC METER DIES—REASON MINISTER SENT LETTER

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my topic tonight arises from a question I put to the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) on April 13 when I asked what portion of the $150 selling price of postage meter dies was to be retained by the seller, Pitney Bowes of Canada, and also why the taxpayer of Canada was asked to pay for the minister's solicitation on behalf of this company. As usual the minister did not answer the question, which was fairly straightforward. Instead he said:

> Mr. Speaker, Pitney Bowes has a vested interest in selling meter dies, which is their business. We have a vested interest in ensuring that meter dies contain the Olympic symbol in order that people who use meter dies rather than stamps will avail themselves of the opportunity of offering financial assistance to the Olympics. Of course, this is a co-operative venture of the Post Office, Pitney Bowes and the Olympics in general.

From that it is clear that neither the question about the portion of the purchase price, nor the reason for the taxpayer being called upon to bear this expense, was answered.

This is a very serious matter and it is not the first time it has been raised with this minister or by me in the House. The first time I can think of was in March when the question referred to a press release issued by the minister on February 25 about a $12 million issue of Olympic commemorative stamps. I believe that release contained misleading statements as well. In it the minister stated:

> We need to show our young Canadian athletes that we care about them—that we are aware of the tremendous effort and the sacrifice they are making for Canada. One way you can give your support is by buying this commemorative stamp issue for your collection at philatelic outlets.

When the question was raised in the House on March 26 the minister explained that the net proceeds after the cost of production are turned over to COJO and COJO is expected to pass on 3 per cent of whatever it receives to the Canadian Olympic Association. That, of course, would go to assist the athletes.

It is obvious from the remarks that it is not 3 per cent of the $12 million, but 3 per cent of a smaller amount which the minister was unable to pin down, and indicates less support than would be implied by the minister's press release.

In the Pitney Bowes case a letter from the minister addressed to Pitney Bowes customers on March 17 states several times that the program of selling postage meter dies will help the athletes. In the second paragraph it states "to provide aid to Canadian amateur sport"; in the third paragraph it refers to "support for the games and for amateur sport" and in the last paragraph it states "your organization can show its support for the 1976 summer Olympic games and for our young athletes."

The letter states that the die is available for $150. There is no information on what portion of the $150 will go to the athletes and what portion would be retained by Pitney Bowes.

In his answer to my question the minister said that Pitney Bowes has a vested interest in selling meter dies. I hardly think that is a definition of the stand taken by the minister, yet he was unable to explain why, at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada, on the letterhead of the Government of Canada, he was promoting the sale of this die which would presumably result in profit to an ordinary business corporation, namely, Pitney Bowes of Canada.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, although the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) responded to the hon. member's question of April 13 last, there is additional information I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke). The question relates to the sale by Pitney Bowes of Olympic postage meter dies, and asks what portion of the $150 price is retained by Pitney Bowes, and further, why Canadian taxpayers are asked to pay for the minister's solicitations on behalf of that company.

To answer the second part of the question first, there is no cost whatsoever to the Canadian public. The cost of the sales letter signed by the minister, together with all other administrative costs, is deducted from revenues accruing to the Post Offfice from the sale of the dies. I think that is very important.

The Post Office negotiated a price with Pitney Bowes which is the same, or less, than that company's normal charge for producing a meter die. The company then quoted a price equivalent to their production costs—between $20 and $25, depending on the model. The price is less than a customer would have to pay for a die of his own. After the Post Office has paid for the die and for the administration and production costs, whatever is left from the $150 collected from the customer becomes part of the revenues of the Olympic stamp program.

The sales promotion has been a co-operative effort between the Canada Post Office and Pitney Bowes. The company arranged for its 500 service representatives to make calls on customers, offering the special Olympic postage meter dies. All the costs of the sales calls are borne by the company.

We have gone into some detail in answering this question because we believe this is a worth-while venture for a worth-while cause, support for the Olympic stamp program and, of course, for Canada's own athletes.

EDUCATION—ALLEGED INADEQUACY OF PAYMENTS TO WESTERN PROVINCES FOR POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on May 14 I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) about his disposition with respect to renegotiating the 1972 federal-provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act whereby the federal government provides 50 per cent of the moneys for the operating costs of post-secondary institutions. I asked the Secretary of State to look again at the anomalies in that act. I was referring to the provision for the 15 per cent increment which is included in that act.

At first glance, when we consider the increase of cost resulting from inflation, that provision looks generous. But on closer examination, if one considers the disparities in the growth of post-secondary educational institutions across this country, it becomes evident that great inequities exist in this legislation. The 15 per cent increment provision is fine for those post-secondary institutions in provinces where there has been stable education growth; I am thinking of provinces in which a plateau in growth was reached some time ago, perhaps decades ago. When applied to British Columbia, where there is a bourgeoning growth in education and where new regional colleges are being established almost every year, the 15 per cent increment provision does nothing but heighten the obvious inequity of the legislation.

Answering my question on May 14 the minister said, as reported at page 13520 of Hansard:

> . . . that is a subject on which I have received some representation and of course it is being considered.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that we can take the minister's word at face value, because the present arrangement is creating no small hardship for many of the newer institutions in British Columbia.

I realize that the federal government, which is accustomed to dealing with astronomical sums of money, might consider the few hundreds of thousands of dollars which would be involved if the act were adjusted as a matter of no consequence. But I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that to the small institutions of British Columbia, those hundreds of thousands of dollars, if they can get them, mean the difference between life and death. For example, I am thinking of Douglas College, in Surrey-White Rock; of Trinity Western College, in Fraser Valley West; of Fraser Valley College, a brand new college in Fraser Valley East, and of Northern Lights College, which was established this year at Dawson Creek. Here we are talking about brand new institutions which must meet not only extremely large capital costs and start-up costs, but carry the extra burden of high operating costs.

Under the 1972 arrangement, Mr. Speaker, there was provision for a fixed rate to be granted, plus a 15 per cent increment. The present arrangement means, in the face of the growth which has taken place in the province, that there is nothing left in the kitty for those colleges which come on stream last.

I am particularly acquainted with Trinity Western College, since I served on faculty and staff for about 12 years. It is a small private college with an enrolment of about 400. It has not cost the taxpayer one red cent. Everything that has been brought to fruition in that college has been through sacrificial gifts on the part of people interested in that kind of an education. All donations and tuition have brought that college to where it is today. In the past 13 years that one institution has saved the taxpayers hundreds of thousands of dollars. In addition, it has in a sense been subsidizing other post-secondary institutions across Canada.

Since 1972 Trinity Western College has repeatedly tried to get help under the provisions of the act. The provincial government as well as the federal government have in good faith said they would like to help, but under the provisions of the act that was not possible. Even with the 50 per cent help in operating costs the provincial government has said it would cost it extra tax dollars to make up that 50 per cent cost because of the 1972 plateau that was established when the act was passed.

In order to do that kind of catch-up financing, the provincial government would have to throw in the extra dollars to make up the 50 per cent of the operating costs. I say again that this is not fair to a province like British Columbia which is experiencing that kind of growth.

The same is true for Fraser Valley College which is about three years old. The province has to kick in the extra money to finance the operating expenses of that college. This year Northern Lights College in Dawson Creek is facing the same kind of dilemma.

The 1972 Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act is being very prejudicial in light of the experience of these colleges. I ask that the Secretary of State take a serious hard look at the disparity that exists because of the fiscal arrangement of this legislation. I hope he will seriously consider a readjustment of the arrangement in order to include those colleges which come on stream later in the life of the province, the educational experience of a province, and provide some kind of equitable arrangement so that new colleges that come on stream will also benefit by the 50 per cent operating costs arrangement that is supposed to be provided by the provisions of the act.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to the matter raised by the hon. member. He is suggesting that the 15 per cent ceiling which exists on the annual rate of increase in federal payments under the post-secondary education provisions of the Fiscal Arrangements Act is having an adverse effect on certain post-secondary institutions which are facing high rates of increase in enrolments.

The post-secondary education fiscal transfer involves two distinct aspects. The first of these is a formula for determining the amount of money to which a province is entitled that is, the value of the federal contribution. The second is a mechanism for actually transferring funds to the provincial government. The value of the federal contribution to a province is based on 50 per cent of eligible operating expenditures of post-secondary institutions in the province, subject to the floor provision and the 15 per cent limitation on the annual increase in total federal expenditures under the program.

The mechanism for transferring funds to a province involves two components, the federal "revenue reduction" and residual cash "adjustment payments". The revenue reduction relates historically to a transfer of personal and corporate income tax points to each provincial government as part of the 1967 arrangements developed by the federal government for supporting post-secondary education in Canada. It also includes, where applicable, equalization and revenue guarantee payments associated with the value of the tax transfer. This part of the legislation is administered by the Department of Finance. To the extent that the revenue reduction is insufficient to meet the total value of the federal contribution to a province, the Secretary of State's department makes cash adjustment payments to provide for the difference. I should stress here that these payments to the provinces are totally unconditional as to the purposes for which they may be spent.

The program has just entered its tenth year of operation. During the first nine years of the program, the total value of the fiscal transfer to all provinces, that is, the combined value of the federal revenue reduction and the residual adjustment payments, has exceeded $8 billion. Of this amount approximately $4.5 billion was in the form of the revenue reduction and approximately $3.5 billion has been paid by the Department of the Secretary of State as adjustment payments. Given these magnitudes, I think it is reasonable to conclude that the substantial growth and development which have occurred in the field of post-secondary education in Canada over the past decade simply would not have approached the same degree without the federal support program.

As can be seen from my description of this program there is no link between the 15 per cent ceiling on the annual rate of growth in the aggregate value of the federal contribution to the provinces and the funds made available to individual institutions by the governments of the provinces. Given that the funds transferred to the provincial governments are entirely unconditional as to the purposes for which they may be spent, the decision as to the amount of financial support the government of each province chooses to provide to the various post-secondary institutions in the province is one which rests exclusively with each provincial government.

I am clearly not in a position to comment on the manner in which the various provincial governments may choose to provide financial support for post-secondary institutions in their respective provinces.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that these comments clarify the question raised by the hon. member.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INVESTIGATION BY ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE OF ALLEGED FRAUDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: —I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Solicitor General make available immediately full details of a recent investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police into the infiltration of organized crime into the Unemployment Insurance Commission and, specifically, that the House be told of companies existing on paper only making use of valid names and social insurance numbers and reportedly engaging in the fraudulent collection of a vast number of claims each week from the Ottawa UIC office and possibly other UIC offices amounting to thousands of dollars; and, finally, that full details be made public of fraud charges laid by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police under section 338 of the Criminal Code in connection with this matter during the last several days against Gordon Gunn, former employee of the Unemployment Insurance Commission residing at 1435 Prince of Wales Drive, Ottawa, and when further charges will be laid.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I know that all hon. members, regardless of their sentiments in respect of this particular motion, will know that by moving it the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) shows that he has made a complete recovery. We rejoice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Notwithstanding that expression of sentiment, the motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be presented to the House only if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF LEGAL ADVICE GIVEN MINISTER WHEN NEGOTIATING LOCKHEED CONTRACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and commend the urgency of this matter. In view of the decision yesterday by this government to accept a loss to the Canadian people of a minimum of $16 million and possibly more over the Lockheed Orion negotiations, with nothing to show for it; the decision by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) to announce agreement in principle prior to approval by Treasury Board, thereby incurring such liability; and the decision of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) to guarantee such loss by purchasing an extension of the option for $16 million, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House refer this matter forthwith to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to determine what legal advice, if any, was given to the responsible ministers throughout the negotiations and, in particular, what legal advice, if any, was given prior to the announcement of approval in principle by the Minister of National Defence on November 27, 1975.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF COMPENSATING DISCOUNT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that for a few years the world price of cereals will continue to sustain rising food prices which are already subject to quite strong upward pressure, and that the final reports of the Food Prices Review Board and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture recognize that fact and both point out the need for taking immediate measures, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House discuss right now the board's recommendation stating that the government should introduce grant programs for consumers to protect Canadians, and that the discussion consider our proposition of making up an efficient system of compensating discount for consumers stabilize and balance this sector of our economy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 provisions, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion may not be put.

SUGGESTED SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTE WITH VETERINARIANS TO AVOID STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I move under the provisions of Standing Order 43 a motion of national and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the veterinarians employed by the health of animals branch of Agriculture Canada are now proposing strike action to back up their legitimate grievances concerning working conditions and poor salary schedules, an action that will have dire consequences on the meat packing industry, the livestock producers, meat exports and consumers all across Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That the President of the Treasury Board take immediate steps to again meet with representatives of the veterinary group to settle their differences and avert a very costly national strike.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF COMPENSATING DISCOUNT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an important and urgent matter.

Considering that the energy policies of this government will result in continuous increases in the price of oil, gasoline and natural gas, and particularly in a nearly immediate increase of 5 cents a gallon for gasoline, and considering that these increases cannot be sustained by low-income Canadians who are now affected by the anti-inflation policy of the government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House consider immediately the possibility of establishing a compensating discount on the price of heating oil, gasoline and natural gas to roll back the price of these essential products down to a level which makes them accessible to low-income Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

OIL—SUFFICIENCY OF PRICE INCREASE TO GENERATE EXPLORATION—NO COMMITMENT TO PROVINCES CONCERNING EXCISE TAX ON GASOLINE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister advise whether in his extensive discussions with the provinces and industries, which I am sure took place in setting the new prices for oil and gas, he received guarantees or assurances that these increases in price would be sufficient to generate the exploration and development to meet the goals put down in the energy strategy report? In other words, what I am seeking now is whether the price was arrived at in a random fashion, whether it was worked out in order to get the exploration that is needed or whether it is basically another source of tax revenue for the federal government?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I made quite clear in my statement last night, it was a negotiated settlement based on a number of factors; that is to say, the whole question of minimizing the inflationary impact on one hand and, on the other hand, to recognize the legitimate concerns of the producing provinces for revenues from a depleting resource. Third, it had to be a price that was high enough to bring on greater exploration and development. All of those points were made in my statement last night. I invite the hon. member to reread the statement.

Mr. Gillies: The minister did not answer the question that I raised, namely the relationship between the amount of the increase going to exploration and the expected amount of energy coming forth. In the minister's discussions with the provinces, was a commitment made to the consuming provinces that a change would be made in the excise tax on gasoline as a quid pro quo for the price arrangement that was finally arrived at?

Mr. Gillespie: On the last question the hon. member has asked, Mr. Speaker, there was no understanding of that kind about the excise tax. Let me make this quite clear when he raises the question of taxes. This is not a measure to increase the federal government's tax take. It is a measure designed to increase exploration and development in Canada, particularly in the frontier areas, the cash flow. If that investment takes place, the federal government's tax take will be only 3 per cent of the increase.

Mr. Gillies: Can the minister tell us whether in the discussions with which took place with the industry he received the impression the industry was satisfied that this change in price was sufficient to develop the cash flow the hon. gentleman believed to be necessary to get the exploration projected in the energy strategy report tabled on May 4?

Mr. Gillespie: As the hon. member must know by now, if the industry reinvests 50 cents of each dollar of the increase in the oil price in exploration they will have the benefit of that 50 cents and they will retain 3 cents in addition. The federal government backs right off so that its total take is only 3 per cent. That is only one of the measures the federal government has taken to stimulate exploration and development in Canada. The other set of measures I shall be bringing forward this afternoon; they will be announced jointly by myself and my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan). They deal with the fiscal regime, the land tenure regulations, Canadian participation, and a number of other important matters, all specifically focused upon additional exploration and development in Canadian lands and waters.

OIL—GUARANTEE FROM COMPANIES THAT ADDITIONAL MONEY GENERATED BY PRICE INCREASE USED FOR EXPLORATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): As the oil and gas companies will be quite free to spend the increase in oil and gas prices in any of three ways, that is they can devote it to exploration, they can put it into reserve funds or they can pay it out in additional dividends. May I ask what guarantees the minister has received from the companies that this additional money which comes out of the pockets of the consumers of Canada will be spent only on exploration for additional resources?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Perhaps the best reason it will be spent on exploration and development is that it will be in the self-interest of the companies to spend in this direction.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: If I might be permitted, I should like to finish my answer. I believe the hon. gentleman who asked the question is perfectly well aware that self-interest, the profit motive, is the most important generating force as far as business decisions are concerned and I think there is a built-in incentive for engaging in exploration.

The second reason I think there will be reinvestment in exploration is that we shall require, through legislation, mandatory reporting of their cash flows and how much of their cash flow is directed to exploration and development. The public of Canada will then be able to see whether or not those funds are in fact being devoted to the purposes which they, the companies, and we, the government, say are necessary.

Mr. Hees: As the government will obviously not know for many months, until it has had a chance to monitor the expenditures of the oil companies, how the money has been spent, I ask the minister how in the world he could agree to allow these companies to raise prices in absence of iron-bound guarantees from them that they will spend this extra money only in the way that they should, and that is by exploring for additional resources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: It comes to me as a great surprise that the hon. member should have forgotten all about incentives. He spends a good deal of his time in this House telling the government that they ought to put more incentives into our whole system; he has now turned his back on this completely.

● (1420)

Mr. Hees: The minister is absolutely right, Mr. Speaker. Any incentives that I have urged are the sort that are paid in exact proportion to the efforts that the people who are asked to do these things expend, not some vague promise that makes it possible that the money will be spent in some other way. Obviously the minister is wasting the consumers' money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF CHARGES OF CORRUPTION IN CALGARY OFFICE—SUGGESTION DEPARTMENTAL POLICIES NOT HELPING NATIVES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of Indian affairs may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Not very long ago there was an apparent suicide of one Nelson Small Legs of Alberta. Before Mr. Small Legs apparently took his own life, he wrote the following words:

> I give my life in protest to the present conditions concerning the Indian people of southern Alberta. I also give my life in the hope of a full scale investigation into the department of Indian affairs corruption and also the resignation of Judd Buchanan, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and the divide and conquer tactics present on each reservation.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will take this symbolic act of violence as notice that that department and its policies are not helping the native people as they should; and more specifically, would he see that an investigation is launched into the charges of corruption and mismanagement laid against the Calgary office of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I do not know the details of this matter, but I must say that when a man gives his life for an objective I must respect that and regard it as a very serious matter indeed. I will look into it with all the earnestness that it deserves.

However, I would remind the hon. member and the House that, as a government, we did offer as long ago as 1969 to abolish the department of Indian affairs if that was what the Indians wanted. We made a clear proposition to them and also stated that, in view of their grievances against the department, we were prepared to change the act progressively in that way. The President of the Treasury Board was then minister, and the Indians specifically asked us not to do so. So, in a sense, we are complying with the Indians' own request to keep the department in operation and to continue treating the native population in a special way under the Indian Act. We are doing that at their request.

In the meantime we are trying to meet as many of their grievances as possible. We named Mr. Barber as Indian claims commissioner for a long period, and we are now in the process of negotiating, with various Indian bands in different regions, solutions to their problems.

Mr. Firth: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What the Prime Minister is saying sounds fairly good to me, but the Indian people across the country are still meeting with frustration in their dealings with this department. It seems that the department is working hard to perpetuate itself without really responding to the wishes of the Indian people across the country. Would the Prime Minister please see that that department makes moves to prevent further violence happening again and that it responds more to the wishes of the native people of this country?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, in view of my previous answer I must take exception to the suggestion of the hon. member that the department is seeking to perpetuate itself. I repeat that the proposal of the then minister was to the effect that the department should do away with itself, leading to the situation where the Indian population would be Canadians like everyone else and would be treated under federal and provincial laws just like everyone else. I repeat that it was at the request of the Indians that we did not proceed in that direction.

In the meantime, in addition to the various suggestions I have made, we have set up a meeting between the National Indian Brotherhood and a group of cabinet ministers to deal on a continuing basis with the grievances that worry the hon. member and many of us on this side. We have this continuing structure with them at the ministerial level in order to help them make up their minds, as Indians, what the best course in the future is. As the hon. member knows, the Indian people themselves are very much divided on where their future lies and we understand they do not want to take any hard decisions in that regard. For this reason we have not abolished the department. We are meeting with them and we have said we will time our own actions to suit their priorities.

DAIRYING—REQUEST FOR REDUCTION OF LEVY ON EXCESS OF QUOTA

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the fact that industrial milk producers in the province of Quebec now have to throw away 25 per cent of their production and that sooner or later many of them will go bankrupt and that, as a result, there will be a decrease in the amount of milk and powdered milk, can the minister tell the House whether he is considering reducing the levy of $8.60 a hundredweight on the surplus of quotas before next September or October?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is wasteful if they are throwing away a product. I have not been made aware of this. There is no necessity for them doing it because they are wasting energy producing the product in the first place that has no market. They would be better not to be doing that. Many producers have cut back a great deal on production and are supplying the market in an orderly fashion, which is what we want them to do. If they do that they still can make money. We know that and they know that. No, I am not considering changing the levy.

REQUEST FOR NEW POLICY TO HELP INDUSTRIAL MILK PRODUCERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

If he did not know, I just told the minister that industrial milk producers now have to throw way 25 per cent of their production. Considering that heifers are hard to sell and that industrial milk producers cannot make money, I would ask the minister whether he would consider the possibility of establishing a new policy to help them on a temporary basis because of their lack of revenue due to the new dairy policy.

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, they have not been asked to cut production 25 per cent, they have been asked to cut it 15 per cent which would leave production practically the same as we requested last year. They know what markets there are and the provincial marketing boards know what markets are available for this production. This over-production does not make sense, unless we have an orderly, world distribution system. That is not totally my responsibility but is totally a world responsibility in which we would require all governments establishing monetary funds in order to carry out distribution to the needy people of the world. It is not the farmers' or the minister's responsibility to do that. Until we have that kind of a system it can be very wasteful, to repeat, to produce a product that has no known home.

AIR TRANSPORT

REACTION TO MINISTER'S OFFER TO BROADEN TERMS OF REFERENCE OF INQUIRY INTO USE OF BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and refers to a question of yesterday. In view of the positive response last evening of the spokesman for the air traffic controllers welcoming the minister's offer to broaden the terms of reference of the public commissioner, has the minister approached the commissioner or the interested parties to see whether such action on his part would facilitate solutions to the outstanding issues, or was his offer just a gesture?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member does not mean to add that kind of final phrase, and I would be glad if he would refrain from doing it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are very touchy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are not back in the classroom.

Mr. Lang: I simply meant, Mr. Speaker, that he is sometimes better than that. I expect to meet representatives of the controllers this afternoon.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, will the minister be taking steps this afternoon when he does meet the Commissioner to extend the time so that all parties directly concerned may reach a solution, especially in light of the complexity of developing satisfactory procedures for IFR through the simulator which, by some accounts, has not yet been activated and made operational?

● (1430)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the accounts are largely wrong. I am sure the hon. member did not mean to misunderstand me. I did not mean that I was meeting the commissioner this afternoon but rather the representatives of the controllers. I would like him to be more specific about what he wants in respect of an extension of time since the time is indefinite.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED DEFRAUDING OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO CHARGES

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice. Could he confirm to this House details concerning the recent extensive defrauding of the Unemployment Insurance Commission of thousands of dollars which was investigated by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Could he also tell the House whether charges will be laid against bogus companies and individuals involved in addition to charges already laid against Gordon Gunn of Ottawa last Friday.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I should like to advise the hon. member that I do not have the particulars of the allegations in respect of charges to which he has referred. We will look into it, study it and advise the hon. member of whatever the charges are.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED FRAUD—POSSIBILITY OF CHARGES

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the minister in a position to provide the House with full details of the investigation carried on by his officials in co-operation with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police into the extensive defrauding of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, particularly in Ottawa, and can he tell the House when charges will be laid against all those involved in addition to those laid against Gordon Gun of Ottawa.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I can only indicate to the hon. member, as he pointed out, that this matter is under investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Until they have completed their investigation I think it would be a disservice for me to make any detailed comment. Charges, if they are warranted, will be laid. We will encourage that course if that is the case, but we have to await their investigation.

FINANCE

NUMBER OF OUTSIDE EXPERTS RETAINED TO HELP PREPARE BUDGET—MAINTENANCE OF BUDGET SECRECY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As it is understood that the minister has retained certain outside experts to help him with his budget, would the minister indicate how many of these brains not in the public service have been retained, what type of concerns they come from and, specifically, what is their job in relation to the budget?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman would be inexact in saying that in respect of the fiscal aspects of the budget. In respect of whether there have been any such outside retainers, it is true that the Anti-Inflation Board and the officials of my department have been in consultation with a number of people in the professions with regard to possible amendments to the anti-inflation program which I indicated would be announced at the same time as the budget.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, as budget secrecy, certainly relative to tax changes or the spending plans of the government, is of uppermost importance, would the minister indicate what precise guidelines he has established to ensure continued secrecy of budgetary information as this is very much a pool effort behind the presentation of the budget.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I just said the discussion was not with regard to tax changes or government spending.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM IN CAPE BRETON AND EXTENSION OF TIME LIMIT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the extremely serious unemployment rate on Cape Breton Island, would the minister announce as quickly as possible what programs will be available for students under the SEAP—the Student Summer Employment and Activities Program—in Cape Breton. I understand there are over 1,500 students in the Sydney district area alone registered for employment at the moment.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I will make that information known to the hon. member.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his reply. I am wondering whether he would give consideration to extending the program under his department for more than eight weeks, so that at least a few students in every community on the Island would be given an opportunity to apply for some of these positions.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I can agree to look at that representation.

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATES—INCREASE OF AGREED CHARGES ON POTATOES—INADEQUACY OF ROLLING STOCK

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that both the CN and the CP have served notice on New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island potato shippers that they intend to raise their agreed charge freight rates by 20 per cent on domestic shipments and 15 per cent on export shipments, as of July 1, would the Minister of Transport have a heart to heart talk with these servants of the national interest so as to convince them of the need for improved rolling stock to substitute for the antiquated and unacceptable railway cars now being provided by U.S. railways, when these are at all available, so that eastern potato growers can receive the same fair treatment accorded to the western wheat producer in this respect.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to raise the question of adequate equipment with the two railways. I perhaps should also make sure that the Canadian Transport Commission has taken note of the rate increase.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF RENEWALS OF CAR INSURANCE UNLESS OTHER TYPES OF INSURANCE PLACED WITH FIRM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, if I could get the minister's attention. Would the minister tell the House if a number of officials in his department have been investigating what has been described as a flood of complaints about the practice by a number of insurance companies of refusing renewals of car insurance unless the person applying for insurance would also agree to place his fire and life insurance with the same company.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the situation but have not been flooded with complaints.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, would the minister just answer the question. I asked him if his department is investigating this. I understand from reports that it is. If so, has he received a report from his officials and is he taking any action on this deplorable practice.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, as soon as I receive the report, if action is necessary I will be glad to take it. One of the limitations I find in my role as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is the quasi-judicial role of the investigator in respect of the Combines Investigation Act means that even I am prohibited from knowing what actions are being taken, if any, unless they are revealed by a third party. This is an embarrassing position to be in because it is very difficult to be forthright with the House.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, if it should turn out that this practice does contravene existing law, which I understand is problematical, and since such a practice really amounts to the consumer being held up to blackmail by the insurance companies because presumably the consumer has other insurance with another company, would the minister take steps to ensure that the law is changed so that the government would be in a position to stop this practice.

Mr. Mackasey: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman's representations are coming at a very appropriate time since the legislation is about to be changed. I certainly will give it full consideration.

IMMIGRATION

MEDICAL EXAMINATION OF IMMIGRANTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE ADEQUACY

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the astronomical costs being encountered in respect of health care in the treatment of worms and intestinal parasites as well as sickness which, according to experts in the field, is becoming a widespread problem in urban areas, I should like to ask the minister, since this problem is brought into Canada mostly by immigrants from tropical countries, why proper examination and treatment is not carried out before entry of the person into Canada?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there have been changes in the recent past with regard to examination of immigrants and indeed visitors destined to employment in Canada in terms of health. Those efforts have been stepped up very considerably in recent months. I would be glad to give the hon. member the full details of this and elaborate on it in a letter or make the situation public. There is a further difficulty which bothers us of course with regard to people who come here as visitors and then stay for other purposes, that is to take unauthorized employment. But here again steps are being taken to make it easier for employers, and more likely that they will be able, to identify people who are authorized or unauthorized in terms of the validity of their being in Canada. These steps combined with others will improve the situation which indeed concerns me, as it does the hon. member, although I am not sure it is as prevalent as he is indicating in his comments.

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGES IN TERMS OF REFERENCE OF INQUIRY INTO USE OF BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, and it is basically a supplementary question to the one asked earlier. The minister in his statement yesterday indicated a willingness to look at all aspects of safety. I should like to ask him now whether he could be more specific and indicate exactly what he meant. Is he willing to go as far as the air traffic controllers have asked him to go, that is to include all aspects of bilingualism?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that my answer yesterday speaks for itself adequately. I do not think it would be useful to attempt to spell out in detail what may be the nature of the first proposal, the reply, the second proposal, and later discussions today. I can say to the hon. member, however, that any aspect relating to safety, so far as I am concerned, is something we are certainly willing to establish satisfactorily, that we are concerned and that our procedures take it into account.

What I am not willing to do is to treat as a bargainable issue a matter which must be a matter of government policy or indeed, in parallel business terms, a matter for management, and that is the fundamental issue of a policy decision about whether or not to provide certain service in a bilingual way. That is a policy decision which the government will take and, with the co-operation of this parliament will continue to take, and that does not become a bargainable issue.

SPORTS

POSSIBILITY OF CANADA CUP HOCKEY GAMES AT QUEBEC CITY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

On May 7 last, the minister made a statement about the Canada Cup and said that the games would probably be held in Montreal, and Toronto if a satisfactory agreement could be reached with them, and that possibly one or two games might be held in Quebec City. Is the minister in a position to say to the House today whether such agreement has been reached and whether there will be some hockey games of that series in Quebec City?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The organizing committee has the firm intention of scheduling at least one game and perhaps two in Quebec City. I do not know, however, if a formal agreement has been signed, but as far as the organizing committee is concerned, there is no doubt that it will do its utmost to hold at least one game in Quebec City which, as you know, has many hockey fans.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—POSSIBILITY OF UNION REPRESENTATION ON COMMITTEE TO ESTABLISH NEW POLICY

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I will direct my question to his parliamentary secretary; it is about the recent establishment of a special committee to review the whole Canadian textile and clothing policy. As this committee must report to the minister before June 30 next, and following the interesting meeting last week between CSD representatives and several government members on the matter, will the participation of a union representative on this committee be encouraged to ascertain the constructive and useful views of workers in this major industry who are interested in the safety of their employment?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think I must first outline the composition of this advisory committee: three senior executives of the textile industry, three senior executives of the clothing industry, one provincial representative each from Ontario, Manitoba and Quebec, and three representatives of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I want to mention that we have no objection to some members of this advisory committee consulting the unions concerned. A first effort has been made to call the initial meeting for May 25, and the next meeting will be held on June 7 with some members of this advisory committee.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROVISION OF SERVICE TO BRANDON, DAUPHIN, YORKTON AND SASKATOON—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Since Skywest has been a dead issue for some four or five months and the provinces are apparently not willing to enter into any arrangements with the federal government because of some stipulation which the federal government is apparently making, would the minister indicate what are the immediate prospects of providing air service to the communities of Brandon, Dauphin, Yorkton and his own constituency, Saskatoon, via feeder lines?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the work is going on with regard to what might be required in the way of particular facilities on those routes. I hope to be in a position to say something definitive before very long.

Mr. Korchinski: May I ask the minister whether he is consulting any airlines, and is he considering the purchase of a Russian plane Ilyushin 21? Is he still prepared to provide financial assistance to provide this service, even without provincial participation, and what deadline is he aiming for?

Mr. Lang: Quite a wide range of consultations are going on. It is not our intention to acquire aircraft ourselves, and the type of aircraft which any carrier might offer is itself part of the discussion, but it would largely be the responsibility of the carrier, depending on the type of service required.

ALLEGEDLY CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS CONCERNING IMPORTATION OF EGGS BY MARKETING AGENCY—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. I have before me a statement issued by the Minister of Agriculture that the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency should be considered the applicant and first receiver of imported eggs under constraints of a system of monitoring all transactions. At about the same time the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs stated in the House that he was in no way in favour of CEMA being the first importer of eggs, even though it would mean an over-all lowering in the price of all eggs to consumers. Can the Prime Minister advise the House which of the two ministers was expressing government policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, they were certainly speaking very truthfully, one in defence of agriculture and the other in defence of the consumer. I think this is their role. I would point out to the hon. member that he would have to go beyond either statement because the importing permits are not issued by either of the two ministers, they are issued by a third minister, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. That would indicate to the hon. member that when we have a problem such as this, where ministers are supporting conflicting interests, we solve them in cabinet in a way which is the most profitable for the Canadian people.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED CHANGE IN INDICATION OF COUNTRY OF ORIGIN OF IMPORTED EGGS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): While we are waiting for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to come back, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Why is it that eggs which come to Canada from the United States are marked "product of U.S.A.", but when they get to the Canadian consumer they are marked "made in Canada"?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinley: Why should consumers pay Canadian prices for these cheaper imported eggs from the U.S.A.?

Some hon. Members: Shame, Bryce.

An hon. Member: Think quickly now.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): If the hon. gentleman told me that the stamp had been changed to "laid in Canada", I would understand him, but "made in Canada" with the rooster in the U.S.—I cannot even follow the logic. Under our system when there is a shortage of eggs in Canada, a quota of, I think, 100,000 dozen is brought in at a time from the U.S. and is considered part of the Canadian production.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: This is clear and understandable in order to control the market. It is only when that number of eggs is still insufficient that ITC, as the Prime Minister pointed out, designate certain importers to increase the volume of eggs coming in from the United States in order to provide a sufficient quantity for the consumers of this country. Such action in no way affects the producer.

EFFECT OF FAILURE TO INCREASE CEILING ON CASUAL EARNINGS OF THOSE DRAWING ALLOWANCES

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. When considering the matter of the present ceilings on the casual earnings of veterans drawing war veterans' allowances, would the minister look into the possibility that the delay in raising the $1,500 ceiling on casual earnings actually reduces the monthly allowance paid to veterans on war veterans allowances?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we had discussions the other day and the answer is still the same. The department is looking into this. We hope to be able to do some work on it in the near future and have it processed before too long.

ALLEGED DANGER FROM RED FOOD DYES—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DEPARTMENTAL STUDY

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Little more than two months ago the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe asked the minister if any conclusions had been reached concerning the danger from red food dyes in our foodstuffs. The minister replied that his department was considering in detail the studies made in the United States. I now ask the minister what has been the result of his department's study of the danger of red dyes in foodstuffs? What conclusions have been arrived at concerning this matter?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. member has taken cognizance of the press release issued by me on February 2 on this particular subject. It was a nine-page press release which went into this issue extensively. I can only report to the hon. member that the conclusions expressed by my department in that press release have not changed.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I have read the press release.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You are one up on your colleagues.

Mr. Grafftey: I am not interested in press releases; however, I am interested in answers to questions by the minister in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: He was asked in the House to reply in the House and tell what dangers were identified in the study into these red dye in foodstuffs. Would he reply in the House and tell us what the general conclusions were?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am not asking the hon. member to be interested in press releases but in their content.

An hon. Member: Don't be smart!

Mr. Lalonde: If he went to the trouble of reading it, he would not need to ask the question. It is all there, he can read it if he wants. I would say that the concern expressed by the United States authorities was not substantiated by the available scientific evidence.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO COMMON FUND ESTABLISHED AT UNCTAD CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I should like to address my question to his parliamentary secretary or to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that on Monday the Secretary General of the Commonwealth referred to the common fund as essential to the success of the UNCTAD conference in Nairobi, and in view of the fact that the OPEC nations have now made a large commitment of money for the common fund, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether Canada is now in a position to make a specific commitment and contribution to the common fund?

[Translation]

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who attended, I believe, the opening of the UNCTAD negotiations knows that Canada naturally approved in principle the setting up of a common fund. As for the details on participation to the fund, I shall be glad to inquire about them from the department; in any event, it would be more appropriate, if only because of my voice, for me to answer tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, may I try a supplementary and say it is the money I want, not the voice. May I ask the parliamentary secretary whether the department is aware that in the opinion of many of those at the conference, if the common fund is not adequately supported, not only the UNCTAD conference but the north/south conference at Paris of which Canada is one of the chairmen, is in danger of breaking down?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will not get the money, it will go to the Third World countries! He knows very well the concern of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who represents the Canadian government, and he knows the minister is going to use every platform to promote that idea both at the north/south conference in June and in Nairobi now through our officials there.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED LOSS OF BENEFITS OF PERSON WHO FOUND WORK AND THEN LOST JOB

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Does he agree that it is unacceptable and intolerable for a person to be disqualified for unemployment benefits simply because he had the courage and initiative to find himself a job that was terminated six weeks later because his employer went bankrupt? In fact, that individual was penalized because, instead of staying at home and living off unemployment benefits, he chose to work. Having lost his job because his employer went bankrupt, he can no longer get unemployment insurance because of the four-week break in his receiving those benefits. Does the minister agree that it it unfair to penalize the person who tries to find a job, and if so, can he tell us what solution he intends to suggest in the near future with a view to helping those who are in that situation?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would need to have the details of that specific case. It sounds like a travesty to me if the facts of the hon. member are totally correct with regard to all the factors. If he will give me details, I shall be glad to look into it and give him a specific response. If there is an injustice I shall do my best to correct it.

RESULTS OF STUDY OF RESPONSIBILITIES OF VETERINARIANS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Has a study authorized by his department to examine all aspects of the responsibilities of veterinarians in the federal public service, especially the health of animals branch, now been completed? If it has, could the minister tell us whether the report recommends that the position of veterinarians in the public service be up-graded commensurate with their high responsibility for protecting the health of the livestock industry in Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not one hundred per cent sure that it has been completed. I think it has been, but I certainly have not had time to study it. I am sure the hon. member knows that we want to make sure that these people, who are amongst the most dedicated civil servants in Canada and who have maintained a high profile for agriculture Canada especially with regard to health of animals, livestock diseases and poultry endeavours, are properly classified. They have one of the best records in Canada and we want to maintain it.

[Miss Bégin.]

PUBLIC SERVICE

SALARY OFFER TO VETERINARIANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of what the Minister of Agriculture has stated, and in view of the fact that 70 per cent of all wage settlements in the public service, as reported by the Financial Times, have been settled with increases of 20 per cent and more, and also in view of the fact that because of a 27 per cent vacancy rate in the health of animals branch the AIB guidelines do not legally apply, is the minister still insisting on his offer of 8 per cent or 9 per cent despite the fact that veterinarians' salaries have not kept up with inflation over the last five years?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that the statistics he is using are not true. Last year we settled with the federal civil servants for an average of 14.4 per cent; that was for last year, before the implementation of the guidelines. At this time, unfortunately, I have, in the case of all civil servants, to abide by the guidelines issued following the anti-inflation program which was adopted under an act voted by this House.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS WORKING AT TORONTO—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport following upon a question I put to him a couple of weeks ago about illegal immigrants who were arrested and bound working at Toronto airport. Has the minister checked to see if all persons now working at airports, especially Toronto, who have access to security areas at these airports are in Canada legally and have security clearance?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the original question is being followed up but I do not have a report at this time.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

REASON BOARD REFUSED TO ADMIT LETTER FROM MR. SEABORN CONCERNING ENVIRONMENTAL EFFECT OF GENERATING ELECTRICITY FOR EXPORT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I have in front of me a copy of a recent letter received by the National Energy Board and written by Mr. J. B. Seaborn, Deputy Minister of the Environment, expressing anxieties about the possible environmental effects of power generation by Ontario Hydro for the export market. Can the minister tell the House whether he was consulted by the National Energy Board before it decided to refuse to admit the letter as evidence at recent National Energy Board hearings, and can he further advise the House why this important piece of documentation was refused and under whose instructions it was refused as evidence?

● (1500)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I did not in any way refuse to allow that piece of documentation to go forward to the National Energy Board.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is recognized for one supplementary question.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I am not asking a supplementary, but repeating my request. The minister did not answer my question. The letter was received by National Energy Board from the deputy minister of the environment. My question is, why did the National Energy Board refuse to consider the letter as evidence at the hearing, and was the minister aware that the National Energy Board refused to consider such documentation?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the details on a day-to-day basis of National Energy Board decisions of this kind. I think the hon. member will recognize that the National Energy Board, as a quasi judicial body, has a great deal of independence for the making of its own decisions.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to do with the reply of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) to the question I asked him regarding the defrauding of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and when further charges would be laid. He advised the House that the making public of such details could possibly prejudice an investigation in progress. We all share that sentiment, but my point of order is this. I am sure the minister did not intend to mislead the House intentionally. I should tell the House that as 1.15 this afternoon I was informed by sources in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that the investigation was complete and the raising of it in this House would in no way prejudice the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and I ask the House to give unanimous consent for a question to be asked of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) concerning the tragedy in Lebanon. I am sure all hon. members of the House would grant me the indulgence to ask that question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is clear that such a procedure would depart entirely from the practices we follow on a daily basis. Every day members wish to ask questions which are urgent to them, to their interests or the interests of their constituencies, and each day a number of members fail, in the ordinary course of rotation, to gain the floor. I suggest that if such a question is asked at this time, it should be entirely understood that it is only done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to ask the extra question on the subject indicated at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is not unanimous consent.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANCELLATION OF OPTION TO BUY LOCKHEED "ORION" AIRCRAFT

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, at a meeting of the cabinet held yesterday evening it was agreed that the Lockheed Corporation should be informed immediately that the government would only be able to proceed with the purchase of 18 Lockheed long range patrol aircraft if the Lockheed Corporation could provide the required bridge financing.

It was agreed by cabinet as well that if the Lockheed Corporation could provide the required bridge financing, the government would proceed with the purchase of 18 LRPA aircraft from Lockheed.

Yesterday evening, following the cabinet meeting, my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), who has the responsibility of negotiating the contract on behalf of the government, met with Mr. Bill Wilson, executive vice-president of the Lockheed Corporation, and informed him of the government's decision. Mr. Wilson advised the Minister of Supply and Services that Lockheed was unable to provide the required bridge financing, and for that reason the government has now abandoned its plans to complete that specific purchase contract with Lockheed.

Mr. Leggatt: It's about time.

Orion Cancellation

Mr. Richardson: I also wish to advise the House, Mr. Speaker, that prior to these decisions, in spite of the best efforts of all parties concerned, it was not possible to make arrangements whereby Lockheed could conclude a financial agreement with the Canadian banks. Also, it was not possible to accommodate the purchase of the Lockheed LRPA by direct financing without an undue distortion of the government's planned program of expenditure.

At the cabinet meeting yesterday evening to which I have referred, the government confirmed its commitment to contribute its share to collective security and emphasized that the decision not to purchase the Lockheed LRPA did not in any way diminish this commitment.

Anti-submarine patrol continues to be an important task for the Canadian armed forces, and it will continue. It had been planned, even if the Lockheed purchase did proceed, to continue to use our fleet of Argus aircraft on anti-submarine patrol until 1980. The Argus aircraft will, therefore, continue in the anti-submarine role as planned, and the government will immediately renew the search for the most effective way to replace the Argus.

An hon. Member: Put wings on a crowbar.

An hon. Member: Are you volunteering?

Mr. Richardson: That search will, of course, include any renewed and financeable proposal by the Lockheed Corporation.

Finally, the government wishes to express its appreciation for the full and willing co-operation it has received from the United States government during the period of negotiation with the Lockheed Corporation.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, most farces end as fiascoes, and the government farce of re-equipping the armed forces, using promises instead of money, has ended in the predictable fiasco.

I believe that the opposition, in the months leading up to this denouement, has shown a responsible attitude in the questioning and debating both in the House and in committee. In fact more leadership and more understanding concerning the LRPA project have been evident on this side than on the government side. We have, by our questioning and comment, brought out into the open the disadvantages and dangers of the financial arrangements of the Lockheed deal.

It is difficult to pick the proper modifier to describe the performance of those in the cabinet who were involved in this debacle. One can choose between bumbling, obstinate, inept, naive, deceitful, incompetent, and misleading. In fact they are all true.

First we have the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) in November, 1975, at the end of the $12 million worth final definition phase, announcing that a decision had been made to buy the Lockheed LRPA. He could not wait another few days for the contract signing, but must rush off to NATO to seek praise for his efforts. That piece of vainglorious, self-serving immodesty, will be long remembered by our long-suffering NATO allies.

Then, the hapless Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) who, although a senior civil servant from his department served on the LRPA project staff, was himself never informed that the Department of National Defence did not have the money budgeted to fulfil its financial obligations; nor was he informed that Lockheed could not fulfil its real or imagined—depending on whether you believe the Minister of National Defence or Lockheed—commitment to provide money for interim financing. The position of the Minister of Supply and Services was somewhat further weakened when the official in charge of the project informed the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence that the cabinet had been informed of the problems prior to November 27.

The unkindest cut of all came from the one in charge of this ship of fools, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: —who, in reply to a question in the House, put the whole blame on the Minister of National Defence by saying that minister was responsible for the financing and the execution of the contract, which leaves us wondering if the Prime Minister was only trying to save the Minister of Supply and Services, or is he really ignorant of the role of supply and services in such a situation?

Other ministers played their part. Judging from his answers in the House, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) was obviously not consulted before the matter was before cabinet on November 27. Equally, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) was not consulted concerning the legality of the government paying interest on the bank loan to Lockheed; whether this loan was not in fact a loan on behalf of the government and thus required parliamentary approval was quite apparently not brought to his attention until after the government had announced its support of such a dodge.

Concerning this loan, we have had the unedifying spectacle of the Minister of Supply and Services saying that such a loan would be repaid to the banks if Lockheed defaulted. At the same time he and all other interested ministers were devoutly stating that there would be no guarantee of the loan.

Casey Stengel once, when managing a very poor team, called them together and said, "Doesn't anyone here know anything about this game?" It is now time that someone called this group of minor leaguers, playing in the big leagues, together and told them what is expected of the team in charge of Canada at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: Unfortunately the manager in this case seems as incompetent as his players.

In the last several months the Minister of National Defence has been frequently questioned about alternatives if the Lockheed LRPA scheme failed. His answers seemed to indicate it would show a lack of faith in Lockheed to consider alternatives. The Conservative party has always supported and will continue to seek an early and rational replacement for the Argus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: I do hope the minister's myopia in this regard will be speedily cured and perhaps the next scheme produced will be rational. I hope it will not be accompanied by the means of self-praise that we were subjected to last December.

I must confess that I was never greatly concerned about the Canadian banks involvement in this deal. Their management is far more capable and far more astute than is the management of the government at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should remind the hon. member that he has already gone some distance past the time taken by the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I can only say that this is a $1 billion arrangement about which we are speaking, although the minister responsible cut his time, and I ask the indulgence of the House to carry on for about two more minutes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: The attitude of the banks was best summed up by the president of one member of the consortium who said, "No banker in his right mind would lend money to Lockheed without an iron-clad government guarantee". Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence has blown $12 million for a final definition phase, plus $16 million for work in progress, plus the cost of the LRPA project office, some $6 million, plus the possibility of a suit by Lockheed; $34 million for sure, and maybe more. And there is nothing to show for it. In addition the minister made a fool of himself on the world stage at NATO last December and greatly eroded Canada's reputation as a responsible nation and ally. Now he has lost the confidence of the cabinet, which is the prime requisite for holding cabinet rank.

What is to become of a minister who shows his unsuitability for his portfolio in such a graphic and expensive manner, rests with the minister and the Prime Minister for the good of the Department of National Defence, and for the sake of Canada's reputation among our allies, the minister should offer his resignation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: He has let down the forces, misled our allies, and wasted $34 millions of the taxpayers' money. He should now move on to lesser things.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, listening to the statement by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) to the House this afternoon, both in tone and substance, I thought I was listening to the cancellation of a Sunday afternoon church social instead of the cancellation of a project that is going to cost the Canadian people anywhere from $16 million to $30 million, without getting us one aircraft. That is the implication. Money is going right down the drain. The minister is responsible for it, yet he is not at all concerned. Apparently his cabinet colleagues are, because there is not one left in the House.

Quite apart from the financial mismanagement, there is the very serious military implication. Our armed forces have been waiting, not for months, but for years for a suitable replacement for the Argus aircraft. Therefore we are short militarily, losing millions of dollars, and the minister sits there smiling in benign indifference. Surely something is wrong.

The minister said in his statement that the project has been cancelled because of the incapacity of Lockheed to provide bridge financing. Possibly the minister really thought he was purchasing bridges at one point, and that led to a real entanglement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: The minister knew at least five months ago that the Lockheed Corporation was not in a position to provide that financing. I wish to quote two instances in the House when the minister spoke in rather calm tones about the seriousness of the situation. With reference to negotiations that had taken place some weeks and months prior, the minister said, as recorded in Hansard for March 26:

> There was a difference between the amount of funds available in the national defence budget and the progress payments required by Lockheed. We explained this and were told by Lockheed that the difference could be financed by them. Subsequently they told us they could not do it. That is all there is to the misunderstanding. It is serious, but easy to explain.

It is serious alright, but I am not sure it is easy to explain. With reference to his earlier knowledge of his financial position of the Lockheed Corporation the minister said, and I quote:

> We then made our decision and entered into detailed negotiations. It was in the final negotiations that it became apparent that what Lockheed had told us they could do they were unable to do.

That is with reference to negotiations and discussions that were taking place last fall. This process of negotiating, ordering, purchasing, and subsequently cancelling the purchase has been a colossal bungle from start to finish. The minister should have got commitments in writing last fall not verbal commitments on the kind of interim or, as he calls it today, bridge financing which was so essential to the whole project.

I support entirely the observation made by the spokesman of the Conservative party that this minister should resign. If ever there was a case of ministerial incompetence, we have had it clearly demonstrated here today. The minister came before the House and announced that a project for which he has been fighting, almost ad nauseam, without sufficient knowledge, is going down the drain.

I want to speak very briefly on the alternative because that is something the government must deal with, and deal with quickly. I hope I have not used all the time that my predecessor used: I will be one or two minutes more at most.

In the view of the NDP there has always been a more sensible alternative to committing ourselves to the $1.1 billion envisaged for the Orion deal. It is one which fits in with the No. 1 priority set out by the Department of National Defence in the white paper back in 1971, that priority being the surveillance of our own territorial coastline. The Orion of the kind the minister wanted to purchase had basically nothing to do with that function; it had everything to do with Canada's NATO commitment. We say the government should practice what it preaches and take care of our No. 1 defence priority, which is the surveillance of our own coastline, in order to protect our fisheries or to spot submarine activity.

We are putting forward a straightforward proposal which makes both military and economic sense. The government could refit a dozen or so Argus aircraft—

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I hear cries of "Oh" from one member of the Conservative Party. I notice it is not their defence critic. Add to that, 18 or 20 Dash-7s produced by the DeHavilland Corporation, thus producing jobs for Canadians in Montreal and Toronto, and you have a package which would cost about $400 million only, and which would adequately meet the demands of our No. 1 defence priority. That is our suggestion to the minister, and I hope he acts on it.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, it is strange, after all, that in Canada the Lockheed Corporation should continue for sometime to make the headlines. In all other countries, for at least a year, we have heard that this corporation had been involved in many scandals where politicians were mixed up. Here in Canada, it is the reverse situation. It is the federal government, which will, in the end, pay at least a subsidy directly to the Lockheed Corporation, a subsidy of $16 to $30 million, which will be a loss for the country.

Today, the minister just said that the financial position of the corporation was not good enough to gain the confidence of financial institutions in Canada to achieve this project of the Canadian government.

Yet no later than a few days ago, the situation looked pretty rosy and now we are told that it all seems hopeless. Mr. Speaker, I cannot blame the government for not proceeding with the purchase of those aircraft, as they may have realized that too late, unfortunately and the opposition seems to agree that we realized too late that the government was getting involved into a rather risky venture. However, as they say, better late than never. That may be why the government has decided to cancel the deal. But what upsets me greatly, Mr. Speaker, is to note that the two Lockheed main consultants are both former senior members of the civil service of Canada.

It would be interesting to delve further into that matter to know what role was played by those two former federal government officials who have become consultants for Lockheed. Perhaps the cabinet or some ministers were mislead by the recommendations of those officials who are now on the other side of the fence.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that because of the statement made by the minister today we will know all about this important matter which resulted in a loss of between $16 and $30 million for Canadians and which is why we are now further back than we were seven or eight months ago in our national defence.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I would like to say that it is another evidence that we are at the mercy of strangers, that we are unable to solve our transportation problems, both in our merchant navy and our aviation, and as long as we will be at the mercy of foreign companies or governments, we are likely to suffer economic conditions such as those we are faced today, just like small fishes in a big lake.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a couple of questions to the Minister of National Defence in connection with his statement. I might say that I address them to the Minister of National Defence in the absence of the Prime Minister, the President of the Treasury Board—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would remind hon. members that the Standing Order under which we receive statements by ministers indicates that following the statement questions are permitted, at the discretion of the Chair, directed only to the minister who makes the statement, so there is no possibility of questions being directed to other ministers at this time.

Mr. McKinnon: Maybe then I can compliment the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) on sticking with the Minister of National Defence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: Yesterday the Prime Minister said that, using the hypothesis we would not proceed with the Lockheed deal, the government would consider other alternatives. Would the minister enlighten us with regard to any other known alternatives which are acceptable to the Minister of National Defence? If there are any, does he have the support of his colleagues for these alternatives, or even a mandate to proceed?

Mr. Richardson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We clearly have a mandate to proceed, and this was referred to in my statement. I indicated that not only would we look at other alternatives but also that we would consider any renewed and financeable proposal by the Lockheed Company. We shall look at all the alternatives which have been discussed, including the continuation of the Argus, and any suggestions which may be made by the Boeing Company for a less expensive long range patrol aircraft. We are looking at those possiblities on an urgent basis now, because our commitment remains the same—to replace the Argus and to continue our anti-submarine role to meet our commitments to NATO.

Mr. McKinnon: I am pleased the minister has gone further than he did in his written statement which I received at 1.30. Throughout the last few months we have constantly heard about the willingness of the government to table the documents as soon as this could be done without harming us in the negotiations. I now ask the minister when he would be willing to table these documents concerning the contract, as well as the contract itself. I would remind him that someone has "blown" $34 million; the country and the opposition have a right to delve into this matter by perusing the original documents to find out where the truth lies.

Mr. Richardson: The contract is the direct responsibility of the Minister of Supply and Services, but it has not come into effect. We were to table it when it was in effect and fully signed, but there is no point in tabling a contract which has not been executed.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) is not in the House and therefore we cannot ask him this question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I again state the rules for the benefit of hon. members? Standing Order 15(3) reads as follows:

On statements by ministers, as listed in section (2) of this Standing Order, a minister of the Crown may make a short, factual announcement or statement of government policy. A spokesman for each of the parties in opposition to the government may comment briefly thereon and members may be permitted to address questions thereon to the minister.

There is no provision, as hon. members will see, for questions to be directed to other ministers.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I thought I was just repeating the rule, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson), who is here. Would the hon. gentleman undertake to consult with his colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, to determine whether or not it would be permissible for this document to be tabled in the House under Standing Order 41, whether it is signed or not, so that parliament and the people of Canada might have an opportunity to look into what is one of the biggest fiascoes in Canadian defence or financial history?

Mr. Richardson: I will, of course, consult with my colleague. I do not believe that a contract which has not been executed should be tabled, but I am prepared to leave it to his judgment.

Mr. Nowlan: Both the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the newspapers have indicated that we are talking about a deal with Lockheed involving about $1.1 billion. I was wondering whether the minister could not give us a little more detail than was contained in his statement today so that the Canadian public might appreciate what is involved, not only in the Lockheed proposal but in some of the other areas which are under consideration.

● (1530)

The minister says in his statement that he will renew the search for the most effective way to replace the Argus. The minister has not started to come close to it. I should like to ask him what is the range of cost options of the various other proposals that have been studied over the last ten years, namely, the Boeing 707 proposal, the Phoenix proposal, the Argus refit proposal, and the P3C proposal, which is an off the shelf aircraft built by Lockheed. Any of these other proposals will cost the Canadian public a very large figure.

As a supplementary question, in the range of options for an effective replacement for the Argus, and supplementary to the question asked by my hon. friend from Victoria about the government's commitment, would the minister tell the House what timetable will be followed in searching for a new proposal, since it has already taken the government 10 years to get this far?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, if I may answer the second question first, I indicated that in our present planning, even if we had been able to finance and purchase the Lochheed aircraft, we were going to use the Argus fleet until well into the summer of 1979, probably into 1980. That arrangement will continue. We will meet our anti-submarine obligations in that way, exactly as we would have had we made this purchase.

I said a moment ago that we will be proceeding on an urgent basis to find an effective replacement for the Argus, and hopefully that replacement will follow on within the same timetable, or very close to it, unless we decide that the most effective route is the one that the hon. member has suggested. He did make mention of the Phoenix proposal, and that included in part refurbishing some of the Argus aircraft. It was a mixed fleet concept involving other aircraft of long range and some of shorter range capability. It was a very attractive proposal, but one of the disadvantages was the cost of extending the life of the Argus itself. I am sure that we will have to face that increased cost again as we look at the alternatives before us.

Another alternative which we examined exhaustively was the Boeing 707. In round figures it was $400 million more to purchase the Boeing than the Lockheed, and also its operating cost was very much higher, particularly at low level. That was the reason for ruling it out. But this does not mean that we could not have some modified proposals from Boeing, using perhaps one of their smaller jets equipped with long range fuel tanks, or some variation of that kind. These are the kind of proposals that we will be examining.

Mr. Nowlan: I have a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I realize other members want to ask questions on this important matter but I think we should have some clear understanding of some of the problems the minister faced. I also think there should be no misconception on the part of the Canadian taxpayers that some other proposal is going to save us x million or x billion of dollars. The other proposals or options are all in round figures, and these will change with inflation every year.

Having searched for 10 years, would the minister tell the House what the cost has been to date of the whole of this evaluation and revaluation process that has gone on? The hon. member for Victoria spoke in terms of $16 million being spent on the Lockheed project so far, some $6 million on the LRPA office project, and he made reference to the penalty. I am talking about what went on in the years before. Having gone through this trial of searching for the most economic and effective replacement for the Argus, does the minister really think we will end up with anything that is better?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, it is, of course, not possible to give detailed cost figures for the alternatives because in recent weeks and months we have not been looking at alternatives. We have been working to complete the Lockheed purchase but we have been unable to do so because of their inability to finance the interim payments. I cannot go into further detail than I have already in describing in round figures the cost of the Boeing.

I should like to respond not only to the hon. member but to what the hon. member for Victoria said about the costs that we have already incurred. I believe the hon. member for Victoria said that we have nothing to show for it. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is something to show for it. I should like to put on record the fact that the Government of Canada is the legal owner of the design and project work that is represented by this figure. A portion of this preliminary design work will be common to the avionics system acquired by the government for any long-range patrol program. In short, some value has been received.

Because I think it is important to know what has taken place, I should like also to point out that as far back as 1972 both the Boeing and Lockheed companies placed work in Canada which was related to the long-range patrol aircraft program. Lockheed has placed in Canada to date some $48 million of work and Boeing some $35 million of work, for a total of $83 million of industrial benefit that is related directly and is credited to the long-range patrol program that has just terminated, so it is not accurate for the hon. member for Victoria to say that we have nothing to show for it.

Mr. Broadbent: Presumably, Mr. Speaker, we will have $16 million worth of photographs. I noted two additional references that were added to the copy of the text that we had in advance regarding the possibility of another purchase from Lockheed. If I am correct in assuming that the minister does not purchase any aircraft from Lockheed, would the minister confirm that we will have to pay Lockheed a minimum of $16 million? Is there any amount additional to the $16 million that we will have to pay? Finally, would we have had to pay anything had we not signed an agreement, symbolically enough on April 1?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, again these negotiations are the direct responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, but I can reply that the figure of $16 million is not a minimum; it is a maximum figure under the arrangements which my colleague made. In addition, I do not believe that that is necessarily the figure that we will have to pay. I understand from him that there will be negotiations with the Lockheed company to see whether in fact the total funds have been spent. So it will either be $16 million maximum or something less than that.

To answer the second part of the question, it was really to preserve our interests under the contract that he made that arrangement. If we had terminated the contract that had been negotiated up until then, we would have lost, as we have now, the industrial benefits. We would have lost the price that had been negotiated. It was for that reason that we agreed to put the contract into escrow to see whether Lockheed would be able to achieve this bridge financing through Canadian banks.

Mr. Broadbent: The fact that the government signed that contract on April 1 seems extraordinary to a number of us, given the previous record. Is the minister saying that the development work to which the government now has copyright is worth $16 million? Is the minister telling us that these rights would be worth that in any commercial sense?

● (1540)

Mr. Richardson: No, Mr. Speaker. I am saying this is worth something.

An hon. Member: How much?

Mr. Richardson: That will have to be measured. It would not be the full amount, but I was responding to the statement that we have nothing to show for it. We do have something to show for it.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious matter and I do not think it should be considered lightly. It is probably one of the more serious matters that this House has considered, involving the defence of our nation. I should like to know whether the interim financing, the so-called problem, was the only real reason the deal with Lockheed fell apart? If there are no documents, agreements or written arrangements, why is Canada responsible to Lockheed for what some suggest is $16 million and others suggest is $34 million? Why are we responsible for any amount, and is it true that this amount, or some part of it, has already been paid to Lockheed, and how much?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, these are areas to which I cannot respond directly because I do not carry out the negotiations of the contract. The total amount, as I have said, will not be more than $16 million. It will have to be negotiated by the Minister of Supply and Services, and it could very well be below that figure.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, a week or so ago in reply to my colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), regarding the deployment of search and rescue aircraft in Canada on the west coast and, more especially, in our own province of Newfoundland, which would help save lives and cut down the action time—we have already lost over ten fishermen this year—the minister said this would not fit the cost effectiveness. Can the minister explain the rationale and show how the writing off of $34 million fits into that cost effective philosophy of his?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the two matters are related. We have proceeded as we had to proceed in these Lockheed negotiations. The Lockheed Company is unable to arrange the financing, and without that the project cannot go ahead. I should like, if I may, to revert for a moment to the question of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) as I failed to respond to the first part, which was whether or not there were any other reasons for not going ahead with Lockheed. There were none of any substance or importance. Last night the cabinet agreed, as my statement indicated, that if the bridge financing could be provided by the Lockheed Company we would proceed to purchase the 18 aircraft. There were no other reasons of substance.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the minister that his announcement will be a very serious blow to the people of my area, especially those who are looking to the government for some guidance with regard to the surveillance required when we establish the 200-mile limit. We are also concerned over the lack of sovereignty patrol, over the lack in respect of the NATO anti-submarine commitment which is required in Atlantic Canada, and certainly over adequate search and rescue facilities. All of these matters are of life and death concern to our people.

On the international scene the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated he was seeking a contractual link with Europe, and we have commitments in Europe to maintain détente in that part of the world.

I would ask the minister whether he really put all his eggs in one basket, so to speak? If that is so, today is a good time to make a new beginning. The fact that the minister has goofed and blundered badly is unfortunate and the taxpayers will have to pay the loss for his incompetence and the incompetence of the government, but today is the time to start anew.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member will realize he has gone somewhat beyond the bounds of questioning into the area of representations.

Mr. Crouse: I will put my question then, Mr. Speaker, and it is simply this: what will the minister tell his NATO allies when he meets with them in the very near future as to what alternative he intends to propose for replacing the Orion?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I will reply to that in a moment. I want to respond to the earlier question which was embodied in the statement. There will be no change in our capability for surveillance over the next five years. With our trackers, which are already in operation, and continuing with the Argus which, as I said, would have gone ahead in any case, and if we are successful in finding a replacement for the Argus, then we will have exactly the same degree of surveillance and protection as there would have been had we gone through with this specific contract.

Concerning our commitment to NATO, throughout all these negotiations, and particularly when we made this important decision, we were very conscious of our obligations to the NATO alliance. In my statement I tried to assure the House, and I hope to reassure our NATO partners when I visit with them in Brussels next month, that we are fully committed to meet our obligations to NATO. We are committed to staying in the anti-submarine role, and we intend to perform at the same level as we would have had this purchase gone through, except that we will be achieving that objective in another way.

Reference has been made to the taxpayers. We were very conscious of our obligations to the taxpayers, and that was again one of the reasons for the decision. We did not wish to expose the Canadian taxpayers to undue risk. Above all, we were committed to our obligations to the Canadian armed forces. We have this year increased our expenditure for new equipment by 34 per cent over last year. We have met our commitment to the forces in that respect, and we will continue to do so as we find the most effective replacement for the Argus.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have taken note of hon. members who have been seeking the floor since the question part of this procedure began. I think I should therefore conclude the question period by recognizing hon. members in this order: the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling), the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden), the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Stewart), and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie).

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, in his statement the minister went out of his way to express appreciation to the United States for its willing co-operation, and I presume he was referring to the permission to increase the ability to lend money under the American Loans Board. Will the minister advise the House whether he requested any assurance at all from U.S. authorities in terms of guaranteeing Lockheed performance under this contract and, secondly, did he ask for any guarantees in the event of the bankruptcy of the Lockheed Company, and were these guarantees forthcoming from the U.S. government?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I was primarily referring to the assurance which the United States government had given us concerning its opinion and view of the financial viability of the Lockheed Company, and the company's ability to stay in business and in fact deliver the aircraft to us. The U.S government gave us strong assurances in that respect. It also gave us the assurance that in the unlikely event of bankruptcy we would be protected in the same way as the United States government itself in respect of its own military equipment being purchased from Lockheed.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, the minister in his statement said it was agreed by the cabinet that the government would proceed with the acquisition of 18 LRPA if Lockheed could provide the bridge financing. What intrigues me about this is the way Lockheed's financing is being rearranged. I note that the bank credit facilities Lockheed had were with a consortium of 24 U.S. banks, led mainly by Bank American and Bankers' Trust. These facilities expired on May 15, four days ago, and new credit facilities are being arranged. Why was the decision on this matter not deferred until new bank credit facilities were completed? It would appear to me that an order for more than $1 billion would be a damned good lever for Lockheed in seeking the necessary bridge financing from any banking facilities.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is speaking about the relationship between American banks and the Lockheed Company.

Mr. Kempling: Right.

Mr. Richardson: They are not directly related to the negotiations and discussions which took place with the Canadian banks. I may say that one of the problems which apparently was faced by the Canadian banks was that they would be subordinated to the position of the American banks. This, among other factors, was a reason for their not wanting to proceed with the interim financing.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that Lockheed indeed was in political and financial difficulty, and that indeed any fool could see from its financial statement that it was virtually bankrupt and likely unable to provide the funds to complete this program and service these aircraft over a period of many years with spares, I should like to ask the minister how he could say in the House today that he was not looking at alternatives in recent months. The fact is that there was absolutely no second line of defence. I ask the minister how he could have risked the reputation of our government, the entire LRPA program, the reputation of Canada in NATO and in Europe, and the morale of our armed forces on a shaky company like Lockheed, with absolutely no back-up plans.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, we did of course have extensive studies as I indicated in response to earlier questions with regard to other alternatives. The best answer appeared to be the Lockheed aircraft. it was the most cost effective of the alternatives we studied. It is also true that it is the only effective long-range patrol aircraft that is made in this part of the world. The others we were considering were converted passenger aircraft, and smaller aircraft that did not have the range, so I really think we were doing the right thing to try to proceed with Lockheed. But I agree with the hon. member that when it became apparent that we would have to finance the company, and that the banks would not do so, we took the only course which I presume from his statement is the course with which the hon. member agrees. We have ended the contract.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my question is very brief. Because of the minister's mismanagement of this whole affair has the Prime Minister asked for his resignation or, because his cabinet colleagues have deserted him, has he offered his resignation?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I have not tendered my resignation. My resignation has not been asked for. My colleagues have not deserted me.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Where are they?

Mr. Paproski: Just look behind you, Jim. You are all alone.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I am referring to the decisions that we have made. In that my colleagues are in full support. Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that there is only one clear reason we could not proceed with the purchase of the Lockheed long-range patrol aircraft. That reason is that the Lockheed Company is unable to provide the bridge financing. I have a number of responsibilities. I know what they are. But I am not responsible for Lockheed's inability to provide this financing.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, last fall in late November in the House, and during the committee meetings on December 1 the minister stated emphatically that work would start immediately on these aircraft and that Standard Aero in Winnipeg and Bristol Aerospace of Winnipeg would get to work immediately to start manufacturing parts for these Orion airplanes. Could the minister tell us if these two firms in Winnipeg have made any preliminary preparations or have spent any of their own money in preparation for these contracts?

I should also like to ask the minister whether, with regard to any alternate purchases such as from Boeing, the Canadian government will have to put up the money for the financing of a Boeing plane or will arrangements have to be made through Canadian banks, or just how will the financing be arranged if it is decided to purchase the Boeing or any other aircraft that have been looked at.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, to answer the last question first, clearly if we were dealing with the Boeing Company I think that company, with its great financial strength, probably would find it easier to provide the bridge financing than would some other companies. However, I cannot say until we get down to negotiations exactly what the financing arrangements would be. But clearly it would be easier, I think, financially for this company than it would be for one which has had some financial difficulties.

In answer to what was really the first question, I think the hon. member was not in the House when I pointed out a moment ago that something more than $80 million worth of industrial benefits had come to Canada already, directly credited to the long-range patrol program. This involved some $48 million worth from the Lockheed Company and some $35 million from the Boeing Company. Clearly with the contract not proceeding all the very substantial industrial benefits such as those mentioned by the hon. member will not be going forward, but in the other arrangements that we make, whatever they may be, whether they involve refurbishing the Argus or buying from Boeing, whatever is the best approach, substantial industrial benefits will be provided. We will make certain that they will be provided. In that sense there will not be any loss to the Canadian aerospace industry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed the following Bills to which the concurrence of this House is desired: Bill S-34, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act; Bill S-35, an act to amend an act to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, there have been the usual consultations and there is agreement by all parties that a special order should issue relating to reverting to routine proceedings at five o'clock this afternoon to permit the reception by the House of a statement to be made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Mr. Speaker, the motion should read as follows:

That the House shall revert to Routine Proceedings at 5 p.m. on Wednesday, May 19, 1976 in order to permit the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to make a statement and to table a document; and

That the House shall not adjourn on that day until all proceedings relating to the said statement are completed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there have been the discussions to which my hon. friend alluded, but I think it is only fair to say that this consent has been given, or will be given, because on this particular occasion the ministry has seen fit to provide a copy of the statement in advance in sufficient time for the spokesman for the official opposition to prepare his response. I must say that that was not the case last evening. There may well have been reasons why copies were only provided a few minutes in advance last night in the case of our party and five minutes after the statement was started in the case of the NDP.

● (1600)

It is important that in terms of the procedures of the House, and in terms of the intent of the amendment made to the Standing Orders of the House, a copy of the statement be provided to all parties well in advance so that not only the minister's statement may be made but that the comments that are made and the question period that follows can be completely relevant. Surely the object of the rule under which this is being done is that the matter referred to in the statement can be fully covered in terms of the reply, and also that some questions can be put that are reasonable in all the circumstances, and therefore the House time be best used.

The consent given by us today, Sir, is in the spirit of the rules, and I hope that the parliamentary secretary will transmit this message to his chief, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), who in turn will take it to his colleagues, that we will not grant consent on all occasions if reasonable time is not given in advance of a statement. In granting consent today I want to make it quite clear that we are prepared to observe our normal parliamentary customs and I hope the government also will be prepared to observe normal parliamentary courtesy with respect to notice, a courtesy which was not followed last night.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my remarks are essentially the same as those made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). As the parliamentary secretary knows, we came very close to denying consent today because we were having difficulty in getting the reports into the hands of our spokesmen on this side. However, there was an agreement to put those reports in their hands; I assume that has been done and on that basis we gave our consent today, but we hope that these remarks will improve the practice in this regard.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I think unanimous consent is required and I would like the courtesy of a copy of the statement put before me as well.

Mr. Speaker: Unanimous consent is either forthcoming or it is not—it does not have conditions attached to it. However, I presume the condition of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) can be met, and I therefore assume that unanimous consent has been given and that the House is now prepared to agree that the House shall revert to routine proceedings at 5 p.m. today in order to permit the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to make a statement and to table a document, and that the proceedings shall continue, if necessary, beyond normal adjournment in order to allow the Chair to exercise the discretion given to it in the Standing Order to complete the proper period of questioning. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

4. Contracts for the aircraft chartered from CP Air and Air Canada were signed on December 5, 1975. Two tenders were let and contracts were won by Air Canada and CP Air respectively. Charter costs totalled $78,662. Additional air flights and ground transportation were required to connect with the charter aircraft and these were arranged by the Department of External Affairs.

6. Authority for the payment of transportation expenses was included in the decision of the Treasury Board dated May 12, 1975, which authorized Canadian participation in the Roses and related Bicentennial activities. The type and nature of transportation in the California activities was the result of numerous operational decisions made by officers attached to the Canadian Consulates General in Los Angeles and San Francisco and with the concurrence of the Department of External Affairs in Ottawa. Each decision was based upon the anticipated requirements, the local knowledge of the officers concerned, and the ability of local firms to provide adequate transportation at the times required.

8. The selection of accommodation for the California activities was the result of numerous operational decisions made by officers attached to the Canadian Consulates General in Los Angeles and San Francisco and with the concurrence of the Department of External Affairs in Ottawa. Each decision was based upon the proximity of the hotels to the performance sites and the ability of the hotels in those areas to provide sufficient space of an acceptable standard.

5. What were the total organizing expenses for such meetings including advertising, printed material, hall rentals, etc.?

6. What is the estimated number of the general public not including employees of any government or the media who attended each meeting?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): For the Canadian Habitat Secretariat 1. The National Committee for Habitat held public meetings in the following centres: Inuvik, Whitehorse, Prince George, Vancouver, Quebec City, Edmonton, Montreal, Halifax, Fredericton, Toronto, Thunder Bay, Frobisher Bay, St. John's, Winnipeg, Charlottetown, Regina.

At each meeting, with the exception of Inuvik and Winnipeg, the Secretary of State Official Languages Conference section provided two or three interpreters for English to French and French to English simultaneous interpretation. As the Secretary of State office could not provide interpreters for Inuvik and Winnipeg, the Department of Supplies and Services let contracts to provide for simultaneous interpretation interpreters. At each meeting, the firm of International Translation Services of Toronto provided a technician with simultaneous interpretation equipment. This firm was awarded the contract by DSS.

4. Total travelling expenses for Canadian Habitat Secretariat staff, Secretary of State interpreters and public relations people, were $22,000.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): For the Canadian Habitat Secretariat: 1. Fourteen symposia were organized by the Canadian Habitat Secretariat and held across Canada in September, October and November 1975. The objective of the symposia was to stimulate an interchange between specialists and concerned citizens about Canadian human settlement issues and alternatives for the next decade. The following table lists the symposia, giving, for each the date, location, topic, number of participants and number of persons who were paid by the government.

3. A report on each symposium is being prepared, translated and distributed to all participants. It is also being circulated to approximately 50 persons per symposium who were unable to attend but who requested all information relating to the topic, and to members of the Interdepartmental Task Force for Habitat, the IDTF Working Groups for Habitat, the Canadian National Committee for Habitat, and the Federal Provincial Preparatory Committee for Habitat. Approximately 300 people have requested copies of all 14 reports. In addition, a synthesis of the 14 reports is now being prepared.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—COST OF FIT-KIT

Question No. 4,950—Mr. Jones:

1. What was the total cost of the Fit-Kit recently introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, including (a) salaries (b) binder (c) printing (d) recording (e) cost of cutting the records (f) other expenses?

2. Did the government copyright (a) all (b) part of the material in the Fit-Kit and, if so, at what cost?

3. What amounts were paid, or are payable to persons or firms for the publication and/or rights to publish the items contained in the Fit-Kit?

4. Who authorized the expenditures for the Fit-Kit and under what authority?

[Mr. Danson.]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. (a) to (f) inclusive. The cost of 100,000 copies of the Fit-Kit was $451,678. This figure includes the cost of printing, recording, cutting of the records and all other expenses, with the exception of the salaries of the Fitness Section. Staff salaries are estimated at $15,000 over the last two years. Total amount recoverable to the Department from sales of these Fit-Kits will be $80,000 for the balance of the 1975-76 fiscal year. Based on present sales trends, it is expected that this amount will be considerably greater in the 1976-77 fiscal year. It is anticipated that, ultimately, production costs will be fully recovered through Fit-Kit sales.

2. The government did copyright all parts of the material in the Fit-Kit. All material, except as noted below, was original work or contracted research of the department and, therefore, required no financial outlay for copyright.

3. The Health and Fitness booklet was originally copyrighted by the Scandia Insurance Company in Sweden and this has been produced in Canada and amended by permission of the copyright owners at no cost to the Canadian Government. The music on the Canadian Home Fitness Test was original music developed and purchased by the Canadian Government for $14,087, which includes all future rights for use of this music. $2,000 was paid in residuals for the four artists whose voices were used on the Canadian Home Fitness Test. Except for these, all other contributions from non-government sources have been assigned to the federal government at no cost.

4. The expenditures for the Fit-Kit were authorized by the Minister or his duly delegated representative under the terms of the Fitness and Amateur Sport Act.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): For the Canadian Habitat Secretariat. 1. The printing cost for this booklet totalled $47,338 for the 30,135 copies produced. It will take some time to determine the actual cost of distribution since a large percentage were sent by diplomatic bag to the Canadian Missions abroad who, in turn, distributed the booklets in each country.

2. Of the 30,135 copies printed, 23,684 have already been distributed to the following. Vancouver office of the Canadian Habitat Secretariat, Foreign Embassies in Ottawa, Canadian Missions abroad, United Nations, United Nations Associations representatives, Permanent Missions to the United Nations, CIDA representatives, Habitat Bulletin overseas distribution list, Habitat Forum News distribution list, Canadian Government offices of Tourism, Canadian Consulate, Milan, Provinces, NGO list, The Hague, NGO list, ACSOH, Vancouver, RCMP Commanding Officers/Chiefs of City and Provincial Police, Senators and Members of Parliament, Provincial Premiers and Cabinet Ministers, Foreign Government representatives (from World Travel Directory), National Travel Agents Associations (from World Travel Directory), ASTA Board of Governors, International Division of ASTA, President and Executive Vice-President of ASTA, Host Broadcaster's list, CNGO PG mailing list, Editors, Radio and TV Stations at points of call Mayors, Air Canada, Eastern Pacific and Pacific Western Managers at points of call.

[3] For this CMC, there was only the Training-on-the-Job (T.O.J.) Program in 1971-72, but in 1972-73 and 1973-74 they had both Training-in-Industry (T.I.I.) and T.O.J. These programs were combined in 1974-75 to form the Canada Manpower Industrial Training Program.

[4] Figure is for all of 1975-76.

NOTE: Expenditures are not available on a calendar year basis or by sex for a CMC.

This was supplemented by a market survey which confirmed the assumption that the Fit-Kit would appeal to people of all ages and all walks of life.

2. 100,000 Fit-Kits were purchased at a total cost of $451,678.

3. The Fit-Kit has been on sale since March 9, 1976 through Information Canada (Canadian Government

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, may I just take this occasion to respond to the comments that were made by the House leaders of the other parties. I would like to point out, with reference to the statement to be made at 5 o'clock, that it is subject to a lock-up. As hon. members know, the subject matter is one that has to remain confidential until such time as the minister is ready to make the statement. I fully agree with the House leaders of the opposition parties that the courtesy of a notice should be extended to the chief spokesmen for the opposition parties. This has now been extended and I hope it will be the practice followed in the future.

With reference to the statement made last evening, I agree that a copy of the statement was provided to the opposition parties' spokesmen rather late but, as I understand it, the reason was that the statement was being prepared right up to the last minute, negotiations were being carried out, communications were in process with various provincial authorities up to the last moment, so the document was not made available until the minister was ready to make the statement.

I would also indicate to hon. members that I sought the consent of the House to deal with the motion yesterday at a very late stage, and we got the consent around 4 p.m. At that time the statement was not yet ready. The decision to make a statement yesterday by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was a late decision by the government, and effectively that is the reason why a copy of the statement was late in reaching spokesmen of the opposition parties. I should also like to point out that these reasons were communicated to the leaders of the three opposition parties. The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) was not here yesterday when we disposed of these motions.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I appreciate the explanation, but in order to observe what I previously described as parliamentary courtesies—because as it turns out there was no real import in the timing of the statement—the government might well have considered having the minister make the statement today so that the two statements might better have been made together.

Dealing with the question of the lock-up, I hesitate to remind the parliamentary secretary of this but members of the House are hon. members and I am satisfied that it would not be necessary to lock up any members of the House in order to give them the advance information which is given to the press in these circumstances.

It has been the practice here—and I have been party to it—for the government House leader to indicate well in advance what legislation would be brought forward in case of an emergency, and to ask me, my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and the House leader of the Social Credit party to keep the matter confidential. So far as I know these undertakings have never been broken. I hope that the government regards the spokesmen of the opposition parties as hon. members in terms of any undertaking for which they may ask and which they may receive so that the spirit of the rules which I have mentioned could be carried out that notice be given in advance of a statement, and that an opportunity be given to prepare appropriate questions so that the fullest possible examination could take place within the limited time under the rules. I think this practice is a sound one, and it is quite important for the intentions of the drafters of this relatively new Standing Order to be carried out.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), who has gone to a meeting of a standing committee, I should like to raise a point of order. My colleague draws my attention to the fact that his notice of motion for production of papers No. 86 has been on the order paper since February 11. It does not look as if it needed long to produce. I hope that my comment will draw the matter to the attention of the parliamentary secretary and will result in the return being produced very soon.

Mr. Blais: It usually does, Mr. Speaker.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I cannot imagine anything more designed to make one's words disappear than to be interrupted by the clock in the middle of a speech, but because I have had the opportunity to speak on this issue on other occasions I shall not worry too much about timing. Anyway I am not going to take the entire time allocated to me on second reading.

When I was speaking last night at ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was reminding hon. members of a particular person in the city of Moncton whom I want to honour and I did honour him last night. He has provided leadership on this difficult issue not only to his church but to all of us who are New Brunswickers and to other Canadians as well. I refer to the Archbishop of Moncton, Donat Chiasson, who has spoken so eloquently about the issue, has written to the Prime Minister, and has expressed himself publicly in the newspapers. I cannot imagine an archbishop being embattled, but I can imagine there are many people who do not support his Christian point of view on this issue. What excites me about the Archbishop is his obvious courage and leadership characteristics.

Mr. Allmand: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: Having said that about the Archbishop of Moncton, I should like to share the views of others who have spoken who have been immensely comforted or assisted by groups, largely from the Canadian churches, which support the abolition of the death penalty. I think of a wonderful statement by the Mennonite Brethren; the Catholic Conference which after a long period of silence on the issue spoke in eloquent terms when it came up in 1972, of the United Church of Canada, the Presbyterian Church, and many in my own Anglican Church who are convinced abolitionists and who, at the risk of worrying those who profess to be followers, make clear and unequivocal statements in favour of abolition.

There seems to be a wonderful network not only of church people but of those in secular life who hope this debate will mean that at last Canada can join those nations of the world which have abolished the death penalty from their statute books. The network is one of very great comfort and satisfaction because, as the debate goes on through the years, time after time we hear from those people who have espoused this cause, some at rather great risk to themselves and to their political futures.

The importance of the issue we debate has been darkly underlined by the amount of time and energy it has occupied in the life of every thoughtful Canadian. Every newspaper in the country has devoted column inches to the subject. Just a couple of months ago the Ottawa Citizen carried a leading article on the 100 years of that newspaper's crusade for the abolition of capital punishment. If it is risky to be an abolitionist today, I can imagine that in 1875-76 the flak was even heavier. Perhaps to the great advantage of the people who represented us in those days, members of parliament did not take refuge behind Gallup polls to reach their conclusions.

The Ottawa Citizen ran a leading article on its 100 years of involvement; universities have sponsored debates; opinion groups have sent petitions; individuals have written letters—oh, how they have written letters. As I reminded the House last night usually those who wish to hang, wish to hang in red ink. Opinions have been sought—of course they have been sought. Any member who does not seek opinions, who does not wish to debate is failing in his duty to his constituents, I think.

Politicians have made speeches. Surely the purpose of parliament and the legislative process is to provide the time and means for the special study of issues which by their very nature are emotion-charged and terribly complicated, to provide a chance for those of us who have been given the responsibility by our constituents to consider these issues by reason and discussion, rather than by prejudice or passion.

But the debate over this particular issue has been going on for the last ten years. Since 1966 there have been three major debates on capital punishment, 700 pages of debate and discussion have been devoted to it—38 days in the House and committee. That, Mr. Speaker, does not include the over 50 speeches and the 20 hours in this thirtieth parliament. I would now hope, indeed I will venture to suggest, and I did this last night, that surely it is time for this issue to be removed from the agenda of all of us—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: —from the agenda of parliament so that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), who in my opinion must have had to spend needless hours on this absolutely minute aspect of the criminal justice system, can get on with the business of dealing with criminal justice, providing good detection methods and certainty of conviction once detection had occurred.

I am not one of those who feel it is wrong to be debating this again because I devoutly hope this will be the debate that ends the issue. When I was in London last September

I spoke to several members of parliament who had various views on capital punishment, but to a woman and to a man those members at Westminster said the issue is over in Britain; it has been debated ad nauseam; decisions have been made—the issue is moot. I hope very much that this will occur in Canada very soon.

This is not to say that I think the issue is not important, Mr. Speaker. On the contrary I believe deeply in the sacredness of human life. I ask that we bear this in mind; that we bear in mind that a person who commits a crime is after all part of human society, just as his victim is. It occurs to me that although many speeches have been made about the victim, very few comments have been made about the compensation systems in place in many provinces which in money terms—and surely this is a most inadequate way to try to ameliorate the effects of death—but in money terms at any rate various provinces have tried to alleviate the problems of the victim's survivors. I had occasion myself to ask that the Ontario Compensation Fund be used for the burial of a victim of a murder. The fund responded rapidly and with very little red tape.

The taking of human life, I think we must agree, is an act of supreme arrogance. My conviction about the brutality and futility of capital punishment dates from my early boyhood when, if I can use a metaphor, our household was afflicted with the gloom of a veritable Good Friday as my father, who was a Justice of the Supreme Court, was importuned by people connected with the justice system, the judges and those in other walks of life, to spare the life of somebody who would, perhaps in a day or two, be executed. I need not go into the relationships involving the tiral judge in those circumstances; but the request was made, nonetheless. The judiciary was not removed from those pressures. No judge who is human can be removed from them. I can only say that on those occasions in our household the deepest gloom prevailed.

That, of course, is not enough reason for me, now in adulthood, to support abolition. Obviously there are many other aspects of the question to be considered. But I do remember that our household was not a nice place to be in on those occasions. I hope my colleagues think that I have arrived at my present decision by the use of whatever reasoning and rational process are at my disposal.

As I said last night, as I have said 100 times, even 1,000 times, hanging will not save the life of a policeman; hanging is no deterrent to violent crime. It is time we decided the issue once and for all.

My colleagues will be glad to hear that I have almost finished. Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) was able to announce that instruments of ratification were in the process of being signed so that Canada could accede to the Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations. It was a long time a'borning. This will be understood by those who understand the constitutional complexities of this country. Surely it would be the supreme irony if Canada, after waiting literally a generation, would become a signatory to the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights as the very time when parliament should reject this bill and start again his horrible aspect of the criminal justice system, execution by hanging.

Lastly I ask, as I did at the beginning, must night fall again in this country? Must ministers of the Crown, and must we all, since after all we all have a share in this decision-making, be asked to start this horrible engine again? The discussion has gone on endlessly. Surely it is time for Canada to take its place among the civilized nations of the world which possess certain intrinsic values which tell us that the time has come to abolish capital punishment.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this bill has been debated at length, and debate will continue for some time. I listened with interest to the arguments of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather). Having read what has been said and listened to in this debate, I observe that I do not think much more can be said on one side or the other of the question we are considering.

What has interested me is the extent to which similar arguments have been used on both sides of the question. Members have spoken on the effect of capital punishment. Some members argue that it has a deterrent effect; others, that capital punishment encourages the commission of capital crimes. We have heard arguments based on moral and religious grounds, based on Biblical justification, and so on. These authorities and justifications can be used to support arguments on either side of the question, it seems to me.

The House has discussed rehabilitation and the undeniable possibility of miscarriage of justice, of someone being found innocent, after all, after the sentence of capital punishment is carried out.

The argument which has moved me enormously is the one concerning the social implications of capital punishment, the argument that says that if we examine those who have been the victims of capital punishment over the decades we shall find that they are not a cross-section of Canadians, not even a cross-section of criminals in our system. They have been the poor, the people at the bottom of our economic and social system. They, invariably, seemed to be the ones to suffer the penalty of capital punishment.

Having said that, I wish to make a couple of other observations before putting a proposal to this House. I suggest that public opinion is an extremely important factor in the determination of an issue like capital punishment. The system of justice in our country after all is the people's system. It must be a system which accords with the population' sense of what is right and fair, and which makes the Canadian people feel secure. Although individual members of parliament perhaps spend more time studying this question than the man in the street, and are exposed to a greater cross-section of argument and expertise, all of which must be brought to bear on our deliberations, when you come right down to it we are asked on behalf of the people of Canada to provide a system of justice they think is fair.

I do not see how any member of this House can escape the undeniable fact that the majority of the people of Canada are of the opinion—however you want to measure or count it—that there is a place for capital punishment in our system of justice. I insist that this House must respond to that concern.

It is also true, I think, that there is a great variety of opinion among retentionists about what place capital punishment ought to have in our system. You cannot hold a referendum on the subject because some people feel you should retain capital punishment for hijacking, treason, and kidnapping; others, that it should be retained in the narrow case of murderers who commit murder for pay. Some retentionists also question the power of commutation and how that power ought to be exercised.

Before I make my recommendation, I wish to point out one of the difficulties we shall encounter if we proceed to vote on the bill in its present form. I think that the matter will be decided by a narrow majority on one side or the other. A large minority of members, who will represent a large segment of public opinion, will oppose that decision, no matter how the House decides on that important question. For that reason I wish to make a proposal for an amendment, for which I hope there will be a fair degree of consensus. I will bring forward a proposal which I think can be supported by abolitonists because it recognizes their point of view, but which will preserve capital punishment among the panoply of remedies available under the Criminal Code.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There is not a quorum present. I think the House should adjourn.

An hon. Member: The quorum has been called.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I consider that a solid life sentence is as effective a deterrent, in general terms, as capital punishment. I am prepared to argue, from the moral point of view, that a solid life sentence, if I can put it that way, is just as rigid and just as oppressive a punishment as capital punishment itself.

● (1630)

I listened with interest to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal talk about his experience with the application of capital punishment. I invite him—perhaps he has already done it—to talk to some people who have had imposed on them a life sentence, people who have been in prison for 25 years or more. There are some in Canada who have had that. He should then come to a conclusion about whether the capital punishment that upset him as a youngster is more of a severe penalty than the penalty of life imprisonment.

I now come to the point. What I intend to propose when this bill goes to committee is an amendment that will continue capital punishment, not for the most serious criminal acts in general, but for those acts committed by individuals who are already subject to life imprisonment as a sentence under the bill proposed in the House today. In other words, I am saying that this heavy, solid life sentence is, as far as I am concerned, an effective deterrent in general. However, what is the deterrent in this sentence for a violent crime committed by a lifer while in prison?

As an example, I refer to prison executions. Almost every time convicts take over a prison, they kill two or three of the other prisoners to whom they take strong objection. When the Kingston penitentiary was recently taken over by the convicts, the first people they killed were the criminals serving long indeterminate sentences for sex crimes. Who are they to impose the death penalty on fellow prisoners? They pick the men who have nothing to lose, those already serving life sentences, to carry this out. They are not deterred by the life sentence when trying to escape or from being a danger to the life and safety of prison guards as well as to their fellow prisoners. I want to see us turn to an amendment which would reserve capital punishment for that very narrow area.

I am also going to put into the amendment that capital sentence should be non-cummutable by the cabinet. It should be a definite, emphatic, non-commutable death penalty subject to only one thing, that being if the jury recommends clemency in the case of a lifer who commits a serious capital crime, the cabinet should have the power to review the decision and commute it.

I feel the position I have put forward can be viewed as an abolitionist position because it elminates capital punishment for a very broad range of crimes where the solid life sentence is an equal deterrent. However, I invite those who are concerned about protecting society to consider what deterrent there is for the person I have described who has nothing to lose by committing serious crimes in prison, trying to escape, or endangering the system of order within our penitentiaries, as well as the crimes he might commit after he escapes. This is a real problem where I would argue that capital punishment is an obvious deterrent and I think it ought to be continued.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, once again this House is debating the question of capital punishment. I have spoken four times in this House on capital punishment over the past ten years; August 4, 1966; November 14, 1967; May 23, 1973; and October 19, 1973.

Sometimes it seems to me that this new liberalism that holds the reins of power in this country has developed and fostered a firm schedule of debate that includes deficit budgets, capital punishment, unemployment, inflation, and scandals in the ranks of the government. I do know that all this debate on capital punishment over the past decade has not availed us of a firm policy in dealing with murderers and other dangerous offenders in our society. It has not accomplished anything to improve the level of public security in our country. Because the government has adopted and maintained a namby-pamby attitude toward the treatment of dangerous criminals, we now have open season on law enforcement officers and prison guards.

The gist of this debate is the traditional basic reason for government; protection of persons and property. Neither the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) nor his government care anything about the protection of persons and property. This has been shown recently in this House. Yesterday during private members' hour from 5 to 6 p.m. Bill C-255, sponsored by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), came up for debate. This bill would greatly assist in the protection of persons and property. It would provide for the establishment by all Canadian telephone companies of an emergency telephone number.

The bill has a great deal of merit and should have been passed. It was deliberately talked out by Liberal members—the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins) and the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young)—much to the disgust of the rest of the House, including many private members on the government benches.

Canada badly needs a universal emergency number. The use of it would no doubt aid in our efforts against capital crime and lawlessness of all kinds. The Liberals talked the same bill out on March 26 last, at which time it was sponsored by one of their own members, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson). This is the new Trudeau liberalism in action at its best, or perhaps I should say at its worst.

We have an opportunity and responsibility in this debate to stop shilly-shallying over the question of capital punishment and do what we should have done many years ago. We should carry the war to the enemy. People who engage in deliberate anti-social conduct, who commit deliberate pre-meditated murders and other forms of violent conduct, are the enemies of our society. They are engaged in war, Mr. Speaker, and we in this House are engaged in a holding action. An analysis of the statistics available to all of us could indicate but one thing; we are losing the war.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has declared more than once recently that if anyone hangs in this country he will resign. Now, Mr. Speaker, as an elected servant of the public, and a special one at that, placed in an office of trust, elevated to the cabinet, he should resign for making such irresponsible statements. We are fighting a war against capital crime, and how ridiculous can the Solicitor General make himself when he lowers the prestige and dignity of his office by making such statements? He can be compared to a war minister, a minister of defence, who would declare that he will refuse to fight a war that the country might be engaged in but he still wants his job. Again I say, let him resign.

Many of the hon. members of this House, some of whom are my colleagues, continue to speak out on behalf of the poor, misunderstood and maligned criminals. While I respect their right to hold and express their own views on this or any other subject, I cannot accept the argument that we, the state, do not have a moral right to employ capital punishment as an extreme measure in dealing with violent and capital crime.

Murder is the extreme method in settling an argument, in pulling off a major crime such as a robbery, or to settle any other matter in which a criminal might become engaged. In fact nothing could be more extreme. I simply cannot understand how anyone could become overly sympathetic over a murderer who happens to be unlucky enough to get caught.

I was appalled the other night to hear a tape of a conversation a reporter had with a prisoner in a Montreal jail who had been involved in a hostage-taking incident. When the reporter asked the prisoner whether he would have killed the hostages, the man laughed and said he would not have hesitated. Asked how he could have done such a thing when he had never committed a murder before, the prisoner laughed again and said he did not say he had never killed anyone, just that he had never been caught.

Arguments that capital punishment demeans a society, or that capital punishment is as barbarous as the crime for which it was originally proposed, are specious and unwarranted. People who argue that the state does not have a legal or moral right to impose capital punishment are using a personal and restricted definition of justice. It is all too easy to "cop out" and say that murder is murder, whether committed by a criminal or by the state. Mr. Speaker, I would accept the proposition that a state can commit murder. A totalitarian state can, but not one such as Canada. But I will not accept the contention that a state can commit murder in the context offered so frequently in these debates as a valid reason for abolishing capital punishment.

When a person is tried in a duly constituted court bound by laws of procedure and evidence, as is the case in Canada, and found guilty by his or her peers, whatever verdict is rendered by that court should determine what the disposition should be. When a verdict calling for execution is rendered by a judge and jury, unqualified by a recommendation for mercy, the state is bound to see that the execution is carried out. This would not be murder. It would be the administration of true justice in consequence of a deliberate murder having been committed—I use the word "deliberate" because we have always made a distinction between deliberate murder and other actions leading to a person's death.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) went to the Canadian public last Sunday night by way of the television program "The Nation's Business" to present his fatuous argument that capital punishment would not be a deterrent to the crime of premeditated murder, and to try to sell his proposal regarding gun controls. He told his audience that those who have presented counter proposals do not understand the legislation.

I am amazed that the minister would go on national television and try to convince the Canadian people that the spokesmen for the national gun clubs and associations cannot read, that they cannot interpret legislation. They know full well what the intent is of this legislation, just as they know the intent of the legislation which would abolish the death penalty. I am surprised the minister did not use a couple of minutes of his television time to explain what the gun control law is intended to accomplish. Instead he spent the entire program period complaining that people just do not understand him or his legislation. Mr. Speaker, we understand him all too well. He has fallen for the old story that if you take guns away from the law-abiding you will eliminate murder and other crimes committed with guns, with the result that capital punishment to deter people from committing deliberate murder would not be necessary.

The minister also asserted there was no evidence to support the view that capital punishment was a deterrent to murder. How could there be any evidence of that kind when the hon. gentleman and his cabinet colleagues have commuted every single sentence imposed on convicted murderers of policemen and prison guards over the past ten years? In these circumstances, how could there be any evidence that we in parliament could weigh when we are debating measures to protect Canadian citizens from murderers and other violent criminals? We would have some evidence to evaluate if the Minister of Justice had had the courage and the sense of responsibility to allow the sentences of our courts to be carried out. I suggest he has no right to tell the Canadian people there is no evidence to support the position of the retentionists in this House.

For a long time it has been common knowledge that retentionists outnumber the abolitionists throughout the country and, indeed, in this House. The minister knows that if his views prevail and capital punishment is abolished it will be because of the majority which the government commands in this Chamber and the political compulsion imposed on members of the cabinet to vote in favour of the bill before us.

The minister tries to make a case in favour of abolition on the ground that executions carried out by the state amount to murder and that the state does not have the right to commit murder in order to punish the crime of murder. What complete and utter nonsense. A state can commit murder, but not in the way suggested by the Minister of Justice. The Prime Minister's buddy, Fidel Castro, has committed thousands of cold-blooded murders in the name of the state. That great friend of our Prime Minister has condemned thousands of people in his kangaroo courts and then had them murdered in the course of disgusting public executions.

I do not agree with the minister that we will be committing murder if we allow the sentences passed by Canadian courts to be carried out. I would point out that when a person is charged with capital murder and appears in our courts, he or she has recourse to laws of procedure, laws of evidence, and the benefit of adequate legal counsel. The accused has the advantage of being considered innocent until the prosecution can establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Should guilt be established, the accused has the benefit of an avenue of appeal extending through lower court all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada. Anyone who compares this process to the sham and shame of a so-called Cuban or Russian court trial should have his head looked at.

What we are talking about here is the right of the state to adopt stern measures to protect the majority of law-abiding people in our country from an anti-social minority. What we are talking about is whether or not the government opposite will accept its responsibility to the electorate and use all of the weapons available to us so as to win the war against violence and capital crime. The criminals are using all the weapons they have. Can we do any less?

The Canadian government, like all other governments, maintains the armed forces in readiness to defend our people from aggressors. Our soldiers, sailors, and airmen might be called upon as they have been in the past to kill in the defence of our country and our free society. Some of those who spend all their time pleading the cause of murderers and other violent criminals say war is state-subsidized murder. This is a high-sounding phrase and one which gives these people an excuse to "cop out" when they are called upon to defend the society which has defended them. No, Mr. Speaker.

While crimes might be committed by individuals in certain wartime situations, under cover of war, as it were, the act of going to war in defence of Queen and country is not in itself a crime. Let the abolitionists dredge up some more credible excuse for the cop out they propose. Let them match their philosophies and their theories against the reality of everyday crime in Canada and tell us that capital punishment is more brutal than the crimes which it is intended to deter. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that a state which maintains a judiciary such as we have in Canada, a state which allows as many opportunities of appeal against court sentences as ours does, cannot commit murder. We can permit murder, we can forgive murder, and we can punish murder. But we cannot commit murder.

I am just as interested in the rehabilitation of anti-social persons and misfits as anyone else, but I think it behoves members of parliament to approach the subject of rehabilitation with somewhat more realism than I have seen exhibited by many so-called experts on human behaviour. In my view, a lot of them have their priorities mixed up. The criminologists and the sociologists are not the only ones who are mixed up, though.

The new Liberals, the disciples of Trudeaucracy, are also mixed up. At the moment they are chasing each other around the Liberal squirrel cage wondering who is leading and where they are going. These new Liberals are those who advocate abolition and who insist, at the same time, that the answer is rehabilitation. At the present time they are confused by the antics of the Minister of Justice who is trying to satisfy retentionists by promising longer prison sentences as the answer to the abolition of the death penalty. He promised to keep convicted murderers behind bars for 25 years. At first the new Liberals accepted this logic, happy that at long last they would see the death penalty abolished. But then the new Liberals—and they are not all from the Liberal party—realized they would not be able to rehabilitate these poor, misunderstood, and maligned capital murderers if those offenders were required to spend 25 years behind bars. They realized that a person 25 years of age would be 50 years old when released from prison. That person's productive life would have been spend in confinement. A person convicted of premeditated murder at age 40, and sentenced to 25 years, would be 65 years old when released, ready for old age security.

This debate is taking place under indeed trying times for parliament and especially for the Liberal government which is now holding the reins of power. They stagger along from day to day in disarray and chaos. It has got so bad that the Prime Minister is now unable to confront the confusion, corruption, influence peddling, graft, and hypocrisy of his own administration and the Liberal party. The latest example is the ineptitude and bungling of the Lockheed Orion deal today and the resultant loss of thirty-four millions of dollars of taxpayers' money. That surely is capital punishment, of a different sort!

This administration will go down in history as one in which the credibility of government, of parliament, and of the individual members thereof, reached its lowest point. The latest polls show the Prime Minister at a new low of unpopularity. Do not be fooled, Mr. Speaker, into thinking that this does not affect private members of this House. Our popularity is down too. If you conducted a poll on us you would find that out. Our credibility is down, especially the credibility of those who support the Prime Minister's policies. This is the new Trudeau liberalism. Where is it taking Canada?

What is the history of Trudeau liberalism? Over the past 10 years it has been one of loose government and permissiveness. Its policies have invited an increase in the rate of all crime. In its craven efforts to avoid capital punishment it has disobeyed its own law. It has declared its deep interest in rehabilitation in the past, and has allowed early and easy paroles. The results of this policy have aroused the general public who are convinced that the government no longer cares about protecting persons and property. This is the new liberalism.

Now under the Liberals they bring forth this bill and they say to the representatives of the people here, "We wish to abolish capital punishment and substitute instead 25 years in prison". Through you, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister, the Solicitor General, the Minister of Justice, and all the authors of this bill, where is your noble experiment with rehabilitation now? If this bill passes, rehabilitation goes out of the window. Twenty-five years in prison precludes and destroys all hope of rehabilitation for anyone convicted of capital crime. So you see, Mr. Speaker, when you trace the sinuous deviations of the Trudeau government, it is a government with a majority mandate that refuses to govern. It should resign.

The government has a few spokesmen out through the country who are trying to make excuses for this legislation. The other day when I was driving to Ottawa from Napanee, Wednesday, May 5, I was listening to stations CJET, Smiths Falls, and CKWS, Kingston, which were carrying the comments of one named McCaulay, broadcasting over CBC from Moncton, which was the scene last year of the fiendish murder of the two Moncton policemen by Hutchison and Ambrose. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that these two now convicted men captured the two policemen, took them out into the country to murder them, but made them dig their own graves first. The decision on their appeal is being awaited from the Supreme Court and I think they deserve a punishment commensurate with what they meted out to their two helpless victims.

To get back to Mr. McCaulay, the freelance broadcaster over CBC on that date, he said that Canadians are a blood-thirsty lot in their demands for the exaction of capital punishment for capital crime. He was very slanted and sarcastic in his comment. He said the cross-section of the majority of Canadians who demand the use of capital punishment were rural people, Roman Catholics, the less educated, policemen, prison guards, God-fearing Christians—as though Roman Catholics were not God-fearing Christians—older men, right wingers, residents of Quebec. And to top it all off, Mr. Speaker, he had to return to the Catholics again and say that a Catholic with grade 8 education is a typical Canadian "Archie Bunker". The government is pretty hard up for a spokesman to put that over the CBC air waves.

I say as a supporter of those groups, thank God for the rural people, the Roman Catholics, the less educated, the policemen, the prison guards, the God-fearing Christians, the older men, the right wingers, the residents of Quebec, and those Canadian "Archie Bunkers" who are trying to preserve Canada and to protect persons and property. Thank God for all those people I have enumerated who stand up for the retention of capital punishment. Thank God for that majority of the Canadian people for whom and for whose opinions the government shows such contempt in this bill.

[Mr. Alkenbrack.]

I regard it as one of the prerogatives of power of a democratic nation, governed by responsible government, that it always reserves and maintains the right to demand the life of any of its citizens as the penalty for premeditated capital crime. Along with capital murder, this also includes those convicted of treason against our country. The abolition bill about to be presented to parliament completely ignores the latter crime, which if successfully committed can mean the destruction of our nation and its form of government.

I have profound respect for the opinions of abolitionists, but there is one point more I must make. When I was first elected to parliament in 1962 capital punishment was one of the laws in force on our statute books, although it was only adivsedly and astutely enforced from time to time. Capital punishment is still on our statute books to be administered to murderers of policemen and prison guards, alghough under Liberal administration, since its inception, all cases have been commuted to life imprisonment.

My point is this. The people of Prince Edward-Lennox, my first constituency, and now the people of Frontenac-Lennox and Addington, through a total of six parliaments did not send me as their representative to Ottawa to abolish capital punishment, for had this been their wish, I certainly would have heard of it on the hustings at each election. I also contend that when the state carries out a sentence of capital punishment imposed by the courts it is not committing another murder but is simply administering justice according to the law of the land.

I believe that the will of the people to maintain the survival and security of the collective whole of a nation, such as Canada, is morally correct, and that the retention and exaction of capital punishment for premeditated capital crime, including treason, is not an immoral act. It is indeed the administration of true and swift justice, and there is nothing more morally correct than justice.

Mr. Marke Raines (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, I have some comments to make on capital punishment and I am prepared to make them now, but in view of the time I will call it five o'clock and continue at the next available opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to order made earlier this day the House will now revert to Routine Proceedings for the specific purpose of permitting the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) to make a statement.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

ENERGY

PROPOSED LEGISLATION AND REGULATIONS TO DEAL WITH OIL AND GAS

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and my thanks as well to all members of the House for giving their consent to enable me to make a statement at this time. As hon. members will appreciate, the reason for making the statement at this time is because all the markets of Canada are now closed.

On April 27 I laid before this House a document setting forth the government's strategy for dealing with the energy issues of the next 15 years. That strategy contained nine key policy priorities. Today I wish to advise members of new initiatives which are indicative of the government's decision to move toward self-reliance in energy by 1985 and which support, in particular, the announced policy priorities.

They are, first, increased exploration and development; that is to say, to double at a minimum exploration and development activity in the frontier regions of Canada over the next three years; secondly, increased resource information that is to say, to accelerate the flow of accurate information about the Canadian resource base; and the third priority area, greater Canadian content and participation in resource development.

● (1700)

The new supportive policies are contained in a document entitled "Statement of Policy—Proposed Petroleum and Natural Gas Act and New Canada Oil and Gas Land Regulations" which, with your permission, I will table at the end of my remarks, and copies of this statement are being made available to all members.

An hon. Member: How many rabbits are in this one?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the existing Canada Oil and Gas Land Regulations governing the disposition and administration of oil and gas rights in the north and in the offshore were promulgated in 1961. Since that time there have been major changes in the petroleum situation, both nationally and internationally, and technological advances have changed greatly the capability to explore for and develop oil and gas reserves. It is necessary to up-date the regulations pertaining to Canada's frontier areas so as to provide increased public controls over exploration and production, modernize the system for collecting economic rent, and at the same time continue to encourage exploration for new reserves. As emphasized by our strategy report, all of this must be done under acceptable environmental and social conditions.

The great bulk of Canada's frontier areas that can be considered as prospective for exploration with current technology is already held under permits issued in accordance with the existing regulations. Thus, in order to institute meaningful changes in the existing system, it is necessary to amend substantially the terms and conditions of these permits, which currently contain commitments to lease and royalty conditions extending for periods exceeding 50 years. This necessitates the adoption of appropriate legislation designed to impact on present contractual obligations.

However, it cannot be over-emphasized that the continued involvement of industry is essential, not only from the standpoint of providing investment capital but for the source and flow of exploration concepts, as the discovery of new reserves is a function of the input of new ideas engendered by the competitive nature of the business. A discovery may be the result of several successive waves of exploration based on different methods of collecting and utilizing information.

What I should like to do is deal with this very complicated area under six headings with some brief comments on each. The six headings are: period of tenure, new work obligations, new fiscal system, preferences for Petro-Canada, production orders, and last but no means least, Canadian participation and content. First is period of tenure.

Under the current regulations exploration in the frontier areas is undertaken on rights that have been issued by the government in the form of permits. A permit allows the holder to explore a designated area for a period of 9 to 12 years, depending upon regional location, and gives him the exclusive right to drill exploratory wells within that area. Production of oil and gas cannot be undertaken from a permit, the permit must first be converted to lease during which process at least half the acreage must be surrendered back to the Crown. The company then has had an option to reacquire that acreage in return for higher royalties for any oil or gas produced from it. The tenure of a lease has been 21 years, with provision for renewal of a like period if producible.

Under the new regulations existing permits will remain in effect but with modified requirements. However, there will be no 21-year oil and gas leases. Instead, the permittee if still in the exploration stage of operations will be able to go to a 5-year provisional lease covering the entire permit area. Upon commencement of production, where this occurs either in the permit stage or in the provisional lease stage, a 10-year production licence will be issued. Production licences will have a provision for a 10-year renewal period based upon production capability. A new incremental royalty plan for all production replaces the added royalty from the 50 per cent Crown acreage of the present arrangement, to which I alluded a moment ago.

I should like to turn now to new work obligations. Under the new regulations, a combination of incentives and work obligations is designed to impact upon oil and gas rights currently held by industry so as to increase exploration efforts. The minimum levels of work obligations that holders of existing permit rights must satisfy will be increased significantly for most areas. For example, under the new regulations the new work levels for the Scotian Shelf and Grand Banks will be increased threefold.

Under the new regulations the minister will continue to have the power to extend the period of exploration rights through the granting of special permit renewals when permits have come up to the end of their normal life tenure, with such special renewals subject to levels of work as he may order, including the drilling of exploratory wells, thereby promoting exploration efforts in areas where this may be desirable.

Requests for special permit renewals will become increasingly frequent over the next few years. By mid-1979 about half of the existing permits will have expired, and the remainder will run out by the end of 1984. Alternatively a permittee may opt to hold some acreage under a provisional lease, in which case it will be subject to payment of annual rentals of $2.50 per acre, versus $1.00 per acre per year for leases under the current regulations. This $2.50 per acre per year may be refunded to the extent that exploration work is carried out on a provisional lease, thus providing another means for promoting the increase of exploration activity.

The pace of exploration may be further advanced by orders to drill exploratory wells on specific oil and gas prospects which are now under permit even though all present permit terms have been met. If the holders of the rights fail to have such drilling done the government may direct that the national oil company, Petro-Canada, drill instead, thereby earning an interest in the prospect. I will expand on this later. Another factor that will act as incentive to exploration is the early release of information, especially seismic data, that has been collected by the oil companies and filed with the federal resource management agencies.

The third section deals with the new fiscal system related to economics of individual fields. Under the new regulations a permittee will be allowed to hold a production licence covering the entire productive area within his permit. Under the old regulations, as mentioned previously, upon conversion of a permit to lease half of the permit acreage had to be returned to the Crown. If the returned acreage was considered sufficiently attractive by the company, it could exercise an option to reacquire the surrendered lands in return for higher royalties on production from those lands. This system was a method of receiving a portion of economic rent in addition to the nominal royalty levied, 5 per cent for the initial 3 years of production and 10 per cent thereafter. Under the new regulations, economic rent beyond the basic royalty, which will be a flat 10 per cent, will be received by the government through a progressive incremental royalty system. "PIR" will be used henceforth in my remarks as progressive incremental royalty system.

Unlike a flat royalty system, which penalizes marginal fields and does not ensure a fair return to the government from highly profitable "bonanza" fields, the PIR system depends on the net revenues generated by a particular field and so is progressive in nature and profit sensitive. The incremental royalty is not payable until the investments in production facilities for a field are largely recovered, the basic 10 per cent production royalty and income tax have been allowed for, and a return of 25 per cent is realized on the development investment as calculated on a field-by-field basis. This level of earnings is designed to allow the recovery of average exploration costs as well as to generate a reasonable level of profits on total investment.

The PIR will provide for a fair return to Canadians from their resources, and it will also allow industry a fair rate of return on its high risk investments. By delaying collection of the Crown's share of resource revenue until production takes place, the new fiscal arrangement ensures that scarce resource capital is channelled directly into exploration and development rather than into bonus payments and other front-end charges. As a further means of promoting early exploration, the government will allow a 3-year PIR-holiday in respect of oil and gas discoveries made before June 30, 1980. I wish to stress, however, that contrary to many recent comments the incremental royalty scheme is exactly that—incremental to the basic 10 per cent royalty.

The fourth section referring to Petro-Canada is a very important section. As an agency of the government, Petro-Canada has an important role to play in accelerating exploration for oil and gas in the frontier areas. It will be given certain preferences with respect to the acquisition of oil and gas rights in Canada lands. Petro-Canada, subject to meeting levels of work obligations similar to those imposed upon other companies, will have the right to acquire any existing areas not now covered by permits or leases, as well as 25 percent of any acreage that returns to the Crown upon the termination of permits or leases over the 7-year period following promulgation of the new regulations. Lands in these categories are commonly termed Crown reserves.

Where no prior discoveries have been made, Petro-Canada will also have the option to acquire a working interest of up to 25 percent in permits that are granted special renewals by the minister as well as any provisional leases issued while operations are still in the exploration stage, with no pay-back of past exploration expenditures to the permittee. As extensions of this type will only be sought for attractive prospects, the 25 percent working interest option will be of significant value to the national company.

As mentioned previously, the minister may consider it necessary on a need-to-know basis to order a permit holder to carry out an exploratory drilling program on a prospect within his permit acreage. Should the permittee fail to do so within a reasonable period of time, Petro-Canada may be directed by the governor in council to undertake the drilling program itself, in which case Petro-Canada can earn up to the entire interest in a prospect. In such a case the permittee will be allowed to retain at most a half interest in the subject prospect, and if he chooses not to commit to pay half the drilling costs before the program commences, then he must pay Petro-Canada four times his share after the first well, six times after the second, or eight times after the third to reacquire 50 percent of the prospect under his permit.

In respect of production orders, to support further the attainment of Canadian self reliance the government will be provided with the authority to order a producer in the frontier areas of Canada, the Territories, and offshore, to commence production of oil or gas into domestic markets at prevailing wellhead prices notwithstanding the existence of any arrangement between the producer and a purchaser for purposes of export to a foreign market. Moreover, the government will be able to take both the basic royalty and PIR in cash or production in the case of oil or natural gas. In the latter case, the government's share of production can be directed to domestic markets as considered desirable—an additional option.

The last heading I indicated I wanted to cover with regard to these new and complicated regulations is Canadian participation content. As regards Canadian participation in the petroleum resources under Canada lands, the Minister will be empowered to require a 25 percent minimum level of Canadian ownership in producible properties, and he will be able to exercise discretion as to the method by which this level is attained. Only about one third of existing permits are now held by parties or groups of parties having a level of Canadian ownership which would meet this requirement. Stated another way, 65 per cent of all the acreage under permit at the present time is held by companies which have less than 25 per cent Canadian ownership. We want to change that.

This provision will help strengthen the Canadian presence in an industry at present more than 90 per cent foreign owned. Another aspect is that the use of Canadian goods and services will be enhanced in a number of ways, for example, as a requirement for granting special renewals for permits; as a provision in new exploration agreements; and during the course of granting approvals for work programs and allowable expenditures.

As is readily apparent, the discretionary powers envisaged under the new regulations will be far more extensive than those under the current regulations. There are many difficult decisions to be made as regards existing exploration permits, in particular the need to establish new requirements for widely differing areas as increasing numbers of permits reach the end of their normal life over the next few years. As regards future oil and gas rights, there are the basic decisions as to where and on what terms and conditions such rights should be made available by way of public tender or in some cases issued directly by order in council. In the former case, choosing successful applicants in the future will not be a matter of simply picking the highest bidder; there will be a number of factors to be considered in the best interests of Canada.

Equally important and difficult will be decisions involved after the discovery of producible oil and gas. The new rental collection system will require the determination of a number of factors involving far more than normal accounting procedures, indeed requiring a high degree of oil and gas expertise. The development of the necessary administrative organization and personnel should, therefore, be ideally within one group and the government proposes to set up a new unified resource management agency. This new agency will at the same time provide the vehicle through which preferential treatment as regards Canada lands will be effected for Petro-Canada, and it will maintain an objective balance between Petro-Canada on the one hand and industry on the other in the implementation of matters under the new regulations.

In summary Mr. Speaker, this new policy which will be presented for parliamentary consideration this fall is designed to meet equally important but sometimes conflicting objectives—increased exploration and discovery, and greater control over the activities of the industry which must carry the lion's share of the exploration risk. We are confident that, following extensive discussions with that industry, as well as with the provinces, we have reached the fine balance which will prove to be in the national interest.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister is indicating his intention to table some documents. Earlier the order was that we would revert to Routine Proceedings, namely, tabling of documents and statements by Ministers in order that the minister might be permitted to table some documents and make a statement.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2) I should like to table two copies in the two official languages of "Statement of Policy, Proposed Petroleum and Natural Gas Act and New Canada Oil and Gas Land Regulations".

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House welcome the minister's statement today. I might add that after six years absence of any oil and gas land regulations this statement probably deserves some sort of a welcome. The welcome we give today, however, is a mixed one.

It would be unfair to say that during the past six years, when we have had no regulations, nothing has happened. We on this side of the House have watched with not a little amusement as final draft after final draft has been churned out by the departments concerned, and then returned red pencilled by the oil companies. As each one of these final drafts went out, hope would rise anew that this would be the last.

● (1720)

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) would rise to his feet and tell us, yes they will be out this spring, later to say, sorry they would be delayed to the fall, unfortunately they would not arrive until winter, they would definitely be ready in the spring, and so on—the rhythm of the passing seasons. Well, now the industry is presumably satisfied and the country can get down to business. While congratulating the minister on the fullness of his consultations with interested parties, I might add this—nowhere in this seasonal procession was room found for parliament's view. Apparently we are not to be consulted, only informed.

Yet this delay has not been without its cost to Canada. Investment capital abhors a policy vacuum. Hundreds of millions of dollars cannot be invested in an uncertain regulatory climate, no matter how full consultation is. Capital which might be invested in developing our frontier resources has gone to other areas, such as the U.S. continental shelf and the North sea. Indeed it is a sobering fact that Great Britain, where frontier oil development has been more costly than generally has been the case in Canada, will surpass Canadian oil production in two years. This has happened despite the fact that British reserves are at present approximately equal to Canadian oil resources on which the government places a 90 per cent chance of recovery.

In Canada frontier exploration has suffered while the jury was out on these regulations and, parenthetically speaking, while various budgets dispelled any impression of government competence in resource management. Last year, $332 million was spent on the development of frontier resources, a figure which is less in real terms than the 1972 expenditure. This country simply cannot afford energy management which marks time for three years while other countries, even Britain with its socialist government, surge ahead.

Having received these regulations we must now decide whether they emanate from a credible source. Let us look at the record of official ignorance in the question of predicting exactly how much frontier oil there is. In 1969 we were told by the government that if we were lucky we could expect to have four billion barrels of oil surplus to our needs in 1985. If everything went wrong we could expect perhaps only 2.5 billion. In 1973 we were told to expect 780 million cubic feet of gas and 100 billion barrels of oil. Today we are told we have no surplus at all. What they did not tell us then they tell us now, that there was a zero probability of those resources existing, which is about the probability that this government's estimates will ever be taken seriously again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: These regulations come as one more piece of ad hocery in an energy strategy that is held together by guess and wishful thinking. As things stand today we do not even know whether northern development will take place. Judge Berger apparently regards his task as being concerned with this seminal question, and his conclusions are by no means forgone. By the time a decision has been finally reached on the MacKenzie corridor it will be late 1977, or, with the record of the oil and gas land regulations in mind, perhaps 1997 might be more accurate. Once that decision is made we must await the immense lead times required from initiation to production, which today span a decade or more. In the context of the past the idea that we will be burning frontier energy in our homes by 1982 is absurd. It is in the context of these general caveats that we must examine today's statement.

We support wholeheartedly the concept underlying the progressive incremental royalty program. It is natural that we would because an important part of the idea owes its origin to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) who has been putting such ideas forth for almost a decade. The minister would do well to borrow more of my hon. friend's ideas for Canadian equity participation in frontier development.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: As for the rate of the profits tax and the length of the moratorium, full comment will be made after we have had more time to examine them in detail.

The preferential treatment of Petro-Canada under the regulations raises once again the serious question of the government's competence in resource management. This is not the time to build up Petro-Can at the expense of the private enterprise companies in the north. The Canadian people do not need Petro-Can. What they do need is fuel to move their wheels and heat their homes. It is difficult to see how ceding Petro-Can immense tracts of northern and off-shore acreage which it could not possibly handle will help Canadians with their energy problems. It is a looking glass policy—the government biases the system in favour of a company that manifestly cannot do the job and prejudices the system against those companies which manifestly can.

As regards the "challenge to drill system" we do not oppose this in principle. What we do oppose is an unwarranted increase in the arbitrary powers of ministerial discretion that this document entails. The minister should realize that in many cases the major asset that smaller independent oil companies possess is acreage. Legislation which compromises this asset will inevitably reduce the ability of a company to raise capital and thus slow down the pace of development. It is unacceptable that no appeal from this arbitrary power to be assumed by ministers will be permitted. When these regulations come before the House, we shall certainly seek to incorporate some sort of appeals procedure.

The regulations also appear to reinforce the dangerous precedent set by the Petroleum Administration Act of giving ministers the power to abrogate contracts. This strikes directly at principles which are at the heart of the enterprise system. Yet the regulations appear to provide for no compensation or recompense for those who have had their property rights diluted in this fashion and who could suffer losses as a result.

There will be widespread concern about the ministerial discretion involved in the determination of a qualified person with respect to exploration agreement.

Although we find ourselves to be in essential agreement with the requirement that oil companies operating in federal territory be Canadian corporations with participation by Canadian citizens, we feel the planned administration of the principle leaves something to be desired. Surely it makes more sense to apply the requirement to exploration licences, that is, at the beginning of the process, than half way through at the exploration agreement stage. We will also seek assurances that present permit holders will not be classified as unqualified with respect to existing agreements.

As regards the increase of information, we are, for the reasons I have elaborated earlier, fully behind any initiative that will help government get some information to dispel the woeful state of inaccuracy on which it has operated in the past.

In short, it seems to me—and we should not neglect or forget this fact—that the proposed regulations which literally empower the minister to set posted prices, to take royalties in kind other than cash, to order drilling on permits and leases, to order production to begin, to order production to certain markets, to require approval of farmouts, are, in a sense, an absolute revolution in the operation of the energy industry in this country, a managerial revolution. We have seen a movement of the managerial responsibilities of the energy companies in this country from the boardroom, from the company, to the bureaucracy. This is precisely what these regulations have done. Will this produce more oil for the Canadian people more efficiently? I doubt it. Is it an attempt by the government to move indirectly into the oil and gas industries? Is it another government power grab? Is this really a regulation, or is it the start of the confiscation of this important industry?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: These regulations must have, for the sake of all Canadians who depend on the north for their future energy, the most careful scrutiny, and I can assure the minister that when they come to the House they will receive such an examination. They amount to a managerial revolution in the operation of the energy industry in Canada, a revolution which, in our view, may not be in the best interests of all Canadians.

● (1730)

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada have been waiting a long time for these new petroleum and gas regulations covering the Arctic and offshore areas.

I cannot join with the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) in saying that I welcome the statement made by the minister, but since he is a very persuasive and urbane individual I tried very hard to find something in the statement for which I could commend him.

I did not realize it was quite so good until I heard the hon. member for Don Valley objecting to the fact that there was to be any attempt to make oil companies get ready and drill and to use the permits on which they have been sitting and doing nothing for a long time. I want to commend the minister on the fact that he is going to insist that companies which have taken permits, drill, and that he is going to reduce the length of the permit from 21 years to six years and the length of the lease to a provisional period of five years and a production lease of ten years.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, of the 920 million acres of sedimentary land in the Arctic, 80 per cent is under permit. The companies have been simply sitting there waiting to see what they could do with this asset. They have been sitting on their assets in many cases doing nothing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I commend the minister for saying he is prepared to take the necessary steps to get legislative authority to insist that if they are going to hold these permits they must drill and either produce oil, or get off and let somebody else produce oil. I also agree with the principle of a revenue tax through which the Canadian people will share in the revenue produced from any oil or gas discovered in the offshore areas or in the Arctic.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that if one reads the minister's statement and the documents which accompany it very carefully, it is perfectly apparent that we are now going to turn over millions of acres of potential oil and gas lands to foreign companies on leases. This amounts to nothing less than a gigantic sellout.

In the first half of this century this country made a lot of mistakes as to how it leased out its oil and gas lands. We could perhaps have been excused because of our lack of experience, but surely in the last quarter of this century there is no such excuse. I am afraid this government is something like what Tallyrand said about the Bourbons—they have forgotten nothing and learned nothing. We should have learned something from what happened in the southern part of Canada. The minister's statement indicates we have learned nothing at all.

I want to deal with two points, Mr. Speaker. The first point is that the minister says that under the new regulations a permittee will be allowed to hold a production licence covering the entire production area within his permit. Most members of the House know that both the oil and gas lands coming under federal jurisdiction and provincial jurisdiction have always had a provision in the past that 50 per cent of the area which is leased belongs to the Crown. This has been done by having a checkerboard system—I believe Alberta was the first to introduce it—by which the black squares go to the permittee and the white squares belong to the Crown. Those Crown reserves could either be put up for cash bid or could be put up for a percentage of the oil production, to be taken in oil or kind, or they could be used by the Crown itself to extract oil and gas.

In drafting these regulations the government had an excellent opportunity to make sure that in any area where oil and gas was found the Crown had a piece of the action. Those Crown reserves would have provided an opportunity for Petro-Canada, on behalf of the Canadian people, to go into those areas, to produce oil and gas and assure that the Canadian people would get supplies at reasonable prices rather than being at the mercy of a gigantic oil monopoly. The government has not done that.

Speaking in the House yesterday the Minister for Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) predicted a great future for Petro-Canada. I share his desire that Petro-Canada should have a great future. In the statement he made today, however, I see very little future for Petro-Canada except to be a standby. The minister says that Petro-Canada is going to have certain things; it is going to get 25 per cent of any acreage that is returned to the Crown. Mr. Speaker, any acreage that is returned to the Crown will be leftovers that the oil and gas companies do not want.

The minister also said that where an oil company is not carrying on its drilling obligations the government can order Petro-Canada to go into that area and drill. But, Mr. Speaker, he pointed out that the company which has the lease can either agree to pay 50 per cent of the drilling cost and have 50 per cent of whatever Petro-Canada discovers or, if it does not agree to pay 50 per cent in advance, then if Petro-Canada takes the risk in looking for oil or gas and does not get it, it is out that money. If it does find oil or gas, the company holding the lease can step in and, by paying 50 per cent of the drilling cost and a penalty, can still hold 50 per cent of the area on which it, up to that time, refused to drill.

Is that a great future for Petro-Canada? What we are doing is sitting it on the bench and saying that when nobody else wants a lease and nobody else wants a drilling area or somebody has refused to drill in an area, Petro-Canada will be called in. I do not call that an imaginative program for Petro-Canada. As a matter of fact, if the government were serious about Petro-Canada it would have insisted on holding on to the provision which is still true in southern Canada under provincial jurisdiction, and which has been true up until now under federal jurisdiction, of saying when a permittee wants to lease 50 per cent of a checkerboard area which belongs to the Crown those areas which the government did not want to put up for a cash bid or royalty bid basis could be used by Petro-Canada.

This afternoon I heard the hon. member for Don Valley make some rather derogatory remarks about the role of Petro-Canada. I want to remind my Progressive Conservative friends that in almost every country of the world today governments of different political stripes have set up government oil companies in order to provide a countervailing power against the oil cartels, whether it is Great Britain, France, West Germany, Japan or Venezuela. Some, of course, have have gone further, as in the Middle East, and virtually nationalized the entire oil industry. The only place left where people still do not have a government agency available to provide some countervailing power in the oil industry is the United States and some of the antediluvians who sit in this House.

The second point I wish to make briefly is this. While the minister has abandoned the idea of holding on to 50 per cent of the leases granted, he says this will be made up by virtue of the fact that the government will share in the production from these oil and gas fields through the progressive incremental royalty, which the minister euphemistically called PIR.

It is worth noting, first, that the royalty to be charged will be only 10 per cent, as compared with 20 per cent in Alaska and 21 per cent in Alberta; that the companies will be able to get back, as the minister said, their payments of royalty, their income tax and their costs; and that the first 25 per cent of their net profits will be exempt. Only when their profits have reached 100 per cent of their investment will the incremental royalty exceed 30 per cent. Let me consider the instance of a company which has invested $100 million. That company will be able to earn, in the last seven years of its ten-year lease, $25 million a year, on which it will not pay incremental royalty; in seven years it will take in $175 million on a $100 million investment. There will be no tax bite, except the 10 per cent royalty which the company will be required to pay.

I began by saying to the minister that I approved the idea of taxing the production of oil and gas companies so that the Crown shares to some extent in the profits made by the oil and gas industry. But this so-called progressive incremental royalty is a farce. A company with $100 million to invest will be able to make a profit of up to $100 million before the royalty exceeds 30 per cent; and that 30 per cent will be imposed only on the amount above the first $25 million of net profit calculated after it has taken into consideration its royalties and income tax.

We shall discuss this matter further when the government brings down the legislation. I appeal to the minister and to the government, to rethink their position seriously on this matter. Future generations will hold us accountable if we turn over 900 million acres in northern Canada, to say nothing of offshore areas, to oil companies, without holding on, as we have the right to do, to 50 per cent of the leases, and without making sure that there is a place for the government-owned oil company to act on behalf of the people of Canada in finding oil and gas. We must make sure the government-owned company provides sufficient competition in this field, so that the people of Canada are not ripped off by the oil and gas monopoly which has treated our people so badly in years gone by.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, as the minister recognizes, many questions come to mind. Did I understand the minister to say that the governor in council if it so decides, may direct Petro-Canada to explore in certain areas and drill in others? Did I understand him to say that the governor in council envisages this as part of his program? If so, who is running Petro-Canada, the directors of the company or the governor in council?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, two points need to be made clear. First, the agency, to which I referred as the new, unified resources management agency, will determine if a promising structure should be drilled. The agency would say to the permittee, or owner of that land, "We think it is promising, you should drill. We will give you a reasonable period of time." The time will be based on a number of factors, such as the availability of equipment, climate, and so on. If the private company decides not to accept that particular challenge from the agency, the federal government, through an order in council, will have power to direct Petro-Canada to drill that particular structure. As the hon. member may know, that particular power is written into the act constituting Petro-Canada. A specific section gives the government authority, through order in council, to direct in writing the activities of Petro-Canada.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, God help us all. May I ask the minister what the current situation is with regard to the offshore rights claimed by the provinces? Has the Government of Canada reached an understanding with the eastern provinces and British Columbia about offshore rights and leases or, will companies operating in those waters find that they must deal with both the federal government and the provinces? Would the minister in a word or two tell us about the prospects of a solution of that problem?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I expressed the hope last night when answering a question asked by a colleague of the hon. member—and I am much more hopeful now than I was six months ago—that it would be possible to work out reasonably soon a new understanding with the maritime provinces, including Newfoundland, concerning the administration and division of revenues from offshore resources. There have been recent meetings and I am hopeful that we can proceed quickly to some solution.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I notice, having perused a copy of the minister's statement, that it says practically nothing about native peoples. Does the government plan to allow the native peoples a proportion of royalty income? Is this to be included in the regulations?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I said in the early part of my remarks this afternoon, these regulations, of course, are conditional upon acceptable environmental and social conditions being met. These, of course, are matters on which the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand) and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) can answer. Undoubtedly, as the hon. member knows, consideration will be given to a suggestion already made by some northern peoples, namely, that there should be some participation in the revenues.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I seek further information. How does the government propose to proceed in view of the highly complicated costing procedure which this regulatory process will involve? Will it act on the basis of regulations which are to be passed by parliament, or on the basis of powers given to the department? I refer, for example, to the allocation of costs as between ring fencing and non-ring fencing activities. Who will determine how costs are to be allocated? Who will make the determination? I ask this because I am concerned about the fantastic involvement of regulations in management functions concerning the development of energy in this country. How does the government propose to deal with the myriads of problems which are implied and inherent in these types of regulations?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I thought I made it clear that specialized expertise in this area will be sought. This expertise will repose in the new agency. There will be a period of time, clearly, from the start-up of the new régime until revenues are generated from the ring fence. Clearly this will take some years, in which we can work out the details of that.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, the minister said in his summary that changes in the regulations regarding currently held lands will increase the required level of oil exploration work. As the minister seems so sure of his assertions, has he documents or background papers to prove that this will be the case? Can he also say if he has had consultations with industry, and if this activity will increase, or will it decrease?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it very clear that my remarks dealt with the proposed changes in the regulations. The document that I tabled is a statement of policy with respect to the proposed Petroleum and Natural Gas Act, new Canada oil and gas land regulations. Quite clearly, parliament will have an opportunity during the course of consideration of this legislation to make input to those regulations.

Mr. Bawden: The minister obviously did not answer the question. What he said is that he has not done his homework. If he cares to answer my supplementary question, maybe he can prove he has done his homework. What is going to happen to present holdings of land by permit holders? The minister speaks about Canadian ownership, apparently the fact that the government intends to force 25 per cent Canadian ownership. I wonder how they planned that. What if, for example, Canadians are not willing to take up the other 25 per cent? Since the minister quoted statistics that indicate the percentages of foreign ownership are already too high, will he confirm that this will conclusively eliminate any foreign dollars being spent on these lands?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked more than one question. The first question was what will happen to existing permits under the new regime? Quite clearly we expect that some of the lands will be surrendered because the work obligations will be higher. We think that will be good. In other words, if a company is not prepared to spend a lot more money than it is presently spending on an attractive acreage, it should surrender and give somebody else a chance. That is the general answer to the first question.

As to the second question, about increasing Canadian ownership, quite frankly I am not as pessimistic as the hon. member about Canadians being ready to invest in their own country. The hon. member forgets that very few of them have had an opportunity to do so. If he were to look at the way those permits are now being held, he would find that the large majority—I already indicated the numbers—are held by companies in which there is a very small Canadian participation. We on this side think that should be changed. He may not.

There are three areas where this new power that we are seeking will come to play. The first is with respect to existing permits, which is retroactive. There is no question, there is a substantial amount of retroactive legislation involved here with respect to existing permits. If an existing permit holder wants a special renewal, or a provisional lease, he is going to be faced with providing an option of a working interest for Petro-Canada. If he wants to go to a production licence, he will have to satisfy the minister that he can meet that 25 per cent ownership I am talking about.

The second has to do with lands which are not now under permit. I think this was referred to by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). In this instance the minister will have the authority to determine whether that 25 per cent should be met in the exploration permit, quite apart from the production permit, because there we are moving to the future. It is not retroactive. Therefore in a number of very significant ways we want to open up the opportunities for Canadian participation in the north and Canadian ownership.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In order to conclude the questioning, I propose to recognize the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) for a final supplementary, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro). That will undoubtedly take us past the ordinary hour or adjournment, which was provided for in the order made by the House earlier this day. However, in order to be absolutely sure of the regularity of our proceedings, it ought to be deemed that the order under consideration at the hour of adjournment was Bill C-84 and that the floor was held by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Raines). Is that understood and agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a further question. The minister knows very well that the government has been in charge of the rules for most of the time since oil was first discovered in this country. There has never been a climate sufficient to encourage Canadians even to invest in the low risk areas of Alberta. Does the minister propose to recommend to the Minister of Finance, and to take an active role in seeing that the rules are changed in this country so that Canadians truly have the opportunity to deal with this in a financial way? This has nothing to do with high risk areas where he is saying they will be forced into accepting 25 per cent in the Arctic areas.

Perhaps at the same time he can advise whether this new petroleum revenue tax will be a deductible expense for those companies that ultimately end up paying it. Will it be deductible for tax purposes, as was adjusted in the last budget, or will it not be deductible unless it is a very serious disincentive to expenditure?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I again ask the hon. member to look at the document. I realize he has not had much time to do so. He might be very interested in seeing Canadian ownership. If he looks at that he will also see how far back these permits go. It is pretty darn hard to make the argument that Canadians would have invested when there is no way they had a chance because somebody already held their acreage. He seems to have a major blind spot there. As to his second question with respect to the PIR, I am informed that would not be a deductible expense for calculating corporate income tax.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the new regulations propose to set up new work requirements which those holding permits must perform. If these regulations were to come into effect tomorrow, what percentage of the companies operating in the Arctic would qualify as having met those requirements, and what percentage would not?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member the percentage of the companies because there is a large number, some with very small holdings. If the hon. member looks at the acreage on the permit he will find that only 35 per cent of the acreage under permit would now qualify under that 25 per cent rule.

Perhaps I might make another point while on my feet. It deals with the question of corridor acreage about which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands made a great deal. I thought he would have known, because I tried to emphasize it in my remarks, that the Crown does not have a completely unencumbered right to the 50 per cent under the old checkerboard system. Indeed the company had the option to possess that additional 50 per cent by paying a higher royalty. That is an important point. Quite clearly, if it was very attractive, the company would do that.

There is a second point worth noting. Generally speaking that corridor acreage was worth between 15 and 20 per cent in terms of the producibility of the area. It is again not accurate to convey that was 50 per cent of the asset.

Third, if you consider the application of the corridor and checkerboard system to the Arctic and Arctic Islands, you have to acknowledge that the situation there is very different from the kind of situation we have with land in a province like Alberta. There is a whole series of points that needs to be made with respect to corridor acreage. The main one I want to make is that the government is giving up 50 per cent of a producing asset under the new system.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to argue again with the minister. I am only allowed to ask a question. Since he is changing many of the existing agreements I thought he would have changed this one as well to give the government 50 per cent, as does the province of Alberta and the province of Saskatchewan, should they allow a permit to go to lease. In view of the statement he made that Petro-Canada will be given the first shot at any areas which are not under permit, may I ask what acreage that would involve in the Arctic at the present time—what proportion of the total acreage?

Mr. Gillespie: There are hundreds of millions of acres still available and not under permit. I do not want to make a judgment as to the quality of that acreage. But there are vast tracts.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): My information is that of some 960 million acres about 827 million acres are already under permit, or controlled in some way, that is, about 80 per cent. But I will leave that point and discuss it with the minister at some other time.

The minister said Petro-Canada will also have the option to acquire a working interest of up to 25 per cent in permits which are granted special renewal by the minister. Why should there be a limitation of 25 per cent? I keep noticing that Petro-Canada always gets in at the tail end—they are only allowed in when nobody else is interested, or when the government has ordered them in. Now, in the case of special renewal, they are to get an equity of only 25 per cent, which gives them no control, and unless they are in the marketing business the oil is not of much use to them.

Mr. Gillespie: That is the kind of figure I would have to put down as a judgment call, one which balances a number of factors involved. The point which needs to be made is that Petro-Canada would have an option to get in at no cost to itself for any previous work which had been done. It would, of course, be obliged to pay its way in all future developments.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, my question also has to do with the 25 per cent level of minimum Canadian ownership. In the news release the minister handed out reference is made to this requirement before production is allowed. In response to the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) the hon. gentleman indicated that this also referred to permits. Can the minister advise us what period of time will be allowed a company to qualify under this requirement of 25 per cent Canadian ownership? Will this be set by regulation, will it be part of the act, or will it be up to the discretion of the minister? I should further like to ask whether or not there have been discussions with the industry as far as this provision is concerned, and whether any problems are envisaged by the industry itself.

Mr. Gillespie: This is a discretionary item as far as the minister is concerned; there is discretion for working out what might be considered a reasonable period, particularly during the transition stage. As to the reaction of the industry to this proposal I can say that in general terms this principle has been explored with a number of companies. I anticipate that some would think it is a good provision—I say this based on the comments I have heard from them. Others would not be so favourably inclined.

Mr. Neil: With respect to the option that allows the government to take royalties in kind rather than in cash, would the minister advise whether it is the government's intention to use Petro-Can as the vehicle to refine, produce, and market this oil, or has he some other method in mind?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, that is jumping a long way ahead. Quite clearly Petro-Canada has the power to get into the refining and marketing of petroleum products. We have always made it quite clear that the first priority for Petro-Canada was the exploration of Canadian resources and the development of them. The provision we have been discussing here with respect to the federal government's having the power to take royalties in kind would provide an opportunity for Petro-Canada, acting as the agent of the federal government, to take title to that natural gas or oil and consider marketing arrangements for them. But I put it to the hon. member that that is a power the implementation or use of which would be many years away.

Energy

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is prompted by the question on off shore jurisdiction asked by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). Seaward offshore jurisdiction is one thing. In the particular case of British Columbia may I ask the minister whether there has been any resolution of the jurisdictional dispute between the federal authorities and the province of British Columbia over the waters between Vancouver Island and the mainland, and between the Queen Charlottes and the mainland? In other words, who will be empowered to issue exploration licences in these waters, and who will collect the royalties on any finds? In any event, because of the many changes, has there been any consultation on this matter with the province of British Columbia?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that there has been consultation but to date no agreement has been reached with respect to these matters that the hon. member raises. Therefore I cannot answer the second part of his question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day. It being after six o'clock this House stands adjourned until two p.m. tomorrow.

At 6.09 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST THAT SOLICITOR GENERAL TABLE LETTER TO PAROLE BOARD CONCERNING REINSTATEMENT OF MR. MARCHAND'S DRIVER'S LICENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has admitted today in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that he has personally communicated with the chairman of the National Parole Board concerning a proposed application by the Minister of the Environment to suspend or revoke a prohibition from driving. In order that there be no question that the Solicitor General's actions would be subject to the interpretation of representations on behalf of a cabinet colleague, to a board under the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour):

That this House direct the Solicitor General to immediately table all documents relating to the Solicitor General's communications with the National Parole Board concerning the conviction of the Minister of the Environment and make a statement on motions concerning details of the circumstances of this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A motion of this sort can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR PAYMENT OF SPOUSE'S ALLOWANCE TO WIDOWS, SPINSTERS, WIDOWERS AND BACHELORS BETWEEN 60 AND 65—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43. It relates to a matter which is even more urgent than it was the last time I made this proposal to the House. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the government to introduce without delay an amendment to the Old Age Security Act to provide for the spouse's allowance which is paid thereunder to be paid also to widows, spinsters, widowers and bachelors between the ages of 60 and 65, on the basis of need or preferably on the basis of their being out of the labour market.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF CONFLICTING STATEMENTS ABOUT DEFRAUDING OF COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek leave of the House to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Solicitor General be required to give an immediate explanation of the obvious discrepancies between the admission made by the Minister of Manpower yesterday that the defrauding of the Unemployment Insurance Commission was a serious situation because of its size and that it was more than an ordinary problem and the public statement made by a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that the matter is not as serious as stated by the minister, further that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration should explain to the House the reasons why certain details of an investigation being conducted by the Unemployment Insurance Commission parallel to the RCMP investigation have apparently been withheld from the RCMP, that the House receive immediate information as to whether this was done under pressure of political considerations to avoid scandal to the government and, finally, that a judicial inquiry be immediately ordered into the entire operations of the UIC with full powers to bring out all details of corruption and to make recommendations for reforming the commission.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMMIGRATION

PROPOSAL TO GRANT LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS TO STEVEN BADGER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity which relates to the attempt of Steven Badger, the Australian swimmer, to obtain landed immigrant status in order to enable him to represent Canada at this summer's Olympic Games. In view of the fact that this exceptional swimmer would strongly boost our nation's much needed chances at the games, and because his application was made from abroad sometime ago, in accordance with the laws, and keeping in mind as well the fact that the minister has granted within the last two years alone over 18,000 ministerial permits to applicants who did not qualify for landed immigrant status, many of them to shady and corrupt characters like General Quang, because the IOC has not as yet approved the so-called commonwealth switch and time is quickly running out, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House instruct the Minister of Immigration to utilize his department's policy in respect to special consideration regarding cases of exceptional merit, under which Steven Badger unquestionably qualifies, and grant him the landed immigrant status which he so desperately needs by May 31 of this year in order to qualify for and strengthen our Olympic team.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the national significance of the large gathering here in Ottawa today of members of the newly formed group of "Canadians for Health Research", comprising representatives of both professional and voluntary health groups as well as other lay organizations, and in view of the recent announcement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare that he intends to increase the budget of the Medical Research Council by only $2 million, thereby leaving it about $4 million short of funds sufficient to continue operation at the same level as last year; I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk):

That this House urge the government to recognize both the need for restraint and the need for medical research by giving immediate reconsideration to funding the Medical Research Council to a level which will maintain its activities on a par with those of the past year.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Then the motion cannot be put.

RESTRUCTURING OF HARBOURS BOARD JEOPARDIZING PORT OF CHURCHILL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of national concern. Last year, a task force was formed by the Ministry of Transport to bring forth recommendations for the restructuring of the National Harbours Board. Bearing in mind that the report of this task force has not, as yet been finalized, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the minister advise this House why certain proposals or recommendations contained in the draft report are now being implemented at a time of year when such restructuring could place the important Churchill shipping season in jeopardy.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented pursuant to Standing Order 43 only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LOCKHEED CONTRACT—AMOUNT OF GOVERNMENT'S LIABILITY TO LOCKHEED

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Since the Lockheed Orion fiasco may already have cost the Canadian taxpayer over $34 million, would the hon. gentleman now table the unsigned contract with Lockheed that got us into this mess?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, of course I find it very difficult to table in the House a document which has no meaning whatsoever. I know that some members of the opposition did refer to documents which have never been tabled in the House. The document in question has not been signed by the parties, and as such it simply does not exist, legally speaking.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Well, Mr. Speaker, the document itself may be meaningless as far as a contract is concerned, but we are interested in the procedures which led the government into this mess. As the minister has told us he was willing to table this contract once it had been signed we are now forced to the conclusion that he has something to hide. In any event, may I ask him this question: Since an array of figures is being thrown around as to how much this affair may have cost us, will the minister tell the House how much money has been spent by the government and what the government liability to the Lockheed Corporation might ultimately be?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has doubts about things which the government might be hiding, I would ask him to be quite intellectual and voice them openly before the public.

In reply to the second part of his question, I would say that our legal commitment, as I have always stated in the House, is restricted to $16 million. Up to now, we have made payments to Lockheed amounting to $10,800,000 for the work performed and we shall examine with the company the consequences of voiding all our contractual bonds with it. Of course, all those figures are subject to audit by government officials.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—NAMES OF PERSONS AUTHORIZING START OF WORK AND EXTENDING OPTION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, may I first reply to the minister as honestly and intellectually as I can. I certainly do doubt him on this matter from start to finish.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKinnon: On December 2 the minister authorized Lockheed to start work on the project, and on April fool's day the minister signed an agreement, which apparently accepted liability for $16 million for work in progress, in order to extend time to find the interim financing. Would the minister tell the House who approved those two decisions, the authorization to start and the acceptance of liability, and were they made on the advice of the President of the Treasury Board, the Minister of National Defence and the LRPA project team?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

REQUEST FOR TABLING ASSESSMENTS OF SOLVENCY OF LOCKHEED

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. General Allan advised the defence committee this morning that the Department of Supply and Services made periodic assessments of the solvency of Lockheed for the LRPA project team. Would the minister table those assessments and tell the House whether they did include any precise analysis of whether Lockheed had the capacity to provide over $300 million of interim financing?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker I have always indicated to the House that the government was determined to deal with Lockheed because, it its opinion, this company did not present as enormous a risk as the opposition tried to make believe.

We had access to information which Lockheed considers to be confidential and it is not my business to reveal information which is indeed exclusively Lockheed's. However, if the company wishes to make public these financial arrangements while we are negotiating or later on, it is up to them.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON GOVERNMENT UNAWARE OF UNDERSTANDING WITH UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES COMPANY WOULD NOT BORROW

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. The Minister of Defence told the defence committee on March 23 that Lockheed did not reveal that they had an understanding with the United States government and U.S. banks that they would not borrow any further moneys. I would like the minister to tell the House why the government did not know that in any case, as it was public knowledge and must have been made available to those who supposedly assessed Lockheed's financial status.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I cannot respond because I do not know to what the first part of the question, or the whole of that question, refers. I will have to ask the hon. member to repeat it.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I repeat my question. The Minister of Defence told the defence committee on March 23 that Lockheed did not reveal that they had an understanding with the United States government and U.S. banks that they would not borrow any further moneys. I would like the minister to tell the House why the government did not know that in any case, as it was public knowledge and must have been made available to those who supposedly assessed Lockheed's financial status.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I will have to return to the record of that meeting before I can reply to the question. I will take it as notice.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENT TO EXTEND OPTION—POSSIBILITY OF LEGAL ADVICE PRIOR TO SIGNING AGREEMENT

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question also is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. I presume that the minister has no objection, by the way, to tabling the option agreement for the renewal, since it is an agreement and there is a clear commitment under it to $16 million. I hope the minister is going to nod his head and agree to table the document, which was obviously signed by both parties. I see he is nodding his head.

An hon. Member: It's a nervous tick.

Mr. Leggatt: It was indicated in the House that the Department of Justice had given legal advise in this matter. Would the minister advise whether he received any legal advice either from justice or from any other source, prior to his commitment to the $16 million, in extending the Lockheed contract for one month? Did he receive any legal advice and, if so, what was that legal advice in terms of Canada's commitment at that point to the Lockheed Corporation?

● (1420)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, throughout the negotiations, and God knows how long and difficult they were, we constantly checked all our actions and decisions with officers from the Department of Justice, that is those who are permanent in my department or those who had been lent by the Department of Justice to my department. Therefore, I can say that, as far as I know, there was no action that was not checked and verified by the Department of Justice, as it must normally be done.

[English]

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will pardon me if I did not quite understand that answer. The question was, did the minister get legal advice that the government was committed to the Lockheed Corporation as a result of the announcement of the agreement in principle which the Minister of National Defence made on November 27? Was there legal advice given to the minister, and was there a legal commitment before he entered into the renewal or the extension of the option with the Lockheed Corporation? That is the question and it is a clear one. It is not a question of verification, it is a question of what was the advice the minister received, and did he follow it? Would you respond to that question, please?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member refers to an action taken by the Department of National Defence on November 27, I do not know then why this question is directed to me.

[English]

Mr. Leggatt: I will try to get the second language down a little better, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps then I can get through to the minister.

An hon. Member: Get the first language down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Leggatt: The first language, agreed. My final supplementary question is this. Prior to the letter that was sent on December 2 authorizing the Lockheed Corporation to proceed with work, which followed the November 27 announcement of the agreement in principle, did the minister receive any legal advice at that point, and did he check with the Treasury Board prior to sending out that letter or that communication as to the availability of funds from the government for that contract?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Finally, the question is more precise, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

On December 2, a telex, equivalent to a letter of intent and signed by myself, was sent to Lockheed indicating our intent to sign a contract with them, if ever they met certain conditions, which was done in fact. It is from that moment, according to the lawyers of the Department of Justice, that we had a contractual link with Lockheed. This authorization of course was the result of a decision by the Treasury Board and the Department of National Defence.

ATTITUDE OF PRODUCERS TO NEW DAIRY POLICY—ALLEGED REQUEST OF UPA FOR RESIGNATION OF THREE COMMISSIONERS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Following the announcement of the new dairy policy for 1976, did the minister receive any reactions, positive or negative, either from the industrial milk producers unions or the executive of the Federation of Industrial Milk Producers of Quebec, or the Agricultural Producers' Union? If so, what was the minister's response?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have received reactions from them to the effect that they are not satisfied with the program. This was not unexpected. The only answer I could give them was to confirm that I had received the representations and they would be considered.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I want to put a supplementary question.

The minister confirms that the policy announced by his government is unsatisfactory for producers, according to their reactions. Given this situation, can the minister tell the House if the producers' grievances are founded and legitimate and, therefore, if he is going to act to serve both the producers' and the consumers' interests, or if he intends simply to leave things as they are now?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, much of the problem in Quebec is the same as in other provinces. It is within the responsibility of their own marketing boards to iron out some of their problems. It is they who set the market share quota system and decide what the supply of milk shall be. We tried to tell them last June and last September that they were producing away more than the market could possibly absorb. They did not pay much attention to us. They increased it. So all we can do is make the rules known to them, show them that we mean business, and that we cannot afford to spend government money and they cannot afford to produce a product for which there is no market, as I said yesterday and will say again.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a final supplementary question.

Can the Minister of Agriculture tell the House whether he has received from the Agricultural Producers' Union a letter demanding the resignation of three commissioners of the Canadian Dairy Commission, and if he has received such a request, whether he intends to comply with it?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I have received this type of request, I believe from the UPA, but I do not remember whether it is for all three commissioners. I do not feel that all three commissioners are totally responsible for the present condition of the industrial milk supply. I think they have to recognize they are as responsible as the dairy commissioners of Canada because the dairy commissioners of Canada recognized the problem, tried to tell them what problem they were getting into and so on, and they paid little attention to it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EFFECT OF CANCELLING PURCHASE OF "ORION" ON NATO MEETING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the statements coming out of Oslo this morning and the headlines in both Ottawa newspapers this afternoon which I am sure the minister has read stating that the face of the Secretary General of NATO turned white and his jaw dropped when he heard the news about the Orion this morning, can the minister give me, as the person representing us on the military committee of the NATO parliamentary meeting which will be held next week in Brussels, some good news about tanks or anything at all—I will accept anything—that I can pass on to this meeting to try to counteract the simply terrible news that broke on the NATO ministerial meeting at Oslo this morning?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to know that the Secretary-General of NATO feels that Canada's contribution to NATO is so important that our decision would have that effect on him. But also, Mr. Speaker, I should make very clear to the House and to the country that the government's policy has not changed.

An hon. Member: What policy?

Mr. Hees: That is the trouble.

Mr. Richardson: The government is committed to support NATO. We are going to stay in the anti-submarine role. We would in any event have been fulfilling our anti-submarine role with the Argus fleet for the next four years. We will certainly be doing that. There will be no change. The only thing we may change is the type of equipment we may use to replace the Argus in the early eighties.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, if the minister would take the trouble to attend any of these NATO meetings he would know what our NATO partners think about our contribution to NATO. It is not a very nice opinion I can assure him and anyone else who attends these meetings will back me up on that. I would ask the minister this: Does he really believe that a vague, general non-answer such as he gave me is anything to change the opinion of our NATO allies as to the kind of contribution that we have made, are making, and intend to make in the future?

● (1430)

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say first of all that I have attended all NATO defence ministers' meetings in recent years and I think many more than the hon. member. In fact, I am not certain that he ever attended any.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: But of more importance is the government's over-all policy of re-equiping the Canadian armed forces, which is reflected in the fact that the defence budget is up by $400 million this year over last year, and the new equipment purchases are up 34 per cent over last year,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Richardson: —and all this does not include the major expenditures which are in an advanced planning stage, for the purchase of tanks and of general purpose armoured vehicles. Our over-all policy of re-equiping the forces is proceeding, our commitment to the anti-submarine program is continuing, and the only change that this decision will bring about is that we would do that with possibly different equipment than originally planned.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, if the minister would take the trouble to find out who it is that represents this parliament at the parliamentary meetings of NATO, he would know I have been there on quite a number of occasions.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hees: Does the minister not realize that when you let your equipment run down as low as this government has let our NATO equipment run down, it takes a great deal more than he is doing to bring it up to even a close approach to what it was when it started 25 years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY

ALLEGED DECISION TO CLOSE RCA RESEARCH LABORATORY IN MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the guidelines for the conduct of foreign controlled businesses operating in Canada as set out by the then minister of industry, trade and commerce in July of 1975, and in view of the fact that Radio Corporation of America has decided to rationalize its north American manufacturing and control it from New York, resulting in the closing of the RCA research laboratory in Montreal in contravention of the new principles of international business conduct to which I referred, does the minister plan to take action to ensure that RCA observes the government's guidelines and so reverse this totally irresponsible decision?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the chief executive officer and other officers of RCA called on me late last week and indicated their intention to undertake what would have to be described as substantial corporate structural changes. I expressed my disappointment over what was being planned.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: You had a long face.

Mr. Jamieson: Whatever I may have in this House I do not think any hon. member looking at me can feel I would ever have a long face. I have a round one. In any event, we undertook to have further consultations and I asked them for considerably more detail as to what their intentions are and as to whether or not they will in fact be breaching what has been described as good behaviour guidelines. I will report to the hon. member in the House later on those meetings.

CHURCHILL—REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF PORT MANAGER

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The port of Churchill is considered a remote port because of its mid-Canada location. The port's remoteness demands on the spot decisions by an experienced port manager during its 88 day grain shipping season. Will the minister take immediate action to have the present port manager reinstated so that this port can carry on with one of its most important grain shipping seasons in the history of the port without further delay or restructing?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, although I do appreciate the hon. member's complimentary remarks about the record season which will be accomplished in Churchill this year. I can also assure the hon. member that there will be adequate management but a new man.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister. I certainly cannot agree with his remarks. I feel that this port is now being placed in jeopardy with the changing of the port manager and the restructuring. Will the minister assure us at this time that there will be a port manager in Churchill within the next ten days to get the season underway?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the port of Churchill has been given a great deal of attention. The chairman of the National Harbours Board in fact visited the port himself in the last week and is giving personal attention to make sure that the port is indeed effective in its operations.

ENERGY

REQUEST MINISTER ADJUDICATE DISPUTE BETWEEN QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND OVER CHURCHILL FALLS POWER—REFERENCE TO ENERGY BOARD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Today in the Newfoundland legislature Premier Moores has announced that unless Quebec were able to provide an agreement with Newfoundland by May 31 on the recall of 800 megawatts of power up to 1982 from the Churchill Falls agreement there would be recourse to whatever legal means the province has at its disposal. Is the minister prepared to adjudicate the dispute between the two provinces to avoid what could be a very serious confrontation, or at best is he prepared to instruct the National Energy Board to refuse to provide the province of Quebec with any more export licences to sell their surplus Churchill Falls power to New York state?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain that it is the role of a federal minister to adjudicate a dispute between two provinces. However, if the two provinces came to me and said, "We want to see whether we can work out an arrangement which would solve our separate problems", and perhaps assist in some way the Maritime provinces as well, I would be delighted to sit down with them.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact that Newfoundland, like its sister Atlantic provinces, will have a very serious energy shortage by 1980 and hence it is absolutely essential that we be able to recall power from Churchill Falls which is now going into the Quebec grid and a lot of it going to ConEd in New York State, may I ask the minister if he is prepared to refer this matter to the National Energy Board to reassess the whole export licence program that has been given to Quebec to sell this power to New York?

Mr. Gillespie: I think that the matter is now before the National Energy Board. I think there is an application to export by the province of Quebec before the National Energy Board, and undoubtedly the board will take note of the hon. member's representations.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH—PROPOSED FIVE-YEAR FUNDING PROGRAM

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the large and imposing delegation representing the medical research communities across Canada and their associated voluntary associations which made representations to the government today, indicating, first, that the money allocated for medical research in this year's estimate is completely inadequate, and, second, that the $2 million increase announced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on Tuesday will not meet the needs of medical research, can the minister indicate whether further consideration is being given to the needs of medical research for the coming year?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that the Medical Research Council would have been very pleased with our granting another $2 million, which would be a rather significant increase from last year, but of course the government cannot increase its grants to this or any other group in Canada because of the budgetary cutbacks.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: It is interesting that the Minister of National Defence a few minutes ago indicated that there is a $400 million increase for national defence this year and the President of the Treasury Board thinks that medical research should be satisfied and happy with $2 million.

May I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether, in view of the repeated representations by researchers that the government's present stop and go policy for financing medical research destroys not only existing programs and future programs but helps to discourage potential medical researchers from going into the field, the minister can indicate if the government will give some consideration to the proposals made again this year by medical researchers that the government work out a five year funding program for medical researchers so that long range plans can be made?

● (1440)

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the minister indicated at the last meeting of the health committee at which the medical research estimates were considered, he is proposing to look into the question of developing a long-term basis for determining the needs of medical research and the appropriate method of funding. As a matter of fact, the minister is meeting with representatives this afternoon at 3.30. He is looking forward to a discussion and to hearing their views.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMPARISON OF CONTRIBUTIONS OF OPEC COUNTRIES AND CANADA TO COMMON FUND ESTABLISHED AT UNCTAD CONFERENCE

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, since the Secretary of State for External Affairs is absent, I would like to ask a question of his parliamentary secretary, if her voice has improved. Following the question of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) yesterday about the UNCTAD conference and an alleged participation by the OPEC countries, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to indicate whether she is aware that the OPEC countries made a commitment to the common fund for the buffer stocks. If so, how does this commitment compare with the one Canada has made so far?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity of using my improved voice to correct what I said yesterday to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville and point out that during the UNCTAD IV conference in Nairobi the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) said that we were prepared to look favourably into the idea of a common fund. As for what the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville said about the contribution of the OPEC nations, I must say today that, as far as we know, these nations have not made any commitment to the common fund and that Canada did clearly announce its financial participation to a common fund for tin.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED INTERVENTION OF SOLICITOR GENERAL TO HAVE MR. MARCHAND'S DRIVER'S LICENCE RESTORED—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Will the minister explain to the House the basis for his communications to the National Parole Board on behalf of his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, which led to the lifting of the minister's driving suspension five and a half month's early?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I explained in the Justice Committee this morning, I made no such representations to the National Parole Board. The Minister of the Environment asked me if there was any procedure to have a licence suspension revoked. I said there was. He asked me for the criteria and the procedure, and I merely asked the Parole Board to send that procedure to the minister, which in fact was done.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Allmand: I never knew that he made any application under that procedure, nor did I know that the board had been seized of it or that a decision was made until I read about it this morning.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN SOLICITOR GENERAL AND PAROLE BOARD RELATING TO RESTORATION OF MR. MARCHAND'S DRIVER'S LICENCE

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Will the Solicitor General table all documents and copies of correspondence in his possession relating to this entire matter in order that justice will not only be done, but will be seen to be done?

Mr. Trudeau: Why don't you put your gumshoes on? Why don't you hire a private investigator?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Why don't you slide down a bannister?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): I have no correspondence or documents in this case. I received merely a document with the procedure and the criteria on it, which I thought would have been sent directly to the minister, but it was sent to my office to be given to him. However, the file is in the hands of the National Parole Board. That is an independent quasi-judicial body. The hon. member would have to ask the board for any correspondence or material. I have no right to interfere.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Would the Prime Minister advise the House what circumstances led to his unprecedented visit to the Supreme Court of Canada, and what was the purpose of it?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: How about church?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure that if the Prime Minister is left to answer that question by himself, he will be quite able to do so.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was invited.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to ask a question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. However, I see that the case of the disappearing minister is with us again, and I will reserve my question until he is back.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF CONFLICTING STATEMENTS ON NUCLEAR AGREEMENT WITH INDIA—ROLE OF MR. HEAD

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated in the House on Tuesday that Canada, in its negotiations with India, had never varied from the position that all nuclear facilities originating in Canada must be safeguarded but that last night the Indian foreign minister stated that his government understood that the safeguard in question had been settled and that India had a binding agreement with Canada, will the Prime Minister indicate whether Mr. Head, when he was in New Delhi last March, exceeded his authority when negotiating that agreement with India?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the document which was initialled by our officials in India was an ad referendum agreement and is not binding on any government. That is a well known technique following discussions. Canada has done everything possible to upgrade the safeguards in India, and in trying to conclude an agreement Canada was not able to reach the levels she wanted.

NUCLEAR AGREEMENT WITH INDIA—POSSIBILITY CABINET REVERSED EARLIER DECISION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister or for a responsible minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Ask somebody else, then.

Mr. Lawrence: If in initialling the agreement Mr. Head was within the instructions given to him by the government, is it not a valid conclusion that the cabinet reversed itself on this matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for standing in front of a lady.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He said a responsible minister.

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I probably expressed myself badly earlier. I said that the officials of the government had initialled, and not signed, an ad referendum agreement. That is not an agreement. It is a document called "ad referendum agreement", and so there was no reversal of any cabinet decision whatsoever. The cabinet decision followed a study of that particular document.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REFUSAL OF STORES TO CASH BONUS COUPONS—POSSIBLE FALSE ADVERTISING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is the minister aware that many people, often senior citizens, find it impossible to cash in on bonus coupons which are enclosed in many food products, and does the minister consider this a form of false advertising?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of the question. Several acts, both provincial and federal, cover the whole area of misleading advertising. I think at best this could be described as immoral if not illegal. Obviously, there is no obligation on the retailer to accept the provisions of a coupon in a package. I think the specific law which is most appropriate is in Quebec where a coupon can be exchanged for equivalent cash, and we are presently looking at our own legislation to see if this would be a helpful amendment.

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS CONCERNING INVESTIGATION OF FRAUD

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration as a result of questions asked by the hon. member for Leeds regarding the investigation which was allegedly carried on by the RCMP regarding dummy companies and frauds. The minister is reported to have stated outside the House that the investigation revealed more than an ordinary problem and that he considers this to be a serious situation because of its size. That answer implies that the RCMP was involved. Yet today, according to this afternoon's Ottawa Journal, Sergeant Gordon Butt, temporary head of the RCMP's commercial crime section at "A" division said the force was dealing with only one fraud charge involving a minimal amount of money. Actually, they were surprised about the extent of this investigation. Is the minister now in a position to indicate to the House how this discrepancy has come about, and can he clear the air?

● (1450)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Hamilton West might begin by asking a question of the hon. member for Leeds. My comments of yesterday, and particularly one report which I have seen by Canadian Press suggesting that I said this could amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars, were inaccurately portrayed. It could amount to thousands of dollars and that, indeed, is serious. I could not take lightly the possibility of fraud with regard to unemployment insurance or any other matter. I do not think there is anything wrong with my saying it is serious. It is under investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and I am told that the investigation was undertaken at the instigation of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, which did a preliminary investigation and decided the police should be called in to conduct the investigation.

As for the scope of the investigation and further details on it, I believe it is not proper for me to reveal what I know about it in the House until the investigation has been completed, and until I have information from the chairman of the commission or an inspector of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to that effect.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATION UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION NOT CO-OPERATING WITH FORCE IN INVESTIGATION OF FRAUD

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it has also been alleged that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is not co-operating with the RCMP and not releasing documents in order that the RCMP can go through with its investigation. I ask the Solicitor General, has this matter been brought to his attention and is it true that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is stonewalling the activities of the RCMP with respect to this needed investigation?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the commissioner of the RCMP was with me this morning, appearing before the justice committee, and he said that is a lot of nonsense.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGATIONS OF FRAUD—POSSIBILITY THAT LOOPHOLES IN THE ACT NEED CLOSING

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the minister indicated that this is a most important matter and has said that it is more than an ordinary problem, can he say what kind of problem he faces at this time, the size of the problem and whether his investigation to date has revealed a significant loophole in the act which requires closing?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would think the question of fraud involves more than an ordinary problem. We hear from time to time in this House and outside accusations regarding the misuse and abuse of the act. These involve individuals who may fail to meet their obligations under the act, but these are often exaggerated. But fraud is entirely different. If the hon. member implies that I am stretching my imagination or the facts, and indicating that my attitude to fraud is not serious, then he and I are in complete disagreement.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

POSSIBILITY OF INVOLVEMENT IN ASSISTING NORANDA MINES DEVELOPMENT IN CHILI—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On April 14 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government, directly or indirectly, through the Export Development Corporation was assisting or proposing to assist Noranda Mines Limited or any of its subsidiaries in developing a copper mine and smelter at Andocollo, Chile. The minister seemed not to know the answer, or did not give a clear answer. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe directed a similar question to the minister's parliamentary secretary yesterday or the day before, I forget which. Is the minister now able to tell the House if the Export Development Corporation is in any way involved in this Noranda project in Chile.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was only advised of the question of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe yesterday, as I arrived back just before the question period, and have not had a chance to look into it. I think the hon. member's question repeats the basic query of yesterday. I have asked for a detailed explanation. I simply had an oral statement given to me as I came into the House and learned that, to the best of our knowledge, there is no such activity. I shall be pleased to get more specific information and reply to the hon. member later.

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBILITY OF ADMITTING LEBANESE REFUGEES IN CYPRUS INTO CANADA

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the fact that Canadian immigration officers accredited with the government of Cyprus are now residing in Tel Aviv, Israel, could the minister tell the House what special steps his department has already taken or intends to take to promote the admission into Canada of the many Lebanese who found refuge in Cyprus and would no doubt appreciate the hospitality of a country with french as one of its official languages? Furthermore, could he say whether his department is in contact with the Quebec Department of Immigration about that potential French-speaking immigration?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have had a communication with the Hon. Lise Bacon, Quebec Minister of Immigration, about this matter and will be meeting the minister early next week to discuss it further with her.

With regard to measures taken in the tragic situation in Lebanon, we have, to the degree we can and recognizing the difficulty of having facilities operating in Beirut, in those particularly difficult circumstances, expedited the processing of applications from Lebanese, with particular emphasis on those who have relatives in Canada. Relatives of people of Lebanese citizenship who are in Canada now and who are sponsorable or nominatable and meet the criteria, we are proceeding to land in Canada under the order in council authority I have in the circumstances. Lebanese visitors to Canada who do not have relatives here are being permitted to stay beyond their ordinary period of time and not being asked to return to Lebanon until the situation clarifies itself. We are indeed, going further than that, and looking at the possibility of establishing auxiliary facilities in Cyprus, which is about a 20 minute flight away I am told, from Lebanon, in order to meet this emergency situation. Indeed, any Lebanese people wishing to apply to come to Canada, who can get out of the dangerous situation in Lebanon and go to a third country of any kind, can make application and we will expedite the procedure within the general criteria I have mentioned.

WORK PERMITS FOR LEBANESE STUDENTS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, may I say that I think most of us welcome the special arrangements the minister announced. I wish to ask about another area of concern. It has been brought to my attention that many students from Lebanon who are unable to get help from home will require help. I hope the minister can arrange for them to obtain work permits this summer, so that they can augment their finances.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to add to what I said previously. I missed the point the hon. member raised. We are permitting the allocation of work permits, except in the most extraordinary circumstances of which I cannot at the moment give any examples, to students or other Lebanese visitors who are not sponsorable or nominatable but who have stayed in this country. We are not asking them to return to Lebanon. If they can find work, we will give them visas.

FISHERIES

AGREEMENT BETWEEN SOVIET UNION AND CANADA CONCERNING FISHING RIGHTS IN 200-MILE ZONE—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I will direct my question to the Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries. I gave him notice of the question which I feel is of great importance to the people of Atlantic Canada. Have Canada and the Soviet Union signed an agreement covering fishing rights over a 200-mile limit; and if so, what are the particular terms of reference? Finally, since many species are now fished below the sustainable yield level, what species will be classed as surplus to Canada's needs, with permission being granted to the Soviets to catch those fish under special licences?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I know the agreement was signed between the USSR and Canada. I also know that it was agreed that Canada would determine the allocation of surplus fish stocks in Canada. Finally, I know there has been a decrease in the population of ground fish but it is obvious that we will then take into account the situation of fisheries within the 200 miles, if ever they should be accepted.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF WORLD CLASS AND OLYMPIC ATHLETES

Mr. Speaker: I know hon. members will want to join me in calling attention to the presence in our gallery of a distinguished and extraordinary group of Canadians, all of whom have been honoured by being invited to Ottawa today to a reception with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Their achievement is that they are holders of medals in world class or Olympic competition. Those Canadians who qualified and are in the gallery at present include, if I am not mistaken, Kathy Kreiner, Toller Cranston, Susan Nattrass, John Primrose, Ken Bate, Gaétan Boucher, Sylvia Burka, Cathy Priestner, Nancy Garapick, Anne Jardin, Cindy Nicholas, Sylvie Fortier, Carol Stuart, Laura Wilkin and Patricia Messner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1500)

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I will try to make my point of order without in any way attempting to deprecate the hardworking parliamentary assistants to the ministers, and especially the abilities of the lady member in question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: However, when a member in this House asks a question that can only be within the knowledge of a member of the ministry, directly relating to a cabinet affair only, and the member who is asking the question makes that apparent at the very beginning, surely it makes a sham and a façade of the question period if we cannot receive an answer from a responsible minister of the Crown. In attempting to do so, Mr. Speaker, you, in your discretion, cut us off without giving permission to ask a supplementary question, which would have made that readily apparent.

Certainly, a parliamentary assistant does not, or ought not—if they do, they are in breach of the oath of secrecy—to have information that can be available only in relation to a cabinet decision or what led up to a cabinet decision.

My point of order is this. When a member asking a question makes it quite apparent that it has to be answered by a member of the ministry, and I am not talking about a routine question that perhaps a parliamentary assistant can answer, then surely the privilege of the member of the ministry is to either give an answer or say nothing. However, we should not be sloughed off by a parliamentary assistant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The position of the Chair is quite clear on this subject. This is not the first time it has been raised. As far as the Chair is concerned, perhaps not as far as other members are concerned, one of the early and more memorable decisions, personally, was to refuse to permit parliamentary secretaries the opportunity to put questions in the question period. I have taken that decision because I hold that parliamentary secretaries who ought to be, or seek to be clothed with the responsibility of answering questions on behalf of their ministers, ought not to be able to have it both ways, both to ask and to answer questions. If I refuse them the right to ask questions because they have the obligation or the right to answer them, surely I am being consistent, and I would not now be able to say that a parliamentary secretary ought not to have the capacity to answer questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Presence in Gallery

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, as I gave you notice of it in writing yesterday. It arises from the publication in the Globe and Mail of May 19, 1976 of a report of the meeting of the House Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates held on the morning of May 18. I had to postpone this matter until today, Mr. Speaker, because I had difficulty obtaining the report.

In my opinion, the matter I am raising closely affects the privileges of all members of the House. I would like to quote a first excerpt from the article emanating from the Canadian Press and published in the Globe and Mail to put the question in its proper perspective. The Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates was considering Bill C-81, an Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act with respect to the escalation of certain payments thereunder. The main witness was the President of the Treasury Board, the hon. Jean Chrétien. The article in question is entitled:

[English]

NDP scores cheap political points

Despite grumbles, MPs back pay freeze plan

Je cite:

Mr. Chrétien said the public has little idea of the amount of work an MP must do. Many work from early morning until after the Commons closes at 10.30 p.m. he said.

The Commons sits from 2 p.m., three days a week. There are rarely more than a handful of MPs in the House during evening sittings.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this last paragraph is the basis for a prima facie case of privilege and concerns this institution as a whole.

[Translation]

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I think that the Canadian Press reporter who wrote this article deliberately and maliciously tried to deceive the Canadian public by clearly giving the impression, first that the House of Commons sits only three days a week and, second, that only a handful of hon. members take part in the numerous activities of this institution. This kind of article from a press agency deemed to be responsible is an attack on our institution. The article is an attack on the intelligence of Canadians who ask for and require objective and complete information.

I could speak several minutes on the many activities of this House, of the committees, on constituency and party work, etc. In fact, all hon. members are familiar with these facts. This makes the kind of journalism mentioned above all the more odious and offensive. The lack of objectivity showed by some members of the press gallery—not by all, I must admit—is so obvious and I think that the few reporters who maliciously cast a slur on the integrity of the House of Commons and on hon. members' participation in the business of this institution should be required to explain themselves before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. One more minute, Mr. Speaker, to raise an aspect of the question which concerns me personally. In the same article of the Globe and Mail, one can read:

[English]

Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria) said he would support the bill—

Presence in Gallery

Most of his constituents support an increase in allowance for MPs he said. Although he has received "two letters from ding-dongs" against an increase, the majority support better pay benefits, he said.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that is another example of malicious or irresponsible reporting. Here is what I actually said, and I quote from the text given to me by the committee's clerk:

As far as I am concerned, I sold to my constituents the principle that we had established last year. The vast majority supported what the Parliament of Canada did. They understand the importance of a good renumeration for MPs. Except for two naive types who wrote me anonymous letters, I am pleased to report that the vast majority of my voters supported our decision.

On the one hand, you have my words: I mentioned that two naive types wrote me anonymous letters, on the other hand, you have an article in the Globe and Mail which translates my words by "Two letters from ding-dongs".

Mr. Speaker, there is a difference which should not be overlooked. The newspaperman failed to mention that the letters were unsigned, which changes the whole matter entirely, and does not mean, incidently, that I did not receive any signed correspondence. Furthermore I wish to emphasize that "naive types" cannot be translated by "ding-dongs".

Therefore my statement was seriously if not maliciously distorted. The reporter and the press agency which show such a blatant disregard for professional ethics and display such shamelessness towards the public that they consider gullible, ought to be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to support their stand.

[English]

It is time this House dealt with the accredited fiction writers in the press gallery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Corbin: To use the words of an eminent member of the press gallery, Richard Gwynn, "The press needs critics, it is getting just too smug."

[Translation]

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne):

That this matter be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for consideration.

● (1510)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question raised by the hon. member for Victoria-Madawaska is a very important one, and if I were to hold that a prima facie case existed and that the matter ought to be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections it would obviously be a very popular decision. But the difficulty is that, in my opinion, it would not be consistent with the precedents which have guided us in this House for a very long time and which were strengthened only recently by the extensive work of the committee on privileges of the British House with particular reference to the rights of journalists where a contest is exhibited between those who write about parliament and those who are elected to it. In my opinion, wherever possible the decision ought to come down in favour of the freedom of those who write about parliament to say almost at will what they wish about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: There has really never been an occasion on which an hon. member has been deprived of the opportunity, when there is a grievance of this sort, to air that grievance. Whether or not it constitutes strictly a question of privilege, there has never been a time when the hon. member concerned did not have the opportunity to raise the question, to air his grievance and to make it well known, as the hon. member for Victoria-Madawaska has done today. Other members who might have wished to take part in the discussion could have done so.

However, it will remain my view that a fundamental right is involved here equal, at least, if not greater, than the special privileges which surround the rights of members, who really ought to claim privilege only if their opportunity to operate as members of the House of Commons is actually interfered with. Certainly, the right to comment and express to the public what takes place here is an aspect of the freedom of the press which is one of the fundamental rights of our society and one which ought not to be interfered with, in my view, unless it is in fact in contempt of this institution.

The expressions of opinion put forward by the author in this case have been commented upon forcefully and, I would say, most ably by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria whose statement met with the general approval of the members of the House. He put his case extremely well and I do not think any further action by the House is needed to put it in its proper context. He has been congratulated by other hon. members and, in my opinion, deservedly. But I feel that in the interest of the public who, after all, have a very large stake in what takes place here, and in the interests of the freedom of the press, the matter ought not to go any further.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Today, during the question period, Your Honour recognized me for the purpose of asking a question. I had mentioned to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that I would be asking a question on the Steve Badger case. I thought this was especially appropriate in view of the fact that there were representatives of Canada's Olympics team in the gallery. Noting that the minister had left the House for a few minutes, I took the usual course of action, having informed him I would be asking the question before, and asked that my question be deferred until later in the question period. I know other members of the House have taken a similar course of action, and while Your Honour might say, I know, that other members were standing at three o'clock, I wonder whether, in view of the circumstances which prevailed, I might be allowed to ask my question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Provencher does, indeed, have a point well taken and a rather special case. There was great pressure during the question period today and, regrettably, only a very small number of questioners were able to be recognized. I did, in fact, recognize the hon.

member and he indicated he hoped to reserve his question until later. However, there was a lot of pressure as we got close to three o'clock. I do not know whether the House would want to give its consent to the hon. member putting his question now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR EARLY DECISION ON APPLICATION OF STEVEN BADGER FOR LANDED-IMMIGRANT STATUS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thank hon. members for their indulgence. I should like to remind the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that in a recent ruling by the department concerning Mr. Steve Badger, a student at the University of Manitoba, Mr. Badger was denied landed-immigrant status. As the minister knows, Steve Badger is a world class swimmer who wants to swim for Canada in the 1976 Olympics. In order to achieve his dream, he applied to the immigration department two years ago for landed-immigrant status. In view of the fact that in the last two years the minister has averaged over 18,000 ministerial orders in favour of people who did not qualify for landed-immigrant status, would he give an assurance that if Steve Badger made an application at a Canadian immigration office outside Canada, it would be accepted? In view of the fact that he has been offered many jobs by various swimming organizations, could not a speedy decision be made on his behalf in order that he might swim for Canada, as is the desire of many Canadians?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Unfortunately, there are a few misunderstandings about this situation. Steven Badger is a renowned swimmer. He is a student from Australia taking his studies in Canada. He was admitted as a visitor to Canada on a student visa. He did indeed apply—I am not aware it was two years ago—in September of 1975 from San Francisco, and because he is a student and does not have the necessary certification and other qualifications he was not granted entry.

The real point is this. It is not a question of Mr. Badger being a landed immigrant. It is the ruling of the Olympic committee, who have so advised me, that he must be a citizen of Canada, and to grant him landed-immigrant status, which might be possible, although questionable under the circumstances, does not satisfy that condition. The Citizenship Act, which is administered by my colleague, the Secretary of State, still requires five years of residence in Canada as a condition of becoming a citizen. Even if Bill C-20 receives royal assent within a short time, it will take three years.

That is the first confusion. The second is this. I understand from press reports only that there has been a suggestion that the Olympic committee itself, within its own jurisdiction, has found a possible ruling within its own regulations which women permit what they call a Commonwealth switch. Mr. Badger is, in fact, a citizen of Australia, a member of the Commonwealth, and possibly he could swim for Canada under that banner. But that aspect has nothing whatever to do with immigration or, indeed, citizenship. It is really a matter in the hands of the international Olympic committee. I do not even want to dwell on the propriety of making a visitor an instant landed-immigrant or Canadian citizen for the purpose of winning a gold medal for Canada. That is another matter. I do not even have to address myself to that question because the other situation prevails as I have described.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the acting House leader whether he would take the House into his confidence with respect to the business for the balance of the week? Possibly, in view of the fact that the budget is coming down next Tuesday, he might also indicate what we might be doing in the House next week.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to do so. Today, of course, is an opposition day and we shall be dealing with vote No. 1—agriculture. Tomorrow will also be an opposition day and the nature of the subject to be discussed will be made later on this afternoon in the usual way; we shall then be taken into the confidence of the opposition.

With reference to next week, Monday, of course, is a holiday, and on Tuesday we shall be dealing with Bill C-84 until the budget declaration at eight o'clock. On Wednesday we shall revert to Bill C-84. Thursday is the first day which has been set aside as a day to debate the budget. We shall proceed with the budget debate on Wednesday and Thursday, June 2 and 3, with the first vote on the budget at 5.45 p.m. on June 2. We shall proceed again with the budget debate on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of the following week, June 8, 9 and 10, with votes at 9.45 on June 8 and at 9.45 on June 10.

I might indicate to the House that it is the wish of the government to proceed with Bill C-84 with all due dispatch, that extra time could be made available in the hope that perhaps the opposition would agree in the near future to an extension of the ordinary hours so we can dispose of second reading, refer the bill to committee and then report back, so we might commence our summer recess at a convenient time.

Royal Assent

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising from a question asked earlier of the Minister of Supply and Services. I might say that I do appreciate his waiting in the House for my point of order; I know he has a commitment.

I did ask the minister whether he would be willing to table, not the unsigned contract with the Lockheed corporation but the renewal agreement for the option that extended the deal for a month. Obviously, this was a document signed both by the government and the Lockheed corporation. In the course of my question I indicated that the minister had agreed to do so by a nod of the head, but some of my colleagues think that I might have misinterpreted the minister. Therefore, would the minister clarify whether he was nodding his head up and down to that particular question, or was it sideways?

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I will use word of mouth, which will make the matter clear. Effectively, there is a document called a letter of agreement, dated March 31, 1976, which constitutes authorization of payment. I will be ready to table this document and the articles of a negotiated draft contract referred to in the letter of agreement when the translation is completed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding two unanswered questions on the order paper. The first is No. 3,359 which asks for details of any government business dealings with William Teron Associates, William Teron Limited, Mr. Teron personally or any other company with which he has had any connection, and what public funds are involved. I point out that this question first of all disappeared from the order paper entirely. This disappearance was, so-called, justified by an inaccurate reference to Beauchesne. I discussed the matter with the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council and subsequently also with the President of the Privy Council, and the question was reinstated on the order paper. Six months have gone by and it has not been answered, and I think I have a very valid reason for rising and asking why not.

The second question I should like to refer to, No. 3,520, asks a very simple question. It asks for the name of the person from the Prime Minister's office who gave instructions that the Canadian television network would not be allowed to film furniture in cabinet ministers' offices even though certain cabinet ministers had agreed to allow this to be done. I think it is a valid question because the Canadian people have the right to know what they are paying for.

● (1530)

An hon. Member: It's a stupid question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: You may think it is stupid, but I can tell you that the Canadian people do not think it is.

An hon. Member: You just go back to sleep.

Mr. Cossitt: I would conclude by saying this: if it is a matter of giving us the name of who did this, it should not take six months; It could be answered in 24 hours. Having regard to the first question I raised about William Teron, I do not like to think or suggest this, but I am beginning to wonder whether the reason it is not answered is Mr. Teron's well-known connection with the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister's office.

SUPPLY

ALLOTED DAY S.O. 58—AGRICULTURE

House in committee of the whole for consideration and disposal of an item of the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1977—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

[English]

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $35,451,000 be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1977 (less the amount voted in interim supply) as follows:

Vote 1—Administration—Program expenditures and contributions, $35,451,000.

The Chairman: Order, please. Before calling upon hon. members perhaps I should at this time bring to the attention of the committee the problem we have had on previous occasions. Members will be aware that we have experienced some difficulty on similar occasions when the committee of the whole has been examining the estimates during consideration of supply, specifically as to the length of speeches and the time allocation for the asking of questions.

After analysing past practices and taking into account the changes in the rules, I have concluded that in the past, when considering supply, time was not limited and members could not really complain about the allotment of time on an individual basis, but that this practice should not apply to a one-day consideration of supply, as is the case today. In view of this, I feel that perhaps this is a good time to consider the matter in the hope of preventing any difficulty arising during the consideration of the estimates today. I feel that the committee should either come to some kind of unanimous agreement on the agreed procedure in respect of time allocation, or accept the proposal the Chair is prepared to put forward. The suggestion is that speeches be limited to 20 minutes and that we alternate from the opposition side to the government side. When a member directs questions to the minister, the time required for the answer should be included in the allotted time unless it appears to the Chair that the answer is unduly lengthy.

In addition, I would suggest that a second intervention should not be accepted before the first round of speeches or questions, and that hon. members be recognized when they seek the floor by standing in the House or by giving some other indication of a desire to participate in the debate, perhaps in the form of some notice to the Chair. I am ready to receive an indication of the feelings or the points of view of hon. members in respect of this matter.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think the procedure you outlined is perhaps as good as any, using the 20-minute limit which would include questions and answers, if I interpreted you correctly, as I hope I have, with members being recognized on a rotation basis around the chamber. I think we should try that procedure. I hope it will work and that it will not lead to a breakdown such as has occurred in recent memory and experience. Speaking for the official opposition, I think, in any event, your suggestion is worth a try.

[Mr. Cossitt.]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Chairman, perhaps you have indicated what your intentions are in relation to the question I wish to ask, but I did not hear as I was not listening. What I am concerned about is whether there is to be a regular apportionment of time as between members of the government side and the opposition side. I should like to know what sort of division Your Honour would be ready to make in that regard, so there is some understanding at this time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the point raised by the hon. member is a valid one. I would not suggest that because this is an opposition day, the opposition should be allowed to ask all the questions. I would not suggest that, sir, but I would think it not unfair if you apply your mind in your usual judicial manner to ensure that the fact that what is an opposition day under our rules is not defeated in the allocation of time. It is not possible for you to allocate time in a mathematical way, but I am sure you will bear in mind that this is an opposition motion. If some difficulty develops, I am sure there will be a protest; but I hope that will not be the case.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I think this is a matter that at some time in the future should be referred back to the committee on procedure and organization. In the past we have run into considerable difficulty that I do not think was anticipated. It has been suggested many times in the past that when an opposition day is used to discuss the estimates, the proceedings should be considered more in terms of an opposition day than in terms of the normal consideration of the estimates.

It is my understanding, from the way the motion is set out, that there is to be a vote on the item at the end of our consideration. The item of the estimates was not originally spelled out, but I presume the vote will be on Item No. 1. This raises an additional problem. These estimates are still before the committee on Agriculture. They have not been withdrawn from that committee and I think it is, therefore, inappropriate to call for a vote on an item which really is not back in the House.

The procedure we should follow is the procedure we follow on an opposition day, with the 20-minute rule being applied. This is not the practice during the usual consideration of estimates in the House. In that case when we are considering an item hon. members' remarks must be directed to that one item, whether it is administration or something else, and all the questioning must be in respect of that item until consideration has been completed, and then we move on to another item. If we were to bring this item back to the House, then we would not be following that procedure. These estimates, as such, may be the basis for discussion on an opposition day, but the estimates themselves are not back in the House. I disagree that we are in a position to handle them in the way indicated in our Standing Orders by the motion before us today. I think Your Honour would have to come to the conclusion that we must handle them as a subject for an opposition day, and that in effect the estimates are before us only in that sense and are not here in the sense that a vote can be taken under this section, because they are still in the committee. I think that is the way it should be.

● (1540)

The way this has been set down on the order paper, as an opposition day, I think will lead to some confusion. Some of that confusion, Mr. Chairman, you have already indicated. I believe the matter should be referred for consideration at a future date and that you, Mr. Chairman, could refer it to the committee for further study and consideration of a more appropriate way to bring the estimates before the House through the procedure of an opposition day without, in fact, having the actual estimates recommitted to the House from the committee, and a vote taken.

Other members may disagree and would like to see them handled in this way, but if we do so we really would not be following the procedure of taking the estimates out of the committee and putting them back in the House. Therefore, I think the suggestion that we vote on them tonight is totally improper.

The Chairman: Order, please. Before I recognize the parliamentary secretary, perhaps I should clarify a couple of points raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming. In his remarks, the hon. member referred to the fact that the way the notice appears on the order paper, the vote itself is not indicated. Perhaps the hon. member was not paying attention when I put the question to the committee. I went further than the notice which appears on the order paper and indicated that vote 1 was an administration vote for program expenditures and contributions in the amount of $35,451,000. So we have the complete vote. This falls, properly, under Standing Order 58. It states that opposition days can be used for the consideration of any items in the main or supplementary estimates in committee of the whole. This means that the opposition, by giving notice of its desire to bring that item before the committee, is momentarily withdrawing that item from the committee to which it had been referred and is bringing it to the House for this day. The committee will have to make a decision at 9.45 tonight on that item and the committee will report back to the House afterwards.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make the points you have made. The hon. member for Timiskaming is concerned about the range of the debate. He need not be concerned about that, because it is the practice to have the questioning very wide-ranging. My concern, basically, is about what I raised initially. While I feel the opposition may have an argument relating to having some slight preference in respect of the number of speakers, I think if they were given the whole debate it might be a very dull day. I think there ought to be some allowance in view of the fact that Your Honour seems to be going to the usual procedure in the standing committee of allowing all parties to make contributions and to question the minister.

In respect of allocation of time, while I do not think there should be military precision, I am sure everyone is interested in fairness, justice and equity. I understand that the minister may wish to make an opening statement which, again, would be in accord with the usual practice followed in our standing committees with regard to estimates or other matters. Then questions could more effectively be put to the minister after the questioners have heard his statement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I think all members want to get started on the consideration of this vote, but may I say to those who are afraid that by dealing with this matter today they will not have the right to continue in the committee, that they are protected in that regard by Standing Order 58(15A), which states that even though an item has been dealt with here in this House, consideration of that subject matter is still before the standing committee.

The Chairman: Order, please. Perhaps I should reassure hon. members that as a general rule I interpret that I have the acceptance of the committee that the Chair should have sufficient leeway to use its best judgment. Maybe before I satisfy myself on that point I should clarify one particular point which has presented some difficulty in the past. The parliamentary secretary raised the point concerning the possibility of the minister making an opening statement. I think that has already been done in the committee. If we were to follow the past practice on opposition days, the minister might feel that it would be better if he heard at least one speaker from each party before making his intervention, so that he would be in a position to present further argument rather than repeating the statement he may have made before the committee.

The second point I wish to make is that if an hon. member speaks for 20 minutes and the minister, in replying to the questions raised in that speech, should exceed 20 minutes, that 20-minute time allocation would be taken away from the government members. While the minister may speak more than once and may have the facility to intervene more often than other members, if he answers questions for more than the 20-minute time limit, whether he is answering a direct question from a member of the government or a member of the opposition, that time will be taken from that private member. If the minister, after his speech, wishes to get up and answer each speech, then there would not be any time left for government members to intervene. So I feel the committee should, after a first round from the opposition, go to government members. I think that would be fair to all hon. members on both sides. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Chairman, I have one concern I should like to express. As the chairman of the standing committee, I must advise you, Mr. Chairman, that we had reached a certain agreement with regard to that committee and the conduct in the committee concerning questioning. In fact, because of the general administrative vote that was put down, there was to be an opportunity in that committee for substantial leeway with regard to the examination of the minister before, in fact, the item was returned to the House by way of report next week. I am seriously concerned that in the event there were a vote this evening in respect of vote No. 1, this general nature type of questioning to which all members of the committee had agreed might not be able to occur next week.

● (1550)

I should like to have some general understanding that in fact that would not be precluded in committee when the matters are returned.

The Chairman: Order, please. My interpretation is that the estimates are temporarily withdrawn from the committee and do not in any way reflect on the rights of any member of the committee. When one of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture is brought in front of the House, it does not preclude or restrict any right of hon. members in the committee.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, as usual, it is not unusual to see government members opposite more interested in arguing procedural matters than in focusing their attention on the Department of Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, the decision of my party to call back the estimates of the Department of Agriculture for further examination and debate was taken for a number of important and very legitimate reasons. It will demonstrate and reinforce our request for a greater opportunity to question departmental estimates than is now possible under our present parliamentary rules and procedures. It will demonstrate, if not to hon. members opposite, then to the nation, at large and to the agricultural community in particular, that we in this party are prepared to advance the importance of agriculture. We are anxious to remove agriculture from the wings and shadows where it now receives only the attention of lip service, perhaps the occasional bill, and just maybe a Friday afternoon in this chamber. Today's action will demonstrate the real concern, from this side of the House at least, that my colleagues and I possess for assurance that moneys appropriated by this department, and indeed others, are fully utilized for purposes producing maximum benefits.

I might suggest at this point that in this respect, generally speaking, this has not been a major problem in the Department of Agriculture. What we do question, however, is whether agriculture has been appropriated its just entitlement in relation to other expenditures of this government, and in this regard we are inclined to think seriously that it has not. One recent and prime example is the government's new dairy policy. Reductions and cutbacks resulted in every province, some to the extent of 20 per cent. Lower incomes and the creation of severe financial troubles for all dairy producers, and the probable collapse of some new and young producers, appear to be the ultimate result of this new policy.

In view of the recent frustration and dissatisfaction among Quebec producers, I think my friend from that province will agree that if funds had not been reduced, or could have been reduced on a more gradual basis, or if an effort could have been made to match supply with domestic requirements over a longer period of time, fewer hardships would have occurred. Personally speaking, I would not be at all surprised if a shortfall in product occurs toward the latter part of this calendar or dairy year—all of this while consumer prices continue to be high.

I want at this point in the debate to draw the attention of my colleagues to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of Saturday, May 8, 1976. The headline reads: "Government Pins Survival Hope on Food Policy", and the first sentence reads as follows:

The Trudeau government is busily trying to save itself from drowning in increasingly stormy political waters.

The article goes on to mention that heavy emphasis will be placed on reducing food prices. Mr. Chairman, whenever food prices are reduced for various reasons, experience has shown that primary producers have absorbed the greatest percentage of those reductions. It is indicated that the key department in the quiet development of a cohesive food policy is not the Department of Agriculture but, rather, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The reasons, believe it or not, are said to be jurisdiction and, of all things, personality. If these reports are correct, and if this government needs a food policy, then I submit its proper place of origin and development is within the Department of Agriculture, with an input, naturally, from other concerned departments. The present and future livelihood of producers is totally dependent on a fair and equitable policy and their advice and counsel on any such venture is imperative. When I hear that policy papers are now in preparation for cabinet consideration, and in light of the government's past record of confrontation rather than open discussion and co-operation, I fear for the future of the agricultural industry.

It is unfortunate that because of the lack of action in certain areas, the cow-calf and dairy people for example, the lack of proper border protection for vegetable growers in the Fraser Valley, to name another and seemingly deliberate action to create division between producers and consumers, feelings are hardened and the confidence and understanding between these two groups is eroded.

The ongoing and highly publicized blow-by-blow battle between the Minister of Agriculture and the former chairperson of the Food Prices Review Board has instilled anger and, in many cases, distrust between producers and consumers. This feud personality conflict and running feud has served no useful purpose whatsoever. On the contrary, it has dismantled to a large extent the efforts of many service clubs in the country who, by a continuing series of special events, strive to bring rural and urban people together.

I continue to be completely amazed and utterly baffled by some people's reluctance to place problems in their proper perspective. When the dairy policy was announced, displeasure and objections flowed from both producers and consumers. Let me take a minute to compare briefly just how both groups are affected by this policy. The average producer could lose 15 per cent of his income to begin with. In addition, he will receive nearly 25 cents less for every 100 pounds of milk he produces. With a daily production of 1,000 pounds, a dairy loss of $2.50 results, or a total loss of approximately $900 for the year, not even taking into account the percentage of reduction in milk subsidy quota.

At the same time, butter has increased by approximately 5 cents a pound. With the annual per capita consumption running at 12 pounds, this means an increase of 60 cents for the entire 12-month period to purchase the same amount of the product. What we are left with is $900 less for the producer, compared to 60 cents more for the consumer—and bear in mind that dairy producers themselves purchase higher volumes of butter than do average consumers.

It is of vital interest, in the long-term interest of all Canadians, that every possible effort be made to bring together a greater understanding and fuller appreciation of our urban and rural elements of society. On the surface, these two groups appear to work separately and apart from one another, yet in fact nothing could be further from the truth. Each is completely dependent upon the other, tied together by the common bond of necessity. This vital relationship is a prime example of the old adage that "no man is an island unto himself."

If you will allow me, Mr. Chairman, I would like to shift the emphasis of debate to the income and capital gains tax structure which, because of its many inequities, places an undue hardship on many of our agricultural producers. It is my intention to expand on a couple of the more outstanding examples of inequity at this time. I would like to join the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, the Joint Dairy Breeders Association, and the Ontario Milk Marketing Board, to name but a few interested and concerned organizations in supporting the adoption of the principle of replacement at full value of animals ordered to be slaughtered due to contagious diseases. Furthermore, I believe it is now necessary to seek changes in the taxation treatment of the compensation. Entire herds of cattle may be lost on such occasions. Already, in the past year, cattlemen have had to suffer through outbreaks of both brucellosis, in eastern Ontario particularly, and blue tongue disease in B.C., perhaps spreading eastward. The present system, whereby compensation received in a given year is fully taxable in that year, is clearly inadequate and unacceptable to those involved. I suggest that where compensation is paid there should be no taxation on the proceeds, at least until such time as the quarantine has been lifted and the producer has had a reasonable chance to reconstitute his operation with a clean bill of health or has had the opportunity to restock his herd.

What I am saying is that there should be provision for the livestock operator to maintain intact the receipts from the forced disposal until such time as he has had an adequate opportunity to re-establish his livestock or cattle operation. In such situations, the immediate cash flow problem caused by this catastrophe is of vital importance and I think it is time that this fact received the support of the Minister of Agriculture and the recognition of the Minister of Finance and, hopefully, that recognition will become evident next Tuesday, May 25.

In the past, the government has taken the position that by using a year of low or negative income to balance more favourable years by income averaging, the producer is not subject to undue hardship or financial loss. I suggest, however, that the present averaging provision is only of secondary importance. It must be recognized that the problem of forced slaughter has taken on new dimensions in the past year as the numbers of these distasteful occurences have increased. Cattlemen are worried at the prospect of losing all or part of their valuable herds, and they are concerned and disappointed that the income tax provisions regarding compensation discriminates against them.

The government has always pointed to the relatively low incidence of total herd depopulation in Canada as justification for rejecting previous representations for a better taxation deal on compensation. During the fiscal year 1974-75, 105 herds were depopulated. During the following fiscal year, 1975-76, an additional 120 herds were ordered depopulated. The rate of forced depopulation is expected to continue its rise during the next few years, and over and above that the extent of blue tongue infection creates another real danger.

What is also on the increase is the total number of cattle which are subject to forced slaughter. The loss of any significant number of cattle can be just as demoralizing and equally as enduring, financially, as the loss of a complete herd. As of February 5, 1976, figures indicate that some 864 herds of cattle were under quarantine in Canada, and this confirms that at least one, and possibly several animals in each herd, was ordered slaughtered. In the ten-month period ending January 31, 1976, a total of 16,332 cattle were led to forced slaughter. Some would have us believe that this is an insignificant problem. Indeed, the magnitude of the difficulty need not be the guiding factor in assessing the need for a change in the provision for taxation of compensation. On a strictly individual basis, the small operator can be as badly hurt by the loss of a few high quality cattle as the larger breeder can by a more substantial loss in terms of numbers. There are those in the agricultural industry who believe that compensation payments should be totally exempt from taxation. We in the official opposition will be content to settle for the deferral of payments, for we feel that this request is fair and right and that any excuse offered by the government to sidetrack this request can only be looked upon with scorn and indignation.

Farm organizations are unanimous in supporting the request for a tax change on compensation payments, and it is fair to say that health of animals officials are also sympathetic to representations on this matter and support the seeking of more reasonable tax treatment in this area. I would like to lend my support to proposals made recently by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture on the subject of capital gains tax. The present federal regulations clearly discriminate against the transfer of family-owned farms when they are incorporated, organized in partnership or in other types of family organization. As this discrimination seriously threatens the transfer of such farms to succeeding generations, the federation proposes that the rules for transferring farms to succeeding generations be the same regardless of the type of organization, as long as they are family-owned.

The government could well consider, too, exemption from capital gains tax of income received from land sold by a farmer or a family-owned corporation where the money is reinvested in another farm within a period not exceeding two years. An opportunity may arise for a farmer to sell one farm and buy another in the case of a more efficient operation. In many cases the farmer does not take advantage of this opportunity because of the present capital gains tax regulations. Since money received from expropriated farmland is not subject to capital gains if reinvested within two years, it would seem appropriate that a voluntary sale should be excluded from this tax as well.

Having supported these resolutions adopted by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, I would like to take this opportunity to expand my arguments on the former resolution. The intergenerational transfer of farmland from an individual farmer to his children, and the inequitable tax laws which apply to that, has been a source of ire to farmers for many years. No doubt the Minister of Finance is aware of this difficulty as representations have been made in the past on this vital issue. The minister's predecessor was called upon to deal with this problem on several occasions, and on each of those occasions he was successful in frustrating the legitimate aspirations of farmers and the farm community.

While admitting that this is, indeed, a complex problem, particularly because what is required is an extension of the roll-over provision to family farm partnerships and corporations, I do not think it is quite as complex as the department would have us believe. The position has always been, simply, that nothing can be done as the issue is too complex to be solved by government, and that the loss of treasury money would be too great because the same provisions would then have to be granted to the small business community. I cannot accept such a negative explanation. While I am not of the opinion that it would be harmful to extend the roll-over provision to family businesses other than farming, I do not believe it is necessary to deal with the two as if they were identical cases when in fact they are not.

However, let us examine the problem from the farmer's point of view. That view is substantially the same as it was on February 18, 1975, when the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain spoke so eloquently and so accurately about the plight of the farm wife and her outrage at income tax time. It is well known that because of the shortage of available labour farmers often cannot secure people to work on their farms. With equipment as expensive as it is, the only way they can keep things going is to find a responsible person to look after that equipment, and that responsible person is inevitably the farm wife. The wife may spend long hours driving a truck, running a tractor, operating a grain loader, running combines, loading bins, planting crops, milking cows, and quite often keeping books—and for this the wife is unable to collect wages and the farmer can make no claim for this on his income tax.

The only way that women or children who work on family farms can be entitled to payment is if they incorporate. If this is done, they pay lower taxes on the first $100,000 and pay their legitimate labour fees on the farm, but there is a catch in that because if they pass the farm on to the next generation, they then lose the tax-free provision in that section. It is grossly unfair and particularly insensitive of this government not to allow these people to have the advantages of incorporation without penalizing them by taking away the advantage of being able to pass the farm on to the next generation.

I am pretty certain that my time has expired, and I appreciate that. I have a number of other items to cover, but I am certain I can utilize the budget debate to do so. I would not want to jeopardize my hon. colleagues and, in fairness, hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Wise.]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity which has been afforded to us today by the hon. member for Elgin in bringing forward the subjects covered under the agricultural estimates. I have kept in touch with events in my area and programs affecting the milk industry and I know that dairy farmers, like all Canadian farmers, favour a marketing system which will be conducive to stability of production.

● (1610)

Farmers like to think of themselves as free enterprisers, whether they are engaged in the field of beef, pork or egg production, the production of broilers or the production of milk and products related to it. When things are going well, they like to think of themselves as free enterprisers. When things do not go so well, they behave like other businessmen and turn to the government for help. Then they do not behave as free enterprisers but as producers afflicted with difficulties over which they have no control. This was true in the case of butter producers. Acting paternalistically, the government tried to solve the difficulty by establishing a floor price and bringing in surplus production at the floor price. But that did not satisfy producers because the price seldom went above the floor price. What was envisaged as the minimum price too often became the maximum price. For many years the government bought surplus dairy products and accumulated large stocks. This has happened in other areas of farm production. It has happened with regard to cereal grains and other commodities not covered by the stabilization legislation.

Over the years we have tried to give the agricultural producer the sort of security which is given to the industrial worker by a guaranteed or minimum wage. We set up the Canadian Dairy Commission which was to oversee matters of marketing and production and match production to national requirements. A number of provincial agencies entered the field as well. I have followed with interest the discussions in the last few weeks taking place in the agricultural committee between the representatives of various provincial marketing agencies and the minister and his officials. The provincial people put forward the provincial point of view and the minister and his officials tried to justify the marketing system which has been established. Mr. Chairman, the system has not worked, for reasons outlined by the hon. member for Elgin. Under our system we tried to meet national requirements. Unfortunately, we more than met them. The farming community over-reacted to demand and, using capital available from both federal and provincial sources, overproduced. Unfortunately, estimates of total milk demand in Canada proved to be excessive and producers were forced to reduce production. The result was disaster, as many young farmers can testify.

The hon. member for Elgin raised another point. Was the minister's decision that there was global demand in this country for 100 million cwt of milk based on the opinion of experts? Did he really have the benefit of expert opinion, or of an opinion which would allow him legitimately to arrive at that figure? Further, was that the proper figure to consider? Not long ago I talked to a prominent milk producer who, as representative of his local milk committee, discussed the minister's program with several hundred farmers. He described the minister's program and talked about provincial input. I attended that executive meeting and told him to explain the program, but not to try to sell it. I explained that there was some difference between the Ontario Milk Marketing Board and the federal agency and that he should not try to sell the minister's program but merely explain it. He was asked this question, "What is your personal opinion about this program?" He said, "My personal opinion is, disregard it. Don't be too worried about the problem because it is my personal opinion, having been in the business 40 years, that we have cut back on production so fast that there will be a shortage by September." He may be wrong, but I am inclined to believe he will be right. In one month we cut back production in Canada by 15 per cent. After being ahead in February by 30 per cent over last year's production, we cut back production in one month by 15 per cent.

I do not know if hon. members pay attention to the number of milk cows coming on the market. In my community you will normally find, around this time of year, between 15 and 20 dried-up milk cows on the market. In the last two or three weeks we have seen between 100 and 125 milk cows being offered on the market for slaughter. One result has been that the local co-ops have sold less feed supplement for milk cows. I say that we have cut back too rapidly, and this more than anything else may bring the Canadian Dairy Commission into disrepute as a national marketing agency. Frankly, I do not think the Canadian Dairy Commission is capable of gauging the entire market. In that area of activity it is probably weakest. I am justified in saying this because in the last few months the consumption of fluid milk has risen by about 5 per cent. Why it went up, I do not know. Perhaps people quit drinking tea; perhaps the increased price of beer may be a factor.

An hon. Member: Perhaps people quit drinking water.

Mr. Peters: I do not know why consumption went up, but the consumption of fluid milk rose by 5 per cent. This growth in the consumption of fluid milk, as hon. members from Quebec know, creates difficulties for industrial milk producers since surplus fluid milk is used for industrial production. Clearly, the increased consumption of fluid milk will have ramifications in other parts of the milk industry. It is quite possible that milk consumption across this country will increase by 10 per cent.

This brings me back to my previous point. Why are milk cows now being offered on the market for slaughter? Many of them could have been sold two years ago, but were not because the market was depressed. Prices were rock-bottom for slaughter cattle. Consequently, they were held back. Hay and grain supplies were plentiful, and conditions for holding back were ideal. Farmers kept their cows so long as they had room for them. Probably they milked them. There has been no significant culling out of cattle for about two years; but now this is happening and there will be a considerable drop in production.

I am concerned because the minister does not give a damn whether his radical and short-range programs upset the market almost month by month. Last year the Ontario Milk Marketing Board was very upset. They held a number of conferences—one at Geneva—where they dealt with the minister's intervention into their market with his subsidy payments. He intervened in that market on the basis of once every three months. No notice was given that there would be a change in the subsidy program. When the minister intervened he changed the whole structure of the dairy industry. It is a very complex industry and a change in any part of it can make a very considerable difference.

To be fair to the minister, there was another large intervention in the whole structure. The Prime Minister went to Europe. I think it was for a trip which he could well have afforded, rather than going for the purpose of interfering with the industrial development of this nation. He could have gone on his own, like the rest of us. The Prime Minister visited a number of Common Market countries where he was wined and dined and talked about a contractual link. It sounded as though it were monkey-pod trees or something similar which would have no effect on them. However, they found out that in return for that contractual link the Prime Minister promised that Canada would buy 10 per cent of our dairy requirements from the European Common Market. To again be fair to the Minister of Agriculture, he must have put up a real battle because this was changed to 5 per cent. However, 5 per cent will have quite an effect on the dairy industry. If we go to 10 per cent, it will be an additional strain on the industry.

The area to which the 5 per cent applies is mostly cheese. There is a small amount of other dairy products. I suggest that the bleeding hearts working on behalf of Mrs. Plumptre look at what these imported cheeses are costing the Canadian consumer rather than making their idiotic suggestions. I am sure they would be surprised. You can walk into a Bank Street store here in Ottawa and purchase imported cheese from 30 or 40 countries, some of which costs $4 a pound. It probably has no more food value than Canadian cheddar which should sell for a considerably lower price than it now does.

Over the years, cheese factories in Plum Hollow and other places have not been able to get enough milk. There is a cheese factory in Belleville with 40 or 50 vats. It could run on two shifts and probably handle half the surplus milk in the industrial field in eastern Ontario. However, it is not in operation. I presume someone bought and closed it. I understand that someone wanted to buy this factory. He was told by the Ontario Milk Marketing Board that they could not guarantee him a regular supply of milk. If he could not get the milk, he could not get the loan. If he could not get the loan, he could not buy the plant. Obviously, it is still not in production.

When the government agreed to buy dairy products in the Common Market, this had quite an effect on the dairy industry in Canada. It is safe to say that dairy farmers, who are very large consumers in the industrial field, got very little benefit from any arrangement that would guarantee a 10 per cent commitment by this government. I ask the minister to make every effort to hire research people to make a full study of all facets of the dairy industry. The result of such a study should allow us to predict trends. Kraft carries out this kind of marketing research. They know exactly how much of a particular product they can sell and how high they can push the price before there is a diminishing return. We do not. We just tell the farmers to cut their production 15 per cent.

It is not generally known, but when we had a surplus of milk powder last year which the minister said he could not give away, the government did not pay anything to help get rid of it. The farmer paid for it. Indeed, he paid a heavy price. In fact, I know some producers who only received a return of about $4 a hundred. The minister cut this to where they only get 17 cents a hundred for their surplus milk. Therefore, they have to turn to an alternative operation.

A year ago in my area, day-old calves were selling from $3 to $5. They are now selling from $40 to $72—$72 if they have a white face. Why? The farmer knows it is better to feed the calf for nothing than to dump milk down the drain. There are people in my area, and I know of some in Quebec, who open the tap at the botton of their bulk tanks. They are smart enough to turn off the agitator at night and drain out 300, 400 or 500 gallons. This just goes down the drain. The milk remaining in the tank will be worth more because the butter-fat content increases. Therefore, the price the dairies now pay for butter-fat content is steadily increasing. We must work out the best deal we can to provide as much money as possible out of the consumer dollar for the farmer and still have a good product at a reasonable price.

There is much talk about giving food to other countries. However, the idea of giving food to people in Canada has not been explored. Rather than the farmer pouring milk down the drain, he would be quite happy to give it to those willing to come and get it. That would be better than dumping it, which causes a bad odour in the barnyard. The drain systems were built to handle washwater, not milk. However, the farmer is not allowed to give it away. There are all kinds of regulations to prohibit that. For example, the milk is not pasteurized. In addition, he would run into trouble with the milk marketing board because that would cut into the market.

The minister can do something about this over the long term. If we cannot give away powdered milk to the people of India or Bangladesh because they do not know how to mix it and, if they did, the water would kill them, we could give it to our own people. Most low-income people in this country do not drink enough milk. They do not get the nutrition which our national health agency says is necessary.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, in my turn I wish to take advantage of this unique occasion to address the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), who is now with us, especially with regard to the dairy policy which predominates among the concerns of the eastern producers at this time. Before that policy was announced, the Minister of Agriculture, who was present when one of my motions was being debated, drank milk in the House and, it seems, thought he was being funny doing so. At that time, he promised a fair policy, taking into account all circumstances.

The policy was announced after much negotiation and discussion. Now, the producers must submit to it. I would like to know whether the minister realizes that there is the only category of workers in Canada who have to accept a decrease in income, compared with production or income in 1975, and that this lower income is being imposed by the very federal government which, in the past, through its policy, induced the producers to increase their production and which now inflicts upon them the burden of its short term policy. Can the minister tell the House, at this point in the debate, what his long term policy is with regard to dairy production? That is but one sector, and practically the only one in Canada, where producers depends exclusively from government initiatives, that policy is state controlled in the sense that under it the government can control every pound, from the first to the last. When producers produce too much, the government can use the act to penalize them.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin) rises on a question of privilege or a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Daudlin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I am informed that the officials in front of us have no translation facilities, and this may make it difficult to provide an adequate response to the hon. member when he has completed his remarks. I believe we ought to correct this situation before we proceed.

The Chairman: I do not think this should prevent the hon. member from making his speech. It is a temporary difficulty which we shall correct, but in the meantime I believe the hon. member should continue.

The hon. member for Lotbinière has the floor.

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

To summarize, I will say that dairy production in Canada is now state controlled in that governments have 100 per cent control over it. Producers are completely dependent on governments. We call this subsidized production in the sense that the income of producers depends on the government policy.

There are years when through its agricultural, and particularly its dairy policy, the government invites producers to produce more. The next year, the government says to producers: You produce too much. So we are going to impose quotas. The year after, the government says: Since we have been able to liquidate the surplus, we encourage producers to produce more. We will increase subsidies. We will tighten our controls. The next year, this year, the government says: You, the producers, are responsible, because you have produced too much. The government will accept no blame whatsoever. The minister himself and his parliamentary secretary have said in the House that the government could not do anything about it because we must import. The same minister told producers that they had to make their share of sacrifices because there was surplus production. This is a rather paradoxical situation.

Since the dairy policy was announced, there are over 3,000 industrial milk producers in my riding of Lotbinière. These are not small investments since they amount to $200,000, $300,000, $500,000 and $800,000. The minister keeps saying and recognized today during the question period that this policy had given rise to many reactions, generally from people who are opposed to it. He confirmed that he received a request for the resignation of the three commissioners who sit on the board. This is an indication of a deep and very serious dissatisfaction. Is the minister aware of this situation? While his department's estimates are being considered, can he tell us if himself, his parliamentary secretary or his experts have a recipe to give us this afternoon, so that we might send it to our producers to show them how to pay their debts for which this government is responsible, because of its dairy policy?

Can the minister answer 30 or 40 complaints I have received for a week from farmers of my region who are about to put their farm up for auction, simply because they would give up farming. Mr. Chairman, this is a dramatic situation. The livelihood of these producers, the food of our people are at stake, a whole health system and marketing of our domestic production. Can the minister tell us where his interests lie? Do they lie in the import of cheddar and other milk by-products? Is he really the minister of Canadian producers so that he will assist them?

Is the minister in a position today to tell us whether when he is in the west he says the same things as in the east of the country? Mr. Chairman, we are Canadians or we are not. The minister says this to the western producers at some occasions: We have too much wheat, slow down your production and to this effect, here are subsidies to stop seeding; and in the east, the same minister not only imposes a ceiling but in addition to this he imposes a very hard penalty on those who produced too much. They produced too much because the government, with its short term policy, led them to organize themselves better.

I remember that since I have been sitting in this house, I heard this minister and his predecessor say that it is important to have a modern, well equipped agriculture and that milk producers should modernize their equipment, that they should put their herds under ROP control, that they should go into debt. That is what they did, Mr. Speaker. And now those people are penalized because they work. Can the minister advise the House this afternoon on the following matters: First, what suggestion has he to offer so that producers may live with this new policy? Can he tell them how to defer their payments to the farm credit union and on their instalments on farm machinery? Has he any answer? If so, Mr. Chairman, the debate is closed. If not, we must infer that the minister is wilfully accepting to let producers disappear because he has chosen to let the big get bigger and the small ones vanish.

Mr. Chairman, agriculture will never be viable in Canada if there is a policy for big producers which overlooks small ones. When I say "small ones" this may mean in some hon. members' minds a very small farmer with a couple of cows, but to me it means milk producers with $200,000, $300,000, $400,000 or $500,000 investments and who are now being penalized. To be honest, I must concede that the government is not the only one to blame. There are labour leaders at that level who have not been really honest with the producers and who did not always serve the cause of farm producers. Mr. Chairman, the minister is aware of that.

There is also that famous problem of two kinds of production—whole milk and industrial milk. There is also that problem, namely passing the buck at the provincial and federal levels depending on circumstances, depending on whether it suits Ottawa and Quebec to get out of a discussion, some dialogue or some question period. I am quite aware of that, Mr. Chairman. I think the time has come to stop passing the buck between Ottawa and Quebec, to stop passing the buck to unions also by saying, well, integrate your production of natural and industrial milk. Let us have a policy of extensive consultation and a long term policy. That is what producers want to know.

At present, Mr. Chairman, they are not overly worried about prices but they would like to know indeed what they will be faced with tomorrow morning. I could read to this minister this afternoon 30 to 40 letters of protest by people who are utterly confused, no longer have any hope for tomorrow working independently on their own farms since they are entirely disadvantaged by that policy.

The Chairman, I hope quite sincerely without any political partisanship that the minister will consider those issues which I may be expressing in violent terms but which reflect exactly the requests of my fellow citizens in Lotbinière who are very concerned—there are thousands of them in my riding—but also those of incalculable producers across Quebec in that situation.

Mr. Chairman, we do not have the right in our conscience as a Parliament and a government to let things go, to impose the dairy policy that was announced belatedly for that matter and, Mr. Chairman, we do not have the right to let that policy be implemented without ensuring an honest living and an equitable income for the number of hours, the work and the investment put in. If not, Mr. Chairman, it will demonstrate once for all that agriculture is not considered important by this government but I am not convinced yet. I wish the minister would tell his views on that matter and again I repeat the question: As long as the minister will be there, will he continue to deceive us by using short term policies from year to year or will he agree some day to give us a long term policy?

Mr. Chairman, I remind the House that last year, that same minister announced with a great fanfare a supposedly extraordinary long term policy to deal with that problem once for all. It did not even last a year. It lasted exactly nine months. And then the threat of a false overproduction was revealed by the statistics on foreign products importation and producers began to worry.

We have no right to abandon our fellow citizens in such a situation when they made so many efforts, sacrifices and investments. Not many Canadians work so hard, so intensively with so many hours of work than dairy producers. I do not compare them with other producers but those people have guts and certainly deserve more than a kick in the pants for all their work and their efforts.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, quite a bit has been said about the dairy industry. As I have said before in this House, the hon. member for Elgin is usually very constructive in his suggestions, but I hope he has chastised the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, who I believe is the consumer critic of the official opposition. For he told me in this House that I paid the dairy farmers of Canada too much money. I trust he told the hon. member what he thought about that statement.

I am also wondering, Mr. Chairman, where the hon. member gets his information. One source of his information was the Ottawa Journal. I know they often quote him, but they do not quote me very often. We all know the certain leaning that this Free Press periodical known as the Ottawa Journal has. If the hon. member is getting his information from this worthy—well, I am getting too complimentary of that paper, so I had better behave.

The hon. member also made reference to the somewhat controversial discussions that have been taking place between the former chairman of the Food Prices Review Board and myself. These may have concerned some people, but I think a lot of good has come from them. The people of Canada have never been better informed about food costs, food production, and so on. All during my long career in the public service before I came to this place no one paid very much attention to talk about food, but everyone is concerned about it now.

We conducted an official survey in Canada of what people think about food production, and the majority of the Canadian people think there should be a strong agricultural economy. They believe that what the Minister of Agriculture is saying is enough to prove this. I do not remember hearing the hon. member say this, but I did see a copy of what he was going to say about who is going to be where when we hold the thirty-first parliament. If he really believes that, then I can show him a survey that would kind of scare him, which is an indication of what the people think about what this government is doing about food production, what the government is doing about agriculture generally, and what the people want it to do.

The hon. member has talked about dairy policy. Many people have been saying that I am responsible for getting the government to pay the dairy farmers of Canada too much money, and as a result there is overproduction. Neither of the speakers of the opposition parties was so complimentary to me today; they just gave me a little bit of hell about what I have done or about what I am not doing.

When we talk of the dairy industry, we have to face facts. The agreement we have was heralded by the dairy producers of this country. The dairy farmers of Canada are some of the most efficient in the world. We worked out a policy with them whereby they would agree to participate as partners. They would be responsible for putting surplus products on world markets. We did not force this policy upon them; it was worked out in many meetings and consultations with them, and they agreed to it. In reply to the hon. member for Elgin, there has never been a time in our history, and records will show this, when there has been so much consultation with any group as there has been with the dairy farmers of Canada in trying to work out a stable and satisfactory dairy policy for them.

The hon. member for Timiskaming talked about the Prime Minister going to Europe, trying to establish a contractual link, and the fact that we might possibly import 10 per cent of our cheese from other countries of the world. We do not import cheese just from the European community. We import cheese from 26 countries, I believe it is. How could we possibly manufacture more than 75 per cent? Twenty-five per cent comes in in such small, minute amounts that no producer in Canada would even set up the facilities to process and manufacture that amount because it would not pay. None of our producers would do that, and they have told me this themselves because they could not possibly make it pay.

When we put an import quota on cheese of 50 million pounds, this was heralded by the dairy farmers and processing industry in Canada as a step in the right direction. They said that at least under these circumstances they knew what to plan for. If we banned all cheese imports to Canada we would not get rid of 20 per cent of our surplus. Yet the hon. member suggests this would be a step in the right direction. I do not hesitate to admit that I have not recommended that we ban every bit of imported cheese, because I know we could not manufacture some of this here in Canada. We have negotiations going on at the present time regarding cheese coming into Canada that is subsidized and supported by the country of origin. The United States has been successful in its negotiations. Cheeses that are supported or subsidized to a great extent are not imported into that country any more.

We are condemned for our dairy policy. Many people say we are too restrictive. The United States is more restrictive when it comes to dairy production than we are, yet people point to that country as a great trading nation. We have nothing to feel guilty about when we suggest we should be negotiating with those countries that support or subsidize cheese. I can take you to cheese factories in Ontario and in other parts of Canada that have real salesmen. They conduct tremendous advertising campaigns to sell their products. They have increased their productivity by 22 per cent, and they increased their sales by 22 per cent in 1975. You can check those processing factories that are doing this and you will not find that their sales have gone down. On the contrary, they have increased their sales in Canada to the same extent as the sale of imported cheese has increased.

One man told me last year that he did not know what he would have done had it not been for the mail strike. I asked him what he meant, and he said he could not have filled all his mail orders for cheese packages. He told me the most he had ever shipped in the past was 100,000 packages, and in that year he had shipped 122,000 packages. He has a mail order business and ships cheeses mostly during the Christmas season. This is the sort of thing we are missing the boat on in Canada. We are not selling our cheeses the way we should as compared to other countries. Just look at their ads and their salesmanship, or whatever you want to call it. They conduct sales programs for their products in Canada. They are selling all the cheese that we import here, and they are selling it at a very high price, as the hon. member for Timiskaming suggests. We know the mark-up on cheese in most stores. If someone tells you he is not making any money on butter and he has a cheese counter, just ask him how much he is making on that counter. There is an average of at least a 50 per cent mark-up on cheeses processed in Canada. The same is true in respect of some imported cheese, and the mark-up is less on others.

Hon. members have made out that we do not pay any attention to the problems of dairy farmers. We knew, and they knew, last June that they were in trouble. We brought them in here in the early part of July and told them they had to do something about it. Some hon. members seem to forget what I told them last April when I announced the program for 1975-76. I said at that time I had enough money for a subsidy in respect of 100 million cwt. of milk, and no more. I told them they would have to stick strictly to that program.

An hon. Member: You were 20 per cent too high.

Mr. Whelan: I said I had enough money to support 100 million cwt. of milk.

An hon. Member: That was too high.

Mr. Whelan: When the final payment goes out, we will have paid the subsidy that we said we would pay on 100 million cwt. The producers increased production by over 114 million cwt., and maybe even more when the final figures are tabulated.

Mr. Murta: Your information was wrong.

Mr. Whelan: My information was not wrong. They should not have produced more than the 100 million cwt.

An hon. Member: You shouldn't have said it.

Mr. Whelan: We said that was all we wanted. You know, this is a dream to some of my colleagues in cabinet who always want more production. We asked for 5 per cent more production and we got 15 per cent more.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): If it is white, you say it is black; and if it is black, you say it should be white. You always say it is the reverse.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Minister of Agriculture has the floor.

An hon. Member: You are never wrong.

Mr. Whelan: The Canadian dairy farmers said that was okay. They said we would not have to worry, they would not even increase production by 5 per cent. That is what they told me. I can remember one fellow in Ontario who said, when I got into my biggest problem in respect of the surplus production of, I believe it was eggs, a couple of years ago, that this could never happen in the dairy industry because they had a supply-management system that worked. He was a long-time employee of the Ontario government and I thought, "By God, if he says that, that must be true; it must be factual."

It has been stated here that we have control over this. Every province in this country has a different kind of marketing system for milk. There are no two of them identical. The provinces have incentive programs with no consultation with us at all. They tell the farmers to increase their production. What are we supposed to do about that? I agree with the hon. member when he talks about passing the buck. There should be more control, whether through the Canadian Dairy Commission or a federal government program of some kind. There should be more central control if we are to have any plan or program that will work across this nation in an equitable and fair manner for the industrial milk producer.

You can consider the province of Ontario which has one over-all board marketing 54 per cent fluid milk and 46 per cent industrial, divided between industrial and some cream producers. Then you can go to Quebec where you have two separate organizations, one for fluid producers and one for industrial producers. You can then move to Manitoba where you have complete pooling, with one organization. If 60 per cent of your milk sold is industrial, you get paid for 60 per cent at the industrial rate and 40 per cent at the fluid rate. Actually, it is the other way around, with 60 per cent in Manitoba being fluid milk and 40 per cent industrial milk, and that is the rate they are paid for No. 1 milk shipped in that province. I think there is less controversy and less dissension in Manitoba. I am not saying there is not some, because I know better than that, but there is less problem there than in any other province that has an industrial milk problem. Some provinces do not have much of an industrial milk problem.

Let us check some of the figures in respect of supply. On the basis of a report dated May 5, with 85 per cent total industrial milk in Quebec the supply for April, 1976, was 15 per cent to 20 per cent higher than in April, 1975. In Ontario the supply of industrial milk in April, 1976, was up 15 per cent to 20 per cent over that in April, 1975.

Mr. Peters: But it dropped 15 per cent the month before.

Mr. Whelan: Yes, they had dropped some, that is right. We know that in Canada there were 200,000 dairy cows kept in production one year longer than they should have been. We know these have gone to market. I have met a lot of dairy farmers in Canada, many of whom have told me they made some mistakes. They are ready to share the responsibility for those mistakes, as we are ready to share some of the responsibility. I do not have that bad a time when I meet dairy farmers. Some of them blame me entirely, but the vast majority recognize that they were also at fault and do not blame me.

● (1700)

We told them last year that they should curtail production. They admitted that they were wrong and that their marketing boards should not advise young farmers to get into dairy production unless they had quotas. I think the province of Ontario is doing a very fair thing about quotas. They will distribute them to the young farmers who they think need them the most. It is about time they did that.

The hon. member for Lotbiniere asked whether we are trying to make it easy for all the rich people. That is what they were doing. Those who could afford to pay a high price for milk quotas were buying them. It was brought to my attention, through a letter the other day, that a quota was sold for $16 a pound. An old disc on the farm that had not been used for five or six years sold for $2,000 in the same deal. It would be worth about $12 for scrap. This is how they get around the quota price. So I think the province of Ontario is doing the right thing in trying to rectify the situation that exists.

We talked about brucellosis and some of the other diseases. I could go back to what the hon. member for Timiskaming mentioned about making sure that we get rid of the skim milk powder in our own nation because many people need more protein and more of the minerals that milk contains. There is not denial of that. However, the provinces can do that. Society as a whole can do it. Do not ask the farmers of Canada to do it, because they own that product. We might go to Nova Scotia, that little province on the eastern seaboard.

Every child in school in Nova Scotia gets milk at five cents for eight ounces. That is under a good government down there. I will tell you that their dairy farmers are the highest paid in the world. Plus the subsidy that we pay them, the province pays them $1.50 a hundred on top of that. They have not increased their production too high. They are not self-sufficient in respect of milk supplies. They bring in milk from Quebec. I could show you a very successful farm co-operative in Nova Scotia which has some of the most modern dairy equipment in Canada which, plus that, paid them $1 a hundred dividend on the milk that they put in their area and they supplied the people in the area with some of the lowest priced dairy products in Canada.

If they can do that, and they are doing it, then surely we can solve some of the problems that confront our dairy people. Do not forget, also, that we are subsidizing skim milk powder to the tune of 34 cents a pound for consumption by people from any part of our society. That means that one can buy a pound of skim milk powder for approximately 72 cents. There have been some sales at which it has been sold as a loss-leader for much less. One can make four quarts of skim milk powder, according to our nutritionists, from a pound of skim milk. That works out to 18½ cents a quart. Mr. Chairman, I do not think one can even buy distilled water for that amount of money. That is the cheapest and most nutritious drink we have in this country. Our social services in this country are second to none in the world. So there is no reason that anyone in our society who has to spend nearly $1 for a package of cigarettes cannot spend 70 cents a day for four quarts of milk.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Whelan: I will not take up very much more time. I think there is a great misconception when we hear talk about our getting rid of skim milk powder on the markets of the world. I was happy to hear the member from the New Democratic Party say what he did. He could go right to the city of Windsor, that little old labour town of mine, and say the same thing that he said here about those farmers and what they should get for their milk, and so on. Those are good things to say.

I can tell you that many members of the media are not saying that. They think that because a farmer has a nice dairy farm, and so on, he is among the richest people in society. They must learn that this is a seven-day a week job, that the children work and, as the hon. member for Elgin pointed out, there is also the matter of the treatment of the wives. I should like to touch on that later, if I may. The denatured skim milk powder that we are selling on the world market for animal feed, which cannot be used for human consumption, is a product that deteriorates. Some people think when we talk about skim milk powder that we are talking about grain that can be stored in a farmer's bin on the prairies even without a roof over it. That is not true.

We should be honest about that when we are talking about skim milk powder. We should make sure we know what we are talking about and that we know how it is distributed on the world markets. The skim milk that is distributed on the world markets is not instantized. It is not ready for human consumption. Canadians would not drink it in that form. There is no doubt it is true that it can be used in the baking process, but it cannot be used in the home. There is a cost of about 30 cents a pound just to instantize it. So if you see it sold on the world market at 13 cents or 14 cents, add 30 cents on top of that right away before you talk about using it for human consumption.

The hon. member for Elgin talked about farmers' wives, the taxing problem, and so on. I think we should be realistic. When we changed the tax laws about three or four years ago we allowed a farmer to turn over his farm to his son or daughter without any capital gains tax. They had worked all their lives at building the thing. This was approved by the House. By the way, no other country in the world does this. The Secretary of Agriculture in the United States, when I told him about it, asked me what we are doing. I said that we want to make sure that our farmers remain in agriculture. He said that he would not have a snowball's chance in hell of getting that through the United States Congress. He said he would never know how we ever got that through the parliament in Ottawa. There is not another country doing what we are doing.

The hon. member for Elgin mentioned the forming of a corporation. He said that they could issue shares, and so on, and do this in a very fair manner in the same way it is done by business. The farmers' wife, in that way, could share in the income in a fair fashion. I do not see anything wrong with that, but so far as I am concerned we can only go so far. Agriculture is so different from small business, and so on, that I would find it difficult to promote that kind of a thing, much as I do promote agriculture, because I would have every small businessman in Canada being kind of mad, and I think they would have a legitimate reason.

Other things were said here about the amount of the supply of milk, the eradication of brucellosis in Canada, and the number of cattle we have. In 1950, approximately 9 per cent of our cattle in Canada were infected with brucellosis. In 1956, 4.5 per cent were infected. In 1966, the figure was 2 per cent. That is one of the lowest rates. It is practically the same, but we are not too happy about it.

We maintain that much of the brucellosis problem in Canada today is due to poor housekeeping. Farmers have a certain responsibility in this respect, and they know it.

Very rarely do you find brucellosis in a good farmer's dairy herd because he does not allow neighbours' dogs on his farm, and so on. But some farmers do not want to recognize the fact that they have that responsibility. We believe that the eradication of brucellosis and blue tongue are absolutely necessary to maintain the good health of our herds. We have the most disease-free herds in the world, and we want that to be maintained.

We want to be able to issue health certificates for disease-free animals which were accepted, I believe, in 131 countries of the world. That is a much better state of affairs than can be found in any other country. I think that as members of parliament we should not suggest, for instance, that blue tongue should not be eradicated. We will have to isolate the area in British Columbia where it exists, to make sure that cattle are not shipped out of there, and we are having some difficulty in that respect. Some infected herds have been found there. They have been moved to meadows and pastures up in the highlands of British Columbia, where they will stay until next fall. So we will have to do something more drastic than we have been doing up to now to bring farmers to the realization that this disease must be eradicated.

Mr. Chairman, I have been speaking too long already. I will try to answer questions as they are put to me.

Progress reported.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58

House again in committee of supply to consider a certain item for the year ending March 31, 1977, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 58(9)—Mr. Turner in the chair.

Agriculture

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $35,451,000 be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1977, (less the amount voted in interim supply) as follows:

Vote 1—Administration—program expenditures and contributions, $35,451,000.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Chairman, it should come as no surprise to members of the House that I intend to discuss various aspects of Canada's beef cattle industry. Most of my remarks will relate to the current situation, but it will be necessary to give a brief background and I hope to end with a short-term outlook for our cattle industry as I see it.

Canada's beef cattle industry has just emerged from its most rapid growth cycle in modern times. From the 1968-1969 period our beef cow numbers increased 43 per cent to a total of over 5⅓ million head in 1975. Even with a corresponding drop in dairy cows, in that same period the net composite increase over this seven to eight year cycle was still well over 30 per cent. Presently, Canada's total cattle population is about 15 million head. Over this period we were consistently net importers of cattle and beef, with practically all cattle imports coming from the United States and beef imports from the United States, Australia and New Zealand. Starting last fall with the heavy sale of cows, we are now definitely on the downside of the cycle and our current 1976 calf crop will likely be down by 2 per cent to 4 per cent. However, Canada still has ample supplies of cows, and currently even an oversupply of steers in various stages of growth either on grass or being finished in feed lots. We should not overlook the fact that while in 1975, 900,000 cows were slaughtered, about 300,000 more than in 1974, if we go back to the figures for 1973 and 1974 we find that the numbers were down by approximately 250,000 for each year. So we are only catching up with the average with the heavy slaughter last year.

The last two years have been difficult ones for our Canadian beef cattle industry, and no one can deny that. They have been especially difficult for the cow-calf producers and the feeding side of the total industry. The reasons for these difficulties relate to two basic factors, first, excessively high cattle populations which developed much too quickly and, second, rapidly increasing, and now sustained, high feed grain costs. The problems of our cattle industry were further complicated by some world factors such as drought, feed grain and protein shortages, inflation and realignment of several major currencies. We all made a serious error in assuming that rising beef prices at the consumer and producer levels meant a shortage of cattle on a global basis. I am sure that this was a serious error on the part of many people. But the most serious complication was a series of ill-advised political decisions in both the United States and Canada. I am referring to policies such as Canada's LIFT program, the U.S. control policy which was left on cattle and beef for six weeks after all other controls were lifted, Canada's 7 cent beef subsidy policy, and the several serious and successive retaliatory border control devices employed by both countries.

This government has developed its so-called stabilization approach for various agriculture commodities including the cattle industry, but it is now obvious that stabilization for cattle as provided by Bill C-50 is certainly not the panacea that the minister and some of his cabinet colleagues would like us to believe it is. The current debate on our total cattle industry centres on various provincial income insurance plans, supply-management and the North American market concept, with the government's stabilization proposals being the dominant connecting issue. Over the last 12 months the stop-loss concept of the Minister of Agriculture has been pushed toward a guaranteed income or incentive level approach for our cattle industry by the minister and at least by some provinces. We should not forget what stop-loss is. It is a support price level at 90 per cent of the previous five-year average market price, plus a cost of production index. The minister now seems to be supporting a level above 90 per cent, such as the 100 per cent used in his fed cattle support price of $43.94 for the last 4½ months of 1975. Incidentally, that level turned out to be 26 cents a hundredweight below the actual pay-out average price of $44.20—so there was no pay-out, of course.

The minister has announced that there will be another fed cattle support price for 1976, but he refuses to announce the price and he has hinted that it may not be announced until the end of the year. However, we do know, as a result of my question on the order paper, that the previous five-year average for fed cattle ending December 31, 1975, is $40.60 a hundredweight. Of course, this is not adjusted for a percentage factor or the cost of production factor.

Let us turn to calves and the possibility of a cow-calf stabilization program. In my opinion there are clear indications that there will be no such program. The previous five-year average market price—this is for the last quarter of each year—up to December 31, 1975, is $40.39, again not adjusted for the percentage factor or for the cost of production. The level of $40.39 is the real reason, in my opinion, why the minister will not bring in a calf stabilization plan since the actual average calf price, even with a modest percentage and cost of production increment, would not be politically acceptable to cow-calf producers in Canada today.

There are two additional and important reasons why there will be no cow-calf plan. First of all, there are various calf programs now operating across Canada in six provinces and covering most of Canada's cattle. Second, there is a lack of federal financing and cabinet support for a cow-calf program, especially during this period of restraint. Of course, all these realities are small comfort to cow-calf producers who have operated at less than cost of production over the last year and a half, and I am very much aware of that. If we are honest, we must surely recognize the real reason for the cow-calf mess is the too rapid cow population increase in Canada and the United States over the past seven to eight years and the high cost of feed grains, as I have already pointed out.

● (1720)

However, after a period of political distortion in both Canada and the United States, the free market for cattle is working, and working very well now. The market signals have said loudly and clearly that there are too many cows, and a substantial reduction has already taken place. I pointed out that the 1976 calf crop may be down as much as 4 per cent. The cow population adjustment has been abrupt and rough on some operators, but again, if we are honest, we must admit there were some new producers—and I am not thinking of young producers—who transferred into the cattle industry who should never have become involved.

Should federal moneys be used to bail out or otherwise induce these fringe operators to continue? I think not.

I said the free cattle market system is working and, I might add, so is the North American market. Several weeks ago the minister at a Strathroy, Ontario, meeting made it very clear that he feels that heavy or excessive imports from the United States can only be controlled by supply management for cattle. There were some heavy imports at that time, as high as 8,000 head per week, whereas last week, the last week of record, there were approximately 1,900 slaughter cattle and 1,200 slaughter calves. I suggest the minister at that time only gave one side of the story.

For the week ending May 10, and that is the last week of record, here are the cumulative trade totals with the United States for 1976, that is, from January 1 to May 10. In that period, Canada exported 116,840 head to the United States, and we imported some 60,320 slaughter cattle and another 19,238 slaughter calves for a total of 79,558 imports. For dressed beef in that same period Canada exported 30 million pounds to the United States, and we imported 8.6 million pounds from the United States. This 8.6 million pounds of imports from the U.S.A. is up 1.2 million pounds from the same time-frame a year ago, but the total imports of dressed beef are up some 23 per cent. Most of this, of course, is coming from Australia and New Zealand. The point is that Canada has a very positive trade advantage in both dollars and numbers over the United States. We should not overlook or forget that during the last 4½ months of 1975 the U.S.A. accepted some 100,000 live cows from Canada, a fact which did not go down very well with United States cattlemen but did considerably strengthen our Canadian cow market for the other 800,000 cows which were sold in Canada. The North American cattle and beef market continues to be the only practical, long-term market available to our Canadian industry, regardless of whether we are net importers or net exporters of cattle and beef.

When we are on the net import basis, as we have been for the last seven or eight years, the United States is the only source of live cattle and fresh beef available to us; and when we are on a net export basis, no other country in the world can afford to buy our cattle and beef on an offshore basis, that is, with transportation costs considered. To those of us in the Canadian cattle industry who feel we should move in a supply-management direction or even in a series of provincially-oriented income assurance or price stabilized plans which involve top-loading, I say very emphatically but sincerely that that decision must surely be based on the more basic and fundamental issue of the choice between access to a continued North American market for our cattle and beef, or an inward-oriented—with federal import controls—type of industry which will surely move us toward virtually a giant public utility. That must be our choice, since the United States will certainly move to deny us their market if we choose the price-subsidized route.

We have recently seen how quickly the Americans can move in matters of border retaliation, and we simply cannot win that kind of trade war. As recently as mid-January of this year United States Secretary of Agriculture Butz told a small visiting group of Canadian members of parliament and provincial MLAs that the United States would move quickly and decisively with border restrictions if Canada chose the subsidy route on major agricultural commodities involved in international trade, such as cattle and beef.

The companion policy decision to be made by our Canadian cattle industry must also be whether or not we intend to go all out and produce cattle and beef and seriously compete with the United States, at least in proportion to our cattle numbers, and this means moving to a net export position, or very close to it. The alternative to this is the same alternative to the North American market, which is an internal ultimate supply-management for our cattle industry in Canada. Surely consumers will have a say here, if only through the marketplace, since minimum cost beef can only come from efficient high production which is geared to what I consider to be the best market in the world, the North American market.

In any event, the decision as to which route our Canadian cattle industry takes must surely be made by our own beef cattle industry and not by governments. No one will question the need for governments—especially the federal government—to provide certain guidelines as to animal health, trade matters, etc., but that ultimate decision must be made by cattlemen. I wish to conclude with some specific questions and comments to the Minister of Agriculture and his department, all relating to our cattle industry. These are in series to which I hope the minister might respond a little later.

Why has his department ceased reporting the monitored weighted average price which used to come out monthly in the blue book? Producers are entitled to this, especially if we are to have support prices. I should not have to put questions on the order paper to get this information. Why was Canada's export quota allotment to the United States recently reduced by 4.5 million pounds and an identical increase awarded to Australia and New Zealand by the U.S.A.? Was this protested by our Department of Agriculture and by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce? Is our Canadian cattle and beef still being used as a pawn in trade matters for the ultimate benefit of other industries, such as the auto pact?

The Canadian Cattlemen's Association made a very useful presentation to the Canadian Tariff and Trade Committee as a reference to GATT negotiations. Has this presentation been used in the Tokyo round of discussions, or will it be used? On another trade matter, current offshore imports of beef, that is, from Australia and New Zealand, are being dumped into Canada at price discounts of as much as 15 cents per pound under prices in the United States for the same kind of offshore imports into that country. This has a direct tendency to lower our Canadian cow prices. What about the United States' 10 per cent ad valorem duty on Canadian beef and processed meats, which I consider to be a one-way inequity which has no equivalent on our part in Canada?

I will continue to remind the minister of the need for a Canadian meat import law. In his December 31 press release he as much as promised this item, without using the phrase "meat import law". I urge the minister to read that press release once again, and if the minister again reminds me of his sarcastic comment involving the free traders in the Canadian Cattlemen's Association wanting protection, I will remind him that as long as the U.S.A. employs this device by presidential decree—that is their meat import law—that is reason enough for its use in trade emergencies here in Canada.

• (1730)

Let me return to the stabilization question. Will the minister announce the 1976 support level for fed cattle, now? I know the minister has stated that such an announcement made too early might distort the market, but announcing it late denies the producer of a basic right and information which could establish a more realistic market level for feeder cattle as they relate to finished beef. I say to the minister, let us be frank. A late announcement also permits political manipulation.

Mr. Whelan: We would not do that!

Mr. Hargrave: Will there be a federal cow-calf stabilization plan? If not, say so. Let us have an end to this play on words such as "cattle", "beef" and "cows", etc., words the minister insists on using every time he is questioned. His parliamentary secretary is now doing it, as evident from his response to my colleague from Vegreville in the adjournment debate on May 17. As reported at page 13604 of Hansard the parliamentary secretary said in part:

> Ever since the original 1958 legislation "cattle" has been interpreted to mean slaughter cattle. We continue to consider that the named commodity, cattle, is represented by slaughter cattle.

This is nonsense. By implication the minister and the parliamentary secretary suggest that Bill C-50, which the minister sponsored, does not permit a cow-calf plan. Of course it does, and the minister knows it. I ask him just to answer my question on the subject. If there is not to be such a plan he should say so, and very quickly.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I shall refer to a newspaper article. Last Saturday, May 15, in a Toronto Star feature story on the Minister of Agriculture, the minister was quoted as saying:

> All the farmers want is to be guaranteed—if I'm a productive person, make sure I get a proper return.

I suggest that this is a socialistic philosophy which the majority in the Canadian cattle industry does not accept.

Mr. Whelan: Come, now.

Mr. Hargrave: It represents a direct departure from any semblance of a market dominated by supply and demand. My own personal experience suggests that most productive farmers want the opportunity and freedom to exploit the opportunities of the market.

Mr. Whelan: That's a red herring argument.

Mr. Hargrave: I can personally support the stop-loss concept of Bill C-50 for the cattle industry, but not the toploading provisions with regard to cattle, for the very reasons given in the minister's two amendments on toploading. They relate to regional unfairness and incentives to overproduce.

Suppose a federal cow-calf stabilization program had been in effect for 1975, a program which might have paid out, say, $50 per calf.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, whose allotted time has expired. He may continue if he has the unanimous consent of the committee. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for its courtesy. I shall speak only one or two minutes. I was saying, let us suppose that a federal cow-calf stabilization program had been in effect in 1975 under which $50 per calf might have been paid out. The total cost would have been about $275 million to the public treasury. What would have been the result? I suggest that the downward adjustment in our cow numbers which was so essential would not have occurred at least to the same necessary degree. I also suggest that a payment of $50 per calf would not have been sufficient to help those in trouble, but would have created an atmosphere which would naturally lead producers to expect a continuance of the program year after year. In my opinion the actual market price of calves would have been somewhat lower than the true market level, owing to the effect of the $50 subsidy.

While it is true that the large numbers of steers now in the pipeline will have some pricing problems, by and large the Canadian cattle industry has either resolved or is in the process of resolving, its own problems in a market place which includes the United States market. You can say it was rough justice, that it was swift and sure. At least the cattle industry can now see much better days ahead. And, Mr. Chairman, that is more than can be said for the egg and dairy industries of our country.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, I understand that the committee will be interrupted at 5.45 for Royal Assent. As I am to chair at eight o'clock this evening a committee on Indian affairs, I have little time to make my remarks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't worry, his nibs will be late.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I will not cover the entire ground covered by the hon. member for Medicine Hat; I shall leave that to the Minister of Agriculture who is a wise man. I admit that the hon. member who spoke on behalf of the cattle industry mentioned many good points.

I wish to bring to the attention of the committee a situation which developed in British Columbia, where cattlemen met and voted to adopt the B.C. income assurance program. I think the committee is aware of conditions which had existed in the province, of the difficult times ranchers went through. Many of them were on their knees. We had a poor crop in the area a couple of years ago, cattle prices were low, and some operators were forced to their knees.

I am not speaking of cattlemen who had just established themselves in business. They were not fly-by-night operators, here today and gone tomorrow. Many of them were cattlemen who had been in business 30 or 40 years. Actually some of them were descendants of the people who had displaced my ancestors in that part of the country, so you can see they were solid, good types. Many of those guys survived and were able to carry on as producers in British Columbia only because they became involved in the income assurance program which was introduced in that province. I know some are concerned about abuses connected with the program, and about people becoming overly dependent on such programs. I only say that such programs, if handled and administered properly, can be good. It was a good program and helped many cattlemen in the province to survive.

I want to speak for a few minutes about the disease, blue tongue. I say to the minister that we have discussed this disease in committee, and I emphasize again how concerned British Columbia ranchers are about it. I understand that 49 herds in the southern part of the Okanagan Valley are afflicted with the disease, although I do not know how many animals are actually involved. The situation is serious and concerns many ranchers. I have no qualms about the eradication program and have the highest regard for the health of animals people, the veterinarians involved with that special branch of the Department of Agriculture. They did a good job. The eradication program was necessary. Nothing else could be done, I submit.

Let me enter a note of caution. I am concerned about the possibility of herds in that part of the province being reinfected unless there is a similar eradication program in the state of Washington. The herds on the Canadian side are very close to herds in the state of Washington. In some cases ranch lands are side by side, and herds on both sides of the border are often close to each other. I am told that the infecting insects, known as "no see'em" culicidae, have a very short flying range. However, I really do not buy all of this. I would like to see the minister make great efforts to get the state of Washington and U.S. Secretary of Agriculture Butz to take a long hard look at the program in the state of Washington as it relates to the re-infection of our cattle population in the south of British Columbia.

I wish to get a little more parochial now and a little closer to home and talk about the future of the research station in Kamloops. This station has been doing range management research since about 1936. It is a good station with a good history. It has served the ranching industry of that province very well.

Lately the research staff has diminished to five. Over the years, there have been approximately seven research scientists involved in animal research, soil, range management research, and so on. One problem recently identified as being of high priority for the ranchers is related to deer-cattle competition for range.

On behalf of the ranching industry in British Columbia I ask the minister to take a hard long look at this. Perhaps that has already been done. I know the minister has been looking at it on behalf of the ranchers' advisory committee there. I ask that the two positions at the Kamloops research station be filled so that it can continue as a very valuable station on behalf of the ranching industry of British Columbia.

Another question that is very urgent for the feed grain users of British Columbia is that of feed freight assistance. I know this question is now under reconsideration by the government. However, in the remaining few minutes that I have I want to emphasize that it is a very serious question for the feed grain users of British Columbia.

There are some great inequities. These have been pointed out by the agricultural community of British Columbia as far as the transportation agricultural products are concerned in the province of British Columbia. One question that always comes up is the bringing of feed grains into British Columbia.

I will give an example of why there is concern. Grain for the export market moving between Calgary and Vancouver moves at a rate of about $4 a ton. Feed grains for domestic use move between Calgary and Vancouver at $18 a ton. When you apply the feed freight assistance between those two points, it amounts about to $9.50 a ton. This shows that the concerns of the feed grain users of British Columbia are serious indeed. I hope that in the minister's part of the review in this policy question he will ensure that this program remains, either in its present form or improved. Something must be done to benefit the feed grain users in British Columbia.

One consideration when the policy was announced a few years ago to remove the provincial boundaries for purchasing of feed grains was that some other program would be introduced in order that the situation would be improved in some parts of the country. One suggestion was that more grain be grown in the maritimes. There may be some free land there. I am not sure of the situation. However, that situation does not exist in British Columbia. There may be a few areas in the Okanagan where a bit more feed grain could be grown, but there is just not land available in British Columbia that could be used for growing feed grain. Therefore we are very anxious that the feed freight assistance program be carried on so that feed grain users in British Columbia can survive in a much healthier manner.

Those are all the remarks I will make at this time. I think the man will be coming to the door pretty soon.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Chairman, I hear a knock at the door. I just wonder whether it is the intention that we proceed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress, and request leave to consider the resolution later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It would be in the interest of the membership to recognize that we have gone through this exercise in order to be prepared for the knock at the door which is due to come at any moment, and that later this day we will go through a similar exercise in order to retrieve this important committee and get it back into session.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This would be a delightful occasion for us to have a grievance, but I do not know whether in the aftermath of the glow of today we should do that. It occurs to me this would be a great opportunity for a grievance of some kind.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can we not just sit for a minute or two?

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58

The House resumed consideration in committee of certain items of the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1977, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 58—Mr. Turner in the Chair.

Agriculture

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $35,451,000 be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1977, (less the amount voted in interim supply) as follows:

Vote 1—Administration—program expenditures and contributions, $35,451,000.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Chairman, allow me, as representative of the constituency of Saint-Hyacinthe, which is both urban and rural, to take part briefly in this debate of the House and to express some views on the difficulties that exist in certain sectors of the agricultural economy, particularly in the dairy industry of my province. These difficulties are a result at the same time of the disturbance caused by inflation, of the chaotic policies of this government and of the particular structures of Quebec's agriculture.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

There is no use to hide this. As much as the industry worker, the agricultural worker is the victim of the startling consumer price increase, which has risen by some 35 per cent during the 1971-76 period. The effects of inflation have been particularly felt by the farmer because he is not only a producer of goods but also a consumer like everybody else. Like you and I, he has to provide for his individual needs as well as his family's but as a producer, he also has to pay for the equipment and the input needed for the business he is running.

More than everyone else perhaps, the farmer is affected by the continuous price increases in feed grains, fertilizers, energy and transport rates. The milk producer in particular is further affected by the domestic and international market contraction, and he has to fight against growing dairy products imports. In those circumstances, he deserves more than the divided attention the government is paying him. He asks that we consider seriously his fate and that we take at last some harsh steps if necessary to restore in his industrial sector the prosperity and the security which he needs like other citizens.

Now, what has the government just done for the milk producer? On the pretext that the subsidy to production tends to reduce efficiency and productivity and that it is necessary to curtail budgets, the government has just ordered a lamentable reduction in its program designed to support the dairy industry. But is this policy as realistic as stated by the government? On the one hand, the consumer will experience a considerable increase in his food budget; on the other hand, we run the risk of reducing our consumption of dairy products which are so important to our health. Finally, the government puts hundreds of small milk producers on the verge of ruin, and they will eventually be on other welfare programs. The savings it expects to be able to make could well be only an illusion.

And that is not all. The government is directly responsible for the enormous difficulties which, as recognized by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) himself, the dairy industry will face this year. One and even two years ago, the minister was strongly urging dairy producers to increase their production to such an extent that the domestic market has now reached saturation point.

The height of folly for the government was to raise by 11 million pounds the ceiling on cheese imports which now reaches 50 million pounds. Last year, they authorized the import of 10 million pounds of butter and regardless of a glut in the international market, they urged our producers to produce more powdered milk. Mr. Chairman, is this planning in any reasonable sense? A ceiling of 9.5 billion pounds for authorized shipments is a hard blow to producers. Actually, this ceiling is still being lowered by the minister's decision to impose a levy, more exactly, a fine of $8.60 per hundred pounds on shipments exceeding 94.5 per cent of the individual quota.

To make the position of the milk producer even more difficult, the minister is now imposing another levy of $1.35 a hundredweight on all shipments made within the limits of the marketing quota.

What is the minister trying to achieve? The bankruptcy of milk producers? With such drastic measures, one would be tempted to think so. The direct result of his policy is that a vital Quebec industry is now confronted with nearly insurmountable problems.

It is therefore not surprising that when the new dairy policy was announced, the Quebec Agricultural Producers' Union and the Canadian Association of Dairy Producers expressed their anger and their frustration.

Mr. Pelletier: You were in Florida!

Mr. Wagner: I think this is a personal attack from the parliamentary secretary (Mr. Pelletier). I would like to advise the hon. member that I was absent from the House at that time on my doctor's instructions. I would have preferred to be here to face the government's unfair decisions.

The APU's publication, "Terre de chez-nous" judiciously pointed out, and I quote:

> In its national dairy policy, the government seems much more concerned with applying restrictions than promoting the establishment of a strong policy to protect both the dairy industry and the producer.

The milk producers from Quebec alone will loose this year, with this new policy, around $30 million. Not unlike the APU, one may fear that many dairy farms will be deserted and that many producers, particularly the younger ones, will go bankrupt, with all the economic and social consequences that such a disaster may cause. The Minister of Agriculture does not seem to be aware that his solution, namely the gradual integration of farm production in Quebec, does not meet the specific requirements of my province whose soil is generally poor and unsuitable for diversified agriculture.

In fact, in Quebec, 70 per cent of some 23,000 farm producers operate dairy farms. One sees therefore how hard a blow the new dairy policy will deal the economy of my province. The problems of the Quebec farmers and their colleagues in other provinces are compounded by the decision of the government to allow imports of 50 million pounds of cheese, without that same government having attempted to obtain, especially from the European Common Market, reciprocal treatment for Canadian dairy products.

Of all the requests made to the minister by the dairy producers, he has accepted only one in its entirety: he kept the subsidy at $2.66 a hundredweight. He did, theoretically, set a $1.45 price guarantee for industrial milk but, through the play of deductions, the minister in fact reduced the subsidy by half, not to mention the fact that he doubled, by increasing them from $0.65 to $1.35 a hundredweight, export fees on powdered milk. One therefore understands the ire of the dairy producers to whom the government refused true indexing of their production costs, a privilege granted other industrial sectors. One can therefore state in all fairness that the government's new dairy policy is a complete disaster for Quebec agriculture.

Those difficulties are heightened even more by the protracted conflict between Treasury Board and the veterinarians working for the government. I am told there are now 140 openings for veterinarians in the federal administration, and resignations are many among those experts who are indispensable to the health of both the public and our cattle. I therefore trust, Mr. Chairman, that the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Agriculture will join in their efforts to solve the problem, and thus ensure Canadian agriculture services that are necessary in every regard.

Before I resume my seat, I should like to call the attention of this House to two problems: one of a local nature and the other of a moral and economic nature. The Saint-Hyacinthe area is located in what is called the Montreal plain, the heart of the Quebec farming industry. The time has come for the federal government to reach an agreement with the Quebec government in order to lay the foundations of an integrated agricultural food industry. I urge particularly the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) who, I know, sympathizes with Quebec agriculture, and particularly in the area comprising the Saint-Hyacinthe riding.

The Montreal plain is already an important centre of vegetable and fruit farming; it compares with others as concerns large scale farming and feed grain production. It has a dairy industry of high potential and cattle production is possible on a large scale. In order to create this integrated agricultural food industry out of the basic elements we already have, it is essential first to zone farm lands in order to protect them against increasing urbanization. But some thought should also be given—and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion could play a role in this—to concentrate in that area those industries which depend on agriculture. I am thinking of processing plants, fertilizer or feed mills, farm equipment industries or even, if possible, of tanneries. As it already have a sugar beet refinery and a famous veterinary school, the Montreal plain and the Saint-Hyacinthe area might also become a centre of specialized farm teaching that could give employment to its graduates on farms or in plants processing farm products or by-products.

The other problem is of a moral, economic and administrative nature. It is the supply management problem as regards hunger in the world. While millions of men suffer from malnutrition, countries like ours periodically cut their food production because of a shortage of markets or of adequate mechanisms to help the famished.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the generous efforts made by Canada to help the hungry, but I am convinced—and the dairy policy is a good example—that the Canadian contribution to food assistance is still totally inadequate. In spite of our efforts and those of other industrialized countries, the fact is that the wealth of some people compared to the poverty of a great majority of human beings is a social scandal that should trouble our conscience.

Mr. Speaker, the disproportion between the wealth of some people and the distress of others should prompt us to find an answer without delay to the problem of assisting the famished. It is still the best way to ensure peace and stability in the world. Until we have learned to give without receiving, we shall not have put into practice that universal solidarity which is one of our national goals.

● (2020)

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, there have been three or four speakers so far. Some of them have asked questions and others have made statements, as did the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. I am surprised that he did not speak about all the good things we are doing in his constituency. We have just signed an agreement for a large agricultural complex in his area. Knowing him and how charitable he is politically, I am surprised that he has not mentioned that. I am also surprised that he has not mentioned the fact that we have entered into an agreement in his section of la belle province to assist them with their problems with surplus production because of weather conditions last year and not very high grade maple syrup. We did not have to enter into such an agreement but we did, and it resulted in half a million dollars to the people in his area. I am also surprised that he did not say how much money we are putting into the veterinary school at Saint-Hyacinthe. We are doing so much in his area, and he is saying so little about it!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: I only had 20 minutes.

Mr. Whelan: I would also say, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member has made some pretty fatuous statements on the dairy policy. He is building up the hopes of the dairy producers, whether or not he realizes it, which he would not be doing if he realized the world-wide problem faced by all dairy producers and therefore by our producers also. Members of the European community show no sign of curtailing their production. Their surpluses are growing bigger and their treasuries are funding these surpluses. Some members of the European community are not too happy about that. For instance, West Germany does not have a dairy surplus, but they are contributing to the problem with the 1,600,000 tons of skim milk powder on the world markets at present. To suggest to producers that they should find a way of producing more of this commodity—a commodity which deteriorates—is deplorable, but in essense that is what the hon. member is suggesting.

The hon. member is suggesting also that I am encouraging production. We did not say that at all. We said to the producers that we would give them a decent income for their production, for their investment, for their labour, and for their managerial abilities. That is what we intend to do and that is what the producers will have under this program, that is, the producers who produce reasonable amounts of dairy products to take care of our necessities and of the export markets which we have developed over a period of years.

We must be realistic and recognize that the world price of skim milk powder dropped from over $1,400 a ton to less than $400 a ton in a little over a year. What is one supposed to do? We made an agreement with the producers. If the hon. member thinks it makes me feel good to say to the producers there will be a levy on their production, then he is mistaken. Let him not say that the federal government was not acting responsibly because we entered into that agreement. The producers knew what our production demands were.

The Canadian Dairy Commission has operated the industrial milk program successfully when compared with dairy operations in other parts of the world since 1966. They were in trouble one year, and now everybody says that there is utter chaos. This really makes me mad, Mr. Chairman. We are dealing here with a biological entity, a cow. You cannot compare it to a factory where you can pull a switch and turn production on and off, turn people on and off, and put them on unemployment insurance. You cannot pull a switch on a cow, and you have to gear your production as best you know how.

I hear people criticizing the system we have now. Because of the perfect weather conditions, perfect pasture and perfect forage, things could not have been better last year and the productivity of this nation was high, plus the fact that farmers—and I know farmers as well, I think, or even a little better than the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe—used one third more dairy ration last year. Because of good haying and forage conditions we had the highest percentage of protein that has ever been measured. Protein makes good milk.

Dairy producers used one third more protein last year to get the most out of their cows. Some of them were told by the provincial milk marketing boards, "We know the agreement says that on April 1, 1976, your quota will be set and from then on you will be on a strict quota, so produce all you can." It was wrong for them to do that, and I told them so. I told them that in April when I announced the program last year, I told them that in June, and I told them that in September, but some of them did not pay much attention.

The hon. member has many producers in his area. The consumer and corporate affairs critic in his party from the Eastern Townships knows that producers there did not increase their production any more than 5 per cent. They are the ones who are being hurt most because they did not contribute to this problem, but they have to suffer the same as the ones who increased production by 40 per cent, 60 per cent, and even 80 per cent in some instances, knowing full well they will be in difficulty this year but hoping that there would be a quota by April 1, 1976. We just do not have the market for these products.

Hon. members should remember that only two years ago we were importing butter into this country. The Canadian Dairy Commission recommended that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce import 50 million pounds of butter so that butter producers would not be producing a surplus but there would be enough for the country's needs. We imported it from our Commonwealth neighbours and from some of the European countries to make sure we had butter, but now we have a supply of butter which is adequate for our own people. We do not have the great big surplus of butter some people are talking about. We can look after our needs in our own country. However, I want to repeat that neither I nor this government told them to increase their production. We said 5 per cent was all we wanted and all we could stand for the dairy year of 1975-76, and I can give some figures.

I gave some figures earlier, but we can go to the two main dairy producing provinces of Canada which produce industrial milk and compare April of last year against April of this year. Quebec is 20 per cent above last year, and Ontario is 15 per cent above last year. For the total nation as of the end of April of this year the figure is 15.9 per cent, nearly 16 per cent above last year. They are getting their house in order; there is no doubt about that, as far as I am concerned.

The hon. member from the Creditiste party is not here now, but he said, when he brought in a motion before, that I smiled about his motion. If anything this politician gets criticized for, it is for not smiling enough because I look so sour, too gloomy and too worried all the time about what is going on. This is what I said when I got up to speak about the motion of the hon. member:

> Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Social Credit party for raising the present topic for discussion this day. They have shown leadership in raising it. The other parties have not seen fit to talk about agriculture on their opposition days.

The hon. member for Elgin recognized how wise was the member from the Social Credit party, so he decided to take a day and talk about agriculture, but he has not been dishonest about what he is because he is an old dairy farmer. He now has a full time job; he has had to give up dairy farming because he is trying to be a studious member of parliament. I congratulate him. Many people do not know the sacrifices you make to be a member of parliament.

I do not think the problem the dairy farmers of Canada have at the present time is anything to laugh about, and if I was smiling that day it was not about the motion the hon. member brought into the House, that is for sure. It was not about the plight I find the dairy farmers in, but I could smile a little about it. However, I can become very angry about it when I hear some of the things some people in Canada are saying about dairy farmers and about what we did. Those people never once recognized that the dairy farmers are very productive, but they suggest that the producers should give away their products because they are so productive. Who else in society do we find who tries to do that?

Have hon. members ever heard of a daily newspaper with 5,000 extra copies at night giving them to a senior citizens home, a hospital, or to the disabled? Like hell they do. They do not give them away, or even sell them at half price. They shred them up because if they did not do that it might hurt their market. But we are supposed to be different. Why—because we are peasants, because we are farmers, or because we are producing food?

Have hon. members ever heard of Chrylser, Ford or anyone else doing the same thing, or have they ever heard of it being done with any other article? Even hon. members of my own party suggest that, which is damned, utter nonsense as far as I am concerned. I was at the Auto Parts Manufacturers Association meeting a little while ago, and they were talking about supply management. I asked whether they build parts for Ford, Chrysler, General Motors, American Motors or International Harvester and hope they are going to buy them. They said, "Do you think we are nuts? We do not turn a wheel until we have an order, and when that order is filled, we pull a switch and put the workers out on unemployment insurance if we do not have other jobs". However, when it comes to agriculture, we are different, we are super, and we can live on nothing.

It costs just as much to produce a surplus pound of milk as it does to produce a pound of milk which has a home. It does not cost a bit less, but the producers in the dairy industry have become more proficient than they ever were in the history of this nation.

In 1968 there were 150,000 dairy producers. In 1976 there are 87,000 dairy producers. Twelve years ago there were three million cows giving the same amount of milk as two million cows do in Canada today. Efficiency? Yes, but where else in society can that be found? I want to make sure that hon. members on all sides of this House tell the story fairly and squarely about what the dairy producers are doing. This product belongs to the dairy producers of Canada, not to the Government of Canada, and the dairy producers from all over Canada are the ones who sat down in the Sir John Carling Building and decided that this problem must be solved. The producers got into this problem, not solely but mainly, by themselves, and they decided to solve this problem. They knew it would cost them to solve it, but they are solving it because production is coming back in line.

The hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo raised a question about the research station in Kamloops. The research branch intends to fill that position just as soon as we can identify a suitable candidate, hopefully by next week or the week after. There has been no reduction in the efforts at Kamloops since the entomology group was moved to Lethbridge several years ago. No other reduction is planned. Kamploops works very closely with the Lethbridge scientists on the range management program.

I know hon. members may know that the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo chairs a committee of this House, but if they want to read one of the best books ever written by a researcher they should read the one by the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo about range management. I do not know if he worked at Kamloops, but I never knew he wrote that until I went to an international meeting between Canada, Mexico, and the United States at Tucson, Arizona, and there was the book by the hon. member and another researcher from western Canada. However, one of them was our very own member for Kamloops-Cariboo.

Moving to what the hon. member for Medicine Hat said, he talked about stabilization. He said the Agriculture Stabilization Act is no panacea for the beef cattle industry. He said the cattle support should be no higher than the 90 per cent index. I am just a little confused. That does not sound very consistent to me. The hon. member talked about the government being off and on with regard to the beef program.

I want to say something about the Canadian Cattlemen's Association. An official in the Canadian Cattlemen's Association corrected me when I said that some of our programs have meant at least $100 million more to Canadian cattlemen in stabilizing their industry. He wrote me a letter and said that I was wrong. He said, of all things—and I am sure some hon. members opposite will know better—that I was being too conservative. He said that the programs I implemented, at the request of the association in most instances, to make sure that the beef industry stayed healthy and alive meant more like $200 million. That is what a top official of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association said.

The hon. member talked about the six provinces which have cow-calf programs. I hope the hon. member was not saying that those provincial ministers of agriculture do not know what they are doing, because they have gone ahead with these programs. The hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo pointed out earlier that when there was a vote in British Columbia, well over two-thirds of the cattlemen there voted in favour of participation in the program which the province of British Columbia had put forward. There has since been a change in government there, and the present provincial minister of agriculture recently wrote me a letter saying that B.C. intends to continue this program of income insurance for the beef cattle people and the cow-calf producers, but he wants to know when there will be a federal program to participate in.

Moving on to Alberta, 50 per cent of the beef cattle produced in Canada is produced there. The minister of agriculture in Alberta says he wants this kind of program. He wants some kind of national program. Moving on to Saskatchewan, the minister and the premier in Saskatchewan, as well as the premier of Alberta, say that there should be a national program.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture recently came before the cabinet, and the president of Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture was there. He said he wants this program and that this was endorsed by 1,600 people at the rural municipalities annual meeting in Saskatchewan, with not one dissenting vote. I asked him whether there was someone there from the Saskatchewan Stockgrowers or from the Canadian Cattlemen's Association who voted against it, and he said there was not a dissenting vote. I repeated, "Was there any member?" He said that he was the president of the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture and a member of the Saskatchewan Stockgrowers' Association, but that they do not speak for all the cattlemen in Saskatchewan or for all the cattlemen in western Canada. So the issue is becoming confusing, and it is becoming more difficult for me.

The hon. member talked about the North American market for beef as if it were the only one in the world. Let me tell him that I returned from a meeting at which representatives of the United States, Mexico, Canada, Central American, Caribbean and Latin American countries tried to develop a program for aiding Latin American countries. There were to be horizontal working agreements between some of the developing countries of the area and the have countries were to help the have-nots.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat thinks that we should consider solely the North American market. Perhaps we should, in the case of live cattle. I ask the hon. member to look at it this way: the World Band and North American banks lent Uruguay over $80 million to help that country build a big processing and cold storage plant; and the bottom dropped out of the beef market. Beef slumped. Next consider Panama, Guatemala, and other countries of that region. The United States encouraged them to go into beef production. What happened to them? All their producers are disillusioned and dissatisfied, because now they are broke. They borrowed money from the World Bank, from the Latin American banks, the International Development Bank, and from other banks, in order to enter the cattle business; and now they are broke. And what help do those countries now seek of us? They want us to help eradicate foot and mouth disease. Why? So that they can ship beef to developing countries. Therefore, if the hon. member thinks that we are concerned solely about the North American market, he is mistaken.

[Mr. Whelan.]

Let me refer the hon. member to what happened in the Australian market. If I am wrong I hope the hon. member will correct me, but I think he said that the Australians were shipping beef here for 15 cents a pound less than they are selling it in the U.S.A. They may have done that at one time; we made representations to them. We do not know why they did it. We believe it was done during a time when Australia was using incentives for exporters to find markets, they were required to export to a third market before they could earn the right to ship to the U.S.A. Under that incentive program, if producers shipped so many pounds to certain other countries they were given a certain beef quota for the United States. Therefore they shipped to Canada at 15 cents below what they were charging in the United States.

Mr. Hargrave: They still do it.

Mr. Whelan: They are not supposed to be doing it. They are breaking the agreement if they are. If they are, they certainly are not living up to their agreement as Commonwealth traders and fellow-Commonwealth trading partners, as far as I am concerned. We shall tell them that. But I have seen no facts to substantiate the hon. member's claim.

This incentive program led to lower prices for Australian beef in Canada than the United States. Australia removed Canada as a country in which credit could be earned for exports to the U.S.A., and prices are moving to a normal differential between the U.S.A. and Canada as far as we are concerned.

I am trying to answer questions as quickly as I can. I believe the hon. member suggested that we have accepted a reduced figure for meat exports to the United States. We have not accepted any figure. There are no quotas, although I saw quotas alluded to in two press reports. There are no quotas on poundage as between Canada and the United States. I repeat, there are no quotas this year. We will be exchanging estimates of trade in meat between the two countries and will watch developments during the coming year. If they get out of balance, our officials are to meet. That is the kind of agreement we entered into. No figures at all were used in it. I saw this alluded to twice in the press and saw it on the television media. I immediately checked with my officials and said, "We agreed to no figures." They said, "No, and we don't know where the media people got them."

The hon. member referred to the December press release and implied that we had something akin to a meat import law. My reference was to maintaining meat imports under a general meat import licence, and the Export and Import Permits Act—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I must interrupt the minister—

Mr. Whelan: I have finished, Sir.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Béchard): —whose time has expired.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I wonder if I might answer one more question.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Béchard): The minister may answer only if he has the unanimous consent of the committee. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Béchard): There is not unanimous consent.

An hon. Member: Jack Murta said no.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to say a few words about the dairy industry in Canada. Needless to say that according to the latest statistics, this sector has badly deteriorated ever since the beginning of the year. During the present dairy year, the surpluses of industrial milk will reach almost 1.5 billion pounds, and in order to reduce production, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) could not find anything better than to apply quotas, to resort to a quota system which penalizes those who will overproduce.

The minister merely wants production to equal demand. In other words, he wants to match supply and demand. But I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if he really wondered whether the real demand was adequately met.

I am thinking for instance of those children throughout the country who do not get enough milk, butter and cheese. I wonder whether the minister thought of the people in Montreal and other cities who live in slums, of the children who do not drink enough milk every day.

Not too long ago, I moved a motion under Standing Order 43, urging the government to distribute free milk in all schools and, as usual, members of his party rejected it. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I wonder what the minister intends to do with the milk surpluses. The best he could think of was to apply quotas.

First, the Canadian Dairy Commission imposes quotas at random and does not bother to do an adequate marketing; in my opinion, we might for instance distribute our milk surpluses, swap products with other countries like the Arabs and exchange our milk products and our food surpluses either for oil, coffee or tea. There is no doubt that it could be possible during those exchanges to do some trading to satisfy the needs of countries stricken by hunger and here we could easily exchange this kind of products.

The minister said that we could not put a switch on a cow and turn it off whenever we want to. I would answer him that a cow is not a tap which we can opened or closed at will.

We are now imposing quotas and I sincerely believe, Mr. Chairman, that it is an insult to mother nature to do so, to pay western farmers to refrain from seeding and so on; I could also tell him that nature takes its revenge and it is almost a blasphemy today to live in a country which is immensely rich and to see that our system compels the minister to impose quotas.

● (2050)

All our surplus products could very well be stocked for future years which may be tougher, for years of scarcity when we call on nature to produce milk, to produce wheat and when nature fails to answer the call. I think we would be well advised to stock all our surplus products and give it to poor countries, or exchange them for something else, as I said earlier. One must keep in mind that crops are conditioned either by the weather, seasons which are shorter or colder, the harvesting season which may be affected by rains or early frosts, and sickness which alter the production in general.

In my opinion, the monthly quota is raving madness. Why not quotas for each milking, morning and night. More civil servants would be needed for the controls, which would permit the civil service to grow. That is sheer madness, you may say. Not worse than the monthly quota system. Farm production quotas of any kind are total nonsense in our twentieth century context of famine, provety and disease. When the government paid wheat producers to reduce their wheat acreage, they simply financed scarcity, they financed a reduction of wealth.

When the government confronts milk producers with a system of quotas they do not reflect all the natural factors that can influence production such as those I listed earlier. They reflect neither the real needs of Canadians nor those of the peoples of the world. If they applied realistic policies allowing every Canadian to be adequately fed according to his needs, if they curtailed all unnecessary imports, namely cheese, eggs and all kinds of products, beef, etc., truly there would be underproduction, providing of course that all Canadian and world needs were met.

If we were to give a discount on all basic products to every Canadian family, a discount on Canadian products, especially to families most in need, certainly the overall consumption of Canadian farm products would increase. We would not then have to go the length of imposing those nonsensical quotas.

The government is using a bureaucrat kind, a paper kind, a high level official kind, a restrictive kind of laws. Too often they are antinatural they do not meet with current and future needs of the people. The government should have nothing else than an advisory role on farm product marketing boards. These boards should be under the direct control of farmers. I would like to point out that milk consumption in Quebec went down 33 per cent since 1972, I mean in 1955, average consumption was 133 quarts, while in 1974 it was 42 quarts, down 33 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, we in the Social Credit Party view milk, cheese and bread as vital food items to maintain childrens and old age people's health and prevent disease, this is also true of everyone else. Therefore, we urge the government once more to take immediate steps to restore the astronomical prices of milk, cheese and bread to the 1972 level.

On March 2, as I said, I urged in this House that the government take steps to have milk distributed in schools and universities, instead of coke and cream soda. As usual the answer was no. Mr. Chairman, per capita milk consumption is now 71 quarts in Quebec, as against 91 quarts in Ontario, the neighbouring province. There is no question that milk must take a foremost part in young peoples' eating habits.

We, of the Social Credit Party, believe that one way to help dairy farmers would be to emphasize research as concerns a greater utilization of milk so as to offer consummers new dairay products. Moreover, to encourage milk consumption, we seriously believe that the government should give a discount on prices to consumers, which would be compensated for the producers by the issue of new credits by the Bank of Canada so as to prevent any tax increase and meet the true aim of production, which is consumption.

We sincerely believe that a healthy farming community is essential to the success of our national economy. The government must protect and encourage our dairy farmers. The agricultural market should be based on freely negotiated interprovincial agreements. The federal government should no longer be allowed to play dictator in this area.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Chairman, during the supper hour I read a very interesting article in the May 22 Financial Post. It was written by Dr. John Shepherd, Executive Director of the Science Council of Canada. He states that at a time when we face the most significant technical challenges in our history, science and technology are at a low ebb. I certainly think that any cutbacks in our agricultural research at this time would be tragic. We need to regain our leadership with new and improved varieties, particularly in cereal grain.

Dr. Shepherd says that one of the mythologies about Canada is that we are a storehouse of natural resources, that Canada has endless acres of arable land and huge surpluses of food to feed a starving world. He goes on about our imbalance in trade. He says that by the mid-1980's Canada could well face horrendous deficits which could be compensated for only by significant increases of exports of raw materials and agricultural products.

He further points out that although we have two billion acres of land, actually a very small percentage, 13 per cent, is classed as agricultural and only 42 per cent of that 13 per cent is suitable for commercial crops. He concludes by saying, and I quote:

> One has only to envisage the inevitable external pressures which will be placed on Canada's food system. The arguments of Lester Brown of the Worldwatch Institute are persuasive. Between 1934 and 1976, four of the six major grain exporting areas of the world have become net importers of food. As the world grain reserves since 1961 have shrunk steadily from 105 days to a projected 31 days for 1976, so the reliance upon North American exports has become almost total.

It strikes me that with the great need of the world for food and fibre, coupled with the tremendous increased productivity of our two agricultural industries, the U.S.A. and Canada should cease petty rivalries and start co-operating in food and fibre production and developing markets.

After some disastrous attempts at trying to prevent Canadian farmers from attempting to produce too much, grain in particular, the government is still woefully unprepared for the new era in which we do not seem able to produce quite enough. This new era has arrived with dramatic swiftness.

Some 18 months ago the World Food Conference in Rome ended. We should use it as a benchmark. For the first time all the components are now in the grain industry on a world-wide basis. By this I mean no country will purposely let its people starve. Russia and China are now in on a regular and on-going basis. Russia will not be a stabilizing influence on the market because of her great production swings in the wheat growing areas. We do not have to be reminded of that. Grain policy will pretty well set livestock policy in this country.

Of all our industries, none is subject to more increasing political control than farming. Management decisions have to be made against a background of laws and regulations which control the scope for initiative and enterprise. It seems we are faced with more and more government control.

I wish to quote from a report by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, commenting on the final report of the Food Prices Review Board, a public body. I quote:

> Focusing our comments on this report to only the substance and recommendations has called for great restraint. Seldom if ever have we seen a document produced at public expense which is so laden with bias, innuendo, unsubstantiated allegation, and in so many ways stunningly smug, self-congratulatory, contradictory, misleading, and possessed of an animus toward all—both in government and out—who are involved in, or interested in farm policy. We think it is unfortunate that the board chose to conclude its existence with a report of this nature.

They talked about the board's recommendations for feed grains. The government put in place a subsidy program like the two-price system on wheat. Let us take a look at the two-price system on wheat. This is a system under which farmers are asked to absorb any difference between the $5 subsidized price and the export price. The export price remained at about $5 from September, 1973, to May, 1974, and producers absorbed a loss of some 85 cents a bushel, the federal government picking up the $1.75 per bushel. This meant that the grain producers of Western Canada subsidized the bread eaters of this country to the tune of about $55 million in that period. All this was going on at the time when a wrapper around a loaf of bread was probably worth as much as the wheat which went to make up the loaf.

The Prices Review Board proposed management of domestic grain prices. They are proposing government intervention to control domestic grain prices and create a domestic feed grains and livestock industry insulated from world prices. Such an intervention, which would essentially amount to the subsidization of livestock and livestock products, would unquestionably lead to massive planning of the grain and livestock sectors. It would, of course, involve the over-all planning and management of the entire agricultural economy, the likes of which were never, never contemplated nor desired, and the consequences of which would be great and far-reaching.

There is no question that the Minister of Agriculture is dedicated to the agricultural supply management concept. It was summed up in his speech at Kelowna, B. C. earlier this year when the hon. gentleman said, "The free market system has not worked to the benefit of the agricultural producer... the free market system has never existed in Canadian agriculture. So far, the supply management system is the best we have come up with. I am a supporter of the supply management system and I intend to continue promoting it." Mr. Chairman, I should like to know the basis for that statement. I, too, am a believer in supply management, but I believe in supply management at the producers' level where a quarter of a million producers make the supply management decisions, not a handful of people.

The European Economic Community has been in favour of supply management for years, and their agriculture is in a mess. Agriculture in the USSR has been under total control since the first world war, and as a result that country has gone from a surplus position to a deficit position as far as agricultural products are concerned. The United States has by far and away the best record in the world, and it is one which is certainly not based on supply management. Give the producers the best possible information available and let them make the decisions.

It is interesting to note that while our average annual wheat crop in the past five years has been about 500 million bushels we have exported an average of 470 million bushels each year and used another 170 million bushels at home, for a total of 640 million bushels. These figures show there has been a deficit of about 85 million bushels each year. Whatever the scientists' feelings are with regard to long term weather trends, they agree that the world's climate is entering a period of widely felt varying conditions which will make the planning of agricultural production extremely difficult. Unless by some happy circumstance we produce an unusually large high-quality crop in 1976, the Canadian Wheat Board's overseas sales staff will have to be very cautious.

In Canada we seem to operate on the basis of the Boy Scout idea of doing our good deed, which is to open up Canada to all overseas goods and for us to live off the exports of raw materials. This philosophy was followed in the years of the Pearson government, incidentally by the people who gave in to the first 30 per cent wage settlements. The question now is this: are Canadian agricultural products being put on the block in return for trade-offs in industrial goods? What concerns me is the fact that antiquated low tariff levels permit foreign food products to flood Canadian food markets and undercut Canadian producers. We have only to look at such examples as the entry of soya beans into Canada from the United States duty-free. In contrast, soya beans shipped from Canada to the United States are subject to a tariff of 60 cents per bushel.

Last year Ontario had a surplus of peaches. If canned peaches are exported to the United States, the duty to be paid amounts to $1.90 per case. Canada's duty on American peaches is only 63 cents per case. Canada admits corn from south of the border at a tariff of 8 cents per bushel, but Canadian exporters must pay a 25 cents tariff to export Canadian corn.

We are at a point now in Canada where the only products we can market internationally are grains and oilseeds. We do sell some things to the United States, and small amounts of pork to Japan, but apart from this we are pretty well out of the international market. Agriculture needs help and lots of it.

After the great fuss over the new Farm Credit Corporation legislation, what do we find? We find the government completely reversing itself. The situation now is that only farmers demonstrating extreme need can qualify for FCC loans in 1976-77. Loan allocations will drop by 42 per cent this year to some $370 million from last year's level of $641 million. I would point out that of last year's loans about two thirds went to farmers under 35 years of age, which is exactly what the act was designed to accomplish.

Surely it is time we made a distinction in this country between economic activities such as agriculture, which produces commodities, and those which do not. I have said many times in this House that our senior civil servants are disdainful of trade. No real importance is attached to marketing. There is no drive. Look at the present surpluses of powdered milk. There is no doubt in my mind that if the correct action had been taken when the stocks of powdered milk first began to accumulate, we would have had no great difficulty about disposing of them around the world.

Recently, Mr. Chairman, a real milestone in labour relations was reached by Canada's west coast ports. This was the substitution of voluntary arbitration for disruptive strikes and lock-outs. Grain handlers and elevator companies have agreed to mediation under an arbitration process, which promises to keep prairie grain flowing through those ports at least as far as labour and management in this sector of the grain system are concerned. It is significant that the government should have shown no leadership in this area whatsoever. After a long period of bad relations between labour and management, the best it could do was impose a settlement. Our customers, particularly Japan and China, complained bitterly about late grain shipments. We lost business to the United States port of Seattle.

The success of this latest move by labour and management is significant for all of Canada. It is the first acceptance by a major industry under federal jurisdiction of a mediation arbitration technique. It took a number of members from this side of the House to initiate the project. Six of us went to Vancouver and met with the parties involved to find out the facts, weigh the feelings on both sides, and try to bring the parties together. The federal government did not enter the picture for 14 months.

There is another question which is of great concern to farmers and it concerns land valuation. December, 1971, was V-Day for that purpose, and as most members know on that date farms were selling at the lowest prices for years simply because there were no grain quotas, no grain sales. Farmers could not even meet their expenses let alone pay for land. So valuation day prices were many times below what they should have been. Nowadays, with the cost of everything else going up, these valuation day prices seem particularly unfair to farmers who are subject to capital gains tax if they sell their land at more than the valuation day assessment.

About a week ago I noted with some concern a press report indicating that the government is pinning its survival hopes on a food policy, and that this policy will put heavy emphasis on getting food prices reduced. Several days ago when the deputy minister of agriculture was in front of the standing committee he indicated to the committee that he was not aware of such plans and that so far agriculture had not been involved in any policy discussions. There is surely cause to ponder there.

Our expensive stabilization schemes just do not seem to be doing the job, Mr. Chairman. As I have said before, they have brought Canadian agriculture to the state that we now have only one commodity, grains, that can be merchandised internationally. Surely to bring us into a competitive situation the government should be looking more and more at income tax as a vehicle for helping agriculture in this country.

I should just like to quote what one farmer has said about the latest stabilization scheme that the minister is trying to sell western Canada. He writes:

I'll offer a deal to Mr. Lang. I won't put up that $500 cash for the stabilization plan (I'll pay off my note at the Credit Union instead) and he won't have to squeeze the general Canadian taxpayer for the $1,000 he has promised to put up on my behalf should I go belly up. That way we'll all save money.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we started down the slippery slope several years ago when the federal government task force on agriculture indicated that there was no real future for western agriculture in particular, and proposed restricted production for the prairies. This task force report was accepted by the government.

Since the railways have to plan years ahead, they looked to their operation and decided that, as a result of government policy, it would be necessary to reduce their services in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. This led to their filing for abandonment of most of their branch lines in western Canada.

It was a technical requirement of the act that the railways had to file an application for abandonment with the Canadian Transport Commission to be eligible for a subsidy, and of course they did so in regard to almost every branch line that we have. However, the uproar as a result of this transportation policy and the LIFT program forced the government in Ottawa to act. It declared a five-year freeze on rail abandonment, which expired January 1, 1975, but has since been renewed. But the grain companies still do not know where the lines are going to be or where they can build because the railways do not know which lines are going to be retained. In addition, we have discontent over federal feed grain policy. Western producers generally feel that it costs too little to move western feed grain east.

However, the real threat facing the prairie livestock industry is perhaps not a grain freight rate inequity; it is the possibility that national market sharing agreements will hamstring prairie hog and cattle feeders next time grain is cheap and they want to expand production.

A national marketing plan would allow them only limited access to eastern markets in this country. It could also require import restrictions, which in turn would be sure to bring retaliatory action from the United States. The U.S. market is the closest and potentially the largest outlet for prairie livestock and meat. This market is desperately needed. However, it seems some policy makers in Ottawa would like to do away with this. This seems to be the biggest threat to prairie livestock producers and grain growers at the present time, and it is a threat that they must guard against.

There are some basic questions that have to be answered and, I suggest the first is this: are farmers in a business like any other? In short, we want to know where we are going in Canadian agriculture and what the targets are. Full, efficient agricultural production in Canada is a necessary fact of life.

[Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek).]

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Chairman, I intend to enter only briefly into this debate on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and I wish to raise three or four of what appear to me to be concerns, as a parliamentarian from an urban constituency. The first is the problem of insuring that young people will find farming an attractive occupation and will make every effort to go into agriculture at a time when other opportunities may appear to be more attractive to them.

I also find that many constituents are concerned about the alleged disappearance of our prime farm land, land that would produce food. I want to know from the minister, if he has an opportunity to tell us, what he has been able to do about this matter. I want to raise the matter of purchase of farm land increasingly by foreigners, and I will raise the matter in terms of the Foreign Investment Review Agency and whether or not there is a role there for it to play in deciding whether such purchases are in Canada's interests.

Then finally, I will raise a matter that the minister may find somewhat vexing but which I think is in its right perspective as a supportive suggestion, namely, that consumers be found recognized places on marketing boards.

If I may begin with the question of young people being attracted to farming, I know this is more than a question of credit. But what I would appreciate knowing is how successful are the efforts made by farm credit institutions to put funds in the hands of young people in order to encourage them to become another generation that will own farm land and enter agriculture. What proportion of farm credit loans are going to people who are, say, younger than 40, or in the middle or younger age groups? If the efforts have been unsuccessful then we should look at further ways to encourage the younger generation. In city constituencies we are told that the farm population at the moment is aging. I am not sure what the average age is, but I believe it is in the middle fifties. Farming is a strenuous occupation and we must have a group coming up behind.

In addition to the question of credit there is the preservation of our prime farm land. As I understand it, technically speaking "prime farm land" means land that is classified in the Canada lands inventory as Nos. 1, 2 and 3. We have a very limited amount of prime farm land. I believe it is correct to say that almost one half of our No. 1 farm land in Canada is in southern Ontario.

Southern Ontario is going through a very rapid urbanizing and industrializing process, but surely preserving our No. 1 farm land is in the national interest. I suggest the question is larger than the province of Ontario which has jurisdiction over land use planning. I would therefore ask the Minister of Agriculture just what perspective his department has in this regard.

We hear these frightening stories about how much No. 1 farm land goes out of production almost every hour. We hear the counter argument that a certain amount come back in. No. 1 farm land is land that will grow almost anything because of moisture content and warmth and the number of frost-free days, and things of that kind. I am told there is no No. 1 farm land in the Atlantic provinces, for example. The land there starts at perhaps No. 2. Here therefore is a precious resource of great interest to the consumers and to people in urban centres. What is this process of urbanization and industralization doing to our farm land? Industrialists and land developers will pay more per acre for this land than the farmer can pay, and the land will produce more investment for them than it will for the farmer under current production.

More important, before we accept the minister's estimates, what is he doing to raise at the federal-provincial level this basic concern? Once this land is gone, it is probably gone forever. Does the minister participate in any federal-provincial meetings on land use planning? If he does, what is his contribution to these meetings, and how are they progressing from the minister's point of view? Perhaps he already does, but let me put it as a question; would the minister not find as one of his responsibilities to urge that the two levels of government meet frequently at land use planning conferences in order to arrive at some national objectives in respect of land use in which the agricultural interests would be paramount? These conferences could consider the activities of our own federal government which also uses land, for example for airports often near major cities, and major cities are usually built where the best land is. What agricultural interest is there in respect of federal use of lands, and what guidelines do the two levels of government use to guide us in the use of land, particularly agricultural land?

Would the minister accept as useful the proposition that certain land of high classification be set aside in agricultural preserves or reserves to be used exclusively for agricultural purposes and denied to urban, industrial and other purposes? Would he find that a useful proposition? And would land banking for agricultural purposes make as much sense as land banking for housing or urban growth? If so, is there a federal role in land banking?

I associate the concern of urban persons and consumers for the protection of farm land with their willingness to see income stabilization of a generous kind to farmers, because it is very much in the interest of consumers that agricultural incomes be such that the farmers will indeed stay on the land to produce food and other products. Therefore their incomes ought to rise with general incomes and ought to be stabilized because of the unique character of agriculture, subject so much to the weather, to international markets, and to wide price fluctuation. The interest in preserving that land is also an interest in seeing that it is profitable to use it in agriculture. Therefore I am sure I can say to the minister that city people want income stabilization programs for agriculture.

Let me raise the question of foreign ownership before I come to my last concern, Mr. Chairman. Without knowing, I believe there is an increasing amount of purchase of farm land in Canada by foreigners. Perhaps we are not unduly concerned at this stage about it, but I understand they are willing to pay more than Canadians for this land. What do they see that we do not see? Is it that our agricultural programs are not satisfactory to Canadians, or sufficiently attractive to keep them in farming? Is it that they recognize a world problem that we are not fully adjusted to in our policies? Do they know better than we that not only Canada will need increasing food against disappearing land but so will the world and, therefore, they are placing themselves in a position in our country into which we do not seem to be able to attract Canadians?

Is farm land of concern to the Federal Foreign Investments Review Agency? If that is not the case, does the minister feel it ought to be and, if so, what sort of guidelines would be applicable? The agency's responsibility is to see that foreign purchases are of benefit to Canadians. Is the foreign purchase of farm land, particularly prime land, in the interest of Canadians?

Finally I would like to suggest that farmers would be reassured to have consumers on their marketing boards. Consumers want to have the assurance that these marketing boards, when they control supply and when they regulate price, as they must from time to time, are acting in the general interest as well as in the particular interest. The best way to give them that assurance is to make a place for consumers on agricultural marketing boards, even as I think there is a very strong agricultural interest in being represented on other boards. There is a suspicion which is hard to dispel, but which can probably be readily explained, that marketing boards may act unduly in the interests of producers. Most consumers feel that farmers must be given protection for the reasons I have already mentioned, but they would like to have that extra assurance that this is fair to everyone, and I think that means participation. With those remarks I conclude, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Mitges: Mr. Chairman, my contribution to this very important debate tonight will dwell mainly on the maintenance and protection of the health of our livestock industry in Canada. I am referring, of course, to the veterinarians employed by the Health of Animals Branch of the Department of Agriculture. We all know these veterinarians are responsible for testing animals for contagious diseases, maintaining inspection services at meat packing plants, testing cattle sold to other nations, and maintaining inspection of all animals and meat imports.

Our services are recognized throughout the world, and they provide not only control measures in respect of many animal diseases, and those animal diseases transmissible to man, but at the same time open the door to many millions of dollars worth of exports of livestock and livestock products. Because up to now we have had such a tight grip on disease control we export livestock and livestock products to more countries than any other country in the world. At last count we sold livestock and products to approximately 125 countries, with a dollar value of close to $1 billion. It is the veterinary profession, working through the Health of Animals Branch, that has given Canada the opportunity of becoming the world's number one supplier of beef and dairy breeding stock.

Wiping out costly diseases has saved farmers many millions of dollars as they are able to put more meat of high quality on the retail shelf. In return, consumers have saved money at the meat counter.

Effective legislation to protect Canadian livestock was one of the first important agricultural acts passed by the Government of Canada back in 1867. Since that time our animal and health protection standards have gained worldwide envy. The need to maintain this position and to advance with modern scientific and technological achievements has been recognized by the passing of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. However, the responsibility attending such legislation can only be effectively discharged by utilizing adequate numbers of competent and skilled professional staff. But, despite increased responsibility of the veterinary staff of the Health of Animals Branch, there are at present approximately 150 established positions that are unfilled. Twenty-one per cent of the veterinary staff employed by the Health of Animals Branch are over 57 years of age, while 70 per cent are over 40 years of age. A projection of anticipated retirement separation up to 1980 indicates a recruitment requirement of 233 during the same period, just to maintain staff numbers without giving consideration to unfilled positions.

During the past five years 242 veterinarians have been hired and 142 have left the service. The average age of recent employees suggests an unsatisfactory recruitment of younger veterinarians. A similar problem exists in other departments. For example, in the Health Protection Branch 58 per cent of the veterinary staff are over 51 years of age.

Considering the additional problem that modern transportation places on contagious diseases control, we should expect that additional veterinarians will be required in the Contagious Diseases Division of the Health of Animals Branch. Coinciding with this will be increased workloads in the Animal Pathology Division, which will necessitate the employment of more veterinarians. Therefore a solution must be found for the present low recruitment rate if Canada's livestock industry is to maintain its present favourable health position in the world market.

In studying this problem it is the opinion that insufficient use is being made of the veterinarians' professional skills at the working level. This inevitably destroys morale and professional satisfaction. There is little evidence that members of the staff receive much encouragement, or are given adequate opportunity to improve their professional development.

With the present classification each department has special problems. For example, promotion within the Contagious Diseases Division of the Health of Animals Branch is restricted. Eighty per cent of veterinarians are classified within the VS1 and VS2 groups. Any remuneration commensurate with demonstrated ability or long useful service is not recognized as such a classification. This, naturally, discourages incentive. The current position in regard to the relative pay of professional staff and primary products inspectors may reflect more successful bartering on behalf of the larger group of primary products inspectors than the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada was able to achieve for veterinarians.

There is no doubt that this overlapping has caused a serious outcry of dissatisfaction from the professional staff. It is incongruous that many of the jobs classified in the federal service's veterinary positions, which require six years of post-secondary education, are not worth a great deal more financially, maybe not even as much, as those occupied by persons with only secondary school training.

[Mr. Mitges.]

A recent survey carried out by the Health of Animals Branch revealed that salaries and professional fulfillment were the two areas of major concern to veterinarians. In order to achieve high levels of productivity it is essential that an environment be created to improve morale and provide a challenge to the professional knowledge and skills of the incumbents, and a scale of rewards related to responsibility and productivity.

I would suggest that serious consideration be given to promoting better career progression of veterinarians within the public service. There should be a wider classification that recognizes the complexity of the work, the kind of assignments, demonstrated ability, as well as seniority and excellence in the job. A system should be adopted in which each classification has a salary floor, but not a maximum. This will permit an outstanding individual in one classification level to receive increments above the floor of the next higher category.

The present pay scale should be reviewed to reflect the extensive training, professional training, responsibilities and skills required for job performance. There is no question that a serious shortage of government veterinarians has threatened to undermine health standards for animals and meat across Canada. So far this shortage has only caused economic difficulties in meat packing and livestock industries. But as the situation continues to deteriorate inspection services may be reduced to the danger level, and the health of the nation's livestock may be jeopardized. Not only that but the vacancies mean that some government responsibilities cannot be met.

This situation is particularly sad because veterinarians in the Health of Animals Branch are now trying to test cattle for brucellosis before they are turned out to pasture, where any infection will spread more rapidly from herd to herd. They are trying to cope with a major outbreak of blue tongue in the Okanagan Valley in British Columbia. They are trying to maintain inspection services at meat packing plants. They are trying to serve the demands of exporters to test cattle sold to other nations. They are trying to maintain inspection services on all animals and meat imports.

A breakdown in any area could prove disastrous. For example, in the 1950's when the dreaded hoof and mouth disease slipped through the border inspection net in Saskatchewan, Canadian beef farmers lost an estimated $50 million. Some say the loss amounted to about $250 million because no nation would accept our animals and meat during the outbreak, and that reduced the value of the nation's entire cattle population. A breakdown in meat packing inspection could threaten the health of consumers and jeopardize export markets. A breakdown in brucellosis, blue tongue, tuberculosis and other disease-testing and control measures could threaten the health of all animals, and again export markets.

We have already lost our market for semen amounting to millions of dollars, thanks to the recent blue tongue outbreaks. As a result of this outbreak of blue tongue in the Okanagan Valley, the federal government is moving veterinarians from across the nation to that area to test cattle as quickly as possible to prevent any further spread.

So far, about 4,300 cattle have been tested and 800 condemned for slaughter. The veterinarians have to move quickly so that the disease does not spread. This involves taking staff away from other important priority areas.

Aggravating this whole problem is the current salary negotiations between the veterinarians' union and the federal government Treasury Board. More militant veterinarians are now working to rule. Salary negotiations with Treasury Board have broken down. December 28, 1975, was the final date of the last contract with the government. The Treasury Board has offered a salary increase of between 8 per cent and 9 per cent, in spite of the fact that veterinarians' salaries have not kept up with inflation for the last four to five years. Treasury Board's excuse is that it cannot exceed the AIB guidelines. It makes one wonder if they are using the federal veterinarians as scapegoats in their vain attempt to be perceived as if they are trying to hold the line.

The veterinarians have conducted a work to rule campaign. So far there has not been any extensive disruption of service, unlike in the Post Office in past years, which seems to indicate that the veterinarians do certainly take their jobs seriously. The veterinarians maintain, and rightly so, that they have a historical relationship with primary products inspectors. The primary products inspectors work under the veterinarians at meat packing plants. They need only a grade 12 education compared to the veterinarians' six years of university. Yet with the new contract they are now being paid almost as much as veterinarians, and some even a little more than veterinarians.

The PPI's new contract was signed last October, and in it they received a 10½ per cent increase, yet the Treasury Board is offering only an 8 per cent to 9 per cent increase to the veterinarians. Historically the veterinarians have earned proportionately more than the PPI's. The veterinarians maintain that they can legally exceed the guidelines because of the historical relationship with the PPI's and because of a 27 per cent vacancy rate of veterinarians with Agriculture Canada.

The AIB states that a group of employees can be exempted from the guidelines if there is a 20 per cent or more vacancy rate in a department. In spite of this, the Treasury Board intends to ask that their dispute with the veterinarians go to conciliation. Once the conciliators have been selected, and a conciliation report prepared, each side can either accept or refuse the conciliation report's recommendations. If the recommendations are unacceptable, then the veterinarians could legally strike seven days after the report is handed down.

Canada cannot afford to have these veterinarians strike. There has been, and will continue to be, a heavy run of cattle, approximately 70,000 per week, and other slaughter animals to the meat packing plants. Since from 85 per cent to 90 per cent of all Canada's slaughtered animals go through federally inspected plants, these plants would have to close within a week if the veterinarians went on strike. As a result, 25,000 employees would have to be laid off. The producers would be hurt, not only by increasing feeding costs but also by the damage done to their animals through the delay in slaughter.

Furthermore, a strike would ruin the pricing structure for slaughtered animals. As meat supplies dry up prices would invariably rise, to the detriment of the consumer. And once the strike is ended there would likely be a glut of slaughtered animals coming to market, which would mean that the producers would receive less money.

The veterinarians in the Health of Animals Branch deserve a better all round deal. If the Treasury Board is unwilling to grant them more, then perhaps Agriculture Canada could be encouraged to reclassify them upwards.

It should be noted that 77 per cent of the veterinarians fall within the two lowest pay levels. In contrast, the provinces have most of their veterinarians working in the higher pay levels.

The Canadian Veterinarian Medical Association and the other provincial associations, including the Ontario Veterinarian Association, are backing the federal veterinarians 100 per cent. They are in complete sympathy with them and understand the factors that have led to their action. The associations recognize that their current state of affairs is the direct result of the federal government's failure to respond to repeated requests to undertake a full and complete investigation of the professional role of the veterinarians, assuring them that their professional skills are not under-utilized and that they are given recognition for those skills by a constant upward classification of their jobs.

The associations have communicated and will continue to communicate with producer groups such as the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, the Meat Packers Council, the Pork Producers Marketing Board, the Ontario Poultry Council, as well as companies in the meat processing industry—urging them to request the government to reach an immediate agreement with the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada, the negotiating agent for the veterinarians in their salary dispute.

The veterinary associations will continue to work with these and other interested groups, using all of their resources, as they feel this approach will produce a resolution to the current state of affairs on a long-term basis, which will be in the best interests of the public, the professionals involved, and the federal government.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, if the federal government expects to maintain and improve the high quality of veterinary services in Canada, this can only be accomplished by providing a climate which will attract and retain qualified people in jobs which should be both challenging and financially rewarding.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. As hon. members are aware, we are operating under a rule which calls on you, Sir, to bring this debate to an end at 9.45 p.m. The purpose of that rule is to allow 15 minutes in case there is to be a recorded vote. I understand—and I think my understanding is correct—that no such recorded vote is to be forced this evening, and I would like to suggest that you not see the clock for another 12 or 14 minutes so that some other speakers might take part in the debate. I could not be more impartial in making this request because in this party we are not seeking any further opportunities to speak tonight.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Chairman, I rise on the same point of order. That would be agreeable, and I think the House leader of the Official Opposition agrees as well.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I would like to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the parliamentary secretary for the courtesy.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent that we do not see the clock until 10 p.m.?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to try to answer as many as possible of the questions that have been put to me, and also to make some comments on some of the statements that have been made. First of all the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek has made some statements that should be corrected. He spoke about petty politics between Canada and the United States. I had the impression he favoured free trade. He also spoke about duty on soya beans and some of the other products coming from the United States, which is much higher than ours. This is something that many people do not seem to understand. They think the United States is a free trading nation, but the fact is that they are probably one of the most protective nations in the world so far as their agricultural industry is concerned. Let me give as an example their meat importing laws, their tariff on corn, soya beans, vegetable oil, seeds of all kinds, and wool. I could give a list of about 30 agricultural products on which their duty is higher than ours.

Then the hon. member made some statements about the money we are spending on research. Let me say that from 1974-1975 to 1976-1977 the money we gave for research went up from $74 million to practically $100 million. We are putting more money into universities and more money into research. Our total on contracts increased to $2.1 million and our total for universities increased to $1.3 million.

Then the hon. member said that the European Community had supply management. I do not know where the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek got that. The members of the European Community do not have supply management and that is why, out of their total budget, which amounts to about $9.5 billion, they spend about $7.5 billion on agriculture, and with their surplus products they try to salvage the situation.

Then the hon. member made a comparison with Russia and said that Russia had supply management. I think this is a most unfair comparison. The USSR has no real system which would provide any incentive for a producer to be productive, and that is why their agriculture will never really be efficient. There is nothing that I intend to do to any marketing board that would take away from our people. Even the hon. member for Medicine Hat recognized that when he said our stabilization program assisted farmers to the tune of 90 per cent of the previous five years' average market price and the cost input was taken into account. This would not make millionaires of producers but it will prevent them from going bankrupt.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

If I am accused of anything, it is of putting forward programs that create too much incentive for over production. If hon. members will remember, I stated that if I were in Russia I would be given a medal for the over production we have here. They have fired their minister of agriculture there because he could not get production.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Chairman, we still have one speaker who would like to say a few words—the hon. member for Joliette. If we could allow him to say a few words now, then perhaps the minister could wind up the debate. He has been here all evening.

Mr. Whelan: Some hon. members on both sides of the House have asked important questions and I am trying to answer them as quickly as possible. I will do my utmost to give a few members a few minutes at the end. I think it is unfair that we are not allowed to correct some of the statements that are made.

I spoke about the hon. member who made the comparison. That is one of the things that people are so amazed about, that in Canadian agriculture there are so few people who are producing so much. Marketing boards have been with us since 1926, two years less than the age of the Minister of Agriculture. That is quite a long time. They have made agriculture productive and they have protected the little farmer so he can stay in business.

I am sure the hon. member remembers what started the Canadian Wheat Board, the greatest marketing system in the world for cereal grains, a supply management system. You cannot rush grains to the market if the Canadian Wheat Board cannot sell them, so you are put on a quota. Even the former chairman of the Food Prices Review Board said it was the ideal thing. There is no better system in the world than that marketing board. It is not socialism. The hon. member would not dare suggest in his riding that marketing boards should be banned, nor would he suggest that the Canadian Grain Commission should be banned. That was started by the government of 1935, the grain commission and wheat board, to protect the interests of those farmers because they were being taken down the river for a merry ride. I just think we should be fair when we are talking about some of these things.

I believe it was the hon. member for Rimouski who made a certain statement, but he is not in the House so I do not know if I should bother trying to answer his question. He said monthly milk quotas were stupid, and I think it should be put on the record that we want 12 months of production per year. If producers produce all their milk in three months and sell their cows, they will have the subsidy for the whole year and their whole quota, and there would be utter chaos. There would be no supply management at all. Nothing could be more stupid than to suggest filling a quota in five or six months, quit milking cows and then ship the cattle to the slaughterhouse.

The hon. member talked about slums in Montreal. Montreal has Expo and—what do you call that other thing—the Olympics, and I am suggesting that, by God, if Montreal can have those things, it can feed skim milk powder to the people in Montreal and in the province of Quebec. I said when the hon. member was not here that Nova Scotia is doing that, and Nova Scotia is a much smaller province. If Montreal wants to work with the Minister of National Health and Welfare, he has told me that he is willing to try to work out programs, but they should not ask the farmers of Canada to do it alone. Let total society do it.

Another hon. member, who is not here either, asked many questions, and then went out. He is a city slicker.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He is a member from your side, the hon. member for Scarborough East.

Mr. Whelan: He wanted to know about young farmers and what I would suggest we should do to attract them to farming. I can tell the hon. member that since 1973 more young farmers have stayed in agriculture and more have gone back to it than was the case for 25 years in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Why have they gone back? Because they have confidence in this government's agricultural program, the stabilization program, marketing boards guaranteeing stabilization, and the Farm Credit Corporation making it possible for them to get money. They could not get it before, and now 65 per cent of the loans from the Farm Credit Corporation are going to young people under the age of 35 years.

The hon. member talked about farm lands owned by foreigners and whether we should be controlling that. He also talked about land use. The Department of the Environment, under the Minister of the Environment, is leading the provincial environmental ministers and working in very close co-operation with the federal Department of Agriculture and provincial departments of agriculture to try to work out a sensible land use policy for agriculture. I just want to ask the hon. member who asked this question about land use whether we should just say it shall be held for agriculture. I see he is coming back. He was getting hell while he was outside.

We are not going to get people interested in agriculture by saying that a particular piece of land must remain in agriculture and that they are going to stay on it. That is what they try to do in Russia and other countries, and they wonder why we have productivity. We cannot do that and expect productivity unless we can make sure producers get their proper return. I agree with the hon. member that pretty well every acre which can be cultivated is under cultivation, but we could increase productivity in many areas by as much as 50 per cent in five years with better horticultural practices, better seed, better fertilizer, better drainage and all the things. However, there had better be a better economic base to entice them to do that so that they will be protected.

The hon. member asked another question about foreigners. The provinces have the right to stop foreigners from owning land. The only condition under which the federal government can become involved is if the land is worth over $250,000, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce through FIRA can make some representations and discourage them, or tell them they cannot have it unless they comply with the rules.

I think something should be done because land in Canada is still cheap when we compare it to the $30,000 per acre in our money in Holland for productive land. When we go to the southwestern part of Ontario, orchard land costs $1,500 per acre, and for a person from Holland that is very inexpensive.

Mr. Paproski: Come on, Gene.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member mentioned consumers being on marketing boards. I am in favour of that. I was against it at one time, but they are strong representatives, especially if they are from labour.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, my comments will have to be very brief. I would still like to make a few points, and I am greatly honoured to speak after the minister. I had the impression that the minister was very embarrassed by the answers he had to give. I must admit that he wants to help farmers. I would also like to say that he has made some efforts to stabilize the farming industry. But as I have not much time, I shall not quote many statistics. I would however like to remind the minister that despite all the efforts of this gouvernment, despite all the goodwill that he showed tonight, despite his efforts to reply to the recommendations or accusations made since this afternoon, it still remains that we find ourselves in a very difficult situation.

Why is it that even though the government talks about its best system, about an ever-improving production, and one which is the best in the world per producer, nearly all groups are dissatisfied? It is important for the minister to know this.

There are neither wonder solutions nor easy solutions. But let me remind you and let me insist particularly—and others have spoken about it before me—on the situation of the dairy producers in Quebec. Whatever the minister may have said in the House today, last year, because of a very favourable weather, we had excess production. The way things are going, this situation will not happen again. To my mind, the minister should study this really particular situation we had last year and try to improve the situation of the industrial milk producers. I know that the system is different in various provinces but in Quebec there is a situation of fact and we have enough members opposite to indicate to the minister the importance of the problems that now face the industrial milk producers.

So what are they going to do? Are they going to let them sell part of their herds? Are they going to let the producers keep on sending their herds to auctions? I think these questions should be asked and the Federation of Industrial Milk Producers of Quebec has certainly very serious reasons to ask for the resignation of the CDC. If the minister means that the Quebec federation is wrong, he should say so. If he means that an important part of the dairy production of Quebec should be lost, he should also say so. I think it is important that all these questions be answered and it is also important that the CDC seriously consider the difficulties that face the milk producers in Quebec. Mr. Chairman, I would have many other things to say but I understand by your last sign that we are nearing ten o'clock. May I say that it is ten o'clock?

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being after 9.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 9(a) and 9(c) of Standing Order 58, to interrupt these proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the proceedings.

Shall Agriculture—Vote 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Agriculture—Vote 1 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF PRO-RATED PENSION FOR WIDOWS OF PENSIONERS WHOSE DISABILITY WAS LESS THAN 48 PER CENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, May 17, as recorded in Hansard, page 13561, I put the following question to my hon. friend, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald):

> Now that Bill C-92, which provides compensation for Canadian veterans who were pensioners of war, is in effect, will the minister and his department study the possibility of bringing in legislation to implement one of the recommendations of the Seventh Report of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs which was not included in Bill C-92, namely, the provision of pro-rated pensions for widows of veterans where the veteran's disability pension was less than 48 per cent.

I was grateful to the minister on Monday for at least leaving the door open, and I am grateful to him for being here this evening for this late show when we are discussing this important question.

A great deal of gratitude is being expressed by veterans in this country for Bill C-92, which provides compensation for former prisoners of war. But there are some who are aware of the fact that when the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs recommended the provisions which are now in Bill C-92, it also recommended what was implied in my question, that the Pension Act should be amended to provide pro-rated pensions for widows of veterans where the veteran's disability pension was less than 48 per cent. As hon. members are aware, if a veteran was on a pension of 48 per cent or more, his widow draws a full widow's pension under the Pension Act. But if the veteran's disability pension was less than 48 per cent, the widow is cut off completely from any widow's pension as a matter of right.

This matter has been the subject of discussion for many years, and I can say that in recent years the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs has recommended, at least three or perhaps four times, a provision such as the one contained in the report we tabled on June 12, 1975.

The minister is aware of the arguments, just as I am, and I shall not try to repeat them tonight; but I do feel that now that we have Bill C-92 on the statute books, this piece of unfinished business should be raised again so that we can press the minister to push hard for it both in the department and with his colleagues in cabinet. It seems most unfair that there is this cut-off point. None of us has ever suggested that the widow's pension should be 100 per cent in the case where the veteran's disability pension was of a low percentage but we are suggesting that where the veteran's disability pension was below 48 per cent there should be a pro-rated pension for the widow of that veteran.

I appeal to the minister's concern in this matter, to his well established sympathy for veterans' widows, and to the capacity he has shown to win at least some gains from his fellow cabinet ministers.

Before I sit down may I remind the minister that in my supplementary question the other day I also referred to the fact that, although the committee had recommended that the compensation for prisoners of war should be available to all former prisoners of war, the act as it is now on the statute books covers only those who were prisoners of war in World War II. The number of World War I veterans who were prisoners and are still alive is now very limited and I hope consideration may be given to covering them, as well, under an amended form of Bill C-92.

I again thank the minister for coming back this evening to hear my pleas on these two points. I do not expect an answer tonight as to when legislation is going to be introduced, but I do express the hope that he will work hard on these two important points.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to reply to the question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) regarding the suggested provision of pro-rated pensions for widows of pensioners whose disability was less than 48 per cent.

I am aware, and the government is aware, that recommendations have been made to provide pro rata pensions for widows of disability pensioners. At the present time a widow will be pensioned if her husband's death was attributable to service or was incurred during wartime. In addition, if her husband's pensionable disabilities were assessed at 48 per cent or more during his lifetime, she would be eligible for widow's pension.

I believe that percentage was selected because at that rate they were obviously seriously disabled and it was considered that the pensionable condition might play a part, however small, in the pensioner's death. On the other hand, if someone is pensioned at 5 per cent for flat feet and dies from a different cause, his death bears no relationship to his pensioned condition and the question arises as to whether a pension should be paid for an unrelated death.

Canada does not take a back seat to any country in so far as our pension legislation is concerned. The benefits we provide for the disabled serviceman or woman or their surviving dependants are far greater than those provided by most other countries. I am not aware of any of our major western wartime allies who pay automatic survivor benefits to widows on any basis even approaching the 48 per cent basis which we in Canada use.

Having said that, I must also say that the entire matter of veterans benefits, and that includes pro rated widow's pensions, is always under constant review by the Department of Veterans Affairs and by the Canadian Pension Commission and the other agencies of my ministry, to see what changes can be made to improve the lot of the veterans and their dependants.

IMMIGRATION—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF DUBÉ INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, since 1973 the federal government has been conducting intensively a comprehensive review of Canada's immigration policy. With the publication of the green paper on immigration in December, 1974, the final report of the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy in November, 1975, and the Economic Council of Canada reports "Options for Growth" in 1975 and "People and Jobs Study" in 1976, the government should have sufficient information and enough recommendations for an up to date Immigration Act helping to direct the flow of future immigrants and the population growth in our country.

Canada's exceptional economic growth is due not just to good governments, but above all to its human resources—the brave, hardworking settlers from France, the United Kingdom, Ireland, and other countries of Europe, and from other continents. The energies and talents of these settlers and of the immigrants who followed them are making an increasing contribution to the development, defence, and prosperity of Canada. Today new pressures and needs have arisen and they are clamouring for attention and solution which we should provide without fear because we are a nation with sufficient diversity and richness, as well as productive capacity, and an awareness of our international responsibilities. Therefore there is no reason to further delay action in this matter.

It is becoming more and more urgent to deal quickly with these new problems, the results of our anachronistic, obsolescent, and unfair laws, regulations and attitudes. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) has promised us a new Immigration Act for this fall. In the meantime problems, abuses, frustration and, indeed, personal tragedies are piling up. As a result Judge Claire L'Heureux-Dubé was appointed special commissioner to conduct an inquiry into certain problems in the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

In January, 1976, the commissioner submitted a report outlining just a few flagrant shortcomings and recommending ways in which the minister should, on an urgent basis, put some order into the application of current regulations and practices. Among others, the commissioner made statements urging improvements in the legal representation available to visitors, and recommending the expansion of legal aid plans as well as the establishment of a system of control over those representing persons dealing with the immigration department in order to ensure a standard of competence and ethics.

The commissioner called attention in paragraph 370 of the report to the need to prevent the exploitation of persons wishing to become landed immigrants by ensuring adequate information services both here and abroad. There is a great need to provide appropriate information in the language of the visitor and of the potential immigrant to Canada. Furthermore, there is even today a lack of sufficient numbers of expert interpreters whose services are available to people seeking assistance from the Immigration Department.

Another serious aspect of the immigration issue is the working of the appeal system. I should like to refer to the testimony of the chairperson of the Immigration Appeal Board before the Special Joint Committee on September 23, 1975, which revealed that the appeal system is, and I quote:

—unnecessarily complex, cumbersome and unjust and that the present appeal system to the Board in relation to refugees and citizenship claims is a shambles, and something has to be done about it.

The chairperson of the Appeal Board went on to make at least three very good recommendations. We are all waiting for long overdue action on these recommendations, for justice delayed is justice denied.

[Translation]

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Judge l'Heureux-Dubé has clearly indicated in her report that the legislation in force in 1972 had given rise to some problems at that time. Since then however, the Immigration Act and its regulations as well as the Immigration Appeal Board Act have been substantially altered to correct some problems mentioned in the report of Judge Dubé. The changes are briefly as follows:

a) In November 1972, any individual who wanted to immigrate to Canada had to file an application to one of our offices abroad; b) during the same year, some regulations concerning employment visas were enforced to enable the department to control the number of non-immigrants accepting employment in Canada; c) in 1973, the Immigration Appeal Board Act was amended to restrict the right of appeal to some group of persons; d) in 1974, amendments were brought to the immigration regulations so that the selection procedure would be more responsive to the needs of the labour market.

The actions taken following Judge Dubé's report are as follows: a) four of the six persons judged severely by the report no longer work for the department, and the disciplinary actions recommended in the report were taken against the other two. Briefly here are the disciplinary measures taken in each case:

1. Laurence Doirion—fired

2. Georges-Étienne Desrochers—retired before the report was published

3. Brian Purdon—fired

4. Vic Bellemare—fired

5. Gaston Therrien—suspended (10 days)

6. R. Primeau—severely admonished

b) Selection procedures for the training and supervision of immigration officers were improved, and we intend to do more in this area. c) We followed the recommendation whereby we should increase our investigation and enforcement methods. d) To protect work visa holders against exploitation we took the following steps: First, regularly check working conditions; second, consider the possibility of imposing severe penalties to employers posting false employment conditions; third, give the employment visa holder a letter explaining to him his rights, his salary and the employment conditions that the employer undertook to respect.

Following the Dubé report certain policies are now subject to revision: the l'Heureux-Dubé report clearly expresses the opinion—which we share—that our legislation on immigration is outmoded and behind the times. So all efforts are being coordinated to introduce as soon as possible in this House a new legislation on immigration. However, we are now reviewing a number of recommendations contained in the report to be able to bring about the necessary corrections. So here is in a concise form the steps we took on the basis of those recommendations:

1—The department is expanding its training program and considering the systems used in Britain and the United States.

2—We are amending the regulations and guidelines applicable to applications for permanent residence by "businessmen".

3—Improvement has already been brought about to ensure better checks at ports of entry and more efficient methods of investigation.

4—We are considering the possibilities of requiring a visa from visitors from countries from which come a substantial number of people without legal immigrant status. Indeed, that problem is part of a much larger situation.

5—Setting up a system whereby employers must check the right to work of an applicant before hiring him; that procedure requires changes to the legislation and regulations, and the use—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but his allotted time has expired.

IMMIGRATION—REQUEST FOR EARLY DECISION ON APPLICATION OF STEVEN BADGER FOR LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) whether he would review the application for landed immigrant status of one Steve Badger, and Australian citizen who wants to swim for the Canadian Olympic team. Support for this view has come from many supporters of Canada's Olympic effort. In fact it is backed by the Canadian Olympic Association, it has been backed by various editorials, and it has been backed by various newspaper articles. Badger himself has said that he cannot afford the price of a plane ticket back to Australia, and he hopes to stay in Canada to take out Canadian citizenship and become a Canadian citizen.

[Mr. Portelance.]

Added to that, Mr. Speaker, he has received job offers both from national and provincial swimming associations. If he had the opportunity of reapplying outside of Canada, as he did in San Francisco a little while ago, he would in fact qualify under all the terms of the Immigration Act. Not only that but the Department of National Health and Welfare expends millions of dollars encouraging fitness and participaction. Our Olympic athletes are supported by that department and I know that the officials of that department would like to see Steve Badger swim for Canada.

This afternoon the minister tried to sluff off his responsibilities and brought out the so-called Commonwealth switch, arguing that if Badger wants to become a citizen of Canada, if Bill C-20 is passed three years' residency would be necessary before he could do so, so he still could not swim for Canada in 1976. Mr. Speaker, that simply is not true. Under the IOC rules, section 28(4) provides that he would do so only one year after the date on which the person concerned last represented his former country, but in this case only with the agreement of the two national sports federations, the approval of the relevant international federation, and the permission of the IOC.

Steve Badger has also received permission from the Australian Olympic Committee. He has received permission from the Canadian Olympic Committee. These two bodies have talked to FINA, which is in charge of the international scene, and FINA has told them that once the documentation is in its hands IOC approval should be forthcoming and it sees absolutely no problem. And so, Mr. Speaker, citizenship is not the issue.

The real issue is this. The minister does not want to take a new look at this situation. He says that he does not want to make exceptions. I want to show the House the exceptions that the department is making which are a travesty and a shame.

A document from the minister received in my office today shows that last year, 1975, 21,202 ministerial approvals were made, and I should like to refer to some of them. There were 468 approvals of persons who had been convicted or admitted to having committed crimes involving moral terpitude; there were seven approvals of prostitutes, homosexuals or persons living off the avails of prostitution or homosexuality; 52 persons using, selling or distributing drugs, and one person likely to engage in activity detrimental to the security of Canada. There were 20,304 persons who could not or did not comply with any of the conditions or regulations of the Immigration Act or the regulations and orders under it.

If I sound agitated today it is because I am. I am incredulous at what has gone on in the Department of Immigration. Is this the type of people we want? The minister has the power to change the whole situation. Mr. Badger could swim for Canada. He could win a medal, the Canadian flag could be raised at the Olympic site and the anthem could be played. He could be representing us, but he is not good enough for the administration or the department, but apparently pimps, prostitutes, and others who are likely to be a risk to our security are acceptable.

I simply want to conclude by saying I do not want a stock answer from the parliamentary secretary. I want him to review this case. Let me quote one paragraph from the Winnipeg Tribune of May 8 as follows:

> Surely officials of this department can lift their noses out of their sacred rule books and see before them a young man who has said he wants to swim for Canada, wants to practice law in Canada after graduation, and most important, wants to help other young Canadian swimmers. Or is Canada over-stocked with individuals of such special abilities?

What are we doing in this country? There are people who are willing to contribute and offer support. In fact there is a petition which came from Winnipeg today with 5,000 names. They know Steve Badger. They know he wants to qualify and can fulfil the requirements. He cannot qualify, but someone who has broken the law apparently can. Mr. Speaker, I want an answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to explain briefly the remarks made this afternoon by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) in answer to the question of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) concerning Mr. Steven Badger. First I want to make it clear that the present immigrant status enjoyed by Mr. Badger is not corollary to his eventually becoming a member of the Canadian Olympic swimming team. The latter case is exclusively subject to the Olympic rules.

These rules first require that competitors be citizens of the country they represent. Under the Canadian citizenship legislation, Mr. Badger would therefore have, in order to apply for citizenship in our country, to have been a resident in Canada for five years. However, a more recent Olympic ruling applicable to the citizens of the Commonwealth travelling to member countries might allow Mr. Badger to swim with the Canadian Olympic team. Once again, the immigrant status of Mr. Badger in Canada would not be the deciding factor.

I should like to add certain facts pertaining to Mr. Badger's wish to obtain landed immigrant status in Canada: Mr. Badger first came to Canada as a student in November 1974. In September 1975, he went to our office in San Fransisco and applied for permanent residence in Canada. He then gave an address in Kansas City, though he lived in Canada under his status as a student. The request was therefore turned down since, as a student, Mr. Badger did not meet all selection criteria as an immigrant.

On February 17, 1976, Mr. Badger got in touch with our office in Winnipeg and requested permanent entry in Canada without leaving the country. We explained to Mr. Badger that he could not be allowed in as an immigrant. Humanitarian considerations alone could justify an exception to Canadian immigration criteria, and this case does not seem to involve any.

The eligibility of Mr. Badger for landed immigrant status does not depend at all on his success or his failure to become a member of our Olympic team.

According to the selection procedure, the people of all countries—except for sponsored people and refugees—must meet the same criteria to become immigrants. Mr. Badger is free to make his application at one of our offices abroad. If he did so, his case would be evaluated as in September last according to the criteria and his ability to become an immigrant would then be decided upon.

May I just add a few words concerning one of the remarks of the hon. member for Provencher in respect of the list of special permits. I would refer him to the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the committee of last Tuesday afternoon. At that committee an explanation was given concerning the reason these permits were issued.

SUGGESTED DESIGNATION OF MARKETING AGENCY AS FIRST RECEIVER OF IMPORTED EGGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to put forward a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. In the light of an apparently unique opportunity to benefit egg producers through reduced producer levels while simultaneously benefiting consumers through lower retail prices by the alternation of egg import policies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley):

That the government designate the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency as the applicant and first receiver of all imported eggs.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

REQUEST FOR DELAY OF INCREASE IN RATE ON RAPESEED PENDING CONSULTATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of utmost importance to Western Canada, that being the recent order in council of the federal government which will increase freight rates applicable to the movement of rapeseed products and which will in turn have the effect of curtailing one of Western Canada's most promising industries, namely, rapeseed processing. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith):

That the Ministry of Transport refrain from any such move until thorough consultation can take place between the affected parties in Western Canada and the question of rate structures can be examined in detail by the Standing Committee on Transportation of this House.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED APPROVAL OF USE OF FRENCH IN AIR-TO-GROUND COMMUNICATIONS IN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that French is one of the official languages of Canada, that it is even the primary language of work in Quebec, considering that French-speaking pilots request the authorization to use French in air-to-ground communications, at least within the limits of Quebec, and that it has been shown that the use of French can sometimes become an important security factor, as indicated in the statement by Arvida pilot Marcel Deschamps who could save his own life, that of a passenger and his aircraft thanks to the cooperation of the military air controller at CFB Bagotville and of the captain of military helicopter 08 who both agreed to speak French, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House unanimously approve the use of French in air communications over Quebec territory.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Matte: I did not hear anybody say no!

SUGGESTED REPRESENTATIONS TO SOVIET AUTHORITIES TO PREVENT INCARCERATION OF MR. MOROZ IN PSYCHIATRIC INSTITUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Ukrainian historian Valentyn Moroz who for a number of years has been in a Soviet prison, has recently been transferred to a psychiatric institution for later transfer to a prison psychiatric hospital. His wife has made an appeal to the West to prevent this transfer from occurring, since she believes he is not mentally ill.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather):

That the Parliament of Canada, through the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, make a representation to the Soviet authorities on humanitarian grounds with a view to preventing Mr. Moroz from being incarcerated in a psychiatric institution.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented to the House in the absence of unanimous consent. I might add that, in line with the ruling I made last week I have some serious misgivings about the jurisdictional aspect of this proposed motion—

An hon. Member: No!

Mr. Speaker: In any case, there not being consent, the motion cannot be put.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES IN SALE AND DISTRIBUTION OF LOTTERY TICKETS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity relating to irregularities in the sale and distribution of Olympic lottery tickets and also to the fact that, in the second to last lottery draw, there were 980,000 unsold tickets which remained on the computers, thus reducing considerably the chances of winning of ticket purchasers across the country. For the sake of public protection I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House instruct the Solicitor General to look into the aspects of irregularities relating to the sale and distribution of Olympic lottery tickets and confirm whether or not members of the RCMP are in fact investigating these irregularities, particularly the case relating to one Marcel Lambert of Montreal—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek:

—not to be confused with the illustrious member—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think we have to exercise caution that the content of a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 is sufficient to expose the urgency of the matter without embarking upon a debate of any sort. I think the hon. member has developed sufficient information to demonstrate the urgency of the motion.

Mr. Jelinek: Then, may I reword the motion, Mr. Speaker. I move that the Solicitor General look into these irregularities——and further obtain from the offices of Samson, Blair and Associates in Place Victoria in Montreal the records of the last lottery draw in order to determine the actuarial soundness and fairness of the Olympic lottery program.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ALLEGEDLY PREJUDICIAL EFFECT OF NEW OIL AND GAS LAND REGULATIONS ON SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE LAND CLAIMS—PAYMENT OF ROYALTIES TO NATIVES

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. It relates to the statement of policy on the proposed petroleum and natural gas act and the new Canada oil and gas land regulations tabled Wednesday afternoon by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the new policy is a joint statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and there is no reference whatever to northerners, in particular to the native people, and in view of the fact that the policy is one of exploitation of the north and northerners for southern needs without an over-all strategy for development of the north, would the Prime Minister not agree that this policy will prejudice responsible land claims settlements in the north?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Holmes: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Notwithstanding the fact that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development have skated around this most important issue, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether there is any provision in the new policy for the advancement of royalties to native people and, if not, will such provisions be included in the proposed legislation that we are to see at a later date?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, these matters are being discussed in various forums, some of which I described a few days ago. In particular, they are being discussed at the present time in direct negotiations with the peoples of the north, particularly the natives of the Yukon.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF PUBLIC HEARINGS BEFORE GRANTING OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION LICENCES—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I have some supplementary questions for the Minister of the Environment which arise out of this statement, together with the statement of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development entitled "Land and Environmental Control", which unfortunately does not seem to have been prepared in consultation with the Department of the Environment. In view of the statement of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that public hearings will accompany new development in the north, would the Minister of the Environment tell the House whether or not in his view oil and gas exploration licences and agreement require public hearings before their issuance?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. member wants to have a legal opinion or is asking for one right now on the morality aspect under the rules. I do not know what you have in mind.

Mr. Jarvis: A moral opinion will do.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I have no objection to Northern Affairs issuing the permits. I know this is done in co-operation with all departments concerned. I have been consulted and that is all I need.

METHOD OF CONTROLLING ISSUANCE OF LICENCES FOR OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I am trying to find out what consultative provisions there are. In view of the fact that the great bulk of resource development in the north will occur in the oil and gas sectors, will the minister tell the House how he or his associate, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, intend to control development in light of the fact that oil and gas regulations will come under the supervision of the resources management agency which, in my view, has no input from either his department or the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development? How does he intend to control the issuance of the licences?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): I think the best example we have of this is what happened in respect of the Beaufort Sea. The department was consulted all the way along and the decision was made by cabinet after consideration of all aspects of the situation. I think it is the role of the department to bring to the attention of the cabinet all of the environmental aspects of development in the north, and I intend to keep doing that. I think it is the normal process.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the Minister, but there are no regulations that ensure this. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development used the words "environmentally insignificant exploration activities". I should like to ask the Minister of the Environment what he considers as environmentally insignificant exploration activities and where these activities are potentially likely? I have used used the words of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but what do they mean to the Minister of the Environment?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be proper for me to interpret what the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development meant by the expression quoted. I think the hon. member should put the question to the minister who can tell him exactly what he meant by it.

REASON FOR PAYMENT TO CANADIAN PACIFIC FOR RAIL SERVICE IN QUEBEC-MONTREAL AREA PRIOR TO COMPLETION OF STUDY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Considering that just about a week ago his department took steps to initiate a study on passenger rail transportation in the Quebec-Montreal area on the one hand, and the Toronto-Windsor area on the other, and that this study is supposed to be completed by July of this year, will he explain the extraordinary announcement which involves $30 million as a gift to the CPR for expanded rail services at this time in the Quebec-Montreal area? Will he tell us why the money was given to the CPR now before he has the results of the study, and can he say why it was given to the CPR when the CNR already has much better service in the area? Finally, can he tell us if this has anything to do with the beginning of the public advertising by the Liberal party in Quebec for the next provincial election?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, let me dispose, first of all, of the last suggestion which, of course, is completely ridiculous, and I say so straightforwardly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: The study that has been going on of the sections of tract in the Quebec-Windsor corridor has been on much longer than just the week to which the hon. member referred. It is our intention to see progressive improvement on the whole section as, indeed, in other parts of railway sections throughout the country as passenger service is committed to them in line with the new policy of more complete compensation. I think the hon. member made something of a mistake in thinking of the $30 million as a gift to the CPR. It is a part of the over-all program which will have us bearing certain parts of the cost where upgrading and improvement in services are planned.

Of course, in the particular case of choosing one line, it will be that line where the expenditure will be made. What is really involved is that in the case of the Quebec-Montreal section, it has been our judgment that the particular rail line on which passenger services will be run efficiently in the future with new trains happens to be the CPR line.

Mr. Jarvis: Why?

Mr. Lang: Because it is our judgment that this is the best line for that service. We will in fact be selecting lines in that fashion throughout the country, and we hope that the actual operations of passenger services will in fact be under the management of one joint company, and not particularly the CPR. No doubt the CNR will have the greater part to play in it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBILITY CROWN AGENCY WILL RUN RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the minister said it was not a gift, but I remind him that it is a 100 per cent subsidy, so he can call it what he likes. My supplementary question refers back to the Liberal party's campaign promise in the 1974 general election in which it was asserted that a new Crown agency of some sort was to be established to take over existing CPR and CNR passenger services. I put this question to the minister: Does the government still intend to go ahead with this plan or does this announcement by him in an ad hoc way mean the government is planning to abandon that proposal or when it implements it will we buy back from CP the $30 million gift we are giving it?

● (1120)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I really find it extraordinary that the Leader of the New Democratic Party has not seen in this announcement the simple continuation of what was clearly indicated in my policy statement to the House of Commons in January. This simply is an implementation, which was indicated at that time, of one phase of the over-all program. I indicated at that time that whereas initially we had thought in terms of a new corporation to operate the passenger service which might be a direct government Crown corporation, we had judged at that point in time that it might be better to have a company which was really formed by CN-CP, much like the telecommunications operation, rather than come in with our own. But we do believe one company has to be operating passenger rail service in this country in order to have efficient and good passenger service. We will fall back upon our own creature if that is required.

This $30 million is not a transfer of money but will be compensation for a specific cost outlay in passenger service. Again in the policy statement it was made clear that we believed it essential to move to a total compensation system in order to have a good rail passenger system. The alternative simply is that the railways have to find cash by taxing other goods or they run down their service. We believe that if there is good rail passenger service in this country it must be paid for by the passengers or the taxpayers. It is as simple as that.

REASON FOR DEALING WITH PASSENGER SERVICE ON PIECEMEAL BASIS RATHER THAN AWAIT COMPLETION OF STUDY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): The CP has been systematically dismantling its service for 15 years. That is as simple as that. I do not know why the minister did not bail out the CN instead of the CP.

My final supplementary, Mr. Speaker, is: Given the obvious intention of the minister's department to now dismantle on a piecemeal basis a good deal of the passenger service—and I am thinking in particular of western Canada which should be of some passing concern to the minister—could he tell us why he is proceeding on this piecemeal basis with the decision in Montreal when he has a report just initiated, I repeat, a week ago which is not due until July covering that area and before he finally presents to the House of Commons an over-all integrated national transportation system.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party once again talks about piecemeal style. I presume he would want us to fix a particular point in time when all the tracks that are to be lifted and replaced are moved simultaneously, otherwise, it is a piecemeal program. That is nonsense.

Mr. Broadbent: It is not nonsense.

Mr. Lang: The announcement yesterday indicated that we were progressively moving in relation to all rail areas in Canada where passenger service is justified. We propose to do that. Indeed, in the very announcement yesterday, it was indicated that the tender call would be a request for prices on up to ten new trains, of which only three would be in the Quebec-Montreal corridor. If it should turn out between the time these are in and we have made our evaluation that we can go for the larger number of trains, we will do so and be that much further ahead in terms of service. The announcement also indicated that we did not expect a delay in improvements in rail passenger service in other areas but that that could proceed progressively. It is our objective to have good rail passenger service in this country wherever we can afford it, but it is also our objective to recognize the interest of the taxpayers in not maintaining service where good alternate service is available.

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF FEDERAL SUBSIDY TO PERMIT HANDBALL TEAM TO PARTICIPATE—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In answer to a question I put to him with regard to the discrimination, boycotting or segregating that may exist in the participation of athletes in the Montreal Olympic Games, the minister said that in all cases brought to his attention he had not found a single incident based on discrimination. Here is my question: Is the minister aware of the three articles published in the newspaper La Presse on May 6, 7 and 8 last, signed by François Béliveau and dealing with this subject, and more specifically has he looked into the case of the national handball team made up mostly of Quebecers which team, until recently, received no government subsidy because it was not representative enough of Canada, that is, because it was more representative of Quebec?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I had a quick look at the articles in question, but did not have the opportunity of looking into the case any further. Should the hon. member want me to do so, I should be pleased to meet his wishes but, to my mind, it does not necessarily constitute a case of discrimination. However, if more specific details are given, I shall have a closer look at the point brought up by the hon. member.

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY OF BROADENING TERMS OF REFERENCE OF INQUIRY INTO USE OF BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. Having in mind the very timely and appropriate words of the Official Languages Commissioner as used in the press release earlier this week to the effect that the only sensible language of aviation is that of safety, and taking into account the discussions which the minister had with the controllers on Wednesday of this week, I believe, can the minister now clarify for the House and the country the terms of reference of the public inquiry into safety in the air space over the province of Quebec and tell us whether and in what respect the terms of reference have been broadened?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, while negotiations are going on I do not think I would want to add to the words I have already used about the general direction. Of course, I can say to the hon. member that I, myself, have said a number of times something similar to what Mr. Spicer has said, indicating that safety had to be pre-eminent. Indeed, our whole procedure in moving toward the use of French and English in air traffic control in Quebec was dictated with safety in mind, that is, in going to the two languages for visual flight at the first five airports. Also safety is the pre-eminent watchword in the development of procedures as we move forward with that program.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I ask the minister then what long range plans he has in mind for ensuring that air traffic controllers will not have to vote again on a walkout in order to be heard on matters affecting air safety. In other words, what steps are in hand to ensure that confrontation is replaced by consensus?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, they certainly do not have to resort to any vote in order to be heard. Indeed, we have been consulting with them constantly and any absence of consultation has only been on occasions when they were unable to attend a meeting. Certainly, they have been fully involved in preparations at each stage and in each task force. I have agreed that they will participate in the simulation experiments, for instance, but they have not attended at this time because they were busy with negotiations and not for any other reason.

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF FINANCE BRANCH AT WINNIPEG BY AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I informed the minister that Warnock Hersey Limited of which Yves Ménard, a former Air Canada vice president, is a director owed Air Canada for 400 air tickets. Last Friday, the day after I raised the matter in the House, a bank transfer for $44,000 was received by Air Canada in Winnipeg to pay for the 400 missing tickets, but this has presented another problem. The Warnock Hersey account is missing and Air Canada does not know where to apply the money. Will the minister now reconsider and have the Auditor General's department conduct an immediate investigation and establish a proper account system at the Air Canada finance branch in Winnipeg?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is my basic belief that the management of Air Canada should be left to the management of Air Canada, and I am sure they will do a good job.

An hon. Member: Mismanagement.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF FINANCE BRANCH AT WINNIPEG AND ASSURANCE BRANCH NOT MOVED TO MONTREAL

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): That certainly is not my belief. I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister in view of the fact that the Minister of Transport is not prepared to take any action. I should like to point out to the Prime minister that, since there are no longer any enforced controls on travel agents reporting ticket sales and, as of October, 1975, there were an excess of 96,000 unreported travel agent ticket sales, which represents a minimum of $2,208,000 unpaid for transportation, will the Prime Minister launch an immediate investigation and also give an assurance that the finance branch will not be moved to Montreal? Will he also check to see when the lease expires in the Richardson Building in Winnipeg?

● (1130)

An hon. Member: What building?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the very question, which is a mishmash of various questions, is proof positive that the government should not be trying to run one of its Crown corporations from the floor of the House of Commons. I note that the hon. member does not agree with that view, but if he wants us to start interfering with the management of Crown corporations, he had better stand up and say that that is his party's policy, and then we will consider whether it is worth taking seriously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Since when did you ask our position on anything?

Mr. McKenzie: We are talking about public money and taxpayers' money, and I would like to point out to the Prime Minister that at the present time there are employees sitting in the offices doing nothing.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member was permitted a rather strong representation as a preliminary to his second supplementary. In this question I wonder whether he would go directly to the question.

Mr. McKenzie: Yes, I can go directly to the question. Air Canada is paying outside contractors $6 per hour to do ticket sorting while ticket sorters are sitting idle in the offices of the Winnipeg finance branch, and I think the Prime Minister is going to have to take some responsibility here to get this mess cleaned up.

Mr. Trudeau: The only responsibility I will take at this present time is the one which the Minister of Transport properly took in answering the question. We will refer the concerns of the hon. member to the Crown corporation and trust it to deal with them properly. If the Crown corporation does not deal with them properly, surely that will be brought to light by the report of the accountants who audit the books of the corporation. The hon. member shakes his head, but this is the principle of Crown corporations. They should not be managed on a day to day basis by the government, even upon representations in the House of Commons. For instance, frequently representations are made about the CBC. The hon. member, and certainly his party, would not like us to interfere with the management of the CBC, in spite of the representations they make. We refer these questions to the Crown corporations and trust that they will be dealt with fairly.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR CONSULTATION WITH UNION REPRESENTATIVES CONCERNING DANGER OF CANCER CAUSED BY BLUE FIBRE ASBESTOS

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the government reached any decision regarding the banning of the import into Canada of blue fibre asbestos? I ask this question again in view of the danger to workers of a fatal cancer caused by blue fibre asbestos. Will the minister undertake to consult, with respect to this danger and this request, with the unions representing workers at the Johns-Manville plant in Scarborough?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, a while ago the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and myself announced our intention to proceed to the banning of blue fibre asbestos. There have been consultations with the firm involved after it made further scientific representations. We have since examined those further scientific representations. We have come to the conclusion that those representations were not of such a nature as to change our original intention. My colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, intends to make an announcement shortly on this subject, and I think he should be the one to answer with regard to this particular aspect.

As far as the latter part of the question is concerned, I am pleased to receive the representation of the hon. member with regard to the unions concerned. I will instruct my officials to make themselves available to the union officials, at their convenience, and to make available to them the scientific information we have on this particular subject.

SUGGESTED INTEGRATION OF CANADIAN PACIFIC AND CANADIAN NATIONAL PASSENGER SERVICES IN TORONTO-WINDSOR AREA

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the area between Windsor and Toronto is the most densely populated area along the entire length of the proposed corridor and that the CPR has been permitted over the years to evade its responsibilities by discontinuing passenger services totally in this area, despite the fact that it has the best operating line which does not need any subsidy, can the minister assure the House that it is his intention to restore CPR passenger services in that area and to integrate the CPR lines, which are the better lines, with the CNR lines? If so, when will he have an answer?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the representation from the hon. member that we might consider which line is indeed the better line for service between Toronto and Windsor as between the CPR and the CNR and not just automatically choose one over the other on some a priori criteria. I will certainly be glad to make a thorough re-examination of the question of the communities involved and the type of service which would be involved on the two lines.

Mr. Saltsman: In view of the great importance of the restoration of passenger service in many areas of southern Ontario, and into Bruce peninsula as well, will the minister assure the House that he will invite representations from the affected communities so that they can put their cases to his department in order to get the CPR to restore its services?

Mr. Lang: I will be very glad indeed to receive representations.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ORIGINAL UNSIGNED CONTRACT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services. Yesterday on a point of order raised by the hon. member for New Westminster the minister undertook to table a letter of agreement dated March 31, 1976 and articles of a negotiated draft contract referred to in the letter of agreement involving the contract dealing with the Orion, but earlier in the question period he indicated that he would not table the unsigned contract. In view of what he said after the preliminary question by the hon. member for Victoria, has the minister considered his position, and would he reconsider his position and table the original unsigned contract requested by the hon. member for Victoria so that the House may have all the documents with respect to the matter.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the rationale behind tabling the letter of agreement is that it constitutes an authorization of payment, and I said that I was also going to table the articles related to the letter of agreement because this was the whole contractual agreement we had with Lockheed. Otherwise, there is no contract as such, and I cannot table in the House an unsigned document.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am sure that with the unanimous consent of the House the minister could table anything. In any event, the reason the question is asked—and I think the minister should know this—is that there may well be more to this in terms of public examination which should take place than merely the authorization of payment, terms and condition and a number of other things which were in the contemplation of the parties. Would the minister please reconsider and table the unsigned document, so that the House and not the minister alone can make a judgment with respect to what is contained in that document? Otherwise, the minister is withholding, perhaps, some information, and I wish he would reconsider the matter in that regard.

Mr. Goyer: This is totally untrue. As a matter of fact, I stated in the House that I was going to table the contract in the eventuality of the signing of the contract, so that would have then become public. We had nothing to hide. However, the problem is that now there is no legal obligation, according to this proposed contract, so why should it be tabled? In the event there is another contract, of course, it would be.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The minister asked why it should be tabled. The reason that these questions are being asked is that there are reports that Lockheed and the government may have been discussing matters yesterday, and in order to consider the results, if any, of those discussions I think it is fair and important to hon. members and to the country to know the original basis of discussion so that judgments can be made. In view of that would the minister consider again—he can consider it overnight—tabling this unsigned contract, in view of the reports that negotiations are continuing with Lockheed? How can we make a comparison?

● (1140)

Mr. Goyer: I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, that the arguments of the hon. member have not changed my mind.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO IMPROVE ECONOMY OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion but no doubt the acting minister can handle it. It concerns the recent report of the Atlantic Development Council, a body established by the minister's department and is in regard to the effect of the Regional Development Incentives Act upon the economy of Atlantic Canada. Considering the depressing and discouraging findings of the council, can the minister advise if consideration will be given to new programs and planning which might actually improve the Atlantic economy and reverse the slowdown which the report notes?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Acting Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my colleague, as acting minister I shall be glad to convey the representations to him on his return.

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN RELATIONSHIPS WITH MUSEUMS CORPORATION

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State in his capacity as the minister responsible for lending assistance to the arts. It arises out of the resignation of the director of the National Gallery. What consideration is being given to a restructuring of the National Museums Corporation and its relationship with the National Gallery as the search for a new director of the gallery begins?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, that is not being contemplated at this time. As the hon. member knows representatives of the National Museums Corporation appeared before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts last year. They spent some time discussing the structure and answered most of the questions put by members at that time. I have reread the testimony and have the impression that there was some support for the structure. We should not lose sight of the fact that in the years since the corporation has been in place we now have 25 associate museums established across Canada which did not exist as such before and we have 30 new national exhibition centres. I think the record of the corporation has been quite commendable. I am not minimizing the fact that there may be problems, but in terms of the over-all thrust of the corporation, in my judgment it has served this country well.

CONTRIBUTION OF DR. BOGGS AS DIRECTOR—POSSIBILITY NEW DIRECTOR WILL BE A PROFESSIONAL

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the Secretary of State. I wonder whether he could say something about the contribution made by Dr. Boggs to the cultural life of this country and whether her successor will be a professional?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the question asked previously was about the corporation. I have said many times that Dr. Boggs' contribution not only to the National Gallery but to the cultural life of this country has been exceptional. It has been at the very highest level. I think the legacy of Dr. Boggs is found in the gallery today in the level of curators and research staff we have there as well as the obvious thrust toward the purchase of Canadian art. Everyone in the government, and on the other side as well, would, I am sure, want to join with me in saying that she has made a marvellous contribution to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: I can also confess that certain efforts were made to try to make her stay.

On the question of a successor, Mr. Speaker, a search committee has been formed and the decision by the chairman of the board of trustees is to make that search as wide as possible to cover all areas of interest in the gallery—artists through museum directors, etc. It will be a wide comprehensive search with the fullest possible participation.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ENSURE SERVICE TO VETERANS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA IN VIEW OF POSSIBLE STRIKE OF HOSPITAL WORKERS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Fortunately, the action taken by the British Columbia government yesterday has given a 21-day cooling off period but I should like to ask the minister what plans the government has to guarantee uninterrupted service to the hundreds of war veterans in hospitals in Vancouver in view of the prolonged hospital workers' strike in that province which has spread to seven of the hospitals in greater Vancouver?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have had no problem in British Columbia or many other provinces up to this time. In the past when we have had interruptions as a result of professional people going on strike, sufficient people have usually been retained by law to look after our veteran patients.

Mr. Clarke: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the minister's concern and I should like to ask if he will ensure—even though they have had no problem until now—that the service will continue uninterrupted in the event of the resumption of this strike?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, we are always very close to the situation. When our transfers are completed there is always a guarantee in there for care of patients. We have people situated in those hospitals who are responsible for the care of veterans. I can assure the hon. member that my department will be checking this. As of today, we will look into the situation.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR PRE-OLYMPIC BASKETBALL TOURNAMENT AT HAMILTON

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I wonder whether he or someone in his department could say whether there has been any confirmation of financial assistance to the pre-Olympic basketball tournament which is to be held in Hamilton? The people of Hamilton are quite interested in this in view of their recent wonderful experience in Montreal when the Hamilton Finn Cups won the memorial cup?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have received numerous representations on this particular subject. I am pleased to confirm that I have approved a subsidy of $30,000 for the holding of these games.

POSSIBILITY OF MERGING OFFICES WITH MANPOWER CENTRES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. About a month ago I asked a question regarding joining together Canada Manpower centres and unemployment insurance offices. At that time the minister said he had previously answered that question. I looked back in Hansard and found that in fact he had put off the answer. Now that he has had a couple of months' respite, could the minister indicate to the House if he intends to join the function of the Canadian Manpower Centres and the unemployment insurance centres?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that we are seriously examining this option. If and when a decision to do so is made, it will be made public and in this House.

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS LAND USE REGULATIONS—FEDERAL JURISDICTION OVER OFFSHORE LANDS ON EAST COAST

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources but in his absence I shall direct it to the Prime Minister. The question relates to the proposed new Canada oil and gas land regulations and their application to offshore lands, particularly on the east coast. Since jurisdiction over the east coast offshore land is claimed by the provinces concerned, can the Prime Minister inform the House of the nature of its agreements with these provinces which allow the federal government to unilaterally set the land use regulations for these lands?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for Energy, Mines and Resources answered this question in the debate that ensued after the oil and gas regulations were announced earlier this week. He indicated that he was very hopeful that an agreement could be reached between the federal and provincial governments with regard to the royalties accruing to the government on the offshore oil and gas.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, is the parliamentary secretary able to offer any assurance to the House that any such agreement will precede the introduction of the land use regulations so that prior to asking the House to debate the subject of these proposed regulations members can be sure that a firm agreement has been reached with these provinces?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can give that assurance. I think we will go ahead with the legislation this fall and hope that a suitable agreement can be reached between the two levels of government.

GRAIN

STABILIZATION PROGRAM—ALLEGED INABILITY OF GOVERNMENT TO FULFIL FINANCIAL COMMITMENT TO PROGRAM

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the minister has been trying to sell the western grains stabilization program to producers for a considerable time, even as late as a month ago on a tour through western Canada, may I ask if he was aware at that time that the government would not be in a financial position to fulfil its commitment this year to that program which, according to the minister's figures, could be up to $100 million?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the fact that at this point in time an actual accounting item has not been put on to the books of the stabilization plan has no impact whatever upon the plan. In terms of the cash transfer, the money is owed to the plan and is earning interest. Notwithstanding the actual delay in payment, it will be made at any time a payment out of the plan is needed, or earlier if that meets the fiscal framework. I would hope the hon. member would not try to discourage anyone from joining the plan. Surely, he should realize that the plan is to the great advantage of each and every producer.

RATE OF INTEREST ON AMOUNT TO BE TRANSFERRED TO STABILIZATION FUND

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. Minister that I am trying to encourage people to enter the plan. Since producers are compelled to meet their commitment under this program to make a fund available for federal government use—which suggests that they are helping the government instead of the government assisting them—is the minister aware that more than double the financial burden of payment and interest will be placed on the federal treasury next year, which could create financial difficulty? The question is, will provision be made for it and can the minister inform the House what the interest rate will be for the outstanding amount as a result of this so-called sneaky trick?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the interest is the same as it would be if the amount were transferred, so that there is no difference whatever. It is not a trick. It is a matter of fiscal framework and the only time that the actual availability of the cash is important is at the time of the payout of the fund and that is assured.

COMMUNICATIONS

USE BY CREDIT COMPANIES OF COMPUTERS TO OBTAIN FUNDS FROM CARDHOLDER'S BANK ACCOUNT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications, although I recognize that this is an area that falls under multiple jurisdiction. It arises from press reports that Bank Americard, the American counterpart of Chargex, is moving in selected markets toward an electronic funds transfer system which would eventually replace most cash payments. Apparently Interbank, which issues Master Charge, is looking into a similar system. The initial steps involve use of a card which would allow merchants to get electronic access to a customer's bank account and to make withdrawals from his account without the issuing of a cheque. Has the minister been following what has been taking place in the United States, and can she tell the House whether she is aware of any plans by financial institutions to introduce such a program into Canadian markets within the next year or two?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is referring to the matter of privacy in the future use of computerized data. We have developed a plan for our own operations inside government departments whereby we will protect the privacy of individuals with regard to the data we have on them in the sense that one department will not be able to transmit to another information it has on a particular person. We hope that private companies in Canada will emulate what we are doing in our departments. However, we are following, and this is the question asked by the hon. member, developments in the United States in order to see how we in this country can protect the privacy of the individual in light of the developments in the computer industry.

TRANSPORT

EFFECT OF IMPROVEMENT IN TRAVEL TIME BETWEEN MONTREAL AND TORONTO ON RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in the statement issued by the Minister of Transport with regard to improved corridor rail service, he indicates that the present rail time between Montreal and Toronto is four hours and 50 minutes and the possible improved rail time will be about four and a half hours. Does he hope to improve service to the point where it will take only 20 minutes to get from Montreal to Toronto or that the time will be cut by only 20 minutes? If so, does he consider that enough change to affect rail travel between Montreal and Toronto?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that service between Toronto and Montreal is now really quite good and is attractive to passengers. The kinds of things that can be done with a reasonable amount of money will only make a marginal difference, but will still be justified. This is the very reason we have selected other parts of the scheme between Windsor and Quebec City for more dramatic action. In those cases, trip times can be improved rather significantly, particularly when new equipment is added which is as good or better than the Turbo equipment operating on the Toronto-Montreal line.

TYPE OF EQUIPMENT TO BE USED TO IMPROVE RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Have the Department of Transport and the railway companies made firm decisions with regard to the type of equipment they consider ideal in the circumstances or is this still a matter of research? In other words, has the government decided the optimum equipment for this run or is this still subject to research?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there have been some decisions about the numbers of trains in order to justify certain frequencies of routes. The exact type of train will be judged finally after the tenders have been received from various possible suppliers. Naturally, we have made some preliminary judgments about advantages and the like, but clearly cost will enter into it. We will make a final judgment after the bids have been received.

SPORTS

CANADA CUP HOCKEY SERIES—REQUEST FOR WIDER TELEVISION COVERAGE THAN IS PROVIDED BY CTV NETWORK

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare as minister responsible for the federal role in sports. Recently, the minister announced that the CTV network has been accorded the right to broadcast the Canada Cup hockey series next fall. Will the minister take steps to ensure that all Canadians, including those not living within the CTV viewing area, will in fact be able to see the broadcasts of the Canada Cup games?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the organizing committee proceeded on a negotiated tender basis between the two main networks in Canada. I have drawn to their attention the importance of having the widest possible coverage. It is true that the combination of the CTV English and French network will not have the same broad coverage as the CBC. Again, let me say that I have drawn this to the attention of the organizing committee. I am advised that discussions will likely take place between the CTV and CBC in the near future on this subject.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF INTERCITY RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday the minister announced he would be spending millions of dollars on improving intercity service in central Canada. Will he assure us today that he will shortly be announcing the establishment of intercity service in the prairies?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I previously announced our intention to start to improve all services in the west as well as in the Atlantic. Hearings now going on before the CTC will give some preliminary indication about which services can be justified and are desirable. It is our expectation that as soon as those decisions are made as to what service can be maintained, investment will be made as required for track and equipment to improve the services.

Mr. Nystrom: Will the minister give assurance that there will be an intercity passenger service in the prairies which in effect we do not have today?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that there will be good passenger service in the prairies. The exact nature of it and whether it would be classified as intercity as distinct from transcontinental really awaits the decision of the CTC. I expect there will be intercity links as well as transcontinental service.

HOUSING

EFFECT OF NEW REGULATIONS ON CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING PROGRAM IN NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, I will direct my question to the acting minister because it is urgent. In light of the new housing regulations which, according to knowledgeable people in the field, have completely destroyed a co-operative housing program pioneered over a 40-year period by the Extension Department of St. Francis Xavier University, indeed one which has been an example to all of North America, and because of the urgency to provide much needed housing for low income working families, will the minister have these new regulations investigated and eliminated?

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question, look into it immediately and report to the hon. member.

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS STRIKE

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Considering that there is a possibility of a strike by air traffic controllers, has the minister considered a mechanism to avoid this strike which would undoubtedly affect the whole country?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations are continuing, but there has been no settlement at this point. Therefore, the threat of strike remains.

ALLEGED BREAKDOWN OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister confirm or deny rumours within the past few hours that negotiations have in fact broken down between Treasury Board and the air traffic controllers? What is the present situation? If this is so, can the minister advise what possibility there is for renewed negotiations within a matter of hours or days, keeping in mind the vital importance of this to the whole country?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, following the meeting between myself, Mr. Livingston and a couple of his colleagues the day before yesterday, there was a meeting yesterday with the bargaining teams to discuss the specific terms of remuneration under the contract. It may be that no progress of any note was made at that time. I asked Mr. Livingston to meet me again this afternoon to discuss further the question of the terms of reference and so on, because I would like to bring that to a conclusion. We made some real progress in our previous discussion and really had very little disagreement. I thought that issue could be cleared out of the way. Mr. Livingston indicated that he is not able to meet with me, but I do not call that a breakdown in negotiations.

● (1200)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Minister of Supply and Services for coming back into the House. My point of order has to do with the answers he gave to my questions today. My question arose out of a question put to the minister yesterday by the hon. member for Victoria. It referred to the original document which was called an unsigned contract in the course of the question and the answer. In the course of his answer to the hon. member for Victoria, the minister said—and here I am quoting from page 13698 of Hansard:

> The document in question has not been signed by the parties and as such it simply does not exist, legally speaking.

Today I asked him to table a piece of paper which is an unsigned document, according to him, but I am wondering whether that is the case. I am wondering whether the minister might not inadvertantly have misled the House. The fact is, at the time the Lockheed negotiations came to the crunch it was reported to the press that the agreement had been made and signed, according to my recollection, and that it had been put into escrow awaiting confirmation of the financial arrangements. If that is the case, and if the government was speaking the truth when it spoke to the people of Canada on that occasion, there is at least some question that the effect and the nature of the document was much more than merely that of an unsigned piece of paper.

If the government was telling the truth when it made the announcement to the people of Canada that arrangements had been made, completed, signed, sealed and delivered subject to escrow relating only to confirmation of the financial arrangements, then the document sets out in detail the terms and conditions of the relationship between Lockheed and the government of Canada. It therefore becomes a significant documents in terms of public discussion of the situation concerning the Lockheed transaction. Moreover, in view of press reports that Lockheed is still sniffing around for a transaction, reports which have not been denied by the government, then in terms of any subsequent contract which might be negotiated the existence of the old arrangements setting out the terms and conditions of that relationship become important. I rise on a point of order to say that in the circumstances I have outlined the minister might well have misled the House as to the nature of the document referred to yesterday by the hon. member for Victoria and referred to by myself today.

I do not want to put the minister on the spot today, Mr. Speaker, but I would ask him to reconsider the decision he has taken and table that part of the documentation relating to a transaction which, by his own admission, will cost the country $16 million and, in the opinion of others, very much more. Does he not believe this is the kind of document which ought to be tabled? I feel that the minister should reconsider his position on the basis of these submissions. My point of order is that it would be contrary to parliamentary practice to fail to do so. It would be contrary to the principle that we ought to be given information with respect to this kind of undertaking. I ask the minister to reconsider the position he has taken, in all the circumstances.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a point of order to the Minister of Transport since the Prime Minister has left the House. The Prime Minister stated today, in regard to my question about Air Canada's financial branch, that it is not government policy to become involved in the affairs of a Crown corporation. I should like to point out to the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It appears that the hon. member is seeking to differ from or disagree with answers given to him during the question period. Opportunities to do this are provided in the course of debate. It is not fair to allow one member to rise on a point of order to pursue objections or disagreements which are really the subject of debate. If the hon. member has a point which concerns the order of business for the day, or in general, I will hear him.

Mr. McKenzie: My point of order is that the Estey report, which cost Canadian taxpayers $400,000, specifically states there are problems in Air Canada's financial branch, and the government will be fully justified in dispatching an auditor there because of what is contained in the Estey report.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I raised a point of order. There was no response from the minister with respect to the matter, nor was there any response from the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: The minister is in no way obliged to respond to the point of order which the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton raised. I believe the hon. member realizes that he did, in fact, make a strenuous representation to the minister, an extension of the question which had already been put to the minister three times, asking him to reconsider his decision with regard to the tabling of a document. If the minister wishes, he may respond, but he is certainly not obliged to do so.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, simply to clear up confusion I understand the hon. member and I would like to say that some very accurate distinctions should be made. They are not easy to make. The hon. member refers to a contract which was signed and put in escrow. It was dated April 30, 1976, but one condition for the escrow has not been met, namely the financing of the contract. It is understood that consequently the contract became null and void because the condition was not met. If we refer to March 30, we see that there was a draft agreement, a letter of agreement which continues to bind the parties and represents an obligation to pay up $16 million. This concerns the House. This document must necessarily be tabled, and I committed myself to do so when its translation is completed.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is confirmation of the signing of the document—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is obvious we are getting into discussion of the question itself.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order on the same subject. It concerns the minister's statement yesterday that he would table the document relating to the renewal of the option. However, he did not take the occasion today to rise under Standing Order 41(2) in order to do so. Perhaps he could explain why the document was not tabled. Surely there has been sufficient time for the translation to have been completed.

Mr. Goyer: The explanation is very simple. There are articles in the letter of agreement which we have to translate. This is not just a one-page clause in a contract; there are many pages. But the work is going on and probably on Monday I shall be in a position to table it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How about Tuesday?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

TABLING OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE REPORT ON APPEAL SYSTEM

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 41(2), I am pleased to table, in both official languages, copies of the Unemployment Insurance Advisory Committee's report on the appeal system, as well as copies of correspondence between the chairman of the committee and myself.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the Postmaster General is about to rise and make a statement on motions with respect to the operations of the Post Office which are the subject of an opposition motion today. In my respectful submission to Your Honour, it would be a bad practice to allow the minister to make a statement in any event on an opposition day. It is bad practice in terms of the use of time on a short day. This is particularly so when the statement may very well relate to the operation of a department that is the subject of discussion and on which a vote will later be put before the House. Under the circumstances, I do not think the minister should make his statement now; rather, he should make it during the course of his representations in discussing the estimates later this afternoon.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the point raised by the House leader of the official opposition, I had the same misgivings in this regard. The postal estimates are up for examination, and it is a short day. I am not in regular communication with the Conservative party but out of courtesy I did raise the question and asked them to determine which way they wanted it. I am quite prepared to withdraw my statement and to make it during the course of my remarks. The only reason I have brought it forward today rather than some time next week is to make certain that the opposition is made aware of what it contains, so that they will have ample opportunity to comment on it in debate. I circulated the statement many hours ago, but I will follow the advice of the hon. member and make my statement later.

Mr. Speaker: In fairness, I must say that the Chair had a misgiving similar to that which occurred to hon. members. It has been suggested that the minister might be prepared to incorporate his remarks vis-à-vis the statement in committee of the whole and that that course should be followed. I hope that the House, when it goes into committee of the whole, will take this as an expression at least of the will of the House and that in the initial stages questioning ought to be permitted. There are 20-minute speeches in committee of the whole and the questioning process could easily be thwarted if the minister's statement is followed by a number of lengthy speeches. If, in committee of the whole members do follow the practice of immediately questioning the minister and getting in a round or two of questions, this might solve the problem much more satisfactorily. Is that agreed?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to lead off with the statement, and I do not think there is any obligation on my part to do so. I am prepared to make a very short statement. There is no obligation on the opposition to answer that statement on motions. They can prepare their rebuttal or reply in the statements that they make during the course of discussing the estimates. I fully intend to participate in the debate during the rest of the day, but not necessarily as the first speaker. I think that is an option I have and which I should like to exercise.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The points have been well noted so far as the point of order is concerned. However, the minister has given an indication that he intends to make a statement. He has been called, and he has every right to do so. Under the Standing Orders, discretion is given to the Chair in regard to what steps should be taken respecting statements followed by questions, and I will hear some representations perhaps after I have heard the statement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the principle that the opposition House leader placed before us, namely, that the government should not steal time from the opposition by putting down a statement on an opposition day.

Mr. Gillies: Nor should the NDP, by speaking on points of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member will appreciate the fact that this point of order and the debate on it were started by the Progressive Conservative party. It seems to me that now we know about the statement and have copies of it, and since most of us know what is coming, it would be better to have a brief statement followed by brief replies, and we can do the rest in committee of the whole. If we go into committee of the whole and there are three opposition statements, and then the minister makes his statement, it is going to be a bit of a mess.

Mr. Speaker: In the final analysis I am going to have to hear the statement and be guided at that time as to what steps should be taken. However, before proceeding I understand that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has a document to table.

POST OFFICE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHANGE IN POSTAL RATES

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I will make my statement as concisely as possible and I will read it as fast as possible. I mention that the volume of mail has increased tremendously in the last four years, from 4 billion to 5.5 billion pieces. Our surveys on service which have been taken weekly and monthly indicate that the level of service now being acheived by the Post Office is more and more acceptable to the Canadian people.

I draw attention to postal rates in other countries and to the fact that we have not increased our rates for four years. The United States is now charging a basic first-class rate of 13 cents, the United Kingdom 17 cents, France 18 cents, and Australia 23 cents. During this period of four years, costs have risen for such things as labour, fuel, transportation, buildings and machinery. The gap between the cost of the service and the charge to our customers has continually widened.

More particularly, Post Office customers—and it may be of interest that 80 per cent of our mail is generated by 20 per cent of the users—have been asking us when we intend to increase our rates so that they can undertake their own planning for the future. We intend to introduce changes to the Post Office Act to deal with this whole question and our relationship with industry. Furthermore, in the interim we should like to introduce certain measures now in order to give as much notice as possible of how the Post Office is planning ahead. For this reason, using the authority under the Financial Administration Act, I intend to introduce an interim change in the basic first-class postal rates on September 1, 1976, from 8 cents to 10 cents, and a further increase in this rate on March 1, 1977, from 10 cents to 12 cents.

Canada Post Office recognizes that many of our customers were adversely affected by the recent postal disruptions. Consequently, some of the rate changes in other classes of mail will be graduated both to cushion the effect of the strike and to allow for longer range planning. As a result of strong representations made to me by my colleagues, in particular by the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) who is concerned for the welfare of the Canadian publishing industry, a 20 per cent increase in second-class mail rates will not take effect until March 1, 1977. I might point out that this is 20 per cent of the basic rate of five cents, so I am talking about a copper.

Changes in rates for other classes of mail, including the important third-class direct mail category, will go into effect on dates which are still under discussion with the appropriate parties. That is the association representing the bulk mail industry. The Post Office is planning a complete review of its rate structure in that category with the view to a more realistic determination of postal charges for the services rendered. There are some association which are currently using third-class mail for their publications, and these may warrant some form of government support or subsidy. I propose to review this question with my colleagues with the view to having certain departments assume the cost of any assistance which may be identified as a result of this review.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I want to agree immediately with the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) that there were some negotiations as to how we should handle the announcement that he has just made. When we moved into committee of supply yesterday there were discussions as to how we should proceed. We have got a little out of practise with the proper procedure in this regard.

When Your Honour indicated there were some precedents for making a statement of this kind on an opposition day, which today is going to be primarily concerned with Post Office affairs, I could see immediately that we were heading into some procedural difficulties. Now that the Postmaster General has made a statement, I will respond briefly and reserve my more detailed comments until we move into committee of the whole. The Postmaster General has chosen a rather unfortunate day to lead with his chin in this respect. He is an Irishman, and the Irish have a habit of doing things of this kind. There is another quality of the Irish which I think might be referred to at this juncture: they have the optimism of Finian in Finian's Rainbow.

Someone suggested, when we were discussing the announcement the Postmaster General was to make, that obviously the increased rates must be for the payment of the extended storage period required because of the continuing delay in the delivery of Canada's mail. My immediate response is to suggest to the Postmaster General that there is no evidence of restraint here. He must be having difficulty reconciling his role as Postmaster General in this respect with his new responsibility as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The proposed rate increase exceeds the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines and regulations. I suppose it is designed to overcome the growing deficit which has been increasing rather substantially with each passing year with the current deficit for the 1976-77 period estimated at some $630 million. Hon. members must agree that it requires a combination of sharply rising costs, mismanagement and inefficiency to run up a deficit of that size. That is a fair appraisal of the situation. The Postmaster General has frequently said there is a malaise, a sickness in the Post Office Department. We intend to suggest, during the course of the debate today, that this sickness or malaise still persists notwithstanding the optimistic note of the Postmaster General's statement this morning.

The statement was placed in an unfortunate context. The opening statement was to the effect that the Postmaster General restrained himself in announcing any increase in postal rates until the Post Office had achieved a satisfactory level of efficiency. In spite of reassuring statistics from postal officials about on-time delivery and efficiency, the public seems increasingly convinced that postal service has gone from bad to worse. I spend a good deal of my time, as Post Office critic, dealing with complaints which come in from all parts of Canada in respect of continuing problems of the Post Office Department. This will be substantiated by contributions my colleagues will make during the debate today. There is a steady stream of complaints. Everybody has heard stories of damaged, lost, stolen and delayed mail, sometimes with horrendous consequences. I am not sure I should move into this phase at the moment. Perhaps I could delay it until the study of the estimates in committee of the whole. I have a series of quotations from government departments, some as recent as March 15, which indicates they are less than happy with the Post Office Department. This has specific reference to the use of courier service. Let us have a look at the Privy Council Office complaints.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This whole process has put the Chair in a rather awkward spot. This is, again, an opposition day and it seems ironical that I should be considering restricting the time of an opposition member. There is, however, a format that has been set out. It would have been preferable had this been part of the proceedings of the committee of the whole. In any event, the minister's statement was very brief and it would have been awkward to start proceedings in the committee of the whole without the statement. It is now on the record. I wonder if I could invite hon. members to move as quickly as possible to the committee of the whole and continue questions then.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will save that for later and conclude my remarks by indicating that the increase has been justified in part by a reference to increases which have been announced over recent years in the United States and the United Kingdom. That also was an unfortunate context in which to place the statement, because customers in the United States are curtailing their use of the mails and turning to alternate services. As the rates go up, public resistance grows more firm and volumes drop even more, creating a vicious circle. In fact, I would suggest that the postal service is making the same mistake the railroads made, and in light of the discussions that took place in this House earlier today we realize the consequences of that decision to Canada. Obviously, when rates go up exorbitantly without a corresponding increase in efficiency of service, the Canadian public, particularly the business community which is the large user of postal services, will turn to cheaper and more efficient modes of communication.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I received two statements this morning in which there was a slight change. In part of the first paragraph of the first statement it is stated:

—recent surveys which indicate that the level of productivity achieved by the Post Office is becoming more and more acceptable to the Canadian people.

This was changed in the revised version as follows:

Recent surveys indicate that the level of service achieved by the Post Office is becoming more and more acceptable to the Canadian people.

That was a very necessary change because, obviously, productivity is not one of the great achievements of the Post Office Department, as we shall demonstrate during the discussion that takes place today. It is very important that we have this discussion today, and I will not prolong its commencement further at this stage.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the debate on the Post Office estimates I will be very brief in my remarks regarding the minister's announcement. It seems strange to me that a government committed to fighting inflation should propose a 50 per cent increase in the cost of first-class mail service by March of next year. It is doubly strange to me that this proposal is made by the Postmaster General who is also the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, because in that role he should be interested in knowing what this sharp increase will mean in the cost of living of every individual who uses the mail to send letters to friends and relatives, and every company that uses first-class mail for billing and other forms of business communication. They will all be affected by this sharp increase. In the case of the business community, this increase will be passed on to the consumer in the form of higher prices.

The NDP does not accept the principle that each part of the postal service must be self-sustaining or, indeed, that postal services must pay their way.

An hon. Member: Who is going to pay?

Mr. Orlikow: We believe there are some aspects of postal service, like aspects of health and other government services, which of necessity must be run with a deficit. We do not believe personal letters written to families and friends by individual citizens should necessarily cover the full cost of delivery. We believe that the reading of newspapers and magazines is so important to Canadians and the Canadian identity that the cost of this delivery service should be subsidized by the Canadian people as a whole.

● (1230)

In the same way, we question the good sense of increasing the cost of first-class mail at this time and it being done alone. We certainly object to the postponement of decisions in respect of the increase concerning third-class mail charges particularly when we realize that so much of the unsolicited mail—what is commonly referred to as junk mail—is moved and paid for as third-class mail. The latest figures I have for last indicate that there was a deficit of $130 million for third-class mail. It seems to us that the minister would have been much better advised to have sharply increased the rate for third-class mail, particularly junk mail before he increased the cost of first-class mail. We certainly object to that step being taken at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, before commenting on the minister's declaration, I would like to thank him for making a French copy available to us.

According to his statement, the purpose of the increase would be to reduce the deficit of the Canadian post office which, if I am not mistaken, amounted to some $500 million last year. I appreciate that the minister is right in believing that this increase is justified and that in advocating it he is only doing what is expected of him, just like a good soldier obeys his superiors. The only difference between him and a good soldier, as far as obeying orders is concerned, is that the minister receives his instructions from high financial circles and complies with a system which urges him to act the way he does, namely increase the postage.

In his statement, the minister said he was trying to make up for the deficit which was incurred last year. But do you really think that this will solve all the problems? I do not think so. It may help for a while but eventually the same situation will arise, perhaps within a few years. And that is because the system is inadequate and cannot meet the needs and expectations of the Canadian people.

For many years we, the Social Credit Party of Canada, have tried with every means available to us to make the government understand that all the economic problems we are facing proceed from our financial system. If the financial system were consistent with reality, there would be no inflation, not to mention deflation, nor any price increases.

We are sure, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians would see a gradual price decline as progress would show up in techniques and production processes. What we want most of all is that the government change its goals and its legislation implementation in order that they become fair for all Canadians, and thus the situation would improve. But as long as the government will not implement what we have tried for many years to make them understand, the same situation will prevail and we will sink ever deeper into the economic depression we are now facing.

We believe that the situation will improve if production is pushed up. To this end we have to work harder and harder, because we are a rich country, we have natural resources, we have large quantities of raw materials, and enough manpower. What else can we ask for? Yet we are faced in Canada with an unemployment rate of 9 per cent. There are people, and they are numerous, who cannot make both ends meet, and to cap it all a new increase has just been announced today.

At the present time, Mr. Speaker, we are mere slaves of finance and corporations, of this government. I think that should the government ever respect and protect the human being instead of finance, as is presently the case, inflation will have disappeared and it will be more pleasant to live, because there will be fewer thefts, less drugs, fewer murders, and certainly more mutual aid and understanding.

I am aware that the postal strike of last fall has underlined the problem of relations between wages and prices, and that the deficit which we experienced last year and which we will probably experience again this year, if it does not grow larger, will depend partly upon that and upon inflation in general, because, faced with a constantly increasing cost of living, and also to take advantage of the material and economic progress achieved each year and each day in our country, something must be done.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In exercising the discretion given to me under the rules, I think it is obvious that it would reflect most accurately the desire of all hon. members if the House were to move as swiftly as possible to the committee of the whole and deal with these matters there.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RELATING TO SEXUAL OFFENCES AGAINST JUVENILES

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-438, to amend the Criminal Code (sexual offences).

She said: Mr. Speaker, because of an inconsistency in the definition of the word "child", our Criminal Code appears to offer less protection to children than does most provincial legislation. The purpose of this bill is to remove this discrepancy and, by raising the age from under 14 to under 16, afford increased protection to juvenile victims of rape.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

EGG IMPORT PERMITS

Question No. 5,094—Mr. Murta:

1. What firms or individuals have received egg import permits from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the years 1975 and 1976 and what was the size of the permits?

2. What criteria are used to decide who receives egg import permits and the size of the permits?

3. What official or group of officials in the Department are responsible for administration of the programme?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. Information submitted on all applications for import permits is commercially confidential. Therefore, statistical information on imports for which permits have been granted is only on an aggregate basis to protect this confidentiality. In 1975, import permits were issued to 17 firms or individuals to import 36,000 cases of eggs under the global quota. In the same year to supplement the global quota, import permits were issued to 10 firms or individuals to import 40,350 cases. In the first four months of 1976, import permits were issued to 12 firms or individuals to import 23,250 cases of eggs. In the same period to supplement the global quota, import permits were issued to 12 firms or individuals to import 56,000 cases. Permits are normally issued by truckload quantities, or multiples thereof, one truckload being 750 cases of 30 dozen eggs.

2. Global Quota—Import permits for eggs issued under the global quota are allocated to importers on the basis of their historical record of imports. An allocation of up to 10 per cent of the global quota is available to accommodate new importers. Supplementary Import Quotas—If the Canadian market has requirements for eggs over and above that which can be supplied by Canadian production and the global import quota, supplementary import permits are issued following consultations with the trade, CEMA and Agriculture Canada.

3. Import permits are issued under the authority of the Export and Import Permits Act through the Export and Import Permits Division of the Department.

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL ADOPTION DESK

Question No. 5,305—Mr. Brisco:

Has the government begun negotiations with provincial government officials in order to obtain agreement as to the role and function of the proposed International Adoption Desk with a view towards facilitating the adoption of children from foreign countries by Canadian citizens and (a) if so, what is their present state of progress (b) if not, on what date does it plan to do so?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) Following a study on international and interprovincial adoptions by a federal-provincial committee, an Adoption Desk was established in the Social Service Programs Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare in October, 1975. The Desk has two components responsible for the co-ordination of interprovincial placements and international adoptions respectively. Operational guidelines for the Desk have been prepared and distributed for approval to the Provincial Ministers of Welfare. Policy and procedures documentation on international adoption has also been developed for distribution to Canadian missions abroad and foreign governments. Approval of this material has been received from seven provinces, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. With the co-operation of the Department of External Affairs and its missions abroad, the Desk is currently securing information on foreign adoption laws and procedures of other countries for dissemination to provincial social service departments and child welfare agencies. The Desk is presently assisting provincial child welfare authorities with a number of individual international adoption cases. Discussions are being held with private international adoption groups in Canada for the purpose of seeking their co-operation in working with government officials under established policy and procedures in order to promote efficient international adoption programs and ensure good international relations in this area. The Desk is viewed by the provinces as a focal point for contact with federal government departments having responsibilities related to international adoptions. In order to maintain effective co-ordination and liaison among these departments, the Desk has established a federal interdepartmental committee on international adoption comprised of representatives from External Affairs, Manpower and Immigration, Secretary of State, Justice, and National Health and Welfare. The Committee has played a key role in developing comprehensive documentation on the many facets of international adoption and is proving to be a valuable resource in assisting the Desk in its co-ordination function, particularly in responding to emergencies such as the recent Vietnamese and Guatemalan situations. (b) The international component of the Desk will become fully operational following receipt of approval from the provinces and dissemination of the aforementioned documentation from abroad to provincial governments.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTED DAY S.O. 58—POST OFFICE

House in committee of the whole for consideration and disposal of an item of the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1977—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

[Translation]

Post Office

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $977,488,000 be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1977 (less the amount voted in interim supply) as follows: Vote 1—Operation expenditures, contributions and authorizations to spend receipts of the year for financial services and others—$977,488,000.

● (1240)

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, now we can get on with the business at hand for the day, after our little diversion. I trust that during the course of the day we will have the opportunity to deal with questions and answers in the committee which will raise specific issues that are concerning members of parliament from their various constituencies.

I am very happy to see the Postmaster General in his place, because I think the consideration of estimates in committee of the whole is one of the great losses to our parliamentary system. There was a time when we used to practice the basic principle of parliamentary democracy—no taxation without representation. The minister used to sit on the griddle until all the queries, questions and grievances had been dealt with, and only then was he allowed to proceed with his estimates. We are very circumscribed in the time allocation today, but at least we will have a chance to deal with specific problems.

The preamble to the estimates states that the basic function of Canada's Post Office Department is to provide postal services to the people of Canada at reasonable rates and a standard of service adequate to meet their needs without incurring subsidization from general taxation. I think we will discover today that the Post Office Department at present is meeting few, if any, of the exalted goals outlined in that statement. As we already indicated in the preliminary discussion, rates are increasing, complaints from the public are increasing, the deficit is increasing, and unfortunately the great principle that was first enunciated by the pioneers of the postal service, that it is the indispensable chain that binds the nation together, no longer has any validity.

I could go into some of the recent history of the decline of the Post Office but I will not take the time on this occasion to do that. The decision was made a few years ago to change the Post Office Department into a business with managerial expertise, to the neglect of public service and consumer and labour relations. I know the Postmaster General during his incumbency in the Post Office Department has been trying to overcome the errors that were made a few years ago, but obviously he has not been successful and he now takes the easier route of increasing postal rates in order to cover up the problems and the deficiencies of the postal service which have largely contributed to the increase in the Post Office deficit.

We need recite the fact of 24 illegal strikes in five years until 1975 to indicate where the labour relations situation stands. We can refer, and we will refer, to the marketing gimmicks that have come in rapid succession—very expensive ones—which have not dealt with the basic malaise of the Post Office Department. Indeed, many of these marketing gimmicks have led to more and more of the business fleeing to the private couriers. I wish to refer to the unhappiness as expressed by some replies to a question on the use of the courier services by government departments on March 15. Here is what the Unemployment Insurance Commission has to say. It expends some $375,000 annually in private courier service. It says:

> The Post Office Department cannot provide overnight delivery between the regional offices and the district offices... We must use private couriers to supplement existing Post Office services.

So much for the assured mail delivery program which came out a few years ago guaranteeing overnight service within particular areas. The Privy Council Office has something similar to say, "We require, urgently, prompt services outside Ottawa-Hull within 24 hours, and this cannot be guaranteed by the Post Office Department. Letters, documents or small packages which must reach their destination within a time limit which cannot be guaranteed by the Post Office Department, we send through courier route. Regular mail services were not used because they were not available, or couriers were faster and more economical. In addition, the Post Office could not give an assurance that mail could be delivered within the time limit required."

The statement made by the minister today indicates that the volume of mail has increased. I want to pose as my first question the following: How much of this is dependent upon the promotional work of the Post Office Department for Olympic stamps and coins? I get constant complaints, as I am sure do other hon. members, that the Post Office Department is contacting almost every householder in Canada with a slick package, urging them to buy either Olympic coins or Olympic stamps and I think the postage alone for this mailing is 20 cents plus the return mail. A more recent venture in this regard is the use of the telepost which is the new marketing facility which is supposed to speed up urgent business communications in Canada. In a telepost message that went out from the minister's office to, I presume, hundreds of thousands of people across Canada urging them to subscribe, we read the following words:

> As a previous patron of Canada's stamp sculpture program, you were personally informed by Mr. Mackasey of the introduction of series IV stamp sculptures. All orders addressed to Mr. Mackasey's office at the House of Commons will receive priority treatment. Olympic stamp sculptures are unique commemorative works of art and valuable items for serious collectors and investors. Minting and delivery time now just two weeks. Orders must be postmarked by deadline of May 15.

I believe a message like that costs about 75 cents each, which would account for a lot of the upsurge in Post Office business and revenue to which the minister referred in his report. One of the weaknesses of the Post Office Department has been its failure in public relations. I raised an issue in the question period some weeks ago with respect to this situation concerning the use of third class mail by the Kinsmen Rehabilitation Foundation of British Columbia. They went into considerable detail in outlining the complaint. The only action that was achieved as a result of that complaint was that the public relations people came along and said that obviously the Kinsmen had not packaged the material properly, and if they had there would have been a greater response to the appeal on behalf of the disabled people of British Columbia.

Furthermore, there is a low return on the basis of this sort of mailing. The point that the foundation was making was that they did not want a public relations exercise; they wanted a customer relations exercise which would deal specifically with the complaint, because they were contemplating sending out 400,000 mailings if there could be an assurance and a guarantee that the mailing would reach the people concerned. So I raise that issue once again with the Postmaster General. It is not public relations which is wanted; it is good customer relations.

Administration of the Post Office Department is constantly under criticism, mainly because of the increase in managerial staff as compared with service and delivery staff. Executive, scientific and professional categories have tripled from 43 in recent years to the present number of 127. In eight years over-all employment in the Post Office Department has increased fron 39,180 to 60,524, but the large percentage increase has been in the executive, scientific and professional categories. This is a complaint which comes from the letter carriers and the postal workers who are the people who really provide the service directly to the public.

There is another inquiry I would like the Postmaster General to consider. The marketing branch has been active. There has been a new marketing manager appointed who is supposed to have expertise in this regard. Publications such as the communication publication, and now the new customer publication, have obviously taken a good part of the Post Office budget. In spite of this marketing and customer relations, customer complaints increased by 16.3 per cent between 1970 and 1975, and indemnities due to loss of mail have increased by substantial percentages.

The private courier matter has already been dealt with in the House, and in response to a question I asked recently the Postmaster General indicated that the Post Office is intending to go back into the courier business, which now takes about $70 million in revenue from the Post Office Department. The Postmaster General said he is aware that when they cream off the business, they are costing the taxpayer, and that his department is going to make a pitch for all of it. Well, that is a mixed blessing because obviously people are using the private couriers because they are providing people more efficient service than the Post Office. This is why so many government departments have moved in this direction. The Postmaster General and his officials will have to see to it that they can restore the confidence of the public if they are going to move back into this market. The experience in the United States is that with their increasing costs of postal delivery and their deficit, running at $1.5 billion currently, the post office department there is losing more and more of the business to competitors. Certainly an increase in rates without a corresponding increase in efficiency in Canada will not deal with the problem which was outlined in the minister's statement this morning.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Basic to the back of efficient services of the Post Office Department is the low morale of the employees. The strike situation points that cut, and we are hoping that there will be a happier relationship. I want to bring a few points to the attention of the minister. There is still indifference toward the human needs of the postal employees following the settlement of the contracts of last year. People are more important than machines, and I continually get the complaint that the employees at the managerial level keep talking about plugging the people into the automated system. The coder-sorter issue is still not resolved. For example, in the Vancouver post office, even though the assistant deputy minister says that the coding category must be changed to coder, sweeper and sorter, coders are still only coding. This was one of the big issues in the automation battle. The Taylor report is clear in this regard, and it was obvious that the plant managers are defying even the wishes of an assistant deputy minister at the level of Mr. Gordon Sinclair.

Consultation, which is important to human relations, is restricted to issuing an order. The National Film Board has been travelling from post office to post office doing a film on labour relations, and I imagine this will become available to the Postmaster General. I am sure he will find the comments of the employees informative in this regard.

The letter carriers raise the issue of the failure of the Post Office Department to provide house-to-house delivery to an increasing number of communities across the country. One of my colleagues will be dealing with this. This is the negative kind of restraint which does serious damage to the reputation of the Post Office Department because it fails to provide the basic services which are required.

The association of postal employees, which is in the bargaining process now, has reached an impasse. We discussed this in the House of Commons recently. They are faced with a situation where supervisors in certain categories are going to receive less income than the personnel they supervise. It has not been resolved in some categories. Now that the negotiations have reached the crucial stage it is impossible to bring the Post Office representatives back to the bargaining table because they cannot get a mandate from Treasury Board. I submit to the Postmaster General that the reason his officials are hesitating to come back to the bargaining table is that they have such a miserable offer to make, and the situation is going to be further aggravated because on July 1 there is to be a further 6 per cent increase, under the existing terms of the contract, to postal employees. The minister is aware of this.

He talks about industrial democracy. Industrial democracy requires real consultation where, as the minister himself has said, supervisors will no longer tell employees what to do and how to do it. The supervisors will ask the workers how they think it should be done, and restoring dignity and prestige of the postal employees is a huge job calling for adjustment at every level of management. As we approach the hour of adjournment, I remind the Postmaster General of those words and hope that he will be able to get real industrial democracy working in the Post Office Department. Perhaps the military posture of the Post Office is too deeply ingrained. There are still postmasters around who expect their workers to come to attention in their presence. I am sure the hon. gentleman agrees that this is not conducive to good human relations. The very term "Postmaster General" has military overtones, and I trust that in his actual contacts with the employees he will not aggravate that image by the posture he assumes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One o'clock.

The Chairman: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At 1.01 p.m. the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, we had an opportunity today to discuss the problems of the Post Office—the delivery of mail, which is considered by many people to be unsatisfactory, the large deficit the department has experienced in recent years and will undoubtedly face in the coming year, and the announcement by the minister this morning that in an effort to reduce the size of the deficit he proposes to increase the cost of first-class mail by some 50 per cent in the next year.

Undoubtedly, part of the reason for the problems in the Post Office can be found in the very bad relationships that exist between senior officials in the department and the employees. Because I do not want to be accused of being partisan—which I am, and which I admit—let me put on the record a description of the situation in the Post Office given by none other than the Postmaster General in a letter which appeared in the Globe and Mail on April 25, 1975. I shall only read part of the letter, Mr. Chairman, but I think it describes the situation much more eloquently than I could ever hope to. In that letter the Postmaster General said:

> One can make a strong case that the workers are extremely militant—that their productivity leaves much to be desired; that they have continuously taken the law into their own hands, and, on some occasions resorted to violence.

In the year or more since that letter was written the Postmaster General has told this House frequently—in fact, I would say ad nauseam—how true that statement is. The letter continues:

> But one can make an equally strong case that the employer, that is, the government, over a long period of time, has been anything but a model employer. As a member of government, I accept my share of responsibility and single out no individual as more responsible or less responsible for this fact.
> Inadequate compensation, work places that are a disgrace, uneven managerial policy, regimentation that at times has bordered on a military mentality, has, over the years, resulted in a slow but steady reduction in morale, in pride of association and in inevitable hostility on the part of the workers.

Later in the letter he said:

> As a government, we have an obligation to be at least as good an employer as the more enlightened employers in the private sector. I believe that this is now well understood—both among my colleagues, and, perhaps more important in this bureaucratic jungle, understood by the bureaucrats.

When the hon. member for Brandon-Souris was speaking, one of my Social Credit colleagues said, "I have heard all these things before". That is true, unfortunately. We have to make essentially the same speeches because the more the minister speaks, the less things change. I turned up some old files, Mr. Chairman, and found an article published in the Montreal Gazette in 1974, written by George Radwanski, in which he summarized a report made in 1966 by Mr. Justice Montpetit who had investigated the situation in the Post Office. I should like to quote a couple of paragraphs of the report of Mr. Justice Montpetit:

● (1410)

> A large number of the Post Office employees' grievances are, first and foremost, human relations problems.
>
> Except in one or two districts, the attitude of some supervisors and postmasters toward their employees leaves much to be desired. These people have only a vague notion of the importance of maintaining good relations with their staff . . .
> A well conceived policy of consultation and of exchange of viewpoints at all levels becomes essential. The dialogue must not become a mere formality to which one has to submit and which is considered more or less a waste of time or mere idle chatter. Nor must it become a one-sided conversation.

Nothing has changed since Mr. Justice Montpetit made that report. The minister may say that things have changed. The Letter Carriers' Union, which had a much better relationship with the minister and the department than the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, commissioned a study some years later by Professor Vanderberg, a professor of economics at Carleton University. He found:

> —still inadequate consultation at the root of postal employees' grievances.
> Harmonious industrial relations cannot be achieved without a meaningful airing of views.
> The initiative for the inauguration of such discussion on any topic logically rests with the party which is considering the implementation of a new policy.

It is the Post Office which decided to make major technological changes. It decided to automate the sorting of mail and everything else. No one in this party ever questioned, nor do we question now, the necessity of using the most modern methods for sorting and delivering mail. We recognize that sorting mail by hand would make it prohibitive, cost-wise. We realize that without using the latest techniques the mail service would be slowed to such an extent that people would no longer use it.

I do not believe that the postal workers, certainly never publicly, or their union officials have ever opposed automation. However, they have a very legitimate concern. Automation should not be brought in at their expense. Masses of workers should not be laid off. If money is saved through the use of automatic equipment, the workers should get part of the benefits. From that point of view they are no different from workers in private industry.

In the Post Office we have continual objection and guerilla warfare against these feelings of the workers. Let me illustrate very briefly. When the sorting equipment was brought in, the rate of pay for the sorters was set much lower than the rate for hand sorting. You do not have to be an expert in work procedure to know that watching an automatic sorter handling thousands of letters a minute is a lot more difficult than sorting by hand. However, the Post Office, Treasury Board or whoever makes these decisions, insisted on this. It took months of threats and strikes before the Post Office agreed to at least pay the same amount per hour to those manning the automatic sorting machines.

Professor Vanderberg and Mr. Justice Montpetit talked about consultation. The postal workers were worried about the effects of automation on their employment, and there was a bitter strike. In the new collective agreement in which this minister was involved there is a clause to the effect that there shall be discussion and agreement with regard to any new automatic equipment being brought in. Did that happen? No. Last week the union tried to take the Post Office to court, claiming that a new post office had been begun in New Brunswick without the role of the workers being worked out in advance.

Mr. Breau: That was in Newfoundland.

Mr. Orlikow: Newfoundland, I am sorry. The case was dismissed by the court. I do not say the workers were right in that or any other case. However, if the workers felt so strongly about not being consulted that they went to court, the bargaining process has in fact broken down. I say that even if the workers were wrong, because this should have been settled before it was necessary to go to court. I am sure there are still hundreds of thousands, and I say this advisedly, of grievance cases filed by the union. Why? Because nothing is ever settled voluntarily by the Post Office.

I know we are dealing with a union which has a reputation for being very militant. It is not the easiest thing in the world to settle disputes with a militant union, but it takes two to tango, it takes two to have a fight. I am not convinced, by anything I have seen since coming to parliament, that those occupying the senior positions in the Post Office Department do not want to fight. Why are there so many grievances? I am told that if the department loses at a relatively low stage of grievance procedure, it appeals to the ajudicator. If the decision of the adjudicator is not to the liking of the department, they take the case to court. That means delays of months or years. It costs the unions thousands of dollars. That is not the way to get co-operation and to boost morale. In addition, I am told that if a decision at any level is in favour of the position taken by the union, the Post Office Department takes the position that all that has been settled is one particular case. If there are 50 other cases of a similar nature, the union must fight each one individually.

This situation has gone on for a long time. I remember making the same kind of appeal to a former postmaster general, Mr. Kierans. I suggested to him that the almost military organization and discipline which the present Postmaster General spoke of in the letter from which I quoted no longer meets the needs of the country or the Post Office. That condition has existed since the Post Office began. I suggest it is time to get rid of that system.

If it is necessary, in order to get rid of that system, to begin by getting rid of most of those who occupy the top positions in the Post Office itself, particularly those involved in labour-management, this is what ought to be done. I made that suggestion six or seven years ago, and I make it again to the present minister. I say to the hon. gentleman publicly what I say to him privately—that I have a great deal of respect for him. He has demonstrated on more than one occasion that he is a friend of working people. I would have expected that he would at least have begun the job of changing the situation in the top levels of the Post Office Department, so that we could hope to see an improvement in the relationship between the unions and the department as well as between the employees and the department.

I am confident that regardless of the tens of millions of dollars we are spending on automating and renovating the system, we shall not benefit from an efficient postal delivery system until we have created a situation in which the employees are happy, proud of working for the Post Office and prepared to do a fair day's work in return for a fair day's pay. I believe they are getting a fair day's pay and I want them to do a fair day's work. I believe they will do so when they get human and decent consideration from the people who direct the work of the department.

The minister has had a difficult year. He has been through some bruising battles with the postal workers and their unions, and I want to say to him, as I have said elsewhere, that there were faults on both sides. I hope both sides can forget what has happened in the past and use their efforts to change the situation in such a way as to provide the kind of postal service of which people can be proud. I hope the minister will give the kind of leadership which most of us expect him to give, although I must say I have seen little sign of it so far.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I want to spend my time this afternoon by addressing a few questions to the minister in the hope of eliciting some information on a few matters which are of great interest to the Canadian public. The first aspect I should like to explore relates to a question I asked in the House a year or so ago: whether the minister and his officials had taken steps to upgrade studies which had been carried out under an earlier regime into the possibility of placing the services presently carried out by the Post Office Department under the direction of a Crown corporation. Has the hon. gentleman investigated this possibility and weighed the advantages, or disadvantages, of following such a course?

At the time I asked my question, the minister suggested I should read an article in Time magazine showing that the United States post office had experienced huge deficits after following that route and placing its post office under the control of an independent agency. Recently, too, we have read about the difficulties the United Kingdom is experiencing in this regard. Nevertheless, the fact that there have been problems in other countries ought not, in my view, to prevent us looking at the Canadian scene and asking ourselves whether a change should not be considered here.

In this connection, I would refer to the comments made by the previous speaker on the subject of the relationship between management and unions in the Post Office Department. It seems to me that if the whole organization were brought under the roof of a Crown corporation, certain advantages would follow—advantages of the kind enjoyed, for example, by Ontario Hydro and other public utilities. Management and staff could get together to iron out their problems without being involved, for example, with the Public Service Commission, as is the case with the Post Office.

There would be other benefits. The corporation would be able to plan and build its own buildings, put in the facilities needed, without having to turn to another department of government. The analogy that occurs to me is that of the distribution of electricity in my own province of Ontario. I think it is accepted that had this service been left in the early days of the century to a department of the provincial government, our lights would still be flickering. Instead, the responsibility was handed over to a Crown corporation, and I believe most people would say that it has been handled in a most efficient manner. Management has, over the years, tended to be extremely good. Perhaps the minister would comment on this aspect.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I did forgo my right to make a formal speech at the opening of the debate in deference to hon. members who might wish to ask questions. I realize that this is a short day. I hope to express my philosophy in more general terms when I have an opportunity to wind up the debate later.

The idea of a Crown corporation has many attractions, and the hon. member has touched on some of them. My own thinking, as Postmaster General for several years, is that the efficiency of the Post Office could be improved somewhat if the Post Office were treated not exactly as a Crown corporation in the sense that Air Canada is a Crown corporation, but if it were brought in under another schedule, like the Mint, for example. Let me explain why I say this. In a moment of frustration two years ago I said the only role I had in opening a post office was to cut the ribbon—and I did not even get to choose the colour the ribbon would be. Post offices are built, and priorities determined, by the Department of Public Works. Machinery and equipment is bought by the Department of Supply and Services. Hiring and firing is done by the Public Service Commission.

● (1430)

A good part of my time is spent consulting with other departments and doing things we could do with much greater efficiency were the Post Office given a special status. That need not necessarily be a Crown corporation. I could explain the reasons for my reluctance to go all the way and to set up a Crown corporation, but this would take too much time. It is perhaps related to costs and to the unhappy situation in the United States where the post office is very close to a Crown corporation but still subject to a lot of political interference in regard to establishing rates and things of that nature.

So if I may sum up my reply to the hon. member for Scarborough West, yes, I think there should be special status for the Post Office in relation to the government and to other government departments, preferably along the lines of other organizations that come under government control, but with more of a "hands off" type of approach than is now the case. Thus, the Post Office would have a greater degree of autonomy in determining the day to day operation of the Post Office without having to solicit, enjoin, seduce, coerce, or call it what you will, other departments in order to obtain what we sometimes think should be priority items for the Post Office but other departments do not.

The approach of a Crown corporation is appealing and deceptively so. Perhaps it is a little too simplistic. I think a happy medium could be found between the present status of the Post Office as a department of government and a full time Crown corporation. There are dozens of these, and I could name them all; indeed, there are a number of schedules. I think that the Post Office sooner or later—and preferably sooner than later—should be put under another schedule.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, my understanding in discussions with the Chair earlier was that it was appropriate for members to take their 20 minutes and use them by asking the minister questions if they so wished. That is the process that I was following and I had not consumed more than 50 per cent of my time.

The Deputy Chairman: That is my understanding also. The hon. member for Scarborough West.

Mr. Martin: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am very much encouraged by the comments of the Postmaster General in this connection. The suggestion of establishing a Crown corporation was really an expression of hope that the Post Office would move away from being a direct government department. I think the Canadian public in general would very much endorse the kind of proposal that the Postmaster General has put forward this afternoon. If we stop short of making the Post Office Department a full Crown corporation, it should at least be able to operate entirely on its own, in essence unfettered by having to go to various other government departments simply to stay in business and to render an efficient service to the people in a very basic area.

The next point that I want to make relates to the statement made by the minister a little earlier this afternoon. The Canadian public is going to be asked—indeed, it is going to be told—to face a 25 per cent increase in first-class mail rates as of September 1, followed by a further 20 per cent increase as of March 1 next year. The combination of these two increases represents a 50 per cent increase over the rates that will be in effect on August 31 of this year.

I think I understand the argument that the Post Office does indeed lose money, that therefore any increase in the rates, so long as it does not produce a profit for the Post Office, can be justified even under the guidelines of the Anti-Inflation Board. In other words, no new profit is being generated because there was never a profit in the first place, and there will still be no profit.

However, Mr. Chairman, what I find difficult to accept—and I think the people in my constituency and across the country will find difficult to accept—is the imposition by the government of very substantial increases in a service which in this particular case is, I think we must accept, certainly not quite up to scratch at the present time, for whatever reason. I say for whatever reason; they may be many and varied. Nevertheless, the fact remains this is a service the government is offering the people of Canada which simply is not up to the degree of efficiency which I think the public is entitled to expect and receive.

In effect, the Post Office is saying, "Look, we are doing our best, but we are going to have to increase our rates by 25 per cent". No company in business today is allowed an increase of that amount, and I think quite properly so under the anti-inflation guidelines. Nevertheless, the government is doing so in one particular service area. It then will compound the situation six months later by throwing at the public another 20 per cent increase.

I am sure that the Postmaster General can establish, on straight economic grounds, that indeed the Post Office is not making a profit, and that therefore we should endeavour to cut back on government expenditures that would otherwise have to be provided to finance a larger deficit. But I think we need a clearcut explanation, which we as members of parliament can take back to our constituents, of the kind of matters mentioned earlier by the Postmaster General. We should indeed examine the idea of making the Post Office a separate organization outside of government. We must do all we can to increase the degree of efficiency. It is also important that the public be persuaded somehow or other to accept this at a time when they are asked to pay more for the service.

We know that many businesses today who can afford to do so are saying no thank you to the services offered by the government's Post Office. Instead they are employing a private service. The growth of private mail couriers has been fantastic over the past few years. But the problem is that private mail services are really only available to those who can afford them, such as medium-sized and large businesses. There is no question that they are more expensive. Nevertheless, there comes a point in the business world where you have to be assured that your mail is going to arrive at its destination and that you do receive the mail that is dispatched to you, because money is involved, the basic foundation of all business.

However, individual members of the public cannot afford to switch. They must put on their 10-cent or 12-cent stamp, as the case may be, and depend on the government service to deliver their letters to the places they are supposed to go. Increasingly I am being asked whether this service is being properly performed.

I wonder whether, Mr. Chairman, I can combine my two points in a question to the minister. Would the minister in some way or other assure the Canadian public, through this House, that everything will continue to be done to improve those areas of postal service today that are still lacking? Will he continue to search out the areas of real weakness, and do so prior to the first of the new increases coming into vogue?

In addition, he might look into the matter of the private couriers, determine how much business they are skimming away, and see if there is any way in which people using the private couriers can be encouraged to return to the government service. There are two ways of cutting costs. If we get more business, which means more revenue, since a lot of our expenses are fixed the net deficit of the Post Office will be reduced. I am concerned at the falling off of business at the present time, and the signs are it is increasingly falling off. This will further hamper the ability of the Post Office to break even or to limit its losses to a reasonable amount.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, in order to keep my answer short, I should inform the hon. gentleman that I covered a lot of these points in my general remarks this morning, particularly the point in respect of percentages. Perhaps I am kind of conditioned to percentages from my years as minister of labour. Someone the other day said he had doubled his daughter's weekly allowance. It went up 100 per cent, from 25 cents to 50 cents.

So percentages are meaningful only if they are tied to a base period, and this is one of the weaknesses of statistics. It is one thing to say that we have increased the cost of a stamp to the average Canadian by 25 per cent. It is equally true to say that since the average Canadian writes four letters a year, with this increase of two cents it will mean an increase in cost to the average citizen of eight cents a year. Assuming that we are wrong in that regard, it would mean an increase, on the average, of only 15 cents a year to the individual considering that Canadians do not write many letters, and 80 per cent of our volume comes from 20 per cent of our business community, I do not think this will have a detrimental effect in so far as inflation is concerned. I will talk about the effect on the business community a little later.

The hon. gentleman made an extremely valid point, and perhaps it accentuates exactly what I am saying. As I mentioned earlier today, even with our proposed increases, which are phased in over almost a year, ours is still the cheapest or most inexpensive first-class mail service in the world.

An hon. Member: And the slowest.

Mr. Mackasey: Let us take the extreme. When we do reach the 12-cent cost, compared with the cost of first-class mail in West Germany and in other countries, which is now over 20 cents and in some cases 25 cents, with penalties for odd-shaped envelopes, and the rest of it, I do not think our service costs very much. The hon. gentleman also referred to courier service and I intend to refer to that in depth in my speech. He made it quite clear that people are quite prepared to pay substantial sums of money for courier service if they can get assured mail delivery. This is really what people are looking for. I am not as concerned about the increase, which is nominal, but rather about whether the people are going to get the service.

It might be of interest to the hon. gentleman and to other members of the House to know that most private carriers did not operate nationally during the strike. They did not make a great deal of money not because they were overloaded. They had no facilities from Toronto to Montreal, from Toronto to North Bay or to Vancouver. The reason they did not have the facilities is that they use the Canadian Post Office.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, it gives me pleasure to be able to speak on the Post Office estimates today. I should like to confine my remarks to northern mail service in our country. Many years ago, but as recently as 1950, people in the north were receiving their mail by a man on snowshoes, carrying a pack. They then advanced to the use of dog teams. At least at that time they knew they were going to get mail once a year. That is not the situation now in at least three post offices in northern Manitoba, namely, Poplar River, Garden Hill and Wasagamack. This increase in the postal rates really does not affect the people in those communities. They could not care if it was 50 cents a letter because at the present time they do not have postal service at all in their communities.

Let me first speak of the community of Garden Hill. You may think this is a small community of 150 people, but there are 1,200 people living in Garden Hill. Their family allowances, their hydro bills and their old age pension cheques come in by mail. On April 1, 1976, an auditor arrived from the Post Office Department. According to the rules, I suppose an auditor can check the books. In any event, he did audit the books and found some sort of a discrepancy in the accounting procedure and he immediately closed the post office. That post office is still not open.

It took 23 days to advertise the opening of a position for a new postmaster. I am led to believe it took this long because when it was being advertised the advertisement first had to go to Ottawa to the Postmaster General in case he had someone he wanted to appoint to that job. This caused a delay. People in that community since the closing of that post office have not been receiving their hydro bills through the mail. As a result, many of them had their electric services completely cut off. Many old age pensioners have not received their cheques. They were told by the Post Office Department that mail could be picked up in Winnipeg, but that is 280 air miles away.

The community of Island Lake does not have telephone service, does not have television and there are no roads to the community. The only link the people have with the outside world is by mail. At least when the mail was packed in by a man on snowshoes they were sure of getting mail once a year. Under the present system they are no longer certain of that. Let me also point out the importance and gravity of this situation in respect of those people who are on medication. They depend on receiving this medication by mail. When the mail service was stopped many of these people had to turn to the airlines and have their medication shipped in by air express. This is a costly item for people on old age security. The same is true in respect of eyeglass prescriptions, and so on.

The irony of the situation is that if an accounting discrepancy such as this occurred in a community closer to the hub or the capital of the nation, I do not think the people would stand idly by while the Post Office Department took that sort of action. I do not know what the Post Office is trying to do. It waited for 23 days in this case before advertising for a new postmaster. Obviously, the process takes several months to accomplish. In the meantime, the department says the postmaster or the band of Indians which looked after the mail service had done something wrong so they are being penalized by not having mail service for three months.

Another northern community, Poplar River, which is 300 air miles from Winnipeg, has not had mail service since the end of February. It took the postal department from the end of January until April 6 to advertise for a new postmaster. The people of this community were told in a letter that they could pick up their mail at Selkirk, which is 300 air miles away. This community also has no roads, no telephones, and so on. How do we expect these communities to operate?

When I post a letter and put an 8-cent stamp on it, or a 12-cent stamp, which will be the case in the future, it seems to me there is a guarantee that the letter will be delivered to the person to whom it is addressed. I have a number of pieces of correspondence from the people in these isolated communites which were sent out by carriers, such as a pilot or somebody who happened to be going out. They have told me they have not even been able to get repairs for some of their small outboard motors because normally the parts are ordered by mail.

The postal department has tied up these communities without any thought whatsoever for the convenience of the people. We are not just talking about 1,200 people in one community, but 400 in another, 300 in another, and right across the country. I cannot see why the postal authorities should be allowed to just walk in and close down a post office because of a discrepancy, without giving the community any opportunity whatsoever of reimbursing the post office for the loss. It has never been proven to me that there was a discrepancy; it has only been mentioned in several letters. The people of these communities are pleading for their postal services back. They are saying that perhaps something wrong was done, but they have been penalized now by a loss of service for a period of 3½ to 4 months; they have done their penance and should now have mail service.

The other matter I should like to mention at this time is the manner in which mail is handled throughout the north. It would seem that long-term contracts are handed out to mail couriers. These can become obsolete with the discontinuation of air service and because of a more convenient way to get mail to certain areas of the north. I have written the Post Office inquiring about this but have received no positive response other than that this has been the system for years and cannot be changed.

I would ask that these problems be looked into and that some action be taken on them immediately because, as I said before, this mail service is the vital link for all the north. Without mail service the community is absolutely dead. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, which is responsible for the treaty Indian people in these three communities I mentioned, I do not think really has taken any initiative in going to the Postmaster General to see whether this matter could be straightened out. I hope the Postmaster General is not even aware that this is happening and that it is a nightmare case that can be blamed on the regional or district office.

I do not blame this Postmaster General for not taking action if he did not know the situation existed. I mentioned, in the case of Island Lake, that I did see a piece of correspondence which indicated that the community would receive its mail from another post office eight miles away. To the people down here this distance may not look great, but to the people in the community that eight miles represents a journey across water, and at breakup in the spring these people are without service for at least six weeks. At other times, if they want to get their mail they have to travel by means of outboard motor a distance of six miles. Also, that is only in respect of first-class mail. They cannot receive clothing parcels or anything like that through the mail. The people have been paying 8 cents and will be paying 12 cents. I do not think they argue about the increase in the rate, but they would like to have service. I think that is where the emphasis should be placed.

If we could guarantee service to the people in these three communities I think they would gladly pay 50 cents a letter, but they would like the privilege of being able to post a letter.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I should like to reply briefly to the hon. member for Churchill with whom I have a great deal of communication because he does very assiduously concern himself with the problem of mail delivery in the north, which is a type of business I do not think private enterprise would want. We have 8,600 post offices in Canada. The people of the north deserve the best possible treatment that can be afforded them. I think philosophically we agree. On the few occasions on which he has brought matters to my attention, I have tried to act on them. I think he will agree that that is so. He said I have the right to name postmasters. It seems that I have missed out after all these years on some patronage, because I have not named a postmaster since I have been Postmaster General. I shall inquire why I was not made aware of my privileges in this regard.

I am aware of the situation at Garden Hill. If we were to defend ourselves adequately, we could cause some harm to people and I prefer not to do that. I might speak generally about this deficit. This particular community is involved in a deficit of $10,000, which is a lot of taxpayers, money, going back to 1973. The arrangement in respect of the choice of Winnipeg as an alternate source of obtaining mail in the interval while the dispute is being settled has virtually been completed. It was not our choice. It was the choice of the band. We had suggested the Hudson Bay post, which is only nine miles away. The hon. gentleman says that this is a long distance in the north. However, they opted for a distance of 300 miles possibly because of a matter of principle or rivalry, although I am not sure what the reason is.

We have an obligation to collect deficits and close the post offices which we think are inefficient. Fraud may not be involved here. It may merely be a lack of carrying out the rules. These deficits are established. The procedure is painful. We tried to find another post office and another postmaster in this area. We have agreed with the representatives of the people affected to establish very early in the week the precise amount we think is owing. We have discussed the matter with the band in great depth and hope to have a meeting very shortly. This matter, which is of particular significance to many Indian people who depend on the mail, I do not think is entirely a problem involving the Post Office. The problem is that we cannot continue the procedure which ran up the deficit which has existed since 1973. This is a deficit in the sense of money owing to the Crown or the taxpayers of Canada which has not been turned over to them. This, basically, is the problem in this particular area. Our alternative was to use the post office nine miles away, but the band preferred to use Winnipeg. I am aware of the problem. There has been continuing dialogue and discussion over the last few weeks. The matter should be resolved very rapidly.

[Mr. Smith (Churchill).]

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, as the members of this House know, I am a supporter of the government. I am a proud supporter of the government and in particular of the government's restraint program. However, while I support the restraint program I wish to bring the attention of this House to a decision taken by the Postmaster General which I find unacceptable. I shall ask him if he will reconsider that decision.

My constituency of York Centre in the northern part of Toronto is almost a fully built-up and occupied area. In a rather dense development a street, Blackhawk Way, is being finished on which there will be townhouses and an apartment building. At the moment there are 24 townhouses. By the time the development is completed there will be 129 homes. People have already begun to move in. In fact, there have been people living on the street for a few months. They have been unable to obtain postal service in that area. I wrote the minister about this. It would seem to me that normal postal service should be extended to an area like this inasmuch as the street is completed and people are living there. The minister replied on April 15, telling me that the federal policy of restraint on spending prevented his adding another postman in that particular area.

Surely something can be done about this problem. If the restraint program is to be applied to the Post Office, and I do not disagree with that, it should not be applied in a discriminatory way in respect of the development of new services. The people who live in this postal area are entitled to have their mail delivered in the same way it is delivered to other people in the area. I am told that although there are only 24 new households on this walk, the postmen on either side already have a full schedule of households and that under the union agreement neither of them is permitted to add even these extra 24 homes on the street and which are now occupied.

I would think that between a more equitable application of the controls program and some reasonable discussion with the postmen concerned on either side and with their bargaining representatives, it might be possible to return to doing the job which the Post Office is bound to do, which is to deliver the mail to the people living in that area. I hope that the minister will have some good news for us.

I was particularly disturbed—and I will conclude with that—to see him note in the letter that it would be necessary to wait until the limitations or restraints are removed. This restraint program is in effect for three years. Does that mean that the people on Blackhawk Way in north Toronto will have to wait for three years before they can start to get postal delivery? I would remind the minister that the Post Office, to which they have been invited to walk, is over a mile away from some of the houses on that street.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I will be ambivalent here. These cases come up all the time. I am quite pleased that a Liberal member asks me this question because I have been accused of favouring Liberal members. But now we have heard a negative representation from a Liberal.

The fact is that many thousands of Canadians do not have door to door delivery. Here it is a matter of lack of co-operation by the unions. It is the unions which spelled out in the agreement the number of pieces of mail mailmen can be expected to deliver in eight hours. We will have another look at this particular problem presented by the hon. gentleman, but I wish to point out in general that there are limitations on the size of the work force which were not imposed by the Postmaster General but rather by the size of the budget, the restrictions and the directives of the Treasury Board in light of the government restraint policy. This means that there are many Canadians who will be inconvenienced to the point sometimes of having to walk a mile to pick up their mail rather than having it delivered door to door.

The question is whether there should be a restructuring of the routes with the co-operation of the union, or whether by some other method we can implement door to door delivery in the hon. gentleman's riding. We will review this again, but I want the hon. member to know that there are hundreds of such cases across Canada at present and the only way in which we could satisfy every request would be possibly to hire another 50 or 100 letter carriers at a time when we do not have such a mandate. We are trying to accommodate as many people as possible by continually reviewing our route structure and the workload of the postal employees because I do agree that, as a general principle, wherever the population warrants it Canadians should have mail delivery door to door.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Chairman, I am taking part in these discussions today for many reasons which not only concern myself but Canadians from coast to coast. The primary reason of course is the general inefficiency of the Post Office as a whole, and I am glad to see that even the parliamentary secretaries on the other side are in opposition to the way in which the Post Office is being run.

However, before I begin my remarks, and in fairness to my friend, the Postmaster General, I want to take this opportunity to offer my belated condolences to him for inheriting the department in the mess in which it is in, a mess which probably the Post Office Department has never seen in the history of the mail service. He inherited it from the former minister, the hon. member for Papineau, who will probably go down in history not only as the most incompetent minister but certainly as most untrustworthy, as witnessed by his resignation as minister of consumer and corporate affairs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: Because coincidentally the Postmaster General has acquired that portfolio as well from the hon. member for Papineau, I sympathize with him doubly. The only consolation that he can have is that the former minister was not minister of consumer and corporate affairs long enough to bring that department down to the all time low to which he brought the Post Office.

In any case the major concerns regarding the Post Office were ably presented by my colleague, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, who so eloquently brought to light the many inefficiencies and mismanagement in the Post Office. Because of my concern regarding strikes and walk-outs, particularly within the Post Office and other essential services, I would like to find out from the minister whether he or indeed the government has any long range suggestions to overcome the labour unrest which plagued us in the past.

We all know that in just five years the Post Office had a total of 24 illegal strikes around the country, causing untold inconveniences and hardships for the public and for industry. They were the cause of many bankruptcies within the segment of our economy which forms the backbone of our industrial life, and I am of course referring to the small businessman who seems to be neglected by large governments, large unions, and large multinational corporations each day. Because of the fact that he is a small businessman he is unable to do very much, if anything, on his own to overcome his problems. Yet this government, and specifically the Post Office Department, deals with these illegal and other strikes on a day by day basis as it does with almost everything, rather than establishing a comprehensive long range program to deal with matters relating to labour unrest mainly in essential services such as that provided by the Post Office. In this regard it is no secret that I, along with the majority of my constituents, would like to see the right to strike taken away from individuals and groups of individuals within areas that adversely affect the well-being of our nation, and of course the starting point could be the Post Office.

There are other general and pertinent questions which must be answered, such as the fact that federal departments, because of their dissatisfaction with the unreliable mail service are now resorting to the use of couriers, and the rising amount of theft and loss within the Post Office. I understand that the Post Office has admitted to a loss of nearly half a million pieces in the last five years alone. This is a disgrace, it is unbelievable.

Another such matter is the unrealistic deficit within the Post Office, the fact that operating expenses have increased by 24.6 per cent, a matter which is hard to comprehend when the same government under which the Post Office Department operates is advocating guidelines and controls to be applied by the rest of the country far below that level. It can be easily said: do unto others as you do unto yourself. But unfortunately this is not the case with the government.

I could go on and on about the mish-mash of inefficiencies and mismanagement within the department, not only under the minister's predecessor but under the minister himself, but, as I said at the outset, my colleagues who spoke before me today and those who will follow me this afternoon will speak in detail on these questions which should and indeed must be answered for the benefit of all Canadians.

I would now like to dwell on a more specific subject which relates to the minister's responsibility with regard to the Olympics. I am of course referring to the Olympic coins, stamps, and medallions so far as production, sales, distribution and, I hope, profits are concerned. I am certain that, unlike the minister's predecessor, the Postmaster General will not in answer to my questions relating to the Olympics bring forth racial discrimination as did his predecessor on every occasion that I brought the matter of the Olympics before the House.

The minister knows very well that I am and always have been very concerned about the way in which the Olympics have been handled so far as the financing and staging of the games is concerned. He knows also that I have attempted to co-operate with the government on this matter to the best of my ability.

● (1510)

However, in this respect let me begin by saying that the result of the coin and stamp programs to date is a far cry from the objective the Post Office set as a goal when the Olympic Act passed through this House two years or so ago. In fact, what had been realized in net profits compared with the original projected forecast by the Post Office is a disgrace. Instead of net profits of $250 million, total sales of Olympic coins as of September 30—sales, not profit—were only $141 million, which is bad enough, but what is worse is that the net profit was less than $35 million, and even now with just months remaining before the program ceases to exist in accordance with the legislation, the forecasts by the coin department indicate that the silver coins alone will contribute $150 million toward the capital cost of the games. That is a nice fat figure, but it is still $100 million less than was originally projected. How can we trust or believe that projection when, out of the seven series, four series realized less than $35 million?

There are only three series to go, and I realize that there are still some coins from the other series yet to be sold, but certainly that $150 million goal at this stage of the game, although it is $100 million behind, is still unrealistic. We simply cannot believe the predictions, based on past performances, and when the minister gets a chance to answer this specific question I would like him to do so.

The minister and the managing director of the program, Mr. Austin Page, boast that no other company or industry in Canada has been as successful as the coin program was under the Postmaster General with regard to net profits. I can only say that no other business has the federal government printing or minting coins in that regard. It is as simple as that. I know the minister will be happy to explain these forecasts. I am sure he will explain why, with all the spending going on, such a concentrated continuation of advertising is taking place in the United States, for example.

I realize that to sell you have to advertise, but it has been proven that in the United States the program has been a disaster. Less than 10 per cent of the total sales have been made in the United States. The advertising program must be very expensive. I will wait for the minister to come up with that figure, but I doubt whether it is worth while at this stage of the game. I think it is really a waste of money.

There are other areas which we cannot understand. What about having to absorb the $1.6 million of the cost in the bank programs within the United States, or the $600,000 advertising costs which have to be absorbed as a result of the Canadian re-solicitation program? I wish the minister—and I know he has difficulty doing this, and I have great respect for him, but I am concerned about the programs in his department—on behalf of the program and his department would own up to the fact that there is no doubt in anyone's mind about the inefficient personnel within his department and the Olympic coin program, at least in the area of projections. There has been a total failure in projections, and we cannot continue to believe the projections at this late stage.

I also wish the minister would come clean in this regard, as he often does, and lay the facts on the table as they really are by admitting, unfortunate as it may be, that the coin program has been a big failure, and by producing realistic forecasts which can be trusted, as opposed to past performances. Once that can be counted on we can try to figure out what deficit or what part of the deficit will be able to be absorbed with regard to this coin situation.

Still on the coin side, it would be good to know how many coins are yet to be minted. These are very pertinent questions, and I would like to get the minister's attention now. I know I have been going on at length with regard to the coins, but how many coins are yet to be minted, if any, both in the silver and gold categories? What are the plans for the unsold coins, and is consideration being given to the possibility of continuing the program into 1977? The minister knows that according to the legislation the program will end at the end of this year.

I think the same questions must be answered with regard to the Olympic stamp situation as well, and more than that I understand it to be a fact that there exists a huge surplus of Olympic stamps on hand with little if any possibility of disposing of these stamps on a regular basis. It seems to me that the stamp program is in worse shape than the coin program.

It is hard to believe, but the stamp program has only raised a fraction of the $10 million anticipated by the original projection. Perhaps this is the reason why the Postmaster General saw fit to initiate his own mini lottery within the Post Office. Is the minister not concerned that such contests as the one he has established in the Post Office can result in the use of pressure tactics by wicket clerks, for example, within his department? There are enough problems within the department already without more problems. I say this because since the Post Office has had to resort to such means to sell these stamps, is the minister contemplating the extension of the stamp program into 1977 as well? I hope if this is the case that it will be brought forward in the House in the form of an amendment to the act, and I am quite sure our party would consider that.

However, going back to the mini lottery within the Post Office, perhaps the minister should consider similar contests for regular stamps, and the main prize could be on-time delivery of the winner's mail for one week. That would be something unusual in the Post Office.

The whole question of the Olympic stamp lottery within the Post Office is questionable as to its legitimacy, at least, because it definitely relates to the Olympic legislation passed by parliament—the stamp program—and yet at no time was parliament asked or even advised of this situation. An explanation by the Postmaster General must be given in this regard. The stamp program is tied in with the original Olympic legislation, and therefore nothing which differs from the legislation can be done by the department or by the government unless it comes back before parliament in the form of legislation; I certainly hope there will be some explanation from the minister in this regard.

I would also like an explanation regarding the sale of Olympic stamps to foreign countries at discount prices, which also goes against the Olympic Act. I refer specifically to the United States where these stamps are being sold for less than they are in Canada and then are being bootlegged back into Canada with the profit going to no other than the bootleggers themselves. I realize these schemes are initiated to try to get rid of the stamps, which along with the surplus stamps on hand went unsold, but surely if the minister is going to be changing the legislation which was passed by parliament, parliament should be advised as to any changes within that legislation. Once again, these questions. should and must be answered for the benefit of all involved.

An hon. Member: Keep to the right department.

Mr. Jelinek: This comes under the Post Office Department, and the Postmaster General knows that very well. The hon. member may not know that, but the minister does.

Last but not least is the Olympic metal stamp sculpture or medallion situation. I am sure the minister will inform us as to the quantities which were ordered, packaged, and sold, and once again, as with the coins and stamps, I am sure he will let us know what the Post Office intends to do with those medallions which cannot be sold, how long this program is intended to continue—the same as with the stamp and coin program—and whether they will go hand in hand or whether it is a separate situation.

● (1520)

You may recall, Mr. Chairman, that Austin Page, the managing director of the coin program, once pooled the Olympic medallion thing with the Olympic coin situation so I assume it can be taken that it falls in the same category.

You may recall, Mr. Chairman, that last October there was a question as to who received the contract to mint and package these medallions and what criteria were used in making the final decision. The reason I bring this matter forward now is because it was my understanding that Mr. Norton Cooper, president of the Jacques Cartier mint, was in fact awarded some if not most of the contracts relating to the medallions, while other reputable Canadian mints whose bids were considerably lower did not receive the consideration they deserved. I say this because the same Mr. Cooper was involved in the past with the prosecution of DREE officials in connection with substantial federal grants that were made to Mr. Cooper's other company, Silver Shield Mines, and it is puzzling to say the least that this individual continues to be favoured by the government of which he illegally took advantage.

It is my understanding that the other well known Canadian mints did not even receive an opportunity to bid on these medallions, and that some contracts regarding the commemorative medals were awarded to a Swiss firm. I am sure that once again the minister would be happy to inform us where these medallions are being produced, by whom, and who is responsible for their packaging, distribution, and sale.

As with the other Olympic coins, be they silver or gold, as well as the stamps, we should like to know whether it is the government's intention to extend this program. I think I have already made mention of the problem of unsold products.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I should like to reiterate that from the outset, and along with the majority of my colleagues, I have always been in favour of the Olympic ideal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: We have on many occasions criticized the development of the program in regard to financing and in regard to staging. The blame must clearly rest on the shoulders of the federal government which gave to the city of Montreal, to Mayor Drapeau and to COJO, the opportunity to play with matches—and in the process to burn themselves.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I wanted to say, and I am sure that I speak on behalf of many of my colleagues, that I wish the Olympic games the greatest success. I hope that once the Olympic flame dies down we as Canadians can hold our heads up high and be proud that we put on a good Olympics.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I hope the hon. gentleman is not speaking for too many members on the other side. The only greater penalty than a poor service would be to have to read the diatribe that we have had to listen to from the member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I would agree that the hon. gentleman is not a racist. We have often discussed that and I think I have protected him against that charge in public. He knows exactly how I feel on that particular subject. It is not an accusation that I would want made against me, so it is not one that I would make lightly. The hon. gentleman need have no fear that, because he is asking questions about the Olympics that are to take place in Quebec, anybody is going to put a racist connotation on his questions. On the other hand, I think if he reads his speech he may find that he has smeared a lot of people himself, and that is not very nice.

We could start with the Olympic stamp sculpture. It was the gentlemen in front of me who issued the contract and I should protect them by pointing out that the Olympic stamp sculptures were tendered by at least three firms in this country. They were not issued to the Jacques Cartier mint. The hon. gentleman, through circumspection, brought in a Mr. Cooper who went bankrupt despite DREE funding four or five years ago, as have thousands of businessmen. The point is that the recent contract was awarded to a large firm in Toronto known as Johnson, Matthey & Mallory Ltd. of Toronto. It is a very responsible organization. I visited the plant and met with the owner, the supervisor of the plant, and the production engineer, to make sure that the metallic sculptures they were producing for us under tender were of a quality to match the first sets that had been made by Jacques Cartier.

The Jacques Cartier mint ran into financial trouble so I felt it should not be included in the subsequent tenders in case it had financial problems again and would not be capable of supplying the merchandize. We took its name off the tender list and issued the contract to Johnson, Matthey & Mallory Ltd. of Toronto. I think it is important that this go on the record.

As an interesting sidelight, Mr. Chairman, that firm had a little trouble with production and the first people they went to for advice was the Jacques Cartier mint.

I do not like smears, Mr. Chairman, and I do not want them on the record even if they are unintentional. These things were tendered, the tender was won by the firm I have mentioned twice. I suspect Johnson, Matthey & Mallory Ltd. is well known in the country. It is a respectable and responsible firm in Toronto and I would imagine it would resent any attack on its integrity, as do my officials.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. gentleman has asked a lot of basic questions but it was very hard to follow because they were interwoven with a certain amount of bias in philosophy that makes it kind of hard, perhaps, to keep my temper on the matter.

Mr. Paproski: Be nice, Bryce.

Mr. Mackasey: I intend to be nice but it is kind of hard in this situation. I think if the hon. gentleman is sincere he should really start with reading the Debates when the act came into this House and was agreed to by all parties, except the New Democratic Party. It specified what finances were to be placed at the disposal of COJO through the federal government for the building of the Olympics, whether they are held in Montreal, Vancouver or Edmonton is unimportant. That debate is specific and important because the official spokesmen of our party at that time, the President of the Treasury Board, stated that we anticipated raising $100 million from coins. It is in Hansard. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman any more clearly than that. They are not my words. They are not Austin Page's words. They are the words of the hon. minister when he was speaking. He said we would put a ceiling of $250 million on the revenue coming from coins in the event that coins became very popular in the venture.

His own realistic appraisal was that if we were to get $100 million it would be a magnificent effort which we damn well should not be ashamed of as Canadians. I say right now that we will reach that $100 million despite the cynicism of the hon. gentleman opposite, who is not a racist but is without doubt the greatest cynic in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: I will also suggest to him—

Mr. Paproski: You are speaking of a former Olympic athlete. Shame on you!

Mr. Jelinek: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Mackasey: Do you want me to call him an optimist?

[Mr. Mackasey.]

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley on a point of order.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Chairman, I have to rise and object to the last statement of the Postmaster General when he called me a cynic. If he wants to call it pessimism he can call it that on the past figures—out of seven coin series four have already been minted and as of last September less than $35 million has been realized. I hope that the Postmaster General withdraws that statement. He may call me a pessimist but not a cynic.

● (1530)

Mr. Mackasey: Maybe I should not call him anything, pessimist or cynic. However, I do not see anything unparliamentary about cynic. If the word cynic bothers the hon. members, I will gladly withdraw it. I hope it is recorded in Hansard that I am withdrawing the word cynic and substituting the word pessimist.

I come back to the hon. member's contribution. I am not reflecting on my predecessor, who is not here to defend himself. He left the Post Office in extraordinary good shape. That extraordinarily good minister is not in the cabinet now because he had the courage to get up and talk to the consumers of this country, and he paid a pretty heavy price for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: In case there is any doubt about the integrity of the Mallory firm, they are the ones who prepared the blanks for the Mint. That credential ought to satisfy the hon. member about the quality and integrity of the firm supplying the metallic stamp.

With regard to what will be done with the extras, they will be melted down under the supervision of the Royal Mint or by whatever authority is charged with that. The hon. member should know there will be very few since, basically, we mint them to order. If I am not mistaken, we keep a minimum inventory of metallic stamps on hand.

The important thing about the coin program is that periodically the whole operation is subject to audit by the Auditor General's department. The Auditor General has made an odd footnote where he thinks the operation ought to be tightened up in inventory of samples. There is some question about amounts of money advanced in the United States in the form of advertising. I read the Auditor General's report on the operation several months ago. He gave it a clean bill of health.

On Tuesday next I will be tabling the report. I say to the hon. member that, despite his pessimism, we will hit $100 million which the former President of the Treasury Board said we would hit; not the $250 million that Mayor Drapeau talked about, not the $250 million put in the act in order to make certain that, in the event the coins took off, we did not turn over more. However, we did say in that same speech we would put at the disposal of COJO $375 million from lotteries, stamps and coins. We are not spending here. We are just raising it through three programs. We will meet that, obviously, with the success of the lottery.

Sales through the Olympic coin program amount to over $216 million. Our profit is more than half way to the $100 million. This is one of the reasons why it is being continued. We do not think we will hit the $100 million; we think we will hit $125 million. That should remove some of the pessimism of the hon. member.

On Tuesday next the hon. member will have a copy of this. It contains all the information. I do not want to bore the House now with all the statistics to which they can have access on Tuesday. I simply want to assure him, as a concerned Canadian member of parliament, that the coin program is one Olympic program that will not be stigmatized or have attached to it any kind of scandal. The Auditor General keeps close guard on the operation. The advertising and everything else are properly accounted for. I am satisfied that the operation is being adequately run under Mr. Page.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the minister is referring to a document which he said he will be tabling on Tuesday. It might be helpful to the discussion and the committee if he follows the ordinary rules. Having referred to it specifically, he should table it today so that we can have a look at it from the point of view of this opposition day.

Mr. Mackasey: I have no objection to that, Mr. Chairman. I would have tabled it earlier today had it come into my possession earlier today.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You cannot do it now.

Mr. Mackasey: I am not going to get into all the innuendoes of the hon. member. I will simply sum up by saying yes, we will hit $100 million. Yes, we will hit $10 million in stamps. We are over $50 million now. Yes, the surplus metallic stamps will be accounted for and melted down. The metal will be returned to the Royal Mint, or whatever we do, to get a credit. Yes, we are running things in a business-like fashion. Yes, Mr. Page is quite adequate. Yes, we will meet the objective which the President of the Treasury Board set several years ago.

With regard to the matter of the medallions, I do not know anything about that. Our only interest in the medallions is that they do not interfere with the coin program. They are not purchased through the Post Office. To the best of my knowledge they are not purchased through any responsibility of the Postmaster General. I will verify that later, but I am quite certain of it. It is a COJO production. They may or may not have been minted out of the country. I feel certain they were awarded to somebody on tender, but they do not have anything to do with the Postmaster General. If the hon. member wants to say that it does, this is his opportunity, but he had better be accurate. As far as I am concerned, I do not have anything to do with the medallion program and I do not want anything to do with it. I hope the hon. member reflects on the inference he perhaps unintentionally placed on the record. What I have anything to do with, I will stand behind.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Chairman, I would like to address my remarks on the Post Office to three separate topics. The first two are related and I will cover them together. The last is on a different matter and I will cover it separately. There may be a fourth matter about which I will raise some questions.

The first matter I would like to bring before the minister is the problem of the lack of communication within the Post Office as to the exact status third-class mail holds. This problem first came to my attention in April of 1976. It seems that the agricultural representative for Huron County sent notices of a meeting to area farmers by third-class mail on April 20. The recipients of the notices did not receive them until as late as April 30 to May 3, a full ten to 12 days after they were originally mailed. As a consequence many of the people involved never got any notice of the meeting until it was over. I believe there was more than one meeting involved.

I was asked to inquire into the problem, and this is when I became aware of the lack of communication on the status of third class mail within the Post Office. The customer service person contacted confirmed that the delay of third class mail is condoned in the Post Office. He did mention, however, that the delay of ten days for delivery of a mailing in a county was unusually long. He also suggested the use of first class postage to assure delivery of notices of the meeting.

It seems evident that in the eyes of the Post Office employees third class mail does not have any status at all. On May 6 I informed the Postmaster General of this problem. I received no answer as to the status of this mail. He suggested I send him complete information and I have since done that. I look forward to the minister making a personal inquiry into the situation as he promised in the House when I raised the question. I believe this will benefit many people who use open envolopes with six cent stamps. They should be made aware of the situation. There is a conflict between Post Office employees and the general public as to the status of third class mail. This presents a serious problem and everyone concerned should be allowed to know what exactly a 6-cent stamp means.

● (1540)

The second matter I should like the Postmaster General to consider is the effect of the proposed increase in the cost of first class mail announced today. The hon. gentleman said there would be an increase of 50 per cent in two stages from the present rate of 8 cents to one of 12 cents. An increase of 50 per cent can hardly be justified during the present time of restraint. If the government plans to increase the rate let us make sure the business community is in agreement. If it is not, business interests might well feel they should turn to the other forms of communication. It would not be surprising if, given the Post Office's record of poor service and inefficiency, the business community were to turn to other forms of communication should they feel this latest increase is unjustified, in which case any additional revenue from the higher postal charges will be more than counterbalanced by a decrease in the total volume of mail carried. The increase announced today could be the beginning of a vicious circle. Finally, let me say that if rates are increased the department must make sure there is a corresponding increase in the quality and efficiency of the service offered to the public.

Another matter I wish to mention is of direct concern to the Department of Public Works, although it clearly comes within the purview of my responsibilities as the spokesman of my party on matters having to do with the Post Office. In the early seventies, as part of the government's policy to reorganize the Post Office, plans were made for the development of metropolitan area postal plants designed to improve the system of moving mail and to cope with projected future mail volumes. This project was referred to as the MAPP program.

The new MAPP facilities which, for reasons I shall show, are of interest to us today are those in the Toronto area, specifically the large Gateway postal plant at Dixie and Ellington Road, Mississauga, and the downtown Toronto south-central letter processing plant near Lakeshore Boulevard East at Greenwood Avenue. Both these facilities were developed by the Department of Public Works under the project management principle in 1971, and the estimated cost at that time was $80 million. The date of completion was tentatively set for Christmas mail in 1974. This completion date soon proved to be unrealistic. A progress report stated that Gateway would be ready for live mail testing in 1975. The south-central plant was also expected to begin live mail testing some time in 1975. This was the first announcement in a trend which is most revealing and one which, once understood, must be stopped.

The story in its barest form is one of delays and rising costs. As I say, in 1971 the cost was estimated at $80 million, with completion to be effected in December, 1974. In 1975 the facilities were still not completed and the cost was reported to be in the order of $140 million. Today, according to informed sources, the cost is estimated to be in the order of $160 million and it is believed the Toronto plants will not be operative until at least 1977. There is no guarantee that these figures are correct, however, and costs could quite possibly soar to $200 million with a completion date set for 1978.

There is some suspicion that irregularities exist in the terms of the contracts governing these postal plants. They take the form of contracts in which no time limitations are provided, contracts which embody no financial limitations upon contractors or sub-contractors. It is rumoured that the total consultants' bill alone is in the neighbourhood of $20 million. The contractors working on these projects have nothing to lose as long as costs keep increasing and the completion date is extended.

There have been implications, Mr. Chairman, that there is no reason why the buildings should be completed on schedule. There is some suspicion that many interested groups would like to see the projects continue, with further delays and further extra costs. It is felt there was little concern shown for time limitations and cost factors in connection with either of these projects. All this, of course, affects the Post Office and the efficiency with which mail is delivered and, as such, it should be of great concern to the minister responsible for the Post Office. In closing, I should like to ask him three questions: 1. Why have these postal plants suffered such delays and such increases in cost? 2. What will be the final cost of these plants and what are the definite completion dates? 3. What are the terms of the contracts related to the construction of these postal plants that they should allow for such delays and cost increases?

The minister told us today that the Department of Supply and Services looks after equipment and the Department of Public Works looks after buildings. It is surely in the interest of the Post Office Department to make sure that contracts are awarded in the proper form, and that contractors do the job the Post Office wants them to do.

From my experience in negotiating contracts it is customary in most cases to put in a penalty clause to make sure that the facilities are completed when needed, or by the date contracted for. This is the normal procedure but apparently it was not followed in this instance. The question arises whether these new facilities were necessary in the first place. Perhaps they were not. If they were, is the mail being delayed unduly because they have not been put in place?

Mr. Mackasey: I shall be very brief, Mr. Chairman, because there are several other members who wish to ask questions. If I should fail to deal with all the point which have been raised I will attempt to do so in my closing remarks. First, let me say that all the hon. member's questions about the new facilities in Toronto are being asked on the wrong estimates. While all these questions may be appropriate, they are being asked in the wrong place. The Minister of Public Works is responsible for the building, for the maintenance, for costs, for services, for architects fees, for consultants fees, and for turning the buildings over to the Post Office. I must confess that I have not come here prepared to answer questions on behalf of his department.

Mr. McKinley: Does the minister not agree that this delay—there appears to have been a delay from the start—affects the Post Office greatly? I would at least ask the minister whether he is making daily representations to the Minister of Public Works and to the Minister of Supply and Services in order to see just what is the hold-up, or does he not need these facilities in the Post Office?

Mr. Mackasey: Yes, Mr. Chairman, we need them, and yes, we are not happy with the delay. Perhaps the more fundamental question is, is the delay deliberate? I think the hon. member might be inferring that some people would like to see this work stretched out, and I think that is a pretty strong statement. Perhaps hon. members would like me to help find out, but I am not able to do so because the hon. member who has advanced the question has offered no significant proof that this is the case. I think he would have to be much more precise.

We would like to get into the building as soon as possible. To the best of our knowledge the delays are unintentional. if the hon. gentleman has any information that the delays are intentional, then I think it is his duty as a good Canadian to bring the information forward.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Chairman, I did try to make it plain. It seems that the terms of the contract allow for this; it is not a question of anyone breaking the law or anything like that. Is the minister able to say anything about the contract itself?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I have not seen the contract. I can only repeat that this question is best addressed to the minister in the question period or during the estimates of the Minister of Public Works. I will reply a little later to the question about third class mail, particularly as it affects the organizations and associations in the hon. gentleman's riding.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Chairman, I have enjoyed the debate this afternoon, particularly the remarks of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris whose speech I would describe as the decline and fall of the Post Office. I should like to take a somewhat more optimistic view of the whole scene as I see it, and I think I could probably put a title on my own speech and call it the decline and rise of the Post Office.

On the decline side I have to accept the comments of the minister. We were certainly in serious trouble, and there is no question that we still are. But I see very optimistic signs in the Post Office today and I hope that within the next year or two the situation will change to the point where we can be extremely proud of the Post Office as an institution. There is no question that in the last few years there has been very definite instability in the Post Office. Members on all sides have commented on the number of work stoppages, work to rules and so on, which have made it very difficult for the postal authorities and for the Post Office itself to move mail on schedule. There have been needless delays.

Another problem we have had concerns the employee himself. Traditionally the employee of the Post Office has been someone respected in the community who played a definite role in the community, one who in the past would be equated with a police officer, a fireman, or with people working in other institutions in the community. Over the years I think the postal employee has been downgraded. His role has been diminished, and accordingly his salary has been diminished in relation to these other groups.

Because of this instability to which I have referred we have lost some business that we might otherwise have gained. But there has not been a total loss. As a matter of fact over the last five years there has been an increase in business of 20 per cent, or about one billion pieces of mail distributed by the Post Office annually. Nevertheless there is no doubt that some groups in the community have chosen alternate methods of depatching mail or other goods that would normally be moved by the Post Office. This is one of the major problems that have faced the minister since he took office within the last year and a half.

The Minister told the people of Canada on several occasions during the last year or two that there would be no rate increase of any kind until such time as he saw some improvement in postal service. Today he announced some badly needed rate increases, increases that I understand disturb many members in view of the present period of restraint. Nonetheless these increases are legitimate, even with the anti-inflation program. No part of the anti-inflation program says that price increases cannot be made when they result from cost increases. Certainly the cost increases in the Post Office department far exceed the revenue increases we are seeking.

To return to what I was saying, the minister said he would not increase the rates until he could justify it in terms of better service. I think we are now seeing an improvement in service. Some of our larger customers are telling us they are experiencing improvements in service. A period of stability has now come to the Post Office.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What is your question to the minister? Do not waste the time of the committee.

Mr. McRae: This period of stability commenced, I think, with the contract itself. We now have a reasonable contract. Indeed I think it is a good one. Once more the employees are in a position of parity with other groups in the community, and I think this fact alone will increase stability in the Post Office.

Another very important step toward better service and productivity was taken by gradual acceptance of the postal code. We now have an acceptance rate of 57 per cent. Then associated with the code and its acceptance is the whole mechanization program which is fundamentally designed to improve service in the Post Office. This program is only partially completed and some major aspects of it are not yet in play.

Mechanization is partially a fact in Toronto, Hamilton, Vancouver and London. For example, in Toronto two new plants are opening and are now working at 20 to 30 per cent capacity. Toronto, which handles approximately 50 per cent of the mail moved in Canada by the Post Office, is a very key point. We hope that the two plants in Toronto will prove to be very efficient in operation, but it will probably be the end of the year before they are functioning at full efficiency.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

● (1600)

The Deputy Chairman: This can only be done with the consent of the hon. member because the time will be taken from his allotted 20 minutes.

Mr. McRae: Yes, I will, accept a question.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): With the improvements the hon. member speaks about in Toronto, where this great bulk of mail is handled, does the hon. member think this will shorten the time it takes to send a letter from Prescott to Ottawa, some 60 miles, which on three occasions last week apparently took seven days? Do you think that automation will help this problem in my constituency?

Mr. McRae: I do not think it is going to help that problem, Mr. Chairman, and I never suggested it would. What I am saying is that this one change will help the province. Certainly letters going through Toronto will be facilitated with this new equipment. If the hon. member would just wait for a minute he will hear some of the other solutions I want to suggest.

There is no question in my mind but that one of the major areas of this problem relates to general productivity of the individual and the feeling in the Post Office, or general morale, which is something I think is more important than equipment. I hope to be able to go through all these points in the short time that is available. I agree with the hon. member that this is not a total solution. If the mail is not going through Toronto this equipment certainly is not going to make a difference or solve the problem in that particular case. However, we will try to satisfy the hon. member in terms of the other points I propose to make.

In addition to this program of mechanization we have a program designed to get more acceptance of the postal code. Incidentally we can expect a very aggressive program fairly shortly, and these plans are under way, designed to increase the use of the code, particularly among the larger business users of the mail service which make up 80 per cent of the postal load. In addition to this move toward greater acceptance of the code we have an aggressive marketing program in terms of using the Post Office and the facilities provided by it. We are particularly concerned about dealing with the larger business users in terms of how they use the mail, how they address their envelopes, how they use the code, the size of their envelopes, and so on.

This aggressive program directed to the business community will be something of which we will see a great deal more in the near future. People will increasingly see the red, white, and blue colours of the Post Office. It is hoped they will become more aware in terms of what the Post Office can do and what the users can do to help get the mail to the point of destination in a limited period of time. There is an aggressiveness which is something we have not had in the Post Office for a very long time, but I think we will see a great deal more of it in the next six months or a year. Even at this stage of the game we are seeing some success. Large and small users, individuals and businesses are suggesting that things are already improving. They are indicating a desire to support the Post Office in its program designed for improved and more efficient service.

The major criticism of the Post Office over the last four or five years has been, and rightfully so, in respect to morale. This is a more difficult problem in the sense that you just cannot buy a machine and turn this thing around, as you can when using the code and mechanization. This is a problem that is associated with people, and I think it is the major problem the Post Office has faced. It is also a major problem facing many industries in this country today. We are talking about the work place itself and the role that the individual has to play.

We are talking about individuals who work 40 of their perhaps 80 waking hours, and the satisfaction those individuals get from their jobs. It is wrong to assume that we in the Post Office and the people who work there are not basically concerned about this problem. I can assure you that there have been meetings recently with senior Post Office officials and employees to discuss this very problem, and how we can improve the service and increase productivity. Bringing management and employees together in the Post Office on a continuing basis is one of the ways we think we can improve the spirit within the Post Office, and eventually the service itself. This has to be brought down to the individual worker. We have to practice industrial democracy, and industrial democracy means giving the workers a share in some of the management decisions in the Post Office.

The other point has to do with the work on the floor of the Post Office and on the postal route. We must make these more meaningful activities and this is something—

An hon. Member: How can you do that?

[Mr. McRae.]

Mr. Dick: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if the hon. parliamentary secretary would permit a short question.

Mr. McRae: Yes.

Mr. Dick: When the hon. member talks about this involvement in democracy, is he referring to something like participatory democracy? Does he hope this will have the same effect and success that the so-called participatory democracy we heard about at one time enjoyed?

Mr. McRae: Mr. Chairman, the participatory democracy in the terms the hon. member has mentioned is very definitely a current concept, particularly when we see this week that the CLC is talking about participating as a partner with the government, with business and the whole economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: I think there is a need for some kind of participation of this kind within the Post Office. These are things we all have to learn something about, including the government. The point of the matter is that we are very concerned about the situation. Another aspect of participatory democracy, as I see it, is the satisfaction an individual gets from his job. This is another area about which we must be concerned. The two have to be brought together so that we do have that kind of participatory democracy.

If the hon. member wants an example, and this is what I think he was leading to, we are talking about a massive marketing program in terms of getting the proper use of the mails by the individual users so that the mail will move quicker and more accurately. We think our employees who are sorting the mail should be dealing with questions of this kind. We think there are roles that can be played by those individuals. We think we can make the work at the Post Office more satisfactory for the individual, and thus make the individual much more productive.

These are some of the problems we are looking at within the Post Office, and I think we are beginning to have some success toward a solution. I must remind hon. members of this aggressive marketing program in fields other than those involving the moving of mail. There is a great deal of criticism about so-called junk mail and so on. There are many areas in which the Post Office should move. We believe we have one of the finest marketing programs in existence in the country, and it is based on the concept that the Post Office Department is the last single entity that drops into almost every household in the country on a daily basis. In some way we are able to move something to the doorstep, the postal box or the point at which our customers receive their mail on a daily basis.

We are trying to find ways to provide a variety of services to the public while at the same time increasing revenue. There has been a continuous growth in mail service, as I mentioned, something like one billion extra pieces per year. It is our belief that this growth will continue. People are going to see the red, white, and blue symbol of the Post Office a great deal more on their television screens, and they are going to see postal employees moving around the community in a strong marketing way. I hope that in a year or so the Post Office in this country will be an institution of which we all can be extremely proud, as a going business.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Chairman, we have just heard an incredible speech about how the government is going to spend more money, and perhaps increase the deficit. We are going to have the red, white, and blue symbol throughout the community and on the television screen. Since these happen to be the Conservative party's colours I hope this will be borne in mind when the news is being spread.

Let me get down to some specifics about the Post Office generally. I should like to ask the Postmaster General a couple of questions. In small communities people rent postal boxes for which they pay a charge of perhaps $4 or $6 depending on the size of the box. Frequently they ask, since they do not receive the mail at their door, why they should pay the rental fee. They say it is an extra charge and that they are being discriminated against. Each time I inquire of the Postmaster General's department I am told that when there are sufficient people in an area it is cheaper to use letter carriers than to go through the postal box routine. Perhaps the minister could explain it to me a little better.

● (1610)

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I am taking note of several questions which I will answer all at once. I have noted that and will answer it before the debate is over.

Mr. Dick: Of course the minister is entitled to follow that procedure. That is one matter with which I wanted to deal.

It has been stated that the department is entering a period of restraint. I do not think most Canadians disagree that there should be restraint. I believe the government should have been in restraint long before it actually got there. However, I am glad to see it is in restraint. One thing, however, concerns me. In going into restraint the postal department has broken its word.

I feel that politicians in general and governments in general are at a fairly low ebb in this country in the sense that people say politicians make promises on which they never deliver and that the government says it will do something but never does. For example, the community of Carleton Place applied for door-to-door service. A survey was made. There are over 2,000 postal drops. On October 7 the Deputy Postmaster General wrote a letter in which he said that I would be pleased to learn that the results of a recently completed survey indicate that Carleton Place now meets the requirements for door-to-door mail delivery and that this service will be established in the next fiscal year. Since the letter stated that the service is to be established in the next fiscal year, which is this year, and since it did not say "might be" or "it is hoped it will be", a commitment has been made.

When a restraint program is in effect I do not believe further commitments should be made. However, once a commitment is made I think it should be honoured otherwise politicians and governments fall into disrepute. The people say that politicians promise things and do not follow through with them. I argued this matter through the mail with the Postmaster General.

An hon. Member: How do you get your mail delivered?

Mr. Dick: This correspondence took place between October and February, so one can see that it is a lengthy process. The reply I received states:

> In my letter of November 4, 1975 I informed you that Carleton Place, Ontario qualified for door-to-door mail delivery and that the service would, in all probability, be established in the summer of 1976.

In the letter the minister talks about an indefinite period and refers to the probability. I want to point out that the promise was "will be established in the fiscal year". The only doubt was in respect of the probability about the summer of 1976.

I can understand the difficulty in respect of the fall or the winter, but I think the promise should be kept. Although I believe the government should follow the restraint program, at the same time I believe it should follow the commitments it has made. During the last election the government promised that in Montreal there would be house-to-house delivery service in the urban community of St. Louis de Terrebonne where there now are 2,550 homes that are without delivery service, in the community of Mascouche where there are some 2,400 homes without delivery service and in Mascouche Heights where there are 2,400 homes without delivery service. If these promises were made prior to a period of restraint I think a government, in order to maintain its credibility and in order to appear to be honest in the eyes of the community, must fulfil its promises. I agree with restraint, but this is sort of attrition in a sense. Sometimes when it is necessary to lay off people it is nicer to do it through attrition because in that way people are a little happier. I should like the Postmaster General to refer to this area as well when he replies.

The Postmaster General made some general remarks concerning the third area about which I should like to inquire. Because of the communications I had had concerning the situation at Carleton Place I contacted the Letter Carriers' Union of Canada. I received a letter from Robert McGarry, the National President, who said that he would discuss the situation and come up with some ideas. Perhaps the best thing I can do is read his letter so that the points he makes will be on the record. He said:

> I know for a fact that service could be given to Carleton Place and to the other communities meeting requirements for letter carrier delivery and the Post Office could cut back on the men-years as requested by Treasury Board and still provide this service. The problem is in the refusal to cut back and stop hiring at the executive and top level positions in the Post Office which does little to improve or provide postal service to anybody but provide employment for executive types who cannot make their way in outside industry.
> The Post Office was requested to cut back in the increase of staff for next year. The Post Office did all the cutting from the only branch which provides service to the public and that is in the operational category which includes postal clerks, mail service couriers and letter carriers.
>
> The Post Office will increase its total hiring this year by 2.2 per cent, the highest proportionate growth will be at the higher paid executive level which will increase by 9.4 per cent. The technical, administrative support and operational groups which provide the service to the public will increase by 1.8 per cent and it is this kind of planning and thinking that has caused the service to deteriorate to the level we find it at today.
> The only business the Post Office should be interested in is delivering mail. The Post Office is top heavy with high priced help which does little or nothing to provide service to the public but in most cases cuts from the service budget to make more money in the budget to hire more high-priced help.

The cost of three of the executive types who will be hired could pay for, if put to proper use, the hiring of the six letter carrier positions necessary to institute delivery into Carleton Place this year.

The answer to the problem in Carleton Place is one which the union has been complaining about for years. The cut back is never in high-priced help but in service personnel such as letter carriers and service to the public.

I would be more than pleased to discuss the method of giving service without increasing the deficit with any group of M.P.'s or with the Postmaster General whom I do meet on occasions.

Since he mentions that he will speak to the Postmaster General about this I think the Postmaster General should take his advice. The final paragraph I wish to quote is as follows:

The make-up of the Post Office to date is 18,000 delivery personnel, 22,000 sortation and mail handling personnel, 20,500 executive and supervisory personnel, which makes one supervisor or executive employee for each two employees who provide the postal service.

● (1620)

If that is a true reflection, then it is a little top heavy with supervisory and executive personnel. I think one supervisor or executive should be able to supervise more than two of the people who do actual door-to-door delivery and other services for the public.

In conclusion I would like to point out that there is a complaint in rural areas about having to pay a fee for those little boxes at local post offices. The Post Office Department always says that it does that because it is more expensive than having letter carriers. In the specific case of Carleton Place where a promise has been made, if it really is cheaper to have letter carriers, I wish they would be used.

Then there are promises for the Montreal suburban areas, and finally there is a reference by Robert McGarry, union national president, talking about the number of people at high levels compared with those doing the marching or the troop work as it refers to Carleton Place. However, in general I thank the Postmaster General.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the practice is. I hope to have an opportunity to wind up on an unpartisan note with some pertinent observations about the Post Office. I know there are one or two other hon. members who want to speak, so I will answer very briefly and then at about twenty to five I hope to be given an opportunity.

Bob McGarry, the president of the Letter Carriers' Union, is an excellent president. He has met with me not once but on a dozen occasions. I would be surprised if his philosophy as enunciated in the letter is any other than that all our problems can be solved by adding more letter carriers to the union at the expense of another union's membership. We have terminology whereby supervisors in the Post Office, who are really the bottom line of management, are probably the ones we depend on most to keep the mails going, are probably the most underpaid, and probably the best case for some distribution of our employees' income, which I might be able to have some time to speak about.

If Mr. McGarry wants to reorganize the distribution of the letter carrier workers in such a way that he can provide extra service with the present workers, that is fine. What is really important is that if I told the hon. member that this summer we would look after his particular problem, then he has my word that that is exactly what will happen. I will review the correspondence, but that commitment is for that particular letter and no other. I have hundreds of requests.

I do not know what Mr. McGarry was referring to, but in 1974 which is, after all, quite a few years ago, our executive strength was 31. If we fill all our positions, and we have not, the executive strength at the end of 1977 will be 34, an increase of only three people. With regard to our scientific and professional group—and there will be more and more and these people coming as the Post Office becomes more and more automated—I think the hon. member knows that the ultimate end of automation is attrition and a shift of the type of characteristics of the people we have to hire for different skills. I will not explain that.

Obviously the hon. member understands industrial relations, but even so, in 1974 there were only 70, and we are contemplating only 93 if we fill all the scientific and professional vacancies in the Post Office.

So Mr. McGarry can make an excellent case for more letter carriers, but he does not have to do so at the expense of somebody else. I think everybody in the Post Office, from the deputy minister to the labourer in the Post Office, is equally important, as long as he does his job, and I will have a chance to talk with Mr. McGarry when he gets back from his holidays. I think he is taking a holiday right now. I hope to talk with him within a month or two. I will discuss with him which executives he thinks I should dispense with and how many letter carriers I can hire in their place.

I think the hon. member asked me about boxes. I will deal with them. The old policy of the lock box rental was at one time pretty well left to the rural areas. Because of problems of restraint and because of continued city growth and urban sprawl, if that is a good word—and we get a lot of that in some parts of the country where new housing developments grow up, which do not necessarily warrant door-to-door mail such as the 2,000 criterion which was mentioned—we have been using boxes and charging about double the price of the rural areas. This is hardly fair in this period of restraint when people have to use this method of obtaining their mail when normally they would have letter carrier service, so what we are doing is reviewing the relationship of the cost of lock box rentals—which, as the hon. gentleman knows, is not an obligation because there are free boxes available in rural areas—between rural and the urban residents, and I imagine that out of that review will probably come a more equitable relationship.

Mr. Dick: Thank you.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to make a couple of points and ask a couple of questions of the minister in this debate on the estimates of the Post Office Department. First, I want to congratulate the Postmaster General on his many accomplishments in the department. As a man he has some very special and unusual qualities and unusual ability in matters of labour relations.

Thinking back to the strike of last fall, which was perhaps the longest postal strike in Canada's history—I think it was some 41 days—normally with the mail tied up for that period of time one would expect constituents to be irate and writing and complaining, and demanding that the Postmaster General or the government do something. However, in this strike the Postmaster General was able to find an equitable balance between what was fair to the postal workers and what was fair to the Canadian people. From my own constituency I think I received only two letters, one saying "Tell Bryce to hang in there", and the other demanding that the government take action to halt the strike. However, generally the response from at least my constituency, where there are many rural post offices, was that the Postmaster General was making a reasonable and fair proposition in view of all the circumstances which existed in the country at that time relating to the problems of inflation, unemployment, and the implementation of the selective wage and price controls.

In my constituency there are some 42 rural post offices. About 39 of the 42 remained open throughout the strike, and in some areas we were able to have mail service between the small rural post offices on Manitoulin Island. The Postmaster General probably had one of the most difficult times of his political career, but he certainly had the overwhelming support of Canadian people from coast to coast.

There are one or two matters which I would like to bring to the minister's attention. One relates to the provision of a letter carrier walk on the Batchewana Indian reserve, Rankin location, which is located right within the city of Sault Ste. Marie. It contains really only a few streets in a section of the city of Sault Ste. Marie. It has been trying for some time to get a letter carrier walk service there. They have had group boxes at selected places throughout the reserve, and I have made representations on behalf of the chief and band council to have a letter carrier service.

Even though reserves like this are not part of an incorporated city, if they are an integrated section of the street system of a city as this one is, I think they should be treated as part of the city for letter carrier walk service. In this case about 40 homes and public buildings require a letter carrier walk or house-to-house delivery. It only amounts to about 1,000 feet in distance. I should like to see the service implemented on this reserve, Mr. Speaker.

We usually think of Indian reserves as being located in isolated areas but in this case we have a modern subdivision within the city boundaries with sewers, water, a modern industrial park, modern homes, a new band council administrative building, and a new daycare centre is being built which is a credit to the entire band. We should do our best to ensure that a community like this is given postal service equivalent to that of the city which surrounds it. I should like to ask the Postmaster General to look at this again as it has been under consideration by his department for several months.

Another area I should like to mention is the case of the rural route carriers. I think these people are often the unsung heroes of the Post Office Department. They are really contractors, not employees. They do not accumulate a pension and their job is rather insecure as they have to tender for the contract and, of course, the lowest tender wins. In the vast majority of cases, however, the people concerned are very dependable and go out regardless of weather, regardless of road conditions. They provide a very important service to people in rural areas—perhaps one of the most important services.

A few years ago the Post Office proposed that the contracts—which I believe run on a statutory basis for some five years—be changed so that there would be a regular indexing of income. The contract involves running a vehicle as well as wages, and it is difficult to pick an index which is completely satisfactory. I think we should try to move toward regular indexing of the contracts, however, especially in days of high inflation such as last summer when the index went over 11 per cent. I am sure we are all very pleased that the anti-inflation program is working so well that it is now below 9 per cent and, as the year goes on, I am sure it will come down to 8 per cent. Even with the 7 per cent or 8 per cent that we will probably see this year we should have some sort of automatic indexing for the rural route contractor.

Another matter to be considered is the automatic retendering of contracts over $10,000 every five years. There is an automatic requirement that it be tendered, otherwise it could be carried on beyond the five year limit.

These proposals have been in the offing with the Department of the Post Office and I would welcome the Postmaster General's views on them. There are a large number of rural route carriers in my constituency and they are very important people to the communities they service.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words concerning the philatelic section of the Post Office. First of all, however, I want to take issue with an answer given earlier by the minister when he was commenting on the eight cents or ten cents it may cost the individual in Canada to send a letter. He said most people would only send half a dozen letters per year. According to the estimates, first class postage revenues will be $400 million, and the increase the minister has announced will therefore cost Canadian taxpayers $200 million. Any way you look at it, the cost will be $10 per person in this country, not ten cents. While that may seem a small amount it is 100 times the figure the minister gave earlier.

He said that 80 per cent of the postage in this country is paid by 20 per cent of the customers. That means that business pays, Mr. Chairman. But who does the minister think pays for the business postage? Of course it is deducted to arrive at the taxable income so 50 per cent of it will directly come off the national revenue. The other 50 per cent will be passed on to customers by business. Again, the taxpayer will pay. Unlike the Post Office, business concerns in this country have to abide by anti-inflation rules. They are allowed to pass on price increases, however. I should like to hear the minister's comments on this point.

The philatelic section of the Post Office is very important, Mr. Speaker. From time to time the minister has sent letters saying he is proud of the various new issues. The fact that the Post Office has a separate section for philatelists shows that this service is regarded as very important. In a letter circulated last Christmas the minister made reference to his severest critics—the philatelists of the country. If it is true that they are his severest critics then I cannot understand why he does not pay attention to them.

An article in the September, 1974 issue of "The Stamp Magazine" begins at page 60:

Not so very long ago Canada was one of the most respectable stamp-issuing countries, with a long-standing tradition for fine stamps, a moderate stamp issuing policy, and a wealth of fascinating classical material.

The article goes on to explain the drastic changes taking place in the world of philately and challenges the Post Office to publish the sale and cost figures for the various issues that now proliferate. I believe this challenge has been issued before but there has been no response from the minister. The article comments on the number of examples pointing out how a greedy stamp issue policy can damage the image of the country.

I assume that the Post Office believes philately to be an important source of revenue, Mr. Chairman, because those stamps do not require any service. If the Post Office continues with its present policy, however, collectors will just abandon Canadian stamps. It is a very easy thing for a collector to just stop.

As an example of the proliferation, I would point to a release issued by the minister commenting on the 1975 stamp program, in which there were to be 34 issues. Of these, 11, or one-third, were related to the Olympic program and had some significance, but there were still 23 brand new stamp issues available for the collector. Even this month there is a new issue commemorating the centenary of the Royal Miltary College of Canada. I know that time is limited. Some of my colleagues have a few words to say. However, I hope the minister will make some sort of response.

● (1640)

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for bringing to my attention and that of the committee another very important segment of the Post Office, that of the philatelic world. I agree that I said they are the greatest critics. They are also our most constructive critics. We meet very often with representatives of the magazine industry who are dedicated to this particular group of Canadians and, in fact, people around the world who save stamps.

Naturally some collectors complain about the quality, number of issues, and number of stamps in an issue. It affects the value of the stamps, especially if you are interested in speculation. However, I am rather surprised the hon. member would object to the issue of a stamp honouring the Royal Military College.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is not the point.

Mr. Mackasey: The point is that we get thousands of requests from all members of the House. The hon. member opposite is no exception. We honour the one hundredth anniversary of this or that group or this or that community. As the country gets older, we get more and more of these requests. We are asked to honour this or that event or patent. It is difficult to keep down the number of issues.

I was heavily criticized in the philatelic world for issuing a stamp honouring the Calgary Stampede. It is uniquely Canadian and I thought it deserved honour. Nevertheless, it resulted in a lot of criticism. On balance, I expect this. It is the type of field we are in.

[Mr. Clarke.]

We are asked why Calgary, not Edmonton, or why Edmonton and not another community; why a stamp for the Caisse Populaire or the gentleman who first brought into being credit unions in this country.

We have an advisory group of Canadian citizens. They determine out of all these requests what is the most appropriate design. I get as far away from it as I can for the simple reason these are people who understand the business. They are artists such as Peter Swan. They include representatives of those who produce the stamp, either by offset or letterpress.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the minister, but pursuant to Standing Order 58(9)(a) and (9)(c) I have to put the question at this time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carry on.

The Chairman: There seems to be some disposition to carry on until five o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is saying, as he did last evening, carry on. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka wants to raise some matters with the minister. I wonder if the minister might consider that and answer the questions.

The Chairman: Some hon. members are concerned about the possibility of a vote beginning at five o'clock. Is it agreed by unanimous consent that the debate carry on and, at five o'clock, the resolution be accepted and reported to the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Chairman, those who participated in the debate today had parochial questions to ask, and rightly so. The Postmaster General listened to them most sympathetically. I commend him because any time I have had to contact him he has been most cooperative.

I wish to bring a matter to the attention of the Postmaster General that is not parochial. It will cause a great deal of concern to many people. It is suggested that the department is going to do away with stamping envelopes with the name of the town, village or city, and replace that with a number. I wonder whether that is accurate. That is one of the most unpopular things the Post Office Department could do. I do not know what damned idiot dreamed it up. I wish to state in no uncertain terms that I am against it. I have before me two cancelled stamps. On one, the cancellation reads:

Postes Canada Post
5-4-1976
M1P 4T0

That indicates where the letter came from.

An hon. Member: Is that Parry Sound?

Mr. Darling: No, that is Scarborough. However, who in hell living in Scarborough would know that? Here is another example:

Postes Canada Post
2-1-1976
V6V 3A0

That is the great western city of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. I have a similar stamp from the United States where I believe the same program was being carried out. However, I am informed that all hell broke loose in that country and they have since changed their ideas.

If the Canadian Post Office has any such idea in mind, it will be bombarded with letters from one end of the country to the other. If the minister thinks there was a lot of mail on the capital punishment or the gun control issue, I will tell him there will be ten times as many with regard to this. The minister should tell the official who dreamed this up that if he wants to keep his job, he will scrap this idea right away.

There is another matter. It may seem rather parochial, but it is not. I speak on behalf of the Canadian weekly newspapers. I know that the Postmaster General is sympathetic. These newspapers serve the rural people of Canada. The Canadian Periodical Publishers' Association has asked the czar of the Anti-Inflation Board to roll back proposed postal increases. I quote from their publication:

> CPPA and the Canadian Community Newspapers Association joined in making a formal application to the Anti-Inflation Board for a rollback in the new international postal rates for second class mail. Effective January 1, rates jumped from 5 cents a copy to 20 cents and from 7 cents to 36 cents for magazines mailed to the U.S. weighing four ounces and eight ounces respectively. The Post Office omitted notifying publishers despite a steady stream of correspondence on other postal matters such as coding and pre-sorting requirements.

I hope the Postmaster General will look into this. I am aware there may be some increase in rates to the Canadian weekly newspapers, possibly 20 per cent. In all fairness, the Postmaster General said he will reconsider this. I certainly hope that he will. The weekly newspaper is one of the greatest assets to the country, and especially to the rural country.

● (1650)

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I was about to give the hon. gentleman from Parry Sound-Muskoka some credit. His competence and persistence in making representations on behalf of certain weekly newspapers have resulted in my decision not to include them in the domestic increase I announced today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: In so far as international rates are concerned, I think hon. members will all appreciate what we had to do, which was to take into consideration the volume of mail coming in from the United States which was subsidized by Canada, against the volume of Canadian periodicals and newspapers going to the United States and which are subsidized by the Americans. There was a great imbalance and both countries agreed to raise their own domestic rates on magazines and newspapers being sent out of the country. This, on balance, was to the benefit of the Canadian newspaper industry.

In the seven minutes left to me I should like to touch briefly on a few subjects—I shall not be able to do any of them justice in that short time. I want to say I think these will probably be my last estimates as Postmaster General. Maybe not. In any event, I want to say that as much as I love the Post Office, I take no credit for it. If I had to make an appeal to the Canadian public I would say: This is your Post Office, please listen to one or two of the statistics.

Of all the five departments I have been with there is none I have enjoyed better. It is very people-oriented. There are 52,000 people working in the Post Office, most of them career people. The gentlemen you see sitting here in front of me are not civil servants who spend their time jumping from one department to another. They joined the Post Office 20 or 30 years ago, I suspect from Scotland, most of them; they have a pipeline both into the union and to management that I have never been able to figure out, but it is there. For every Davidson on the union side there is a Sinclair on the management side.

The important thing to remember is that in this country mail is very dependent on factors outside our control. We have six time zones, and climatic conditions play a big role. The lack of an adequate train service hurts us badly. We are very dependent on air mails, and a storm in Toronto, Montreal or Halifax affects mail right across the country, whether we like it or not. Nevertheless by international standards we are considered the third best Post Office in the world.

We are moving five billion pieces of mail in a year. That breaks down the daily potential of complaints to around 200,000. It is very easy, with 200,000 potential complaints, to ridicule the Post Office—not postmasters—they come and go—but the Post Office. One newspaper carried headlines "Body Lost in the Mail". It was great. It was fun; but not so funny for the workers, you know. When you got into it you found they were speaking about the remains of a body. The story began to change a little. They were talking about the cremated remains being sent to a dearly beloved who was 40 miles away and could not attend the cremation. They were being sent by an undertaker who could not find 75 cents to insure or register the packet. It was a little thought-provoking. Where is our sense of values?

It is not my Post Office, it is our Post Office. We have an obligation to make sure that it is improved. What about the deficit? The deficit sounds very high, and it is high. We must, however, take into consideration depreciation and the rent of public buildings which is growing as we move into these new large premises. We also have to take into consideration depreciation on the new machinery which is coming on stream.

Our work force is highly paid, now; our men are adequately paid, they have complete job security, nobody is affected by automation, nobody will be laid off. The rates for working on new equipment have all been firmly established. I do not think there are many in private industry who have the benefit of collective agreements such as the postal unions enjoy. In fairness to the unions, they have withdrawn the boycott of the postal code, and as we increase the use of the postal code we increase tremendously the efficiency of the Post Office.

The rather stodgy image of the Post Office was the first thing which surprised me when I took over, because it is so unrealistic. The Post Office marketing division is aggressive. We have brought in marketing people from the outside. We notice this in the Post Office. We go out to get the business. When I mentioned that 80 per cent of the mail comes from 20 per cent of our customers, I was referring to the business community. I was not talking about the individual letters which people write and which go first class. The hon. member rightly said that the cost of mailing, in the case of the business community, is passed on to the consumer eventually. So is the postal deficit. Whatever way you want to look at it, I won't argue.

The important thing is that the Post Office is on the road to recovery as indicated by the performance charts which the department keeps, not me. It is indicated by the growing volume of mail, it is indicated by the growing volume of mail, it is indicated by our relationship with industry, particularly the direct mail industry, which is probably the largest employer of help in this country. Though I do not like the term junk mail, we have a very close relationship with them. The new rates were discussed with them in depth. As so many speakers correctly said, the point they were most concerned about was not the higher charge but how reliable are the mails. We can improve in that area. The workers must understand, however, that if the Post Office becomes more inefficient it is their jobs which will go, not mine. They have a stake in the future of the Post Office.

Talking about industrial democracy, I think the hon. gentleman made one very valid point. The letter carriers have incentives in this free entreprise system. When they finish their bag of mail, one which has been measured scientifically, one which has been the study of time studies and methodology, they can go home. When they have done, after a period of six hours, seven hours or five hours, they can go home. The inside worker needs the same type of incentive. He does not have it.

What we need inside the Post Office is job measurement so that we can share with the worker by way of a shorter work week the increase in productivity which the new equipment makes possible. In order to do this we need a measurement device which both management and labour think is fair. The increase beyond a certain point should be shared in some tangible manner with the postal worker. Then we could get productivity out of what I believe to be a wonderful group of people, those who work in the Post Office.

The Chairman: Order. In accordance with the agreement made earlier, it being after four o'clock it is my duty pursuant to section 9(a) and 9(c) of Standing Order 58 to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the proceedings.

Shall Post Office—Vote 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Post Office—Vote 1 agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps at this time I should call on the minister, who indicated in committee of the whole that he was ready to table the document to which he referred in his remarks. I think it should be done at this time while the House is still sitting.

Mr. Mackasey: Yes, Mr. Speaker. With the consent of the House I wish to table the document I referred to in the discussion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House consent to the minister's tabling the report on Olympic coins for 1976?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock p.m. this House stands adjourned until Tuesday, May 25, 1976, at two o'clock p.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF NEW EXPANSION PLANS FOR VANCOUVER TO PLANNING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which concerns the proposed expansion of the Vancouver International Airport. In view of the recent statements by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) that this expansion may take place within the Sea Island dyke, in view of the fact that this proposal has not been referred to the airport planning committee which had previously vigorously opposed the airport expansion, and in view of the fact that such expansion will trigger additional non-co-ordinated development in the Fraser estuary, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this new proposal be referred to the airport planning committee and that a moratorium be placed on further development until proper studies not only of the airport expansion but all expansion in the Fraser estuary be completed.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION PROVINCES BE GIVEN POWER TO DEAL WITH DAIRY PROBLEMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on an urgent and important matter.

Considering the general discontent of industrial milk producers following the dairy policy announced for the current year, and considering that the Canadian Dairy Commission seems to fail in its task to plan and coordinate this production, that the Minister of Agriculture does not find any reasonable solution for producers, most of whom are in Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That this House recommend unanimously that the federal government leave to farmers themselves and to provincial governments the task of organizing, coordinating and planning the affairs of the dairy industry.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER "ORION" WAS NOT THE RIGHT AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister and arises out of the dreadful situation in which we find ourselves in the matter of re-equipping the Canadian Armed Forces, particularly having regard to the difficulties in which the country and the government have been placed by his Minister of National Defence. I want to ask the Prime Minister with respect to a quote attributed to the Minister of National Defence in the press today, in which he said—I am quoting—that "he did not necessarily think the Orion was the right one in the first place", referring to a long range patrol aircraft. If this report is correct, can the Prime Minister indicate whether he has conferred with the Minister of National Defence, what is the state of mind of that minister in respect of the matter, and why did the deal go as far as it did if this transaction involving the Orion and its concept did not have the full support of the Minister of National Defence, as he is now supposed to have said?

● (1410)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking me if a quotation in a newspaper is correct. I have seen the quotation but I do not know if it is a correct one. I can see many ways of explaining the thought that might be behind such a quote. There were many options before the Cabinet, some of which were much more costly than the one we eventually chose. Perhaps the minister had in mind that there were better deals if we had more money. We certainly made the decision, for the money we could dispose of over a period of time, which represented the best possible deal.

REASON FOR DELAY IN DECIDING ON ALTERNATIVE TO THE "ORION"

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was not so much concerned about the Prime Minister having seen the press reports as I was about the Prime Minister having seen his Minister of National Defence. The minister is also reported to have said there are at least six possible alternatives of LRPA, and he has hopes of making a decision by the fall. Since all of these other options must have been thoroughly examined in the past before the Lockheed LRPA was finally decided upon, would the Prime Minister explain why we now have to wait until the fall before a new decision is reached? Are there any other elements that were not present when the other options were discarded that would make one of these other six or so alternatives of which the minister has spoken now relevant?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there were, indeed, many options looked at, and the fact of having chosen one means that the other options fell by the wayside. The conditions, submissions and tenderings which were put forward by the other companies would certainly not apply at the present time. We would have to reassess the kind of options the various other companies would be making to see whether they were still within the price range we were interested in and to see what effects inflation or other technological change might have had on them, and then make a new choice. It does not seem to be complicated.

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER "ORION" WAS NOT THE RIGHT AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister of National Defence is in the House I wonder whether he would explain the quotation attributed to him over the weekend in which he is reported to have said in respect of the Orion matter:

—he didn't necessarily think the Orion was the right one in the first place.

If that report is correct would the minister indicate which aircraft he favoured over the Orion and why the deal went as far as it did without his full support, which seems to be the indication in this statement?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what article is being referred to, but my position was very clear. There was a long study undertaken by the project office, which was an interdepartmental office, exhaustively determining which was the best aircraft for Canada. The project office recommended, and we approved as our choice, the selection of the Lockheed for reasons I have given to the House on many occasions. It is the most cost-effective aircraft and we thought it was the best aircraft, but there was, and I repeat it once again, a problem of financing the interim payments. It is for that reason we did not purchase the Lockheed, not because it was not the best aircraft for the job.

REASON FOR ANNOUNCING PURCHASE OF LEOPARD TANKS AT NATO MEETING—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF COST

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it was reported over the weekend at the meeting of NATO foreign ministers in Oslo, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced that Canada is going to purchase 128 Leopard Mark I tanks for use in Canada and Europe. Today it was reported that the West German Minister of Defence has welcomed this decision. Can the Minister of National Defence confirm this decision, and also offer some explanation of why it was decided to have such an important announcement made abroad by the Secretary of State for External Affairs rather than have it made in this House by the Minister of National Defence?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe that if the hon. member reads the statement correctly he will see there was not an announcement of a purchase. I can confirm that the negotiations with the German government for the purchase of the Leopard I are proceeding satisfactorily, but there are a number of matters still to be concluded, and I think that fact was contained in the statement made. We did not announce the purchase of tanks from Germany.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, obviously the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been misquoted and I hope this matter will be straightened out with the West German Minister of Defence.

What is the total cost of these tanks, including spares, jigs and so on? If we are to sign a contract with the Federal Republic of Germany for the purchase of these tanks, can we be assured that this House will be kept informed of the progress of the negotiations, arrangements for financing and so on, so that we will not be subject to another process of bungling and mismanagement as we were with the LRPA.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, in the first place I should like to point out to the hon. member that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was not misquoted. If he reads his statement closely he will see it is stated that there were still a number of factors to be considered and worked out before any such announcement is made. Until we have completed all the arrangements I cannot describe or talk about the details concerning price. That of course will be done at the time of an announcement.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—ALLEGED STATEMENT OF MINISTER THAT IT WAS A GREEDY DEAL—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. The Minister is quoted in Saturday's Toronto Star as describing the now defunct deal in respect of the Orion aircraft with Lockheed as being a greedy project. Is this his view since on behalf of the government he sent a telex communication which amounted to a letter of intent to that corporation last December 2, and if he thought it was greedy at that time what did he mean; did he mean that we were going to get something we did not need in terms of defence requirements or that it was too costly? Why did he send that telegram at that time if he thought it was a greedy deal?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I said, in fact, that we were no longer negotiating with Lockheed on a business basis. The matter had become far more imbued with politics than the main business principles that are essential to the negotiation of contracts with suppliers. So, under those circumstances, the government decided to cancel further negotiations with Lockheed.

[English]

REASON MINISTER MADE COMMITMENT TO LOCKHEED IN VIEW OF UNCERTAINTY ABOUT FINANCING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Well, Mr. Speaker, I will have to read the transcript because the answer makes even less sense than usual. Following this answer, and with regard to the report in the Toronto Star of Saturday in which it is stated that the minister said that a "one man to one man verbal conversation" is by no means sufficient when one negotiates a contract involving hundreds of millions of dollars, may I say that I agree with him entirely. However, I should like to ask him if he believes that why would he send a telex committing the government to this deal last December when they had no commitment at that time for front-end financing for which he is responsible, and why more particularly after four further months did he on behalf of the government sign another contract with Lockheed committing the government to pay some $16 million without the assurance at that time that they would have the front-end financing.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member will read today's debates of the House, I suggest to him that he also go over those of the last few months. As a matter of fact, the Minister of National Defence indicated that an official of his department had talked with an official of Lockheed concerning a possible means of financing the contract. Unfortunately, that agreement remained verbal and was never put down in writing, which necessarily made things more complicated.

In fact, as I told the House in December, we authorized Lockheed to undertake preliminary work for the contract. We authorized Lockheed to undertake preliminary work for the contract to protect the terms and conditions we had negotiated with it and which we regarded as a good deal. Unfortunately it was not possible to finance that deal. Since Lockheed could not get approval from the banks and we wanted to continue to protect the terms and conditions already negotiated, we had to sign in March a provisional contract which protected those terms. Our expenses with the Lockheed Corporation were not to exceed $16 million. In the circumstances, it was the best agreement we could get from that company to retain good terms and avoid breaking up the budgetary ceiling the government had set for itself.

ALLEGATION MINISTER BLAMES DEFENCE OFFICIALS FOR COLLAPSE OF "ORION" DEAL—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I am sure many Canadians will wonder how spending $16 million and not getting any aircraft at all amounts to the best of a bad deal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I would like now to ask the Prime Minister if he thinks it is appropriate for a minister of the Crown who is again quoted in the Saturday Star as putting the blame for the collapse of the Orion deal bluntly on Department of National Defence officials—the Prime Minister knows it is a long tradition for ministers to accept responsibility because civil servants cannot answer for themselves—to make this statement about officials in his or any other minister's department.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the Toronto Star or, for that matter, any other Star. It seems to me that the minister just answered this question. He was quoting the Minister of National Defence himself who was not putting blame on anyone, explaining how there was a misunderstanding between a general in the Department of National Defence who was negotiating with Lockheed and the Lockheed Company. There had been a verbal agreement, as we understand it, and the Minister of National Defence has said this in the House before. From what the hon. member is asking it seems to me this is the reply which was just given by the Minister of Supply and Services.

SUGGESTION PROVINCES BE GIVEN POWER TO DEAL WITH DAIRY PROBLEMS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Considering the general discontent of industrial milk producers and following the dairy policy announced for the current year, and considering that the Canadian Dairy Commission seems to fail in its task would the minister be prepared to let to farmers themselves and to provincial governments involved the task of organizing and coordinating the planning of the dairy industry in this country?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Dairy Commission is responsible for all producers of industrial milk in Canada. We are not receiving representations from all parts of Canada, but we have had some from some parts of the province of Quebec because producers in parts of Quebec recognize their responsibility toward making this program a success, and we are weighing it on those merits. There is no way that this Minister of Agriculture and this government can be responsible for paying money to people to produce a product that has no market. We told the producers what the production had to be last year. The marketing board is responsible for allocating the marketing quotas within the province. Different provinces operate under different systems. This is a most difficult program to operate and it is not without problems, but if producers, provincial marketing boards and the Canadian Dairy Commission want to work together, they can solve this problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DAIRYING—INQUIRY WHETHER RUMOUR OF 20 PER CENT REDUCTION IN QUOTAS IS WELL FOUNDED

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary.

Since industrial milk producers committed themselves to reduce their production by 12 per cent and the government requested 15 per cent last March or April, and since it seems now that the government requests 20 per cent reductions of their 1973-74 quotas, would the minister indicate whether this rumour is well founded?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): We are not asking for a 20 per cent reduction, but for the month of April the figures still show 15 per cent above last year's production. We asked for cuts in production last year at the end of June and in September. Instead, there were increases both times. There must be some kind of strict quota regulation, or we will only compound the problem we have at the present time. If dairy farmers stay within their production quota which is allocated to them by the provincial marketing boards, they can still make a decent living.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

INQUIRY WHETHER ADVICE OF JUSTICE DEPARTMENT SOUGHT ON AUTHORIZING LOCKHEED TO BEGIN WORK

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. Because there was a $1 billion oral contract, on Thursday, May 20, as recorded in Hansard at page 13700, the Minister of Supply and Services said that according to lawyers from the Department of Justice it was from that moment that the government had a contractual link with Lockheed. By signing the agreement with Lockheed on April 1, which limits Canadian liability to $16 million, a sort of retroactive legality appears to have been given to the letter of December 2. My question is, did the Minister of Supply and Services seek the advice of the Minister of Justice in November or December about whether he could authorize Lockheed to begin work on January 5 in spite of the fact that the actual contract had not been signed?

[Mr. Whelan.]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will want to check the precise dates, but I believe that throughout the Department of Supply and Services did have the advice of my officials as to the consequences of any actions it was taking.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister says they were in contact with him and his officials. What advice did the minister and his officials offer, particularly now that it has come out today that we had a billion dollar oral contract with regard to this matter? What advice was given, and did this commit Canada to liability beyond the $16 million?

Mr. Basford: The hon. member should know that traditionally, and for obvious reasons, the advice given to other departments is confidential.

GRAIN

PROPOSED CHECK-OFF SYSTEM TO SUPPORT RESEARCH—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Since it has become very clear that producer groups affected in western Canada are at the present time requesting a grain check-off system to give further moneys to support research, is the government prepared to bring in legislation to accommodate this very necessary and practical request by the producers affected?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in general my answer would be yes, that we are prepared to facilitate a check-off, which is desired by producers. It seemed to me that the broad determination of producers, in addition to the support of producer organizations, is desirable, and I have responded to the spokesmen for those groups indicating to them our preparedness to finance a plebiscite or a vote among producers, and if that is favourable, to proceed with the necessary provisions to enable the check-off to be adopted.

Mr. Murta: Can the minister give us a time frame in which we can expect a plebiscite in connection with a check-off system; if so, can the minister assure the House that possible legislation would be brought to parliament in the next session?

Mr. Lang: The timing of the plebiscite will depend a good deal upon the positive reaction of the groups concerned—which however, I would anticipate—and therefore I would assume we could have that disposed of during the next few months. I am not absolutely sure, in all the circumstances, what form of legislation may be required to implement this, but certainly with the co-operation of the opposition, so that there will be no problem about House time, I would look forward to seeing the necessary implementation as soon as possible after the session closed.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED RATE CHANGES ON RAPESEED AND RAPESEED PRODUCTS—VIEWS OF PROVINCES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. May I ask the minister if he has received a response from the premiers of the prairie provinces and their ministers of transport to his May 6 Telex in regard to the order in council dated May 13 which advanced the new freight rate proposal with respect to rapeseed and rapeseed products which I might say further aggravates the anomaly between raw rapeseed and processed rapeseed? Could the minister indicate the nature of his reply and if he has received a response from the premiers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is a sequence of telegrams moving back and forth and there may have been an interim reply to some of the points in my May 6 telegram. So far as I know, there has not been a reply to my latest telegram. As the hon. member knows, my reaction was to hold the level of rates on rapeseed oil at the lowest rate legally possible under the existing law, namely the compensatory rate. The discrepancy between rates or the anomaly to which the hon. member refers is solely due to the fact that the rapeseed is at a much lower rate than that, even though the oil is at a rate well below cost.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister failed to acknowledge the fact that the rate for rapeseed meal has been adjusted upwards and that has placed a severe hardship on the processing industry in western Canada. In light of the fact that we now find that processors in western Canada are forced to suspend their rapeseed growing contracts with producers as a result of the new freight rate proposal, does the minister not consider his unilateral dictatorial action somewhat premature, having regard to the fact that we have a Stavely commission and a Hall commission studying all aspects of costing and grain transportation in western Canada?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, first of all there has been no change in rates at this point and as far as I know there is no intention to change the rates on meal, if I heard the hon. member refer to that specifically. The specific action is to indicate to the Canadian Transport Commission that it ought not to allow the rate on rapeseed to be set at any higher level than the compensatory level which is the lowest allowed by law. In view of the fact that the appeal process from the CTC decision has in effect taken eight or nine months or more, I can hardly join with the hon. member in thinking that we were in any great rush.

EFFECT ON INDUSTRY OF RATES ON RAPESEED—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN CROWSNEST FREIGHT RATES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Since he is the only Saskatchewan minister in the cabinet, may I ask if he has assessed the effect of his decision on the secondary and indeed the primary rapeseed industry? Also, have all the promises made at the Calgary Western Economic Opportunities Conference been scrapped? May I ask one more question at the same time, Mr. Speaker? In a statement on May 6 the minister suggested that perhaps the alternative might be to increase the Crowsnest freight rates on rape meal; is he opening that discussion again and picking away at the Crowsnest rates one grain at a time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have assessed the impact in relation to processing and, of course, it is true that differences in rates between raw materials and processed materials lead to the movement of the raw material as against the processing and movement of that material. I will be before the House in the next session with legislation to begin to deal more effectively with that whole issue in general. Of course, what I have done in relation to the western premiers or their transport ministers has been to ask them to please be honest enough to say so if what they mean is that they want a subsidy from other freight or from other taxpayers on the rapeseed, instead of hiding behind the argument of equity. Equity, of course, leading to the processing of a product can occur whatever the level of the rate.

I have been pointing out to the premiers that they can hardly expect a rate as far below cost as the Crow rate is, to be applied to other goods today such as oil and beef. In both cases, we get the discrepancy of movement of the seed or the grain instead of the movement of the product. What I want from them is honesty to recognize that if there is equity to be obtained it can be obtained, and perhaps even at a below cost level, but if what they are really insisting upon is subsidies in a new area on particular products, they should be honest enough to say so.

Mr. Mazankowski: You want to destroy the Crow rates.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBILITY OF TURNING DEPARTMENT INTO CROWN CORPORATION

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. In view of the minister's positive response during the debate on May 21 to my question relating to the concept of the Post Office being moved from its current status as a department of government to some form of autonomous or special status, such as that occupied by the Royal Canadian Mint, could the minister give some indication of when such enabling legislation might be brought before parliament?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS TO SOVIET UNION ON BEHALF OF VALENTYN MOROZ

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs may I direct a question to the Prime Minister concerning the Ukrainian historian Valentyn Moroz along the lines of a motion that the hon. member for Athabasca sought to move on Friday. As Your Honour knows, those of us who were members of the delegation, of which you were the leader, to the Soviet Union last September tried to make representations on behalf of Valentyn Moroz so we are aware of the difficulty, but even so, in view of the news that he is being transferred to a psychiatric institute, the result of which is likely to be quite ominous, will the government again make representation to the Soviet authorities for the release of Valentyn Moroz?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I recognize that the hon. member expresses the views of many, many Canadians represented by members on both sides of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: The hon. member just said that he knows that the rule of international law is that of not interfering in the domestic affairs of another state. He also knows that we have taken, and will be taking, every chance to put very strongly to the Soviet authorities our concern in the case of Valentyn Moroz, in the context not only of the concerns of Canadians but also of the Helsinki agreement.

HEALTH

DATE OF ACTION TO ENSURE SAFE WORKING ENVIRONMENT FOR ASBESTOS WORKERS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the report of the federal-provincial advisory group on health hazards related to asbestos has stated that a definite health hazard exists, in the first place, and that, according to the minister's press release, the Department of the Environment on his advice has recently proposed a national emission standard for asbestos under the Clean Air Act, could the minister inform the House when he anticipates that some meaningful action will be taken to ensure a safe working environment for asbestos workers?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated in the press release the hon. member referred to, several steps have been taken by my department in this area but a lot of action is required from the provinces. It is not my responsibility to answer for the Department of the Environment.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Could the minister indicate what action he has taken to improve the health surveillance of asbestos workers?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, after the report was presented, several steps were taken and announced at various times. I should like to remind the hon. member that close consultations are now being conducted with the provinces with a view to improving inspection at the various plants where asbestos is being treated. Consultations have been under way for several months. I recommended, among other things, a maximum level of asbestos in the air, but since the inspection of the plants in question falls especially to provincial authorities, the work must be done with them in this connection.

ENERGY

RADIATION HAZARD IN PORT HOPE—LENGTH OF TIME AND COST OF CLEAN-UP

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? I understand that the minister has received a report from the MacLaren firm of consulting engineers regarding the extent of the damage to the Port Hope area, and perhaps other areas throughout Canada, as a result of radioactivity and radon gas. In respect of Port Hope, could the minister tell the House how long the clean-up will take and how much it will cost?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give any precise figures about how long it is going to take, although I wish I could. As the hon. member undoubtedly knows there is a problem in finding a permanent disposal site for the residue which has to be removed from various properties in Port Hope. I was there on Friday and talked to city council and others in the city. I hope we will be able to work out a transitional arrangement so that we can get on with the clean-up, which can start early in June. Meanwhile, work will proceed and the MacLaren report which the hon. member mentioned will be released tomorrow.

CLEAN-UP OF RADIATION HAZARD IN DELORO AND BANCROFT

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister use exactly the same kind of pressure to effect clean-ups in Hastings county, particularly in Deloro and Bancroft, as the problem arises in both those communities?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that the pressure is on.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—PROTECTION OF ELECTRONIC AND ENGINEERING DESIGNS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence? I am concerned about the financial authority under which we spend money with respect to the Orion after the initial work-up and definition phase. Is the minister in a position to indicate to this House how the Department of National Defence or the Government of Canada will protect certain engineering rights we have with respect to electronic suits and modifications to the basic Orion airplane which would permit the remote sensing of weapon pods or capabilities. How are we protected?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we are the legal owners of any design work that has been done to date under progress achieved by Lockheed before the contract was terminated.

Mr. Forrestall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister where those plans are? Are they in Canada or the United States?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the work has been done in the United States, at the Lockheed plant.

Mr. Forrestall: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the light of that answer, can the minister indicate what steps the department is taking to bring those plans home to Canada, where they belong?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, this will, of course, be negotiated at the time of the wrap-up of the progress that has been made on the program to date. We have indicated that the maximum cost is $16 million but there may be negotiations which can reduce the cost below that figure. These discussions are now to take place.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE RECRUITMENT AND TRAINING OF NATIVES AS ENVIRONMENTAL INSPECTORS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development arising from the announcement concerning reforms in oil and gas regulations in the north and the environmental emphasis. Will the minister outline in specific terms the programs his department has to train and recruit native peoples as environmental inspectors?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can do that in detail at this time but can assure the hon. member that in this area we feel strongly there should be good opportunities for native peoples. Since this is their natural area, we feel they could fit in very well, and we are moving in that direction.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister be specific and indicate if it is his intention to employ native environmental inspectors? What number does he feel would be involved in the program?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, the answer is, yes, it is our intention to do that. I think the figure suggested to me was between 60 and 70 persons.

OIL AND GAS REGULATIONS—MINISTER'S VIEW ON PUBLIC HEARINGS IN CONNECTION WITH LAND USE PERMITS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development regarding the oil and gas regulations? I am attempting to clear up contradictions between statements in those regulations and in his statement entitled, "Land and environmental control," in which he made known his strong feelings about public hearings. Is it the minister's opinion that the oil and gas regulations as tabled last Wednesday made mandatory the public hearings about which the minister in his statement claims to feel so strongly?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the process to which the hon. member refers comes under our land use regulations which require that, if there is to be significant exploration, application must be made for a land use permit. That application must be made available to the communities which would be affected. They have six weeks in which to respond to the application.

Mr. Jarvis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In his statement the minister referred to environmentally insignificant exploration activities. Would the minister in general terms explain what he meant when, in his statement, he used the term "environmentally insignificant exploration activities?"

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, we felt that some activities had reached a point at which we could not control them. In other words, an individual going down the river in a canoe, taking with him a backpack, might be doing some exploration. We felt it would not be sensible to try to squeeze a case of that kind into our bailiwick and require land use permits.

AIRPORTS

PICKERING—ALLEGED MINISTERIAL PRESSURE TO PROMOTE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask the minister if his two announcements last week, one not to allow more foreign carriers into Toronto International Airport and the other regarding the allocation of $30 million to the CPR for Montreal-Quebec rail improvements, instead of immediate assistance to CN for the Montreal-Toronto-Windsor rail service, are part of an over-all plan of his department, as alleged by some, to intensify pressure on the citizens of Toronto to accept the air mode as the only way to travel and, therefore, to accept the building of Pickering airport?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, if there were no need to incur additional airport expenditures in any area of Canada, we would be delighted to avoid them. Our real concern is that people in the Toronto area, as well as people generally, will in all probability want to fly from Toronto and to Toronto from points far distant; therefore there will be the continuing problem of lack of runway capacity in a couple of years' time. Rail services from Toronto are at present the best in Canada. That, essentially, is our reason for choosing some other locations for immediate first improvements. As the hon. member will know from having read the full statement, there are intentions, as well, to improve progressively rail travel in all parts of Canada. These include such immediate steps as we can take in the Toronto-Windsor area.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DEPARTMENT'S KNOWLEDGE OF FINANCING DIFFICULTIES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services? In interviews which were broadcast over the weekend the minister claimed that a general of the Department of National Defence had obtained assurances from Lockheed that financing would be available but that officials in the Department of Supply and Services knew nothing about this. Is the minister seriously claiming that Mr. L. H. Stopforth, who was from his own department and was deputy project manager was deliberately kept in ignorance of these facts by his colleagues on the LRPA team? Was the minister's deputy minister not apprised of this particular situation?

An hon. Member: Anything is possible with that government.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it was done deliberately but, be that as it may, the representative of my department on the management committee of that project was not advised of the possibility of that financial arrangement.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CONTRACT AND AUTHORIZATION TO START WORK

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the seriousness of the matter, and the serious questions which have arisen with respect to this entire matter, I wonder if I can again call on the minister to table the unsigned contract with Lockheed and the authorization to start work which he sent to Lockheed on December 2, so that we may begin to assess the procedure which led us into this mess.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated why I cannot table the document mentioned by the hon. member. The hon. member referred to one, namely that this document has never been signed and is therefore legally nonexisting. Moreover, it is sure that the tabling of this document which has no legal significance could harm Lockheed, should this company wish to offer the government a new contract. As I do not wish to harm any party, or any company wishing to deal with the government, I will not table this document.

INCOME TAX

PROPOSAL TO ALLOW CONVERSION OF REGISTERED RETIREMENT SAVINGS PLANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. At present registered retirement savings plans can neither be withdrawn nor used to purchase annuities available only through insurance companies. Recently Revenue Canada saw fit to approve the conversion of RRSP's to conventional trusts, which would mean that the interest only would be subject to tax, leaving the capital intact. However, final approval from the Department of Finance is necessary before such a change can take place. Can the minister now say whether this approval has been obtained and, if so, when this policy will take effect?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, there has been a hint or suggestion in the press that there has been some disagreement as between our interpretation and that of the Department of Finance. That is not correct. Before I say any more I think I had better hear what is to be said this evening.

DAIRY POLICY—REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S ADVICE TO QUEBEC PRODUCERS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture and it is based on scores of questions put to me by farmers in my province who come to me and say: "Heward, what are we going to do—kill our cows or throw our milk in the river?"

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Grafftey: I ask the minister this question so that I may advise the farmers in my area who are faced with these disastrous alternatives as a result of the minister's milk policy. What does he advise Quebec farmers to do—kill their cows or throw their milk into the river?

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Grafftey: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member at three o'clock.

PLANS FOR CELEBRATION OF HER MAJESTY'S SILVER JUBILEE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Can the right hon. gentleman tell us soon about the plans for the celebration next year of Her Majesty's Silver Jubilee, more particularly as regards the production of stamps and coins, tours and holidays and celebrations of a Dominion nature?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will have to refer for details to the Secretary of State who has these matters in hand. I can tell the House from memory that apart from Her Majesty's plans to visit Canada during her Silver Jubilee year other ceremonies have been prepared; one of them involves my participation in the Commonwealth Conference in London next year.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MOVEMENT OF ACCOUNTING OFFICE FROM CAPREOL TO TORONTO—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the decision of the Canadian National to centralize its revenue accounting operations in Toronto, which will result in the loss of jobs in Capreol and which certainly contravenes the government's often-stated policy of decentralizing its operations, and in view of the fact that more than 1,650 of the residents of Capreol, a community completely dependent on the CNR, have signed a petition protesting this move—I will present a copy to the minister later—can the hon. gentleman assure the House that he will instruct the CNR to cancel this proposal to shift part of its operation to Toronto, which doesn't need these jobs, in the interests of the community of Capreol?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): There are times, of course, when the move of a smaller unit to the location of a larger unit make economic sense, even when the direction is from Capreol to Toronto and consequently inconsistent, certainly, with the objective of the government, that is to say, decentralization. I think it is important for Crown corporations to take account of decentralization objectives whenever they can. However, I would not try to second guess every move of this nature that is made.

TRANSPORT

REASON FOR SUBSIDIZING CANADIAN PACIFIC RATHER THAN CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY QUEBEC-MONTREAL SERVICE—CONSULTATION WITH UNIONS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): A further question to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. In view of the hon. gentleman's recent announcement that the government will be making $30 million available to the CPR to enable improvements to be made in the company's rail passenger service between Quebec City and Montreal, and in view of the dismal record of the CPR in connection with passenger service as compared to the CNR, which has already improved the service in the Windsor-Quebec City corridor, and in view of recent comments by the Minister of Labour suggesting there would be more consultation with unions concerning major issues, can the minister explain, first, why the CPR was chosen for funding in this area rather than the publicly-owned CNR and, second, whether the trade unions concerned were fully consulted in the light of the fact that this funding has serious implications for CNR workers in this area?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): There have been some discussions, and there will be more as matters proceed. It is, of course, important to make a decision and announce it before one can take meaningful decisions about the way in which the various problems associated with it are to be dealt with. As I indicated to the House last week this is not a question of an amount for the CPR but rather of an amount for the upgrading of a rail line along which the passenger service will run. I foresee it will be run as one common marketing operation with the joint involvement of two railways, the CN, without doubt, being the dominant one.

REQUEST FOR EMBARGO ON IMPORTATION OF CHEESE

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It relates to reports this morning that rotten imported cheddar cheese could be sold on our domestic market. It is reported that this product has been offered for sale by cheese importers at a price between 50 and 60 cents below the current market price. Will the minister instruct the appropriate officials of his department to investigate this matter and impose an embargo immediately on all imported cheese?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I understand there is every possibility that this cheese was inspected when it was brought into Canada. But it has been in storage in Canada for over a year; it was when it was brought out of storage that it was found to be unfit for human consumption. It is suggested that with some modification it could probably be made fit for human consumption—this would involve scraping the mold off the sides. I might say that over 4,000 inspections of imported cheese were carried out last year. If the hon. member or anyone else thinks I want Canadians to eat bad cheese they are mistaken; I would like nothing better than to have the authority to condemn it. But if it can be made fit for human consumption, and come up to our standards, it will be approved. Under no circumstances will it be approved otherwise.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POSITION ON COMMITMENT TO COMMON FUND ESTABLISHED BY UNCTAD CONFERENCE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It arises from the crucial stage of the deliberations at the United Nations Conference on trade, aid and development in Nairobi. I believe the Prime Minister has received representations over the weekend from some of the non-governmental observers at the conference in Nairobi as well as perhaps some advice from his own foreign policy adviser concerning the basic test of political will formulated by the Group of 77 having to do with participation in the common fund which now stands, I think, at some $430 million with $500 million being the take-off point. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether any special instructions have been directed to the Canadian delegation in Nairobi to making a firm commitment on the common fund before the conclusion of the conference?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member, I gather, will find the answer to that very same question in last week's Hansard. Canada has, right from the beginning of UNCTAD, made a firm commitment to the tin buffer stock. As to the idea of the common fund which arose from the Manila Declaration, a rather recent one received by our country only a few months before the conference, the minister said he would consider the principle very favourably. Everybody read the news reports over the weekend about the tough negotiations at this last week of Nairobi and Canada's role is very well known. We are ready to contribute to anything which makes sense, and we have already announced a first contribution. The common fund is a theoretical proposal which is being negotiated at the very moment.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I thank the parliamentary secretary for her answer but in view of the fact that her answer last Thursday was not correct with respect to OPEC country commitments from Iraq, Venezuela and Algeria, and in view of the fact that discussion is not commitment and that there needs to be some separation of the common fund principle from the tin agreement which is really quite another matter, will the Prime Minister or the parliamentary secretary confer with the Canadian delegation in Nairobi to determine whether the facts are not that the Canadian commitment with respect to the common fund would be crucial to achieving success at UNCTAD, crucial, in fact, to the continuing role of the North-South Conference which has already been jeopardized, apparently, according to the comments of Canada's co-chairman, Perrez Guerrero, in criticizing Canada's position?

Miss Bégin: Canada does not jeopardize the future of any common fund whatsoever. Canada has always been favourable to any concrete proposal that is likely to stabilize the production of vulnerable commodities. Out of the 10 major commodities of which we are talking in relation to the idea of a common fund, Canada has already picked one commodity for which the idea of a common fund is feasible, namely tin, and we have made clear we are ready to make a contribution. Canada is a party to the two agreements that already exist on other commodities.

The hon. member's personal view is that he favours a common fund; others would go at this for the benefit of the parties concerned, who are the Third World, commodity by commodity. Canada is willing to study any proposal that is of real interest and benefit for the Third World but not for ideological purposes only.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF MINISTER OF GREENLAND FOR DENMARK

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of the Hon. Jorgen Hansen, the Minister of Greenland for Denmark.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the last ten days I have received some extremely serious representations from literally hundreds of Quebec dairy farmers who are faced with a most serious dilemma. They have put the question seriously to me, and I put it seriously to the Minister of Agriculture today.

The Quebec farmers are facing a particular problem. It takes them years to build up a herd. They have to maintain a certain number of cows on their farm if they are going to make farm credit payments as determined by another branch of the federal government. They are literally on the horns of a disastrous dilemma. They have asked me to ask the Minister of Agriculture, as I did today, what they should do—shoot their cows, or throw their milk in the river? That was the serious question that I put today, and I think the farmers of Quebec merit an answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The failure of the minister to answer the question was not through any apparent unwillingness on his part. We have reviewed rather carefully the rules that pertain to the question period. I try not to enforce them too strictly against any member who seeks to put a serious question. However, a question ought not to be argumentative, yet not seek too general a reply. It ought not to seek advice but, rather, information; and it ought not to be a repetition of a previous question. Regrettably, the hon. member's question today suffered from all three disabilities.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, last Thursday was set aside in the House for debate on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. A lot of debate took place at that time about dairy policy. I do not know whether the hon. member was absent, but he did not participate in that debate. I do not know where he was. I also suggest to him that he go to his constituents in Brome-Missisquoi and tell them what he said in this House, namely, that I was paying the dairy farmers of Canada too much money.

SPECIALTY TRAINING FOR TREATMENT OF LETHAL DISEASES

Question No. 4,119—Mr. Robinson:

1. Do nurses volunteer to care for patients with a lethal disease when at present there are (a) no preventive measures (b) no real treatment (c) a high mortality rate (d) a high risk for health personnel and, if so, how many?

2. Can such specialty training be obtained and, if so, in what location?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The training received by all graduate nurses includes understanding of isolation techniques in providing care for patients with communicable diseases. There exists a stand-by pool of approximately 80 nurses who have undergone specialized training in isolation nursing techniques related to medical flight evacuation operations and who have volunteered to respond to any emergency in this context.

2. Specialty training in barrier techniques for nurses is available to nursing officers of National Defence from the United States Air Force. Specialty training in Canada was provided by the Emergency Health Services program in the early 1960's in conjunction with other programs of the government and the Emergency Measures Organization in response to concern over the likelihood of a nuclear attack. Since that time, the Emergency Health Services Program has assisted the provinces by providing standards, guidelines, training and education for various groups from the provinces on contingency planning in the event of natural disasters among which would be included techniques of prevention and of containment of infectious conditions.

ELIGIBILITY OF FORMER MEMBERS OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES IN PSC COMPETITIONS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 5,363—Mr. Forrestall:

Has the government or its agencies taken, in the last six months, any action to make members of the Canadian Armed Forces, formerly resident in Atlantic Canada, eligible to compete in closed competitions held by the Public Service in the Atlantic provinces without regard for the geographical or organizational limits prescribed by the competition and, if so, what was such action?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: No. The commission, under the provision of Section 13(b) of the Public Service Employment Act, is required to consider only the part of the public service and the occupational nature and level of positions in which prospective candidates must be employed at the time the closed competition is held, in order to be eligible for appointment. Therefore, former residence in a geographical area does not make a candidate eligible to compete in competitions open only to people occupying positions in that same geographical area. In the last six months, the commission has taken no action to change this requirement.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Wednesday, May 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Marke Raines (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, I have felt somewhat like Alice in Wonderland these past few weeks, listening to the debates in the House of Commons. The cry has been "Off with his head", as if that would magically solve our problems. Such a simple solution, so cavalier!

This is an awesome responsibility that we face, Mr. Speaker, and we have a duty to think things through for ourselves. You may remember, in the play "Caesar and Cleopatra," that Caesar says:

To the end of history, murder shall breed murder, always in the name of right and honour and peace, until the gods are tired of blood, and create a race that can understand.

Understanding is the key. Murder does breed murder, and violence does breed violence. These people on death row are the product of our society; and if these people have failed, our society in a measure has failed as well. Therefore, we must examine our society and discover the circumstances that led people to commit murder and other crimes, and then let us try to eliminate the causes.

I do not think we can set ourselves up to judge our fellow man so harshly that we say to anyone that they are not fit to live. If we condemn these people to death, we are telling them that there is no hope for them in this world. And who are we to take away hope? When we take away hope for them, we take away the sense of hope for us all. How do we know but that through some ironic twist of circumstance we ourselves could end up on death row, as could someone we know or love? How truly awful to be told that there is no hope for them, that they are beyond redemption. I think we had better not be too self-righteous and complacent. I think we should remind ourselves that "There but for the grace of God, go I".

I am pleased to note that all the major churches and religions are in favour of abolition of the death penalty, as are the criminologists and humanitarians. While these people may not form the majority opinion, they can take comfort from something Adlai Stevenson once said. He said that all progress has resulted from people who took unpopular positions.

As for this entire question of public opinion, it can be easily manipulated by the media and by pressure groups. We who have the personal responsibility to vote on the hanging bill cannot in conscience, simply rely on the latest poll to make our decision for us. When I sent out my own questionnaire in Burnaby-Seymour on the issue of capital punishment, only 4 per cent of the people answered the survey, most of them favouring capital punishment. One could also note that 96 per cent of the people of that riding left the decision to me. Meanwhile, the government is bringing in Bill C-83, which will introduce stronger measures to protect society.

There are those who believe capital punishment is a deterrent. According to the statistics, it is not. The lowest murder rates in the world are found in countries where capital punishment has been abolished: for example, Sweden, and in the American states of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Rhode Island and Maine. On the other hand, some of the highest murder rates are found where capital punishment is, or was, in force until recently: for instance, in France, Spain, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina and Louisiana.

The unhappy statistics of murder also disclose that most killings are the result of domestic quarrels or love triangles, crimes of passion. In Canada, for example, in a 13-year period ending in 1974 there were 4,500 murders and only 559 took place during the commission of a criminal act.

Given, then, the sudden, unplanned nature of most homicides, it appears highly unlikely that most people who commit murder take into account the threat of capital punishment before carrying out that act. In the case of criminals, they know full well that the police carry weapons, and even the danger of on-the-spot capital punishment does not serve as a deterrent. As for the argument that the cost of keeping prisoners is a financial burden to the taxpayers, I find that a ridiculous and cynical argument. One might as well argue against the high cost of trials and appeals. This argument also ignores the fact that inmates do work in prison and are paid wages lower than scale.

I believe that instead of wasting time and dwelling on this gruesome subject, debating whether or not we are going to hang those few people who are already sweating it out on death row, we should busy ourselves with examining our society and improving it. We must ask these questions of ourselves: What is there in our society that drives people to violence? Our figures show that most murders are domestic. It is probably true that, as Thoreau said, "Most men live lives of quiet desperation", but why is that so? Is it too difficult in our society today to raise a happy family? Is it too difficult in this affluent country just to make a living? Are we goaded beyond our means by the commercialism of our age? Are we teased into wanting too much? Has the crassness of the market place already placed necessities beyond the reach of many people?

Many people today are concerned about the violence, the negativism and the crime depicted in the media. I wonder, too, where are the stories of real heroes that might inspire us to new heights of achievement, such as George Washington Carver, Florence Nightingale, Wilberforce, John Stuart Mill, Mahatma Gandhi, Einstein and Schweitzer? Where are the best from other countries? We have had so much blather in the media about capital punishment and the grisly details of crime that one wonders where is the emphasis on the art of living. As Carl Jung wrote, "The art of living is the rarest and most distinguished of all the arts . . . Whoever succeeded in draining the whole cup with grace?"

Our aim should be an ideal society. You may remember Schiller writing "Only the ideal can bring humans to unity. And the ideal has as its foundation . . . knowledge". We must have the courage and honesty to look at our society critically and see where it is wanting. We could look to the happy, healthy societies in the world and see how they are achieving this. We could ask ourselves, what are our goals?

I hope this parliament, in a free vote, will vote with hope, with mercy and with confidence that we can abolish forever the barbaric custom of capital punishment. Surely, in this space age, when we have landed men on the moon and have seen miracles in so many fields of human endeavour, we do not have to retain such a medieval practice. I think it has no place in a civilized society.

As a matter of interest, I want to quote something Eugene Debs once said to a judge:

> Your Honour, years ago I recognized my kinship with all living beings . . . and I made up my mind that I was not one bit better than the meanest of the earth. I said then and I say now . . . that while there is a lower class, I am in it . . . while there is a criminal element, I am of it . . . while there is a soul in prison, I am not free—

For more than ten years parliament has been poised on the edge of full abolition. Once again the House of Commons has the opportunity to abolish a practice which deprives society of any means to rectify its mistakes; a practice which is abhorrent and which adds the suffering of innocent family members to that of the guilty.

I suggest we vote on this bill with hope for life, not hopelessness with death. I suggest we vote with confidence that we can look critically at our society and see where it is wanting and, hopefully, find our way in changing that society. If our society is indeed leading to crime, there is something very wrong with it. For our own good we must come to grips with the problem. The answer does not lie in hanging a few people to show how tough we are. Unless we come to grips honestly with the problem, I fear that, as Caesar says in the play:

> To the end of history, murder shall breed murder . . . always in the name of right and honour and peace, until the gods are tired of blood, and create a race that can understand.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by saying that my remarks during this very important debate will outline essentially my own personal views. I do, however, acknowledge with deep appreciation and thanks the heavy volume of mail I have received on the combined issue of capital punishment and peace and security. I have received the heaviest mail ever in my 3½ years in this House on these two issues.

During the current debate, about 350 individuals have let me know about their feelings on this combined issue, and none of this group is from outside my own constituency of Medicine Hat. These constituency views were contained mostly in personal letters and unsolicited petitions. I did not conduct any formal or informal poll or survey as I did on the previous capital punishment debate in 1973. I freely acknowledge that the greater number of letters dealt with the companion bill on peace and security, Bill C-83. I say this now because I was one of approximately 27 members of this House who was unable to participate in that debate because of the government's closure action.

The ratio in support of the retention of capital punishment in my constituency mail was 17 to 1. After reviewing all these constituency letters, I have decided that in addition to some very blunt comments about the specific issue, there is another, deeper and more serious message—between the lines, if you like; but it is there and it cannot be ignored. That message is one of widespread concern over the state of our nation's apparent attitudes pertaining to law and order. There is deep concern that our respect for law and order and morality has sunk to an all-time low.

These letters make it very clear that the underlying reason for a resurgence in the call for capital punishment is this deep concern over law and order in Canada today. Out of sheer desperation and concern, Canadians are saying that something must be done, that nothing has been done by this government to recognize and abate this obvious trend to national lawlessness, and a growing philosophy in the belief that maybe—just maybe—crime does pay.

Whether we agree that capital punishment can be a meaningful deterrent, my constituents are saying that until something better comes along as a deterrent, we had better bring back, in fact, capital punishment. To those of you who say that the necessary deterrence essential for proper law and order will be provided by this bill and its companion, Bill C-83, I say, very simply, it is three years too late. This government had the opportunity to do something at the time of the last capital punishment debate three years ago with respect to meaningful deterrence. The signs of social concern were plainly evident then, although not as pronounced as now. I was personally concerned about those signs and spoke of them in my first election campaign in 1972. The government's stand-pat attitude in 1973 has been an open invitation to increased crime and violence ever since.

● (1520)

What I have been saying was also expressed much more eloquently by my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) in his very thought-provoking speech in this debate as recorded on page 13219 of Hansard for May 5. I commend it to all members of this House and, indeed, to all Canadians at this time. He was so right when he pointed out that "Canada is not yet ready for total abolition" because the current climate for total abolition is wrong. We should read again and again his statement as follows:

> I cannot isolate the principle of abolition from real conditions in our country. The reality is that it is better to keep capital punishment in limited cases than to rush total abolition and diminish respect for the law... And even be prepared to preserve an inferior type of law if necessary.

There is deep concern and infuriation over the package concept of these companion bills on peace and security and capital punishment. The good features of Bill C-83, and there are certainly some, are being deliberately overlooked because of the feeling we are being bribed and coerced into accepting the total package. Suffice it to say that the two bills that make up this package amend old legislation and mix new legislation with it, in the package concept—a situation that simply invites controversy both in our debates in the House and especially at the committee stage.

Also, part of that package is the new use of the term "free vote" in this House. It is difficult to understand the rationale of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) in their repeated statements that our vote on this bill will be a free vote but that the cabinet will support the bill. For sheer double-talk and hypocrisy we should read again the Prime Minister's response to his own party member from Vancouver-Kingsway when she asked: "Will the free vote on Bill C-84 be free to the cabinet?" The Prime Minister's response was: "Mr. Speaker, a freer group of men and women still has to be found in Canada".

The rationale behind this free vote approach must surely relate to the fact that cabinet has been breaking the law every time it fails to carry out a court's decision calling for capital punishment by abusing its prerogative to grant commutation and is now taking the expedient course of changing the law that still has another year to run. Of course, this change is to be made well before the 1978 election, in the hope that the public will have forgotten these manipulations by then. I acknowledged at the beginning of these comments that my constituency mail on this issue has been very enlightening and rewarding to me, personally. In order to illustrate these "messages between the lines" in these letters from home, I would like to quote a few succinct phrases and statements from some of the mail. From Medicine Hat:

> Our governments, federally and provincially, have been handing out lollipops to criminals convicted of major crimes and are now reaping the harvest.

From a rural clergyman in southern Alberta:

> The government seems to be relying excessively on prisons, more and more of them. If hanging be not a deterrent, neither is imprisonment. Our prison system is almost universally acknowledged a failure and yet we are rapidly expanding it... The whole approach is topsy-turvy. It is like combating lung cancer by doing nothing except removing diseased lungs. How much better it is to get people not to smoke. It may be difficult to persuade them, and some will not listen, but the effort must be made. The federal government seems to do very little to persuade people to avoid contracting the cancer of crime.

From Cardston, Alberta:

> Omnibus bills are a tool of government whereby members may be pressured into supporting "package" legislation, almost inevitably compromising their position on at least part of the package.

From Bow Island, Alberta:

> Further, I would urge that all people receiving a jail sentence should be required to produce or work to pay for the expenses incurred.

From Turin, Alberta:

> An honest man has nothing to fear about capital punishment.

As a layman in matters relating to religion, but as one who considers himself a practical Christian, firmly believing in the moral and spiritual rights of each of us as individuals, I continue to be amazed, and indeed sometimes confused, about two features of this aspect of the debate. First, the frequent and very genuine references to the Bible in support of either side of this emotional debate. There are literally dozens of quotes available for this purpose. Most of the retentionist quotes are from the Old Testament, while the abolitionist support is from the New Testament. Second, I have the feeling that most abolitionists seem to assume that we retentionists cannot possibly be following the exercise of our personal conscience, whereas abolitionists are truly following their own personal conscience.

I know I will have to disagree with many of my close personal friends, and even relatives, on this issue. While I am pleased, and even obligated, to hear the views of all my constituents where possible, I do not in any way attempt to persuade others to agree with me. I have been known to try to convince others of my viewpoint on other issues, such as our national beef cattle situation, or our local Suffield issue in Medicine Hat—but not on this one. My personal decision on this capital punishment bill will be the most serious, soul-searching decision I have ever been called on to make as a member of this House.

Before leaving this portion of my comments, it seems appropriate to express the feeling that surely it is time for the CBC to cease using that background picture of the hangman's noose on the national TV news when a government news item appears on capital punishment. I am certain I have support for this from other members. I certainly have it from my constituents' letters. Of the many references that all members of parliament have received, I wish to quote briefly from only two. The first is from the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada, with reference to the Solicitor General's view on deterrence:

> What the Solicitor General says may be true of some irrational people. But we believe that capital punishment by due process of law, for calculated premeditated murder by any rational person, does have a deterrent.

There is a further quotation from the Pentecostal group:

● (1530)

> We believe also, in principle, that the use of executive clemency by governor in council was a bad practice because, in effect, it made the cabinet rehear the case, and for all practical purposes, constitute another court.

The second author I wish to quote is Dr. Fattah, from Simon Fraser University, who predicts the practical results that could follow the implementation of Bill C-84 if the bill passes. I will paraphrase his suggestions. He states that, first, a considerable number of cases of first-degree murder will be reduced to second-degree. Second, acquittal rates in cases of first-degree murder will be very high, and third, a large number of first-degree murder cases will end with the jury handing out a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity. Finally, I should like to quote the following statement of Dr. Fattah:

> I still remember back in January of 1973, when Marcel Prud'homme, MP for Montreal, Saint-Denis, and James Fleming, MP for York West, suggested that the government bill be amended to imprison killers for a minimum of 25 years. Solicitor General Allmand and other members of the cabinet were the first to declare their opposition. It is disconcerting and disenchanting to see the government, after only three years, adopt the same retrogressive suggestion it once condemned.

I can only add that I can certainly associate myself with these appropriate quotations. In my opening comments I made reference to our concern for the lack of respect for law and order in our society today. Those of us in the Medicine Hat-Redcliff community, including the immediate rural area, have a very special reason to be concerned.

I want to refer very briefly to a terrible tragedy that occurred on August 22, 1974, when a young, 17-year old service station employee was brutally murdered while on duty during the late night hours. Three young hitchhikers robbed the service station of $123.60 and in the process murdered the young attendant by using a mechanic's hammer in a brutal fashion. No firearms were used, but drugs and alcohol were definitely involved. Two of the three young criminals were also involved in an earlier murder in the St. Catharines area that had been committed prior to the Medicine Hat tragedy. Again, no firearms were involved.

I am sure that our Medicine Hat citizens are still asking themselves, "Do we need to have tragedies like this to establish the need for comprehensive and practical law and order guidelines?" As Canadians we have become overly complacent about crime, especially so-called petty crimes. Why should we have to have almost nightly break-ins and robberies in a small city such as Medicine Hat, sometimes as many as eight or ten in a single night? It has been suggested that perhaps many of us no longer believe in evil, only in error or accident. Why are most, if not all, of the current polls so heavily in favour of the retention of capital punishment? Surely it has to be because of this very state of lawlessness in our Canadian society about which I am so concerned.

I should like to conclude by drawing the attention of the House to the sentiments expressed by my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), when he received one of the biggest responses for a one-liner at our recent leadership convention, which is as follows:

> Imagine a Canada in which justice reflects the realities of the public will. Whose rights need the greater protection, the criminals' or their victims?
> The rights of the victims of crime must be paramount in our system.

In the final analysis, Mr. Speaker, I cannot support this bill to abolish capital punishment in Canada.

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity this afternoon to speak in this debate. The issue being debated this afternoon is more involved than the isolated decision to retain or to abolish capital punishment. Canada still has to face a whole complex of questions about the reform of corrections, parole and rehabilitation. The bill that is now before us in parliament to extend the suspension of the death penalty treats, in an isolated way, a problem which is connected with these many other problems.

I come from an almost completely God-loving community; I have listened to and read what my constituents have to say, and I think that they have said many things. But, most importantly, they have in some way repeated what has been stated by many of our church authorities. I would like to convey to you the statement of Bishop W. E. Power, president of the Canadian Catholic Conference, who says:

> We consider it an illegitimate use of the Bible, especially the Old Testament, to quote texts in order to argue, in our time, for the retention of the death penalty. Each biblical text supporting the death penalty must be studied in the light of its historical context, and not simply applied to present-day Canada. Furthermore, each such Old Testament text must be weighed against many passages in the New Testament where Jesus constantly rejects the normal human tendency to redress injury by injury and calls instead for generosity. He established the norm that violence and hostility are not corrected by countermeasures of violence and hostility.

I have listened to many hon. members, both the retentionists and abolitionists, and I am convinced that nothing new has been said to change my mind in any way. The question of the death penalty ought not to focus on whether a convicted murderer, no matter how wanton, deserves to die. The focus should be on us: Should Canadians, as a community, try to break the escalating spiral of violence by refraining from violence, the same violence that some profess will serve as a deterrent? The Canadian Catholic Conference goes on to say:

> To a Christian, whose starting point is reverence for the sanctity of life, the death penalty can surely be only a desperate resort. A Christian must be utterly convinced of its social necessity before supporting it. Our society, it is true, has traditionally exacted the death penalty. But this ought not to mean, as it often seems, that those who favour suspension must bear the burden of proof. On the contrary, those who favour retention should be required to convince a Christian of its necessity.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, along with many others, that we would investigate further and establish research committees to make an exhaustive study of all the ramifications of this complex problem and then publish these reports within a specified period. As one who three weeks after he was elected witnessed a murder, a shooting of three innocent people, and as one who held the body of the murdered man in his arms, I realized that I was a firm believer in the reverence and the sanctity of life.

● (1540)

I am rather inclined to agree with our Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) who said that capital punishment is not only ineffective but also immoral, and who listed the following alternatives which I feel are worth repeating here. There should be better trained, better deployed and better equipped policemen; effective gun control; proactive, rather than reactive, police work; more effective correctional programs for juveniles and adults; more effective social and economic programs to remove the causes of crime; improved treatment for alcoholics and drug addicts; improved education and recreation programs; possible restrictions on the showing of violence on television and through other media; and measures to promote respect for legitimate authority in the home, the school, the church, community associations, and government.

I think we had better return to family life basics and to the great respect which some of our ethnic communities demonstrate toward family life and toward the reverence for the sanctity of life. I think we must return to the three "R's—Reverence, Respect" and, most importantly, the "Right to Life."

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to participate in this very profound debate. I am inclined to agree with our Solicitor General and our government that if these and other measures I have mentioned were pursued with more vigour, we would do much more to lower our crime rate than if we merely emphasized the application of harsh penalties after the fact.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to the House that this is a completely needless debate. There is legislation on the statute books at this very moment which will not expire for another three or four years. I can see no reason whatever for having this debate today. An experiment is in progress. When we voted the last time, we were told that an experiment was to take place. The government has prejudged the outcome of this experiment and has decided, in its own wisdom, that the experiment was a failure, and we are being asked to write off the experiment and abolish the death penalty. This is a needless debate. Never in my life have I seen anything more needless than this particular piece of legislation.

Mr. MacFarlane: Why speak on it, then?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am speaking on it because it needs to be drawn to the attention of the public that it is needless. It is a diversion to take the minds of the public off the serious things which are going on in this country and the failure of this government to deal with our economic problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): How can this government trot out data and conclusions, which is done through the auspices of a pet professor of the government by the name of Fattah, to prove that the experiment has been a failure? It is presumptuous on the part of the government, and on top of that, it is very unscientific. Therefore, I conclude that this is a needless debate. It is diversionary, bearing in mind the legislation which is already on the books, and it is meant to draw attention away from the economic ills which beset this country and to lull those who are really concerned about the failure of law and order in this country, for which this government must take a very large responsibility, and particularly those who are living alone on fixed incomes and who are worried about the economic problems. It is a complete fraud.

It is a cynical misuse of the time of this House to suggest that we must approve this bill before we are allowed out of this House at the end of next month. Are we going to accept that sort of blackmail? That is what it is. There is legislation on the books now. Why should we be subjected to blackmail at this particular time? Why now? Why the rush? Why this bill?

Not for one minute do I believe that this government, which is bringing forward this needless legislation and trying to rush it through, is motivated in this effort by any of the stirrings of philosophic concern for human beings. The motivations of this government are entirely cynical in this as in many other of its activities. Why now? Why the rush? Why do we have to pass this bill before the end of June, when there is legislation already on the books? It is just to obscure the economic problems besetting this country. It is just to obfuscate.

If there were any true and purely philosophical motivations, why should the government not be concerned about the law-abiding and those who respect the law, rather than pretending that it is moved by the poor, unfortunate, misguided criminal?

If such, indeed, is the motivation of the government, why does it delay so long in sorting out the good from the bad; the recoverable from those who cannot be rehabilitated amongst inmates? This is where the problem lies. This is where the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) should be directing his attention—not to wasting the time of this House on needless legislation such as the legislation he has brought forward. Why allow the prisoners in this country to convert prisons into post-graduate institutions where inmates can be instructed on how to beat the law? That is what our prisons have been turned into. Prisoners learn how to pick locks, how to make ice picks and how to hold hostages. Young offenders, through some error, have landed up in some of our penal institutions and are being faced with this sort of deadbeat, the inmate who cannot be rehabilitated. Once the young offender has lapsed once and gets into the hands of those old cons, he is finished; he becomes a criminal for life. This is where rehabilitation should take place.

This bill is not only a needless bit of legislation, but it is bad, bad, and I intend to vote against it. There are certain special aspects to this legislation, however, with which I would like to deal. I could start on page 1 of the bill and go through it seriatim, page by page, but I am going to confine myself to two or three aspects. I would like to deal with the proposal of this government to remove treason as one of the crimes punishable by death. The Encyclopedia Britannica talks of treason in this way:

> The law which punishes treason is a necessary consequence of the idea of a state and is essential to the existence of the state.

If there is no law protecting the state against treason, I submit our state is in trouble. In Roman law, the crime of treason was next in gravity to sacrilege, and if it was so serious, and if it is so serious—and I think it is—should it not be punishable by the ultimate penalty? Since by custom and tradition cases of treason are justiciable by special processes, the seriousness of the felony is amply marked. It is a serious crime, and in clause 2 the government proposes to dispose of it and consider that anyone who has committed treason will be subject to life imprisonment rather than the ultimate penalty.

● (1550)

I find it inexplicable that the government should seek to eliminate the death penalty for treason, whether it be against a head of state, a monarch, a sovereign or the forcible overthrow of government. If there is no deterrent to forestall treasonable acts—that is, attacks on our institutions with the object of destroying them—then what motivation is there to make us want to defend those institutions? This is the problem that this government has not faced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Surely these concepts mirror one another: the existence of one determining the existence of the other, just as the absence of a deterrent predetermines the absence of motivation. If I do not hold dear my democratic institutions, be they persons or functional organizations, such as the one in which I proudly speak today and condemn to the ultimate penalty anyone who ventures to deprive me of them, how can I be expected to defend those same institutions with my life, as many of us in this House did 30 and more years ago?

What sort of mentality can draft such legislation? Perhaps I should ask: What sort of mentality can insist that such legislation be drafted? I am not blaming the drafters, but those who instruct the drafters to put this sort of legislation before us. Is no one on that side of the House who supports this bill prepared to defend with his life those very institutions in which we are permitted to discuss this matter freely and openly? Well, I am. Is everyone prepared to tolerate the violent overthrow of those institutions without lifting a finger? Well, I'm not. The death penalty should certainly be imposed upon those who commit treason against the head of state, against those who wage war against this country or assist others in doing so, or who use force—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): —to overthrow the government, or who commit any other of the incidental treasonable acts outlined in sections 46 and 47 of the Criminal Code. If we remove that ultimate penalty, Mr. Speaker, we will have filleted our nation—we will have removed its backbone and removed from our citizens the will to stand up and defend our way of life when it is threatened. Is that what this government wants? I sometimes think they do.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Is that what the people of Canada want? I do not think it is. If our democratic system and its institutions are not worth the life of someone who attacks them, they can hardly be worth my life to defend them. Then where are we? Is that the message this government is seeking to get across to the nation through this bill? That is what it looks like to me.

This notion should not be pushed aside as if such things could not happen here. They have happened in other states and I, for one, am not prepared to let them happen here. I hope I am not alone.

An hon. Member: You are.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Someone said I am alone. I am alone. I shall have to stand up and defend this by myself? Shame on anyone who should say such a thing. Let me remind hon. members—

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Capital Punishment

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) on a point of order.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): If the cap fits, he can put it on.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I am not rising on a point of order, but I should like to know if the hon. member would permit a question at this time?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): When I have finished my speech. The cap, quite obviously, fits.

An hon. Member: When you get Cafik, you are really hitting home.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): All it would take is for a head of government to assert the right of both making and insisting on enforcing the law, as Blackstone has said; whereas we, here, insist upon a clear division between the legislative and executive branches of government. When the same authority both makes and enforces the law, we are in real trouble. That is how simple it would be, Mr. Speaker. Are hon. members prepared to let that happen without lifting a finger? Well, I'm not.

I sometimes wonder whether members on the other side have even read this bill. They have been talking about the noose and all that sort of stuff that gets people worked up emotionally. I am not talking about the noose. I am talking about the death penalty—the penalty of death for doing something very, very seriously wrong, like treason. I do not care how the execution takes place, but there are crimes which deserve that sort of penalty, and I think treason is one of them. I recommend to members on that side of the House that they read clauses 2 and 3 of this bill. Then, if they are prepared to move some amendments, I will have another look at it.

Has everyone on that side of the House who supports this bill so little commitment to our traditional, democratic way of governing ourselves that he is prepared to stand by and watch any petty tyrant or demagogue come along and assume all legislative and executive powers of government without protest? That is fine if he is, but I'm not. This bill, Mr. Speaker, proposes wrong law—law that I certainly am not able to justify or to explain. I shall therefore oppose it.

Clause 3 is equally wrong—piracy, presumably including the hijacking of people and aircraft. Where there is loss of life, the punishment would be life imprisonment. Under the terms of Bill C-83 which is now before the committee, that would mean a term of something like 15 years. Never, Mr. Speaker! Piracy is a serious act. At the weekend we heard what happened in the Philippines when an aircraft was hijacked. Are we just going to say, "You should not do that; you had better go to prison?" In light of the experience of the last two or three years, how can we say that people will stay in prison and not be paroled after 15 years? For piracy to be expunged as a crime liable to the death penalty is completely beyond the realm of reason. Piracy is piracy and if a life is lost, death is the obvious and only penalty.

The same should be true of kidnapping when a life is lost, Mr. Speaker. That would include rape, bearing in mind the Latin origin of the word. It means "taking away", "taking off", "carrying away". If, in the course of that act of assault, there is a loss of life, to my mind it should be punishable by death. The French term for "rape" is so much more accurate—"le viol". It is "a violation". Our word "rape" is completely misleading in this context. I say that kidnapping, including capture and forcible holding of a female in the course of which the death of the victim occurs, also deserves the death penalty.

Section 214 of the Criminal Code is the focus of much attention in the present debate. It concerns the penalty for killing a policeman or prison guard. A colleague, I think with good cause, has proposed that we should amend this bill by inserting a provision to this effect: if a man convicted of a capital offence should, during a fracas in prison or during an attempt to escape, say, cause the death of a prison guard or policeman, the death penalty should become operative, but only then.

● (1600)

In other words, the death penalty would apply to a person who, having been convicted of first degree murder which would be punishable by life imprisonment, tries to break out, let us say, and causes the death of a policeman or prison guard. That provision would be a deterrent. The hon. member is to be commended for bringing forward the point. I say, let us include it in the bill. But I see no reason to remove the death penalty entirely. Leave it for those cases to which it now applies and for the additional ones suggested, because some people attempting to break out or to create a disturbance may not be in prison for the crime of first-degree murder. I would prefer to see sections 218(1) to (4) remain on the statute books as they are. They should not be considered as experimental provisions but as formal points of our law.

I have not dealt with the other proposed sections which redefine murder as first and second-degree murder; one of those offences would be punishable by a long sentence of imprisonment, with provision for parole after a certain period of sentence has elapsed. I suggest, as I suggested at the beginning, that this legislation is wrong. It is diversionary. There is no need for it at present. We are being asked to spend time considering this legislation rather than considering important economic questions which confront our elderly and those on fixed incomes. By acting in this fashion, the government is being dishonest with parliament and the Canadian people.

I propose to stand up when the time comes and vote against the bill. As far as I am concerned, the time need not come before the end of June. The bill could be voted on at any time in the next three years. There is no need at all to vote on the bill now.

Mr. Stollery: Why three years from now?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Three years from now, when the experiment is over.

Mr. Stollery: It has been over for years.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Do not prejudge the experiment, and do not hire "pet" professors to prove the experiment has failed, in an attempt to convince the Canadian people. They are not convinced. They are convinced to the contrary.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Mr. Alexander: They are convinced that it is high time to get rid of this government.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That is right. By bringing forward this legislation, the government is going about that in the right way. It is my feeling that by bringing forward this phoney, untimely, needless legislation, the government is doing the right thing to defeat itself. I propose to oppose this bill when the vote comes.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member accept a question or two?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about a point the hon. member raised in the latter part of his speech. He suggested, or seemed to think, that only members on my side of the House will vote in favour of this legislation. I ask him if he is not aware that there is to be a free vote on it, and that members on all sides of the House will be free to vote either for or against this bill?

My second point concerns a remark he made in the early part of his speech. He talked about the proper motivation on the part of those who would support this bill. I ask if he does not feel that a presumption of good will and proper motivation on both sides of the argument is necessary, indeed essential, if the subject matter we are considering is to be debated intelligently? When the hon. member attacks people individually and collectively and does not deal with the substantive issue before this House, it is difficult for anyone listening to the style and manner of his speech to consider this subject objectively.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, if I may answer the first question concerning the free vote, it is apparent to me, if not to the hon. member, that there is to be a free vote on my side of the House. But when members of the government say, "I may have to resign," meaning if the bill is defeated, I do not feel that there is to be a free vote opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): As for motivation and good will, I accuse no individual. I was speaking generally. I think the question of motivation ought to be considered in light of the law now on the statute books. I made it clear that the experimental period has not elapsed. We are entitled to wonder why, when the experimental period for retention has not expired, the government should decide now, a few weeks before the summer recess, to "blackmail" us. That is the appropriate word. Why should it blackmail us to carry on this debate when there are other more important matters we ought to debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the beginning of my remarks, concerning capital punishment that I respect the opinion of those supporting the bill.

My comments will be very brief. The society has rights, for instance the right to protect itself against those willing to destroy it or destroy some individuals who are part of it. I would like to stress that I used the word "protect" and not "revenge". In this bill, I see nothing indicating convincingly that by abolishing capital punishment we could, with the sentence increased to 25 years of imprisonment, prevent some individuals from committing one or several murders. On the contrary, extending the penalty to 25 years' imprisonment clearly indicates that the offence must be related to the punishment, in the minds of those who have drafted this legislation.

Many references have been made to rehabilitation during this debate especially in relation to crime offenders. I would like to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that as long as all segments of our society do not feel protected by a just and fair law, there cannot be rehabilitation. This means changes in our social structure, better administration of justice, specialized prevention training for police forces and jail wardens, a review of parole and a rehabilitation plan for those who can still be reclaimed. I must also mention a compensation plan for victims, a review of appeal procedure against the death sentence, whenever the jury has recommended leniency. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the final ruling should be heard, not in the way it is done in Cabinet, but before three Supreme Court justices.

I would like to point out that the best way to reduce crime and have an adequate penal system is certainly to increase the opportunity for the guilty party to be brought to court and sentenced to a penalty which includes capital punishment for premeditated murder. For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, having stated I would be brief, I shall only repeat very clearly that I intend to vote against this bill, that is for the retention of capital punishment for premeditated murder.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of the bill before us was considered in 1961, 1966, 1967, and 1973. Each time it was lengthily and strongly debated, and those who participated expressed contradictory opinions and, until now, we are continuing the same experience because the matter is very controversial.

At any stage of the voting, each member will have to take his responsibilities, for this is a free vote, whatever may think some members of the official opposition. Such particularity implies that the member has an individual role to play and that the line of the party gives way to the voice of the conscience and to the constituents' interest, that is to say that the member votes according to his own assessment of the matter.

First, it is important to place the debate in its general contemporary context. We must above all forget the out-of-date concepts of the death penalty and consider the problem in the light of present perspectives. First of all, it is essential to abandon the ancient law of retaliation, retribution of an eye for an eye through vengeful punishment.

Ideas, customs and needs of the criminal policy have been changing with time. The problem must therefore be approached in a state of mind adapted to the circumstances of our times. It is not useless, therefore, to recall that Canadian criminal law has made substantial progress in this regard. Is there need to point out some effects of the 1961 act in this field? Since that time, capital punishment has been eliminated for many categories of murders, and remains applicable only in the case of qualified murder, and even then the jury may recommend clemency or leniency if they feel this is warranted by the circumstances. Moreover, the 1961 legislation provides for an automatic revision of the case by an appeal court, particularly with regard to questions of law, propriety of procedure and facts. The convicted person is thus given the right to appeal to the Supreme Court. Whether the murderer is rich or poor, his or her case can thus be brought before the highest tribunal in the land without prior authorization. Finally, since 1961, no person under 18 can be given a death sentence. It can therefore be said that in this field, Canadian criminal law has become more humane and that the death penalty is practically brought upon particularly odious criminals only.

Our conception of this punishment and its finality has obviously changed. It is now out of question to impose punishment on the criminal without caring about his rehabilitation merely to set a terrifying example for the citizens. Whatever opinion we have on that subject, we all agree that we should render an offender harmless through reform. Everytime it is possible and not through sheer suppression, everytime circumstances allow it, we must try to rehabilitate the criminal and bring back a social being who can live and be a useful member in society. Having said that, there certainly are convicted criminals who cannot be amended, rehabilitated or socially recuperated and who will finally remain a danger for the community.

It is under that aspect of danger and real necessity that capital punishment must be considered, that is to eliminate once and for all a deadly risk. Capital punishment nowadays should not be considered as a "vindictive torture" but as a "means of defence", an ultimate means to protect the society. It is therefore a matter of social protection by preventing killing and, if necessary, by eliminating beings who are essentially antisocial and a permanent risk for the community. Those who favour abolition of capital punishment put forward various arguments but I want to consider only a few of them.

First, some abolitionists question the state's right to take the life of a citizen. For sure, this debate concerns not only the political concept one may have of the state, but also the religious convictions of every individual. Without starting a philosophical debate, let us say that in Canada nothing takes away such a power from the federal government. Under the constitution, criminal law comes under federal jurisdiction and, furthermore, pursuant to section 91 of the British North America Act, Parliament has the necessary authority to make laws for the maintenance of peace, order and good government of Canada. Thus, the government has not only the power but also the duty to protect the common good and, to that end, it must take all the necessary steps to ensure the security of all citizens and to protect the lives of innocent people.

When the problem is viewed from the angle of the protection of society and the defence of the community, it seems hardly possible to question the right of the state to eliminate dangerous and hopeless individuals once and for all. When dealing with some particularly infamous criminal, does the state not have the right to resort to any measure, if necessary, to the most drastic, in order to protect the rest of society, particularly prison staff and other inmates? It is also to spare the lives of prison staff, of citizens in general, and possibly of some members of the community in case of an invasion, for example, that the state must, in certain cases, eliminate the individual who is a threat to society. Is it not also under this duty that the state must protect the common good and ensure the security of the country by declaring war at times?

How can we challenge the state's right to take the life of a dangerous criminal when it has the right to demand from the citizens any sacrifice necessary for the protection of society and the defence of the country? The state can compel soldiers to give their lives for the safety of the country. So why could it not, in order to attain an end of the same order, resort to the death penalty? In some cases, the duty to take the life of an individual is no more unethical than the duty to kill in times of war or in cases of self-defence. By the way, the death penalty is the self-defence of society and the protection of its members. Even the Canadian Catholic Conference, that is the Assembly of Catholic Bishops of Canada, in a recent release, in recommending the abolition of capital punishment on humane grounds, recognized the state certain rights in this area, and I quote:

● (1620)

This stand taken by the bishops does not deny the state the right to impose capital punishment if circumstances were to demand it, nor is it intended to bind every Christian in his personal opinion on this subject.

Here is what His Holiness Pope Pius XXII stated in 1952 with respect to the rights of the state in the matter of capital punishment, and I quote:

It is the prerogative of the political power to deprive the convict of the blessing of life in atonement for his sin, when, through his crime, he lost the right to live.

Second, some abolitionists believe that capital punishment does not deter anyone from committing a crime or has hardly a deterrent effect on him, and that life imprisonment is equally effective. In our society, Mr. Speaker, opinions are divided on the deterrent effect of capital punishment on murderers. I do not think one can use statistics in support of an argument. Statistics are subject to various interpretations and are uncertain. It is nearly impossible to make a useful comparison between countries because of the differences in the legal definition of crimes, legal procedures and court practices, methods used to compile crime statistics, morality standards, and finally political and economical and social conditions. Those are data that defy any valid assessment.

Strict enforcement of the death penalty certainly does not prevent the perpetration of all deliberate murders. In fact, murderers rely on their guile to escape either the police or a conviction for lack of sufficient evidence. Hence, the care they take to escape pursuit. Caught in the act they shoot down the policemen who want to arrest them. In the expectation of criminal prosecution, they do not hesitate in some cases to murder witnesses who would lead to their conviction. This is an indication of the terrible fear they have of capital punishment. As a matter of fact, all punishments are exemplary. We do not park our car in a no-parking zone because we fear getting a ticket. If all punishments are designed to intimidate the offender—and they do have this result to a large extent—how in Heavens would capital punishment, the harshest of all, miss its goal?

It is perhaps difficult to establish the relationship between capital punishment and crime. However, obviously the concept of this extreme retribution remains closely related to that of some barbarous and abominable crimes. This severeness of punishment concept has undoubtedly been deep rooted in people's mind for generations, and commonsense dictates that no threat other than that of losing one's life would deter a potential criminal from perpetrating a murder.

Moreover, the Senate and House of Commons Joint Committee on Capital Punishment stated in its 1956 report, and I quote:

The law enforcement authorities consider that capital punishment is an effective deterrent to crime, particularly as it prevents professional criminals from using guns and committing violent offences. Capital punishment protects the police forces in so far as a criminal who wants to escape arrest would fear to a lesser extent the consequences of using firearms or resorting to violence if capital punishment did not exist.

Certainly you will be told that this did not prevent policemen and prison guards from being murdered.

Mr. Speaker, capital punishment no longer exists in Canada since 1962, when a death sentence was executed for the last time in this country. Since the current law on capital punishment went into force, 36 police officers and prison guards were killed. Every death sentence for capital murder has been commuted to life imprisonment by the Cabinet. This in certain cases means less than 15 years imprisonment or waiting for Parliament to decide on this legislation.

The third point I would like to make concerns the danger that an innocent be executed following a judicial errror. This is a possibility, but how very remote and problematical. Very few convincing cases can be referred to, because the fact that someone admits to commiting a crime for which someone else has been punished is not sufficient proof that the latter was innocent.

On the possibility of error, on June 27, 1956, the Commons and Senate Joint Committee on Capital Punishment had this to say, as appears on page 60, paragraph 60, of the White Paper on Capital Punishment, and I quote:

Considerable emphasis was put on the risk of irrevocable error in capital convictions. The fact that there was no known Canadian instance of the execution of an innocent person indicated the effectiveness of present procedures by way of trial and executive review and this suggests that the risk of error does not present a reasonable argument for abolition in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, since that report was published, there has been a reinforcement of safeguards against possible execution of innocent people, through Criminal Code and judicial procedure reforms, which practically eliminated any possibility of an error on facts. The death sentence is not given on simple circumstantial evidence any more. Appeal is mandatory up to and including the Supreme Court, which allows the higher courts to review every case and find any minor flow in the Crown's evidence. Then must follow an exhaustive review by the Solicitor General and finally by the Cabinet, and the Cabinet can always use its right to commute a death penalty. It is evident that in all those phases, the least doubt must necessarily be considered in favour of the accused. We already exempt from the death penalty those who kill in a fit of passion, jealousy or anger. We give special consideration in certain cases, for instance a man who is overly nervous and mortally wounds the police officer who tries to capture him.

Mr. Speaker, when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) pointed out that in 1966 there was a miscarriage of justice, he mentioned the United States and England but could not refer to a single case in Canada. Mr. Speaker, the present act has been in force since December 29, 1967 and in 1973 it was extended for another five year period for several reasons, particularly, that a longer period would give the authorities better statistical data.

Now the government has introduced in Parliament Bill C-84 to amend the Criminal Code as regards murder and certain other serious offences, which would replace capital punishment for premeditated murder by life imprisonment. That means in certain cases 25 years imprisonment, but in other cases, after having served 15 years, after being convicted, the inmate could file an application to serve less time before being eligible for parole. I remember that in 1973 an amendment was presented to replace capital punishment by 25 years imprisonment. Mr. Speaker, as concerns such an amendment, members of Parliament, association spokesmen and individuals told us that emprisonment for such a long period is more inhuman than capital punishment itself. To further support this argument, I would like to quote a few excerpts from various newspapers following the announcement of the new peace and security legislation.

On February 25, 1976, the Montreal Start published an editorial which read, and I quote:

> By filling up prisons with men sentenced to endless penalties, we are sure to transform these men in time-bombs and to expose prison personnel to a terrible danger.

Mr. Normand Caron, general director of the Human Rights League, stated, and I quote from the newspaper La Presse of February 26, 1976:

> These new amendments can only lead to even more desperate people who will not hesitate to attempt an escape faced with a hopeless future.

On the same day and in the same newspaper, the Association of Social Workers gave the following warning in a press release:

> We realize that the public must be better protected against criminals, but we do not believe that longer prison sentences are the answer to this problem. In fact, we have every reason to believe that such sentences would only make the problem worse.

Mr. Speaker, while recognizing that many people would like capital punishment to disappear, even more people support and accept it. This support reflects the aversion of the public for murder, the worst of crimes. Moreover, we recognize that public hatred for murder reflects a traditional attitude resulting from the fact that the death penalty is reserved for this crime in particular.

The abolition of the penalty considered traditionally as a fair and effective deterrent could only be recommended if there was clear evidence that the ordinary citizen believes this penalty to be clearly ineffective. The experience of the authorities shows that abolition of the death penalty when the public strongly favours its retention can cause confusion and doubt, which can have disastrous effects on the administration of justice.

Mr. Speaker, I said in 1973 and I repeat it with more emphasis today that at a time when the state has much to do to control crime, we should be more concerned about protecting society rather than the criminal. There are reasons to believe that the death penalty is a deterrent against armed robbery and the abolition of the death penalty could be interpreted by those who disregard the law as a signal to commit other criminal acts.

At the beginning of my comments, Mr. Speaker, I said that each member should make his own decision, since it is a free vote. This is why I for one cannot support this legislation because I am absolutely convinced that the fear of a violent death has an intimidating effect and is the only deterrent to prevent murder.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we all advocate the same objectives which is to provide more protection and better security to the public, but it is possible that we do not consider the same means.

● (1630)

[English]

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, the current wisdom is that parliament will pass Bill C-84 and thus abolish capital punishment, though probably by a very narrow majority. At the same time, sir, it is readily apparent that no issue in recent years has so aroused the Canadian public, the vast majority of whom, according to most indicators, favour retention. How can this apparent contradiction between the views of parliamentarians and those of the electorate be explained? Paradoxically, I believe it is probably because we are each talking and thinking about different things; some about deterrence and others about appropriate punishment. The latter consideration has been neglected by both sides, and probably to the detriment of each.

Those who oppose capital punishment tell us, correctly, that there is no conclusive evidence which demonstrates that the fear of death or the supreme penalty inhibits the potential murderer from killing. Abolitionists also argue the fact that some murderers have proven to be easier to rehabilitate than other types of criminals—and it is obviously true that you cannot rehabilitate a man after you have hanged him.

Such arguments would be entirely valid if those who sought to retain capital punishment wanted it to apply in all murder cases and if they based their argument on deterrence alone. Retentionists differ on the criteria they would apply in deciding when capital punishment is appropriate—although premeditated murder, or, in other words, murder for hire and the murder of police and prison guards are cited most frequently. However, most retentionists do not advocate supreme penalty for unpremeditated family murders, crimes of passion or murders committed because of quarrels among erstwhile friends. It is noteworthy that crimes of this type constitute by far the largest proportion of murders committed in this and other countries.

The retentionists accept, or I presume most do, that capital punishment would not be an effective deterrent in cases of this second type of murder. Moreover, I contend they believe that this type of crime, while reprehensible, is less vicious than those I enumerated first, in that with respect to the first group of murderers the retentionist believes, not only that on some occasions the fear of being hanged will have the desired deterrent effect but that, even if it does not, capital punishment is the just punishment for the perpetrators of such crimes. If a person schemes, without extenuating circumstances of any kind, to deprive another person of his life for his own personal gain, then he deserves to receive the maximum penalty possible for his own iniquities.

We should, it is true, consider all diminutions of responsibility and all mitigating circumstances in determining the appropriate penalty. Hence, when there is full responsibility and no mitigating circumstances, the criminal should be treated with the full force of the law. Justice requires that punishment should fit the crime and the criminal. To be sure, there is no more fitting punishment than death for the person who plans to kill his business partner for financial gain. On the other hand, if we discover that the victim was having an affair with his murderer's spouse, we will agree that there are mitigating circumstances. It is precisely when there are no such circumstances that the death penalty for such crime becomes appropriate.

In order to persuade parliamentarians and the public to support the abolition of capital punishment, the government has introduced a punitive bill on prison sentences for murderers which will do little either to make society safer or to improve the quality of justice. The mandatory sentence to be served for first-degree murder is to be 25 years, and ten years for second-degree murder. When, and if, the cynical manoeuvring implicit in trading-off supposedly tougher laws regarding sentencing of murderers in return for the abolition of capital punishment ceases, then abolition will become more feasible. I say, with respect, sir, that there should be no trade-offs involving matters such as these.

The two main aspects of this bill contain contradictory principles, and as a result this legislation is offensive to retentionists and abolitionists alike. There are two questions involved in this bill, and I can see no reason that we cannot discuss them separately, based on their own respective merits. Let us consider, for example, the case of a 45-year old man convicted of first-degree murder. Under the presently proposed legislation, he will be incarcerated until he is 70 years of age. He has no incentive to improve; he is a constant escapee threat, notwithstanding the higher penalties for attempted escape, and a continuing danger to guards and other prisoners. But if the abolitionists are right, as I believe they are, that murderers without previous criminal records are among the easiest to rehabilitate, and if the criminal has not committed the kind of crime of the type I enumerated a few minutes ago, then to incarcerate such a man or person for 25 years is in itself a denial of justice. Here is a man who could probably contribute something to society, and our proposed new law would deny that possibility. Moreover, the government's negligible efforts at rehabilitation make the possibility of further rehabilitation more unlikely, even if the period of incarceration was lengthened.

The ten-year mandatory sentence for second-degree murder, with the judge's option of an extension of this sentence to 25 years, is probably even worse. Take, for another example, the case of a woman who killed her husband intentionally in a fit of anger because he was constantly beating her and her children, or gambling and drinking away the family income. While we would scarcely consider such behaviour acceptable, it is doubtful that most people would consider it appropriate if she was incarcerated for a minimum of ten years. In each case, I believe the punishment should be determined by the specific circumstances of the crime and the previous record of the criminal. The proposed new legislation denies us the right to such elementary justice and, incidentally, casts doubt on the statement of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) when he speaks of his dedication to a more civilized society.

I believe, strongly, in more judicial discretion and not in tying the hands of our judges with mandatory sentences, which in many cases could be exercised by people without any judicial training whatsoever and which, unfortunately, is becoming more and more a trend in our criminal jurisprudence; that is to say, taking away the right of the judge to decide in individual cases that which is right and appropriate and denying to society and those who appear before him the conscientious deliberation of one of those people in our society whose only mandate is to do the right thing.

The consequence of the proposed new law, if passed, will not merely be that capital punishment will be abolished, but that there will be much less true justice for those who are incarcerated. Moreover, the very real possibility exists that juries will refuse to convict when a minimum sentence seems too excessive.

Should members of parliament abolish capital punishment when its retention is desired by a majority of Canadians is a question which no doubt many members have asked themselves time after time during this debate. Parliamentarians are representatives of the people who elect them, not their delegates. According to the parliamentary tradition, members of parliament should decide on the basis of their wisdom and their conscience. While we should listen to our constituents, the final decision should be ours and not theirs. At this point I reject the self-serving assertions by some abolitionists that only they are following this honoured parliamentary tradition, and also the clear inference that the retentionists are somehow merely responding to the whim of the moment.

Parliamentarians should not mindlessly do what their constituents want. That is obvious. On the other hand, when they want to do something that is abhorrent to most of the people, they should be much more certain of their motives. Members of Parliament ought to be careful in overruling the clear and collective wishes of the people which, of course, in effect is the situation in considering this particular piece of legislation at this point in Canada's history.

I ask the government to withdraw or drastically modify this piece of legislation. As I said earlier, there are two distinct principles involved in this legislation. I believe members of this House must have the opportunity to decide each of the principles separately and according to their merits. In any event I, for one, shall vote according to my conscience. I ask only that the Solicitor General and other abolitionists do the same and refrain from imputing motives to members who may not agree with their point of view.

Our existing criminal law over the centuries has been refined to the point where an accused does have sufficient protection to take into account practically all mitigating circumstances. In this country, when a person is accused of murder there is an assumption of innocence. In our system of criminal jurisprudence there is the right to a preliminary hearing, the right in respect of a grand jury, the right in respect of a petit jury, and the right of appeal right up to the Supreme Court of Canada in respect of any conviction, and in the final analysis, the possibility of the royal prerogative of mercy being exercised on behalf of the person concerned.

All these safeguards are in addition to the very real principle which has existed in our form of justice over the years, that of making sure that it is better for 100 guilty men to walk away than that one innocent man be convicted. All juries are instinctively aware of this tradition. All these safeguards exist, in addition to the option of being acquitted by reason of mental disability, of being convicted of lesser crimes, or included offences, such as manslaughter on the basis on self-defence, mistake or accidentally. Those of us who have practiced law realize, as the previous speaker said, that there is hardly any imaginable chance that in this day and age any person would be executed for a crime that was not of the most reprehensible and terrible type.

We have a system of criminal law and jurisprudence which has served us well. It can be modified and improved, that is for sure; but I am not convinced that the ultimate penalty at this point in time should not be maintained, to be used only in cases when there are no mitigating circumstances that could possibly be taken into account by conscientious jurists or by conscientious members of the cabinet.

To follow the thrust of this bill at this particular time in an attempt to make things more desirable or better for law enforcement in our society, I suggest is not feasible. If this legislation is supposed to be a cure for some sort of malady or disease that is affecting our society at this time because of the forces and influence of crime, it is a cure that I feel will be worse than the disease itself.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I feel somewhat honoured to be able to participate in this debate on Bill C-84 since we will be having a free vote on this very important matter. To begin, I should like to say that once again this House meets to debate and vote on a bill involving the issue of capital punishment. The last time the issue came before the House, in the fall of 1973, a measure was passed that saw the death penalty for a five-year period except in respect of those who had murdered policemen and prison guards. It should be pointed out that the result was the abolishment of the death penalty in all cases, since the government has shown itself to be utterly unwilling to apply the law as it stands. The government can argue that it has been completely within the letter of the law, that it has the power to commute any death sentence, but it is the spirit of the law that has been violated. It is satisfying to know we will see the end of the spectacle of a government that frustrates the law of the land, whatever the fate of the bill as it now stands. In other words, we will finally see the law carried out one way or the other regardless of how people across the country feel.

In the bill before us we are asked to vote for total abolition of the death penalty in Canada. This I cannot do. In fact, I cannot support any legislation on this matter which does not include the death penalty, as potential punishment, not only for the killing of policemen and prison guards but for all premeditated murder. In taking my position, I do not picture myself as a vengeful, bloodthirsty ogre, but as a responsible member of parliament making a decision that is true to both my conscience and the sentiments of most of my constituents. The decision was taken only after weighing all the factors as I saw them.

I have no great emotional attachment to the death penalty as such, as has been expressed by people throughout the various parts of the country and by some members of this parliament. If an alternative were to appear that I felt was as effective for the protection of society, I would support it. However, due to the unique nature of capital punishment as a deterrent, it is doubtful such an alternative can be found. Capital punishment cannot be dismissed as a simplistic solution. The alternative certainly has not been provided in the mandatory 25-year sentence for premeditated murder found in Bill C-84. This measure is a carrot-on-the-end-of-a-stick approach by the government. In the past, when the government knew it could not get a majority in favour of total abolition, it compromised by making exceptions for the murderers of policemen and prison guards and by restricting the measure to five years. Now, when the move has been made to total abolition, the 25-year minimum sentence has, in my opinion, been thrown in to pull enough votes to the abolition side in an attempt to ensure passage.

My position on capital punishment is not based on any philosophy of "an eye for an eye" but a desire—and I hope a sincere desire—to protect society, something that is not obvious today. We have been told that use of the death penalty would brutalize civilization. I not only dispute this claim but I suggest that capital punishment is necessary if we are to prevent civilization from becoming more brutal and lawless.

● (1650)

To my way of thinking, capital punishment as a deterrent has two aspects. The first is that the threat of the potential use of the death penalty deters a certain segment of the criminal or potentially criminal population from using murder to accomplish their ends. The second is that carrying out the death penalty in those cases where there is no hope of rehabilitation and the chance of further acts of violence, including murder, seem likely, capital punishment is the ultimate deterrent.

I am not going to quote statistics in support of my position that capital punishment does have a deterrent effect. That has been done, ad nauseum, on both sides of this issue until the figures become meaningless. For example, the retentionist side can point to the rising murder rate since partial abolition in 1967, which in practice under this government has been total abolition, and the abolitionists can quickly point out the rising numbers of all crimes, implying that the rise in the murder rate has little or nothing to do with abolition but is just a reflection of a general increase in crime across Canada and certainly in most countries of the world.

Which view of the statistics is correct? I really do not think that question can be answered, because once again it depends strictly on the way in which you use statistics. Thus, my reluctance to use statistics in support of my argument is not because such statistics are not available but because I recognize that the other side can support their argument equally well with a different interpretation or set of statistics, thus putting us no further ahead.

The use of deterrents is well recognized in our judicial system. It is one of the prime motives behind the principle of lesser penalties for lesser crimes. As murder, especially premedidated murder, must be considered the ultimate crime, should not society impose the ultimate penalty—not for vengeance but for its own defence?

I would like to say a few words on the aspect of public opinion on this issue, and certainly the House of Commons as the forum which we are using to debate this piece of legislation is the focal point of public opinion which is shifting back and forth across the country. I certainly hope I am not one of those people who wish to see this or any other issue decided by public referendum. I would certainly like to state that in my view that would be an abdication of the responsibility of parliament to make the laws for Canadian society. If we used the method of public referendum, we could do this with any number of pieces of legislation. However, in any issue public opinion, especially when it is as clearly defined as it is in this case, must be given some weight in each member's decision. My sympathy goes to those members who must choose between the wishes of the large majority of their constituents and their own personal view. Fortunately, I have no such difficult decision. The vast majority of my constituents, and myself, are in agreement on the necessity of the retention of capital punishment, though not always for the same reasons.

The coverage by the media of this issue seems to imply that the only members following their conscience are those who favour abolition. I want to make the point emphatically that the members in favour of abolition do not have a monopoly on voting by conscience, as the media would have us believe. Many—I believe, the vast majority—of those voting against the bill do so because of their own personal beliefs. That public opinion shares these beliefs in no way alters the fact that these members will be voting true to their conscience, just as will many of those members supporting the bill. If those sections of the media that are pressing members whose personal views conflict with those of their constituents to vote in accordance with their conscience wish to be consistent, should that same principle not also apply to those close retentionists in the cabinet who are being forced to toe the line on this issue?

In Bill C-83 and Bill C-84 the government has supposedly provided us with its definitive statement on violent crime. However, the measures contained in the legislation leave significant gaps in the areas of prevention and rehabilitation. For example, no measures have been proposed to deal with the significant incidence of hard drug related crime, or with the problems of crime among Canada's native population. These problems need special attention which one does not find in the peace and security legislation or in this bill.

I would now like to explain what I feel is the increased danger when a mandatory 25-year sentence is combined with abolition of the death penalty.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hate interrupting the hon. gentleman in full flight of oratory, but I was wondering if perhaps the House might not give its consent to doing away with private members' hour and continuing this most enlightening debate until six o'clock?

Mr. Paproski: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement to suspending private members' hour and continuing the debate on Bill C-84?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Murta: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the fact that private members' hour will be suspended today to allow us to continue this very important debate. As I was saying before the interruption, I would like to explain what I feel is the increased danger when a mandatory, 25-year sentence is combined with abolition of the death penalty. This increased danger will focus on two law enforcement groups that in the present law are given special status. Consider what will likely be a common case should this bill pass—a murderer sentenced to 25 years in prison, but secure in his knowledge that he cannot be executed no matter what his crime is in the future. Will not the number of attempts at escaping increase when a prisoner is faced with 25 years in confinement, as opposed to, let us say, 10 years? Will not the level of violence used in these more frequent escape attempts be higher when the prisoner is faced with a penalty of only further imprisonment?

Would not a similar response be expected of a successful escapee avoiding recapture? We have enough incidents of escapes and hostage-taking in our penitentiary system at present, without bringing in measures which are sure to increase their number and severity. These problems, these fears, have been borne out by various law enforcement agencies across the country in virtually every province in Canada. From a position of providing special protection for law enforcement officers—at least in theory—we are now being asked to vote in favour of measures which will increase the already substantial risks to which they are exposed. Many of these law enforcement officers are very concerned about the outcome of this legislation if the bill passes as it has been presented by the government.

In conclusion, let me deal with the concept of cruel and unusual punishment. I cannot imagine how any member of parliament can argue that condemning a man to 25 years in our present penal system is an act of mercy, compared with the death penalty. In their zeal to placate their own consciences, many hon. members may be sentencing men to fates far worse than death. Anyone who has had a chance to look at our present penal system certainly must agree.

In my opinion, this legislation is a poor answer to a very complex problem and cannot do anything but make things worse, not only for policemen and prison guards but also for law-abiding citizens across Canada. The most serious effect of the legislation in Bill C-84 and also in Bill C-83—which I suppose we can consider as one piece of peace and security legislation—is that we have not started down the road to any meaningful reform of our penal system at all. When this debate is over, we will go back to what we had before, and unfortunately the issues may not arise again for a long period of time. What we have done is perpetuate a system which has demonstrated that it is just not working.

[Translation]

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, the position I took in this House on February 20, 1973 concerning the abolition or the retention of the death penalty remains the same. This is not surprising since the reforms on crime prevention that I would have wanted to see brought forward have not been forthcoming, unfortunately, so that it is impossible for me today to approve the abolition of the death penalty simply because, to my mind, society's protection would be harmed by such a measure.

Indeed, there are criminals. We are concerned about punishing them through forced labour, imprisonment and hanging. In any event, we are not concerned about healing the causes which drive some individuals to crime. In the social sector, much has been done but there is still much to be done. With our present education system, we are preparing criminals.

In the report which we have been given and which is written by Dr. Fattah, a criminologist from British Columbia, we find on pages 147, 151 and 165 tables which show that among the people surveyed 50 to 60 per cent believe that discipline in schools is not strict enough; this was the opinions of primary and secondary students as much as of adults aged from 20 to 39, 30 to 49, 50 or more. The lack of discipline produces criminals.

In 1968, the Divorce Act was amended, but the regulations concerning the maintenance rules allow one spouse to have a coercive power over the other. As we read on pages 32 and 33 of Working Paper 12 by the Law Reform Commission of Canada on "Maintenance on divorce", and I quote:

> It is an unfortunate part of the folklore of marriage, because of the legal tradition involved here, that the "innocent" husband should be able to put the "guilty" wife "out on the street without a penny", and when the situation is reversed, the wife should be able to "take him for every cent he's got."

In most divorce cases the wife is automatically responsible for children. If she finds a job, she will have to pay a baby sitter, but according to the statistics of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, one sees that generally her salary will not be sufficient for her to adopt such a solution. The only alternative left to her will be social welfare which will be just enough, if not to live, to survive. If she dares pay a lawyer to seek a maintenance allowance from her husband, there will be a ruling of course but how can it be enforced since she is given no coercive means to make him pay alimony?

In that respect, I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) who is now studying if it is possible to pay maintenance allowances, will be able to bring forward such a humanitarian policy. To conclude, with entire families living in a state of constant humiliation and poverty, the Senate commission proved that the state of poverty tends to lead directly to crime. In days of yore, we might have been able to suggest that the poor try to recapture in work some of the dignity they lost, but because of current high unemployment, which seems to show a tendency to increase instead of decrease, our solution would not be welcome!

Unemployment strikes like a plague: the young people, without preparation, the drop-outs, soon become young delinquents; the graduates, become our unemployed with degrees. I know a forest engineer with many degrees who has been looking for a job for two years now, and is still looking. People of 40 or more are considered less productive that the young and women. The latter are the least disadvantaged in the labour market, very often because they accept jobs the men would not do for the money offered.

If that continues, we will soon be running short of taxpayers and workers to pay for unemployment benefits. We will then have achieved the real society of leisure, won't we? But, all that compulsory leisure called "unemployment", Mr. Speaker, finally leads to crime.

As a consequence of all those weeknesses in the fundamental systems that govern our Canadian society, we witness high juvenile delinquency rates and criminality that the judicial system does not remedy. We have reached the point where we invoke judicial error as the reason for abolishing the death penalty. We fear judicial errors, Mr. Speaker, but who commits those errors? Certainly not the one who was killed, who was its victim.

Neither by the accused who may also be the victim of this error. By the members of the jury? But if they make a miscarriage of justice, they cannot be held responsible for that since they are also in some way victims of it. There remains only our judicial system to blame. Perjury, forging of evidence, conjuring of witnesses produce miscarriage of justice at the beginning of the chain, and our antiquated and inadequate penitentiary and rehabilitation system closes the ring of injustices. Unable to correct them, we imagine being able to prevent them by trading off the death penalty for life imprisonment.

I have here a document dated June 26, 1973 and signed by inmates from Cowansville. The prisoners themselves do not accept this solution. They say that even though you are against capital punishment and your vote makes the balance turn towards abolition, nothing will change if in exchange you accept the implementation of a prolonged punishment which under a more humane disguise will only be a death by inches. To deny all hope to prisoners means they will become madmen, dangerous people for those they live with or even leading them to suicide.

And it seems they are right, Mr. Speaker, if we are to believe the statistics on the number of suicides among prisoners in federal institutions. Between 1959 and 1965, when capital punishment was enforced, there were 27 suicides. Between 1965 and 1972, after capital punishment was suspended, there were 77. Prisoners advocate what they call "preventive detention", a formula which would be more like rehabilitation than punishment and which, in my opinion, would deserve closer study. But we are not talking about prevention, but punishment, are we not, Mr. Speaker?

As things now stand, we will have to be very strict. Even some members of the Parole Board are of that opinion. Mrs. Mary Lynch, who retired last November 26 after 15 years in that service stated before the press that it might not yet be the moment to abolish hanging in Canada.

Some people will retort that moral authorities, namely churches, have just decided against the retention of capital punishment. Personally I think that this position by bishops is ambiguous because they do not deny the state the right to impose capital punishment if required by circumstances. But this is the case and we infer that when required by circumstances, the death penalty must be applied.

The League for Human Rights itself determined two objectives: protect society and rehabilitate the murderer. In its document of January 31, 1973, it says:

> It is necessary for Canadian society to have maximum protection against murderers . . . and . . . it is fair for society to force the murderer to make up for his act.

There I say, Mr. Speaker, that because society has not yet provided the appropriate prevention and protection mechanisms, we have no alternative other than voting for the retention of capital punishment.

[English]

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to echo a few of the sentiments expressed by some of my colleagues today about the importance of this debate at this time. The government has been stressing that they want to get the business of the House completed as soon as possible and yet they bring on a debate which, as far as I can see, at this moment has very little importance.

This is the second time that I have had the opportunity to participate in this debate, Mr. Speaker, and neither of these instances would have been necessary if the government had tended to its business. Just over three years ago, on May 16, 1973, was the first time I contributed to the debate on capital punishment. The reason I say it is not necessary that I should have participated at all is that at that time the bill had already expired. The government had lacked the foresight to introduce replacing legislation prior to the end of 1972 when the first partial ban on capital punishment expired. The debate in 1973 extended the partial ban on capital punishment to December, 1977, some 20 months from today. I say there was plenty of time for the government to have organized its program so that the debate could have taken place at a time when the pressure of House business was not so intensive.

My stand, however, does not demand capital punishment in any spirit of blood lust or revenge. The argument I hope to develop will stress the fact that society needs protection by the government—it needs protection from the government, too—I suspect—Mr. Speaker. However, protection of the public is the point I want to stress as being the most important. Before I get into that, however, there is another factor I should like to discuss. This bill presents a "no loss" situation to the abolitionists. In other words, if the bill is passed by the House, then we will have abolition and they will have won the day. On the other hand, if the bill is defeated, it will simply mean that we will continue with the law that exists at the present time and in fact we will still be without capital punishment because for the last 14 years this government has practised abolition.

We should look at the law as it stands so that we will know the alternatives if the bill is defeated. Apparently recognizing the vulnerability of police and prison guards, and probably realizing that it was a necessary feature to get the last bill passed, the government included a provision that killers of police or prison guards shall be or can be executed. Of course, the cabinet retained the power to commute the death sentence and that is the practice they have followed.

I do not think there is anyone in this House on either side of the issue who would not agree with the proposition that murderers should be removed from society, if not permanently then certainly for a very long time. In some cases, that would be extended until they were cured of their propensity to murder. When we are considering murder and the punishment therefor, I think it is important to define exactly what we mean by the term "murder." After all, many offences that involve killing are not murder and the perpetrator is not subject to the ultimate penalty. I should like to read a definition I came across in a Globe and Mail editorial of February 26:

> First degree murder is defined in the bill as planned and deliberate murder and as the killing of a police officer, prison guard or a person working in a prison even though the killing was not planned and deliberate. It would also be first degree murder, even though not planned and deliberate, if someone were killed during the hijacking of an aircraft, or during a kidnapping, rape, attempted rape or an indecent assault on a male or on a female.

Those are all heinous crimes, Mr. Speaker, and I am certain there will be agreement that the ultimate penalty should be imposed for them. Where we have some difficulty is with the so-called passion killing or other "heat of the battle" type killings. I do not think most people want to see the perpetrators executed, and that is where some of our difficulties arise. I think some who are abolitionists have arrived at their conclusion, because they fear a miscarriage of justice, that the wrong person will be executed and society will be unable to make it up to him. I am not certain how well we can make up an error after a man has served 25 years. It would be very difficult to restore those 25 years to him if he were found to be innocent or to have been erroneously convicted.

Dealing with the error aspect, I should like to read a paragraph from a letter I received from Hon. J. V. Clyne, a resident of Vancouver. Mr. Clyne is a retired industrialist and, what makes him more unusual, a retired jurist. He resigned from the Supreme Court of British Columbia in order to return to industry, in which he embarked on another successful career. He wrote the following to me:

> You know the elaborate precautions which are taken to make certain that the accused is deemed to be innocent until found guilty and is deserving of death. It is necessary for the Crown to prove intent in order for a man to be found guilty of murder. If intent is not proved but death ensues as a result of a criminal act then the charge is reduced to manslaughter. It is likewise reduced to manslaughter even if the accused formed the intent to kill but acted on the instant under extreme provocation and the degree of provocation is for the jury to consider. It may likewise be reduced to manslaughter if the jury finds that the accused acted reasonably in self-defence. The judge must always charge the jury in a criminal action that the Crown must prove its case beyond reasonable doubt and if the defence raises a reasonable doubt in the jury's mind it must either acquit or reduce the charge. I mention these matters to emphasize that every safeguard is taken to prevent a miscarriage of justice.

I shall refer to that letter later. What he said ought to allay some fears. After all, society and governments must make decisions from time to time. Existing safeguards against accidental or erroneous convictions are of a high standard.

Many hon. members have referred to the opinions of their constituents. I want to do the same and to refer to other opinions as well. Like many colleagues in the House, I sent a questionnaire to constituents. In 1974, after passage of existing legislation, I asked my constituents the following question, among others: "Are you in favour of capital punishment for other murderers as well as for murderers of police or prison guards?" In other words, the implication was: "You are stuck with this law for the next four or five years; do you think it goes far enough, or should it go further?" We received 3,248 responses, which represent a return of 13 per cent. Statisticians consider a response of about 6 per cent as normal. I think, as we received double the normal response, that we did fairly well, although I do not think one can assume from the greater than normal response that one side or the other would express a stronger opinion.

The result was that 75 per cent of the residents of my riding expressed themselves as being in favour of capital punishment for other murderers as well as for murderers of police or prison guards. If hon. members consider the definition of "murder" to which I referred previously, it will help them to think more clearly.

Society entrusts the enforcement of its laws to the police. Admittedly, at times the police have a difficult job to do. I do not know why abolitionists seem unable to pay much attention to the views of the police, to whom they entrust the enforcement of the laws. I therefore refer hon. members to what the Canadian Police Association wrote to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last year. In part, the letter said:

The association is deeply concerned over the fact that there is now no penalty of consequence on persons who commit murder in our country. Persons convicted of murder who are given a "life" sentence can be eligible for parole in seven to ten years after conviction. It is the view of the policemen of this country, as represented by the association, that this is not a suitable penalty and does not serve to protect society.

The view has been expressed that juries tend not to convict if they feel that a conviction will mean putting the accused to death. On the other side of the argument there is the equal danger that the policeman under fire or the pressure of his job will, perhaps unknowingly or unconsciously, develop a tendency to act without benefit of law. In other words, he may take the law into his own hands. Faced with the choice of making a difficult capture or killing in action, it is possible he will take the law unto himself and act accordingly. That will not be the honourable thing for him to do; he may do it even without realizing what he is doing. The point is that the government will put him in such a position that he will be under those pressures.

I shall now refer to something an official of the John Howard Society said. I am sure hon. members appreciate the good work the John Howard Society has done for many years. A member of the board of directors said he would rather "they hang murderers than see them imprisoned with very little chance of coming out." We know that the suggested alternative to capital punishment is the long prison term, perhaps of 25 years. The John Howard Society has long been an advocate of rehabilitation, but it knows, from its experience, that a 25-year prison term will preclude any hope of rehabilitation. It suggests capital punishment is better than 25 years in jail.

Hon. members have received much correspondence from churches. I have a letter from the Canadian Council of Churches; it is addressed to me. The letter speaks of "the following bodies" as having spoken in favour of the abolition of capital punishment. Various churches are listed, including the Anglican Church in Canada which is at the top of the list, the Baptist, Presbyterian and Mennonite churches, the Roman Catholic church, the Society of Friends and the United Church of Canada.

Mr. Johnston: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke: I am an Anglican, Mr. Speaker. I am a supporter of the Anglican church; what is more, I am an attender of the Anglican church. I know that some Anglicans came together and made the statement that the church is opposed to capital punishment. But I also know that the Anglicans with whom I go to church on Sunday and associate during the week are not of a mind to support the body that made this statement regarding the abolition of capital punishment on behalf of the church.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I have some support in the House. It is all very well for a body to establish a policy, but I do not think they should try to impose their will on the members of the church who have not been consulted on a matter. It is not even as if they were outvoted; they were not even consulted on the issue.

I note that the Baptist church takes a somewhat different position, and I point out that the list previously alluded to contains the Baptist convention of Ontario and Quebec. I have in my possession a letter from a Baptist minister in my riding, Vancouver Quadra. The Reverend Wald Kroguletz is in favour of capital punishment, but did not try to foist his views on his parishioners. I wish to quote a paragraph from the letter. It reads:

Most politicians who quote the sixth commandment: "Thou shalt not kill", have little or no theological understanding of the true meaning of the same. This divine law forbids any individual to hatefully and planfully murder any other individual. The sixth commandment does not prohibit the state to punish and execute the offending criminal—

● (1730)

He makes a reference to Exodus which I shall not repeat now. I shall be saying something later about the right and duty of the state to afford the protection to which I have alluded.

In the last debate we heard a speech by an Anglican clergyman who was an M.P. of this party. I thought he summed things up very well. In fact I sent copies of that speech out to a number of people who wrote to me concerning capital punishment. In a key paragraph of that speech in 1973 he said:

> The conviction is growing among a great number of Canadians that we need the death penalty as one way of reversing the permissive trend of the past decade . . . Few citizens of this country find much pleasure in the sight or thought of a fellow human being hanged. But there are many who want some assurance that the law is going to be enforced and that the public is going to be protected. They do not want cruelty shown to anybody but they want the ordinary man, woman and child of this country protected and they want to say to the criminal element of this society that that element is on notice that society is prepared to defend itself.

A lot has been said about the deterrent effect of capital punishment. There is probably no way of proving that capital punishment is a deterrent, or that it is not. I have heard it said that it is certainly a deterrent to repeaters, and I agree with that obvious statement. It is unfortunate we do not have statistics to lend weight to one side of the argument or the other. As hon. members know, capital punishment has not been carried out in this country since 1963, so both sides of the case cannot be argued. The contention that capital punishment is not a deterrent is not a very strong one when we bear in mind that capital punishment has not been enforced for so long a period.

It is accepted, I presume, that penalties of one kind or another do act as a deterrent otherwise there would be little point, for example, in imposing fines for parking offences—and we find that a three dollar penalty nowadays is not particularly effective as a deterrent; indeed we find parking offences committed all over the place. Nevertheless our selection of punishment ranges all the way up to long prison sentences for serious crimes such as assault and robbery, right up to death for murder. If it can be said with certainty that the death penalty is not a deterrent to murder, how can it be argued that life imprisonment is a deterrent? Indeed, why should we concern ourselves with punishment of any kind?

Even in British Columbia where a socialist government decided that traffic fines favour the rich and should therefore be abolished, there is still a deterrent to dangerous or careless motoring. Indeed, it is probably more of a deterrent than the previous penalties. Offenders are now awarded demerit points, and after a certain number of demerit points they lose their licences.

I should like to refer to an article which appeared in a magazine called The Canadian Police Chief, written by one Sid Nelson, and appearing in the issue of January, 1976, He talks about deterrence in these terms:

> The question of deterrence is secondary to the question of justice and we ought not to confuse the two. One person has observed, however, that capital punishment is really the ultimate deterrent in that it assures us that he who has murdered another will never murder again. A prominent lawyer in Montreal has affirmed that an escaped murderer who was his client probably killed five other persons on his escape. In this instance capital punishment would have saved the lives of five other people.

I consider this to be a very strong argument although it is evidently one which has not been accepted by the government. Talking about the protection of the public, which is my main theme, I say that if a murderer is sentenced to life imprisonment or to 25 years in prison it means he will be there for the rest of his useful life. There is no deterrent for him not to stay in prison. In other words there is every encouragement for him to attempt to escape. If he kills people getting out or if he kills people while he is outside the worst punishment he faces is to go back to jail for the rest of his life. But he is already there for the rest of his life, and after all one can only serve one life sentence.

I maintain that the work of prison guards and of police officers becomes increasingly difficult and dangerous in times when the the death penalty is not carried out. As I say, prisoners find themselves in a "no-loss" situation—somewhat the same as the government finds itself in presently. Prisoners are likely to make use of every occasion and every means possible to escape and find their way back to the free world.

I also want to say something about the power of the state to execute. Some people assert that the state does not have the right to take human life. I suggest that the evidence on the other side of the question is stronger. In my view, not only does the state have the power to protect citizens and execute others in the course of carrying out that protection but it has a duty to protect innocent members of the public.

The state abrogates its duty if it refuses to execute people in cases where such a penalty is obviously warranted. I would refer members who are concerned about this aspect to consider what happens when the state declares war on an enemy of the state. In effect, by declaring war, the state gives a licence to members of the armed forces to kill. It makes very little difference whether we are concerned with an enemy of the state during wartime, such as the second world war, or with an enemy of the state in the shape of an isolated individual murderer. The state has a duty to protect, and it cannot protect the public if it declines to use a power which it now possesses under the law.

I realize there are some who are abolitionists because they object to the method of execution used. I am not one who would insist that hanging is the only way or even the best way in which executions should be carried out. Once again I refer to the letter from J. V. Clyne of Vancouver and read these few sentences:

> When I was on the bench I did make certain investigations regarding the gas chamber and the electric chair and on the basis of making death quick and effective I think hanging is a better choice than either of them. I believe however that there should be substituted in modern times a form of euthanasia, that is to say, the means of procuring a quiet and easy death. With the advancement in the knowledge of drugs this should not be difficult. As I have said the death penalty should be preserved but there should be an enquiry as to the means of carrying it out.

● (1740)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I summarize my remarks. My investigation leads me to the conclusion that Canada needs capital punishment at this time. The present abuse of the will of parliament by the cabinet is seriously undermining public respect for the law. The public must be assured of protection of the law and by the law. I urge my colleagues in the House to oppose this bill as a step on the road to these overdue changes.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the third time I have participated in a debate on this subject since I have been in this House. I must say I think all sides on this particular issue should be congratulated on the rational nature of the debate. I think it has maintained a rather high standard, in the sense that I do not hear too many of those who are abolitionists calling the one side bloodthirsty, and I do not hear those on the other side calling the abolitionists yellow and so on, so in a sense I think the debate is a worth-while one.

Before getting into the question of the death penalty itself I want to deal briefly with the bill and the alternative proposed in the bill, that of a 25 year mandatory sentence for first degree murder. We have had quite a bit of comment about this being a trade-off and so on. The facts are that under section 672(1), as I read the bill, the mandatory nature of the sentence is 15 years, not 25 years. The chief justice of a province has the authority, and I think the duty to appoint three of his judges to sit not merely to make recommendations back to the parole board but to make decisions on how much longer the mandatory section of a sentence is to last. To those who are on the side of arguing that 25 years is a more draconian alternative than the death penalty I suggest they look carefully at this bill.

I think the government should be subject to some criticism for using the argument about a trade-off. Any examination of the bill clearly leads one to the conclusion that the mandatory sentence for first degree murder is 15 years, not 25 years, and I cannot understand why the media and the public are talking about a sentence of 25 years. People in prison who have had the 25 year sentence imposed on them, once they have served 15 years of their sentence will clearly be able to make a routine application to the chief justice of the province, and the chief justice will routinely appoint three judges who will make the sort of decision that the parole board has been making up until now, so I do not think we should kid the public about what this bill really provides.

As for the other issue, the question of capital punishment, we have had this time more than a dialogue between the deaf. Most of the time when we get into this kind of debate we always assume our positions are entirely fixed, that no one will budge from matters of conscience which may have been developed over many years. However, I think in fact some listening is going on. I do not know how much change there has been in terms of debate, but the thrust of the argument has changed. For example, those who are advocating abolition are emphasizing questions that deal with the safety of the public rather than whether we live in a civilized society and such philosophical questions as that. I should like to spend some of my time on whether public safety is enhanced through the use of the death penalty or whether in fact its use increases public risk.

Some of the new evidence that has come forward on this subject has to do with the murder rate. Those who argue for retention have some evidence that we should certainly consider, namely, that the murder rate has doubled since between 1962 and 1974. In 1962 the rate was 1.2 per thousand; it is now 2.4 per thousand, using constant population figures. This is a significant change and well worth examination, no matter which side of the question one is on. It is clear that it is not just public imagination that says that rates of crime and murder are increasing.

I would ask those who favour retention of the death penalty on those grounds to consider the fact that the department of vital statistics disclosed that in 1961, when hanging was in vogue, 20 per cent of criminal homicides led to charges of manslaughter, whereas in 1974 only 7 per cent were manslaughter. What, in effect, has happened is that the murder statistics have risen, not entirely but partly, as a result of the police laying more murder charges. The reason that more murder charges tend to be laid is that the chances of conviction are higher when the death penalty is not the penalty facing the jury when they make their ultimate decision. In terms of statistical evidence murder has increased, but I do not think it has increased quite as dramatically as the bald figures themselves disclose.

The media have some responsibility for the public's perception of its own safety and the risk that the public itself on an average basis faces. There is no question in my mind that anyone who watches a great deal of television has a different perception from those who do not expose themselves to the myriad of media violence to which we are continually exposed. I want to quote briefly from "Psychology Today" for April, 1976, which has an article dealing with the perception of crime and personal safety and how this is affected by watching television. As a result of a very comprehensive study the article says:

> We have found that people who watch a lot of TV see the real world as more dangerous, and frightening than those who watch very little. Heavy viewers are less trustful of their fellow citizens, and more fearful of the real world . . .
> In order to complete a story entertainingly in only an hour or even a half hour, conflicts on TV are usually personal and solved by action. Since violence is dramatic, and relatively simple to produce, much of the action tends to be violent . . . More than half of all characters on prime-time TV are involved in some violence, about one tenth in killing . . . Among those TV males with identifiable occupations, about 20 per cent are engaged in law enforcement. In the real world, the proportion runs less than one per cent . . .
>
> Violence on television leads viewers to perceive the real world as more dangerous than it really is, which must also influence the way people behave. When asked, "Can most people be trusted?" the heavy viewers were 35 per cent more likely to check "Can't be too careful."

The conclusion of this study, which was quite extensive, is as follows:

> We have found that violence on prime-time network TV cultivates exaggerated assumptions about the threat of danger in the real world. Fear is a universal emotion, and easy to exploit. The exaggerated sense of risk and insecurity may lead to increasing demands for protection, and to increasing pressure for the use of force by established authority.

The media have something else to account for, and that is whether public behaviour itself is affected in individual cases; for examples, whether a brain damaged individual or an individual with lower degrees of resistance to what he is seeing is influenced in terms of his potential for crime. When one looks at some of the more notorious crimes that have taken place involving murder, they are surprisingly close to actual media presentations. I am thinking now of a case that happened recently in the United States, and I read from the Ottawa Citizen of Friday, May 14, as follows:

● (1750)

> David McRae, Jr., whose mother said he always wanted to be a policeman, walked into a bar in a seedy area Thursday and fatally shot four persons after warning he was coming to clean out pimps, prostitutes, homosexuals and dope pushers.

I do not know whether they asked this individual, David McRae, what movies he had been seeing lately, but if he went to see a movie called "Taxi Driver" that is exactly what he would have seen in that picture. This is not just a coincidence. There are a number of very interesting murders which took place following the exposure to media violence of some person of low resistance or with possible brain damage, but with the potential for violence. It is too often that this sort of thing happens not long after such exposure.

The media have to start cleaning their own house or this place is going to start cleaning it. I think the time has come to examine the amount of violence to which we are exposing the public. Guidelines will have to be developed in the long run if the media do not develop their own guidelines.

We are dealing with a very sensitive area. The average person may not be affected, but if you take the typical serious criminal, and that is the individual who normally has failed at home or his home has failed him, has failed in school or his school has failed him, or has failed with his peer group or that group has failed him, where does he go? He sits at home watching television every day and thinks the whole world is flying to Hawaii and having a great time. He is sitting there with this sense of frustration, and when he is exposed to a film such as that movie "Taxi Driver", or other dramatic cases of crime, he then says, "I am going to go out and get some attention. I am going to get my piece of the action."

It is long overdue that we took a very careful look at some legislative guidelines regarding the kind of violence in the media to which we expose our children and other members of the public.

Let me now turn again to the question of capital punishment. After looking at the evidence and after considering the question of safety to the public, and I may say that I have studied it as intensively as I can, I am still of the opinion that there is no place for the death penalty, not only because it may not be worthy of the kind of civilization we are living in—and I do not believe that out of any sense of arrogance or moral superiority—but because there is no evidence that it will provide a deterrent, and there is no evidence that it will reduce the number of murders in our society. In fact the evidence is the other way. There is a considerable body of very persuasive evidence that the death penalty increases the murder rate by exposing the public to the risk of murderers being acquitted by juries who apply the standards of our criminal law which have been so time honoured.

The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) indicated this afternoon, in favour of the principle of retention, that the safety valves within our judicial system are so extensive the capacity for error is almost infinitesimal or minimal. The facts are that when we examine some of the more dramatic cases which have led to a more widespread call by the public for a return of the death penalty, and some of the cases of the past, we still have the very uncomfortable feeling that we may have gotten the wrong man. Let me give you a couple of examples.

I suppose one of the most famous cases took place in my own riding, the case of the murder of Tanya Busch, the daughter of a guard. A man called Head was charged with the murder. It was a particularly vicious, rotten, and violent thing. In this case there was no eyewitness, and I believe two of the Crown witnesses changed their stories. There was no confession. I ask the public and I ask this House to consider whether, given those facts, and given the warning that a judge usually has to give the jury to satisfy itself beyond a reasonable doubt that the circumstances are not only consistent with the guilt but inconsistent with any other rational conclusion, even with capital punishment, that jury would have in fact convicted Gary Head of that murder. In the Saskatoon murders a similar situation occurred. This involves the whole question of dealing as an individual with a case rather than as a group of 200 people who may say, "Yes, bring back the death penalty because that is clearly the right answer." When you have 12 men sitting on a jury they start to act very differently. They assess the evidence, as it is their duty to do.

I can tell you that without exception those lawyers who have been involved in any kind of extensive criminal practice on the defence side will indicate that they prefer the death penalty if their purpose is to obtain an acquittal. The problem continues to be that a jury of 12 looks at a man for up to two weeks, and then has to make the decision.

I do not think we should do anything to abandon the jury system. It works and it works extremely well, but with the death penalty it works less well. The chance for an error by the jury, and the chance of acquittal of a person who is a murderer and who should be taken away from the public for its protection, with the death penalty in place in fact work in reverse to the detriment of the public.

The death penalty is not a deterrent. If you look at those societies which from time immemorial have continued to use the death penalty you will find they are consistently less safe than the one in which we are living. For instance, let us take Brazil, Spain, and Argentina. In Spain they impose the death penalty. In fact they have a vigilante gang running around imposing the death penalty in Brazil, and that does not help their society.

The public is entitled to some solution, but the problem with this long debate on the death penalty is that it deflects our judgment and our attention away from the cause of crime. As long as we continue to agonize on the death penalty or no death penalty we are wasting time in the sense that we should be dealing with what is happening within our society, trying to find out why it is tearing apart and why we have this dramatic increase in all kinds of crime. The fact is that we have done little or nothing about drug abuse. A large percentage of violent crime is related to the drug trade and we have done nothing about it. We have done nothing about alcohol. We continue to sell alcohol and governments continue to support themselves from the revenue.

May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, to commence, I would like to express my thanks to my colleagues, and to the officials in my own department and of the other departments and agencies, for their assistance to me in this my first budget. May I express my appreciation also to members of this House who directly, or by correspondence, have made requests or suggestions on behalf of constituents, and to the many hundreds of Canadians who, through the year, but particularly in the last several months, have made representations concerning a wide variety of changes in our fiscal system.

Though I am completing my fourteenth year as a member of parliament and have witnessed as many budgets, still there were some surprises for me in the task of budget making. One of these has been the extent and variety of changes large and small sought in our tariff and tax system. Each of these is assessed by my officials, they are grouped for discussion and then hundreds of items cross the Finance Minister's desk for final decision. In that pre-budget period, the Finance Minister acquires a nationwide perspective into an apparently inexhaustible variety of personal situations, commercial circumstances or fiscal problems as they affect Canadians.

I am conscious that though some will be gratified by changes arising from this evening's announcements, many will be disappointed that their requests could not be met. I regret being the source of that disappointment but equity, administrative necessity, and a wider public interest have rendered it impossible to satisfy all requests.

Before proceeding with my budget statement, and with the permission of the House, I would like to table a number of supplementary budget papers which provide extensive background material relating to some of the more important measures. I would also like to table a number of Ways and Means Motions and ask that they be appended to Votes and Proceedings. I would ask that the supplementary tables on the government's accounts be appended to today's Hansard.

● (2010)

Mr. Speaker: Is the House agreed that the minister table certain documents? Is it so agreed and ordered by the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For notices of ways and means motions, see today's Votes and Proceedings].

[For tables referred to above see Appendix A]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale):

The International Economy

I would like first to set the stage for my remarks on the Canadian economy by reviewing some of the major economic developments taking place on the international front. These have important implications for our own country as a major participant in world trade and capital markets.

The international economy is launched on recovery from the depths of the worst recession since the great depression of the 1930's. The output of the industrial nations making up the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development stagnated during 1974 and declined sharply at an overall annual rate of 5 per cent during the first half of last year. This decline, fortunately, was arrested by mid-year, and with the United States in the lead, the prospect for strengthening recovery seems well-assured.

The severity of the recent recession was due in large part to the impact of soaring inflation around the globe earlier in the 1970's. From early 1973 spiralling price increases contributed to a substantial reduction in consumer spending, investment, output and employment in the world at large. This process was halted only slowly and eventually reversed as the run-down of inventories ran its course, as automatic economic stabilizers like social security came into play, and as governments injected strong stimulus into their economies. With the revival under way the OECD was able last December to forecast that real output among the industrial nations would rise by 4 per cent in 1976. Since the time of that forecast the world prospect has improved further.

While this strengthening recovery is welcome, the problem of deep-seated inflation persists. Although the rate of increase in consumer prices has slowed significantly, it still remains much too high. The world community continues to face the twin tasks of bringing the rate of inflation down to acceptable levels and maintaining a healthy growth of output, employment and real incomes.

One direct result of world-wide recession was a fall of 6 per cent in the volume of international trade last year. The imports of the industrial nations in particular dropped faster than their exports, and their current account deficits declined sharply from $33 billion the previous year to $6 billion. This reduction was mirrored in the decline of the surplus of the oil-producing nations. Unfortunately, the balance of payments position of the non oil-producing developing nations worsened.

The disruptions of the past few years have severely tested the strength of the institutions and practices of international co-operation built up over the past generation. Happily these did not fail us. On the whole the major countries have refrained from solving their problems at the expense of others. Essential joint action was taken on a number of different fronts—in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, the OECD and other organizations.

Last January the Interim Committee of the International Monetary Fund, of which Canada is a member, reached agreement on significant reforms in the international monetary system. The government considers that these reforms will facilitate the expansion of world trade and investment. They will help to ensure orderly conditions in exchange markets and smoother balance of payments adjustments. The reforms will be embodied in important amendments to the IMF Articles of Agreement. Later this year the government will be presenting to parliament amendments to the Bretton Woods Agreements Act for the purpose of securing parliamentary approval for these changes.

The severe economic difficulties of many of the developing countries have led to intensified discussion concerning the evolution of a new international economic order. This discussion is taking place at present in the meetings of the Conference on International Economic Co-operation in Paris and in the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development in Nairobi. We are playing an active part in both world arenas, as well as participating fully in the preliminary stages of the multilateral trade negotiations now gathering momentum in Geneva. The year ahead promises to be one of exceptional challenge, as we are called increasingly to adjust to new trends and pressures in our relations with the interdependent world community.

The Canadian Economy

Against this brief review of the international setting, I turn now to the economic situation and prospect here at home.

As a country which depends heavily for its livelihood on exports, we were inevitably affected by the deep recession experienced by our major trading partners. During 1975, the volume of our merchandise sales abroad declined by nearly 7 per cent, with obvious effects across the whole economy. A substantial drop in total real expenditures on housing construction also occurred, even though the number of housing starts rose significantly during the course of the year.

Despite the adverse impact of these developments and the run-down of inventories, I want to stress that the performance of the Canadian economy in terms of output, employment and real incomes exceeded that of virtually every other industrial nation. This was mainly because of the sustained strength in outlays of consumers, business and governments.

Given the basic tendency of the Canadian and American economies to move in parallel, the contrast between our two countries over the recent period is particularly noteworthy. In the United States, the gross national product in real terms declined by 1.8 per cent in 1974 and by a further 2 per cent last year. Canada, in contrast, achieved a real growth of 2.8 per cent in 1974, and successfully staved off any decline last year. Employment south of the border fell by about 1.3 per cent in 1975; in Canada it rose by nearly 2 per cent. Over the same period, while unemployment rose to 6.9 per cent in Canada, in the United States it reached an average level of 8.5 per cent.

Real income received per person, after payment of direct taxes and after allowing for higher prices, advanced by 2.5 per cent in Canada in both 1974 and 1975; in the U.S. it declined in both years. Over the longer span from 1971 to 1975 real disposable income per capita has risen by almost 18 per cent in Canada, three times the increase in the U.S.

In real terms, Canadian business investment in plant and equipment grew by 4.7 per cent last year, to a level 40 per cent higher than that in 1970. In the United States it decreased by 12 per cent to a level that was only 2 per cent above that of five years ago.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

[Translation]

Our better record in weathering the economic storms of the past three years compared with almost any other country in the western world was not just accidental. One of the important factors was our relatively more favourable position in petroleum supply. That made it possible for the federal government to cushion the economy against the immediate harsh impact of the four-fold jump in world oil prices. But undoubtedly the major factor was the concerted and far-reaching action by both federal and provincial governments to sustain output, employment and real incomes in the face of severe inflation and recession abroad.

During the course of 1974, fiscal and monetary policies became more expansionary. Federal policies, including further major tax reductions, were strongly reinforced by provincial governments. Automatic stabilizers in the economy such as unemployment insurance also played their role, helping to soften the impact of unemployment and buoying up the economy as a whole.

Given these circumstances and deliberate policy decisions, the fiscal position at all levels of government swung heavily into deficit last year. I would re-emphasize the point that if these expansionary policies had not been adopted, the Canadian economy would have experienced a much more severe recession than in fact it did. Recovery, though slow, has been underway for almost a year now, and the pace has started to quicken.

Nevertheless, it is also true that the relatively better performance of the Canadian economy has in itself served to intensify some of our current problems.

● (2020)

[English]

In 1975, a domestically-fueled spiral of costs and prices increasingly became the major source of continuing strong inflationary pressures. Understandably, individual Canadians scrambled for substantially increased incomes to catch up with others, to keep up with inflation, or to protect themselves against the risk of even more rapid inflation in future. Canadian salaries and wages began to rise at much faster rates than in the United States, our major market and our major competitor. The advance of prices in Canada also began to outpace that south of the border. This cost-price spiral posed an increasingly serious threat to the competitiveness of the Canadian economy, particularly at the stage when recovery in the United States and other countries from lower bases would provide them with the opportunity to achieve much larger productivity gains. While we may have weathered the recession better than the United States we will be hard-pressed to keep up with U.S. economic performance in its present period of rapid recovery and slower inflation.

Moreover, during 1975 Canada encountered a current account deficit with other countries of nearly $5.1 billion, a sharp deterioration from the deficit of $1.6 billion the previous year. This swing was largely a reflection of the higher level of demand sustained in Canada than abroad, with the resulting faster growth in our imports as compared with exports. There is every reason to expect that our exports will pick up strongly as recovery proceeds abroad, but we must be aware that their recovery could be adversely affected by our reduced competitive edge.

The relatively high interest rates prevailing in Canada also stem basically from the divergent course last year between domestic and international economic conditions. In particular, they reflect today a combination of factors—notably the continuing high rates of price increase, a strong demand for credit and the deliberate steps taken by the Bank of Canada to lean against inflation by moderating the growth of the money supply.

Over a period of many months, the crucial national need has been to gear down the rate of inflation without impeding economic recovery. To this end, over a year ago the government sought to develop a consensus, particularly with labour and business, in support of a program of voluntary restraint on prices and incomes. Unfortunately, as we all know, that effort was not successful. By last fall, in assessing both that experience and the dangers confronting our economy, we came to the conclusion that extraordinary steps would have to be taken to get us back on the course of full employment without inflation.

The anti-inflation program announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on October 13 contained four closely-related elements—fiscal and monetary policy, government expenditure policy, structural policies and prices and incomes policy. I turn now to consider the evolution of policy on each of these strategic fronts.

[Translation]

Prices and Incomes Policy

The major new element in the Attack on Inflation was a set of guidelines for the setting of prices and incomes. All Canadians were asked to abide by them, and provision was made for mandatory control over the larger economic units within our economy. The essential purpose was to change expectations and to bring about a quicker response to the program as a whole, so that the fiscal, monetary and other general policies would in fact bring about real growth and declining inflation.

In the past seven months, the program has become fully operational and has begun to take effect.

The actual rate of inflation has slowed noticeably since the introduction of the program. In April of this year, the consumer price index was 8.9 per cent higher than a year previously, whereas in October last the year-over-year increase was 10.6 per cent. The seasonally adjusted CPI increased at an annual rate of 6.3 per cent from October to April of this year, whereas it had increased at an annual rate of 11.7 per cent in the preceding six months. This sharp reduction in the rate of price increase is very welcome.

A major factor has been an actual drop in the average price of food. Lower prices of some imported foods and the decline in livestock prices have resulted from market forces rather than the guidelines. The program has, however, ensured that these decreases in costs to the processing and distribution sectors were passed on to the consumer.

In the case of prices for goods and services other than food, there have been significant factors beyond the scope of the program tending to raise the rate of increase in recent months. These have included increases in retail sales taxes and other taxes, higher charges for public services and the rising costs of home ownership.

On the other hand, firms have been very cautious in raising prices in order to be certain that they are complying with the program. In a number of cases, firms have responded to requests by the Anti-Inflation Board to reduce proposed price increases. There has been a deceleration in those non-food prices that are subject to the controls.

With respect to wages and salaries under the program, I have tabled tonight a summary of preliminary data on compensation prepared by the Anti-Inflation Board. These figures show that compliance with the program is widespread. They demonstrate that even in the first six months of the program almost two-thirds of the wage proposals reported to the Board are within the arithmetic guidelines. Of the proposals only a small percentage are significantly above the guidelines and the Board is restraining them effectively. Thus, the record to date indicates that for all groups subject to the mandatory controls, average increases in compensation are only 1 per cent above the level provided for in the arithmetic guidelines. Given the significant improvement on the price side, these lower rates of compensation increase still represent sizeable real gains in income.

● (2030)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the program is off to a reasonably good start. We feel a strong sense of responsibility to all those who have already contributed to the success of the program. They have every right to expect that others should be similarly restrained, and that the program should successfully bring the rate of inflation down to the target level.

Based on our experience to date, we have now come to the view that the regulations applying to prices and profits should be revised in order to achieve greater equity and effectiveness. Some firms are subject to insufficient restraint because in practice they have been able to choose which rules are favourable to them. Others are locked into very unfavourable starting positions and therefore have been subject to unreasonable restraints. The result is unfair treatment as between firms in competition with each other. Overall, this has created the danger that prices may be inadequately restrained in the future.

As a result of the detailed information supplied under the regulations, the Anti-Inflation Board has been able to complete an extensive analysis of the way in which the rules apply to the business community. The government has concluded that a number of important changes should be made. The details of the changes are described more fully in a supplementary paper, but I should like to summarize the highlights.

Let me begin by describing how the revised price and profit rules will apply to firms other than those in the distribution business. At present, not all firms are required to meet a profit margin test. Under the new rules, all firms will be required to do so. In justifying a price increase, they will be obliged to take into account not just increased costs, but the implication of the price increase on their profit position. Experience has now shown that a test based on profits has two advantages. First, it gives the Board a more effective regime to control prices. Second, it leaves everyone basically on the same set of rules and is therefore more equitable.

The new rules will be of particular assistance to many small firms which do not have sophisticated cost accounting systems.

Under the profits test, firms will not be able to set prices in a way which would increase their net pre-tax profits as a percentage of sales above an allowable level. That allowable level will be determined with reference to earnings in a base period. The base period margin is now the average margin in the five-year period ending prior to October 14, 1975. In order to provide a greater measure of fairness among firms, it is proposed that the base margin should be the greater of that calculated under the present rules and the margin earned by the firm in its fiscal year ending before May 1, 1976. For most firms this will be calendar 1975. At the same time, in order to ensure the over-all degree of restraint, it is necessary that the allowable margin be reduced from the present 95 per cent of the base margin to 85 per cent.

Firms will also be required to meet this margin test on each of their product lines as well as on their overall operations. Experience has shown that the product line test is the closest rule to actual business practice for most firms.

There will remain firms whose base margins are too low, whichever time period is chosen. In order to provide some relief for these firms, it is proposed that they be permitted to earn a minimum rate of return. The precise provision will be contained in draft regulations to be issued shortly. Similarly, at that time details will be provided relating to specific pricing and productivity rules.

Within this improved framework of rules, the Anti-Inflation Board will place greater emphasis on price justification. More firms will be required to notify the Board of proposed price increases and to justify them.

I have so far described the proposed revisions of the rules applying to non-distribution firms. The changes proposed for distribution firms are similar but less extensive. As now, they will be required to meet a net margin test on their whole business. In applying the net margin test, they will have the same choice of base period as other firms. However, because of this flexibility, they will be permitted to earn only 95 per cent of the base margin rather than 100 per cent as now. The gross margin test will be 100 per cent of their base year margins as now, but will be applied to product lines rather than on an over-all basis. Distribution firms with low base margins will also have access to the provision for a minimum rate of return.

Certain other changes in the regulations which affect the construction industry, trappers, fur farmers and the land development business are outlined in the supplementary information.

I also wish to announce certain changes in the rule referred to as the "restricted expenses" provision. This provision places a limit on the extent to which increases in certain expenses are allowed as costs. Political contributions will be added to the list of expenses subject to this restriction. On the other hand, charitable donations and approved expenditures for research and development will be removed from the list of restricted expenses.

It should be emphasized that the new rules represent a logical and evolutionary development of the present rules relating to prices and profits. They will ensure that the pricing behaviour of firms will be consistent with the general price targets which we have set for ourselves, without reliance on arbitrary powers of direction.

I have asked the Anti-Inflation Board to release as soon as possible a draft of the regulations incorporating all these changes. In order to ensure that the new rules will operate as smoothly and as effectively as possible, they will not become operative until July. Appropriate transitional provisions will be included in the new regulations.

There is one further aspect of the program which requires consideration. Out of a concern to ensure that all income increases were restrained, the rules have prohibited companies from increasing their dividends, except in special circumstances, for the first year of the program. Obviously, this freeze cannot be extended indefinitely. Hence, effective October 15, 1976 and thereafter until further notice, companies will be permitted to increase their annual dividends by 8 per cent.

Before I leave the subject of the prices and incomes policy, Mr. Speaker, let me pay tribute to all those in the private sector and in government who have worked so hard in this major national effort. We are particularly indebted to the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, Chairman of the Board, Mrs. Beryl Plumptre, Vice-Chairman, and other members of the Board and its staff, who have applied impressive skills and complete dedication to their tasks. Provincial ministers of all political parties and officials have given us both their support and valuable advice. I know that all involved feel sustained by the knowledge that the great majority of Canadians are solidly behind them.

Structural Policies

Beyond the introduction of a temporary program of controls, the White Paper of last October drew attention to the need for underlying structural adjustments in our economy. Such adjustments are essential if we are to win out against persistent inflation. In many ways, this is much the most difficult terrain of all. It raises fundamental problems of how to assure the most effective functioning of our mixed economy, and how to grapple with those social and institutional forces which make for continuous upward pressure on the general price level. These are the broad objectives which we must seek in looking forward to the removal of controls and in the post-controls period and beyond.

The government's work in this connection will be much advanced by the time of the opening of the next session of parliament, and we anticipate a wide-ranging public dialogue. In addition to the central focus of debate in parliament, the government is looking forward to meeting with all major groups in the community.

Mr. Clark: That will start next New Year's.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In that connection, preparations are already underway to meet the Canadian Labour Congress. The statement issued at the recent convention of the Congress makes clear its determination to press its views and interests in the formulation of social and economic policy in this country. The views and interests of all groups in our society must be heard. While government cannot abdicate its responsibilities, the growing complexity of our society requires that there should be every opportunity for consultation and the reconciliation of differing interests.

● (2040)

At this time, I propose to touch upon only those structural problems where immediate initiatives are being taken.

Energy Pricing

The first of these is in regard to energy prices—particularly oil and natural gas. The main message of the government's recent paper "Energy Strategy for Canada" is clear—energy is becoming more costly in the world and in Canada. The full impact of this trend on Canadians has been moderated thus far by our national policies for oil and gas. But Canada still has a long way to go in economizing in the use of energy and in developing new energy supplies.

The government has recognized the necessity of allowing prices of oil and gas to rise at a measured pace toward world levels. The need to encourage production and conservation and to ease the fiscal burden on the government points toward larger and faster increases of energy prices. But the need to slow down the rate of inflation, sustain output and employment and limit the immediate burdens on families of moderate means points toward smaller and slower increases. Regional considerations have to be balanced as well.

Having regard to all these considerations, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), has announced that the wellhead price of oil in Canada will increase by $1.05 per barrel on July 1, 1976 and by a further 70 cents on January 1, 1977. Natural gas prices will continue to be set on the basis of 85 per cent of the energy equivalent of oil. The price of natural gas delivered to Toronto will rise by 15.5 cents per mcf on July 1, 1976 and by a further 10 cents on January 1, 1977. There will be some delay before consumers feel the impact of each of these changes. I might note that the increase in revenues to the oil and gas producing provinces will result in higher equalization payments by the federal government to lower-income consuming provinces. Their increase over the 12 months beginning this July will be about $60 million.

I would like to emphasize the broad range of the policies followed by the government to encourage energy conservation and the development of new supplies. In order to discourage private use of gasoline and to help defray the cost of the import subsidy, a special federal excise tax was introduced last June. I will be announcing further new measures tonight to reinforce the energy conservation program developed by the energy minister. The government is strongly committed to active programs of oil and gas exploration and development through its participation in Panarctic, Syncrude, Petro-Canada and the Canada Development Corporation. The new northern oil and gas regulations are designed to speed up exploration and development. The income tax régime which we have evolved in recent years has provided major incentives for exploration. I would stress that for every dollar that the price of oil and gas goes up, the federal government will receive only three cents in income tax if producing firms make full use of the incentives for exploration. Further incentives are provided in this budget.

The Pricing of Government Services

A second important area for structural adjustment relates to the question of the pricing of government services.

The high rates of cost increase of recent years have led to rapidly growing deficits in the financing of many of these services. This has meant that only part of the costs have been covered by the users of the service, with the balance borne by the general taxpayer. In the absence of necessary adjustments in charges, the cost borne by the general taxpayer will continue to increase. This prospect of increasing deficits carries with it financial and economic implications which are particularly important over the longer term.

On the financial side, the growing cost to government can be met only through government borrowing or through increases in the level of general taxation. There are obvious limits to the extent to which the borrowing route can or should be followed. A further general tax increase may give rise to as much pressure on the general level of prices as an increase in specific charges. While careful attention has to be given to the objectives of the anti-inflation program, undue delay in needed price increases will simply enlarge the deficits and make it harder to pay our way in the future.

In economic terms, if prices charged do not adequately reflect real costs there will be a tendency towards inefficiency and waste in the use of the country's resources. Heavy subsidies erode the incentive for the development of more efficient ways of providing service. We must therefore encourage greater cost consciousness, not only in the provision of these services, but also in their use.

In recent months a number of provinces, confronted with large and growing deficits on particular services and in their over-all budgetary positions, have felt impelled to increase user charges. The federal government also faces rapidly growing deficits on a number of general and specialized services. Heavy transportation subsidies are being examined to ensure that they serve a social purpose without impeding the development of efficient systems.

In the case of the post office, my colleague the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), last week announced necessary increases in postal rates. These increases have to be implemented in view of the rapidly accelerating deficit on Post Office operations, which has grown from less than $100 million in 1971 to an expected level of some $700 million this fiscal year in the absence of the rate adjustment. The proportion of costs borne by users of the Post Office has declined from 88 per cent in 1971 to less than 50 per cent this year. The effect of the rate changes will be to retard but not reverse the growth of the postal deficit. For the next fiscal year, the new postal rate structure will mean that the over-all deficit will be some $200 million less than it otherwise would be.

The Efficiency of the Economy

The productivity of the Canadian economy declined in both 1974 and 1975. While some decline is typical of a recession, this experience has raised concerns that the underlying growth of productivity—which is the basis for rising standards of living—may be slowing down.

Lest we jump to conclusions too quickly, we should recognize that there are particular problems of measuring productivity, especially in the service industries, which are becoming ever more important. But there can be no doubt of the importance of rising productivity and efficiency if we are to achieve our economic and social goals in the longer run. The government is giving urgent attention to the whole range of policies which can be brought to bear in fostering productivity.

Many measures have already been put in place to stimulate capital investment. I am thinking particularly of the manufacturing incentives, the investment tax credit introduced in the last budget and the various programs by which the government provides financing directly for energy development, transportation, small business, farming and fishing. These measures have helped to sustain high levels of business investment in Canada. However, the encouragement of business investment is only one part of a productivity policy which must be concerned with encouraging greater efficiency in the use of all factors of production.

A major objective in pressing ahead with the development of our competition policy is to promote efficiency. I will be announcing tonight a further extension of the tax concession to small Canadian businesses to enable them to grow and compete more effectively with large firms. Our negotiators at Geneva are pressing for the further liberalization of trade. This will provide more opportunities for Canadian industry and encourage it to improve its efficiency. The government will be ready to help.

[English]

One of the best ways to increase productivity is to encourage the development of high technology and innovative new processes. This is a high-risk business and it is difficult to attract venture capital into it. However, it is one which is of great potential for improving the growth rate of the economy.

The federal government already contributes to this process both through a variety of direct expenditure programs and through existing incentives in the tax system. Nevertheless, it has been proposed that more assistance is needed and that the best way to provide this encouragement is through additional tax incentives. It is argued that this catalyst is needed to bring together pools of venture capital and Canadians with new and innovative ideas.

I am sympathetic with these objectives and am willing to explore avenues to achieve them. However, I am not satisfied that we have yet found an efficient and workable solution to what is commonly referred to as the venture capital problem. Clearly, what is needed is a tax regime which will help do the job effectively but efficiently.

I have already instructed my officials to study this matter on a priority basis. I intend to consult with the provinces to gain the benefit of their thinking and work in this area. I am also anxious to hear from people who are interested in and knowledgeable about this issue and I invite Canadians to write in their proposals. If we can find the right answers, we will be quick to act.

Finally, to refer to another important part of the financial system, the government's proposals on the decennial revision of the Bank Act will be brought to the House later in the year. This will afford us an occasion for broad consideration of the task of financing the Canadian economy.

Employment and the Labour Force

We have of course a special interest in improving the functioning of the labour market in Canada. The Economic Council's recent study, entitled "People and Jobs", provides valuable insights into the structural problems of employment and unemployment in Canada. It analyzes the flows of people into and out of the labour force, from job to job and between unemployment and employment. This analysis documents the tremendous size and complexity of labour market change which takes place in Canada each year. Structural and frictional unemployment, which arises in this process of change, has increased substantially in Canada during the last decade. It reflects both institutional changes and the increased participation of youth and women in the work force. Better information on job opportunities, improved training and creation of the right kind of jobs are important means of reducing structural and frictional unemployment. The Council's study recognizes that manpower and direct employment policies and the unemployment insurance program have all made useful contributions toward dealing with these problems. It concludes, however, that all of them can and should be improved.

Unemployment arises not only from structural change but also from fluctuations in economic growth. The primary means of reducing unemployment due to periods of slow growth lies in the maintenance of adequate over-all demand. However, the experience of many countries in recent years underlines the danger of setting targets for unemployment too low or trying to reach them too quickly. If we are to sustain economic growth and job creation while simultaneously bringing down the rate of inflation, demand management policies and policies to improve the functioning of the labour market must go hand in hand.

Canada has been a leader in the recent development of direct employment programs. These programs have created jobs to alleviate the most severe problems of seasonal and regional unemployment. They have assisted those groups which are most likely to be without work for periods of time. We believe we have demonstrated that these jobs can have broad social value and are not simply "make-work". We continue to believe that there is a need for such selective programs of job creation if we are to be able to bring the rate of unemployment down without generating new inflationary pressure. They have to be adapted to the changing structure of the labour market, and to the need to obtain the maximum impact from the limited resources which can be made available within the framework of expenditure control.

Last year's budget speech noted that the continuing review of the unemployment insurance legislation had identified a need to strengthen certain aspects of this program. To meet these needs, a number of changes were incorporated in Bill C-69, which has now become law. During the debate on this bill, it was noted that further changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act would be brought forward as the review progressed. As a result of this review, my colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), will introduce legislation proposing a number of significant initiatives. These changes are designed to make the unemployment insurance system more equitable and dynamic, more responsive to regional unemployment conditions, and less costly. They are also designed to encourage those with jobs to stay with them and those who are unemployed to seek suitable jobs.

Three main changes will be introduced relating to unemployment insurance benefits:

First, the present requirement for eight weeks of insured employment to qualify for benefits will be increased to 12 weeks. This amendment is intended to reflect the changes which have taken place in the Canadian labour market in recent years. These include the increase in the number of people who have only a marginal attachment to the labour force and who thus have less of a claim for the protection of unemployment insurance.

Second, the number of weeks during which benefits may be drawn will be more directly related to the number of weeks worked. In addition, regional extended benefits will be related in a more sensitive manner to the level of regional unemployment.

Third, severance pay will be treated as savings and as such will not affect a person's eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits.

The act will also be amended to permit the payment of unemployment insurance to beneficiaries on a discretionary basis where they take part in such activities as selective employment, training or short-time work programs. My colleague will elaborate on this new concept of adding an important thrust to the over-all insurance system.

The Minister will also elaborate proposals to integrate the administration of the unemployment insurance system with the programs and services of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. We believe the time is ripe to have a common organizational setting in order to promote even greater effectiveness in administration and to enhance the quality of employment services to Canadian workers.

Federal-Provincial Fiscal Relations

Finally, Mr. Speaker, a basic structural element in this country is the financial relationship between the federal and provincial governments. We are engaged at present with the provinces in discussion of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act and shared-cost programs.

My views on the fiscal arrangements that should apply in the post-1977 period are on record. They were discussed with my provincial counterparts at the April 1 meeting, and tabled in the House on the same day. Thus I can simply note the way in which our position fits in with our overall policy.

I want to preserve the principle that the federal and provincial governments should be free, in their taxing and spending activities, to discharge their respective constitutional responsibilities. On the revenue side this means access to sufficient fiscal resources. There is, of course, a need for a great co-operative effort if we are to maintain a uniform national tax system. But fiscal freedom and responsibility are also essential for the control of expenditures and the efficient provision of public services.

Equalization payments must be retained as a continuing and central feature of the ongoing system of fiscal arrangements. We are committed to this. Our objective is to help the less affluent provinces provide reasonable levels of service. But equalization and other transfers to provinces impose a heavy burden on Canadian taxpayers generally. Costs must be kept within acceptable bounds and the ability of the federal government to finance the program through its own revenue sources must be protected.

Over the past 10 to 15 years, shared-cost programs have been a major instrument in the development of a high level of public services across the entire country. In such fields as health care, social welfare and post-secondary education, Canadian citizens have benefitted greatly from these programs. However, as some of these programs have matured, the financing and administrative arrangements built into them have not left enough room for improvements and efficiencies. As a result, costs threaten to outrun the financial capacities of both the federal and provincial governments. For the federal government, these open-ended cost-sharing arrangements have raised many problems in the allocation of limited funds for national needs and priorities. A better method of providing these essential services to the Canadian people needs to be found and, to this end, discussions have been held between the federal government and the provinces. They will continue as a matter of high priority.

[English]

Government Expenditure Policy

I come now to the third principal element of the anti-inflation program—the limitation of the growth of government expenditure and of public service employment.

In recognition of the widespread feeling among Canadians that present circumstances demand restraint in government spending, the government has stated that the "trend in total spending by all governments in Canada should not rise more quickly than the trend in gross national product." Two aspects of this objective should be stressed.

First, it is not put forward as a short-term goal: a brief slowdown in the rate of expenditure growth to be followed by a resumption of excessive growth. Rather, it is put forward as a basic change in the trend of expenditure increase. This guideline is stated in terms of trends in view of the stabilizing role which actual government expenditure should play as the GNP grows more quickly or more slowly than its trend in any particular year. In a period of slow growth, it may be appropriate for government expenditure to rise more rapidly than GNP. In a period of strong economic expansion government expenditures should grow more slowly than GNP.

Second, the objective does not imply an indiscriminate slashing of programs. Such an approach would have disruptive effects on the economy, bear harshly on many people and impair the efficiency of government in providing essential services to the public.

Our objective, then, is to achieve a major shift in the pace of growth of the government sector, in a deliberate, sustained fashion. This lay behind the cuts in planned expenditures for the 1975-76 fiscal year announced in the last budget, and the cuts in planned expenditures for this fiscal year announced by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), on December 18. It was made clear on both occasions that unavoidable cost escalation in a number of programs had made such action necessary. We have recognized the need for action not just in the government's own manpower and operating expenses but also in major program areas. Some grant programs have been eliminated completely and strict ceilings have been imposed on many others. Measures have been taken to reduce the cost of unemployment insurance to the taxpayer. Ceilings have been placed on the growth in the federal contribution under certain federal-provincial shared-cost programs. Government financing of Crown corporations has been curtailed and in this regard, we have decided upon a further deferral of the proposed Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation.

To achieve our expenditure control objectives, the introduction of new programs must be kept within careful limits and the resources required for the continued operation of existing programs must be minimized. A number of recent developments should help us achieve this goal and help parliament and the public monitor progress. One of the few areas in which provision has recently been made for a significant increase in staff is in the Office of the Auditor General. I trust the expanded capacity of this office will encourage the efficient use of resources by departments. In a report tabled last year, the Auditor General expressed concern over the adequacy of certain aspects of the government's system of financial management. The government is responding to these recommendations by establishing a separate branch of the Treasury Board secretariat responsible for all aspects of financial management. Additional changes have been made which will strengthen the effectiveness of the Treasury Board through centralizing responsibility for control of outlays in its hands. The Treasury Board itself is reviewing all proposals for increased expenditure before they are approved by cabinet.

In our expenditure planning, we have focused on total outlays, including both budgetary expenditures and loans, investments and advances. Total outlays increased by 28 per cent in 1974-75 and 18 per cent in 1975-76. I should note that the preliminary estimates of total outlays for 1975-76 are somewhat higher than the President of the Treasury Board and I expected earlier this year. A major contributing factor was a decision to permit our enterprises engaged in energy and export development to obtain financing from us somewhat earlier than had been anticipated. While this has increased the growth rate of expenditures in 1975-76, it has helped to reduce it in 1976-77. Based upon planned total outlays of $42,150 million, our target rate of increase for this fiscal year works out at about 14 per cent. Our forward planning for 1977-78 is based on a growth rate of the order of 11 per cent. For both 1976-77 and 1977-78, these increases are less than the expected growth of the GNP.

I wish to remind the House that my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, is holding the increase in the public service to 1.5 per cent this fiscal year. This is substantially below the growth rates of earlier years. Given the need to add significant numbers of policemen, prison guards and postmen to the payroll and the need to maintain other essential protective and regulatory services in a growing economy, the strict manpower ceiling is requiring most departments to freeze or actually reduce the number of employees in less essential services.

It is a fact of life that the scope for expenditure control increases as one looks further into the future. It proved very difficult to cut back on our expenditures in 1975-76 once the year was already underway. We have been able to get on track for 1976-77. We hope to consolidate our gains in 1977-78. We believe we have put in place the planning and control systems which will ensure that these targets are met.

Fiscal and Monetary Policy

Finally, the anti-inflation program requires that fiscal and monetary policy be aimed at increasing total demand and production only at a rate consistent with declining inflation. In the White Paper of October 14 I stated that "the success of the government's whole program for achieving a progressive lowering of the rate of inflation, together with a sustained recovery of the growth output and employment, will depend crucially on its success in keeping the over-all level of demand in the economy growing at a pace consistent with successively lower rates of price increase."

The monetary policy of the Bank of Canada has been set out by the governor in his 1975 Annual Report and in recent speeches. It carries my full support. Last autumn the Bank announced an initial target for the growth of the narrowly-defined money supply in the range from 10 to less than 15 per cent and the rate of increase since the second quarter of 1975 is now at the lower end of the range. The Bank has indicated that its target range, which allows for the continued real growth of the economy, will have to be lowered over time so that the rate of monetary expansion will be consistent with the price-level objectives of the prices and incomes policy.

This monetary policy, in its refusal to underwrite continuing high rates of inflation, is helping to destroy expectations that they will continue. It requires that we should expect variations in interest rates and the exchange rate. While we would all like to see lower interest rates, the way to bring them about is to reduce inflation. In the most recent years, the level of interest rates has not been high enough to maintain the real value of the money which Canadians have deposited in banks or invested in Canada Savings Bonds or other financial assets. The strengthening of the exchange value of the Canadian dollar, due in no small measure to high domestic interest rates, has increased the challenge faced by Canadian firms competing in world markets. At the same time, it has lowered the cost of the goods and services we buy from other countries and has thereby contributed directly to the success of the anti-inflation program.

The goal of fiscal policy is the same as that of monetary policy—to manage the increase in demand in a way which is consistent with moderate real growth and a decline in the rate of inflation. In present circumstances, this can best be achieved by maintaining close control over the rise in government spending. As I have stressed, our expenditure targets over the next two years involve a commitment to keep the growth of expenditures below the growth of the GNP. However, our revenues will grow more rapidly than GNP because of the very nature of the tax system. The financial requirements will therefore decline.

The deficits of both the federal government and the provincial governments reached record levels in 1975. I have already observed that this was entirely appropriate, and made a major contribution to protecting Canadians against the full force of the world recession. But now that the recovery is well established and private spending is rising, it is equally appropriate that these record deficits should recede.

It would be possible to pursue more restrictive fiscal and monetary policies and rely less upon controls in the battle against inflation. Those who advocate such a course emphasize the adverse effects of controls, in terms of interfering with private enterprise and collective bargaining, discouraging productivity, and creating inequities. We are conscious of these drawbacks and have sought to minimize them. Let there be no doubt as to our desire to remove the price and income controls as soon as possible. But we will not do so at the cost of high unemployment or of undue burdens on the weakest members of society. A more restrictive fiscal and monetary policy would undoubtedly cause unemployment to rise even higher than it is at present. Those who advocate that we slash government expenditure, raise taxes or cut even further into the growth of the money supply in order to get rid of the controls program, betray a shocking indifference to the problem of unemployment.

The other extreme would be to inject more stimulus into the economy by fiscal and monetary means in order to bring unemployment down faster, and to contain the resulting inflationary pressure by relying more upon controls. I doubt if many Canadians would want us to go down that road, and even if we tried we would surely fail. A clear lesson of history is that controls cannot be made to work in peacetime in the face of excess pressures of demand. They have to be supported by careful and moderate fiscal and monetary policy.

Some would prefer us not only of follow a more expansionary fiscal and monetary policy in order to reduce unemployment, but also to abandon the controls program. To accept that counsel is to accept all the agonies of inflation. In the not-very-long run we would all be victims. The rising tide of inflation would inflict severe damage on the economic system, further weaken our competitive position and impair our chances of creating satisfying and well-paid jobs for our growing labour force.

We believe that the problems of unemployment and inflation must be solved together. We cannot solve one of them at the expense of the other. We do not believe that the people of this country want us to try to beat inflation down by creating massive unemployment. Nor would they thank us for trying to lower unemployment at the cost of a renewed outburst of double-digit inflation.

Budget Measures

Before turning to specific measures, I would like to raise with hon. members a parliamentary issue which has long been of interest to me. I refer to the process by which budgets are brought forward and dealt with in the House.

By time-honoured custom, a budget is the primary occasion on which the government reports to parliament on the state of the economy and its own fiscal position, and proposes changes in taxation and other aspects of economic policy. But I believe the time has come to consider whether some of the long-standing traditions that surround the budgetary process should be modified to serve better the needs of today.

Two aspects of the budgetary process require particular study. The first is the strict rule of secrecy that applies to the budget prior to its introduction. The second is the procedure for consideration of the budget proposals following their introduction in parliament.

The tradition of budget secrecy has two grounds. It is intended to deny to anyone financial advantage from advance information. And it is intended to ensure that important statements of government economic policy are disclosed first to members of the House of Commons. Both of these reasons are valid and important, but it would be helpful to clarify the precise obligations imposed on the Minister of Finance by this long-standing tradition.

The procedures followed in dealing with the budgetary proposals after their introduction also deserve re-examination. It has been the recent custom to table very detailed Ways and Means Motions on budget night. The intent has been to make public the greatest possible information about the nature of legislation contemplated by the government. Under present House rules, however, this approach has not left enough scope to take account, in the ultimate legislation, of post-budget discussion in the House and in the country.

Some of the Ways and Means Motions I am introducing tonight are written in more general language so that we will be in a better position to make any necessary modifications in the bills that follow. I will look forward to hearing the views of hon. members and others on this innovation and their suggestions for dealing with the budget measures in the House.

For example, study might be given to the way in which parliament deals with changes in income tax legislation which are of a purely technical nature. A further question is whether there is a better way of giving the full force of law to Ways and Means Motions which come immediately into effect.

In this respect I would intend to seek the guidance of my colleague, the House Leader, as to the best way in which to achieve a re-examination by members of the procedures we have followed for so many years.

[Translation]

I should like now to deal with certain tariff changes. Honourable Members will recall that in February, 1973, tariffs were cut on a wide range on consumer products in order to moderate upward pressures on prices. These reductions were originally introduced for one year only but most were subsequently renewed until June 30, 1976.

To ensure that Canadian tariff policy continues to make an appropriate contribution to the fight against inflation, I am proposing tonight that these temporary tariff reductions, with two exceptions, be extended for another year. In the food sector, reductions are being continued on such products as canned meats, prepared cereal foods, biscuits, certain fresh vegetables and raw and refined sugar. In the non-food sector, products on which reductions are being extended include drugs and pharmaceutical products, plumbing fixtures, kitchen and dinnerware, hand tools, photographic equipment and sporting goods.

I am also proposing that temporary tariff cuts be made on several other food products, including fresh pork, ham, bacon and macaroni.

I have considered carefully the implications which continuation of these temporary tariff reductions might have for our position in the GATT negotiations. I have concluded that their extension until June 30, 1977, would not prejudice our position. The tariff reductions are, of course, temporary and will not be the base from which we will be negotiating in Geneva. We intend to ensure that we achieve over-all reciprocity between what we offer and what we receive by way of benefits in these negotiations.

I believe all of these steps can be taken without causing injury. In case unforeseen problems do arise, authority is again being sought to permit withdrawal by Order in Council of any of these temporary tariff reductions which in fact have serious effects on employment or production in Canada. However, I have concluded that the existing temporary reductions on tires and tubes and on scissors should be allowed to expire on June 30 in order to avoid hardship to Canadian firms and their employees.

Details of the reductions proposed are to be found in the Ways and Means Motion. The motion also provides for a few other amendments to the Customs Tariff.

[English]

I have received a number of representations from Canadian machinery manufacturers alleging that the 2½ per cent British Preferential rate has been causing them considerable difficulties. They have urged that machinery imported from Britain be made dutiable at the 15 per cent Most-Favoured-Nation rate. Canada is no longer obliged to accord preferential treatment to Britain or Ireland following their accession to the European Economic Community. In light of these representations, I am directing officials of my department to carry out an intensive study of the situation and to report to me on the operation of the present tariff provisions governing the importation of different types of machinery.

However, there is a particular need to withdraw now the preferential rate on compressor and electricity generating sets. I am, therefore, proposing that imports of such equipment from Britain and Ireland be made subject to the 15 per cent tariff immediately. When such machinery is not available from Canadian sources, the duty can be remitted under the machinery program.

Tax Measures

Mr. Speaker, I turn now to the specific tax measures I am proposing tonight. They will not produce a significant net change in revenues, but they will significantly reinforce the policies of the government.

• (2120)

Energy Conservation

The following measures will help achieve the government's overall objectives for energy conservation recently announced by the Energy Minister.

I am proposing to expand the present two-year fast write-off to include certain types of equipment which contribute to the efficient use of energy resources. The list includes equipment which enables industrial waste to be used as a fuel source and equipment which produces energy from municipal waste. This measure will apply to assets acquired after tonight and before 1980.

I am also proposing immediate removal of the federal sales tax from a number of items which contribute directly to the development of energy sources other than fossil fuels. Included in this list are such items as solar furnaces and heating panels, wind-powered generating equipment, and heat pumps.

Further tax measures to deter wasteful consumption of energy are proposed. Studies indicate that motor vehicle air conditioners increase fuel consumption by as much as 20 per cent. Consequently, effective tonight the budget introduces a specific excise tax of $100 on air conditioners for use in automobiles, station wagons, vans and smaller trucks.

In addition, I am proposing significant increases in the special excise tax on high-energy consuming motor vehicles. This will be accomplished in two ways. First, the weight threshold above which the tax takes effect will be reduced over a four-year period to 3,500 pounds from 4,500 pounds for cars and to 3,700 pounds from 5,100 pounds for station wagons. The annual reductions will be 250 pounds for cars and 350 pounds for station wagons, commencing this August.

Second, the applicable rate will be increased. Effective August 1 of this year the rate will be $30 for the first 100 pounds, $40 for the second 100 pounds, $50 for the third 100 pounds and $60 for each subsequent 100 pounds. The full effect of these changes as of August 1, 1979 will result in a tax of $1,020 on a car weighing 5,300 pounds. The purpose of the tax is not to raise revenue but to encourage Canadians to demand and the auto industry to produce lighter, more energy-efficient cars.

The timetable for the imposition of this higher tax dovetails with that for achievement of gasoline consumption standards for new cars recently announced by the Energy Minister. Both provide time required by the auto industry to adjust its production toward smaller cars.

Resource Taxation

As we are all aware, both the federal and provincial governments have had some very difficult decisions to make in recent years concerning our petroleum and mining industries.

I believe it is important to maintain a stable tax system for these industries and I am not proposing any significant changes affecting them. I am encouraged to see that the provinces, which impose by far the larger fiscal burden on the resource sector, are offering significant new incentives to seek out new reserves or to enhance recoverability from known reserves.

However, I feel the federal government can make an additional input to help encourage this exploration activity. Historically, our tax system has distinguished between those whose principal business is resource oriented and other taxpayers. Principal-business taxpayers have been permitted to claim their exploration costs at a rate of 100 per cent whereas other taxpayers have been able to write them off at a rate of only 30 per cent per year. In an effort to attract funds from Canadians for resource exploration which is so critical in our national development, I am proposing that all taxpayers be allowed to write off immediately 100 per cent of their exploration costs incurred after tonight and before July 1, 1979. This three-year period will provide an opportunity to determine the effectiveness of this new incentive.

I am also introducing an amendment to make it clear that no federal tax will be payable on moneys received under provincial incentives for drilling and exploration.

Air Transportation Tax

I am proposing to extend the Air Transportation Tax. At present, the tax applies only to air transportation purchased in Canada. An estimated 2.3 million travellers using Canadian airports annually do not now pay the tax, because they purchase their tickets outside the country. We propose to amend the Excise Tax Act to extend the tax to these travellers.

It is our intention to consult with the air carriers, other interested persons and foreign governments concerning potential problems of defining and administering the change before tabling a Ways and Means Motion in the House. Consequently, this evening I am only announcing the broad outlines of the extension.

Capital Cost Allowances

The government has been making an intensive review of the Canadian system of capital cost allowances—that is, the system under which a taxpayer claims the cost of depreciable assets as a deduction against his income. The analysis has now reached the point where I am able to present certain conclusions to the House and to propose some changes.

The main conclusion reached is that our system of capital cost allowances is basically sound. It is not out of line with systems in other industrial countries. It is easy for the Canadian taxpayer to apply, and in a time of growing complexity in tax legislation, certainty and simplicity are not to be under-rated.

Our review to date has indicated, however, that some changes in the rates should be made. These changes, which will be made by regulation and which will apply to assets acquired after tonight, are outlined in the budget papers I have tabled. However, I would like to comment on a few of the more important ones.

It has become evident that because of rapidly changing technology in computers, the present capital cost allowance rate of 20 per cent is inappropriately low. I am therefore proposing that the rate for computer hardware and the related systems software be increased to 30 per cent, and that the rate for other types of software be increased to 100 per cent.

Other assets for which increases in rates are proposed include taxis, roads, runways and offshore drilling platforms.

On the other hand, our review has shown that the present rate of 40 per cent provided for aircraft is unnecessarily high and I am proposing that it be reduced to 25 per cent.

Other rate reductions are proposed for radio, television and radar equipment, electrical generating equipment, earth-moving equipment, and leased advertising signs.

Mr. Speaker, the government does not intend that capital cost allowances be available for unwarranted use by taxpayers as a means of sheltering income from its fair burden of taxation. With this objective in mind, I am proposing that a new limit be introduced to prevent the creation of tax losses by claiming capital cost allowance on the leasing of moveable property. Specifically, taxpayers will not be allowed to claim capital cost allowances on leased equipment in excess of their net rental income from that type of property. This new limit will apply to both individuals and corporations in respect of moveable property acquired and leased after today.

[Translation]

I refer now to the tax treatment of small business in this country.

Canadian-controlled private corporations are entitled to pay tax at a reduced rate subject to an annual and a cumulative limit on their profits. For 1972 and 1973 those limits were $50,000 per annum up to $400,000 in total. In 1974, those limits were raised to $100,000 per annum up to a cumulative total of $500,000. Effective for 1976 and subsequent taxation years, I would like to announce a further increase of those limits to $150,000 per annum up to a cumulative total of $750,000. This measure will significantly benefit our small and medium-sized Canadian-controlled corporations.

Charities

With last June's budget, discussion papers were tabled on federal sales and excise taxation, and on the taxation of charities. With respect to the former, our study of the matter is still in progress. With respect to charities, I am now in a position to present concrete proposals to Parliament. Full details will be found in the material I am tabling tonight, but I would like to mention a few of the more important changes.

● (2130)

One important objective of the review was to rationalize the classification of charities for tax purposes. Under the proposed legislation, all charities will have to be registered in order to retain their tax-free status. Registered charities will be divided into two new groups—charitable organizations and charitable foundations. Charitable foundations will be subdivided into public foundations and private foundations.

Under the present rules, technically no charity can carry on a business. Nonetheless, many charities do indeed carry on worth-while fund-raising activities which might be construed as business activities. I see no reason to alter this situation as it exists in practice. On the contrary, I want to bring the law into conformity with the current standards of the community. The new rules, therefore, will permit a charitable organization or public foundation to carry on a business activity if it is related to the charitable objectives of the charity or if it is operated substantially by volunteers.

In the discussion paper, a proposal was made which would require private foundations to pay out annually an amount equal to the greater of 90 per cent of their annual income or 5 per cent of the fair market value of their assets. This rule was designed to ensure that charitable activities received some reasonable level of benefit from foundations enjoying tax advantages. As a result of representations received, this proposal will be implemented but in a modified manner. The 5 per cent requirement will not be applicable to "qualified investments" such as publicly listed securities. There will also be a phase-in period to permit existing private foundations to adjust to this new rule.

Proposals were also put forward to deregister charities which incur excessive fund-raising costs. There was virtual unanimity in the submissions that such a rule is needed. Charitable organizations and public foundations will be required to distribute or utilize in charitable activities at least 80 per cent of the funds for which they have issued receipts for tax purposes. There will be a transition period during which the required pay-out will be lower.

The discussion paper also proposed that all registered charities disclose publicly certain aspects of their finances and charitable activities. These proposals received widespread support and will be incorporated in the amending legislation.

I should be remiss if I did not thank the charities themselves and other interested persons for their substantial contribution to this exercise. Many of them presented lengthy and thoughtful briefs. Their views have been carefully considered and account for many of the modifications I have made to the original proposals.

Personal Income Tax

The budget tonight also provides for a number of significant amendments to the Income Tax Act affecting individuals.

As part of tax reform, working women and single-parent fathers were permitted to deduct part of the cost of child care from their earned income. The maximum deduction allowed under this provision was $15 per week per child and $500 per year per child, to a total annual maximum of $2,000 per family. I have received many representations that these figures are now too low. Therefore, I am pleased to announce that commencing with the 1976 taxation year the limits will be doubled to $30 per week per child and $1,000 per year per child with a total maximum annual limit of $4,000. An amendment will also be made to allow such deductions to be claimed against income from research grants and adult training allowances.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

I would like to mention an amendment relating to disabled children. At present, a disabled taxpayer is allowed to deduct the amount of $1,000, which is indexed. Effective with the 1976 taxation year, the unused portion of this deduction will be transferable from a disabled dependent child to the parent who claims him or her as a dependant. Because few such children have any income, the effect of this change will be to give supporting individuals a significant deduction in respect of dependent disabled children.

I would also like to outline certain amendments relating to deferred income plans. The government introduced these tax incentives to encourage Canadians to make provision for their retirement years and thus to foster national saving. The limits under all of these plans were substantially increased in 1972 as part of tax reform. Since then, inflation has reduced the real value of these limits.

I am therefore proposing further increases tonight. For the 1976 and subsequent taxation years, the maximum annual amount deductible by employees and employers in respect of a registered pension plan will be increased from $2,500 to $3,500. The same limits will apply to registered retirement savings plans where the beneficiary is also a member of a pension plan, and to employer contributions to a deferred profit-sharing plan. Where the beneficiary under a registered retirement savings plan is not a member of a pension plan, the maximum contribution limit will be increased from the present $4,000 to $5,500.

Finally, in respect of deferred income plans, I am proposing an amendment to the provisions dealing with registered home ownership savings plans which will allow taxpayers to shift plans from one institution to another. This means that if taxpayers move from place to place or if they are dissatisfied with the return they are earning there will be no barrier to finding a replacement and transferring their funds.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members are aware of the widespread concern that is now evident regarding the complexity of the Income Tax Act and of the income tax return. As a first step to improve this situation, I am proposing certain amendments which will contribute to a simplification of the returns for the 1976 and subsequent taxation years.

Apart from these important structural changes, there will be no significant decreases, or increases, in the personal income tax.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I am proposing a number of technical changes to the Income Tax Act and to other taxing statutes, details of which are contained in the Ways and Means Motions.

The supplementary material shows the estimated revenue impact of the various measures on a full-year basis. The tax and tariff measures are expected to cause a net reduction in budgetary revenues of $75 million in the current fiscal year.

The Economic and Fiscal Outlook

Mr. Speaker, the economic policies of the government, strengthened by the measures I have announced tonight, are directed at the achievement of our goals of sustained growth, high employment and price stability.

I anticipate that real growth in 1976 will be about 5 per cent. Our goal of bringing down the year-over-year rate of increase of the consumer price index to 8 per cent by the fourth quarter of 1976 is within our reach. The increase in the GNE price index between 1975 and 1976 is expected to be about 9 per cent. The increase in the nominal value of the GNP in 1976 is expected to be between 14 and 15 per cent.

Employment has been growing quite strongly over the past year and I expect it to continue to grow. I estimate that the Canadian economy will generate more than 250,000 new jobs this year. The broad trend of the unemployment rate has been level for considerable time although there have been erratic month-to-month movements reflecting work stoppages and other temporary factors. I am quite aware of the increase in the unemployment rate reported in April. I assure hon. members that I am keeping the situation under the closest attention. My expectation is that the rate of unemployment will continue the recent level trend in the near term and gradually decline as cyclical expansion takes hold.

The continuing recovery in 1976 will be sustained by the growth of exports in response to recovery in the United States and most overseas industrial countries. I expect that our trade balance will begin to show a significant improvement, bringing about a reduction in the large deficit on goods and services which developed in 1975. Housing expenditures will be strong because of the very high level of starts in recent months. With real incomes rising in response to growing employment and decelerating consumer prices, consumer spending will also be an expansionary force in the economy. Production will have to be incresed in order to rebuild inventories after the heavy liquidation of stocks in 1975. All these factors will outweigh the slowing down of business fixed investment and government spending on goods and services.

The outlook for 1977 is, of course, much more uncertain at this time. The expansion should proceed at a measured pace and the rate of inflation continue to come down. I look to renewed growth in real business fixed investment to help sustain the expansion. I will, of course, wish to review the situation as the outlook for 1977 becomes clearer. If further policy action is needed to keep the economy on the desired track, I will not hesitate to take it.

I now wish to inform the House as to our fiscal position and outlook.

The figures I have tabled on the financial requirements for the fiscal year just ended are still preliminary since the books are not yet closed. More precise information will be available with the publication of the preliminary financial statements in the Canada Gazette this summer.

I should advise that the summary statements of transactions have been modified to bring them into accordance with the recommendations of the report on the Study of the Accounts of Canada, tabled by the chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts on March 9.

On the new basis, the forecast of financial requirements excluding foreign exchange transactions made in the June budget would have amounted to $5 billion. In the event, they amounted to $4.6 billion. I anticipate little change in 1976-77 and a significant decline in 1977-78. These forecasts are based on the expenditure projections which I described earlier and the projected yield of the tax structure as modified by the proposals in this budget.

The government was able to finance the bulk of its requirements in 1975-76 through the sale of securities to the general public rather than to the banking system. Canada Savings Bonds outstanding increased by over $3.6 billion. The general public's holdings of treasury bills and marketable issues increased by over $1 billion. We succeeded in placing long-term marketable securities on a substantial scale with private and institutional investors. The Bank of Canada and the chartered banks increased their holdings only by some $800 million in the fiscal year.

● (2140)

[English]

At the beginning of this fiscal year, our cash balances stood at $3 billion. They could be run down somewhat, and therefore we expect that we will have to borrow rather less money than we did last year. We have been relieved of the necessity of raising about $300 million since the Canadian National Railways and the Export Development Corporation have been authorized as commercial enterprises to exercise their statutory powers to borrow this amount in the capital markets.

It is intended that much of the government's financing will be by the sale of securities to the general public particularly market issues. The purchases of our securities by the banking system will reflect the strength of private loan demand and the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada.

The National Income and Expenditures Accounts are viewed by many as providing a better indicator of the economic impact of the government's transactions. However, they exclude important loans, investments and advances to Crown corporations, other governments and private firms and individuals. A new table extends the National Income and Expenditure Accounts to provide information on these transactions and on the other factors involved in the difference between the National Accounts balance and total financial requirements. This addition also conforms with the recommendations of the Study of the Accounts of Canada.

The National Income and Expenditure Accounts deficit is expected to decline by $900 million to $3.3 billion in 1976-77, and by a further substantial amount in 1977-78. This decline in the National Accounts deficit and the levelling-off of financial requirements in 1976-77 are possible only as a result of continuing efforts to control expenditure growth in a period of cyclical recovery.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, I have provided the House with a full account of the approach of the government to economic policy.

We are still in the critical early stages of the effort to bring the rate of inflation down. Nothing must be done to endanger its success. When there is a solid basis of achievement on the prices front, then we will have greater opportunities for action to maintain the momentum of the recovery. But if we falter in the battle against inflation, we will face the risk of slower real growth and higher unemployment.

Only by bringing the cost-price spiral under control can we solve many of the key problems which confront us. This is what we must do to restore the competitiveness of the Canadian economy, and thereby ensure the continued improvement in our balance of payments and the health of our export and import-competing industries. This is what we must do in order to reduce interest rates, ease the financial pressures on individuals, firms and governments and reduce our reliance on foreign borrowing. This is what we must do in order to restore the sense of confident expectation about the future, so necessary to the growth in investment, the increase in productivity and the rise in our living standards. If we fail to bring the rate of inflation down, we will also fail in our efforts to achieve a sustained reduction in the level of unemployment.

We also believe that the only way to meet these problems is by a deliberate and persistent approach. No miracle drug exists to provide an instant cure to these economic ills. It will take time and patience to restore price stability and a high level of output and employment. This approach is evident in our monetary policy, our fiscal policy, our expenditure policy, our energy policy and our control policy. In all of these fields, drastic action to yield quick results would be highly disruptive, damaging to the interests of the groups most affected and unlikely to be sustainable. It is far better to maintain a steady course in order to restore confidence and enable all groups in society to plan with greater assurance of settled times ahead.

We see ourselves as partners and not as sole proprietors in this enterprise. It is well to remember that in our economy there is not only a recognized role for governments and their enterprises but also a massive and crucial role for private firms, labour unions and a great diversity of other private institutions and associations. If government alone is held responsible for the performance of the economic system, then government will be driven increasingly into the regulation of the private sector, at the cost both of efficiency and of economic freedom. In general we all look to the private sector to deliver the right goods and services to the right place at the right time and the right price. Productivity growth results primarily from the actions of the private sector, not the policies of government. The private sector can expect government to provide a framework of law and economic policy in which it can best function. But government can expect the private sector to operate efficiently, competitively and with due regard to the interest of society within that framework.

Indeed, all Canadians have their roles to play in the achievement of our common economic goals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Where is Joe?

An hon. Member: We want Marcel.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The time allowed for the initial response by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is very limited, and I wonder if he could be given attention.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, John Turner read better than this minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: In the budget which we have just had read to us there was reference to a new system for the presentation of budgets in the future. I sincerely hope there will be a new system because it is intolerable that hon. members on all sides of this House should be tied down to their seats while the minister's press conference is aired on television around the nation.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: It is contemptuous of parliament for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to have used that tactic tonight.

I had hoped that the budget tonight would restore the confidence of Canadians in our future, but it has not. It has not restored the confidence of Canadians, of consumers, of labour, of the businessman or of the investor. The budget fails to achieve that purpose because the present administration is unwilling to make a commitment of 6 per cent real growth in our economy and to cut down on its own spending. If such a commitment were made and fulfilled, we would not only have lower unemployment but we would have less inflation as well.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Stevens: In plain language, this budget anticipates 9.4 per cent inflation this year. If you read it, that is what it is saying.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

• (2150)

Mr. Stevens: It is anticipating unemployment in this nation of some 750,000 Canadians, and it is anticipating a real growth of 5 per cent. Mr. Speaker, the 5 per cent real growth target of the minister represents a lowering of expectations which Canadians are entitled to have fulfilled. That real growth rate of 5 per cent totally ignores the 7 per cent that has been lost over the previous two years as a result of the ineptitude of the government. That 7 per cent in real growth translates into 210,000 extra Canadians being out of work who would not have to be out of work if it were not for the real growth lag.

When John Turner took over the financial portfolio real growth was averaging 6 per cent; when he left, real growth was little better than zero. That reduced rate of growth has exacted its penalty, as I have stated, on job creation. When Mr. Turner took over as minister of finance in January, 1972, there were, seasonally adjusted, 539,000 unemployed; by the time he left last September there were 732,000 unemployed. Now under this minister there are 761,000 unemployed and the figure is likely to rise as a result of this budget tonight. There is little in this budget to relieve unemployment and in fact there are ingredients that may even increase the unemployment with which we are now saddled.

The administration asks for restraint by Canadians. But at a time when most Canadians could only increase their incomes by a maximum of 10 per cent to 12 per cent, at a time when the economy was only to grow at a rate of 13 per cent—you recall it was to be 8 per cent inflation and 5 per cent real growth—at a time when these were the facts we find that the administration has increased its spending by 35 per cent over the last two years.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Grafftey: Leading by example.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, is it any wonder we now have 9.4 per cent inflation rather than the target of 8 per cent we were led to believe it would be only a short while ago?

The spending habits of the administration are so extravagant that federal spending will practically have gone up four times in the last ten years. It took us 100 years to get to a budget of $9.9 billion in 1967, Mr. Speaker; this administration doubled that figure in the next five years, and in the last four years doubled it once again to the present $42 billion spending estimate we have before us and which is confirmed by this budget.

Although the federal government asks all Canadians to participate in the anti-inflation program the administration has carefully excluded itself from participation. The battle against inflation is being fought, first by the Bank of Canada, by keeping monetary growth to a 10 per cent annual rate; second, by the provinces which have kept their average spending increases to 11 per cent; and third, by the private sector, labour and business, who are obeying the Anti-Inflation Board rules.

The weak point in fighting inflation in Canada is with the federal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: If the federal administration persists in spending at current rates while all other groups in society are relatively restrained, the net result will be an even larger share for the federal government in the economy. This may be the single most alarming feature of this budget. Undoubtedly and unfortunately it is the average, individual Canadian who will be paying for this spending spree of the federal government.

There are no meaningful tax cuts, even for the poor, in this budget. I would point out that despite the fact that the federal government proposes to allow another horrendous cash deficit of $4.5 billion this year—the same cash deficit we had last year—Canadians will have to pay more in taxes. The total tax take at the federal level will rise by 18 per cent and falls mainly on the individual Canadian. Under this regime his taxes will go up a startling 25 per cent this year to cover the extravagance of this government.

Turning to deficits, Mr. Speaker, let us look at the inaccurate estimates previously made by the government. Back on November 18, 1974, the former minister of finance totalled the expenditures and revenues and stated the deficit would be $1.5 billion; by June last year he said it would be $3.6 billion, and tonight we find that the deficit as far as this government is concerned is $4.2 billion.

Perhaps the most startling thing of all is that if you add up the aggregate deficit of the government it comes to $11.6 billion, which is four times the amount of deficit of the three previous administrations put together; four times the amount of deficit of the Pearson government, the Diefenbaker government and the St. Laurent government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, that is what this government has the nerve to call restraint. The extravagance and waste of the present administration will unfortunately be paid for by all Canadians, by a growing tax burden, by sustained inflation, by lower expectations and the declining confidence of all, but more about that later.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), that the debate be now adjourned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On motion of Mr. Stevens the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In accordance with previous practice of the House and as a result of the special proceedings of this evening it is, I take it, assumed and agreed that no adjournment proceedings will take place?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: This House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon pursuant to Standing Order.

On motion of Mr. Sharp the House adjourned at 10.01 p.m.

(2) Total outlays are composed of budgetary expenditures plus loans, investments and advances.

Note: This table is not directly comparable to that presented in the June 23, 1975 budget. Since that time, amendments to the Old Age Security Act have resulted in Old Age Security transactions being treated as budgetary rather than non-budgetary. For consistency, they are treated here as budgetary throughout. Also, at the time of the budget, the advance to the Exchange Fund to remit profits was treated as a non-budgetary transaction. This advance is now treated as a foreign exchange transaction. On a comparable basis, the June forecast of total financial requirements, excluding foreign exchange transactions, for fiscal year 1975-76 would have been $5 billion rather than the $5.3 billion presented at that time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUGGESTED PROTEST OF INCREASE IN QUALIFICATION PERIOD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact there are now more than 760,000 people without jobs in Canada, and unemployment is at its highest level in 15 years, and in view of the fact unemployment in the last six months has escalated rapidly in the Atlantic provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That all Atlantic MP's, regardless of party, write to the Minister of Finance and to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, protesting the increase of the qualification period for unemployment insurance benefits from eight to 12 weeks.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR REFORMATION OF MILK POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the Minister of Agriculture stated on many occasions that the surplus made by milk producers last year came from mismanagement by the people who are responsible for industrial milk in Canada and considering that the same people are still employed with the government notwithstanding their error which will cost producers several million dollars, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier):

That the minister order a complete review of the qualifications of his senior civil servants responsible for the administration of industrial milk producers in Canada so that, if necessary, and I believe it is, a clean sweep be made among these people who are mainly responsible for the serious problems industrial milk producers now have.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Beaudoin: Who said no?

PROPOSED BUDGETARY MEASURES TO IMPROVE ECONOMIC CONDITIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House requests the Minister of Finance to bring forward a budget which deals with the serious problems Canadians now face and which he managed to avoid completely in the effort he produced yesterday, namely, the fact that job creating programs are needed for the 761,000 unemployed, tax reductions are needed for the average and the poor, both in fairness and as a major stimulant to the economy, and immediate action is required to increase the supply and reduce the price of housing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Standing Orders of the House provide for six days' debate on the budgetary resolutions presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). It would seem to be an abuse of the procedures to introduce a motion of this kind at this time.

HOUSING

FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO INTRODUCE BUDGETARY MEASURES TO REDUCE COST OF HOUSING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given that the annual rate of increase in the cost of home ownership has been in excess of 10 per cent since August of last year, and in fact was 14.3 per cent last month, and given that housing takes over 30 per cent of the average wage earner's dollar, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That this House condemns the failure of the government to include any measures in its budget to reduce the cost of home ownership to the average Canadian.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. For reasons already stated I would not propose to put, pursuant to Standing Order 43, a motion which relates to the general budgetary provisions of the government.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the budget brought down yesterday will lengthen the minor attachment period—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please; the hon. member for Villeneuve.

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW COMMITTEE TO ENFORCE ABORTION PROVISION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on an urgent matter calling for immediate attention.

Since the committee set up to study the enforcement of the abortion legislation in hospitals is only concerned about having a greater number of hospitals provide abortion services, without checking whether the hospitals now having committees for therapeutical abortions conform to the legislation instead of providing abortion on demand, and since one member of this committee, Dr. Marion Powell, is openly advocating abortion on demand and therefore lacks the necessary objectiveness, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House direct the Minister of Justice to withdraw the terms of reference of that committee and set up another one precisely with the task of ensuring the enforcement of the abortion legislation so as to prevent some hospitals from providing abortion on demand. If this committee is to work properly, it should be made up of people in favour of respect for life.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO HANDLING OF NEWS BY MONTREAL STATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion of pressing and urgent necessity.

Last night, during the news broadcast on the CBC French station, the news time was extended because of the budget and this time extension was given to a sitting of the Commission of Inquiry into Organized Crime, while almost no time at all was granted to the representatives of the political parties to speak on the budget, particularly the Social Crediters of Canada, of which I am one, whose interview was cut down from four to one minute. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts inquire into the lack of cooperation from the CBC officials in Montreal who seem to specialize in eliminating or cutting down news sent by Ottawa CBC reporters, while the Montreal CBC officials do not seem to care a fig for general federal policies.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion may not be put.

HOUSING

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT INTRODUCE MEASURES TO MAKE MORE LOW-COST HOUSES AVAILABLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I too rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the deplorable lack of low cost housing in Canada.

Whereas this government has failed to provide low cost housing, confirming that the lack of supply of decent, reasonably-priced shelter is not an accidental by-product of market forces but a deliberate policy; in view of the fact that house purchasing costs have risen over 14 per cent over last year across the country, for example in the district of Coquitlam a representative net profit was over $14,000 per lot; in view of the fact that the federal government is standing idly by while the government in British Columbia sells off at large profits housing estates built with federal funds intended for low-rental housing; and in view of the fact that experts now charge that the federal government is deliberately discouraging investment in low-cost housing in order to make capital available for extravagant, conspicuous projects like the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, which is ecologically and socially venal and economically beneficial only to the large resources companies; I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House condemn the government for its cruel policy of deliberately denying working Canadians the shelter to which their resourcefulness and productivity entitles them; and instruct this government to introduce legislation to correct this distortion immediately, and at the same time to plug loopholes in the National Housing Act, in order to guarantee that federal funds alloted to low-rental housing are used for the purpose intended.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON BUDGET MILDLY STIMULATIVE—MEASURES TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In the budget address last night and in the minister's press conference the minister has described the over-all fiscal posture of the budget as mildly stimulative. Sticking strictly to the budget itself, would the minister explain how he could make that statement in light of the fact that his own senior officials are reported as saying that it will have a slightly restrictive impact on the economy, a conclusion, I should say, that has already been reached independently by the Conference Board in Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that when we are still running a deficit of several billion dollars it could hardly be regarded as being a very restrictive stand.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a couple of questions to the Minister of Finance relating to unemployment and job creation. In the budget address last night the minister stated that the unemployment rate will decline—and I think I am quoting him correctly—as the cyclical expansion takes hold. Since the budget anticipates an increase of some 250,000 jobs this year while the labour force grew by 353,000 jobs last year and is expected to grow by over 300,000 jobs this year, how does the government plan to reduce unemployment and avoid further unemployment in this year, 1976?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated both in the budget speech and in statements outside, the slowdown in the Canadian economy has come primarily because of the reduction on the export side. As I mentioned, we are anticipating improvement in the performance of the other OECD economies with the consequent benefit for Canadian industries and an increase of our export of commodities. In that sense, we see a recovery coming in the world at large which will have beneficial effects in Canada.

Mr. Clark: The unemployed in Canada and those seeking jobs are asked to look to other governments for comfort because the government of Canada is doing nothing at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR LABOUR FORCE PROJECTIONS AND EMPLOYMENT TARGETS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): So there might be some indication as to the parameters within which this government is working, can the minister give the House now any labour force projections and any new specific employment targets, preferably by region and by sector, which would back up the government's expressed concern about high unemployment in the country?

Hon Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): It seems to me that there is a fundamental fact which the Leader of the Opposition should recognize, that approximately 50 per cent of the merchandize produced in Canada is sold in foreign markets. If those foreign markets are not strong, that merchandize will not find a market.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In that sense it is a purely phoney suggestion to say that the drop off in Canadian exports will not affect Canadian performance. That is the thrust of the budget, the fact that our exports have dropped off, that is the recognized fact in the OECD countries and with that kind of recovery it will be evident as well that the Canadian economy will have the advantage.

Mr. Clark: Will the Minister of Finance or his colleagues give the House of Commons any indication of national and regional employment goals which are guiding the government in the conduct of its own affairs rather then simply leaving the creation of jobs in Canada to the policies of other countries?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. gentleman again repeats the little dishonesty—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are very touchy today.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —about the economic performance in Canada being independent of the export performance. The Canadian economy does not work that way and never has.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AREA IN WHICH JOBS WILL BE CREATED THIS YEAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. Would the minister indicate to the House more precisely where he sees the 250,000 jobs being created in the current year?

Mr. Chrétien: In Canada.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): There will be opportunities in the course of the budget debate and my colleague will be glad to comment on this point.

Mr. Stevens: My supplementary question is again for the Minister of Finance. As he has referred in his budgetary statement presumably to auxiliary work being created as was contemplated by the Economic Council of Canada, would the minister indicate if part of the 250,000 job creation is this auxiliary work concept of the Economic Council of Canada or, more specifically, is this a concept that will fall in place some time but there is no anticipation it will take hold in the current year?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): This government has pioneered with regard to direct employment programs, and indeed there are a number of those currently in operation under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will be looking forward, as I am sure the hon. gentleman will, to the participation of the minister in the budget debate pointing out the direct employment measures that he has in contemplation and in active operation in Canada.

● (1420)

REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROVIDE STIMULUS BY REDUCING TAXES AND INCREASING EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance, the minister in the cabinet who specializes in major dishonesty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: The shoe is obviously on the other foot. Given the fact that the Canadian manufacturing sector is only operating at 80 per cent capacity and that therefore an increase in consumer spending at this time would not be inflationary but would simply lead to the creation of more jobs, I would like to ask the minister why, with 760,000 out of work in this country, he did not provide a major stimulus to the economy in his budget last night to get people back to work by reducing taxes.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I point out to the hon. gentleman what has been very clearly detailed in the Economic Review, that final domestic demand in Canada is and has remained at a very strong level for the past 12 to 18 months. Therefore, the further stimulus of consumer demand in Canada will not take up the slack in current production. Again, as I pointed out to the Leader of the Opposition, the export sector is and has always been a strong factor in Canadian economic performance. It is now recovering. This is an area of recovery which we see as important for full employment in Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: I say in all seriousness now—

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —that I may well have missed the metaphysical point of the minister's answer, but would he please explain to the House why an increase in consumer demand on top of what is already described as healthy consumer demand would not lead to further employment? I do not see the minister's argument in that regard. Would he kindly explain his point? Similarly, if 50 per cent of what we produce is now being exported abroad, what has that to do with the fact that by increasing domestic demand we would simply increase the percentage of goods sold at home? On both grounds, I simply do not accept the argument of the minister.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If the hon. gentleman does not understand, perhaps it would take longer than the question period to go into the details again.

An hon. Member: You don't know.

ESTIMATE OF UNEMPLOYMENT THIS YEAR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): The minister may know a lot about law; I hope he learns some economics in the next few weeks. Would he answer a final question? Given the fact that his budget papers predicted an increase in the supply of jobs by some 250,000 next year—without giving any reasons to expect it, I might add—and given the fact that the increase in the number of people coming onto the labour market in recent months vastly exceeds that forecast for the increase in jobs, would the minister tell us whether he is really expecting, during the current year, a continuing rate of unemployment in excess of 7 per cent?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I set out the anticipations of the government at some length in the speech last night.

Mr. Broadbent: There was no unemployment forecast.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Indeed, there was an unemployment forecast. Perhaps if the hon. gentleman and his colleagues had not been making so much noise during the speech, they might have noted that as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

ALLEGED PENALIZING OF MILK PRODUCERS RATHER THAN THOSE RESPONSIBLE FOR QUOTAS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In the opinion of the Minister of Agriculture, it is last year's production surpluses that make the situation difficult for milk producers this year. Could the right hon. Prime Minister tell the house if the mistake is to be borne by the producers who obtained quotas to achieve a specific performance or to officials who distributed quotas, thus unbalancing the whole dairy system in Canada? If so, why penalize producers and not officials?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the facts are somewhat different from those the hon. member is speaking about. Quotas allocated under the milk policy were exceeded by producers last year. We even have alarming indications that they are going to be exceeded again this year. Facts are obviously different from what the hon. member has said.

As for the burden, we have decided as a policy that it will have to be shared, on the one hand, by producers who exceeded the quotas and, on the other hand, by the taxpayer in general who pays his share of the milk support price and, finally, by the consumer for whom prices will increase lightly.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture.

As the Prime Minister just said that only those who exceeded their quotas will be penalized and as, in fact, those who did not even exceed their quotas of 1973-74, 1974-75 are penalized, can the Minister of Agriculture explain why the latter are penalized?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday the provinces run the quotas within their jurisdiction through the provincial marketing boards and we run the over-all quota. How they administer them within their provinces is up to them.

[Translation]

REASON MARKETING COMMITTEES COMPOSED MAINLY OF FLUID MILK PRODUCERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a final supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Considering that the Prime Minister said recently to a colleague of mine that fluid milk was the responsibility of the provinces, can the minister explain why the positions on the management committees are now almost exclusively filled by fluid milk producers?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not appoint the management committees. Management committees are appointed by representatives of the boards from each province to represent them on this committee. I do not appoint them. The only appointments we make are to the Dairy Commission. This commission is not overly representative of any one group. One member of the Canadian Dairy Commission is not a producer, and one member is part fluid and part industrial producer, while the production of the other member is 80 per cent fluid.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

EFFECT OF REDUCING FIVE-YEAR ALLOWABLE PROFIT ON CAPITAL FORMATION

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Bearing in mind that capital formation is the key to expanding industry and taking up the slack in unemployment, and noting that it is estimated we will have a shortfall in capital requirements in the next ten years of about $70 billion, can the minister explain how reducing the five year average allowable profit under the Anti-Inflation Board regulations from 95 per cent to 85 per cent will allow for the capital formation required?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the changes in the anti-inflation regulations was twofold: first, to ensure more equitable treatment as between firms because of differences of application of the guidelines and second, to impose on firms a stricter control for the purpose of more effective control of prices. It seems to me that the essential part of further economic development, and capital formation in particular, in the next decade in Canada is going to be to get the current rate of inflation under control. In this sense, the effective operation of the anti-inflation program has to take priority.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REASON FOR FAILURE TO STIMULATE MANUFACTURING AND THUS REDUCE BALANCE OF PAYMENTS DEFICIT

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Noting that the continuing balance of payments deficit and the forecasted trade deficit of $4.5 billion and noting as well that our manufacturing is about 20 per cent underutilized, may I ask the minister why he did not move in the budget to stimulate this sector in an effort to spur production that would be consumed domestically and so reduce the level of imports and lower the trade deficit and balance of payments deficit?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman is referring to a stimulative measure such as was introduced in the last budget with regard to the investment tax credit or in the previous budget with regard to the favourable rate of capital cost allowances for new investment in Canada, it seems to me there are already in place very substantial incentives on the business side for futher investment. The really critical question for a businessman is whether he is going to find a market for his products. An exporting firm must depend on the state of affairs in foreign markets. We have noted that they are improving and expect Canada to gain the benefit of that.

● (1430)

REASON FOR FAILURE TO ADOPT MEASURES TO STIMULATE INVESTMENT IN INDUSTRIAL PLANTS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As reported on page 10424 of Hansard, the minister, replying to a question of the hon. member for Halifax regarding investment in plant and industry and steps the minister would take to stimulate investment, stated that questions of this type involving fiscal changes are best dealt with within the context of the budget. I ask, why did he not deal with this matter and the whole area of high interest rates, bearing in mind the difficulty all businessmen will face in putting together capital to expand their industrial plants in order to create the 250,000 jobs which the minister is forecasting?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did, indeed, deal with that in the budget speech last night, pointed out that the panoply of measures we had in place for the purpose of stimulating investment in manufacturing in this country is very considerable and that a further tax change at this time is not necessary. The hon. member referred to the question of interest rates. Of course, they reflect the rate of inflation in Canada, and also the restrictive monetary policy which the hon. gentleman and others have been calling for the Government of Canada to adopt in the management of the economy. So, the hon. gentleman cannot have it both ways. If he wants a restrictive fiscal and monetary policy for the purpose of controlling inflation, he must expect higher interest rates.

REASON NO MENTION MADE IN BUDGET OF DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES ON SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? In the budget speech last night he suggested that there would be a tightening of unemployment insurance funds in order to save in the neigbourhood of $200 million; but no mention was made of the social security talks which are going on between the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare and provincial ministers of health and welfare, which suggest that $350 million in additional expenditure may be incurred in added social security costs. Are we to conclude from the fact that this was not mentioned that these talks will not go ahead?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the talks will go ahead. Discussions with provincial governments have been going on for a number of years in an attempt to find a more effective application of public funds in the social security area of our economy. Any changes, of course, will have to fit themselves within the fiscal framework which the federal and provincial governments have set themselves for this year and subsequent years.

Mr. Horner: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The House and country are well aware that these talks have been going on and involve a suggested additional cost of $350 million in social security. Is the minister now saying that any changes will bring about no additional cost?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am saying that subsequent and further commitments of that kind will either have to be made within the existing fiscal framework, or there will have to be a conscious decision by both the federal and provincial governments to reallocate additional funds to this area of the economy.

[Mr. Kempling.]

Mr. Horner: Therefore the deficit will be larger.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No decision has been taken to that effect. These discussions will be subject to over-all fiscal controls which governments in the plural have set for themselves in Canada.

Mr. Horner: You have not set a very good example.

INQUIRY IF SAVINGS ON UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE WILL BE USED TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Concerning the announced amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, can the Minister of Manpower and Immigration assure the House that all the money saved through these new amendments will be used to create employment in areas in Canada where unemployment is highest?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can give that assurance, based on understandings between myself, the Minister of Finance and the cabinet. The expenditure reduction is intended to be redirected to employment producing programs which will cover the whole field of manpower, for instance, training, short work week supplements and job creation. The details, of course, still have to be worked out.

EFFECT OF INCREASED OIL PRICES ON COST OF ELECTRICITY IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In light of the confirmation in the budget last night that oil prices are to increase to about $2 per barrel, from $1.75, the devastating impact this increase will have on electricity prices in the Atlantic provinces and the lack of any statement in the budget regarding aid or assistance for the people of the Atlantic provinces, may I ask if this means that the government will not do anything to help the people of the Atlantic provinces deal with this enormous increase in electricity costs which have been as high as 100 per cent in one year for consumers in Nova Scotia?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources dealt with this question previously.

Miss MacDonald: He said, turn off the lights.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. lady just confirmed that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Will you accept that?

Miss MacDonald: Yes, he said they should turn off the lights.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite seem remarkably well informed on the answers to their own questions.

Mr. Clark: Someone has to answer; somebody has to answer questions around here.

Mr. Trudeau: There have been some discussions between the federal government and some Atlantic province representatives. They made submissions to the government. I have received some letters from one of the premiers of the region making certain proposals and we have said we will study them. I have not encouraged them to think that there would be any great relief. As the hon. member knows, the federal government is short of funds. We are being enjoined every day to spend less—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): And every day you are spending more.

Mr. Trudeau: —and this applies all across the board. Nonetheless, we are looking at the problem to see if we can find some solution.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister say when a decision with respect to these consultations may be arrived at?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED WHO WILL FIND WORK AS RESULT OF CHANGES IN REGULATIONS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration? Last night the Minister of Finance said that changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act were designed to encourage those who are unemployed to find suitable jobs. Can the minister tell the House his estimate of how many people this is likely to affect, that is, how many people who are presently unemployed will find work because of these changes? I assume the minister has carried out some studies in this area.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the opportunity to elaborate on this and other aspects of my responsibilities in the budget debate at the earliest occasion, probably next week.

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF NUMBER OF PEOPLE DISQUALIFIED AS A RESULT OF NEW REGULATIONS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps, because of the importance of the matter, it should be dealt with now, while the budget speech is fresh in people's minds. May I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration if his department has made any estimate as to how many of the people disqualified under the new system will have to obtain relief from municipal and provincial governments, and whether the $200 million listed as a saving to the federal government is really no saving at all but a transfer of cost to municipal and provincial governments?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the matter is complex and I would not accept the final conclusion which the hon. member appears to have reached. I will go into those kinds of details when I make my comments, but I will say this: There is one interesting statistic applying to those who exhaust their benefits, that is, to those who use the full time of their entitlement. Among those in the eight to eleven week bracket, 70 per cent find jobs within six weeks after exhaustion. Something like 2 per cent of our claim load who exhaust benefits end up on the welfare rolls. That kind of calculation will be applied and made known in precise terms as a result of these amendments. I also point out that the hon. member is singling out only one proposed amendment and, conveniently or otherwise failing to note the other three important components of that package.

HOUSING

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO STIMULATE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Finance? In the absence of measures in last night's budget to stimulate housing starts in Canada, and as housing continues to be a major factor in the consumer price index, I ask the minister what programs the government intends to bring forward to stimulate house construction in Canada, particularly to provide low-cost housing for the many thousands of Canadians in the country who can no longer afford to buy a house?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has obviously overlooked the considerable program which my colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in charge of housing, brought before parliament and which is now in successful operation in Canada. As the hon. member will have noted, housing starts since the beginning of the year have been running at one of the highest rates ever in this country.

● (1440)

Mr. McGrath: If the government's housing program is so successful, can the minister explain to the House why housing costs in Canada continue to rise and why there are so many Canadians who cannot afford to buy a house because of exceedingly and critically high interest rates?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On the latter point, Mr. Speaker, the fact is the hon. member and his colleague have been talking favourably about a restrictive monetary policy in this country. If they are in favour of that policy, they have to accept the consequence of higher interest rates while inflation is at the present level in Canada.

DISCRETIONARY PAYMENTS TO UNEMPLOYED PERSONS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF STUDIES WHICH LED TO CHANGES IN REGULATIONS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration regarding a matter referred to last night by the Minister of Finance in his speech. There is a problem in connection with payments on a discretionary basis to unemployed persons. Can the Minister give some indication of what he is talking about with regard to legislation, regulation and so on?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are proposing amendments to the legislation as part of this package. I think the hon. member is already familiar with some of the details and the possible use, to wit, the Newfoundland UI Manpower training experiment which is in its second year, and it has proven to be a wise decision, and other areas of that type. I will be giving further details when I have a fuller opportunity during the budget debate.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the minister, as I asked him before, if he is prepared to table or give some indication of the studies and conclusions which he has undertaken over the past two or three years and which allowed the Minister of Finance to come to these several conclusions with regard to UIC. Will the minister give us the benefit of all of his studies and the conclusion reached?

Mr. Andras: That is my intention, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

DATE WHEN 200-MILE LIMIT ADOPTED—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENTS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of any reference in the budget to fisheries and the loss of jobs in Atlantic Canada, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of State (Fisheries). According to press reports, the Minister of State (Fisheries) agreed in Moscow to a Soviet request for an even larger quota on capelin than the present 250,000 tons to be caught in 1977 on Hamilton Bank in return for part of Russia's redfish quota in 1976 in the northwest Atlantic,—

Mr. McGrath: The biggest sellout ever.

Mr. Crouse: —and since many species are now fished below the sustainable yield level, causing us to go begging to Russia for a share of their redfish quota, when does the government intend to announce a 200-mile limit for Canada?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to answer this question if the House will allow me to correct some of the mistakes made by the hon. member. The employees of those plants who will benefit from our negotiations in Moscow will certainly remember the words of the hon. member for St. John's East when the time comes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): The Soviet Union did not ask us for assistance; we asked them for assistance to overcome a very difficult situation which results, in part, from the fact that part of the industry did not carefully husband those stocks of redfish which were available in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. I might remind the hon. member that this is simply a situation whereby we get part of the Soviet Union's quota in 1976 in exchange for our support for a higher quota on their part for capelin.

Mr. McGrath: Shame!

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): If the hon. member listened instead of shouting, he might learn something.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): The hon. member might be interested in knowing that the total allowable catch for capelin on the northern capelin fishery is 300,000 ton. At the moment, somewhat less than 200,000 ton are taken. This means that whatever arrangement is made within the ICNAF regulations on capelin, it will be well below the total allowable catch in the first instance.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, the minister's own officials have indicated that they cannot police the capelin quotas and, in some years, double it. Therefore, the minister's statement is open to question in that regard. In view of the concern in Atlantic Canada about the extensive overfishing by foreign fleets on our continental shelf, will the minister undertake to make available to this House the details of our agreements with Britain, Denmark, Portugal, Norway, Spain, France, the U.S.A. and the Soviet Union so that all Canadians will know the terms of these agreements that have been arranged with these countries by the minister and other officials of the government?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, three of the documents, namely the agreements with Norway, Poland and France, are already public. The two with Spain and Portugal will be released when they are officially signed, which is the normal diplomatic tradition. As for the agreement signed last week with the Soviet Union, it will be tabled in the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry within the next hour.

RUSSIAN QUOTA OF CAPELIN—METHOD OF POLICING VIOLATIONS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State (Fisheries). As a result of Canadian inspections under our bilateral agreements with these nations, it was found that the U.S.S.R. overfished capelin by 80,000 ton. Will the minister tell the House and the country what quotas he is talking about with regard to Russia and how he expects to police in view of the 99 individuals vessel violations which have already been found under the bilateral agreements?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, the figures with regard to actual tonnage involved in both redfish and capelin will be part of the discussions which will take place at the ICNAF meeting next month. For that reason I am not at liberty to express what they are. As for violations, the hon. member will recall that last year the ports on the east coast were closed to Soviet vessels as a consequence of our warnings about violations. In fact, the hon. member for St. John's East opposed that action at that time.

Mr. McGrath: That's not true.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I will look up the page number of Hansard and give that to the hon. member tomorrow. At that time violations were reported, we moved and the violations ceased for the rest of that year. For the present year, the quotas were reached seven days ago and the fleet left area 3L, if my memory is correct, and there are no records of violations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN COMMON FUND ESTABLISHED BY UNCTAD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I would like to direct my question to his parliamentary secretary about the United Nations Conference on Trade, Aid and Development.

Could the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether Canada intends to go further than giving sympathetic consideration to the establishment of a common fund for the regulation of raw material prices, and whether we intend to take a definite step in this field before the conclusion of the conference?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada, which is part of the "B" group of developed countries which are political partners at UNCTAD IV now in its last week of deliberations in Nairobi, is in the vanguard among that group, I believe, and is trying the best it can, as I indicated yesterday to the hon. member for Egmont, to work in a positive manner with "B" group countries towards a resolution on the stabilization of the raw material market. We keep thinking that the idea of a common fund is not necessarily, if I understand well, the best stabilization technique. That principle would perhaps be worthwhile only for half the ten vulnerable commodities in question, and it is not sure it would be helpful most of all to the poorest nations, which is Canada's strategy. However, any effort which would seem to lead to a reasonable arrangement with a view to helping Third World countries will certainly be encouraged and promoted by Canada.

HARBOURS

ESTABLISHMENT OF PORT AT GROS-CACOUNA—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Following a question I asked on November 3, 1975, which can be found on page 8778 of Hansard, I would like to know whether the minister is in a position to inform the House of the conclusions of the in-depth studies which were made into the development of the deep-sea port at Gros-Cacouna?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a number of discussions have been going on with persons interested in investing in that port area but these have not yet reached a final conclusion. The joint study undertaken between the province of Quebec and the government of Canada is not yet complete.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REASON FOR FAILURE TO FORECAST FUTURE ECONOMIC CLIMATE TO ENABLE BUSINESS TO DO PROPER PLANNING

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the serious trade deficit from which Canada is now suffering, why did the Minister of Finance not take the opportunity that was available to him in the presentation of his budget to forecast the economic climate that business can expect in the years 1977, 1978 and 1979 so that proper planning can be undertaken by the business community with a view to balancing this serious deficit?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have previously had occasion to point out the essential difficulty of making a reliable forecast that far in advance. Indeed, this has been recognized by governments in Canada for a long time. We prefer to leave to institutions like the Economic Council the responsibility of predicting what economic events will be in the medium and long term.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

RESULT OF CHANGE IN REGULATION CONCERNING PRE-TAX PROFITS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In his budget speech last night the minister, in referring to the AIB guidelines, reduced the net pre-tax profits from 95 per cent to 85 per cent, with an option on the base line. Will this not have a very dampening and depressing effect on business activity and efficiency, particularly since the base period stretches back over five years, a period in which we have had inflation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of providing an option is so that the firm in question may pick whichever, from its standpoint, is the most favourable of the two positions. Our conclusion from the returns analysed by the Anti-Inflation Board is that it is important in terms of equity to a very large number of firms to get all firms on an equal basis, and it is our belief that this is a basis which is fair to all firms generally and which will also exercise some discipline on the increase in prices in Canada.

FINANCE

MEASURES TO CONTROL HIGH INTEREST RATES AND REDUCE HOUSING COSTS—POSSIBLE PAYMENT OF SHELTER COSTS FOR LOW INCOME GROUP

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that housing costs have increased 14.3 per cent in the month of April and 11.5 per cent over the past year, in view of the fact that the average wage earner pays 30 per cent of his wages for housing, and in view of the fact that interest rates are 12 per cent and increasing, it must be obvious to the minister that the housing programs that he had proposed are not working. What measures does the minister intend to take to control high interest rates and housing costs?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, from the housing starts level in Canada I would draw the opposite conclusion. I point out to the hon. gentleman that in the range of programs being administered by my colleague there are indeed provisions to bring down the net interest cost to those at the lower level of the income scale.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the minister will understand my next supplementary question. In view of the high vacancy rate, especially in urban centres like Toronto, and the excessively high rents being paid, and in view of the lack of a program with regard to low income housing, would the minister pay shelter costs to people of low and moderate income so that they may be able to pay the high rents they are now paying, as well as following the suggestion of the Ontario government and social agencies?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, both in his constituency and in mine there are programs in place already to provide favourable rates of rent to those in the lower income brackets. Indeed the programs now in place and being carried out by my colleague's department are specifically related to favouring the situation of those at the lower end of the income scale.

MANPOWER

NAME OF MERGED OFFICES OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE AND MANPOWER

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Given the work incentive measures announced in the budget yesterday and the proposed amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which will make it a work or wage insurance, and the proposal to merge manpower and unemployment insurance centres, does the minister intend to propose that these manpower and unemployment insurance centres be simply called employment centres and that his department become a Department of Employment?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The exact name has been narrowed down to one or two choices which probably I will be able to announce next week, Tuesday or Wednesday; but I can assure the hon. member and other hon. members of the House that it will emphasize the word "employment" as compared with "unemployment".

PENSIONS

POSSIBILITY OF DEFERRED PAYMENTS INTO SUPERANNUATION ACCOUNT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In consideration of the government's program of budgetary restraint, would the minister advise the House whether the government has deferred any payments or obligations that it may have toward the public service superannuation account, the armed services superannuation account and any other pension fund to which the government has the right and obligation to make payments? If that was done this year, was it done in previous years? Perhaps the minister would refer in his answer to the exact amount by which the accounts may be in arrears, if they are.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have no indication that any such thing was done. However, I shall check and give the hon. member a more specific answer.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

EFFECT OF REDUCED BUDGET OF DEPARTMENT—FAILURE TO PROVIDE STIMULUS FOR RESOURCE INDUSTRIES IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Since the budget speech has failed to provide any new stimulus for resource based industries in New Brunswick, does the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion have any new development initiatives in mind, or does the reduced purchasing power of his budget indicate that DREE is no longer a priority of this government?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the hon. member can come to the conclusion that because the budget of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was frozen, like every other department's, activities in the Maritimes have been reduced. On the contrary: precisely as a result of the budget tabled a few months ago and the estimates being spent this year, we will be spending even more in the Maritimes this year than last.

With regard to specific programs we are now in the process of planning to face specific problems in the Maritimes, the hon. member can take for granted that the department, my officials and myself continue to dwell on specific problems, and we will be coming forward with proposals to deal with some of those difficulties within the next few months.

FINANCE

INQUIRY IF PURPOSE OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CHANGES TO REDUCE BUDGETARY DEFICIT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

A while ago, the hon. member for Matane said that the savings made because of unemployment insurance changes would go towards job creation. From what I understood last night, the minister underlined the importance not only of stopping budgetary deficit increases, but also of reducing the deficit. I wonder if the Minister of Finance is in agreement with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration or if his budget aims rather at reducing this budgetary deficit?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated a ceiling for our budget, and the funds mentioned by my colleague will be transferred from unemployment insurance to the programs referred to.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF UNEMPLOYMENT LEVEL THIS YEAR

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

My supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister specifically advise the House whether he forecasts 7 per cent, 7.5 per cent or 8 per cent unemployment for the following year?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY IF CANADA CONSULTED ON WITHDRAWAL OF CUBAN TROOPS FROM ANGOLA

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is addressed to the Prime Minister. Would the right hon. gentleman indicate whether Canada was consulted, or was there any advance notice of Cuban troops leaving Angola? Did Premier Castro advise the Prime Minister of any movement of troops, and are those troops being transported via an Air Canada DC-8 that he lent him?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some difficulty in accepting that as a supplementary question.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege involving the Minister of State (Fisheries), whom I have always found to be fair in my dealings with him, though never entirely as competent as I would like to see him in carrying out his administrative responsibilities. My question of privilege today, Mr. Speaker, is that at the time of the closing of our ports to Soviet fleets I said publicly this was a sacrifice we were prepared to make to cover up for the failure of the government adequately to manage this important resource.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I undertook to verify the exactitude or precision of the words I used. If I did mislead the House or offend the hon. member, I will be the first to stand up and apologize.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order involving the Minister of Finance, the budget address last night, what was contained therein and what may have occurred prior to it. I am referring to a report in yesterday's St. John's Daily News in which the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception is quoted as saying—and this prior to the budget speech last night—that he would be resigning, or at least was considering resigning because of the budget provisions. He used those general words, then he specifically related his reason for resigning to changes contemplated in the budget to the unemployment insurance matter.

I have raised matters of budget leaks or pre-information with the minister before, and the minister has looked into these matters. I am raising it again because there is an indication in the media that somewhere, something in respect of the provisions of this budget was discussed, as a result of which the particular member, who is not now in his place, made a statement regarding his own personal position. I think the minister owes the House an explanation, if he is able to give one today. If he is not able to give one today, he owes the House an explanation on some other occasion. I think, as well, that the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception owes the House some indication as to where he received that information.

Not only does this situation lead us to that conclusion, confirmed last night in the budget speech in the fact that it did mention unemployment insurance regulations; it leads us to the question of what else was discussed, perhaps in the Liberal caucus, perhaps in some other place or in some other media, in respect of the budget and information which ought not to have been released ahead of time. That is the first question in my point of order.

The second matter is something that affects members of this House directly and results from what occurred last evening. During the course of the pre-budget briefing, certain members representing our party, and members of the press, were locked up in the usual fashion and an indication was given of the budget speech the minister would be making later on. I am advised that during the course of the lock-up yesterday, the minister taped a television program. I am not quarrelling with the idea of security in respect of this matter, but he taped a television program in the form of a press conference which was then delivered on national television immediately following, or within minutes of the minister rising to make his speech in the House.

As I indicated to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the minister, I am not quarrelling about the secrecy aspect of it. The unfortunate thing is that we who are members of parliament in this House of Commons did not even have the benefit of a copy of the minister's speech on this matter until the last two or three minutes of his speech, when we were informed that the speech had become available in the lobby. The difficulty for hon. members, regardless of the side of the House on which they sit, is that there is no opportunity at all, especially in the course of a long budget speech, for members to prepare themselves in order to answer questions to be asked of them by the media in the way of interviews outside or by boards of trade and chambers of commerce, in a local sense, in the areas represented by members of parliament.

I know we cannot undo what was done last night, but I respectfully suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Minister of Finance, that if he is to be on national television at eight o'clock, by way of a prerecorded broadcast made in the lock-up, then members of this House are at least entitled to copies of his speech immediately he begins to deliver it in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The speech at that time ceases to be a matter of secrecy, but it does not cease to be a matter of importance in this House to the members here and the people we are representing. I do not want to accuse the minister of bad manners, and I will not, but I am going to say—

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —that we tried throughout the course of the speech to get copies, and I am sure this occurred to others, so that members of our party who had an interest and a particular responsibility could prepare themselves and follow the written text by the minister. I refer to members other than those who were involved in the lock-up. If that is the tradition around here, it is one of those traditions that ought to be changed. My experience is certainly not as long as others in this place, but my understanding is that it is not the tradition that speeches be distributed to members in the lobbies within a few minutes of the end of the minister's speech. Rather, it has been the tradition that the budget speech is made available more or less at the beginning of the minister's speech in the House. If that is the tradition, it should be observed. It was not observed last night, and I think the minister ought to give the House an undertaking that this practice will not occur again, if he is responsible in the future.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised two points in his point of order, although I think the second would essentially be a grievance. I can tell the House, with regard to the fiscal statutes—which are under my specific responsibility as Minister of Finance—that no element of those statutes was discussed with any person other than a member of my department, or another member of the Privy Council, that is to say, another member of the present cabinet.

The changes in the unemployment insurance administration have, of course, been under discussion in this House and in the Liberal caucus for many months. It is indeed true that the options the government was considering, which had been indicated to the House and to the committee by the minister some months ago, were the subject of discussions. The other economic statutes that may be related to the responsibilities of the government have not been subject to the same rules as those involving taxation or the operation of fiscal policy, and there has been no violation of the proceedings in this regard. With regard to the second point—

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, before the Minister of Finance moves to the second point, could I just—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): With regard to the second point, the hon. gentleman used the phrase "the minister taped" a program. In fact, I did attend a press conference in the press lock-up yesterday afternoon prior to delivering the budget speech. At that time I answered questions from members of the press who subsequent to that, of course, remained in the lock-up until I rose to my feet to deliver the speech at eight o'clock. I am advised that for at least 20 years, if not longer, it has been the practice that members of the press gallery be admitted in advance for a briefing during the lock-up proceedings, and that it has also been the practice at eight o'clock for the press to be free to use the information then for the purpose of filing their reports whether it be through the written media or put out through the electronic media.

● (1510)

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby contacted me last Friday with a number of requests concerning the practice that had taken place for advance briefings in respect of selected members of the opposition, as opposed to the press, who would be present prior to delivery of the budget statement. The member pointed out, I think with some reason, that the press were at liberty to make public the briefing once the budget speech had commenced, but that under the practice which had been operative for some time, members of the opposition were not permitted to comment on it until after the Minister of Finance had completed his speech.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby made the point that surely it would be common sense and appropriate that members of parliament should be at liberty, as are members of the press, to comment from eight o'clock on upon what they had learned in the course of the budget briefing. I considered that over the weekend my staff advised the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and, I am advised by the staff, also the Leader of the Opposition and other parties, that they would be free to do so. I am informed that, acting on this advice, the hon. member for York-Simcoe immediately after eight o'clock took advantage of it to put his own interpretation on the budget at 8.15.

The point is that if the hon. gentleman is to be entitled to make his comments, as I agree, immediately after eight o'clock, it seems to be equally clear that I should be entitled to have my comments put on the air. To do otherwise would be to have put the press in the position of being able to comment on the budget speech while it is being given, and to give the opposition the opportunity to comment on the budget speech while it is being given, but not to permit the deliverer of the speech to have his views expressed at the same time. So, Mr. Speaker, I conceded right away that this is a change in practice. It seems to me to have been a sensible change in practice. In the first place, it makes it possible for the opposition spokesmen to comment on the speech and for my views to be made known in that manner.

In connection with the distribution of the copies, I obviously did not have direct administrative control of the manner in which they would be distributed. However, I agree essentially that they should be delivered to members as soon as possible. I suggest that this procedure, based on a collection of precedents and conventions which have arisen around this, obviously is one area in which our whole budget procedure should be changed. It seems to me that by enabling statements to be made outside the House while the speech is going on, we are really debasing the procedure here in this chamber. There are several options in this regard. One is the notion that we should come back to the custom, which I understand from the hon. member for Mississauga was the case when his father occupied my present portfolio, of locking up the press until 9.15, 9.30 or until the minister had finished.

It seems to me that there would be no particular value in reverting to that practice. I suggest a change should take place in the procedures of the House so that we can have really a more current debate dealing with the budget speech when given. My present preference in respect of the budget statement would be to have all the proceedings of the House of Commons broadcast from the House through the media of television or radio broadcasting.

Since the budget statement is a lengthy and closely reasoned argument with regard to the state of the economy and what should take place, it seems to me that the budgetary statement should be made available in written form, in advance, and that we should then find procedures by which members would be able to debate orally on its contents under appropriate safeguards with regard to advance information. That is the background of the situation.

I come back again to the fact that I was yielding to an opposition request to improve procedures in dealing with the budget speech. I regret, in particular, that members on that side—and indeed I apologize to colleagues on my side—were not given copies of the budget statement or that they were not available to them as the statement was being given. The conclusion I draw from it is that this is one of the areas in which the ancient procedures which have gathered around this practice should be re-examined. We should see if we can find some twentieth century way of dealing with this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask a question on the first point.

Mr. Speaker: I presume there will be further comments. The Minister of Finance did refer to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, who was seeking the floor simultaneously when I recognized the minister.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, following the two previous speakers on this point of order, I should like first of all to acknowledge the point the minister made in reference to my specific request to him last Friday about changes in our procedure to enable spokesmen from all opposition parties to comment on the budget just as soon as he presents it at eight o'clock. As he said, it would seem to be common sense that for those of us in opposition to be able to make public comments at 8 p.m. if the press and the minister can be quoted outside the House at that time. Certainly, on behalf of my colleagues—and, I hope, all members of the opposition—I appreciate the change in this regard.

He did not mention a further request which he did not concede to but which I hope he will consider adopting, that is, that members of the research staff for the opposition parties be permitted to be in during the lock-up for the briefing. Just as he had his public servants working for him, some of us rely from time to time on our much more limited in size, but not in quality, research staffs as well. I think this is an appropriate and serious consideration the minister should think more about in terms of further changes in this procedure.

With regard to the points made by the House leader of the Conservative party about the speech not being delivered in advance to members on both sides of the House, I agree, of course, with the suggestion made that it should be; but I can fully understand, particularly in light of last night's budget, why it was not. Such a budget would have driven not only members of the opposition out of the House at the outset but would have had the same effect on the minister's colleagues.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to answer according to what the Minister of Finance may reply, I should like to ask him a question in reference to the first point raised by our House leader concerning the statement made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception in which he mentioned that he would resign if, in the budget, there were changes in the term and time which would increase the period from eight weeks to 12 weeks.

● (1520)

My point is—and I think it would clear the air if we could get a clearcut answer—that I am not talking about a general discussion in relation to unemployment insurance statutes but I am asking the minister: Did he discuss with any member of parliament, either on his side or on this side, that these facts would be contained in the budget speech that he read last night? That is the point. If his answer is yes, then to me that would be a definite leak of the budget.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I will say that the possible changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act were discussed in the Liberal caucus. The point I would make to him, and I made it before, is that in relation to fiscal statutes which are my specific responsibility, there was no discussion of these matters, either with the Liberal caucus or with any unauthorized person.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a few brief remarks. Unfortunately, last night's presentation of the budget address was hollow and unreal. First of all, I would like to say that I, personally, having participated in budget addresses for many years, have always felt that the Minister of Finance is addressing the House on these occasions. He is speaking to the House, not to the media or not to outside persons at all. This is merely another instance where I think well-meaning people actually downgrade and denigrate the status of this House.

It is not so many years ago that members of the opposition were allowed a period of prebriefing which the press has had for years. I recall that it is not so many years ago, either, that the press could release information only when the minister finished reading the budget address. If one went back to that practice, there would be none of this so called argy-bargy that is going on at present. If the press and the media have access to the air waves and to the television screens immediately after eight o'clock, then, naturally, there is pressure by members of the opposition who may have had an opportunity to see the budget to seek the same access.

Then the minister comes along and says that if the media have access and so has the opposition, why should he not have it. In other words, what tail wags the whole dog? I suggest to you, sir, that merely the fact the media have been allowed to comment on the budget immediately at eight o'clock has been at the root of this difficulty. In my view, the answer is not to put this on the television screen. It was tried at Queen's Park some three years ago. The provincial treasurer spoke at that time for the same length of time as did the minister last night, for 90 minutes or more, and the total audience was lost insofar as the budget was concerned. No minister can hold an audience for 90 minutes, particularly with the type of budget that is sometimes delivered.

It is my suggestion, as a means of improving the procedure, that if there is to be a lengthy budget statement, the minister, within the rules as they now stand, should indicate that he will make a short address, seek the leave of the House to table his budgetary statements, then merely give the highlights and sit down. The document will have been in the hands of the opposition and the opposition spokesmen, instead of having to wait until ten o'clock to make their comments to the press—as was done last night—could wait, as I have done in the past, until the minister had finished his comments on the budget.

I suggest that if we are going to pay attention to the media, the national audience is lost if it has to watch the whole proceeding. This is my suggestion regarding how these proceedings could be shortened. The budgetary statement and the accompanying documents would be in the hands of hon. members, there could be a statement and questions, and then debate could start by ten o'clock. I offer that suggestion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West has made some remarks on the point of order which was originally raised, and logically put forward his suggestions. I would not want this afternoon to get into a situation in which all hon. members who have suggestions with regard to this point of order would seek the floor to speak. The point has been discussed and I think the general will has been expressed. Surely the competent body, which I think is the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, should look at this question of the budgetary presentation to see whether or not before the next budget is presented all recommendations by hon. members might be given proper consideration, in the hope that a procedure can be developed which will satisfy the desires and ambitions of anyone who wishes to make some comments this afternoon.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question—

Mr. Speaker: Questions have been put to the minister, and there are others who seek to ask questions of the minister. This procedure is irregular. A point of order has been raised. There is much interest in the subject. Those who seek the floor this afternoon in the capital punishment debate are expecting to speak, and I do not think we should now get into a further question period with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a question of privilege resulting from the question I raised earlier. I have two short examples. One is a case which arose in 1936 in the British House of Commons. At that time Mr. Thomas, the colonial secretary, merely made a remark to a member of parliament of his own party, a Mr. Butt, that taxes may increase on tobacco and beer, following which he went into the House to read his speech. Later it was reported. In cabinet next morning he realized his indiscretion and resigned. It was laid down in Keith's book on constitutional law that there is a fundamental principle behind the doctrine of secrecy when a budget is drafted. The idea is not only to avoid evil, but to avoid the appearance of evil. The idea behind the whole thing is that a leak might permit someone to benefit from the information.

Then there is a second case, that of Sir Hugh Dalton in 1945. When he was walking into the chamber, he spoke to a Mr. Carvel, a newspaper reporter for the Star in England, and made some remark about taxes on sugar. After some discussion, a committee was set up to study the situation. This is what Mr. Dalton said in his letter of resignation:

My dear Prime Minister,

In view of the incident which was raised today in the House I think it is my duty to offer you my resignation. If you accept it I shall continue, though now outside its ranks, to do my utmost to support the government—

In reply, the late Sir Winston Churchill wrote the following:

I realize that this indiscretion in itself did not result in any action detrimental to the state, but the principle of the inviolability of the budget is of the highest importance and the discretion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who necessarily receives many confidential communications, must be beyond question.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we must not consider this matter hastily and dismiss it. A special committee was set up at that time, and this is what they said:

1. Mr. Dalton made a premature and unpremeditated disclosure—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should stress to the hon. member for Calgary North that there is no serious disagreement with the precedents he is citing, but I am not clear as to what he is attempting to raise. Is he putting forward a question of privilege that there has been a budgetary leak of any sort? If so, I would welcome hearing that proposition from the hon. member. His arguments in support of that matter are not being questioned.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, my point is this. I ask the Minister of Finance what was discussed in caucus in a general way: Was it in reference to the statutes, or was the Liberal caucus asked, "If I put this in the budget, will it be palatable to the constituents you represent?" If he went that far, or if he admits he disclosed information to his own caucus, then I say he is vulnerable. He should take the responsibility for the decision he made. That is why I quoted examples. These are very important precedents. That is why we have a rule of secrecy with regard to the budget. Everything depends on the manner in which these matters were discussed. I put this fairly and squarely through you to the minister, Mr. Speaker. I hope the minister will answer me in that regard.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, surely I have already answered this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1530)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I indicated that the possibility of a range of changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act was discussed in the Liberal caucus by the members of that caucus.

Mr. Woolliams: In reference to the budget?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In reference to possible changes to be announced at the time the budget was announced. I also remind the hon. gentleman that he also has confirmed my own case. The two examples he cited have been with regard to the statutes affecting the fiscal responsibility of the Minister of Finance, and not those relating to the responsibility of another minister.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD—CONCENTRATION OF RADIOACTIVE GAS RADON

Question No. 5,309—Mr. Lawrence:

1. What is the maximum concentration of the radioactive gas radon which is presently considered by the Atomic Energy Control Board to be permissible without causing a public health hazard?

2. Does the Atomic Energy Control Board have any plans or proposals for reducing, or otherwise altering, the current safety standard and, if so (a) what will become the maximum permissible safe level of radon concentration (b) on what date will the new standard be adopted (c) what is the purpose of and reasons for changing the existing standard?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Atomic Energy Control Board reports as follows: 1. The maximum permissible concentration of radon in air, as of other radioactive isotopes, is derived from the maximum permissible doses of ionizing radiation specified in the Atomic Energy Control Regulations. In the case of radon almost all of the dose comes from the radioactive "daughter" products produced by the decay of radon. Depending on the rate of change of air in a particular room or space, the amount of dust, and other factors, the amount of these daughter products present may be equal to or considerably less than that which results from radioactive equilibrium. Assuming radioactive equilibrium, the worst case, the maximum permissible concentrations, for members of the general public, are: (a) 1 picocurie per litre (above natural background) for continuous occupancy (in a private dwelling); (b) 3 picocuries per litre (above natural background) for 40 hours per week occupancy (public buildings or business premises). The naturally occurring background in dwellings in the Port Hope region range from 0.5 to 3 picocuries per litre. Measurements made in buildings in Port Hope indicate that the daughter products are present only to 20 to 40 per cent of that which would result with radio-active equilibrium. The maximum permissible concentration for radon varies inversely with the per cent of equilibrium of the daughter products. If, for example, the daughter products are present to only 25 per cent of equilibrium the maximum permissible concentrations are (a) 4 picocuries per litre (continuous); (b) 12 picocuries per litre (40 hours per week occupancy).

2. The Atomic Energy Control Board does not have any plans for reducing, or otherwise altering, the maximum permissible doses of ionizing radiation specified in the Atomic Energy Control Regulations.

ONTARIO COMMUNITY COLLEGES—TRAINING OF STUDENTS IN ENGLISH LANGUAGE

Question No. 5,311—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. How many seats have been purchased by the Department of Manpower and Immigration for training of students in English, as a second language, at Algonquin College and other similar colleges in Ontario for the period April 2, 1976 to December 31, 1976?

2. Is it the intention of the Department to carry on a similar programme for the year 1977 and, if so, to what extent?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. For the period April 2, 1976 to December 31, 1976 there have been 4,401 seats purchased in English as a Second Language Course in Ontario Community Colleges (60 of them being in Algonquin College) to provide language training to immigrants.

2. The Department has every intention of carrying on a similar program in 1977 but its extent has not yet been fully determined.

2. What is the specific breakdown of the cost figure of $2,186.55 and how much of this was for (a) room accommodation (b) meals (c) drink (d) tuition (e) anything else?

FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES—ATLANTIC CANADA

Question No. 5,358—Mr. Forrestall:

1. In December 1975, by province, how many family allowance cheques were mailed to families in Atlantic Canada?

2. By province, what was the total value of such cheques?

3. By province, what is the government's best estimate of the amount of money which would have been paid through indexing the family allowance thus far in 1976 to families in Atlantic Canada, but which has not been paid by virtue of the suspension of the indexing of such payments?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1.

	Number of Family Allowance cheques mailed
Province	December, 1975	January, 1976
Newfoundland	90,169	90,536
P.E.I.	17,356	17,258
Nova Scotia	124,410	124,571
New Brunswick	105,080	104,709
Totals	337,015	337,074

	Total value of Family Allowance cheques mailed
2. Province	December, 1975*	January, 1976
Newfoundland	$10,006,411	$5,050,911
P.E.I.	1,791,994	946,576
Nova Scotia	12,247,996	6,147,337
New Brunswick	10,554,251	5,295,756
Totals	34,600,652	17,440,580

* Due to the postal strike, Family Allowances payments for the months of November and December, 1975 for Atlantic Canada were combined in a single cheque and mailed by special arrangement on December 3, 1975. This was done in order to ensure that those eligible received their proper entitlement for November and December despite problems of delivery associated with the postal strike. As a result the December, 1975 statistics listed above include the Family Allowances payments for both November and December, 1975. The normal value of Family Allowances cheques sent to families in Atlantic Canada is reflected in the figures for January, 1976.

	Estimated amount of Family Allowance not paid due to suspension of indexing
3. Province	January 1, 1976 to March 31, 1976
Newfoundland	$1,674,472
P.E.I.	305,003
Nova Scotia	2,043,542
New Brunswick	1,760,495

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Parks Canada acquired a service station from Imperial Oil Limited held under lease for the sum of $55,000 for the estate in leasehold together with improvements.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, on March 10 my motion No. 94, which was agreed to, read as follows:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the most recent magazine, newspaper or newsletter published by each department, agency or Crown corporation.

I do not like to complain, but it has been 2½ months and I still have not received copies of the material which it was agreed would be tabled. I would appreciate it if the parliamentary secretary would do something about that. I also wish the parliamentary secretary would do something about my motion No. 86 which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked to be called last week.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of the business at six o'clock yesterday I had embarked upon a discussion about the causes of crime and also about the arguments those of us on the abolition side of this issue have made. The entire debate, in a sense, deflects the public mind away from dealing realistically with the subject of murder and with other crime.

With regard to the argument dealing with the causes of crime, the great tragedy in this country continues to be that we do not take a realistic view of how to reduce anti-social behaviour. By concentrating on whether we hang or do not hang, I do not think we make much of a contribution in either direction in terms of the reduction of the murder rate. If we go back to capital punishment, I have no doubt that there will be a public storm to remove hanging again because then the media will concentrate not on the victims of crime but on murderers. The media will give us three pages dealing with a murderer's last hours, what his last meal was, how the priest led him down to the scaffold and how the murderer's face went blue in the agony of the whole thing.

I believe the public mood will turn, and I have no illusions about the public mood. I am satisfied that a majority in this country favour the return of the death penalty, and that in my own constituency there is a majority which favours the death penalty. I must apologize to those constituents who disagree with the position I take, but I believe they understand that position. I believe they understood it in the last election in 1974 when I was re-elected. I made my position clear in 1972 and in 1974, and I am making it clear again today.

I do not expect a man who runs for parliament to change the views he holds at the time he runs depending on the winds which may be blowing back and forth across his riding. I have taken a very strong position in this House in terms of removal of abortion from the Criminal Code, but I would say that if a person running for parliament believed in the principle of the right to life on that issue and made his position clear in his riding, I, as his constituent, would not expect him to come to this place and change his vote on that fundamental matter of conscience. That is the principle we have to abide by, and that is the tradition of this place.

It is absolutely vital that we continue to support that principle, because if we abandon it we abandon parliament and the traditions of parliament. If we really want to reflect the opinion of every constituent, we can plug them all into a television set. Every bill in the House could be voted upon by every eligible voter. That is quite feasible. Computers can do it but, quite frankly, parliamentary democracy would become irrelevant in that case—and I do not want to see parliamentary democracy become irrelevant.

As I have said, I think this argument deflects a meaningful discussion of the question of whether we have death or not in terms of the sanctions under our Criminal Code. What we have created in this society is tremendous disparities of income. Every study shows that in the urban areas, regardless of the general wealth, the greater the disparities, the higher the crime rate and the higher the murder rate. One could go to New York, Detroit, Vancouver or Montreal; this is consistent throughout the world. Expectations are raised and people are brain-damaged and manipulated by exposure to violence on the media. When you put these factors together, you clearly increase that risk.

● (1540)

I should like to turn, again, to the responsibility of the media, although I spoke about it at some length yesterday, Mr. Speaker. The time has passed when we should allow the media to peddle violence for the purpose of selling any product. I think that is wrong. We must give some attention to the effect that violence in the media is having. I should like to refer to an article which appeared in Monday's Globe and Mail which carried a report from Miami Beach. The article said:

> A psychiatric research team reports that violence on television may produce similar behaviour on the part of the viewer.
> The study, by three researchers at the University of California at Los Angeles, was presented here yesterday to the annual meeting of the American Psychiatric Association.
> Dr. Roderic Gorney, associate professor of psychiatry and director of the study said that men assigned to watch only violent programs showed more hurtful behaviour in their homes than men who watched only programs regarded as helpful or pro-social.

The media have some responsibility, but they are not cleaning their own backyard. Mr. Speaker, I have known the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) for a long time. She has taken a keen interest in all matters of crime, not merely the death penalty, and has dealt quite articulately with the case for retention. I should like to deal specifically with some of her arguments now. The hon. member indicated that the probability of mistake is minuscule, that the only known mistake is the Evans-Christie case in England. She is willing to admit that in that case an innocent man was hanged. I am sorry she is not here, because I should like to refresh her memory about a number of cases that she was involved in as a journalist.

When I was in law school, a man called Ducharme was accused of killing a woman. The prosecuting lawyer was Tom Norris, who later became Mr. Justice Norris, a judge of the Supreme Court and a judge of the Court of Appeal, and subsequently head of the Norris commission which was instrumental in cleaning up the Great Lakes in terms of related labour gangsterism. Mr. Norris has been an abolitionist for a long time and is an articulate spokesman for that side of the case. I am convinced that one of the reasons for his view is his involvement as prosecutor in the Ducharme case. There was no confession in that case, and while there was suspicion, there was never any hard or conclusive evidence that Ducharme had in fact killed the 44-year old spinster. Although the circumstances were extremely suspicious and overwhelming enough for the jury to convict, I think everyone involved in that case had some real doubts.

Then we have the Coffin case, the Truscott case and the Raymond Cook case. We can read and read and read, Mr. Speaker—but how do we give a man back his life? How do we correct the awesome error the state makes when it takes the life of an innocent man? Yesterday the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) pointed out that the capacity for error is small—and I agree. There are a number of safety factors within the Criminal Code to guard against mistakes. But no justice system is perfect, and that is one of the reasons why so many people involved in it are abolitionists, why so many who are prosecutors, defenders of judges come down on the side of abolition. The circumstances and facts of every case vary. They know that there are many cases where they can be certain—but are they morally certain? I think before we take anyone's life we should be morally certain.

Some people say we should exclude the circumstantial case. To paraphrase the Hodges' rule, it says that circumstances have to be consistent with guilt and inconsistent with innocence. They forget that the question of identification of the murderer becomes a key part of any murder trial where there is a dispute about identification. If we exclude that, then we exclude almost every case in terms of the death penalty.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway dealt with the case of James Carey in which she was heavily involved. His is probably the living embodiment of a case for abolition. He continues to live in Fredericton, New Brunswick, and I believe was head of the Rotary Club. He has been an exemplary citizen since his release from penitentiary. He was charged with the murder of a police officer in Vancouver, and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway was instrumental in having his death sentence commuted. I think all of society is in her debt for the work she did to see that James Carey did not die.

The hon. member has justified the change in her position on capital punishment on the fact that Carey did not pull the trigger. But I want to ask her about the case of Miller and Cockrell who are presently awaiting the death penalty for the murder of a policeman in Cloverdale. One pulled the trigger, and the other did not. Is that a case where one sentence should be commuted but not the other? I do not believe we should commute the long prison sentences involved in that case; there should clearly be long sentences for that kind of despicable murder. But the death sentence in that case will not provide safety for the police officers of Canada. The death sentence would not have saved the life of the constable who was killed.

Some confusion in this debate arises from the belief that those who argue for retention argue for safety. I say they argue a case that will not stand in terms of deterrence, and will not stand in terms of providing additional public safety. In the history of man, the death penalty itself has never been applied in a non-discriminatory way. The prejudices of people, the politization of the penalty, mean that the underprivileged hang and the rich never hang. That will be just as true if we return to the imposition of the death penalty in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think my son, if he ever committed the crime of murder, which God forbid, would hang because of the political pressure that would be placed upon cabinet by the PTA and people who would have known his history, and so on. But if you take the case of a native child on a reserve who may kill, he would probably hang. That was the tradition in Canada, and certainly in the United States where 50 per cent of those hanged were black. They certainly did not commit 50 per cent of the murders in the United States. We have to ask ourselves some deep and searching questions about the way we apply the death penalty. The final decision belongs with the cabinet, Mr. Speaker, but we are all fallible and human. There is no way we can bring the death penalty back in Canada and apply it in a fair and consistent way. If we bring it back, we will be lowering the standards of justice in the country in a very significant way.

Yesterday the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) referred to the problems faced by the people who have responsibility for guarding long-term prisoners who are also murderers. I have some sympathy for their position, Mr. Speaker. We know that a 25-year sentence is really a 15-year sentence in terms of this bill. I suspect that in almost every case, certainly the majority of cases, parole will be granted shortly after 15 years have been served, when the judicial report is made. If we argue that abolition of the death penalty creates a high risk for guards—and I admit there is some risk—we must concede there is also a high risk for police officers trying to apprehend someone when the death penalty is imposed for murder. In those circumstances, the felon has nothing to lose. That is why the death penalty was abolished in Austria, and indeed the police were instrumental in having it abolished. They felt it compromised their safety when apprehending dangerous criminals. I hope we will give serious attention to this view. I think it is important that we have hope and confidence in our fellowman.

● (1550)

When we do something which leads people to abandon hope and confidence, we take a backward step; we go opposite to the direction of social progress, opposite to the direction which leads to social improvement. When Wilberforce argued in the British House of Commons that slavery should be abolished, people thought he was crazy. After all, slavery had been with us since the dawn of history. His concept was revolutionary; but Wilberforce fought for his ideals and won, and his victory was a small step forward for man. When we abolish the death penalty, we shall take another faltering step forward, a faltering step which will lead to the long-term improvement of mankind. As a society, we must seek to become more humane, compassionate and civilized. Surely that is the end we seek.

I urge members of parliament to gird up their courage, to listen to their conscience and to abolish the death penalty. I say, you will not increase the murder rate in Canada; you will enhance the safety of all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us expresses the will of this government to abolish completely the death penalty as a possible punishment for the murder of a policeman or a prison guard.

The question is still very controversial and even if the bill were to be passed that would not necessarily mean the end of the debate; far from it, because the reasons for the discussions remain very active today despite the fact that, for several years now, the government has tried to decrease the application of the act as much as possible by gradually restricting its application and even simply refusing to apply it. Mr. Speaker, in fact one can say that the act was amended three times since 1961 at which time every murder was considered to be capital murder for which the penalty was always the death penalty.

In September of 1961, the act set up two categories: first, capital murder with the possible penalty of capital punishment. Here we were dealing with premeditated murder, that of a policeman, a prison guard or a judicial authority, and finally murders committed in the course of another criminal act. The second category included all other murders the penalty for which could be as severe as life imprisonment. Later, in September 1967, the act was amended again for a period of five years, reducing the notion of premedidated murder solely to those who were found guilty of the murder of representatives of the law.

In 1972, five years later, the House of Commons decided by a free vote that only the murder of a peace officer would be considered as capital murder. We know, Mr. Speaker, what happened afterwards, and we know very well that, for all practical purposes, it meant the abolition of capital punishment, since all death penalties have been commuted to life sentences for several years. This matter has been discussed for several years, yet it is still with us today.

I had the opportunity to take part in many debates on capital punishment both outside and in the House, where I first came in 1968. I heard practically every possible argument and figure from either side, and I personally quoted many of them to support my views and add weight to my arguments. In 1972, I even went as far as to conduct a survey of 18 heads of families in my riding, the results of which I submitted to the House to emphasize that the great majority of our fellow citizens were in favour of reinstating capital punishment, and it is still practically the same situation that prevails in the riding of Richmond which I have the honour to represent today in the House.

For instance, in February 1976, 1777 heads of families in my riding answered a question which I put to all of them. Question (A) was as follows: Do you agree that cabinet should commute death penalties to life sentences after the court has condemned the criminal to death? Out of a total of 1676 people who answered this question, 330 said "Yes", and 1,346 "No". Therefore, 19.7 per cent are in favour and 80.3 per cent are against. Question (B) was as follows: In the case of premeditated and capital murder, do you approve of the death penalty? Out of a total of 1,688 answers to this question, there were 1,469 "Yes" and 219 "No". Which means that 87 per cent are in favour, while 13 per cent are opposed to it. To question (C): Should parole be granted to a criminal convicted of premeditated murder, 1,676 people answered, 97 said "Yes", and 1,579 "No". This means that 5.8 per cent are in favour and 94.2 per cent are against.

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

Since the matter has again been brought in the House today, I intend this time to deal with it in a completely different way. This is why I will not refer to statistics and various views to discuss more particularly the basic principles involved as far as the death penalty is concerned. I want my intervention to be objective and clear of all emotivity or passion often raised during such discussions. First I will state the main points generally made for both sides of the matter. I then intend to put the death penalty in its present context where society is confronted with criminality, while recalling also how the penalty was applied throughout history. Afterwards, I would also like to interpret the policy of government authorities on the question and finally indicate my own position.

Should we be for or against the death penalty? This is the question. As to arguments made for the abolition or retention of capital punishment they are numerous and I will mention only the main ones. Those who wish at any cost to abolish entirely the death penalty sometimes say that it is merely a barbarian remnant which has no room in a so-called modern and civilized society. Some will advocate the humanitarian rehabilitation of murderers alleging the dignity of human life. Others will say that it is mere revenge, a backward application of the law of retaliation. Finally, a few, such as the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) for example, will argue that it is a useless step since, according to them, figures do not prove that it reduces the number of murders. Those are the major reasons advanced by those in favour of abolishing this penalty.

● (1600)

On the other hand, the retentionists suggest mainly that this is an effective means to reduce the number of murders by arousing the fear of punishment in the criminals. Others suggest that the carrying out of this sentence would be a deterrent for potential criminals. Finally, others say that the implementation of capital punishment would automatically deal with those who relapse into crime and commit more than one murder.

All those arguments from both sides may be discussed one by one and supported by figures and striking examples. I will return indirectly to this later on, but for the moment I would like to place this issue in its true context of everyday life and to relate it to our own society. I sincerely believe that only this way will we be able to deal with the issue realistically, because otherwise the discussion remains philosophical and I consider, if I may use that phrase, that it is only hot air which leads nowhere.

As a matter of fact, if we do not want to miss the point completely, we must agree at the outset that the problem of capital punishment is closely linked to several other social problems. Therefore, we cannot deal with it and analyze it without relating it to the other problems our society is afflicted with, because they are the other pieces of the puzzle of crime, of which murder is the last and most serious one. We must therefore criticize society as a whole if we are to understand the role capital punishment may or may not play. One must be completely blind not to admit that our modern society is faced with huge difficulties with regard to crime. And what becomes particularly alarming is that this phenomenon becomes general and affects all social strata.

To give a good description of the problem, let us say that there are two kinds of crimes: flagrant crimes and discrete crimes. Among flagrant crimes there may be various types of thefts (housebreaking, simple theft, car theft, robbery) as well as assault and battery, rape and, finally, murder. On the other hand, among the so-called discrete crimes, there are a great number of actions that are sometimes very surprising on the part of quite ordinary people which nobody would consider as reprehensible actions. Nevertheless, we may put in this category all kinds of tax evasions, secret stock exchange transactions, bribes, time stolen by an employee idle at work, and lies.

To convince oneself of the gravity of the situation, one just has to consider the worth of a promise in today's world, where even a signed contract is not honoured any more. Even if it seems a very strange thing to say, crime is almost accepted socially as something which is not quite bad or wrong.

That is why it is not unusual to hear people boast about the way they have financially deceived a partner, an employer or someone else, as though it were an achievement. Unfortunately, this way of thinking has been spreading on a large scale during the last few years and has literally poisoned human relationships in the financial, social and domestic fields. It is thus that we have progressively destroyed honesty, a sense of honour and trust to make way for this new type of morality which is actually nothing more than the resurgence of the law of the jungle under which each individual tries to grab all he can get without offering anything in return. If carried to the extreme, this goes as far as the elimination of the other individual, and there we have the whole process of crime which is almost accepted today and ranges from mere lie to murder. And this social acceptance of crime is emphasized even more by advertising which, generally speaking, pictures various offences under a glamourous guise and even turns some criminals into international stars. I shall go even further and suggest that our laws treat criminals better than they treat the honest silent majority of people.

To be convinced, one only has to see how considerate we are about providing sports facilities, entertainment and weekend passes for the criminal, whereas the jobless father has to fight with the unemployment insurance office to get the cheque he is lawfully entitled to. We are thinking of giving a salary to prisoners, but because of the anti-inflation program we reject higher family allowances and so on. One may notice in all this that the victims are forgotten and that he who is against this new morale is not even considered as up-to-date or normal. This brings me to say that the present debate is biased, because generally our laws as well as society itself already favour the criminal. I would go as far as saying that the present discussions are basically false; as evidence, one only has to recall how senior employees of the department succeeded in bringing the minister to sell the idea of abolishing capital punishment by reducing it gradually these last years.

The other question which arises, Mr. Speaker, is this: Is justice capable of being just? Before going any further on capital punishment as such, I wish to ask a question which, in my view, is fundamental and which has not been mentioned by anyone or very few people. Can justice as we know it today be trusted and is it capable of applying effectively and fairly laws such as the one on capital punishment? This question is extremely important since it must be expected that those who are responsible for administering justice practice what they preach, so that the whole of society is trustful and their work is fruitful.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, the answer is not completely reassuring. Unfortunately, one must see reality as it is, and integrity seems to be gradually stepping aside to be replaced by bribery, political dealings, patronage and all those types of new ethics which creep into large corporations, governments and even justice. One only has to see how certain judges are appointed, sometimes more for their political services than their integrity.

The death penalty is not something new and history tells us that it has been applied through times in every possible way and for all imaginable purposes. In the beginning of mankind, millions of men, women and even children were executed; in ancient times, for instance, criminals were done away through stoning, hanging and crucifying. In ancient Rome, they were thrown to the lions and throughout the medieval period, in the name of religion we burned, quartered and beheaded those who were called heretics.

Then the guillotine appeared in France. After came the electric chair in the United States as well as the gas chamber. Those were the ways to apply capital punishment but there were also other means; during the Second World War, Hitler's Germany condemned to death millions of human beings—Polish, Ukrainians, Jews and others—who were hanged, shot or passed through the gas chamber. The death penalty in those days was called Dachau, Auschwitz and so on.

Closer to us, Vietnam has been the scene of numerous executions under the cover of the raging war. Quite recently again, according to the media, capital punishment was imposed in Angola on several people unwilling to help the UNITA, and I can well imagine that it was the same with ALNF and ALPM. To be convinced, one only has to recall the recent piece of news indicating that in northern Angola every woman was raped at least three times by Cuban soldiers. We can then understand why the death penalty may be imposed for whatever reason in some countries.

Yet that is only a very brief historical account on capital punishment, but I think it is sufficient to realize all the abuses to which this penalty gave rise from the beginnings of humanity until today. If I take the trouble of raising all these facts on the death penalty, it is to place the issue in its context. Closer to us, Mr. Speaker, let us see what are the attitudes of governments and ministers responsible for that issue. Last year, the chiefs of police in the province of Quebec, meeting in a convention, adopted one resolution as did the Canadian association of mayors, urging the government to impose capital punishment in view of the incredible increase in violence and in the number of murders.

● (1610)

In reply to a question, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) later stated:

> I categorically refuse to be associated in any way with a hanging.

That is his privilege. On the other hand, the then minister of justice of the province of Quebec, Mr. Jérôme Choquette, stated he disagreed with that resolution and the death penalty was not consistent with the concept of human progress. That is serious. If someone in the street had made such a suggestion, there would not have been great harm. But when one or two ministers responsible for supporting and enforcing the law will not enforce it or respect it themselves, it is getting serious. Is that the so-called progress concept? Is that the kind of attitude public authorities should have to instill respect for the law? In such circumstances, how can they require citizens to abide by the income tax act, for instance, or any other act for that matter? Maybe that is one of the links in the heavy chain of crime that is crushing society at all levels.

Mr. Speaker, some people refer to the Bible to defend their theory on capital punishment or in support of this legislation. As far as the Solicitor General is concerned, I wish he had been as energetic to enforce the law as it now stands as he has been in selling his or his officials' idea of complete abolition. He spoke on the subject on a number of occasions and I shall refer to the speech he made in March 1975 entitled: Prevention and control of violent crime in Canada. At some point, he referred once again to the Bible forbidding to kill. That point is made now and then, and it deserves closer examination.

The Solicitor General stated, and I quote:

The paramount issue is one of morality. Are we justified in taking a human life through capital punishment? Execution does not erase the crime of murder. It takes away another life. The commandment, "Thou shalt not kill" is part of our Judaeo-Christian heritage. It emphasizes the value of human life.

True, the Lord gave that law. It is also a fact that this same law stresses the paramount importance of human life. But it is not quite fair to use that one verse out of context and without any reference to the other directions God gave us, in an attempt to prove He is against capital punishment. That would go against what the Bible says further on. First of all, God created man free, so that he may accept or reject the commandments He gave him to be happy. Now, man misused that freedom by rejecting the divine commandments, preferring to decide by himself what is good or wrong, and we know with what result which was not long coming, since the first generation had its first murderer, Cain.

So, in the beginning, seeing that man misused his freedom and rejected even His commandments, the Creator determined penalties according to offences, and that is why God said, as reported in the Bible, and I quote:

Whoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.

That is quite different from what the Solicitor General said.

Mr. Speaker, in the same address, the Solicitor General proposed a whole series of preventive measures, and I quote:

What, then, do I suggest in place of this? Some of the measures that I propose to prevent and reduce crime are the following: better trained, better deployed and better equipped policemen; effective gun control, proactive rather than reactive police work, more effective correctional programs for juveniles and adults . . . and so on . . .

Mr. Speaker, I want to stress that those are truly fantastic proposals and the minister must be commended for them.

The only thing I regret is that those are very nice words to put on a postcard, for instance, but apart from that, they are nearly useless since they do not correspond at all to reality. They are more like smoke than anything else. I have the impression that the minister is still thinking like a Pee-Wee and that he has been drafted by the major leagues without realizing it.

Professional criminals and organized crime are omnipotent and some people even say that they have friends quite near the government . . . Gangland murders are becoming more and more frequent, and so are senseless murders. The streets of our major cities are no longer safe. Violence increases everywhere. Our "modern and sophisticated" civilization has become that of highjacking, political assassination, hostage taking and kidnapping. Even our youths take part in this spiral of violence and seem to prepare a society which will be far from restful.

For instance, the United States News and World Report issue of January 26 last published an especially impressive article entitled "Terror in Schools". It says that violence and vandalism have taken epidemic proportions to which no one seems able to remedy. Between 1970 and 1973, murders in schools increased by 18 per cent, theft by 37 per cent, assaults on students by 85 per cent and assaults on teachers by 77 per cent. Indeed, in view of the urgent need to put a stop to violence, the Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Edward Levi, who had been against this penalty before, is now in favour of capital punishment in certain cases.

During this time, the Solicitor General intends to aim his action nearly exclusively at prevention, as if this were sufficient. This is very naive reasoning! I believe there must be prevention, but it is not enough; as in the education of children, it is necessary to have just but strict penalties according to the seriousness of the offence. Whether we accept this or not, it is a deterrent which, to some extent, will stop certain criminals. Mr. Speaker, these last few years, we have forgotten the victims.

Our justice has become so slow and lax that we forget about the victims and we even go as far as considering it horrible to punish criminals for the simple reason that too much time has elapsed between the crime and judgement or the carrying out of the judgement so that it is hard to see why they are punished. In this sense, the death penalty has long become ridiculous because of a simple political game.

As I have already said, to be efficient, a judgement must be carried out. Even if it is in the Criminal Code, that is not enough. It must be carried out immediately after the judgement and it should not be delayed by never ending time lapses, until the crime if forgotten or until it seems almost innocuous. Otherwise, the criminals are finally considered as victims, as this bill wishes and we forget about the true victims. Besides, I would like, Mr. Speaker, to read to the House a letter written on February 8 this year, which I have just received, and which tells a lot about this subject:

Dear Mr. Beaudoin:

I send this letter to you and to anyone who might be interested in this subject. The results of the present discussions about the death penalty affect the whole country. A bill to abolish the death penalty will be introduced in the House on February 9, 1976. This is a rather curious coincidence but for me this particular date is the saddest of all. You see, sir, February 9 is the date of my daughter's birthday. She would have been 17 this year but she will never be. My daughter Sharron was savagely killed on March 29, 1975. She had gone to see some friends four blocks from where we live but never got there. Three days later, her body was discovered in a field a few miles away. She had been kept prisoner for three days, raped, hit so hard that she had a double jaw fracture, a skull fracture, a broken nose and ripped organs.

The cause of death: asphyxia by blood in her lungs and her abductor also strangled her. She had been bound and gagged. In looking at statistics about murder in recent years, I must say there has been a very steep increase in the number of murders. As an example, in the province of Quebec alone, there were 17 murders in 1955, 53 in 1965, 217 in 1975. Something has to be done.

Not only is the number of murders increasing dangerously, but also the nature of the crime is becoming ever more sadistic. With the laws as they now stand. I have to believe in capital punishment, not neccessarily by hanging or by the electric chair, but by sleep, the same way we put a dangerous dog to sleep. As to the argument about the risk of putting innocents to death it would be the exceptions who would remain in prison until they are recognized innocent. In my view, the law is a joke. At present, capital punishment for the murder of a policeman or prison guard exists, but only in the texts of law and not in reality. If you cannot trust the law, whom can you trust? I believe in God and I consider myself a Christian and I believe in the word of God when he speaks to Moses in the Bible in Numbers, chapter 35, verses 16 to 21. Those assassins eat, sleep, play cards, tell jokes, have a lot of fun and now they want to form an association in prisons while their innocent victims who had their lives taken away lie in their coffins.

Those victims cannot speak for themselves.

They need your vote.

I trust in God to help you.

Mrs. Yvonne Prior
445 Congregation Street
Montréal.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, in the present state of things where reality indicates a frightening increase in murders and violence in general, continuing to spare hard-core murderers, as proposed in the bill before us, is automatically to condemn others, that is innocents, to pay the price with their lives. So under this legislation the government and particularly the Solicitor General indicate that they want first to protect criminals by reducing their sentences—pending the time when they will offer them trophies and trips to the South—rather than protect the citizens.

Not only must I be against this bill but I must say that in my opinion a responsible government should immediately reinstate capital punishment in Canada, and I should be actually enforced in cases of capital murder—I stress capital—premeditated or committed in the perpetration of another criminal act. However, I expressed certain reservations and that is why I pointed out certain abuses that had resulted from the death penalty in history. I also think that the death penalty alone will not solve the problem of murder because murder represents only the last link in the whole chain of crime which should also be reduced by other means.

However, I know it would check the increase of all types of murders. But I also know that the Solicitor General, as well as the government, wants his legislation to pass at all costs with what is, I hope, nothing but touching guilelessness. I for one took the time to consider all the basic principles of that issue. As for the rest, the Solicitor General, supported to some extent by the cabinet and his caucus, will have to assume the responsibility of the view he defends so desperately. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I wish to quote a few sentences spoken on April 21, 1968, at Notre-Dame de Paris by Reverend Marcel Cornelis, on the 53rd anniversary of the mass murders of Armenians. This reverend father said, and I agree whole heartedly:

Each time we remain unconcerned or shed hypocritical tears in the presence of crime, an even more serious crime is about to be committed, a crime for which we shall no doubt assume our share of responsibility.

He who through his passivity and unconcern is an accessory to a crime committed today is already an accessory to the more serious crime which will be committed tomorrow, and let him beware because he who is now only an indifferent spectator could become tomorrow a bleeding victim.

[English]

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by congratulating the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). I have attended the House and listened to a good deal of the debate on this very important and emotional issue, and I thought he was one of very few members who brought some new thoughts and new approaches to this over-all problem. Were he in the House, I would congratulate him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Milne: Unlike some of the members of this chamber who have been here for some years, this is the first occasion I have had to address the House on the subject of capital punishment. Since the time I was elected to parliament I do not believe I have dealt with any issue that has been more sensitive or more difficult in coming to a conclusion. I think I can say in all truthfulness that I have approached this subject with an open mind. I did not have any great depth of knowledge of the law when I originally analysed this problem, and I sincerely felt I could be persuaded by arguments for either side. I wanted to maintain an objective perspective on capital punishment because I considered it my duty to evaluate all reasonable arguments on both sides of question. It is my respectful submission that members of this House who have prepared themselves as either ardent abolitionists or ardent retentionists have seriously limited their capabilities of giving their constituents' arguments a fair hearing.

Because I am not a lawyer I did not have a full grasp of the legal intricacies of the question. I should like to express my indebtedness to Senator Neiman, of the other place, whose excellent speech of May 29, 1975, illuminates the salient legal issues of the capital punishment question, and I recommend it to all hon. members to read.

I have, personally, made every attempt to research the capital punishment question thoroughly. I have spoken with lawyers, policemen, criminologists and social workers. Indeed, I have had the opportunity of discussing the issues with people who have spent a considerable number of years on death row. For the benefit of my constituents and for my own discipline in preparing for this vote coming up, I have written papers on the history of capital punishment, on the law on capital punishment and on the referendum on capital punishment. In addition to that, I have distributed to a good number of people a number of papers, particularly one on theology and capital punishment.

The greatest part of my study was devoted to discussing this subject with my constituents. Like most members, the correspondence I have received on the subject has been voluminous. The topic arose at the two latest series of town hall meetings recently held in my riding, and I certainly gained a great amount of valuable information from my constituents on those occasions.

Like all Canadians, the people of Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe have a deep-rooted concern about the direction our criminal justice system is heading. They are concerned that society may not adequately be protected against violent crime. They want reassurances that our legal institutions are capable of dealing with anti-social elements properly and effectively. A sense of anxiety or uneasiness has naturally followed the wave of violent crime of recent years which has taken unprecedented sensational dimensions. Through radio and television, Canadians are intimate witnesses to such incredible international incidents as the recent murders of diplomats in Paris, and each day on the news we hear about the incessant, senseless violence that troubles Northern Ireland. Disturbing incidents of this nature cannot help but exert an unsettling influence on our own feeling of security here in Canada.

Here at home many Canadians perceive that violent crime is spiralling out of control. The truth is that we enjoy one of the safest societies in the world. To a large extent, this distorted perception of violent crime has been fostered by the media's sensational treatment of isolated incidents such as gangland murders in Montreal and hostage incidents in British Columbia prisons. We often hear the viewpoint that criminals in Canada are conducting their nefarious activities without any fear of restraint or apprehension. I do not believe this reflects reality. If it were true, Canada would by now have fallen into the same hopeless state of anarchy and confusion which engulfs more and more nations.

This is not to say that various aspects of our criminal law process are not in desperate need of reform. People are genuinely concerned about the shortcomings in our system of granting bail, and I am glad to see the provisions of Bill C-71 have now been proclaimed into law. This legislation should make strides in reducing the abuses which our bail laws have suffered in the past.

The vast majority of Canadians are disturbed about the proliferation of guns in our society and their increasing use in criminal acts. Part of Bill C-83 seeks to redress this problem, and as I have spoken on this matter on two earlier occasions in the House I will not deal with it further today. There is concern about the parole system in Canada, about the process of temporary release of inmates convicted of dangerous offences, and about the sentencing procedures for dealing with incorrigible offenders; but Bill C-83 attempts to respond to these problems also. The peace and security proposals before parliament are, again, the kind of action many Canadians are demanding. They are anxious to see effective measures placed into law which hold a promise of combating the trend toward violent crime.

I should like to put this in better perspective. What is the question with which we are dealing? I do not believe we are dealing in isolation with the question: Are members in favour of capital punishment or not? Or, on a theoretical basis, whether or not they are in favour of capital punishment. If that were the case, certainly I would think that the polls are correct in that 70 per cent to 75 per cent of Canadians favour the retention of capital punishment under these conditions.

Surely, the question parliament is considering at this point in time and, indeed, will be voting on in perhaps not too many days, is the following: Given better law and order through the provisions of the peace and security bill, such as gun control, sentencing of dangerous offenders, wiretapping, crime inquiries, parole, bail as passed recently, crime prevention and redefinition of murder, with first-degree murder carrying a life sentence of 25 years, certainly before parole can even be applied for, do we still need capital punishment on the law books of Canada to deal effectively with crime in our society?

● (1630)

With respect, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I think that is very different from the question: Are we, or are we not, in favour of capital punishment? This is the difficulty I have with public opinion polls. I do not think they accurately reflect on the question with which parliament is dealing, because most of the polls I have seen which have given this preponderance of opinion on the retentionist side have asked the simple question concerning whether or not we are simply in favour of capital punishment.

My experience with town hall meetings, which I should like to share with the House, has been that when the question of capital punishment has come up, it is true that when a poll is taken often 75 per cent of the people attending are in favour of capital punishment. But on a review of the law, the royal prerogative, the plea of clemency and the history of the law as it has been developed, and after discussing the provisions of Bill C-83 and then asking how many people are still in favour of capital punishment, the result is very evenly divided. In fact, we have had meetings at which perhaps only one-third of those present, with a better understanding of the law, would still want capital punishment retained.

I think, as many members have mentioned, that is reflected in the Gallup poll as published in the Ottawa Citizen of March 4, to the effect that what society wants is better law and order and that it may be satisfied with that instead of capital punishment. The question is asked: If we can achieve better law and order, would we, or would we not, be satisfied to see an end to the death penalty in Canada? I really think that is the question. The national poll indicated that 48 per cent would say yes, that 48 per cent would say no, and that the other 4 per cent are not sure. I would point out to hon. members that should this bill fail to pass and we return to capital punishment and carry out capital punishment with the three people on death row on July 15, I really suspect there would be a very different feeling across Canada and I would think that a poll taken at that time would indicate that a very small percentage of the people would in fact support capital punishment.

There is one other aspect of this on which I want to comment because I think it is rather important. I refer to the question of the numbers. In 1974 there were something like 545 murders in Canada. Only seven of these involved policemen or prison guards. If the law had been applied systematically, I wonder if we would have had seven cases of capital punishment. One thing that is disappointing to me is why in this House we are not debating more seriously the question of the 538 other murders. Surely they should be of equal importance and should share a good deal of the time of the House. I think this is what the hon. member for New Westminster devoted most of his speech to.

I have been reading that some 70 per cent of the people who have been murdered have been known to the person committing the murder, and that probably 40 per cent of all these murders, which is well over 200, are domestic murders. It would seem to me that the time of the House would be well taken in a good discussion of some of the trends in our society which lead to the rapid increase in murder in domestic situations. I think of such things as our rapid trend toward urbanization, the poverty levels we have in certain areas, versus the expectation certain people have, the display of violence by the media on television, and so on, and such things as job frustration, overuse of alcohol, depression and drugs. I think members really should be talking about all these things, because in the case of prison guards and policemen we are dealing with something like half of 1 per cent of the crime and we are dealing with a very small percentage of the murders committed in Canada.

It seems to me that in coming to a conclusion on this very difficult question there are three major considerations. One is the revenge approach. There is the question of is, or is not, capital punishment a deterrent, and whether or not we really are interested in rehabilitation of people who commit crimes. I might just comment on revenge. It certainly is an opinion held by many people: they equate revenge with justice. A high percentage of the mail I have received merely supports capital punishment on this basis. I have great difficulty with that.

The law has developed over the years. Members will know, as well as I do, that we have hanged over 700 people during the history of Canada. The first person to be hanged, I understand, was a 15-year old girl, for the crime of stealing. Surely, the law and our society have developed a good deal since that point in time. who committed the offence is concerned. I really think that in this debate we would be wrong not to talk about some of the needs for rehabilitation and the reform of our penal institutions, because as an alternative to capital punishment, if we are to commit murderers to prison for terms of 25 years, we cannot neglect our present responsibility to modernize the prison system and provide work and rehabilitation situations in order to prevent the further development of a potentially violent and destructive malaise among our prison population.

Surely, it is socially unconscionable and irresponsible to imprison a murderer or any offender for practically indefinite periods of time without seriously evaluating the environment to which they will be subjected. It is of no benefit to society to throw away the key and by doing so increase the volatility and inhumanity of the prison setting. I think a policy of longer prison terms must be accompanied, not by a superficial satisfaction that greater justice has been done, but by an augmented concern for the treatment of the prisoner over these longer periods of time. Really, the key question is whether or not capital punishment is a deterrent to others who might commit murder.

My research—and I would like to think that I have done as much as any member of this House—cannot substantiate that it is a deterrent to other people who might commit crime, at least this type of crime. Certainly, if there is some question concerning whether or not it is a deterrent, it would seem to me that the responsibility really should be on those who support the retentionist stand to prove how strong a deterrent it is in fact.

I have reviewed, as I am sure have many others, the experience in other countries. I think Italy and France are two countries which might be compared. In Italy, which is an abolitionist country, the murder rate is 3.21 per 100,000, compared to France, which is a retentionist country, with a rate of 5.11 murders per 100,000. When we look at the statistical evidence in the United States there is very little difference in the murder rate between bordering states which have or which do not have capital punishment. I think, in reviewing this, we might refer to a few statements made by people who have looked into the matter in great detail. In 1958, the Massachusetts special committee investigating the abolition of the death penalty concluded:

> There appears to be, in fact, no greater deterrent effect in capital punishment than in a sentence of life. It does not contribute to the reduction of murder, it is simply an easy and harmful way of satisfying the need "to do something about it".

In Great Britain, the royal commission on capital punishment, which held hearings on the subject from 1949 to 1953, reported:

> The general conclusion which we have reached is that there is no clear evidence in any of the figures we have examined that the abolition of capital punishment has led to an increase in the homicide rate or that its reintroduction has led to a fall.

I fully concur with Schusessler in his report entitled "Murder and the Death Penalty" that statistical studies have uniformly concluded that the death penalty is consequential as a deterrent and that the relative frequency of murder in a given population is a function of the cultural conditions. So the basic point is: does capital punishment deter anyone from committing murder more than the prospect of life imprisonment? Professor Wilson says, as quoted in the minister's opening speech:

> It is a matter of dispute whether any penalty will have a deterrent effect on murders, but surely the prospect of a long prison term will have as much as most others.

I support that point of view quite strongly. There are a couple of other arguments that I would like to put forward. There seems to be a strong viewpoint that if we were to hang one, two or more people, that would effectively control crime in our society. I do not believe that and I do not subscribe to it. I oppose that point of view, because surely members who have been studying Bill C-83 carefully and the background to it would see in the statistics that the explosion of crime is really at the lower end of the crime scale. Crimes of violence as a percentage of both total and Criminal Code offences have not changed over the last 10 or 12 years. If anything, as a percentage there are less of them today than there were 10 years ago. What we are dealing with is a rapidly increasing rate of armed robberies, of arson, of sexual offences, of assault, and so on. There are more murders within the domestic setting. I do not think that if on July 15 we decide to hang two or three people, that will effectively control crime and there will no longer be any more corner milk stores robbed.

I am impressed with a quote from the Church Council of Justice and Corrections which reads as follows. I assume all hon. members have received material from them, but I would like to quote the following sentence:

> The available evidence suggest that the sanction of capital punishment does not really promote public safety by deterring potential killers, but that it does engender a false security in the public mind, which in turns delays community and government efforts to seek creative, realistic and humane alternatives more likely to prevent violence and restrain the violent.

I would recommend this material to hon. members, particularly the point of view that is set down there. The other argument which I would like to put forward and which I think is relevant here is respect for the law. All members of the House have been receiving in their mail letters which show that the country is demanding a return to real, tough law and order to combat a perceived rise in violent crime. A great deal of concern focuses on the administration of laws which already exist, and there is a feeling that our courts and prosecutors are being too lenient with dangerous offenders.

It is important in this debate that the citizens of Canada be reminded of the dichotemy of the justice system provided under our constitution. Simply put, the federal government enacts the laws and the provinces are charged with their administration from the arrest stage through the prosecution and sentencing stages in our courts. It is my opinion that the large degree of public concern should be directed at the provincial attorneys general who have the responsibility of directing the administration of criminal justice in Canada. Many of our present laws provide our courts with sufficient latitude to dispose of cases involving public safety in a way that conforms with public opinion. But our courts have been reluctant to administer the present laws to their full extent. I submit that if we were to make the law so tough or to revert to laws which existed back in the eighteenth century, as many people are demanding, many people would not respect the law and I do not think the courts would administer such a law, nor do I think the police would police the law if we were to do that. I think we want to be a little careful in how tough we make the law in response to many people who are demanding a return to the law which existed at the turn of the century.

In the remaining few minutes I have, I want to touch briefly on two other points. I want to speak as have many other members, about the concern I have about an individual who might be convicted of committing first-degree murder receiving a fair trial. I would not have thought this issue to be so important a year and half or two years ago, but I do today. Surely, all hon. members are conscious of the attitude being displayed toward minority groups here in this country recently and even, in fact, toward some language groups. That is why I raise this question of whether a fair trial can be held, because when we talk about the state taking the life of a human being we must have absolute confidence that the state can guarantee consistently fair trials with the minimum possibility of error, and I am not sure that is possible.

Let us consider, as an example, a wealthy person who is very articulate, well dressed, can afford the very best lawyer and witnesses brought from anywhere around the globe. The perception of that person by a jury, as compared to their perception of someone who may have considerable difficulty with the language, may not be articulate or well dressed and cannot afford the best legal support or witnesses, would be very different. I have heard lawyers discussing this in relation to the law courts. A businessman driving a very expensive car, who has had a few drinks at lunch, gets picked up by the police. Is he not treated quite differently from a youth with long hair, in a rusty old car who is charged with the same offence? There is a question as to whether in fact these two people are judged exactly the same in court. The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled capital punishment to be unconstitutional on these grounds.

We have to take into account that this is not an easy time to deal with the subject of capital punishment, given the present backlash with regard to minority groups, to those living in poverty, and, as I said, even to some linguistic groups. There is an old saying which applies here, that it is difficult to get a rich man into heaven and it is probably impossible to get his head into a noose. On the basis of religion, again, many people hold deep convictions on both sides of the issue, using religion as the basis of their viewpoint. Perhaps half the mail I have received is written from a religious point of view, and the same applies to people who have spoken to me on this subject. In fact I have in my files—and if time permitted I would even read them into the record—two excellent letters I have received from ministers in my riding, each minister representing a different church located across the road from each other. Both letters are excellent, well referenced and written with feeling and conviction. Each of them takes exactly the opposite point of view.

I respect these opinions completely using, as they do, religion as their basis. I only want to say that some people take a pretty narrow view by using a few words from biblical writings to support their argument. I suggest that people should look at how the law changed from the early biblical times to later times and how the attitude toward the law changed over that period. I came across an excellent paper, in my view, entitled "Theology and Capital Punishment". It was written by a very learned scholar, and I recommend that hon. members read it. I found it most useful in responding to people with this viewpoint.

In summary, I do not challenge the right of the state to take a life. In fact, I found little fault and was relatively comfortable with the present law and how it was handled; in other words, that capital punishment is on the books but very rarely, if ever, carried out. In fact, in Canada it has not been carried out since 1962, but the law has been there in case some very extreme case should happen to warrant capital punishment. Like the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), I would not be opposed to capital punishment for anyone who committed a second murder, either in or out of prison. My only apprehension in this whole question is about the security of prison guards, and so on. As a matter of fact, I thought about proposing this amendment myself at one time, and if the bill goes to committee—which I hope it will—and comes back with this amendment, I would most certainly support it.

However, I just cannot support capital punishment on a routine basis for every case either under the law as it is now written or for all first-degree murders, as recommended by many people and some hon. members of this House. That is why I will certainly support Bill C-84. The debate really boils down to the question of removing capital punishment from our Criminal Code or of practicing it on a systematic basis. These questions must be evaluated within the context of the facts which, in my opinion, show that capital punishment is not a significant deterrent to murder and that the mandatory use of capital punishment might well result in less possibility of punishing murderers, in view of the hesitation of juries to convict for capital murder. A couple of hon. members commented on that point this afternoon.

I believe very strongly that the death penalty creates the false expectation that we will reduce the amount of violence in our society. I suggest that the reverse is true, and that using murder or violence by the state to control violence would be neither an effective nor a desirable way of producing peace and security in Canada.

Having researched the subject carefully, given it much thought and shared many evenings with my constituents discussing this, and corresponding with them, I will certainly vote to support Bill C-84, Bill C-83 and any reasonable amendments which might appear when they come back from committee.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate with a sense of having been here before, because I was in parliament in 1966 when the resolution on abolishing capital punishment was debated in this House. At that time there was a free vote, the freest vote this House has ever had and far freer than the one which is shaping up now. We debated the concept and not the legislation, and the concept of abolition was lost in that vote. The vote was followed by subsequent legislation, which is the legislation on the books now. The legislation which was brought in at that time was bad law, but it did something which was even more reprehensible; it ignored the free vote of parliament. I recall the debate which took place a little later on the legislation, when virtually all the debate which had taken place on the resolution was repeated. As it got down to the wire, I remember that it was a little doubtful whether that bill would pass.

At that time I was approached by a member of the NDP behind the curtain and asked how I was going to vote on the bill to limit capital punishment to the slayers of police officers and prison guards. I said I was going to vote against it. He expressed amazement and asked how I could vote against it. He pointed out that I had voted for abolition, and I replied that it was not an abolition bill. He said, "Yes, but you know they will commute them all". I knew, he knew, and I suspect that the government knew that it would commute them all and that what had been achieved was a kind of abolition but not, in a sense, by a vote in parliament.

I know that there were hon. members on both sides of the House who voted for that bill saying to themselves that at least in this instance the death penalty would be carried out, and I know that a great majority of the public accepted the bill which was presented in that light. It is from that shift and from the fact that the commutations have been virtually automatic that a truly appalling situation has developed in this country in which there is now little faith in the law-making of this institution. We hear demands for national referendums because of the sense of frustration which has built up. We know that the government has come to an appalling point. I knew this would develop. It was only a matter of time after passing the legislation that the government would be faced with the terrible choice between mass commutation for all those people on death row, which is not politically acceptable, or mass execution, which is something very foreign to this country.

Then the government has compounded that problem one step further by offering abolition as a trade-off for gun control, or gun control as a trade-off for abolition, in a sense offering the public gun control in exchange for abolition. The people who own guns know that that is not a gift, but that it will be charged against them. It is not much wonder that the public is frustrated and that we in parliament find ourselves in this difficult situation.

As a person who voted for abolition then, and who is convinced now that the only sensible course for this parliament is to abolish capital punishment by a vote of parliament, I know that I probably go against a majority of my constituents, although that has not been accurately assessed, and I defy a great many of the simple polls which have been taken as representing accurate assessments of the will of the total constituency or, for that matter, the nation. Nevertheless, they create a sensitive, difficult problem and tension between members of parliament and constituents which should not be necessary. Abolition should come by a vote of this institution, and it must still be argued by the people who believe in abolition.

I did not blame police officers for wanting to broaden the grounds for capital punishment because the legislation which was passed singled them out in a way which was cruel. The other group, prison guards, are not visible to the public, but police officers are, and they have been the only visible people whose murder fell into a different class. That has concentrated attention on them which has not been in their best interests, and certainly the potential threat of the death penalty has not served to prevent their murder, either.

I deny the deterrent value of the death penalty, but the very singling out of those two groups in the legislation ascribed to the death penalty a deterrent value it did not have. Hon. members accepted the bill and voted for it because they felt they were protecting the people they wanted to protect. Here, again, the frustration of the commutations has compounded the intensity of feeling which has developed in the public. I still argue that it has been many, many years in this country, if ever, since life was forfeited for a life in murder. Our system of justice does not, and has not, rested on that delicate balance of a life for a life, although we have heard from all sides that it does and that if we do not maintain this balance, somehow the very structure of our system of justice will crumble under us. I do not believe that. It is easier to reply on a coupon in one of the advertisements run in the newspapers than it is to sit on a jury, as people still must, in our judicial system and after listening to the evidence, decide what the verdict should be. I find that juries have not changed since the one about 1947 which refused to convict a murderer of two people very close to the community in which I had lived. I have not had much faith in the death penalty since that time, Mr. Speaker. My basic argument against it is its terrible unfairness.

In the Okanagan Valley, in the last year, there have been four cases of murder reduced to manslaughter, for which the sentences ranged from four to seven years. There was the case of the Crown v. Brown for the murder of Sadie Edwards at Sicamous. That case did not go to the jury because plea bargaining entered into it. There was a plea of guilty and a sentence of seven years was imposed for that murder. During the Christmas season, Sophie Lorna West was charged with murder in the death of Earl Edward Walker. The circumstances of that murder fitted the very circumstances that so many people argue should lead to the gallows. It was murder for gain. There was a jury trial but, again, the charge was reduced to manslaughter and the sentence was four years. I have not had a single letter of protest from my constituency about any of these cases, Mr. Speaker. One was in my constituency, and the Walker case was just outside. There have been no letters of protest, so it would seem that the verdicts were acccepted.

Mr. Speaker, I am not convinced that a jury that would not convict on a charge of murder in a case which would carry life imprisonment would have the heart to convict in a case where the penalty was death, or that anything would have been changed in any of these cases if we had returned to the death penalty two years ago or in 1973 when this House last debated the subject.

I have talked to my constituents on this topic since 1966 and I find that everyone makes exceptions, everyone names categories of murderers that should not go to the gallows. Some tell me that I would change my mind if I came home one night and found my wife lying in a pool of blood on the kitchen floor. I reply that I do not know how I would act in a moment of such extreme emotion and tension. Then I ask them, how they can be sure that the murderer would hang? I know he would not if he were wealthy or influential—and that point has been dealt with before. He would not if he were young and caught the sympathy of the jury. He would not if he were insane and judged not fit to stand trial. He would not if he were drunk at the time and this lowered his ability to reason. And she would not if she were a woman. It is many years since a woman was hanged in this country. Very rarely, in English-speaking Canada, have we hanged a woman. They are the great exception.

I would point out that if I had committed the murder myself and called it a crime of passion—that other great excuse for murder that still runs through the domestic life of this country and treats the wife as a piece of property to be disposed of by the husband—I probably would not hang. Mr. Speaker, in my experience in this country, life has not been forfeit for life taken in every case.

Those people who send in the coupons in the newspaper advertisements are not asking for the death penalty as the law states it should be applied, or a simple broadening of it; over and over again they are asking for the death penalty without exception. I have written to some of them and told them that I do not believe they really mean the death penalty without exception. I find that everybody has an exception. When we had capital punishment, in the end it involved hanging very few people. They had to be poor, old, ugly and male before they went to the gallows.

I should like to say a word to the abolitionists, Mr. Speaker, because I feel they have been strangely quiet in this debate. This is no time for silence. Although the argument may be tougher now, and although they will be up against a determined public, if they believe the death penalty as it used to be carried out was something that did not benefit this country and did much harm because it diverted attention from the causes of crime, their voices should be raised for abolition. I praise the courage of those people who continue to write—theirs is a more slender stream of letters than from those who support the death penalty—but they should continue to write and urge the total and final abolition of capital punishment in this country.

Can we go back after a generation without capital punishment? The country has changed a lot in that time, particularly the minority groups and native people. Now there are demands for nations within the nation—but how much greater this would be if we returned to capital punishment and the federal government attempted to carry out that sentence without exception? A return to capital punishment would speed the demand for nations within the nation. Within the last two weeks there has been a suicide which has been widely published and is being called a martyrdom. Imagine the tensions that would arise if we were trying to execute a member of the native population. In Vancouver, at the moment, an extradition case is being argued and tensions are rising, although in a sense it is somebody else's problem. These are things we have to consider, Mr. Speaker. The women's liberation movement has made great strides, but I wonder if they would argue for the right to hang women when it has been so long denied them.

I reply to the women who talk to me, write to me and are vehemently in favour of the death penalty, that no woman in the country should argue for capital punishment, partly for the reason I have just mentioned, and for other reasons. Women have been the great exception. For many years half the population has been automatically exempt from the death penalty, not by reason of law but by reason of our custom, tradition, the benevolence of our courts and the kindness of juries. Women have been exempt from the penalty, and the exemption has remained.

The question of the death penalty is closely related to the question of abortion, another tough question which parliament may need to consider again. I get letters which say, in so many words, "Abortion is murder." It seems to me that the public which is aroused about the death penalty and prepared to see a return of the death penalty may also become aroused about the scandal of abortion and seek to change the law in that regard. It seems to me that since some women call abortion murder, and others a matter only for the woman involved and her doctor, there is a split in the nation, a split which a referendum will not settle. I say that because you would have to argue whether men would have the right to vote in that referendum.

While we have been arguing whether to retain the death penalty or abolish it, we have not been at all prepared to abandon our thirst for violence as depicted on the media. In this country and in the country to the south of us we have been steeped, hour by hour, day by day and week by week in a compendium of violence and crime on television which has influenced for more than a generation virtually every child growing up on this continent. We have not been prepared to remove those instructions in violence from our television sets, but have freely sat in front of our sets and enjoyed the stories of violent death and murder in every conceivable shape and form. Then we wonder, as we reap some of the harvest of that depicted violence, whether we should retain the death penalty, whether we should say, "Let us return to capital punishment", and try to clean up a situation which has been spawned by a variety of causes.
