It is essential for members of parliament to vote on this issue according to their conscience; and I include the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the cabinet. Since this subject is of the utmost importance to the public, I suggest that we ought to be debating a resolution, not a bill. Certainly, we ought not to be debating two bills concerned with so vital an area. The people should trust their elected representatives to vote either for or against abolition. I know that some call for a national referendum on the subject; but a national referendum is not part of the parliamentary tradition we inherited from Great Britain. It was not to the credit of former prime minister Harold Wilson that he employed a referendum in connection with Britain's entry to the Common Market. It was unnecessary, and a waste of public money. Fortunately for Mr. Wilson, the results of the referendum agreed with the vote in parliament.

We should recall, as well, Mackenzie King's referendum on conscription. That referendum raised more questions than it answered and was not followed by legislation based on the results obtained. Therefore, a referendum is unsatisfactory, and until the constitution is changed the ultimate responsibility for action rests in this House. It is our duty to act as the representatives of the people.

This is not a convention of delegates. This is a parliament. It is our duty to debate and then to legislate. If we received our instructions automatically from our constituents, debate would be unnecessary. We would await the results of the polls on any topic and become mere ciphers, carrying out the instructions of our constituents. We do not do this; that is the glory of our parliamentary system.

Let me now say a word about the churches. I have received letters arguing both sides of this question, but have been astonished, after reading some of the letters, to note that they are signed by a minister or a pastor of a church. I am afraid I am not much good at quoting scripture chapter and verse. I had a formidable grandmother who preached endless sermons to me, my brothers and sister; she could quote chapter and verse endlessly. Perhaps, because she did it so well, I have never been able to do it at all. But one thing she did say: her Christianity was based on the New Testament, not on the old law. She told us time and again that the old law was written for our admonition, but our instructions lay in the New Testament.

I still cannot understand why those who study Christ's life and devote their life to His service cannot stand back a bit, so to speak, from the narrow language of chapter and verse and let the glow of the stories of the New Testament light their way through life. Surely that is a better ideal. One remembers many stories. I cannot tell you in which part of the Gospels these stories are to be found; some of them need to be examined thoughtfully, from a little distance. I think, first, of the story concerning the rejection of political power. Christ was taken to the top of the mountain and shown the whole world. I suspect if He had heeded the teachings of some of our modern-day churches, He would have said at the top of the mountain, "Here is a chance to clean up the world." By doing that He would have accepted temptation, rather than rejecting it. But He rejected political power and chose the different route. I think also of the beautiful story in which He commuted the death sentence of the woman taken in adultery. The law called for death and He commuted the sentence at some risk to Himself, because the group which was about to stone her to death was in the heat of passion and thirsted for blood. He dared to commute the woman's sentence. I think of the beatitude of the noble sentiment enshrined in that story: Blessed are the merciful, for they shall find mercy.

I think of the story, perhaps most crucial of all but seldom referred to in this context, of that crazed individual in the cemetery. We do not know if he was guilty of murder; he was guilty of something, perhaps of disturbing the peace. He had been chained, put in the maximum security institution of the day, but still had broken out. Nobody dared to touch him. One suspects the worst about his background. The scripture is silent on that point. The stories of the New Testament teach us that Christ permitted no man or woman to be regarded as an animal, not even one who had been treated as a beast. And I get letters from constituents saying we should sort out the animals from the people. They fail to see how closely interwoven the two can be. But Christ talked to that strange person; nobody had the courage to go with him. Then, when the curious crowd gathered round, they found the sinner seated and in his right mind. There was no suggestion that he needed to serve the rest of his sentence. His rehabilitation was complete and final.

Of course, Christ himself was eventually the victim of capital punishment. Pontius Pilate took a poll. That is something that people forget. He was given the answer very quickly; it was Barabbas. He responded to that impromptu poll. Gallup comes later. We should not forget that part. We should not forget the crucifixion between two common criminals, because that was not accidental. He was numbered with the transgressors. I will not go into the theological difficulties and the "ifs" and the "ors", because what was done was done. It should serve to illuminate the debate going on at the present time.

I have a concern for all the victims, whether it is the battered wife hit too hard once after years and years of battering, whether it is the so-called unfaithful wife, or whether it is somebody beaten to death by somebody while in a drunken stupor. I have a regard for those victims. It has been a long, long time in this country that a life has been demanded for a life in those circumstances.

If any women in this country feel strongly about it, they should read "Crimes of Passion" in the July, 1975, issue of Chatelaine, by Barbara Amiel. She writes well on that subject. She writes about the problem of domestic quarrels, the integrity of the law and concludes with this paragraph:

But perhaps the integrity of the law might be better maintained if we called a spade a spade and a murder a murder and started indicating that our society will not consider the marriage license a discount certificate for reduced rates in case of violence.

One thing is certain; it must be abolition or it must be broader. This is part of what we face. Those who demand a much greater broadening of capital murder have a point because it would make much more sense if it were all or none. We must leave no crack open. In the law as it now is, two cracks were left open. The hope was that no one would dare squeeze through, but they have done so in surprising numbers. Out of that grew a dilemma. Therefore, we must not close off those two and open one more. Here I would refute the argument about the second murder because somebody will squeeze through that very swiftly. Then all the arguments that apply to the first murder will apply to the second: Was it accidental; was it premeditated? All that will arise again and we will have achieved nothing. Sooner than we think we will be back into debate once again.

Would we be able to resist the demands of television to televise executions? We can hardly resist the demand to televise the proceedings in this chamber. If television can enter here and change it as it will inevitably change the role of this institution, how long can we deny the camera access to executions themselves and with results that are not predictable? A great many people say there would be a revulsion if hangings were televised across the nation. I am sure there would be a revulsion if we returned to capital punishment. However, if they were televised, I wonder whether we have not become so depraved that we could enjoy, as a mass, those spectacles. One cannot predict the effects of television. Therefore, I urge that we abandon capital punishment once and for all, altogether, completely and utterly, so that we will not have this ritual sacrifice.

When there have been so few people executed, the executions are in a sense rituals, a sacrifice for the sins of all. Getting back to the church, that has not been necessary for over 1,900 years. Once and for all, the final sacrifice for the sins of the world was made. If we listen to the story at all, we cannot deny the redemptive power that comes through that sacrifice. We should remove capital punishment once and for all and work toward building a society where the causes of murder are removed. We should work toward educating our people to do no murder in this land.

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, in response to the encouragement of some of my constituents to vote to abolish the barbarism of capital punishment, I can only relate to this House what my conscience tells me to do and how my present state of mind was reached. Throughout my youth I attended many policy sessions and so-called "think tanks" on the issue of capital punishment. In each and every case I voted in favour of the perennial resolutions for the abolition of capital punishment. However, for better or for worse, I became a Crown attorney in the year 1970.

[Mr. Johnston.]

During my four years as a prosecutor I had the misfortune to assist in the prosecution of a West Saint John, New Brunswick, man who was convicted of having murdered a seven-year old child. During the commission of the murder, a sexual assault took place on the person of the young and innocent girl. I did not feel then, nor do I feel now, that society could afford the luxury of keeping the perpetrator of such a heinous crime alive. The possibility, however remote, exists that the murderer in this case will be released into our midst at some time in the future.

The question that preyed upon my conscience then, as it does now, is: What should be done to such an individual? After considerable thought, some of it during restless hours of the night, the answer came to me that he should be executed—not hanged, but put to death in the most humane way possible. My thoughts on the issue of capital punishment were solidified when a short time later, as prosecutor, I was obliged to attend the autopsy of a five-year old girl who was murdered in the Saint John area. Assuming the perpetrator of this foul deed, who was never apprehended, was found to be legally sane and convicted, he too, in my humble opinion, should be put to death.

I wish that I had not been exposed to these two cases. Also, I wish that compassion for this type of killer could prevail over what my conscience tells me to do. However, that not being the case, I shall cast my ballot against the abolition of the death penalty, bearing in mind that its use should be restricted to a very small number of cases. It is my submission that the state should have the right to decide when the lives of certain criminally-ill murderers should be terminated. I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that I am pleased to see the issue being put to a free vote.

In conclusion, may I emphasize that I understand the principles of abolitionists, even though my conscience does not allow me to embrace these principles. I trust that the same understanding will flow from abolitionists to me.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, many members who have participated in this debate have referred to its repetitive nature. To me this only suggests that uncertainty surrounds an issue which has moral overtones. It also suggests to me that the Canadian public has hardly made up its mind on the question of retention or abolition of capital punishment. There is great confusion and profusion of divergent viewpoints.

I think one of the reasons this has persisted over such a long period of time—as some hon. members have indicated, this is the third time we have debated the issue, with inconclusive results—is that the government of the day has failed to provide basic leadership on what I regard as the fundamental function and responsibility of government, and that is the maintenance of peace, order and good government. The style of the present government has had a strong determining influence on the mood of the nation. It has been a style of government that has induced a permissive attitude toward the basic subject of peace, order and good government. Indeed, up until the appearance of Bill C-83, the so-called peace and security legislation, the leadership of the government has been entirely in a permissive direction—easy bail, murders committed while murderers are out on bail, failure on the part of the government to carry out the law that exists and as it has been determined in two successive free votes in the House of Commons. In other words, the government has failed to accept its responsibilities, and as a result we see this continuing confusion revealed in the debate which is taking place in this House.

We are now back to another free vote. But I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether it will be a free vote when every member of the cabinet votes, as the cabinet did last time, for the abolitionist position. It seems to me that rather than being a free vote, this is following the principle of cabinet solidarity. I think it would be more to the point if ministers of the Crown, members of the treasury benches, were allowed to follow their conscience in this issue as well as the backbench members of the House of Commons.

My position over the years has been expressed in the attitude of the government of which I was a part in the early 1960s, which was to divide the punishment for homicide, for the capital offence, into two categories, that of capital murder and non-capital murder. Many members during the course of this debate—some have followed the same tack this afternoon—have stated that the possibility of condemning an innocent man to death is one of the reasons they are voting for absolute abolition. Others argue—the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) made this point—that very serious injustice would be done in cases of this kind. However, Mr. Speaker, with the two categories of murder—which have actually been the law, with slight amendments, up to the present time—any possibility of condemning an innocent man would be done away with absolutely, because capital punishment, the ultimate penalty, would only be administered to those who were syndicated criminals, those who use crime as part of their daily activity—the paid "hit men", the professional gunmen who are appearing with greater frequency in some of our major cities in Canada, as they have in the United States in recent years.

It is a fact—this has been demonstrated in the reports of the Law Reform Commission—that most murders are committed by murderers who are acquainted with their victims. They are domestic crimes—husband and wife, lovers, "friends"; I put that in quotation marks—people of this sort. These murders come under the category of crimes of passion. Under the legislation as it existed in the time of the Diefenbaker government, this type of homicide was tried under the non-capital murder provisions of the Criminal Code.

The question of deterrence has appeared repeatedly. I am not going to argue whether capital punishment deters the crime of homicide; I do not think it does. When you are dealing with the heinous, horrendous kinds of capital murder which would be dealt with under the capital punishment aspects of the Criminal Code, you are, of course, dealing with psychopathic personalities, people without conscience, people who have no compunction about murdering someone. There is absolutely no possibility of their being deterred even by the threat of the ultimate penalty. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) gave some striking examples from her own personal experience of this sort of psychopathic criminal.

Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion to deal with one such person on a personal basis in the police courts in Toronto back in 1940, and it has had a strong determining influence over the years on the attitude that I have taken toward this issue. The case in point was that of the silk-stocking murder. Bill Newell, a handsome member of the Royal Canadian Air Force, in the early days of the war cut a wide swath in criminal activity in the various places he was stationed across Canada. I came to know Bill Newell in my capacity as a social worker in Toronto and was amazed to find that there was a genuine psychopathic personality, as handsome as a Greek god but without any social conscience or awareness whatever in regard to the crime of murder. He wound up murdering his wife on Centre Island in Toronto in the famous silk-stocking murder.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway pointed out, there is, unfortunately, in our society this category of psychopathic personality. What are we going to do with them, Mr. Speaker? As I shall try to point out as I move along in this debate this afternoon, when it comes to the question of vengeance putting a criminal of this kind away for 25 years, for life imprisonment, it is much more cruel, much more punitive, much more vengeful than execution through the due process of the law.

I am arguing the case this afternoon from the legal aspect, not from the religious aspect or from any other aspect that might be involved. I am sure we are all abolitionists at heart, wishing we lived in a society where there was no crime and in a world where there was no war. My generation had to make a decision with the onslaught of the Nazi holocaust in 1940. Some of us were pacifists who believed that war was the ultimate evil, and had even signed the Oxford resolution that under no circumstances should we take up arms for king and country, because man was just too good, with the hope that there would never be any more warfare. We had to make the decision whether we would serve, or refuse, on the basis of our sense of social responsibility.

We do not yet live in our utopias, even though we dream of the day of a utopia when the lion will lie down with the lambs and man shall beat his sword into a plowshare and will not make war against our fellowman. Some of those who seek utopia tell us the golden age is just around the corner, but some of these are the worst criminals in the political and judicial sense. I refer to what has taken place in the U.S.S.R. and in Nazi Germany where genocide and mass murder were perpetrated within our own living memory in the interest of carrying out so-called humanitarian justice.

Our system of justice involves a social contract that citizens enter into voluntarily with the understanding that society will protect them. It becomes a very sorry travesty of justice, and it has not happened in Canada but it could according to present trends, when communities of senior citizens are forced to surround themselves with electrified, barbed-wire fences, patrolled 24 hours a day by security guards, in order to keep out marauders and potential criminals. It is almost like putting the senior citizens in jail and allowing the criminals to run rampant in the community and in society.

What are the methods of handling criminals? At one time society used to ban their criminals, getting rid of them—out of sight, out of mind—by sending them to colonies such as Australia, Canada and notorious Devil's Island. More recently, we have been listening to social scientists and social engineers who believe that all crime has environmental causes, and men and women are criminals because we live in a sick society. They advocate the rehabilitation route for solving the crime problem.

The rehabilitation program has had strong support during our discussion of the subject from time to time in the House of Commons. We must face the sad fact that as we move toward rehabilitation versus the punitive approach, we are faced with the continuing phenomenon of crime repetition or recidivism. Recidivism is a fact, and this can be demonstrated by the prison population which remains at a constant 20,000 inmates, or at least has from the years 1969 to 1974, notwithstanding our system of parole, probation and temporary leaves of absence. It has been demonstrated by scientific analysis that many of these 20,000 inmates are repeaters with numerous sentences behind them.

If this is so, we must point out to our social engineers that prisons cause crimes. This would be true, of course, if the environmental theory is accurate. So this leads to the next approach to solving the criminal problem, and that is to empty the prisons. This is one of the major recommendations of the Law Reform Commission set up by the federal government under the Law Reform Commission Act of 1970 to recommend changes in Canadian law. The Law Reform Commission has been a most powerful advocate of dismantling or downgrading prisons. Some of these recommendations issued in the working papers now before us have been pretty radical. I give as an example the recommendation of a maximum three-year sentence for those violent murderers unlikely to repeat their crime. I challenge any social engineer or social scientist to tell us which of the psychopathic murderers are those who will not repeat their crime.

The law commission has also recommended no greater imprisonment for most violent criminals, and no more life sentences. I mention that because the government, in its attempt to trade off the issue of capital punishment for peace and security, has got itself into a cleft stick. It has been repudiated by the very commission it set up to examine the present state of Canada's criminal law.

If the Law Reform Commission is advocating that we empty our prisons and that there be no more life sentences, how is it that the Justice Department and the Department of the Solicitor General are recommending that we deal with first-degree murder—the imposition of a mandatory life sentence, and for second-degree murder or crimes of passion, which anyone is liable to fall into, but for the grace of God, as John Wesley said—with sentences of up to ten years?

It has been suggested that murder is on the increase, and certainly statistics point in that direction. In 1961, the last year capital punishment was imposed, there were 185 murders, and in 1974 there were 545 murders perpetrated in Canada. This being true, what are we going to do with the recommendation by the social engineers, who have the ear of the government, that we do away with penal institutions completely and divert the prison population back into the community?

There is an interesting article which appears in the current Quest magazine outlining the position of Mr. Hans Mohr, a member of the crime commission. He is one of the strongest advocates of doing away with incarceration of criminals. This is the schizophrenic attitude of the government, and this is why parliament is in a schizophrenic mood with members debating the issue almost in both directions simultaneously. How can we bring about rehabilitation in penal institutions, if penal institutions are basically the cause of crime and recidivism is caused mainly by the atmosphere in our existing penal institutions?

There seems to be anarchy in our prisons today. This is mentioned in the report of the crime commissioners. An editorial in the Globe and Mail states that our prisons are becoming a no-man's land beyond the rule of law and civilized man. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has said that the situation in the prisons today is such that it is necessary to break up cliques and gangs and transfer them to other institutions. Yet the government intends to deal with the ultimate crime of murder by sending psychopathic and professional murderers, syndicated murderers and paid killers, to our penal institutions—which have been roundly condemned—for a mandatory life sentence of 25 years.

Obviously, Bill C-84 is a backward move in this regard. If the atmosphere is bad now, what will it be when we have an increasingly larger population of murderers serving life sentences let loose in our penal institutions? If we are to solve the problem, it will be necessary to have special institutions because the lives of the guards will not be worth anything. This is why parliament, the last time it voted, provided an exemption for prison guards and police officers. This will create an absolutely intolerable and impossible situation. As I have already indicated, the trade-off is more cruel than the death penalty itself. It would be a living death for first-degree murderers, and even second-degree murderers would be living in an impossible situation. It seems to me that by the present legislation the government is removing one nightmare and replacing it with another that has even more dire consequences for people.

I wish to spend the last minutes of my presentation this afternoon dealing with the victims of crime. Almost exclusively we are talking about criminals.The Solicitor General has bought, almost without reservation, the argument of the social engineers and social scientists. He agonizes over the psychological strain of imprisonment referred to by the social engineers and shares the worry of the Law Reform Commission which expresses itself in similar words by referring to the anxiety which can be induced by incarceration.

Curiously, the Solicitor General is less concerned about the psychological anxiety of society at large. While the social engineers have been studying the psyches of convicts, a similar study of their victims and a most cursory look at the Gallup polls and letters to the editors which members receive on this subject from the majority of their constituents will indicate the far more dangerous psychological trauma of society.

I have already referred to the citizens' group that had to surround itself with barbed wire and hire security guards for protection against criminal attack. The Solicitor General has an almost mystical belief in social science and social scientists, notwithstanding the fact that his own departmental people can prove to him that the results of last week had been anticipated with regard to the impact of rehabilitation. He perceives the criminal as a person suffering from a lack of love early in life, who rebels with anti-social behaviour, and he simply cannot believe that criminals are other than sick people. I would point out to him that there are psychologists who have underscored this as a psychopathic situation where the human spirit has been so warped that nothing less than being born again would take out the kinks from these unfortunate victims of our society.

Even the physical scientists today are not so sure they have all the answers in the realm of the material and the physical. At one time they had all the answers. The chemical engineers have discovered that their attempts to change the material environment by miracle sprays and chemicals have had an impact that they could not possibly anticipate. There are no more modest people today than the physical scientists who no longer play the role of God even in a material world. So, I should like to say a word on behalf of the victims and the traumas they experience in the face of the awful crime of first-degree murder.

Finally, to bring my remarks to a conclusion and coming back to the basic issue of peace, order and good government, we are hosting the Olympic games this year. This has been brought up in the House before by one of our most distinguished members. What happens if terrorism is cut loose at the Olympic games, and what if some of the terrorists are apprehended and are incarcerated in our prisons even though the crime might be subject to capital punishment? What happens if hijackings of aircraft ensue in order to attempt the blackmail release of these imprisoned terrorists?

Surely the state has the right to protect itself against those who are out to destroy the integrity of the state. Peace, order and good government must be preserved. It cannot be preserved if we condone the use of the ultimate crime, capital murder, by those who would destroy our way of life deliberately—not those involved in crimes of passion but those who would deliberately set out to destroy our way of life. This is why I support the retention of capital punishment for those who are guilty of first-degree capital murder.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ABORTION

COMMENDATION OF EFFORTS OF THOSE SEEKING LEGISLATION TO PROTECT THE UNBORN CHILD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, on this first anniversary of the presentation to Parliament of a petition signed by more than one million Canadians urging legislation providing for the child conceived but not yet born the same protection as is provided for any other person, and noting, with urgency, that the 48,136 abortions in 1974 were 14 per cent of live births, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni):

That this House commend the organizers of the petition for their continuing efforts to seek legislation to protect the unborn and thus foster a life-sustaining society.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROPOSED CANCELLATION OF CHANGE IN ATTACHMENT PERIOD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering that those parts of the country most seriously affected by the proposed change in the minimum attachment period requirement from eight weeks to 12 weeks for unemployment insurance benefits are precisely those parts of the country most seriously affected by persistent high levels of unemployment, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government be instructed to cancel its proposed intention to make this change in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR MORE FUNDS FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that according to a study published by the Science Council of Canada, the National Research Council of Canada should normally have a budget of some $19.9 million to be able to bring their financing at the same level as in 1969, whereas for the current year, namely 1975-76, the budget of the council has been frozen at $10.9 million; considering that the Canadian Cerebral Palsy Association protest violently against the reduction of funds alloted to medical research and that they go as far as saying that these reductions are deplorable, and considering that in the budget of May 25, the Canadian government does not give priority to medical research, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House order the federal government to take immediately all concrete measures required to enable the Medical Research Council to proceed with their works safely, and to face present and future health problems.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

TRANSPORT

ALLEGED FAILURE OF DEPARTMENT POLICY TO CONSIDER ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which threatens the very basis of Confederation in this country. The disparity between the regions of Canada is well known, but the disparity between government rhetoric as opposed to concrete action in resolving these problems has now reached scandalous proportions. Nowhere is this more obvious than in transport policy, as evidenced by a statement this week, the one contained in the communique issued yesterday following the meeting of the Council of Maritime Premiers, which said that:

The announced allocation of transportation expenditures reductions was deemed to be inconsistent with programs designed to correct regional disparity.

The other by the Hon. Gilbert Clements, Minister of Tourism in P.E.I., who felt the situation was serious enough to request an appearance before our Standing Committee on Regional Development, where he stated on Tuesday that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the spirit of Standing Order 43 is clear. It enables hon. members to expose briefly the urgency of the motion that is put before the House, not to debate it.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Perhaps I can put the motion, Mr. Speaker. Because of the concern expressed by a number of members and ministers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Transport meet immediately with the Atlantic premiers, as requested by them, and that he make a statement on motions in the House at the earliest possible date to justify his department's insensitivity to the needs of our poorer regions.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be presented to the House only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR CANADA

SUGGESTED DENIAL OF FARE INCREASE PENDING INVESTIGATION OF OPERATIONS BY AUDITOR GENERAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Yesterday the president of Air Canada announced that Air Canada will be seeking increased air fares in the near future. These proposed increases come within months of the previous increases of April 18. In light of the fact that fare increases are usually directly related to higher operational costs, and in light of the financial fiasco in the finance branch of Air Canada in Winnipeg, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House direct the Canadian Transport Commission to not consider any air fare increases for Air Canada until the Auditor General, under direction from this House, has had the opportunity to do a complete investigation of Air Canada's financial operations to determine that proposed air fare increases are justified, and furthermore that upon receipt of the Auditor General's report the CTC be informed as to whether or not such fare increases are justified.

Furthermore in light of the fact that Air Canada has not been before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications since 1973, that the president of Air Canada, Mr. Claude Taylor, be directed to appear before the Standing Committe on Transport and Communications immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

RATIONALIZATION OF TRANSPORT POLICY WITH OTHER PROGRAMS FOR THE ATLANTIC REGION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It relates to the very strong statement issued yesterday afternoon by the Council of Maritime Premiers, in effect a denunciation of federal transport policy and raising specific questions about the co-ordination of such a policy with the government's program and the announced commitment to regional economic development. In view of the specific request by the Atlantic premiers made in February concerning the revised intra-regional freight assistance program and the fact that there has yet been no official response from the Minister of Transport, can he explain the shocking disregard of this request and what in fact is the basic commitment of the federal government in respect of the rationalization of the transport policy with other programs of economic development in the region?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Rather than a shocking disregard there was indeed careful consideration of the position, including a possible position which had been generally agreed upon between the Atlantic transportation ministers and ourselves with regard to certain freight subsidies, and on that further consideration we decided to have rather longer term discussions before making any move. Indeed, for the present time, therefore, there has not been any further action taken on the $5 million cut in the inter subsidy which had been proposed earlier. The discussions indeed will proceed, but any such action will only be taken when we are satisfied that what we are doing with the available money for transportation is in the best interests of the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I wonder whether the minister can indicate why no information was conveyed or no official response was given to the governments of the Atlantic provinces. In addition, can he indicate what steps have been taken with regard to the announced increase by CN and CP concerning freight rates as of July 1 for that region, and has the minister arranged any meeting with the provincial premiers in order to alleviate the obvious concern and anxiety they have with respect to federal transport policy?

Mr. Lang: There are possible contacts at different levels, and the ones that I had foreseen were preliminary discussions between our officials and the officials from the Atlantic region. Indeed, I will be very surprised if those discussions have not already been under way. It may be that the premiers were simply not aware of what may be done. I obviously would be prepared to meet the premiers. I have a regular system of meeting with the Atlantic transport ministers, and I had thought that would be the ordinary way of going about dealing with transportation issues, but it does seem that each time the premiers meet they raise the subject in a significant way. I will certainly be delighted to join them at some meeting if that is their wish.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the fact that the council of premiers did issue this very strong statement, and considering their particular anxiety with respect, perhaps, to a decline in the federal commitment with respect to a co-ordination of transport policy in terms of the commitment to alleviate regional economic disparities, I wonder if the minister will indicate whether he stands by the same commitments made by his predecessor, now the Minister of the Environment, with respect to the fact that transportation policy had to take into account the special needs which exist in the various regions of this country, and if so, perhaps he would be prepared to make a statement shortly on motions with a view to alleviating the anxieties which presently exist in the region.

Mr. Lang: There is certainly no need for the anxiety, and let that be the statement. In fact, the ongoing position is very much to take regional problems into consideration, and it is our intention—and I convyed this to the Atlantic ministers at our last meeting—to include that as a statement of principle in legislation which will be before this House in the next session, which is also known to them as being in our schedule.

Therefore, there has been every assurance. We have a regular and ongoing system of meetings with the federal and Atlantic provincial transportation ministers which can take all these matters into consideration. Indeed, we have ongoing and regular meetings of officials, and I think the system is working very well. I am somewhat surprised that there might be a breakdown in communication between the transportation ministers and the premiers of the Atlantic provinces.

POSITION OF ATLANTIC PREMIERS ON BUDGET REDUCTION AND DELETION OF SUBSIDY ON EXPORTED WHEAT AND FLOUR—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the minister says that nothing is being done without consultation, and indeed, approval of the provincial leaders in the Atlantic provinces. Is he suggesting that the premiers or the appropriate ministers in the Atlantic provinces approve of the fact that of the $41.2 million removed from the transport budget as of December, 1975, some $22 million touched on the Atlantic region, and that the leaders in those provinces approved the provision in the bill before the House to delete the subsidy on the export of wheat and flour?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it quite clear that I did not say that in every case before action is taken there will indeed be approval of the region. That may be a bit too much to ask, in terms of the obvious desire on the part of any particular region not to pay additional amounts and to have increased and never decreased subsidies. Region by region that is understandable, but not very consistent with the over-all problem of spending in this country.

Furthermore, I would say that the figure is quite wrong in terms of the proportion of savings, and we discussed this fully with the Atlantic transportation ministers some months ago. Furthermore, wrong as it is, it includes, for instance, the very $5 million which, as I just indicated to the hon. member for Egmont, has not been gone ahead with even though the particular slicing of that $5 million was an agreed matter in terms of better re-arrangement of subsidies. Obviously, in regard to increases in ferry charges, those who have to pay them prefer not to pay them, but on occasion we have to face the fact that as costs increase, some charges have to increase too.

Mr. Stanfield: I take it that the minister approves of selective consultation. I would like to ask him whether he has had adequate consultation to work out an integrated approach to transportation problems in the Atlantic provinces with a view to fostering the development of those provinces rather than what seems to be a hit and miss effort on the part of his department to cut back on subsidies here and there.

● (1420)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax suggests that I have been talking about a selective approach but I have not. I have been talking about an all-embracing approach to consultation. If he thinks that what I mean by consultation is to give the final decision and an ultimate veto to a region, that is wrong. There is a need for the federal government to take some decisions and to take the responsibility for them. There cannot be a simple veto and control by any region in this country. I can assure the hon. member that there is the fullest consultation and consideration of the Atlantic need and the very organization of the committee of Atlantic transportation ministers with myself and with our officials working on an on-going basis is designed exactly for that purpose and will be doing a good job of it.

CHANGE IN MINIMUM ATTACHMENT PERIOD FOR ELIGIBILITY—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, continuing on the question of consultation I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Could the minister inform the House whether provincial governments, particularly in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec, were consulted before he announced in his budget two nights ago, the proposed regressive changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act which would change the minimum attachment period for eligibility from eight weeks to twelve weeks? Were the provinces consulted and if so, what were their views?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to reply to the hon. member. The answer is that we have had a series of bilateral consultations with the provinces, which I think included every one of them, on a range of options which we are looking at, including the one to which reference was made. As recently as about three weeks ago, I indicated at a meeting I attended with the ministers responsible, or at that time designated, for manpower matters, some of the ideas that we had and indeed they have had some presentation on some of the reasoning behind them.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps the minister would try to answer it precisely. Could he tell us particularly whether the governments of the Atlantic provinces and the province of Quebec approved the specific change of the minimum attachment period that is required for unemployment insurance benefits to be changed from eight weeks to twelve weeks?

Mr. Andras: Briefly, Mr. Speaker, they did not give us any precise answer. They knew that these were options being considered for a very great length of time. Their responses, both verbally and in writing, were not precise. I will check on my correspondence to see if I can enlighten the hon. member more precisely, but that is it as I recall it.

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION CONCERNING MINIMUM ATTACHMENT PERIOD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering that those parts of Canada most adversely affected by the proposed changes will be precisely those with the most persistent high levels of unemployment, I would doubt that the provinces in question would have agreed to such changes. Having given consideration over the past couple of days to the impact of these changes on the parts of Canada I have mentioned, could the minister tell the House if the government will now announce its intention not to bring that amendment before the House?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Very specifically, Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. I will be glad at the proper time and when time permits to elaborate on some of the measures and some of the reasoning for it. I want to indicate, as I did yesterday, that the government cost-savings that might result from that plus other measures alluded to by the Minister of Finance and myself in this House, are designed precisely to be directed to and compensate on a selective basis the impact where it needs to be compensated for in those provinces or any other areas of high unemployment.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES TO SOLVE PROBLEM OF MERCURY POLLUTION

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment.

Could the minister tell the House whether he had any contact with the committee responsible for studying the mercury pollution problem in affected areas and, if so, what he plans to do or what is done in this area to settle this serious problem?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, recently we drafted new regulations on the emission of mercury into the environment. The hon. member knows that in 1970, about 12 tons of mercury found their way into the environment, which was decreased to about 2 tons. I think it will be even less than that with the new regulations which will probably be enforced within a few weeks, because we are in consultation with the industry and the provinces.

EFFECT ON WELFARE ROLLS OF EXTENSION OF QUALIFYING PERIOD FOR ELIGIBILITY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. As stated in its most recent report, dealing with the extension of the qualifying period for unemployment insurance, the Economic Council of Canada said:

—such recommendations could prove harmful to persons most exposed to periodic and genuinely involuntary unemployment.

I ask the minister if he has taken into account the fact that this move to increase the qualifying period from eight to 12 weeks will have a serious effect on the delicate employment potential in the Atlantic provinces, given the seasonal nature in many of the region's employment opportunities at present, and will result—

Mr. Broadbent: Ask Lincoln Alexander.

Mr. McGrath: —and will result in substantial numbers of people in the region being placed on the already overburdened social welfare rolls?

Mr. Broadbent: Why don't you ask Lincoln Alexander?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the hon. member for Hamilton West should not be delegated to answer the question posed by the hon. member from Newfoundland. Seriously, we are fully aware of these implications. Our intention is to attempt in a better and more constructive way to provide alternatives which I think will be more beneficial both to the recipients of unemployment insurance in that category and, indeed, to the economy of that region as a whole.

An hon. Member: Next time we might as well ask Bryce Mackasey.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PURCHASE OF LEOPARD TANKS—POSSIBLE INVOLVEMENT OF MINISTER

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. On Tuesday the minister confirmed that negotiations are proceeding with the West German government for the purchase of Leopard I tanks but said he could not talk about or describe the details concerning the price of those tanks. Since officials accompanying the Secretary of State for External Affairs have been briefing reporters in Europe on details of this tank acquisition program and since what the press calls government officials have been briefing reporters in this country, could the minister tell us whether he himself, or his department, is directly involved in the negotiations for this purchase?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Defence of course is directly involved in the negotiations. When they have been completed, details will be released.

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask the minister, how is this purchase being negotiated? Is there an interdepartmental project office? If so, under whose direction is it; and, what steps are being taken to ensure that this time officials of the Department of Supply and Services and the Minister of Supply and Services are kept fully informed on all developments?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, there is no interdepartmental project office. Of course, the Department of Supply and Services will be responsible for the contract and its signing.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

PURCHASE OF LEOPARD TANKS—CONSULTATIONS WITH NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my final supplementary question to the Minister of Supply and Services? Bearing in mind the minister's experience, or lack of it, with the LRPA negotiations, can the minister tell the House what steps he is taking to ensure that this time both he and his officials will be kept fully informed of all developments with respect to the acquisition of these tanks, including the amount of money available for the purchase in the Department of National Defence budget?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, there are full consultations.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

PROPOSAL TO GRANT EXPORT LICENCE TO SELL FISH OUTSIDE CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR ANALYSIS OF PROCESSING COSTS

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of State responsible for fisheries? It has to do, Sir, with the matter I raised several weeks ago concerning the Freshwater Fish Marketing Act, in particular the provisions of Part III, section 23(2). I gave the minister notice of my question and wonder if he can now say whether the corporation intends to obey the law and allow fishermen an export licence with which to sell their fish outside the jurisdiction of the corporation, according to the Act?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice. In reply to his question I say that I remain convinced that the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation is the best vehicle for serving the over-all needs of fishermen through its single marketing desk approach. I am not able to agree with the hon. member's request, because I feel it would lead to erosion of the corporation and loss in the strength of the single selling desk approach, as created by the Act.

Mr. Whiteway: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As prices quoted at Motley, Minnesota, are 50 per cent higher than prices offered by the corporation and as the original concept of the corporation, that of a single desk marketing agency, is now saddled with an astronomically high capital cost, will the minister reassess his position and direct the corporation to open its books and analyse, per pound per species, the cost of the processing done by the corporation?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recognize that it is not my function to direct a corporation of this type on a day to day basis. There is a board on which all provinces are represented. Included are a good number of fishermen. There is also a very wide advisory board where fishermen are represented in very large numbers. They are involved in the setting of initial prices which, recognizing the high costs of processing, are set as high as possible with the final price set at the end of the season. The corporation has in fact been rather successful in this operation. Because of a passing difference in prices, which might be very temporary, I am not sure whether the hon. member would like to erode the role of corporation.

INDUSTRY

EFFECT OF TAX ON LARGE VEHICLES ON AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY AND PACT WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Gilbert Parent (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance stated in his budget address that there will be a four-year escalation of the special taxes on gas-guzzling cars in order to encourage a switch to lighter, more efficient cars, what will be the anticipated effect on the auto industry in Canada and what effect, if any, will it have on the auto pact with the United States?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): As far as I have been able to determine, Mr. Speaker, and there has been considerable consultation, it should not have any particular effect on auto sales in Canada. Indeed, I am happy to report, and hon. members may have noted, the first quarter of this year was substantially better than last year. On the second point, I do not think it will have any effect on the auto pact, other than two studies under way at the present time, one in each country, with a view to determining where the auto industry in headed in light of new developments on conservation and related questions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN COMMITMENT TO COMMON FUND ESTABLISHED BY UNCTAD CONFERENCE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that this is the last week of the U.N. Conference, UNCTAD IV, in Nairobi, and in view of the fact that the developing countries regard a positive commitment in principle, with a dollar figure attached, to the common fund as an indication of the sincerity of the commitment of Canada and other developed countries to the new economic order and to a genuine effort to meet the claim of the developing world for a fairer trade system, will the parliamentary secretary or some other member of the government assure the House that Canada is prepared to make such a commitment with the dollar figure attached to the common fund before the conference closes?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, may I be permitted to answer this question. As had been announced in the House, the government has made a dollar contribution to the tin stabilization fund which is one of the commodities that is under discussion in connection with the whole of the common fund. Today in cabinet it was decided that there would be a contribution by Canada to a common fund, providing that certain very logical and I think reasonable precautions are taken.

Mr. Brewin: Will the minister advise whether that commitment that he has given, and which I very much welcome, has or will have a definite dollar figure attached to it, as other nations are making pledges which actually state the amount they are prepared to contribute.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, one of the problems is that one cannot be very sure yet what the dimensions of the need will be. I can assure the hon. member that Canada is prepared to play its full part in any such common fund.

[Mr. Parent.]

SUGGESTED REALLOCATION OF PRIORITIES WITHIN CIDA TO PERMIT CONTRIBUTION TO UNCTAD COMMON FUND

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Given the fact that Canada has agreed in principle to a common fund at UNCTAD IV, is the government willing to pay its share, which has been estimated at around $25 million, and to find that money by reallocating the priorities within CIDA so that there is no additional money being spent, but merely a reordering of existing priorities?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard that particular suggestion. I will take note of it. I want to assure the House that Canada understands its responsibility in connection with the underdeveloped world. Indeed, we have been one of the leaders and we intend to remain so.

INFORMATION

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION ON FREEDOM OF INFORMATION AND APPEARANCE OF PRESIDENT OF PRIVY COUNCIL BEFORE COMMITTEES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council of which I gave him notice several days ago. In light of the hopefully impending end of this session and for the purpose of permitting the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments to organize its work with regard to freedom of information, will the minister advise whether it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation which, with due regard for the interest of the state and adequate protection of personal privacy, will provide statutory rules as to freedom of information?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, preparation of legislation along these lines is underway within the government service. I cannot give an undertaking that a bill will emerge at any particular time, except to say that we are giving some priority to it. The hon. member, who has put forward his own version, understands the inherent difficulties and has pointed to some of the problems that would arise.

Mr. Baldwin: Will the hon. gentleman discuss with the chairmen of the joint committee the possibility of appearing once more before that committee on behalf of the government to consider the usefulness of an omnibus bill dealing with freedom of information, automatic data processing and safeguarding of personal privacy in that regard all of which are matters in which the committee is seized of jurisdiction. The alternative is bringing in an omnibus bill or more than one bill to deal with these very complex and difficult subjects.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity of speaking privately to the joint chairmen and have indicated my interest in their work. As to whether I will appear again before the committee, I hesitate to say. However, I hope that the committee will continue its studies of these subjects because the government will be looking forward with interest to its recommendations.

STATISTICS CANADA

POSSIBILITY MANPOWER CONSULTED IN SELECTION OF CENSUS COMMISSIONERS

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question, concerning job creation in Canada, is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Did the minister or his department make any contact with or seek the advice of the Manpower Department or make any effort to give employment to competent unemployed people registered with Manpower in their apparent partisan selection of census commissioners for this year's census taking, beginning June 1?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that some of those who were appointed census commissioners were in fact recruited through the Manpower Centres to which the hon. member has referred.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): My apologies, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the question. Will the hon. member repeat it?

Mr. Alkenbrack: Were the persons chosen as census commissioners registered as unemployed with Manpower?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I'm damned if I know.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PERFORMING ARTS

MEASURE TO REDUCE CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCE OF FILMS AND VIDEO PRODUCTIONS—EFFECT ON INDUSTRY

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, in view of that very frank and honest answer, I know I will get an answer to my question. In the absence of the Minister of Communications, who I guess is tracking satellites or the Secretary of State who is not in the House but is perhaps out searching for stars, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question involving the budget of the other night because of the Prime Minister's interest in third options and contractual links. Would he tell the House whether the provision in the budget to reduce the capital cost allowance for the production of Canadian films and video productions is in the best interest of Canadian broadcasting and this whole business of the Canadianization of our own broadcasting waves?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am flattered to think the hon. member is asking me for an opinion and I am pleased to tell him that everything in the budget is for the good of Canadians.

Mr. Nowlan: I knew, Mr. Speaker, that we would not get the frankness from the Prime Minister as from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. But can the right hon. gentleman, as the leader of the land and as the leader of a cabinet which includes the Minister of State who made a very interesting speech on Canadian content and what we should do to make Canadians more aware of what we have done in Canada, explain to the House how a capital cost disallowance from 100 per cent to 30 per cent in the case of films and 60 per cent to 30 per cent in the case of video productions in Canada will help Canadian broadcasters fight the problem of conveying Canadian scenes to Canadians and the importation of foreign signals?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I might advise the hon. member that the reduction in allowances are with respect to films from foreign sources. Canadian films or video tape will continue to enjoy favourable capital cost allowance rates.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NECESSITY FOR EARLY DECISION FROM ANTI-INFLATION BOARD TO AVOID STRIKE AT THOMPSON, MANITOBA

Mr. John Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Last week I asked him about the situation in the City of Thompson, Manitoba. Subsequently the Anti-Inflation Board agreed to review its roll-back decision. The situation at the present time is that the people concerned in Thompson have received no reply from the Anti-Inflation Board and that a strike vote is about to take place. Can the minister tell the House what is going on? Is there any hope there will be an answer from the Board in time to avoid this strike?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): The Anti-Inflation Board is endeavouring to deal with the matters before it with all possible despatch and I hope it will come to a decision in this case very soon.

Mr. Fraser: Might I remind the minister, through you Mr. Speaker, that the Board said it would have an answer ready by May 20. I would ask the hon. gentleman, through Your Honour, to use his good offices to hurry that answer because in its absence there is going to be a strike—one which does not need to take place at all since both management and the union are in agreement.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Officials of the United Steel Workers of America have been in touch with me and people in my department to facilitate procedural matters with the AIB, and we have endeavoured to co-operate with them.

REASON FOR DELAY IN ANTI-INFLATION BOARD DECISION ON CASE AT THOMPSON, MANITOBA

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): My question, too, is directed to the Minister of Labour. I should like to ask him why the decision on the roll-back at Elliot Lake was made within two weeks yet it has taken one month now for the AIB to make the decision on Thompson and they are still without definite information?

Mr. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): This question relates to the period within which the decisions of the Board are made, and it is within the domain of the AIB. I feel they are doing the very best job they can in the circumstances.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Is the minister saying that the Anti-Inflation Board is as incapable of making a decision as is the government?

LOWER PAY FOR VETERINARIANS THAN FOR TECHNICIANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Does the minister approve of the fact that technicians who are doing blood testing in suspected cases of Bangs diseases are paid a higher salary than veterinarians who are doctors of animal medicine and who are supposed to be in charge of the local health of animals technicians they are supervising?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I understand that the technicians are under contract while the veterinarians are paid a straight salary. But I would have to check into this matter, and if the hon. member has any real facts to bring out I will be happy to look into them.

HEALTH

HEALTH STANDARDS AND REGULATION FOR ATHLETES AND VISITORS TO OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question arising from widespread concern that adequate protection and safeguards against diseases which may be brought in by visitors to the Olympic Games have not been carried out. Bearing in mind the view expressed by Professor Berkowitz of Toronto, who specializes in health economics, when he stated it is incredible that plans are not more highly developed six weeks before the Games, would the minister advise the House just what the health status requirements are and whether they have been met?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that the standards required at the Olympics for the admission of foreign athletes and visitors will be the same as those which generally prevail in Canada, and that the standards will not be lowered for the games.

Besides, to alleviate the danger of serious contagious diseases developing, we have taken special interim measures to provide isolation facilities to prospective patients. In particular, we have ordered from the Vickers Company in England three isolation units, one of which has already arrived in Canada and the other two are expected to be delivered shortly. Those beds will be made available at the National Defence Hospital here in Ottawa to meet any emergency which might arise during the Olympics.

[English]

Mr. Rynard: Will all the athletes coming have a health innoculation card showing that necessary innoculations have been carried out.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, all athletes entering Canada will have to meet the usual standards which have been set up according to present regulations. No exception will be made for athletes who will have to face the same requirements as other visitors now coming to Canada.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

YUKON—PROPOSED CREATION OF FOUR RIDINGS IN WHICH ONLY INDIANS AND METIS MAY VOTE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of a report from Whitehorse to the effect that the executive committee of the Yukon is proposing the creation of four ridings within which only Indian and Metis people will have the right to vote, can the right hon. gentleman advise us whether or not the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or officials of his department or, indeed, any officials of the government have had discussion with the executive committee on the subject, and whether this proposal constitutes federal government policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will inquire, Mr. Speaker.

POSSIBLE INVOLVEMENT OF TERRITORIAL COUNCIL IN LAND CLAIMS OF NATIVES

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Is it the intention of the government to involve the administration and the Territorial Council in negotiations with the Indian people in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon in connection with their land claims?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The negotiations are with the native people but certain consequences of those negotiations, on municipal structures, for instance, are of importance to the whole of the Yukon and as far as these matters are concerned the Territorial Government and the municipal structures have to be informed.

AEROSPACE COMPANIES—POSSIBLE INVENTORY OF MANUFACTURING CAPABILITIES

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the department considering an immediate inventory of manufacturing capabilities within existing aerospace companies. I ask this question having in mind recent newspaper articles alluding to the intention to establish a new government super corporation to control Canadian airframe companies.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, something along the lines of what the hon. member has mentioned is under way. We know pretty thoroughly what Canadair and de Havilland have by way of inventory, in confidence, but a more thorough assessment is being undertaken to determine just what the aerospace capabilities are in the country in total. This is part of an ongoing study of strategy for the aerospace industry.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he intends to propose to the House an increase in the tariff on foreign automobiles not covered by the Canada-U.S. auto pact, to protect the Canadian auto market?

● (1450)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, subject to a detailed examination of the ways and means resolution with regard to tariff changes, I think the answer would be no.

TRANSPORT

LOSS TO VANCOUVER OF TOURIST REVENUE AS RESULT OF PROHIBITION OF FOREIGN PASSENGER COASTING VESSELS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Considerable concern has been expressed in the lower mainland concerning the loss of passenger tourist traffic as a result of the operation of Bill C-61 which would remove foreign passenger coasting vessels. While I respect the intention of the minister's bill, can he give any assurance to the residents of the lower mainland that the approximate $29 million in tourist revenue flowing into Vancouver as a result of that traffic will not be impeded by the passage of this bill, and does the minister have any specific changes to propose to the bill or specific recommendations to see that this traffic does not dry up?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can give an assurance and, in fact, it is important to note that the question is somewhat misleading in that at the present time foreign vessels can engage in the coasting trade only with a very long process of exemptions through national revenue. What is really proposed is a simplification of the procedures and essential sets of regulations which will allow for the appropriate engagement of non-Canadian vessels whenever that presence is seen as desirable. It is also my intention to reassure everyone, as I have been doing, that the fullest kind of consultation will take place in connection with regulations which may be proposed, and until there is a high degree of satisfaction with those regulations it would not be my intention to proclaim sections 8 to 14 of the bill.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON STUDY OF EFFECT OF REMOVAL OF FREIGHT SUBSIDY ON WHEAT AND FLOUR FOR EXPORT

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and is a follow-up to a question asked earlier by the hon. member for Halifax. The Minister of Agriculture advised that studies were being carried out in respect of the proposed removal of the flour and grain subsidies provided by section 272 of the Railway Act. Is the minister now able to advise as to the gist of those studies and, more particularly, whether the Minister of Transport is either wise or shrewd in doing away with a program before coming up with a definite replacement such as a unit train grain movement between the prairies and Halifax or Saint John?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the question, I am not aware whether the study or the discussions have been completed. I believe they have been, but I would have to check. I am sure the Minister of Transport is not blind.

TRANSPORT

INCREASE IN FREIGHT RATES TO HALIFAX AND SAINT JOHN BUT NOT TO TORONTO AND MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport which is supplementary to the question just asked and one asked earlier today. Earlier the minister attempted to reassure the House that the application of the "user pay" principle was being carried out equitably in all regions of Canada. In light of that general thrust to the minister's response, would he indicate what is equitable about the application of a further 7 per cent increase in freight rates in respect of the ports of Saint John, New Brunswick and Halifax, Nova Scotia, and in general to eastern traffic rates, and not to the areas east of Diamond Point affecting the movement of traffic in the upper river at Montreal, Toronto and the ports of New York and Baltimore?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I should undertake to analyse the rates, especially since many of them are only distantly under my jurisdiction. Certainly, it would take a statement on motions or a speech to do the job.

Mr. Forrestall: You don't deny it then, in other words?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBILITY DREE USED TO AID FINANCIALLY DISTRESSED AREAS FOLLOWING CLOSURE OF BASES

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of National Defence received any communication from the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, or have there been any discussions with reference to the proposal that DREE be substituted as a means of resolving financial stress in communities where the Department of National Defence may withdraw its base facilities?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, of course there is departmental consultation on these matters and DREE is always involved in any discussion involving base closure or adjustment.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBILITY DREE USED TO AID FINANCIALLY DISTRESSED AREAS FOLLOWING CLOSURE OF BASES—INQUIRY AS TO PLANS

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the minister responsible for DREE. Can he give the House any indication as to what phase these discussions have reached, whether there has been a specific proposal to utilize DREE programs in cases where DND withdraws and closes a base in the maritimes or on the west coast; has there been any specific proposal made by either minister?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague has already announced, we work in close consultation in respect of any program, any project or any base closure or adjustment. We are not in a position now to decide, or we have not come to any conclusion or any decision regarding any project that will follow any base closure, if a base is closed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PARTICIPATION OF ARMED FORCES IN SECURITY FOR OLYMPIC GAMES—INQUIRY AS TO COST

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence.

Could the minister confirm to the House that his department will pay all the costs resulting from the presence of the Canadian Armed Forces in Montreal during the Olympic Games, including the out-of-pocket costs estimated at $24 million and whose financing, according to a statement he made in the House on January 29, had to be negotiated with the Quebec government or else with COJO?

[English]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. Our estimate is that National Defence will contribute approximately $30 million. That is our best estimate now of the cost of supporting the Olympic Games.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR EARLY GRANTING OF LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS FOR STEPHEN BADGER

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact the International Olympic Committee has now given permission to allow Stephen Badger to swim for Canada in the 1976 Olympics—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: In light of this development, I should like to ask the minister whether he will give an undertaking that the officials of his department will expedite a new application for landed immigrant status by Stephen Badger, particularly in view of the fact he has now received permanent job offers from various swimming organizations, thereby eliminating the possibility of any incident which might arise if he won a medal for Canada, with the flag being raised and the national anthem being sung, yet he being a person the immigration department does not want to have enter Canada as a landed immigrant?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is fully aware that these are quite separate issues. The Olympic Committee has its own rules and regulations. If it has now found a way of making what it calls a commonwealth switch, that has nothing whatever to do with landed immigrant status as far as we are concerned. If that is the solution the committee has found, that is fine, but it is none of my business or the business of the department or the government. In so far as the application by Mr. Badger for landed immigrant status is concerned, if he fulfils and meets the regulations and immigration criteria, which the hon. member is suggesting is now the case by virtue of a bona fide job offer that a Canadian is not available for, then of course we will review it.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF RAILWAY SERVICE IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact it is four years now, I guess, since the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications unanimously recommended that railway service be restored in those areas where it was discontinued in southwestern Ontario, and in view of the fact that in the space of that time the only action taken by the government has been a succession of promises, recommendations and broken promises, will the Minister of Transport indicate when he will be in a position to announce action on the part of the federal government that will result in a rationalization and improvement of public transportation services in that area?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the whole area of passenger service from Montreal through to Vancouver is now under active examination by the Canadian Transport Commission. As a result of that consideration I expect a fairly early report on the lines in service that ought to be maintained for rail passengers, and thereafter we should very quickly have a final decision about the way in which that service can be maintained and improved, so far as it is to be maintained.

AIRPORTS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS WORKING IN SECURED AREAS

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport following up a question I have asked in the past three weeks about security at airports. In view of the fact that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has confirmed there were some arrests at the Toronto airport last summer of illegal immigrants working at the airport with clearance for security areas, can the minister assure this House that with the Olympics coming up he is taking steps to make sure that people working at airports who have keys to secured areas do have security clearance, and can he reassure this House also that there are no illegal immigrants working at airports with keys to secured areas?

● (1500)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Well, Mr. Speaker, obviously any such blanket assurance is very difficult to give, but I can indicate to the hon. member that the general procedure is that those who have access to security situations are indeed processed for security clearance, whether they are government employees or people working under contract for the government. This practice is the ordinary one followed. This does not mean, of course, that every employee, particularly those under contract or working for people under contract, with the government is security cleared or checked from that point of view. That is done only if it seems that a security question may arise.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of State for Fisheries on a point of order.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The House will recall that yesterday I had occasion to question remarks of the hon. member for St. John's East. He had characterized a recently concluded arrangement with the U.S.S.R. which will enable groundfish plants in his riding and elsewhere to keep operating longer than anticipated, and which entails no trade-off from Canadian quotas as the "biggest sell-out ever". I took exception to this. Later I reminded the House that when we temporarily closed Atlantic coast ports to Soviet fishing vessels, the hon. member for St. John's East opposed this measure. The hon. member rose on a question of privilege denying this, and in response I agreed to check the matter out and report back to the House. I am now prepared to do so.

In Hansard of June 9, 1975, as recorded on page 6548, the hon. member made reference to the possibility of port closure as a "veiled threat which will have little or no effect on ICNAF nations", and also referred to the fact that "some of our ports . . .would be very seriously hit if they were closed". Although he never said directly "I oppose the closure", he spoke in a negative way about the possibility. I must add, however, that later, in fact on the day I announced the closure as reported on July 23, 1975, at page 7854 of Hansard, the hon. member, in referring to this announcement, indicated that "we have all had to revise our thinking". This is as far as the hon. member went in indicating a change of attitude. However, given the ambiguity in the hon. member's comments on the two dates involved, and accepting that he shared my concern for the fisheries, I shall gladly give him the benefit of the doubt and apologize for stating that he opposed the decision to close the ports.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I accept the apology of the minister, albeit it was made somewhat less graciously than I would have expected from the minister whom I have come to respect. The fact is that in the incident referred to I had moved a motion, which was accepted unanimously by the House, supporting the minister in his initiatives at the ICNAF meeting which was based on the closing of the ports to the Soviets as a move designed to force ICNAF to agree to a reduction in ICNAF quotas and an increase in Canadian quotas. That is clear and unambiguous. Also, Mr. Speaker, the Toronto Sun of Thursday, July 24—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: —in a Canadian Press dispatch states:

> Tory MP James McGrath welcomed the move because it shows the government is finally taking the fishing situation seriously.

There is nothing ambiguous about that, Mr. Speaker. However, there is a great deal of ambiguity and uncertainty about what the minister is trying to do in the bilateral agreements with the Soviet Union and with Poland which, in the case of the Soviets, will have the effect of increasing their quota of capelin which they fished illegally up to a few years ago in exchange for sharing the red fish quotas.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The only reason I recognized both members on a point of order today is that yesterday, when the question arose, the minister indicated that if he was mistaken or not clear in the inference he made, he would clarify it today. He has done so. I thought it was appropriate that the hon. member involved from St. John's East should be given the opportunity at least to put his comments on the record at the same time. However, it certainly is not appropriate under our proceedings to go beyond that and develop any discussion on the merits of the question at issue, only the clarification of the remarks the minister made.

Mr. McGrath: May I close the matter, Mr. Speaker, by saying that I thank the minister for his apology.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar on a point of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock on a question of privilege.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I should like to point out to the government House leader that the Secretary of State, among all the habits he has learned in the last while, has at least one bad one. He comes to the House for the first part of the question period and then chooses to leave after a few minutes and no one is in a position to question him. If the minister himself does not have a sense of responsibility for his work, I wonder if the government House leader could encourage him to develop that kind of sense of responsibility. If he needs help, he could get the government whip, and if he needs three people he could get the deputy whip for the government to help him get the minister here on time and have him stay here for the whole question period.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there is a very considerable problem facing ministers who have responsibilities in places other than this House. The attendance of the Secretary of State on the whole has been admirable, at least as good as that of some of the members on the other side of the House.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, this being a Thursday, I should like to direct the usual inquiry to the government House leader and ask if he could inform us concerning the intention of the government in respect of the business during the course of the next week or so.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am a little at a loss because I had hoped to have some further discussion with the House leader of the official opposition on the business. I have been having some discussions with him about the possibility of extending the hours of sitting to be devoted to the consideration of Bill C-84, and only for that purpose. There has been very great participation by members. I think it had been the hope of all members of the House that there should be an opportunity for as many members as possible to participate in the debate. Therefore, in order to be able to complete our work by June 30, it seemed to us that the House should agree to sit some extra hours during the week.

I made some proposals which have been accepted by some parties but not yet by the official opposition. I hope that party will accept the proposals I have put forward. I have put them forward in a completely non-partisan way. They are perfectly reasonable proposals. We are discussing a bill which is not a government bill in the sense that there is any confidence attached to it. It is a bill in respect of which many members of the House wish to say something. There have been 65 members who have spoken already. I understand there are many more from the official opposition. I should like to see them have an opportunity, and I should like to see all of us get out of this House on June 30 with our business completed.

Another problem that has arisen is that I have had some preliminary discussion with the House leader of the official opposition about the possibility of dealing very quickly tomorrow with two bills from the Senate. I leave that open as a possibility. Other than that, we will continue with Bill C-84 on government days. There of course will be an opposition day on June 1, and the budget debate will be resumed on Wednesday. That will fill the rest of the week.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the reference made to the point by the President of the Privy Council, I should like to confirm that we would be willing to agree to some extra hours during the next week or so to be given completely to Bill C-84. We hope that members of all parties in the House will agree to this so that we can plan a recess beginning by the end of June.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, about the comments of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), we were to have a meeting at five o'clock and I would like to know whether the President of the Privy Council still wants us to meet at five o'clock or does he want to cancel it?

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I want to say to the House leader that so far as our party is concerned, the matter is still under consideration. I hope he has not left the impression in the House that we are not giving serious consideration to any proposal he puts forward, but possibly, unlike the government side, we always refer these matters to our caucus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: We are a little more democratic on this side.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the House leader of the Social Credit party, through you, sir, that it is my intention to continue with the meeting. I do not know whether the House leader of the official opposition will be here for the meeting, but I welcome his alternate. I just want to say to the Acting House leader of the official opposition that I put forward proposals for the extension of hours some ten days ago. There have since been two caucus meetings. We have discussed it at ours, and I hope it has been discussed in the others.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FLOWERS PRESENTED BY COMMITTEE OF ONE MILLION

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that due to an unfortunate delay in delivery, few hon. members have been able to wear the yellow flower provided today by the Committee of One Million to mark the first anniversary of the presentation to parliament of their great petition to protect the lives of unborn children.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: I would not want these people, many of whom have come to Ottawa again today, to misunderstand the support they have in the House. I want to assure them that had it not been for this delay, many members from both sides of the House would have been proud to wear this flower as their gesture in recognition of their deep respect for human life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which has to do with the question put to the Minister of State for Fisheries. In his answer he inadvertently misled the House. I realize that he has been away for several days, but I intended at all times to keep him informed through his parliamentary secretary. In his answer he suggested that the price of fish offered to fishermen by the corporation FFMC has been at all times equal, except for sometimes when prices offered on the open market have been outside the corporation's jurisdiction. In fact, that is not the case.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member raises a question of interpretation, disagreement, debate or discussion about the minister's answer and indeed about the whole subject under discussion. Unless there is some indication that there is a question of privilege because of a deliberate misleading of the House, this is not a point of order.

NUMISMATIC HOBBY PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO PROTECT AGAINST CURRENCY COUNTERFEITS

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-439, to amend the Criminal Code (counterfeit of numismatic items).

He said: Mr. Speaker, counterfeits of old and valuable coins are appearing in larger and larger numbers on the numismatic market and defrauding collectors of large sums of money. This bill would extend the protection of the currency counterfeit laws to items of numismatic value by requiring that such coins or tokens be marked with the date of manufacture and the word "Copy".

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Order Paper Question

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

DIRECTION TO BOARD TO ADVISE WHETHER THE FOUR PILOTAGE AUTHORITIES IN CANADA SUBJECT TO GUIDELINES OF ANTI-INFLATION ACT

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the House that His Excellency the Governor General in council has today, pursuant to subsection 12(2) of the Anti-Inflation Act, directed the Anti-Inflation Board to conduct an inquiry and advise as to whether it is appropriate to make the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines applicable to the four pilotage authorities in Canada and private sector suppliers of pilotage services and I give notice of intent, pursuant to subsection 3(3.2) of the act, that should an order in council be subsequently made pursuant to subparagraph 3(2)(a)(v), it will be applicable as of today.

DEPARTMENT OF ENVIRONMENT, FISHERIES AND MARINE SERVICES BRANCH—RETIRED EMPLOYEES

Question No. 3,812—Mr. Crouse:

1. How many employees have retired from the Department of the Environment, Fisheries and Marine Services Branch in the past two years?

2. (a) What are their names (b) were they eligible for superannuation (c) what was the length of their employment?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): 1. During the calendar years 1974 and 1975, a total of 652 employees ceased employment with the Fisheries and Marine Service of the Department of the Environment. Of that total, 133 employees were eligible for either an immediate annuity or an annual allowance.

OLYMPICS '76 IN INNSBRUCK

Question No. 4,605—Mr. Jones:

1. Were athletes sponsored by Canada to participate in Olympics '76 held in Innsbruck?

2. Was financial assistance provided to the athletes by (a) the government (b) the provincial governments (c) any other source?

3. How many (a) trainers (b) referees (c) support staff accompanied the athletes and, in each case (i) who paid their salaries (ii) who paid their expenses (iii) were any sent at CBC expense?

4. Do figures exist for a country with a population comparable to Canada and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The Canadian Olympic Association is responsible for Canada's Participation in all Olympic Games. The Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch of National Health and Welfare makes contributions to the C.O.A., in the same manner as to National Sport Governing Bodies, for certain projects undertaken. A contribution of $50,000 was made by the Branch toward the (1) transportation of athletes, officials and equipment, (2) meals and accommodation, and (3) minor administrative costs in relation to the 1976 Olympic Winter Games in Innsbruck.

2. (a) The Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch makes grants-in-aid to eligible carded athletes in both Olympic and non-Olympic sports who are enrolled in an educational programme. (University level—$1,800; community college—$1,200; High School—$600). In addition, it provides an annual allowance of $600 to student—athletes who are married or living away from home. The following list indicates those members of Canada's Winter Olympic Team which received grants-in-aid and supplements during 1975-76. It is anticipated that several of the other athletes will enroll in summer school programmes and will be eligible for this assistance at that time. The remainder are not enrolled in educational programs. (b) and (c) The Department of Health and Welfare Canada can not respond on behalf of provincial governments or other sources.

3. The Department of Health and Welfare Canada contribution to the Canadian Olympic Association was intended to assist with the transportation, food and lodging costs related to thirteen individuals other than athletes. Canadian Broadcasting Corporation: No.

4. The Department of Health and Welfare Canada is not in possession of financial data for other countries.

INCOME TAX ARREARS—CORPORATIONS AND INDIVIDUALS

Question No. 5,244—Mr. Saltsman:

1. How many companies as of March 31, 1975, were in arrears of corporate taxes for (a) 1975 (b) 1974 (c) 1973 (d) prior to 1973 owed (i) less than $5,000 (ii) between $5,000 and $10,000 (iii) between $10,001 and $20,000 (iv) over $20,000?

2. In each case (a) how many owed taxes for more than one tax year (b) what types of business were they engaged in (c) what penalties are applicable?

3. For each month since March 1975, how much of the arrears for (a) 1975 (b) 1974 (c) 1973 (d) prior to 1973 have been repaid and, in each case (i) how many companies do the figures represent (ii) what penalties were assessed?

4. How many persons as of March 31, 1975, were in arrears of income tax for (a) 1975 (b) 1974 (c) 1973 (d) prior to 1973 owed (i) less than $100 (ii) between $100 and $500 (iii) between $501 and $1,000 (iv) between $1,001 and $2,000 (v) over $2,000?

5. In each case (a) how many owed taxes for more than one tax year (b) what penalties are applicable?

6. For each month since March 1975, how much of the arrears for (a) 1975 (b) 1974 (c) 1973 (d) prior to 1973 have been repaid and, in each case (i) how many persons do the figures represent (ii) what penalties were assessed?

7. As of the last day of each month since March 31, 1975, what was the total outstanding in Treasury bills and what was the average rate of interest owing on such bills?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Revenue and Finance as follows: 1. (a) 12,881 Corporations were in arrears of taxes in respect of assessments issued in 1975 as of March 31, 1975. (b) 9,269 Corporations were in arrears of taxes in respect of assessments issued in 1974 as of March 31, 1975. (c) 2,470 Corporations were in arrears of taxes in respect of assessments issued in 1973 and prior years as of March 31, 1975. Total 24,620. (d) A further breakdown is not available as to the number of corporations in arrears of taxes in respect of assessments issued in 1973 and those in respect of assessments issued in years prior to 1973. (i) 20,837 Corporations in arrears of taxes as of March 31, 1975, owed amounts of less than $5,000. (ii) 1,900 Corporations in arrears of taxes as of March 31, 1975, owed amounts between $5,000 and $10,000. (iii) 1,833 Corporations in arrears of taxes as of March 31, 1975, owed amounts in excess of $10,000. Total 24,620. (iv) Information is not available as to the number of corporations owing amounts between $10,000 and $20,000 and the number owing amounts in excess of $20,000.

2, 3, 5 and 6. Departmental records are not maintained in such a manner as to enable Revenue Canada to provide the information requested.

4. (a) 139,776 individuals were in arrears of taxes in respect of assessments issued in 1975 as of March 31, 1975. (b) 245,426 individuals were in arrears of taxes in respect of assessments issued in 1974 as of March 31, 1975. (c) 116,622 individuals were in arrears of taxes in respect of assessments issued in 1973 and prior years as of March 31, 1975. Total 501,824. (d) A further breakdown is not available as to the number of individuals in arrears of taxes in respect of assessments issued in 1973 and those in respect of assessments issued in years prior to 1973. (i) 263,108 individuals in arrears of taxes as of March 31, 1975, owed amounts between $100. (ii) 155,987 individuals in arrears of taxes as of March 31, 1975, owed amounts between $100 and $500. (iii) 34,289 individuals in arrears of taxes as of March 31, 1975, owed amounts between $500 and $1,000. (iv) 22,258 individuals in arrears of taxes as of March 31, 1975, owed amounts between $1,000 and $2,000. (v) 26,182 individuals in arrears of taxes as of March 31, 1975, owed amounts in excess of $2,000. Total 501,824.

UNUSED ADVANCES FOR TRAVEL—L. D. HUDON

Question No. 5,291—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was any money owing to the Treasury for unused advances for travel on the part of Mr. L.D. Hudon, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, as of December 31, 1975 and, if so (a) what was the total amount (b) what various amounts made up this total and, in each case, how long had they been outstanding (c) on what date was all the money owing finally paid back (d) what are the reasons the situation was permitted to exist (e) what steps were taken to clear the matter up and who took such steps (f) what was the maximum amount owing at any one time and what was the date this maximum existed?

2. Is ten days the normal time permitted for repayment to the government of unused travel advances in cases of this kind and, if not, what is the time?

3. What is a complete history of Mr. Hudon's employment in the Public Service including positions held, dates and salaries in each case?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Yes. (a) $851.37; (b) $470.95 from October 4, 1975 $380.42 from November 30, 1975; (c) February 19th, 1976; (d) Settlement was held up pending receipt of travel claims; (e) The outstanding advances were refunded on February 19, 1976; (f) $851.37 as at November 30, 1975.

2. No, 15 days.

DEVELOPMENT OF A DEEP WATER PORT AT GROS CACOUNA

Question No. 5,337—Mr. Forrestall:

What are the terms of reference for the feasibility study presently being conducted by the Department of Transport and the Government of the Province of Quebec respecting the further development of a deep water port at Gros Cacouna?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The terms of reference of the federal provincial study on Gros Cacouna are as summarized below: 1. To analyze the potential dry bulk traffic to be transshipped at Gros Cacouna based on market trends.

2. To assess the impact of the development of a dry bulk port at Gros Cacouna on other St. Lawrence and East Canadian ports.

3. To evaluate the costs involved in developing Gros Cacouna (including auxiliary costs such as rail infrastructure).

Order Paper Question

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Question No. 5,344—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Have any air traffic controllers been transferred out of Montreal in the past two years and, if so (a) how many (b) to what locations were they transferred (c) for what reason?

2. What was the displacement allowance for each individual?

3. How many were (a) English speaking (b) French speaking (c) bilingual?

4. Did the government pay a housing differential move on any of the transfers?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. (a) 10; (b) Ottawa 3; Toronto 2; Thunder Bay 1; Winnipeg 2; Vancouver 2; (c) 7 lateral transfers at the request of the employee 3 transfers relating to promotions.

2. None of the employees have received a displacement allowance but all have received removal expenses as provided for by the Treasury Board Relocation Directive. The five controllers transferred since December 13th, 1975, may be eligible for special relocation provisions now under consideration by Transport Canada and Treasury Board.

3. (a) mother tongue English 8; (b) mother tongue French 2; (c) bilingual 4.

4. No although the five controllers transferred since December 13th, 1975 may be eligible for special relocation provisions now under consideration by Transport Canada and Treasury Board.

MONTHLY MAGAZINE "LIAISON"

Question No. 5,348—Mr. Dick:

1. How many copies of the Department of the Solicitor General's monthly magazine Liaison, Volume 2, No. 2, March 1976 were printed?

2. What was the (a) cost of printing (b) price of each copy?

3. How many copies were sold?

4. Are copies distributed free of charge and, if so, to whom?

5. Does the government intend to publish the next issue containing views contrary to the government's own political views relating to Peace and Security as set out in Bills C-83 and C-84?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): 1. 9,300.

2. (a) $2,852.42; (b) 30.

3. Nil.

4. Yes. "Liaison" is distributed free of charge to interested parties, working mainly in the area of criminal justice in Canada, and outside Canada. The mailing list is approximately 9,000.

5. No.

RCMP PROTECTION—EASTERN SHORE OF NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 5,357—Mr. Forrestall:

Has any action been taken to upgrade RCMP protection along the eastern shore of Nova Scotia from Sheet Harbour to Halifax-Dartmouth in the last twelve months and, if so, what was such action?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Royal Canadian Mounted Police datachments have increased their patrols along the eastern shore of Nova Scotia.

MONTREAL PORT AUTHORITY AND HALIFAX PORT AUTHORITY

Question No. 5,433—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Has the executive committee of the Montreal Port Authority been established and, if so, on what date?

2. Is it the government's intention to establish an executive committee for the Halifax Port Authority and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, what factors prevent its immediate establishment in Halifax, if any?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. Yes, on January 29, 1975.

2. Yes. (a) Date not yet determined. (b) Completion of appropriate documents clearly indentifying limits of responsibilities and authority which are acceptable to ports concerned and within the powers of the National Harbours Board Act.

PORT OF MONTREAL—TOTAL REVENUE FROM TASK TERMINALS AND MANCHESTER LINERS

Question No. 5,434—M. Forrestall:

In 1975, what was the total revenue from leases paid to the National Harbours Board from the terminals operated in the Port of Montreal by Task Terminals Limited and Furness Withy Limited (Manchester Liners)?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: The total revenue in 1975 from the lease to Task Terminals was $675,353. The total revenue in 1975 from the lease to Manchester Liners was $560,560.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION LOANS

Question No. 5,450—Mr. Elzinga:

1. How much was loaned to farmers by the Farm Credit Corporation in 1972, 1973, 1974 and 1975?

2. How much was disbursed in each province?

3. What are the names of the individuals who received loans in 1972, 1973, 1974 and 1975?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The Farm Credit Corporation advises: 1. Loan Approvals ($000), 1972-73—186,276; 1973-74—400,658, 1974-75—398,814; 1975-76—640,947.

2. Loan Disbursement ($000)

Province	1972-73	1973-74	1974-75	1975-76
British Columbia	8,537	15,463	16,670	14,081

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale):

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, there are no fresh ideas in this budget. There is no new perspective, long range or otherwise, that would give Canadians renewed hope in our future, that would give them hope that our jobless will find employment, hope that our real growth will regain what we lost in those sad years of 1974 and 1975, hope that we will regain our position in per capita national wealth among the nations of the world, hope that our $5 billion trade deficit will be lessened or eliminated. Confidence has been lost in Canada. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) did not help restore it in his presentation on Tuesday night. As one commentor has said, the message seemed to be: Economy, heal thyself.

Judging from responses to questions yesterday, the minister appears to seek his answers in the United States. He hopes their upturn will spill over into Canada without himself having to lift even a finger. The American motto is, as we know, "In God we trust". This administration's motto seems to be, "In the United States we trust". Meanwhile, this administration continues its spending spree. On Tuesday evening I pointed out that they has caused federal spending to quadruple since they took power in April of 1968. Expressed another way, in the nine years since gaining control of Canada, they will have spent twice as much as all previous administrations combined, that is, over the previous 100 years of confederation. On Tuesday we referred to the staggering deficits of this administration which will now total, in the aggregate, by the end of this year, $11 billion—an amount four times the size of all the deficits incurred, in aggregate, by the Pearson administration, the Diefenbaker administration and the St. Laurent administration.

Coupled with this high spending we must note that it is the average taxpayer in Canada who increasingly has been paying the shot. This year alone, aggregate personal income taxes will jump 26 per cent over last year. In 1968, the year this man Trudeau took power—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Stevens: —personal income taxes represented 34 per cent of the total revenue received by Ottawa, while corporate taxation represented 15 per cent. Today, personal income taxes supply an amazing 53 per cent of Ottawa's take, while the corporate sector still accounts for that 15 per cent. In short, it is not the so-called fat-cat, it is not the wealthy, it is not that vague corporate entity which pays—in the main, it is the average, hard working Canadian who increasingly pays for the spending programs of this administration. In fact, taxation has gone so wild in this country that we now find the government is reverting to shell games in order to raise revenues still further.

Consider the approach of the administration to lotteries which it has aided and abetted with a view to increasing revenue and their take from Canadian citizens. Lotteries went out of fashion in the seventeenth century, and yet here we have a government in this century cultivating and developing that concept of raising money from the public.

An hon. Member: Like Wintario.

Mr. Stevens: Let us consider what this administration did with regard to the $100 Canadian gold coin. Yes, the administration is proposing to issue a $100 gold coin for $105, containing $32-worth of gold. That is what I mean by the shell game this government has become party to in order to continue raising money.

Let there be no mistake about it, in my remarks today I would like to indicate where at least $1 billion can be cut from federal government spending plans and where $500 million of that amount can be given back to the Canadian public, where it belongs, and something in excess of $500 million can be used to lower the $4.5 billion cash deficit proposed to be incurred by this administration in the current year. But let me first deal with the administration's wage and price controls. It now appears that this program was introduced at the wrong time, in the wrong way, for the wrong purpose and for the wrong length of time.

Mr. Broadbent: And with your support.

Mr. Stevens: The controls program would have made sense 18 months earlier, but not during the current period when inflation is on the decline around the world, when we hover on the brink of recession, with 750,000 people out of work and when we have a need for more productivity in this country. Any controls program should commence with an absolute freeze for, say, 90 days, with a tempering of controls to suit the circumstances for another 15 to 18 months at the outside.

Hon. members will recall that this administration started with a consensus dialogue. That dialogue alarmed everyone. Then the government went into gentle controls, which were understood by few; and now, partly as reflected in the budget of last Tuesday, the government seems to be moving into extensive controls which will be policed by an ever-growing bureaucracy. Throughout the piece there has been a lack of meaningful dialogue with labour, with business, with the provinces and with the consumer in Canada.

When we clear away the sophistry surrounding this administration, it is more and more apparent that its interest in controls is threefold. First, this government believes it is popular, politically, to appear to be doing something to counter inflation. Second, controls give the government an opportunity to continue its spending habits in the mistaken belief that the wage and price control program will keep the lid on inflation which will ensue from its big spending and high deficits. Cut the minister's figures whatever way you like; the truth is that this government has allowed spending to increase by over 26 per cent per year for the last four years. With such a ravenous appetite for spending, no controls program will ever work.

Third, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) believes there should be greater intervention by government in our economy on a permanent basis. The recently announced northern land regulations perhaps highlight this type of thinking. The administration's refusal to outline options which will be open to Canadians in the post-control period confirms the belief that our control period is here for a long time, and chairman Pepin of the Anti-Inflation Board certainly leaves no doubt that he sees controls for an indefinite period in Canada. To suggest that the program should continue until December 31, 1978, or even longer, is alarming and particularly unfortunate. This administration should give a firm commitment today that these controls will not continue beyond another year. Twice the Liberal caucus, dominated by this government, defeated our amending motions to terminate controls legislation by next April or May.

Mr. Broadbent: Why wait for a year, if it is wrong now?

Mr. Stevens: The members of the Liberal caucus are forgetting that the main reason Canadians have supported controls to date is that they believe they are temporary, and that is one reason we voted against this measure twice in this House, on the basis of it running longer than for an 18-month period.

History demonstrates the administration is wrong in its approach. Robert Schuettinger, lecturer in economics at Yale University, in an interesting survey of wage and price controls for 50 centuries, states, "For the past 46 centuries at least, governments all over the world have periodically tried to fix wages and prices. When their efforts failed, as they usually did, governments then put the blame on the wickedness of their subjects."

Already this administration cites the businessman, the labouring man, or the individual as the villain in our inflationary condition. It chooses to ignore that our inflation is due primarily to excess federal spending and, until recently, undue growth in our money supply.

Surely we can learn from history. Great Britain, over the past 30 years, followed a path surprisingly similar to this administration's economic approach. Now, as we see that country crushed economically and humiliated in the eyes of the world, can we not accept that serious mistakes were made? Why repeat the mistakes? The British approach to wage and price controls developed from attitudes that arose during the Second World War. In an article on wage and price controls entitled "The Lessons from Britain", Michael Parkin from the University of Western Ontario concludes, "The existence of controls has certainly contributed to Britain's last 25 years of slide into economic and social chaos." The message is clear. Let's heed it.

In the March-April edition of the Canadian Tax Journal, Professor J. B. Jump and Professor T. A. Wilson of the University of Toronto reviewed Canada's fiscal policy and ended with a damning indictment of the administration controls program. In their article they state:

> With negative effects on investment spending and spending for research and development, the controls program will hamper productivity growth thereby reducing Canada's potential rate of growth and contributing to higher unit labour costs in the longer run.
> We therefore cannot escape the conclusion that the present program should be either modified substantially or abandoned completely. To continue our present course will reduce the rate of growth of the Canadian economy in the near term by reducing real aggregate demand and in the longer term by reducing productivity growth.

What more need be said, Mr. Speaker, especially when we bear in mind that Messr. Jump and Wilson are advisers to the Department of Finance.

Now let me deal with agriculture. No other field or industry in Canada was so ignored in this budget as was the farming community. Despite the fact that it was the farmer who, through the sale of his goods, helped, lessen our trade deficit, the same farmer was virtually ignored in the minister's presentation. In our view, the farm community in Canada could, with proper federal direction and incentives, be one of the most effective forces in increasing our export trade and thus reducing our trade deficits. Surely the Minister of Finance, who complains that world markets for our products are not available—we heard him say that here yesterday; that was the statement he kept making in this House, that world markets are not available for our products—would have to admit there is a market for food around the world. That market could be tapped more effectively, with better direction from the federal government. It is too bad the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) does not have the clout in cabinet to sell this concept.

Our farmers could increase production if they were given the opportunity. What finer way to reduce our trade deficit than to help feed more of the world's population? Let us take wheat as an example. We are a great wheat-producing nation, but I would suggest that we could be greater. How many people realize that France produces just about as much wheat as we do in Canada, or that India produces about one-third more than we do? How many realize that our production of wheat, expressed in tonnage terms, has been relatively static for ten years, while American production has jumped a dramatic 66 per cent? Incidentally, the Americans have sold much of that increase to foreign markets—the very markets the Minister of Finance says do not exist.

An hon. Member: At a loss!

Mr. Stevens: I believe if the present administration would go to our farming community and say, "Start producing more, and we will start selling more of your goods in foreign markets," the product would be forthcoming and sales could be made. On agricultural products alone, the Americans turned from a trade deficit of approximately $5 billion to a substantial surplus within two years. They are still in surplus, while we nurse our $5 billion deficit. Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister: Let us start selling in markets that are there. In supplying those markets, let us make sure that the family farm is preserved. There is no reason why easier roll-over provisions for farms held within families cannot be facilitated, as several farm groups have requested. The family farm is an efficient unit of production and it should be encouraged to continue.

I should like now to touch briefly on the question of energy. At this point I would suggest that the energy price increases which have been announced are vital to federal finances. Without such increases, federal cash requirements would have mounted sharply and would probably have precipitated substantial changes in existing revenue and expenditure plans. I would hope that this new source of revenue would not be retained by the federal administration long after its initial purpose has been fulfilled. That initial purpose was to even out energy price costs in this country.

I think we must remember that the ten-cent tax on each gallon of gasoline which was imposed by this administration equals $3.50 per barrel for the oil itself. That is regressive, and I would point out that when the administration speaks about a $1.05 increase at the present time, with a further increase next January of 70 cents, it should be made clear that with their ten-cent levy alone they are extracting twice the per barrel amount from the Canadian public that that increase is going to entail when it is fully felt by the public.

In fact, let the administration make it clear that it is not only a ten-cent excise tax they are taking; they are also taking a 3.9-cent sales tax from the Canadian public, or a total of 13.9 cents per gallon of gasoline. Put in perspective, the dealer who pumps the gasoline into the car gets 7.9 cents, on average, while the government gets 13.9 cents on the same gallon. That is why we say it is important that in future this ravenous government should not attempt to retain that source of revenue long after the need for it has gone.

I should like now to touch on the question of capital formation to look after future productivity needs and development in this country. There is nothing in this budget that will ensure there will be sufficient capital formation in Canada to fill our investment needs in the coming decade. It has been estimated that the gap between domestic investment needs and our domestic savings forecast could be as much as 10 per cent. Over the next decade, the cumulative shortfall could be as much as $75 billion.

We have three alternatives, Mr. Speaker. We could let our capital investment lag, which would mean less real wealth for Canadians and fewer jobs, or we could import savings from abroad, with the necessity of paying interest on those foreign funds in subsequent years, which in turn would heighten our trade deficit. Last year alone, for example, we borrowed $4.7 billion in this category—encouraged, incidentally, by the June 23 budget. This year we will start paying $400 million on that debt alone, and in subsequent years like amounts will have to be covered. Our third alternative is to encourage more capital formation in the country. How many people realize that, historically, four-tenths of our capital formation is in the corporate sector in Canada, yet that is the sector this administration chooses to kick around, to overregulate and overcontrol, with the net result that it is hampered in producing the necessary capital that we need for future development.

Does the Minister of Finance believe that his new Anti-Inflation Board formula to control profits will encourage capital formation in Canada? Not only will it not encourage capital but it will lead to further inefficiencies and lack of productivity in our industries. That is exactly what we do not need if we hope to regain our competitive position in the world.

Let me now touch on the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The members of my party commend the Minister of Finance for moving in some of the directions we have long advocated regarding changes in the Unemployment Insurance Commission program. In particular, we think it makes very good sense to recombine Canada Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission into one unit. Indeed, it is hard for many on my side of the House to imagine the kind of convoluted logic which led to their separation in the first place. The changes in eligibility requirements and length of time for benefit payments represent a small step in returning the fund to an insurance concept whereby premiums paid in might be balanced by benefits paid out. We support the principle that the government should provide an income to those who need it in our society, but have a fundamental objection to labelling the program as an insurance program when in fact it is not an insurance program. We are intrigued by the minister's concerns about regional disparity. We share those concerns and look forward to the chance of studying what the minister has in mind.

Having said all that, I am still amazed that this administration has failed to grasp that when a few people have to work to support the many who do not work, significant strains are placed on people of our society. Anyone with vision should be able to see that it is in our long-term interest to move as quickly as possible toward higher levels of employment. Why does this administration continue to highlight unemployment insurance and say so little about stimulating the economy and providing more jobs in the private sector for more people? How can the government tolerate the vague idea that if the United States recovery continues, and we get all the lucky breaks, we shall then create 250,000 more jobs when, at the same time, last year there were 350,000 new entrants to the labour force and there are likely to be as many entrants this year? How can you gloss over the fact that the most optimistic forecasts still indicate to this House that the government is following a budgetary policy which may well add 50,000 more people to the unemployment rolls which are already at the highest level of the last 15 years? We need a change in employment policy much more than we need further tinkering with our unemployment policy. I suggest it is time this government got its priorities straight.

Let us now touch on government expenditures. In the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien)—I am sorry he is not present—we have two of the finest diddlers in the land. Take a look at the Post Office, for example. In the estimates now before the House we are told that the department needs $1.122 billion for the current year. That does not sound too bad when you look at the expenditures estimated in the blue book for the fiscal year 1976.

Last year the department is reported to have spent $981 million, which means it is asking for an increase of $141,312,000, or 14 per cent. But then you find this crafty pair, the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board, start to fiddle. When you look at page 11 of budget papers "B" you are surprised to find that Post Office expenditures for the fiscal year 1976 are only $901 million, or $80 million less than we were told when the blue book estimates were tabled. Based on these figures, we find the Post Office estimates in reality have gone up $221 million, or 25 per cent in one year. Surely the people of Canada are entitled to an explanation. Why have the books been apparently cooked to show an additional $80 million as being expended in the fiscal year 1976, which of course makes the current estimates look more acceptable?

It is our suggestion that as far as the Post Office is concerned, until they can show otherwise their 1976 spending of $901 million should be taken as a base, to be increased by 14 per cent, the percentage they asked for, which would give a total increase of $126 million instead of the contemplated $221 million. Removing this diddle in the accounts would effect a saving for the people of Canada of $95 million. In total, a review of the blue book estimates compared to the budget papers "B", page 11, reveals that there has been a misrepresentation of departmental expenditures in 1976 totalling $218 million. If that money was not needed in 1976, there was absolutely no reason for its being used as padding to justify a new estimate in 1977 which includes that amount plus an increase of 14 per cent or 15 per cent. The bulk of that money should be eliminated from present spending plans and returned to the people of Canada through a tax credit, or the cash deficit should be lowered. We reckon that including the Post Office's $95 million there is $225 million which could be eliminated from the 1977 spending plans of this administration, if they were prepared to be honest about their accounts. The fact is there. Let us cut it out. The average Canadian taxpayer needs that money more than do the ledgers and computers of the Treasury Board. If it is to be retained, then let us have a proper explanation as to why it is needed.

Lest you think that the $225 million misrepresentation, or error, in the accounts is but a single example, let me tell you of two other cases where the present administration appears to have altered the figures to its own advantage. The Minister of Finance notes that expenditures in the 1975-76 fiscal period are going to be somewhat higher—about 2 per cent higher. For this second piece of skullduggery let me take you back to the President of the Treasury Board's publication in February, entitled "How your tax dollar is spent." At pages 7 and 8 of that publication you will note that the President of the Treasury Board states that in the fiscal year 1976 total expenditures were $36.5 billion, and that in 1977 they would go up to $42.15 billion—as he said, a mere 16 per cent increase. The minister, on page 8, points out that this 16 per cent increase is the same increase as the previous year's. Included in the $42.15 billion are loans, investments and advances of a non-budgetary nature totalling $2.75 billion.

Then on Tuesday night in walks the Minister of Finance, with his apparently innocent statement that he and the President of the Treasury Board have been surprised to find that the fiscal year 1976 figures have actually gone over the Treasury Board's final figure—I emphasize, final figure—by $725 million, almost three-quarters of a billion dollars. This conveniently put the minister in the position of being able to say that instead of growth in 1976 being at 16 per cent and in fiscal 1977 at 16 per cent, the actual growth figure was 18 per cent in 1976 and a mere 14 per cent in fiscal 1977. What sophistry! What diddling! Remember, we had been told less than one month before that the anticipated growth rate in this country was to be 13 per cent. Now we are told that real growth is to be 14 per cent or 15 per cent. The government had diddled its percentage figures and said that growth will be at 14 per cent to keep apparent spending in line with growth in the economy.

A review of the accounts reveals how this was cooked up. Certain Crown corporations and related entities—some, incidentally, under the direct control of the Minister of Finance—took down, in the aggregate, $725 million in fiscal 1976 rather than in 1977. By having these amounts reflected before March 31, the 1976 accounts were made to look higher so that the 1977 figure would look lower, percentage-wise. Here is the rub. Despite the fact that this extra $725 million was reflected in the 1976 figures, there is no credit for it now in the 1977 figures. The 1977 figures show no reduction at all from the $42.1 billion figure to which I referred. To be consistent, 1977 spending should have been reduced by the same amount that 1976 spending was inflated, or by $725 million. But that is not the way these twins think. They now have $725 million to play with in the 1976 figures, and another $725 million in the current year.

These greedy, ravenous administrators who have control of this country have chosen to clutch on to this money because they know it gives them a slush fund of almost three-quarters of a billion dollars which they can squander as they see fit without meaningful recourse to the parliament of this country or the Canadian people. However, that is only part of the story of how they are handling your finances and mine and everyone's tax dollars in Canada.

In another section of the minister's speech he mentioned that $300 million will not be included for federal non-budgetary expenses as they have asked Canadian National Railways and the Export Development Corporation to go out and raise the money directly. Remember, it was W. A. C. Bennett of British Columbia who first carried out that scheme. He cleared the British Columbia debt by having provincial Crown corporations take it over and then proclaimed the provincial government debt-free.

We are now told by this administration that they are saving $300 million. The fact is the money still has to be borrowed, and the covenant and guarantee they are giving is the covenant and guarantee indirectly of the people of Canada. Properly reflected, this $300 million should be added to what we understood was the ultimate figure to be spent in 1977, that is, to the $42.1 billion I referred to, the figure which the President of the Treasury Board told us only last month was the sky, the uppermost figure for 1977. For these reasons, we are asking the two ministers to give us an explanation as to why they cannot save for the people of Canada $225 million, as I touched on earlier, but why at least another $410 million cannot be eliminated from the non-budgetary side of federal spending for 1977. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) claims he is innocent of the charge of excessive spending, but he appears to have blackened the figures to make himself white.

In addition to the savings I have indicated, we believe the administration should tell us why $250 million cannot be slashed from the consulting and related contracts reflected in current estimates. These are only part of the contracts this administration has grown accustomed to awarding to their friends. Based mainly on the Auditor General's recommendations, we believe the administration should tell us why administrative savings cannot be realized and the civil service stabilized with a cost saving totalling at least $90 million. In addition, a systematic amalgamation of departments or the phasing out of departmental operations which overlap with other federal departments or provincial counterparts can realize minimum savings of $50 million.

Do we really need 29 ministries in Canada, when the Americans can operate a country ten times our size with half that number? Does it really make sense to have ten departments operating in each of our provinces when in many cases their activities overlap directly with counterpart departments in Ottawa? I understand that on occasion these departments become counterproductive—one arguing with the other as to what should be done, with the result that nothing is done. To this end, it might be wise for the government to commission a Glassco-type commission to review the spending habits of this administration with a view to suggesting where savings may be made. After all, when the Glassco commission study was done in 1962, total federal spending was $6.5 billion. Today it is, on the same basis used at the time of the Glassco commission study, over $34.9 billion, a figure five times that of 1962.

In total, I have outlined possible savings of $1,025 million this administration could consider. Now, here is how we would like to see those savings used. First, we would like to give a tax break of $250 million to the Canadians who have been paying the shot. Of this amount we would like to see a 10 per cent tax credit—that would be about $100 million—go to those earning $8,000 or less. The remaining $150 million should be given in credits scaled down appropriately for those earning between $8,000 and $16,000. We believe it is time to give the taxpayer such a break, for three very good reasons. The April Economic Review reveals, at page 56, that the real gross national product per employee in Canada has actually gone down by $200 since 1972. In 1975, the average employee, in real dollars, earned $11,645 compared to $11,848 in 1972. Surely it is wrong to deny a tax break to such employees who are being required ti restrain their wage increases. Second, we would point out to the administration that they have reaping a bonanza in personal income tax aggregate increases which this year alone are jumping 26 per cent, or $3.3 billion. An 8 per cent reduction of this increase would not be out of line. Third, and most importantly, as we have already indicated, the administration just does not need the money. By being more restrained and by being more frugal there is no doubt they could save this amount and turn it back to the people we and they are supposed to be serving.

We would like to earmark another $100 million of our spending cuts to give further incentives to the private sector to encourage it to increase its activities in the research and development field. In this connection, we should have a further explanation as to why the administration chose to end assistance to small business under the Industrial Research Development Incentives Act. Our incentive scheme would be adjusted regionally to provide the greatest incentive in areas of disparity. For instance, locations in the maritimes would earn a 70 per cent credit, but locations in, say, Toronto, would earn 25 per cent. This administration only gives lip service to productivity and improving our trade balance which is really an $8 billion deficit. I am pleased to see the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) here. We should never forget that before we sold our non-renewable assets last year, the total trade deficit in this country was $8 billion. We covered that deficit by selling $2.9 billion of our non-renewable resources. That left a deficit of $5.1 billion, and even the administration admits that $5.1 billion deficit. We covered by borrowing, in foreign lands, $4.7 billion and allowing our cash reserves to go down by another $400 million.

But let us not forget the point. We had an $8 billion deficit before we started to sell our non-renewable resources, and I would say it is wrong to continue to pay for current extravagances in the form of trade deficits by selling off non-renewable resources that we shall run out of some day. Surely, from an accounting standpoint, we should show our accounts on the basis of the situation before we sold these resources and after we sold them, and the administration should attempt to ensure a continuing benefit to Canadians with respect to the moneys received fron the sale of those resources. I have in mind something like the heritage fund in Alberta in connection with the sale by that province of its non-renewable resources.

The minister spent the greater part of yesterday's question period claiming that we cannot sell goods in foreign markets if the markets are not there. I say to him, "The markets are there, if you have the goods to sell; but you cannot get goods to sell if you keep shortchanging research and development in the private sector." Look at the facts. For the past ten years the private sector has spent .3 per cent of our gross national product on research and development. There has been little encouragement from the administration to increase this figure. On the other hand, the Americans spend 1 per cent of their GNP on research and development, and Japan and Germany spend 1.4 per cent of theirs. With our competitors spending such amounts on technology and the development of new products, is it any wonder that private industry here finds it difficult to compete in world markets? The minister is simply out of touch when he says the markets are not there. The markets are there. The difficulty arises through the failure of the present administration to give leadership and guidance to Canadian industry and to help them capitalize on those markets. By increasing our exports in this field we would lower our trade deficit in the most meaningful way—by selling merchandize, not non-renewable resources.

Tightly linked with this approach we would like to see another $75 million of the savings to which we have referred spent in giving export sales support and incentives to industry, especially to small businessmen who would increase their share of international markets. Surely, if the government is willing to give billions of dollars by way of assistance to large corporations, mainly foreign-owned, in the form of export credits it could give some assistance to our smaller concerns who could compete in these world markets if offered the opportunity.

Another $25 million of the money we suggest the administration could save should go into medical research in the hope that, through research, cures and preventive procedures could be found for many diseases which afflict citizens in this country. It is totally inconsistent to spend billions of dollars in the field of health and welfare while at the same time shortchanging medical research. Is it not sensible to find cures or, better still, to prevent diseases, rather than spend hundreds of millions of dollars treating people who become afflicted?

Mr. Speaker, all businessmen, and small businessmen in particular, are being swamped with increasing requirements to file government forms. This trend must be reversed. We believe the administration should be willing to pay small businessmen for filling in federal forms, possibly by providing them with a suitable tax allowance. Hopefully, action along these lines would drive home to the federal administration the degree to which they are leaning on business to supply them with information which, very often, is never used. If they had to pay in order to get these forms completed, they might decide they did not need the information after all; they might even drop some of these forms. What a pleasant relief that would be for more than one million small businessmen who find the filling out of forms for the federal government one of the most onerous tasks they have to live with, when they would much prefer to be out selling their products or engaged in increasing their production?

In addition, we would like to see an incentive given to small businessmen to encourage them to increase their sales. As their sales increased over a certain level they would become entitled to a tax credit or rebate on a formula basis. In total, this form of assistance to small business and the form fees would take up $50 million of the unnecessary federal spending to which we have called attention. All in all, we believe $500 million of the $1,025 million we have identified could be given back to the Canadian people in the form I have outlined. The balance should be used to reduce the cash needs of the administration from $4.5 billion to $3,975 million. Such a cash deficit reduction would help renew public confidence in the economic future of the country. It would demonstrate to the Canadian public that, rather than continue to live with deficits, an attempt was being made to reduce those deficits. Capital markets would respond positively to such a move, and this in turn would encourage lower interest rates.

One of the most disturbing aspects of the budget is its lack of perspective. There is no long-range theme, no indication of where the administration sees the country going beyond 1977. We believe there should be a two-year review undertaken in every budget presentation, and a five-year perspective offered. In the United States, to which the Minister of Finance looks for relief, two-year budgets are required by law and a five-year perspective is given in addition. In that country they are much more frank with their people than the present administration is with Canadians. They spell out where they believe the country is going, then let their citizens judge the success or failure of successive administrations in reaching the goals set. In Canada we are told our real growth will be about 5 per cent this year, but this is not even a guess as to the situation in succeeding years. In the United States the long-term projections show a 6 per cent average rate of real growth from 1975 through 1981. Furthermore, this rapid advance in output is accompanied by a slowing of the inflation rate from 6.5 per cent in 1975 to 4 per cent, and possibly even 2 per cent. They show unemployment as deciding dramatically, well below the projection the Minister of Finance is holding out for Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the measures announced last Tuesday are not worthy of a budget presentation. Most of the items could have been covered in other ways. We are faced with an inflation rate of 9.4 per cent this year. This ought to be significantly lower. We are faced with current unemployment of 7.4 per cent and the situation is expected to be worse toward the end of this year: the figures will probably be even higher next year. That rate must be made lower. The real rate of growth in the economy last year was only .2 per cent, and the prospect this year is 5 per cent. It should be at least 6 per cent in this current year. We have an admitted deficit in trade of $5 billion, which is really the $8 billion deficit to which I have referred. We have interest rates 3 per cent higher than those in the United States, a country with which we are attempting to compete. It is with that background, Mr. Speaker, that I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner):

To delete all the words following "That this House", and insert:

"regrets the lack of any government commitment to the long-term growth and job potential of the Canadian economy, its failure to realize that sound economic growth and job creation are essential to effective control of inflation, and its refusal to impose any real and honest restraint on its own spending to ease the tax burden on Canadians."

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, may I first deal with a point of order before commencing my remarks. I intend to move a subamendment before concluding, and I understand because of that I will have 40 minutes in which to make my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my understanding that the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) will have 40 minutes in view of the fact he is moving a subamendment.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would have required two days if I had intended to reply to the previous speaker, but I am going to forgo that particular luxury. Let me say something about the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) on budget night, in respect of which he has been suggested as saying he would rather be unimaginative than foolhardy. The minister managed the impossible task of being both unimaginative and foolhardy; foolhardy in the sense that he neglected in the most shameful way to do anything about that great forgotten problem of the Liberal government, namely, unemployment.

In many ways this is a political budget, not that all budgets are not political to some extent in that they all contain some element of politics. I would be naive to assume that they were not; but I have never, in my years in the House, seen a budget that was so totally political and totally responsive to an effort to correct the damage the Minister of Finance thinks his Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did by his speech on New Year's. The budget is totally oriented to assuaging the business community to the belief that the new society the Prime Minister was talking about is unreal. He was trying to say to the business community, "Don't worry about it. This is still 'Canada Incorporated', with business as usual, and I am introducing a budget which will demonstrate that to you."

If you want some evidence of that, Mr. Speaker, let us look at the concluding remarks of the Minister of Finance when introducing the budget. His last paragraph is couched in the best of Bay Street terminology. The paragraph which appears at page 34 of the budget speech is as follows:

We see ourselves as partners and not as sole proprietors in this enterprise. It is well to remember that in our economy there is not only a recognized role for governments and their enterprises but also and a massive and crucial role for private firms, labour unions great diversity of other private institutions and associations. If government alone is held responsible for the performance of the economic system, then government will be driven increasingly into the regulation of the private sector, at the cost both of efficiency and of economic freedom. In general we all look to the private sector to deliver the right goods and services to the right place at the right time and the right price. Productivity growth results primarily from the actions of the private sector, not the policies of government. The private sector can expect government to provide a framework of law and economic policy in which it can best function. But government can expect the private sector to operate efficiently, competitively and with due regard to the interest of society within that framework.

Never, in all the budget speeches I have listened to, have I heard such a denial on the part of the government of its own responsibilities. The budget reflects that, in that it says—almost in its entirety—that the government is not going to do anything. In some ways one gets the picture from the budget of the Minister of Finance, in an old jalopy going down a steep hill, with his foot on the brakes and his hands off the steering wheel, hoping to heck that a street called "Main Street, U.S.A." has been cleared for him. That is about the extent of the management he is putting into this economy with this budget.

The Minister of Finance is, in effect, saying, "Don't pay any attention to the Prime Minister's musings. Private industry is going to run this country as it always has, and not the government of Canada." He says, "To demonstrate that to you, we have given you a non-budget that in fact is not going to interfere with the marketplace in any way or try to manage the economy in any significant way". In other words, from the minister's point of view, the government that is best is the government that governs least.

The budget is a confused and impotent document that seems to have been put together by a committee, not of economists but of theologians. It seems to be an act of faith rather than anything based on economic doctrine and thought; sort of an Episcopalian belief, with faith that the great United States will save us. That country is going to be the cavalry which comes over the hill to the rescue of the Canadian economy. There are a number of problems with that kind of concept. First of all, we do not need the United States to save us. The minister, in his speech, seemed to be saying that unless the United States society recovers there is not much point in the Canadian government doing anything at all. That is the most shameful statement made by any minister of finance of this country.

Let us examine that statement for a moment. Granted, there is always some truth to the suggestion that our economies are interlocked. Let us look, for instance, at the manufacturing sector where the bulk of employment in Canada exists in terms of initial employment which feeds the service industry and other sectors above it. We find that the output of the manufacturing industry is consumed by the Canadian economy to the extent of 75 per cent, rather than by any foreign economy. We do not export manufactured goods, we export raw materials, and that is not a job-creating industry.

An article appeared in this morning's Globe and Mail which is very revealing. I wish I had the kind of confidence the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) seems to have that the United States economy is going to do better than ours. That hon. member holds up the United States as the guiding light for Canada. Things are bad enough in this country without that kind of guiding light. The heading of the article in the Globe and Mail is "Consumer confidence down sharply in U. S." Surveys being conducted in the United States indicate that the present recovery is mild, and a pretty shaky one. In addition to that, there is concern that before that recovery gets under way, inflation will start again. Monetary managers in the United States are starting to tighten up their monetary policies and increase interest rates there. If we are waiting for a United States recovery—and I hope that country recovers, as I hope every country in the world recovers we may be waiting for a long time in vain.

In other words, even if the American economy does recover, what guarantee is there that we will follow suit? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has taken considerable pride in pointing out that our economies have not been going in lock-step, that while the Americans suffered a high level of unemployment and inflation, in Canada we were doing somewhat better on the whole than the Americans. He is now reversing his position and saying that we are in lock-step because we have to wait for them to improve. The evidence is that by pursuing different kinds of policies we can do things the United States cannot do.

What really saved us in this country from the severest kind of depression was the unemployment insurance legislation we had, the old age pension legislation and the family allowances legislation. This provided a cushion and a stimulus to consumer purchasing power. That was absent to the same extent in the United States, and therefore the severity of the depression did not hit us as much as it hit them. However, if we look at the problem in the United States and assume that there will be an automatic recovery in Canada as the American economy recovers, we find no basis for that assumption. First of all, the slack in the United States is very great. Even if they recover to some higher lever of activity, what will they buy from Canada? They will buy the same things.

For a long time they have been buying our raw materials, which does not provide the same range of employment opportunity. If they step up their purchase of raw materials, we will have the same situation except that it will be exaggerated because the effect of selling raw materials to the United States will be that the value of the Canadian dollar will increase and we will be sucking in the manufactured goods, which is happening now and creating further unemployment in Canada.

What I am saying is that prosperity in the United States does not necessarily mean prosperity in Canada. Prosperity in the United States may very well be followed by a depression in Canada. Yet the Minister of Finance pins his entire policy in this budget on the hope that the American economy will recover and that we will get dragged along with that kind of recovery. That is fine management of the economy; that is great government we are getting! We might as well be paying our taxes to congress as paying them in this country, if that is the kind of management that is taking place. A budget is supposed to be an instrument for managing the economy, and not an instrument of prayer. The cabinet does not look like a church, nor should it.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Let me take another example of the kind of situation the minister hopes for which may not materialize. In Canada there has been a fair demand for automobiles. Despite that, because of the lack of demand in the United States, our production in Canada has been declining and the imbalance of trade between ourselves and the United States has been increasing. The total imbalance in automobile trade is now close to $2 billion. In other words, we are importing $2 billion more, in terms of automobiles and parts, than we are selling to the United States. The Canada-U.S. auto agreement, with its main safeguards, still does not provide adequate protection for guaranteed production in Canada. The decisions that are made in respect of that agreement are made at the head offices of the motor companies of the United States, and the decisions are not always economic decisions based on where are the best costs or opportunities. Often they are political decisions.

If the American recovery should take place, it is not necessarily the case that we will receive an increased share of that recovery unless the American recovery takes place at such a pace that it is overheated and there is a surplus which must be purchased from other countries. In other words, before we can really count on the United States helping us, the improvement would have to be of vast proportions—and there is no evidence that that will take place. That is what the Minister of Finance is waiting for.

Other countries have managed their own prosperity. It is not as though this is a universal thing. Countries like Sweden, through proper planning, have in fact avoided some of the worst effects of the recession. Other countries have accomplished the same thing. Germany has accomplished very worth-while objectives by having better management of its own economy. Therefore, it is important that this country not be complacent, that it not sit back, and that it not wait for a foreign recovery in order to get the 7.4 per cent unemployment rate down in Canada.

It is for that reason we have advocated there be tax cuts in the economy at the lower end of the scale. The budget in fact does contain some tax cuts, but they are at the upper end of the scale in terms of registered retirement savings plans. There should be tax cuts at the lower end of the scale, because this would do two things. It would encourage consumers in Canada to purchase goods, and it would also restore some element of fairness to a tax system which badly needs that fairness restored.

The government and the minister may argue that this would be inflationary. Yet there is evidence that it need not be inflationary. The Conference Board of Canada pointed out that government deficits are not the cause of inflation. Other people in the business community also pointed out this situation. Therefore, it is important that purchasing power be restored in the economy. Very often, tax cuts and planned deficits result in surpluses, because if you can get the economy going again and can notch up some of the unemployment that is taking place and stimulate the economy in that way, there are very substantial savings from not having to pay out as much in unemployment insurance and welfare payments as well as having tax collections from those who are working.

A tax cut would encourage investment as well. My friends to the right seem to argue there has to be direct encouragement to investment. The experience has been that investment takes place when there is purchasing power in society. If there are customers whose needs need to be satisfied, industry will invest. At any rate, there does not seem to be any great need for additional investment to get the economy going, since the manufacturing industry is operating at only 80 per cent capacity and we must vastly increase the output of our society if in fact there is purchasing power in our society.

There are many things we could do aside from increasing purchasing power. There could be more direct government expenditure in things like improvement of the railbeds in Canada, which would have a significantly important job-creation effect. This would provide work for people directly on the railroads. It would provide work indirectly in places like the Sydney steel mills where the rails could be made. The Canadian government is talking about reviving passenger service in Canada. If there are expenditures needed for that, what are they waiting for?

Surely now is the time to proceed with these matters, when we need the employment and stimulus in this country. Yet there does not seem to be any response from the government in that area. If I were the prime minister, I think I would be suing the Minister of Finance for alienation of affection.

I mentioned earlier about consenting adults. This is not adult, and this is not consent. I pointed out earlier in my remarks the great rhetoric in the Prime Minister's New Year's address, the talk of a new society and the forward-looking adherence and devotion to the Galbraithian ideas. These have been shot down in this budget by the Minister of Finance. I do not see how the Prime Minister can ever again call himself a Galbraithian. In fact, he has betrayed the central ideas of Galbraith. It seems that that great vision has now gone out the window and that the Prime Minister is in bed with the Minister of Finance and his unimaginative ideas.

The whole point of the Galbraithian thesis—and I think it is important to deal with this—this was the idea that brought in the wage and price controls program of the present government—is that you bring in that kind of system in order to enable you to do good and intelligent things. The government brought in the control system with all that is wrong with a control system but without any compensating merits which would enable them to use the control system for good things.

If you look at what Galbraith had to say about what he would do once a control system was in, you find that the government is doing none of these things. Galbraith said that the first thing you do is to improve the progressiveness of the income tax system; you lower taxes for people at the lower end of the scale, and you increase them for people at the higher end of the scale. That is what a control system is supposed to help you do. The idea of the control system is to keep a lid on inflation in order to enable you to stimulate the economy and to achieve more fairness in the incomes of people. So you would want a progressive tax system. We do not have a progressive tax system, nor is there any indication that the Minister of Finance intends to have it. Rather than do that, he has improved the amount of money that can be set aside for the registered retirement savings plan. He lifted the amount that can be set aside to $5,500. In other words, you can save up to $5,500 of your income, put it in a registered plan, and pay no taxes on it at all. Who has $5,500 to save? Certainly not the ordinary people of this country. If we look at the experience of the registered retirement savings plan and at the experience of some of the other programs that the government has set up, we find that even though it does not look like a tax break for the upper income people, the effect of all these new programs has been to enrich those who already have money, to the disadvantage of those who do not.

Let us take a look at the indexing which the government has brought in. The effect of indexing on tax reduction is startling. By the government's own figures, a married taxpayer with two children who makes about $10,000 can expect to have his taxes reduced by about $150. In 1976, through indexing, a similar taxpayer in the $30,000 bracket will save about $470, while a similar taxpayer in the $50,000 range will save about $680. The 38.4 per cent of tax filers who reported under $5,000 income received the grand total of .2 per cent of the tax savings from the deductions listed; that is, 38.4 per cent of tax filers had an income under $5,000, yet out of every $10 that was saved in taxes because of these programs, this group got just 2 cents out of the $10. The 2.4 per cent of tax filers who reported incomes of over $25,000 managed to snag just over 35 per cent of the total tax savings to be had from these programs. Out of every 1,000 tax filers, it were in the $25,000-plus category, yet out of every $1,000 saved because of these gimmicks, this small group saved $350 million of it.

The benefits of half taxation on capital gains are also enormous and concentrated in this top group. The top 2.4 per cent had 52 per cent of the taxable capital gains in 1974. This amounts to tax savings of about $31 million in 1974, a gift from the government to the richest citizens of the country. At the other end of the scale, the effect of half taxation of capital gains was the tax savings of some $171,000 spread over some 4,400,000 tax filters. The top 2.4 per cent saved over $88 million in taxes in 1974 through the registered retirement savings plan and just under $150 million from the total of exemptions as I have listed them.

The bottom 89 per cent, everyone with $15,000 income or less, saved just under $40 million through the RRSP and about $138 million from the total of exemptions. So we have 2.4 per cent who saved $88 million through this plan, and 89 per cent who saved $138 million from this plan—hardly an equitable system and hardly the kind of thing that the Prime Minister's love affair with Galbraith would indicate would be the correct thing to do.

There is an interesting editorial in the Ottawa Journal of March 30 in which reference is made to some of the loopholes which exist in the registered retirement savings plan. It is headed "Loopholes to stroll through", like walking through the tulips. It reads:

Let nobody deny that Canada is a land of opportunity. Just consider a few of the opportunities created for Canadians by the federal government:

They can borrow from the bank at 13 per cent, invest the money at 10 per cent and make $200 or so in profit every year at the expense of other taxpayers. They can set up a registered home ownership savings plan in order to buy back a share of the house they cleverly transferred to the wife or husband the year before. Or they can collect the same $5,000 or more in tax savings by buying furniture for the house they already owned.

They can get the government to subsidize a foreign vacation by establishing a few years' worth of tax-sheltered registered retirement savings plans, then taking a year off in order to cash in funds at a large tax saving—several thousand dollars' worth for those who can wait a few years for the holiday. They can accomplish a similar tax saving without quitting work or taking a holiday by setting up a few years' worth of retirement plans for a wife or husband and then having the funds cashed in during the year in which the spouse's other income would be low.

Few, if any, countries in the world can match these and other opportunities for taxpayers to get something for almost nothing without even needing an accountant to figure it out. Just reading the financial advice columns in the newspapers would provide all the basic guides to the loopholes.

There is another excellent opportunity that is provided in this new society. If you invest in Canadian corporations and you get an income of $15,000 from the investment, it is all tax-free. Compare that to the situation of the man who works in a shop and earns $15,000 a year, if he is lucky enough to earn that. He would pay a substantial amount of tax. But you can invest in corporations and get some tax-free income. The story in the Globe and Mail of Thursday, May 30, headed "Investing in Canadian corporations could mean tax-free income" tells you how to do it. That is part of what our complaint is. I will not read that story. The techniques for doing it are there, and there are many people who take advantage of them.

Galbraith, in case the Minister of Finance has forgotten, or in case the Prime Minister has not reminded him, wanted a more egalitarian income distribution. Where is that in the budget? This budget, in fact, takes some of the advantages which I have outlined which already exist for upper income people in the home ownership plans and the registered retirement plans and gives them additional benefits, and the same kind of income distribution will take place. Those who have a great deal of money will get the tax-free benefits, and those at the bottom who can barely make it will get nothing at all. They do not have $5,500 per year in clear savings to put into these registered plans, and therefore they do not get the benefit. Is that the more egalitarian income distribution the Prime Minister has seemed to be so taken with?

Galbraith pointed out that there is a need for more government spending when the economy is flat. He did not suggest to the Prime Minister or to those here in Canada who read his interviews that we should wait for the American economy to correct itself. He said that if the private sector is not producing and providing jobs, then it is a government responsibility to see that jobs are created to stimulate the economy. However, above everything else the central part of what he was saying was that there must be full employment in society and that no government has any excuse for not moving and bringing in policies which create full employment. Instead of the government moving to full employment—and it obviously has no intention of bringing in policies to bring about full employment but is only praying that something will happen south of the border—it is going to do something else.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

If the government cannot bring about full employment, how about knocking all kinds of people off the unemployment insurance rolls? Therefore, the government is suggesting a series of moves which would ask the poor in many of the areas of Canada where there is not any employment to pay for their failures and giving them the kind of aura which has been suggested by my friends on the right that they should have. The government is trying to out-conservative the Conservatives in terms of the approach it is taking with regard to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I have been critical of the Unemployment Insurance Act, as have many people. We know there are abuses in the act, and all of us are interested in correcting the abuses; but why does the government not work on those abuses, rather than throwing people out of work off the rolls? The greatest abuser of the Unemployment Insurance Act is the government itself by tolerating this level of unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: Any government which cannot produce employment is not worthy of that name, and because it has failed to provide the kinds of policies which will produce employment, and it is not prepared to intervene in the economy to see that there are jobs for people, it has no right to say to those who are collecting now that they are off the rolls. In many ways, the decision of the government to increase the qualifying period from eight weeks to twelve weeks is probably not going to have the results the government thinks it will. It will not really save the government the amount of money it expects. If it does, it will not be a total saving. It will be at the expense of the provincial and municipal governments which will have to pay out money to cover up what the federal government is not paying. In fact, it is going to be a forced transfer payment from the provincial and municipal governments to the federal government.

Mr. Broadbent: Welfare!

Mr. Saltsman: People will be thrown onto welfare. The other day, when I raised this question with the minister during question period, he became highly indignant and suddenly started to spout figures which a little while ago he claimed he did not have. He had no idea, and I do not think he knows now what the consequences will be. At the present time, even with the eight-week qualifying period there is a serious problem. Somebody who is between jobs, waiting to go back to work and is offered a job and takes it—a job lasting a week, two weeks or three weeks—will lose his unemployment insurance as a consequence. If that waiting period is increased from eight weeks to twelve weeks, how much less incentive will there be for people to take temporary jobs to get off unemployment insurance, to the extent it is possible, until they can get a full time job?

The minister and the government have no right to throw the burden on the unemployed in this country. This problem cannot be dealt with when there are no jobs available. When there are almost 800,000 people looking for jobs, and less than 60,000 jobs listed, how can we put those people to work? We cannot. How do we know who really wants to work, and who is abusing the system? There is no way of telling. Until the government moves to full employment and has some kind of industrial strategy for grading employment, and until it stops waiting for the United States and comes up with some regional policies which make sense, it should not throw people onto welfare by removing them from the very thing which has saved us from a very serious recession.

Because of that, I want to move an amendment to the amendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a semi-colon, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words: "this House regrets in particular that at a time when more than 760,000 Canadians are unemployed the government has announced its intention to change the minimum qualifying period for unemployment insurance benefits from eight to twelve weeks".

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—Manpower—Government action to find employment for students; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Air Canada—Request for investigation of finance branch at Winnipeg by Auditor General; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—External Affairs—Considerations entering into sale of military equipment.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale):

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, it is always with a certain amount of anxiety that members and constituents alike look forward to the budget speech, because in any society and organization, finance and budget matters are always of paramount importance.

Before I get on with my remarks, I would quote some excirpts from an article that appeared in La Presse of May 26, 1976, that is a report on the currant ACDA conference in Vancouver, under the headings:

Six hundred million more units needed within the next 30 years.

I find stated in that article:

Our cities and towns . . . lack jobs, are chocked with pollution, overpopulated, crammed with slums, devoid of adequate transportation facilities and faced with a rising crime rate.

And further in the same paragraph:

There are not enough jobs and housing.

How is it that a foward-lacking society such as ours should run shot of jobs and housing?

The next paragraph quotes the following words by the Right Honourable Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), which were probably referred to at that conference. He said:

In the search for human dignity, housing is a vital need, along with food and health. However, no country in the world not even those with the most advanced technologies, not even those with the most temperate climates can boast of providing adequate shelter to all its citizens.

I agree with that statement. But Canada, a country with the most advanced technologies, could have acted just the same with the best financial technologies, if the will had been there to considered a leader. If we have housing technology and lack the financial technologies needed to meet the current and genuine needs of the people, our present problems will remain.

Mr. Speaker, this budget is no surprise for newspapermen nor members. In my view, it brings forth nothing new, nothing exciting. It is more or less the same old thing I have been hearing under six different Ministers of Finance.

It shows again the same financial thinking, it reveals another aspect of a new tax which Canadians will have to support. Mr. Speaker, unfortunately our economy is running too fast and yet the government economists do not seem to have other solutions to put forward to help the government, because I know very well that it is not the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) who develops the financial policy of Canada, I am not that credulous, yet it is the government economists who control the Minister of Finance and are responsible for what we see now.

I would like to say that in Weekend Magazine of April 24, 1976, page 5, a journalist rightjfully makes fun of economists. The headline of the article reads:

GEE, ECONOMISTS SURE ARE FUNNY

And if we examine the present financial policy of the government and the results it has given in Canada, we can say that this series of six different cartoons show, if I may say so, the outstanding features of our Canadian economists and where they are leading us. They are represented by four individuals—let us say, the Minister of Finance and three economists—on a boat, at sea.

In the first cartoon, we see those economists discussing economic problems among themselves while they are slowly sinking: the boat is taking water, there is a hole in it, and it is sinking gradually, just like our Canadian economy. All the while, our economists continue making grand plans, voicing grandiose theories. This is what one of them says:

. . . Depressions and recessions were part of the normal cycle of . . .

Depressions and recessions are part of normal cycle, indeed! The other one says:

... Solution to the problem is ...

But he does not say.

The boat continues sinking ever so slowly. In the second cartoon, one end of the boat has already sunk quite a way into the water. One economist declares:

... The nature and role of the free market system ...

And so they continue enunciating theories while sinking.

The other says this:

... That consists in defining scientific excellence as ...

He is already half submerged and he keeps on making theories.

In the third cartoon, the economist gives a new theory:

... By stimulating demand and production by manipulating the money supply ...

This is what they do indeed. We in the Social Credit Party know this very well.

There, we see the boat completely submerged and we see the heads of the four economists out of the water. Another economist says:

... Building economic model of ...

The caption on the fourth cartoon reads:

... Once we abandon present theory of ...

The other economist says:

... Short-term analyses which guard against ...

And there you see the head of one economist disappear in the water and the three others have only their heads showing. In the fifth cartoon, the economist says:

... Neo-classicism is a "microeconomic" theory that ...

Then, under he goes. The last one says:

... Whatever the market will bear ...

And the boat diseappears completely. The last cartoon in Weekend Magazine of April 24, 1976, page 5, shows only the sea. The boat has disappeared and so have the economists.

Tuesday night, on television, the Minister of Finance seemed to be already in water up to his waist, because he let himself be guided in the boat of finance by economists who have never brought anything else to Canada but deficits to maintain the financial system we have been denouncing for more than 30 years.

● (1700)

Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely ridiculous and unthinkable to see to what extent, from the mathematical and financial point of view, this country is going adrift and to find out again that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) is having fun in the same boat with the same economists who give him the headaches which we know he has. Now, what struck me first and other hon. members who attended the reading of the budget around six o'clock, before the Minister of Finance made his speech in the House, was that inflation is good for the federal government because, without even touching the tax scale, it takes just under $4 billion more from personal income.

Last year, personal income gave the federal government a total revenue of $12.703 billion without taxes being increased. Because of inflation and as a result of the government financial policy creating inflation, $16.040 billion will be paid by Canadians in 1976, without taxes being raised. This means that inflation now allows the federal government to pocket almost $3.5 billion, without higher taxes while corporate taxes will bring $120 million more in the coffers of the Minister of Finance, which represents a 2 per cent increase for companies.

Mr. Speaker, the last six ministers of finance have always sung the same tune, come up with the same refrains. They do not change their tune and keep telling the Canadian people: Tighten your belts, live within your means.

The budget before us shows a $5 billion deficit, which clearly indicates the federal government is living above its means. How can the people be expected to live within their means, just because they cannot involve everybody into debts to finance their expenses, and trust a government which preaches restraint while incurring a $5 billion deficit?

Mr. Speaker, during the financial year 1976-77, the federal government will spend some 28 per cent of the gross national product. And I have in my hand figures which show that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was elected in 1968, the total yearly expenditures of the federal government amounted to $13.9 billion. Today, they reach $40 billion, that is a 300 per cent increase over six years. In 1963, those expenses represented $737 for each Canadian whereas today they amount to $2,600 for each Canadian or $7,860 a year for the average Canadian family. On page 21 of the French Maclean of February 1976, an accountant from Quebec City, Mr. Marcel Bélanger, who has been for 15 years member of five inquiry commissions—two federal, three provincial, including one on taxation—and who is now president of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants—as far as I know, he is not an idiot nor a social crediter—says the following:

Twenty five years ago, all governments ...

All governments, not only the federal government, but all governments—

... were spending about one quarter of personal and corporate income ...

Today the federal government alone is spending 28 per cent—

That is it, 25 per cent of what we call the national product. Today, the figure is 40 per cent. In the United States, it is about 32 per cent.

Further down in the same article, he says:

... Taxation sooner or later generates inflation?

The government is trying to find the causes of inflation and Mr. Marcel Bélanger, president of the Accountants Association of the Province of Quebec, who has chaired five royal commissions of inquiry, two of which under federal juridiction, says himself that taxation—and if anyone knows about taxation, an accountant does, since that is his job—generates inflation.

... And when taxation starts to generate inflation, you have a very strong indication that your relative limit has been reached.

... Therefore, the limit is not theoretical.

That is not theory, that is facts.

It becomes perceptible.

That is why I said: Stop! Call a moratorium on fiscal changes, on new programs, and try to cut back government expenditures. Or at least slow down their increase . . .

Mr. Speaker, these people also agree with the position we have always taken in this House that inflation results from financial pressures exerted on the provinces, on their taxation system by the federal budget. Québec municipalities are faced with the following situation. Some of them are now increasing their property assesment for 1976 and 1977 by 1900 per cent compared to 1975.

Since the provincial government is forced to change its property assesment in the province of Quebec due to the financial pressures exerted by the fiscal and monetary policy of the federal government, a 15-acre piece of land in the suburbs of Quebec City assessed at $11,670 in 1975 was assessed at $224,700 in 1976. The owner will have to pay in property only, let alone school taxes, $3,292 compared to $435 in 1975. Another taxpayer in Sainte-Foy who paid $40 in 1963 on an assessment of $4,400, will pay $588 in 1975 on an assessment of $33,450.

Mr. Speaker, when we go back to 1940 and look at the federal budgets, we note that in 1975 corporations paid 75 per cent of all taxes and in 1976-77, the national budget will be kept afloat by companies and corporations at a rate of 17 per cent; in other words, while personal income tax has increased, the corporate tax has decreased. As compared with 75 per cent in 1940, today, 17 per cent of the federal budget is being paid by corporations.

Mr. Speaker, I will not waste any time dealing with unemployment insurance. However, personal income tax has increased and the taxpayers will still be paying in 1977 almost $3,500 billion more in personal income tax, although income tax rates have not increased. Unemployment benefits will be reduced by approximately one half; in the words, theoritically speaking, instead of receving unemployment insurance benefits for 52 weeks, because of the new rates which have just been tabled, the same unemployment people will receive benefits during 26 weeks.

Mr. Speaker, one has to change the resources in the system being advocated. When we realize that a federal government, through its financial and monetary policies, can change the resource situation of a province or of an individual, then we must do something. The federal government has not always listened to the advice given him by economists. They listen to the economists who are in their employ, but pay no attention to those outside the House. In Le Devoir of May 31, 1971, it was reported that an economist employed by the Royal Bank of Canada, Mr. Reuber, has stated the following:

● (1710)

Ottawa should reduce personal income tax and sales taxes.

Ottawa does exactly the contrary in its present budget.

The government should reduce personal income tax and sales taxes to encourage productivity and decrease wage inflation, said the economist Grant L. Reuber, Director of the Department of Economics at Western University in London.

According to Mr. Reuber, the Bank of Canada worsened the economic problems of Canada by going from one extreme to the other and alternating credit restrictions and capital inflow in the banking system.

This economist is stating that it is not by reducing the money supply of a country that we lower interest rates. When we restrict the money supply of a country, we automatically boost interest rates and automatically fuel inflation in an economy. When will the federal government stop listening to the economists of the Department of Finance and believe the economists of other spheres of the Canadian economy who have other concepts than the endless deficits, increases, taxes and levies. This economist went on to say:

. . . Canadian taxes are traditionally high and compared to United States tax reductions, they could be the basis of radical changes in the tax system.

And I was referring to a speech. It was certainly not delivered by an idiot as the speaker was the Hon. G. V. Clyne, Chairman of the Board, Chief Executive Officer, McMillan & Bloedel Limited. He made that speech on April 29, 1969 and he predicted what is happening today. He is a businessman who can usually see beyond the end of his nose and who is well known by the economists. I quote:

[English]

It has recently been said in NDP political circles—

[Translation]

And it could be applied to the Liberals to demonstrate the same thing.

[English]

—that the British Columbia forest industry is not paying sufficient tax and is not bearing its fair share of the cost of government. Let me give you some figures from our own company, so that you can judge the truth for yourselves. . . . the profit of our Company was $38.8 million for 1968 . . .

We paid $36,500,000 in current income and logging taxes and set up a provision of $3,500,000 for deferred taxes, making a total liability of over $40,000,000 by way of income taxes. Then we paid another $20,000,000 odd to all levels of government by way of property taxes and fees, property rentals, federal and provincial sales taxes, stumpages, royalties and severance tax. In other words, in order to earn $38.8 million last year, this Company had to pay to governments at all levels $60.3 million.

[Translation]

Even before McMillan & Bloedel Limited could make a profit of $38.8 million, they had to pay $60.3 million in taxes to the government. Here is what he said:

(English]

In 1968, after allowing for interest expense, we made only 6.7 per cent on our net total assets. . . . last Thursday the bids for treasury bills, and as you all know treasury bills are 90-day obligations of the government of Canada, ranged up to 6.78 per cent. . . . Considering the risks, then, it cannot be said that 6.7 per cent is too great—

And this is what he said about Mr. Rasminsky who was then the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

[English]

—government costs are still rising and expenditures increase as government departments continue to seek out more and more areas of our national life in which they feel that they should intervene. Federal spending has risen from $7.7 billion for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1966 to $10.7 billion budgeted for the fiscal year ending March 31 of this year.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that was in 1966—more than ten years ago. And this is what he said when comparing the Canadian and the U.S. tax system which the Minister of Finance likes to interpret as being comparable with that of our country.

[English]

A Canadian earning, say, $30,000 a year, married with two children and paying, say, $2,800 a year in interest and property taxes, would pay about $9,550 in income taxes in Canada ... In the United States, a man with a similar income would pay about $5,750. Now, what concerns me is this, that in that income bracket are men with the kind of talent which Canada badly needs—men with leadership qualities and capacity for innovation. When they are attracted to the United States by improved earning conditions there, Canada loses a resource more valuable than her trees and her minerals.

—the danger of increased taxation ... is a threat to our economy. Canada, with her great resources, faces a future which may bring great prosperity, or it may, by reason of poor government and ill-advised taxation policies, fall into a state of stagnation such as has been experienced from time to time in other countries.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I could go on speaking all day to show that this taxation system, this fiscal system, this monetary system, on the one hand penalize the worker, and on the other, discourage businessmen except those who have learned to evade income tax by the means that I shall enumerate, except the big companies—-and I cannot blame them—who take indirect means to evade taxes and manage not to give away all their profits.

I also have here an extremely interesting article which appeared on page 31 of the March 1976 issue of MacLean's and which was written by two highly qualified reporters, Jean Paré and Walter Stuart, about Tax Evaders, and I would like to quote a few very concrete examples:

With $100, you can set up a ghost company, and with $500, you are tax exempt for 30 years.

And I would like to go a little further and read a few extracts from this article in order to make my point.

In the Cayman Island Handbook, a tourist-oriented brochure, it is said:

Taxes are the scourge of the twentieth century, just like world wars, overpopulation and pollution.

Social Creditors for their part say "pollution through finance". I quote:

There are people who are victimized by overtaxation such as existed in the worst tyrannies of Ancient times ... It is quite natural that you should want to protect your property against thieves and income tax collectors!

I am quoting from the Grand Cayman tourist magazine.

It is estimated that there are 155,000 ghost companies that only serve to protect profits which should normally have been taxed. Last year, there was a travel agency selling a world tour of tax havens.

This means that tax havens were specially advertized.

—(there are more than 30)—

—in one island only.

—for the ridiculous sum of $1,750, which is deductible from taxable revenue in any case.!

—every dollar sent under the tropics by a large company or a rich spendthrift must be replaced with a dollar taken from the income of a worker, most often a poor one. The Gaspé fishermen, the Port-Cartier lumber workers, even the Olympic stadium plumbers are unable to hide their income from the tax collector: They are the ones who pay for "fiscal tourism".

The federal Department of Revenue is completely in the dark as to the amounts lost in this manner: "We do not even have enough information to give us an idea of the scope of the problem. Until now, we have recovered $10 million, but this is only the tip of the iceberg. Some people are talking about $100 million a year, others of $1 billion!

... Even the most famous and the most pretentiously honest banks do chip in. There are 186 of them in Grand Cayman, that is one for every 63 people!

... Any individual may set up a Grand Cayman ...

—And I could quote, Mr. Speaker, a host of other countries where at present, through multinational companies, Swiss banks, banks in the Bahamas, in Panama or in Grand Cayman, companies may evade taxation and this is perhaps one of the reasons why we now see that companies—I will give other figures later on—are not increasing the federal tax intake. Because today they want to save their undertakings they use all legal means at their disposal. I do not say these companies are acting illegally, no they are acting legally. I continue this quotation:

... Any individual may set up in Grand Cayman a joint-stock company by paying $100 in incorporation fee and an annual contribution of $50. As long as this company's profits are coming from outside, Grand Cayman will not collect any taxes. They can even get a tax exemption for 30 years on paying a $500 permit!

Profits made in Canada by your "foreign" company and directed to Grand Cayman are tax free until you decide to get them back ... if someone happens to discover it. "You go on holidays over there, a Toronto Bank manager explains, you draw a cheque on your local company and come back with cash in hand ...

Between sunrise and sunset on December 22, 1966, three days before Christmas, Seagrams succeeded in converting $17 million of taxable profits into non-taxable money simply by having them switched around from one to another of the many branches of the Bronfman empire ...

Imperial Oil ...

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired and unless he gets the unanimous consent of the House, he will not be able to carry on with his remarks.

Does the House agree to allow the hon. member to proceed with his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rondeau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also wish to thank my gracious colleagues for giving me the chance to complete my remarks because I was only beginning. I was surprised to hear that my time was up; however, I will try not to take advantage of the kindness of the House.

I go on with my quotation:

Imperial Oil ... three directors and a secretary succeeded, from their homely little office in the Bermudas, in making a net profit of $35 million in less than five years! If that profit had been made in Canada rather than in the Bermudas, Imperial Oil would have paid $17.5 million additional taxes ...

Mr. Speaker, I could give many more examples just as down-to-earth and as Canadian; however, I have here a list of other Canadian companies that are slow in paying even the Canadian taxes they should pay.

Steel Company of Canada, Limited, have tax arrears of $149 million; Dominion Foundries and Steel, Limited, $101 million; Alcan Aluminum, $149 million; Aluminum Company of Canada, Limited, $139 million; International Nickel Company of Canada, Limited, $102 million; Imperial Oil Limited, $87 million; Domtar Limited, $53 million; (U.S.) Crown Zellerbach, $59 million; International Business Machines, $49 million; all the above mentioned companies have at the moment arrears each exceeding $50 million.

Mr. Speaker, a mere look at the Canadian taxation and monetary systems shows we must be blind not to realize or admit that they are sick. In 1963, we paid $1,431 million in interests on the public debt; in 1964, $1,546 million; in 1965, $1,675 million; in 1966, $1,862 million; in 1967, $2,081 million; in 1968, $2,391 million; in 1969, $2,774 million; in 1970, $3,183 million; the banks are making a remarkable progress; however, it is very surprising that they are not restricted to quotas; only the farmers who milk the cows are being imposed quotas. In 1971, $3,563 million; in 1972, $4,104; in 1973, $4,699; in 1974, $5,297; in 1975, over $4 billion and in 1976, $4,600.

Mr. Speaker, more than $45 billion Canadian in Canadian taxes have been paid to big Canadian finance from 1963 to 1976. Indeed, 94 per cent of the interests on the national debt is paid directly to banks because 94 per cent of the bonds, the liabilities of the federal and provincial governments, are held by Canadian banks and 6 per cent is held by corporations or individuals. To those who would have me believe that if the Bank of Canada should finance interest-free the provincial, municipal, school and federal bonds, it is the low-income earners, the poor who will lose the interests, I say that it is utter nonsense when 94 per cent of the interests on the public debt is now paid only to banks in Canada. And at the same time, as Maclean magazine reported on December 15, 1975, the Royal Bank increased it s profits by $86 million, the Imperial Canadian Bank of Commerce, by $93 million, the Bank of Montreal by $81 million and the Bank of Nova Scotia, by $64 million.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on indefinitely. This budget clearly demonstrates that the Minister of Finance does not control finance in Canada. He should be the one to dictate the monetary policy to the Bank of Canada, and the chartered banks should follow the orders of the Bank of Canada following the recommendations of the Minister of Finance. Unfortunately, we find that 26 per cent of municipal budgets comes from property taxes and that 25.3 per cent of municipal budgets is assigned to interest payments to the chartered banks. I say again, because those figures are fantastic, that as reported in the Revue municipale du Québec and other provincial magazines, 26 per cent of municipal budgets comes from property taxes and that 25.3 per cent is assigned to interest payments on the public debt, in other words there is a 1.3 per cent gap in municipal budgets between paid interests and collected property taxes.

Mr. Speaker, that is further evidence that our financial system is sick and the Social Credit Party has a solution to that problem. From 1973 to 1974, interests on the public debt, as I said, increased by 270.2 per cent. And as I just mentioned, interest charges for 1976-77 will reach approximately, as shown in the budget, $4.6 billion, that is $12.6 million a day, $500,000 an hour. Presently in Canada we pay $500,000 an hour in interest on the public debt, half a million an hour in interest, 24 hours a day, 365 days a year; that is what we pay to the banks to make money instead of using the Bank of Canada to finance our own public outlays as the Social Credit Party has always advocated in the House. This means that within 72 days, only with the interest on the public debt, we could wipe out the Olympic Games' debt that is causing so much fuss. We suggest that the Games' debt is of the order of $1 billion. This means that within 72 days, with the money given to the banks, because the banks finance our federal bounds we could save enough by using the Bank of Canada and without paying any interest to wipe out the public debt.

Mr. Speaker, in the province of Quebec, according to the Canadian Tax Foundation magazine Provincial and Municipal Finance 1975, on page 57, our international balance of payments on the automobile trade alone registered last year a deficit of nearly $5 billion:

Of Quebec's $3.4 billion in outstanding bonded debt at March 31, 1974—

The latest year for which I have figures is that ending March 31, 1974.

[Translation]

These figures are not up to date since they were released two years ago—

[English]

$2.9 billion was in negotiable bonds, $326.6 million in Québec Savings Bonds, $131.6 million in federal employment loans and $35.6 million in Canada Pension Plan fund bonds. Negotiable bonded debt was payable in the following funds: $2,154.2 million in Canadian, $646.5 million in United States, $87.1 million in Federal Republic of Germany, $25.2 million in French, and $32.7 million in Japanese. Other loans outstanding included funds advanced by the federal government for Expo '67, $6.1 million and under the special areas agreement, $74.5 million; funds advanced by the Bank of Nova Scotia, $36.2 million. Other direct debt totalling $97.6 million included debt assumed by the province on behalf of the following entities: Montréal Metropolitan Boulevard, $39.5 million; universitarian institutions, $46.6 million; Québec Municipal Commission for the settlement of school debts, $2.1 million; Institut de microbiologie et d'hygiène de Montréal, $4.4 million; Hôpital St-Luc, Montréal, $4.7 million.

Mr. Speaker, I could carry on like this for a long time.

According to the same magazine, page 56, the provincial debts for the year ending March 31, 1974 had reached $11,406 million, indirect debts $17 billion, bonded debts assumed by provincial governments $15,203 million, and this does not include debts for education.

Mr. Speaker, I want to apologize and I am going to try to conclude as quickly as possible but I would like to draw your attention and that of my hon. colleagues on a book which has been published in November 1975 not, to my knowledge, by a Socred but by one of the best journalists in Canada, Mr. Peter C. Newman. I believe that several members of Parliament know of this book which is entitled The Canadian Establishment. This book presents an extraordinary documentation. Perhaps the organizations of our two traditional political parties will not find that it is in their interest to promote this book because it brings to light a wealth of information which is extremely valuable and which shows that in Canada we no longer live in a system of free enterprise, in a system of competition and in a system of private enterprise. This book makes one understand that one lives in a system of monopolies. Peter C. Newman mentions that 100 directors of Canadian banks control 1,022 companies: 35 Royal Bank directors control 471 companies, 31 Imperial Canadian Bank of Commerce directors control 317 companies, 16 Montreal Bank directors control 178 companies, 4 Toronto-Dominion Bank directors control 56 companies, 14 directors of other banks control 180 companies. All told, 100 directors of various chartered banks control 1,022 Canadian companies.

I would like to quote him just on the subject of insurance to demonstrate that the Canadian banking system and the production system are one unique monopoly system with finance on one hand and on the other hand the same individuals acting in the consumer industry where for example one can see a Royal Bank director controlling Dominion Stores and Steinberg—production on one side and consumption on the other.

I want to quote what Peter C. Newman has to say about insurance. I say that this book is extremely valuable and I intend to use it often. On page 105, he writes:

● (1730)

The bank boards distill business power. Among them, the three hundred directors hold more than three thousand directorships of corporations with assets totalling $700 billion.

The bank directors are drawn from the corporate clusters interconnected with each of the banks. All but four of the top one hundred Canadian bank directors (ranked on the accompanying table according to the amount of the corporate assets with which they are involved) sit on the boards of the three largest banks. Each bank maintains special relationships with these client-directors and also with selected underwriters, law firms, auditing houses, trust and insurance companies. Some sixty-three bank directors sit on the boards of Canada's sixteen largest insurance firms, which control 83 per cent of their industry. Here is a tabulation of the extent of interlocking between banking and insurance boardrooms:

[Translation]

I shall mention only one: 14 banks directors sit on the board of the Sun Life Company. One could keep on reading this book: it is quite valuable. To prove the interlocking or the banking and production monopoly, we read this on page 115:

[English]

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder if in fairness to those who are following the speaker would indicate for just how long he intends to continue with his speech?

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: I had intended to continue for another seven or eight minutes, if that does not displease my hon. colleagues too much. I would appreciate more time: there are so many other good things to read here that I could spare hon. members quite a lot of reading time.

[English]

The banks will not disclose any figures on how high a proportion of their credit is extended to their own directors. The only estimate ever published was in the report of the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance, which appeared in 1962. It stated that about 30 per cent of all authorized credit lines of $100,000 or more were "to directors, their firms or corporations of which they were officers or directors."

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if one keeps on reading that book, one gets a clear picture of the banks and the companies they control and soon realizes, as I did, that our system is one of monopoly, of production, and of finance from which we cannot extricate ourselves. When, for instance, workers go on strike to get a raise of, let us say, $20, after a one-week strike and a settlement, they get their $20 increase in their pay envelope. The man who granted the increase in salary is the same one who controls, directly or indirectly, the cost of food at Dominion's or at Steinberg's. That is why, in our present-day system, strikes lead to absolutely nothing because we are part of an economic system where production and finance operate on a closed circuit. This is what the right hon. Prime Minister had to say about it on January 1 last, and I quote:

[English]

The free market system in Canada does not exist any more.

He was absolutely right: the private enterprise system, the free enterprise system, does not exist any more in Canada. He was right. He is still right. But the same government deeply regrets that we have no competition system and no private bussinesses any more in Canada because they gave a few individuals the power to build an economic empire where finance, production and consumption are controlled.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that I do not have more time to continue my remarks because I have always been particularly interested in finance. I am convinced that it is not possible to make social and economic reforms without giving first our attention to the area of finance. Today, the federal governement, the government which is or should be sovereign, is at the mercy of financial instututions and in his book entitled The Canadian Establishment, Peter C. Newman proves that this system exists today. Thus, it is not by passing petty legislation and by changing some taxes that we are going to correct the situation.

For example, some years ago, a U.S. Senate subcommittee was asked to make an inquiry on trusts, monopolies and finance and at the end of the inquiry, the chairman of this committee, the Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court said there was only one monopoly, namely the monopoly of credit; then we realized that Peter C. Newman said in his book that with one hand we extend credit to companies, generous credit through banks at a given moment this credit is withdrawn or restricted as far as these companies are concerned. It says in the book that banks grant credit to the tune of $100,000 or more to their own managers in order to purchase the controlling shares of the company. Problems have been created through the use of credit, the debit balance of bank accounts.

Mr. Speaker, I would have fantastic examples to give in Canada, but I know that at the present time in the province of Quebec a company must accept to be controlled by the banks or go into bankruptcy. Banks have a 40 per cent control over that company which has become a multinational company. The chairman of that company is reluctant to yield the controlling shares of the company to a group very well known in Montreal, Power Corporation, which wants to take over that company, and we know that Power Corporation has tremendous connections with the Royal Bank, as Peter C. Newman mentions in his book.

What struck me in the book by Peter C. Newman, Mr. Speaker, and I would not like to displease my hon. friends opposite, was to find out that most of the Anti-Inflation Board officials were at one time executives of Power Corporation in the province of Quebec or in other subsidiaries controlled by Power Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand how executives who were under the authority of Power Corporation can serve the interests of the Canadian people unless Power Corporation, through the AIB, wants to control small businesses so as to take them over eventually through the Royal Bank, which is behind Power Corporation.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I rose on a point of order to ask the previous speaker, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau), how long he would be because possibly this is one opportunity we should take to revise our rules. I was in a similar position on another occasion when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked for a few minutes in order to finish his speech. At that time he continued for half an hour. The hon. member for Shefford took another 20 minutes. In fact he spoke longer than the representative of the official opposition when that gentleman made his remarks.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), when he began his speech, said that he would forgo the luxury of rebutting the previous speaker, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). I will give the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge credit for producing a speech in which he made some positive suggestions even if I do not agree with them. I shall not go over them simply because my experience is that socialists act completely differently when in office. This is well illustrated by the socialist governments in this country.

However, I do wish to deal with the remarks made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. This is a luxury I do not think I can afford to forgo. His remarks were so full of platitudes, and so on, that at times I found it difficult even to credit them to the hon. member for York-Simcoe. He said that it is hard-working Canadians who pay for the government's spending program. I find that a little hard to take. Who else but Canadians will pay for the government's spending program, whether it be the spending program of this federal government or of any provincial government? It is a nice pat expression to say that it is the taxpayers who will pay. Whether it be the consumers or the taxpayers, someone must pay for whatever the government's level of spending may be.

He then went on to mention what he said amounted to $1 billion in spending cuts. Let us analyze some of these cuts. He talked about energy price increases. He spoke of the $1.05 and the 70 cents. He mentioned the ten cents levy put on by the government. He did not say that he objected to this.

He did not say that he supported one price. He did not say, if he was supporting one price, how he would set it up. He did not indicate whether he thought this was a good thing. He mentioned that we are spending $1.8 billion in price support in respect of oil in this country. He did not say whether he thought it would be preferable to let the price for gasoline and heating oil rise to the world price so that we would not have to subsidize gasoline and heating oil in this country. That would be one method by which we could save 1.8 billion. He did not mention that.

Mr. Stevens: You should read the speech. You missed the point.

Mr. Herbert: He talked of foreign markets. We know they are there. He did not make any specific suggestions about how to get greater access to those markets. He did not mention the competitive factor or that perhaps we should subsidize our exports to increase our exports. He just said the markets are there. Of course they are there. We could sell to them if we are competitive. One of the reasons we have not been able to sell is that our competitive position has somewhat decreased.

Then he had a real nice pat expression. He said that the family farm is an efficient unit of production. This should be good for getting some farm votes, so I shall repeat it. The family farm is an efficient unit of production. He mentioned that four tenths of the capital regulation is in the private sector and following that, because he wants to see capital generated, he spoke against profit control. I repeat that: he spoke against profit control.

I want every salaried worker in this country whose salary presently is under the wage guidelines of this country to take note that the hon. member for York-Simcoe spoke against profit control.

He wants to stimulate the economy to provide more jobs in the private sector. He did not mention the amount of money we should spend. He studiously avoided talking about any more spending although he mentioned several programs which would require an input of dollars in order for them to be effective.

He then mentioned the Post Office. This is interesting. He mentioned some figures, just as he has so often at committee meetings. I cannot miss this opportunity to talk about the hon. member for York-Simcoe and his performance in committees. He is what I call a flitter. Like a butterfly which goes from flower to flower the hon. member flits from committee to committee. On some occasions he will attend a committee meeting and make a proposal because, after all, as the official spokesman for the official opposition he must show that he has studied the estimates. He will make some amendments to cut the estimates to lower government spending.

I shall not read from the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the committee but I would refer any interested member to the meeting of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of May 4 when the hon. member suggested a cut in the budget of the minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). I shall not go into all the details, but there is an interesting point to this. He took a look at the estimates and made an assumption which was indicated to be false assumption. He then found himself in the ridiculous position of being a financial critic notwithstanding the fact that he really had not done his homework.

Mr. Stevens: Balderdash.

Mr. Herbert: The next item he mentioned was the $300 million that has to be raised by Crown corporations such as, for example, Canadian National. I did not really understand him. Was the hon. member suggesting that he was in favour of having all the money for the Crown corporations raised by the Minister of Finance? After all he should be consistent. We should follow the same procedure for all Crown corporations. Would this not in some way dig into the independence of the Crown corporations? Would it not be contrary to what we are trying to do, for instance, in respect of Air Canada by separating it from Canadian National and making it independent? Would it not be wrong under those circumstances for a Crown corporation to be reliant on the government for its financing by having the government raise the money for Crown corporations?

He mentioned another little cut of $90 million. He wants to get rid of all the outside contracts. This has been the favourite theme of the Tory party. He says we can save all of that because we are going to improve the efficiency of the public service. Presumably all that work will be done by our present public servants with no increase in salary, and nobody extra will be brought in. It will be an additional load on these public servants. In the next breath he says that he would take another $50 million out of the public service—I do not know how. Will he reduce their salaries and have fewer bodies doing more work? He did not say, but anyway there is a nice, neat $90 million worth of extra work to be done by the public service and they will get $50 million less for doing it.

His next remark concerned the number of ministers. He does not want 29 ministers, he wants fewer. It occurred to me that not so long ago there was a Tory convention at which it was proposed that there be more ministries. I wonder has there been a change once again in the Conservative policy, or is this just the idea of the hon. member for York-Simcoe. If we are going to have fewer ministers—which is perhaps not a bad idea and I myself have suggested a different structure—if we have to get rid of some, which ones should be eliminated and which ones should we put together? No mention was made of that. The hon. member just said that there are too many ministers, that we should get rid of some, but he made no positive suggestions on this.

Then he went on to the subject of spending. He is going to let everybody share $350 million. We should give everybody a tax break, he says. That is a good one. I do not know where they money is to come from. He says it would come from some millions of dollars that he has decided to cut off spending, but as I listened to, item by item, I did not find any moneys in actual dollars. This was another of these figments of the imagination without any follow through. Despite that, the hon. member would like to distribute some of these moneys, and he would give a tax break to those earnings $16,000 and less. He is also going to give $100 million to the private sector to increase research. He did not go on to do much explaining about this, so I will put a question to him.

The pharmaceutical industry in this country has had some problems with research work. Is he suggesting that it might be a good idea to infuse some of his $100 million in the pharmaceutical industry so that perhaps this industry could do some of the important research that is presently being done in other countries, specifically in Ireland, where they get a better tax break than in this country, and also in the United States? He did not say, but at any rate he is keen on giving the private sector $100 million.

In the next breath he is willing to give another $25 million for medical research. That is a good one, of course, because everybody wants to find cures and prevent diseases, as he mentioned, and this ties in very well with the demonstration which we witnessed here last week at which, incidentally, this particular group was asking for $6.4 million. It occurs to me that if we are going to be popular, then why limit this to $25 million? There does not seem to be any sense in the figures. It does not tie in with anybody,s request. It might be one way of saying, "Let us give a handout to everybody while we are giving money away, let everyone share in the bonanza."

The hon. member for York-Simcoe mentioned small businessmen. He did not say what benefits were put in the budget for small businessmen but he mentioned the horrors of filling out government forms. His way of solving this problem is not to suggest a specific form which may be unnecessary. Incidentally, may I say here that to every businessman who has written me on this subject I put these questions: What specific form do you object to? Will you send me a copy of that form so that I can explain to you why it has to be filled in and can get your response? I can say that although I have posed this question to every businessman who has complained to me about filling in forms, I have still to receive the first form.

In the next sentence the hon. member for York-Simcoe went on to complain about interest rates which are 3 per cent higher in Canada than in the United States, he maintains. He did not say anything about the fact that we need capital in Canada, nor did he say that the reason for higher interest rates is that money is coming into Canada and that interest rates have to be higher here than in the United States to attract the capital we need. He did not mention if there is a real effect on, for example, construction.

We have heard a lot said about construction and interest rates in this country, but it is quite interesting that although mortgage interest rates in Canada at present are nearly 50 per cent higher than rates in the United States, housing starts in Canada per capita are twice as great as in the United States. The United States, with all its wealth and power, is only building shelter at half the rate on a per capita basis that we are in Canada.

I should mention another thing also because there has been another Tory theme proposed many times, namely, that mortgage interest be deductible for tax purposes. It is deductible in the United States. How is it, since interest rates are so much lower and since the interest on mortgages is deductible for tax purposes, that there has not been the stimulus in housing that he seems to indicate would occur if the same situation prevailed in Canada? I suggest that there is not too much wrong with the housing program in Canada at present. The government's housing programs have been highly successful, and are certainly nothing to be ashamed of in this country in so far as the number of houses we have built in recent years is concerned.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe, the official Conservative financial critic, was complaining in a Toronto Star report on March 26, 1975, that the November, 1974, budget did not provide a sufficient stimulus to the economy and that a new budget is needed. "It is needed now more than ever," he stated. During the debate on the June, 1975, budget in which a stimulus was injected into the economy, the same hon. member contended that major cuts should be made in government spending so as to reduce both the government's budget deficit and its cash deficit, which would of course reduce the amount of economic stimulus.

Up to the time of the May 25, 1976, budget the same Conservative spokesman continued to call for an imposition of restrictive fiscal and monetary policies, but after the budget the hon. member for York-Simcoe appeared to want to go both ways at the same time. He contended on television that there should have been a cut in government spending, a cut in taxes for those in lower income brackets, and a cut in the deficit.

Mr. Stevens: That is what I said today.

Mr. Herbert: In starting the debate on Thursday night he criticized the budget because it failed to make a commitment to provide real economic growth this year of 6 per cent and to bring about a reduction in employment.

Mr. Stevens: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Herbert: May I ask the hon. member to explain by what sleight of hand he proposes to pull off this amazing piece of fiscal magic whereby government spending is reduced, taxes are reduced, and the government's deficit is reduced, but the growth of output and employment is increased?

Mr. Stevens: Because the private sector is given a chance.

Mr. Herbert: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, when I stopped at six o'clock I was pointing out that the totally contradictory position espoused by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, the financial spokesman for the Official Opposition—I notice he has disappeared since the supper break—is the ultimate in economic nonsense. Apart from some brief reversals of position in the past the Conservatives have advocated the adoption of tight fiscal and monetary policies since 1974, from the time the economy was heading into a slump as a result of world-wide recession, and throughout that period. Now that the economy is pulling out of recession the Conservatives seem to be advocating the adoption of restrictive expansionary economic policies.

If the government had followed the course advocated by the Conservatives over the past few years, Canada would undoubtedly have suffered a more severe and prolonged recession than that of any other major industrial country, and unemployment today would certainly be at the double digit level.

The latest position of the Tories seems to involve jamming down hard on the accelerator and the brakes at one and the same time so as to achieve the best of all possible worlds. They call for the injection of massive stimulus to hasten the growth of output and employment. If there was any lesson to be learned from the hard experience of the earlier years of the 1970's it was that trying to push the economy ahead too hard and too fast only laid the groundwork for future inflation and recession.

Let me mention, in the few moments remaining to me, some of the main spending programs not touched upon by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. Some two thirds of the government spending programs which he has been criticizing in such broad and general terms today involve money transferred into the pockets of individuals—such as old age pensions, veterans' pensions, subsidies for bread, or money transferred into the pockets of other levels of government. Moneys are transferred as a result of the payments made by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and huge sums are spent in equalization payments. I recognize that the hon. member for York-Simcoe comes from the rich province of Ontario, but he did not mention whether he approves or disapproves of the transfer of these federal funds to the "have not" provinces; he did not mention whether he approves or disapproves of the large sums already put into the housing programs to increase even further the building of housing that is presently taking place. He made no mention, for example, of the large sums being spent on training programs for the unemployed.

I note, for example, that Canada has had and continues to have the most rapidly growing labour force in the western world. Each year over half a million young people leave school and enter the labour force. Once there they experience major employment difficulties—younger workers account for nearly half our unemployed.

Our adult training program is now considered one of the largest in the world on a per capital expenditure basis. In 1975 over 80,000 people, a number equal to 2 per cent of the labour force, successfully competed training. Expenditures on the program in 1975 amounted to more than $475 million. Does the hon. member for York-Simcoe approve or disapprove?

When he was talking about the cost of the Post Office he did not mention that only 9 per cent of all the material going in and out of the Post Office is private mail. He did not mention the multimillion dollars subsidy that goes to business as a result of the Post Office deficit. He did not suggest that we should substantially increase postal rates to remove that subsidy to the businesses he has been supporting so well.

Mr. Stevens: Just run it efficiently.

Mr. Herbert: He did not mention the large sums of money for cultural spending. He did not suggest it might be a good idea to cut back on cultural programs.

Mr. Stevens: Do you?

Mr. Herbert: He did not suggest that we are spending too much money, although some people think that we may be. Only 11 per cent of the total television viewing time is through CBC channels.

He did not mention the large sums of money being spent on foreign aid for the Third World and CIDA.

He did not mention one of the favourite whipping boys of the official opposition, the bilingualism program, particularly in view of the recent comments of Mr. Spicer. Of course these moneys are being spent to try to make Anglophones bilingual.

He did not mention welfare and all the moneys transferred to the provinces. He did not mention that his party seemed to be opposing some limitation on the moneys being spent on these programs by the federal government. He did not mention indexing, which is one of the reasons why the federal government expenditures are increasing. He did not say whether he approved or disapproved of the fact that some of our best programs, pension programs, for example, are indexed. He did not mention specifically any of the government programs in a fashion in which we could judge whether the Conservatives were for or against them.

One of the things quite obviously we have to be very careful of is labour cost's going up and making us less competitive. Figures show that in the last five years in the United States total labour costs per hour have gone up by some 43 per cent; in Canada they have gone up by some 77 per cent. This indicates that whereas we had an edge on labour rates five years ago, today we are lagging behind. Figures show that on a per unit basis we are running 3 per cent or 4 per cent higher than the United States.

In introducing the budget the Minister of Finance said:

> The world economy is launched on recovery from the worst recession since the great depression of the 1930's. As an exporting nation, Canada was bound to be affected by the slump among its trading partners.
> Yet the performance of the Canadian economy during this period in terms of output, employment and real incomes has been better than virtually every other industrial nation.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the Tory party are just preachers of gloom and doom.

Everyone has read negative comments in the mass media. Different interest groups have adopted a defeatist attitude. The government urges everyone to stop being pessimistic. To demand that the anti-inflation program be abolished even before it is applied, to be on the look out for anything that can discredit it, and to break off talks with the government, are clearly negative attitudes.

The government urges everyone to consider objectively the economic situation of Canada, the problem of inflation, the inequities it creates, the groups it penalizes, and the means we have to deal with it. The government has warned that the evils of inflation can only get worse if effective measures are not adopted. It was not afraid of becoming unpopular when it warned that the program might involve a degree of rough justice and that it might cause hardship in some instances.

The government has shown leadership, Mr. Speaker. It invites everyone else to do the same. Forget the critics and the pessimists. Be positive. Be proud we have so much for which we can be thankful. A constructive attitude will speed the return to an inflation-free, full employment economy.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by saying that from the remarks of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), the people might wonder whether the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is the Minister of Finance. Unfortunately for Canadians, that day may come!

After bringing down five budgets, one of which was rejected by Parliament, Mr. John Turner resigned as finance minister. During his mandate as finance minister, the real economic growth dropped from about 6 per cent to near zero. The trade deficit increased tenfold. Inflation jumped from 4.8 per cent to 10.8 per cent. Over 145,000 additional workers found themselves jobless and federal expenditures doubled.

After putting up with so many economic troubles, Canadians were entitled to expect an improvement in their economic position. Hemmed in by the limits of the anti-inflation program, the people wanted to see the light at the end of the recession tunnel. Canada needed renewed confidence in the future. And good federal leadership could have given it to them. That will be for 1978.

In his first budget speech since he became Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) he showed he was just as incapable as his predecessor. Instead of alleviating the problem of inflation and unemplomentent he Minister of Finance only promises a situation that is barely improved, that is an unperceivable improvement in the rate of inflation and a rate of unemployment that will still remain high. Instead of taking Canada out of the recession the minister proposes a pious game whereby increased trade with other countries, more specifically the United States, will put an end to the recession. He therefore sheds his responsibility to work at maintaining the rate of real growth of the economy. And instead of inspiring trust by showing federal leadership, all the minister provides is uncertainty about the intentions of the federal government and total renouncement of its leadership in the fight against inflation.

This budget is impregnated with inability to meet the expectations of Canadians. Government expenditures are a good example although the paper "Fight against inflation" suggested federal expenditures would not grow at a greater rate than economic growth. The information contained in the budget indicates an increase in federal budgetary expenditures of 16.3 per cent for the fiscal year 1977 over the fiscal year 1976 while the economic growth for the year 1976 will be 14 per cent.

The minister managed to reduce his estimates on expenditure increases to 14 per cent during that period using those very same obscure accounting practices made famous by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien). The increase in federal expenditures was minimized with two kinds of subterfuges. First, expenditures for the fiscal year 1976 rose by $725 million more than the final budgetary estimates brought in by the President of the Treasury Board. That increase was not caused by unforeseen costs but rather a voluntary policy of stepped-up non-budgetary expenditures.

Second, this government excluded from its books the financial needs of two Crown corporations to arrive at the illusory saving of $300 million. If those little games with figures had not taken place, that is if the whole activity of supposedly cut back non-budgetary loans put back in time or destined to disappear under another method had been properly charged to the accounts, federal expenditures would have soared by more than 16 per cent.

The minister wanted to prove to the Canadian people that he had nothing to do with this excessive spending, which he did not say to Canadians. To clear himself, he had to confuse the figures. The 16 per cent increase in federal spending stands in sharp contrast against the restraint applied by other sectors of the economy. For instance, let us consider the labour sector which is restricted to a maximum wage increase of 12 per cent; let us consider the business community which is forced by these estimates to limit its profits to 85 per cent compared with previous levels; let us consider the provinces which keep their spending increases at 11 per cent; let us consider the Bank of Canada which succeeds in maintaining the money growth at about 10 per cent. The financial critic for the Progressive Conservative party, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), in his preliminary remarks on the budget, summarized the situation in more or less the following terms:

Although the federal government is asking all Canadians to participate in the anti-inflation program, it has carefully excluded itself from participation. This is another example of the lack of leadership of the part of the government and deceived of expectations: the failure by the Minister of Finance to commit himself to correct the losses in the economic growth which Canada has experienced for the last two years. In terms of long run economic yield, the real GNP was $7.7 billion below potential in 1975, after allowing for inflation. Such a decrease in relation to potential means per capita a loss of $339 in real GNP. Faced with such a considerable loss, all the minister of Finance has to say he hopes trade improvements will bring actual growth up to 5 per cent this year. We hear from him no long term commitment for compensating the losses faced by all Canadians.

In fact, he ventured no growth projection for the coming years. Because the economy was allowed to bog down in such a dangerous way, Canadians have experienced tremendous losses in potential jobs, revenue, productivity and well-being. If nothing is done now to recoup those losses, they may very well become of a permanent nature. That the minister should acknowledge those losses without doing anything to straighten them out is one of the great tragedies in this budget.

There are relatively few measures of a true budgetary nature in this budget. As a matter of form, some tax reductions were included for the average taxpayer, and the tax burden of small and medium firms was somewhat alleviated. Some changes were also made for energy conservation purposes. This is all very well, but the bulk of these measures certainly have no real significance, considering that they represent a reduction of only $75 million in government revenue, whereas the total revenue increase will reach $4.5 million for the current year.

Once all the rhetoric is taken out, this budget offers Canadians nothing to indicate that the federal government is ready to practice restraint. Nothing for recouping the losses in actual growth, nothing for housing, nothing for agriculture, nothing for productivity, nothing in the way of jobs, nothing to eliminate regional disparities. In other words, discounting the bad news in the budget, one is justified to ask, as did the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Clark), why the Minister went to the trouble of introducing it.

I would now like to comment on some of the more specific aspects of the current economic situation, which are of great concern to me. The first aspect is unemployment. There are now upwards of 760,000 Canadians unemployed. During the year 1975, we had an average of 697,000 unemployed. The fact that more and more Canadians become jobless is in my view a new and very inauspicious trend.

Indeed, since December 1975, almost 50,000 more Canadians have been looking for a job. Will this figure grow? I do not want to sound like an alarmist, but I am afraid it will. In his budget speech, the minister said he expected that more than 250,000 jobs will be created in 1976. This figure seems very impressive. I feel I still have to ask the following questions. The first one is important enough: how can the government increase the number of jobs when, in the Department of Manpower and Immigration and in Statistics Canada, people are being laid off and told there is a lack of work. I wonder if those people will be put on the minister's list of new jobs; I hope so in any case.

And in another aspect, I would like to ask the minister in what industry, in what province, these jobs will be created. And moreover, a question of so great importance: will these jobs be enough to allow first-time job seekers to find employment? Where will these jobs be created? The budget speech does not give any indication of it, nor does the reply given by the minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to our spokesman in financial matters. The minister does not know either. Where are those incentives in the budget which would allow industry to generate jobs? Certainly not in the anti-inflation program where it is stated that profits should be maintained at 85 per cent of their preceeding level. Certainly not in this insignificant cut of $30 million allowed to small and middle-size industries.

Those jobs may come with export industries which the minister expects will experience a miraculous recovery in the coming year but export industries expected to recover during the year are those which export our resources and not our manufactured goods. It is a well-known fact that industries in the primary sector contribute far less than those in the secondary sector to job creation. This is why I am convinced that little employment will be directly created by the recovery of industries which export our resources.

Can we expect any recovery from Canadian industries exporting manufactured goods? I hope so, as this area can certainly be largely improved, but the minister has already informed Canadians that the manufacturing industry has lost all competitiveness in the international field. An illustration in the economic review of the Department of Finance clearly demonstrates today that even manufacturers are not competitive. How could this industry create employment when it is not competitive?

I am not enough of an expert in the financial field to be in position to criticize the minister's forecasts concerning job creation. I have my doubts and I think they are justified. What I ask the minister is to explain how he can expect to create 250,000 new jobs considering the present economic situation and the proposed budgetary policies. I wish, and I think that the Canadian people wish it too, to be convinced of the validity of his projections and of the fact that the minister does not raise false hopes in the minds of Canadians.

In what areas of Canada are those jobs to be created? Are they going to be created in the wealthy and affluent provinces? This will not solve the problem of regional disparities? In my own province, Quebec, there are 224,000 unemployed accounting for 8.3 percent of the manpower. Even if a third of the 250,000 new jobs which are to be created this year were directed to the province of Quebec tomorrow morning, the unemployment rate in my province would still be over 5 percent.

Such an unemployment rate would still be unacceptable in my province, but even more so is the fact that Quebec will probably go through another year with an unemployment rate much higher than the national average. If the minister has the courage to tell Canadians what industries will create these jobs, I hope he will tell us as well in what provinces these jobs will be opened. I want to hear from the minister whether the inflation and recession that took place recently in this country have increased regional disparities.

I asked earlier if 250,000 new jobs would be enough to prevent the unemployment rate from rising if not to reduce it. He says that all these jobs will be created but he does not say anything about the number of new workers who will enter the labour market. If we knew the growth rate of the labour force, we could say whether there will be more people searching for a job than new jobs created. A projection of the growth of the labour force provided by the Conference Board in Canada referred to a little more than 310,000 people. On this basis, it is obvious that the minister tries to tell us that even though 250,000 new jobs will be created, 310,000 people be looking for work, which means a net increase of 60,000 unemployed people. This means that the unemployment rate will go up in 1976. However, in his budget speech, page 32, the minister states that "the rate of unemployment will continue the recent level trend in the near term". Can he explain this statement? After all, the livelihood and welfare of several thousands of people are at stake and I do not think he should play statistical games with the Canadian people.

I would like to deal with another matter in my speech today, in relation with the above. There is nothing in this budget that will assist the workers, the backbone of our economy and our greater resource. According to the guidelines brought forward by the present administration in its "Fight against inflation", workers wages are frozen at a maximum increase of 12 per cent. According to the minister, page 11, "compliance with the program is widespread". Well, the worker is therefore following the wage control and showing personal restraint. But what is he given in exchange? In this budget, the minister is only providing for another $15 million in deductions for child care costs. It also offers $60 million in cutbacks for those who make important investments in retirement pension plans, but how many average Canadians can, according to their salaries, take advantage of such a policy?

Most Canadian consumers must face higher provincial sales taxes, higher property rates, sickness insurance costs, education taxes, and other costs. I do not blame the federal Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) if the provinces need revenues, but he must surely notice that higher taxes reduce the net salary of the worker. Why does this budget provide no advantage to the worker to incite him to comply with the salary freeze? Not only is there no advantage for the worker but the worker whose salary is freezed must tolerate a 16 per cent increase in government expenses. The rules of the federal government apply to everyone except itself.

This budget is highly incomplete and much too shy; that is the least one can say. I am sure that in their speeches my colleagues will know how to demonstrate all its inadequacies.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with a last subject before I resume my seat. I would like to join all those who protested against the cutbacks this government made in the funds allocated to medical research. Even for a government which says it is interested in cutting its expenses, such a cut makes no sense at all and it is like going backward.

The present administration complained many times about soaring health care costs. In my opinion, it is more reasonable to spend money to try to find the best means of protecting health than to cure diseases which could have been prevented. Obviously such an approach would give results in the long run. At least it would be a slightly more humane and more enlightened way of dealing with such an important and vital field as medical research.

As I said in my previous remarks, this budget is a source of disappointment. It contains innumerable shortcomings and, on the whole, creates only confusion. The least we can expect from the minister is that he clarify the misunderstanding that surround his estimates. When the minister has the opportunity again to take part in this debate, or when his colleagues speaks, I hope they will tell us where all these jobs come from. Will there be enough of them? I hope they will point out those aspects of the budget and concern themselves with the workers. I shall not be the only one to listen to the answers of the minister.

The people in my riding, in my province and in my country will do the same. Suffice it to say that the impression the people are left with today, about the budget, impression that I share with them, corresponds to a large extent to what Claude Ryan of Le Devoir said about it in his editorial this morning, and I quote:

Mr. Macdonald took care not so specify what amounts he hopes to recuperate through the new restrictions he will be proposing for eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits. One must wonder, however, whether it might not have been preferable to try to recover those amounts from the categories of high-income taxpayers who have all sorts of means at their disposal for sheltering themselves against the consequences of inflation. From that specific aspect, Mr. Macdonald's budget is disappointing. No other measure having otherwise been put forth to improve the lot of the small taxpayer, one must conclude that he will be, during the coming year, the main scapegoat of the federal government fiscal policy.

[English]

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give a little praise to the minister—

Mr. Stanfield: Not too much, of course.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a little.

Mr. Clarke: The minister has included a few things in his budget which the party I support has been advocating for some time. In particular I should like to refer to the adjustments to the unemployment insurance plan with special emphasis on the extension of the qualifying period from eight weeks to twelve weeks.

Mr. Hogan: Down in the maritimes you would not say that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is where he went wrong.

Mr. Clarke: I sense some opposition in the House, not only from my left but from across the way. Another thing I welcome in the budget is the removal of the dividend freeze and the increase in the deduction allowable under retirement savings plans. Lest the minister think we are altogether in favour of these changes I should like to make a comment about the ending of the dividend freeze. This is something I have advocated on a number of occasions and I should like to think the minister was listening sympathetically.

Large numbers of Canadians rely on dividends to a greater or lesser extent as a source of income. The minister could never explain how he expected retired people living on dividends to cope with the rising cost of living, which was not frozen, while relying on dividends which were frozen. I am sure pensioners will welcome the change, particularly if the minister can bring down the rate of inflation to something like 8 per cent, as he suggests he can. Of course the problem affects more than just pensioners—it affects pension plans in general, and practically every working person in Canada has an interest in a pension plan. I might add that practically every pension plan has an interest in the profitability of Canadian companies.

There is a factor in the dividend proposal, however, which I cannot understand. It ties in with the rate of profits which will be allowed. Corporations were allowed to earn 95 per cent of their previous taxable incomes but the proportion is now to be lowered to 85 per cent; profits must not rise above 85 per cent of profits during the base period. So we are now in the position of saying to business, "You cannot make as much money as you used to, but you may increase your dividends." I cannot see how a businessman acting in a proper manner can reconcile those two requirements.

Furthermore, having been a businessman before I came here, I have difficulty in understanding how a corporation is expected to control its profits. Volume plays a tremendous part in the profit picture. As one example I might cite the Bricklin Automobile Company; it certainly had no problem in controlling its profits because it did not make any, so the regulations restricting profits were not difficult for that company to comply with. But take the case of Chrysler Corporation—I recognize that this is an American company but I am sure there are many similar Canadian examples. The new models they put out in 1976, the Volare and Aspen, proved to be their salvation; the cars sold like hot cakes. How anyone can expect to control profits when a company is fortunate in hitting upon a hot sales object such as that, I cannot imagine.

With regard to the changes in the pension plan contributions, may I say they are certainly to be recommended and were long overdue. The pension plan legislation was introduced in 1970. I believe, and the limits set at that time have been unchanged ever since, so the increase of roughly 14 per cent was overdue. However, I would remind the minister that there is an extremely limited market for an improvement of this kind. For most Canadians the question is how to arrange to have a few extra dollars left over to invest in anything, let alone to put $3,500 or more into a registered retirement savings or a pension plan.

My hon. friend from York-Simcoe noted the fact that this budget would leave the little man bearing the burden of taxation. He quoted statistics which clearly support that contention. I should like to give another example because I feel the government does not understand the problems of the little man.

A few days ago we were debating the estimates of the Post Office Department in the House. At that time the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) told us that the cost of first class mail would rise 50 per cent over the next year or so. He said that the average Canadian wrote only four or five letters anyway so the cost to him would be only 8 or 10 cents every year. I made a quick calculation before putting some questions to the minister and it seemed to me the increase in the postal rates was likely to be some $200 million. Dividing that sum among the population I found it came to more like $10 per Canadian than 10 cents. Put this into a family context and we shall probably find that the average cost of the projected increases will be more like $50 a year rather than $10, or 8 or 10 cents.

An hon. Member: What about the business mail?

Mr. Clarke: That is a point which was stressed by the Postmaster General. He said that 80 per cent of postal costs were paid by 20 per cent of the customers and, of course, he was referring to the business community. What he failed to explain was that the business community will pass the increase along to its customers. Business has a way of doing this because, after all, business has no money of its own—it only gets its money from outside. There is no other source of funds. Furthermore the increased costs to corporations are deducted in arriving at taxable income.

● (2050)

A sum, which could be estimated at approximately $100 million roughly as a part of that increase in the postal rates, will be a cost to the taxpayers through reduced revenue to the government because taxable incomes will be lower until the cost actually is passed on to the customers. When the minister was questioned on this he agreed—the error was 100 times; it was not 8 cents or 10 cents but $10 per Canadian—that my analysis was probably correct but said in defence that the Post Office deficit was also paid for by the little man. I will have something more to say about what is or is not paid for by the little man later on.

It is interesting that members who sit to my left and members who sit opposite do not understand that all the government's money is taken from the little man, the taxpayer. They do not seem to understand that the government has no funds of its own to spend and furthermore that the corporations have no money of their own to spend. It is all taxpayers' money. It is the individual who pays.

Another aspect in dealing with the little man is that wages in this country are not expected to rise by more than 12 per cent in the current year. Personal exemptions are indexed at a rate which I understand is 11.3 per cent, which is designed to take care of most of the effect of the increased wages. This too reflects on the tax burden of the individual. Yet the minister in his speech on budget night indicated that the yield from direct taxes on individuals is expected to increase by 26 per cent. I cannot reconcile how a small increase in wages of 12 per cent, which is supposed to be offset by the increase in personal exemptions, will result in an increased yield of 26 per cent.

We can look at that from another unexplained point of view. The minister said that the gross national product was expected to increase by between 14 per cent and 15 per cent in the current year. I cannot relate that to an expected increase in direct taxes on individuals of 26 per cent. I feel there is something wrong with the arithmetic the minister used in respect of his budget.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) referred to his suggested cutting of expenses and the suggested allocation of those savings. He indicated that $100 million should be applied to the relief of those Canadians who earn under $8,000 a year. The latest figures available in respect of personal income taxes are for 1973. They reveal that Canadians who earn—and this is the gross rather than the taxable income—an income of $4,000 or less paid $104 million in the form of personal income taxes in 1973. Those Canadians who earn what both the provincial government and the federal government declare is the minimum wage earn at the federal minimum wage of $2.90 per hour $6,000 per year, and at the provincial minimum rate of $2.65 an hour earn an annual income of $5,500. Yet in 1973 those who earned $4,000 a year paid $100 million a year in the form of personal income taxes.

There are other measures in this budget to which I would refer as housekeeping measures. At least I did refer to some of them in that manner until today. One example of what I call housekeeping measures would be the control of abuses in the operation of charities in Canada. I thought it was quite revealing that there are estimated to be 35,000 charities in Canada and that the annual contribution taken in by these exceeds $1 billion. I think it is fair to observe at the same time that the government makes an involuntary and indirect payment through forgiven taxes to that $1 billion since the contributors to the charitable organizations deduct the contribution in computing the tax payable. Of course the tax bracket would have to be taken into consideration. However, a large amount is involved.

Further there is the reduction of the capital cost allowances in respect of leased equipment, electrical generation equipment, and advertising signs. There are also increased write-offs allowed on roads, computer hardware, taxi cabs and a few other items. Today representatives of the leasing industry say that the result of their inability to make the normal deduction for capital cost allowance to which they had been accustomed will result in higher leasing rates. Very little arithmetic is required to figure out where the higher leasing rate will be directed in order to finance this change in the budget.

Another factor that has developed today is the higher tax on construction companies which operate heavy equipment. Because the capital cost allowance on heavy equipment has been reduced, the payments that heavy equipment operators receive for their work will be higher in the future in order that they can cover the higher tax bill that will result from the fact that they cannot reduce their incomes by way of capital cost allowance in the way in which they were accustomed.

Another housekeeping measure would be the increased deduction for child care. I am certain the minister experienced much pressure in this regard. Certainly there were inequalities and inequities existent in the realm of child care. The adjustment in respect of deductions for disabled persons and students probably was overdue.

Another area that has been given a great deal of attention by the minister involves the advantages of small business. The rate of 25 per cent on small business incomes is to be increased from $100,000 to $150,000 a year with an accumulated maximum of $750,000 instead of $500,000. I was disappointed to note that there is still no relief for small corporations which, for some reason or other, are deemed not to be in active business. If a business is deemed to be an inactive or investment-type business the small-business rate does not apply and it is taxed at the normal rate of 50 per cent. There seems to be no attempt to plug the loophole which allows a small active business that has achieved an accumulated income of $750,000 to be wound up, another company started up and permits the new one to receive more relief.

I think it would be more appropriate if the minister had given some kind of relief to small businessmen who for some reason cannot afford or do not wish to incorporate. If you operate a business without the benefit of incorporation, no matter how much income you realize you pay at your normal personal rate and there is no way in which you can accumulate funds for the expansion of the business. Many small businessmen feel they cannot justify the costs of incorporation and they have to go along with the rules as they were before.

There is another matter in connection with small business in Canada which needs attention and which was ignored by the minister in this budget, and that is relief for the businessman who operates an unincorporated business and who wishes to employ a member of his family, particularly his wife. The salary for a wife is not an allowable expense, and that applies also to professional men whose wives may wish to assist in the office. I realize that there may be room for abuse there, but I do not think that that is any reason for the minister not having given consideration to this matter.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe also stressed the need to reduce the number of forms required to be filled and filed by small businesses. I suppose the problem is just as bad for big business, but at least big business has the staff and the expertise needed to fill out these forms in some manner that is less painful to big business than to small business.

If a small businessman cannot complete his forms on his own, he needs to employ professional help, such as lawyers or accountants, to help him in this area. The hon. member for York-Simcoe suggested that small businessmen should be paid a fee for each form they are required to fill out. I think that was a dramatic suggestion that the hon. member made, but I am sure he realizes that that might tend to increase the bureaucracy, and in fact another form would be required to be filled out in order just to get the refund or credit, as he suggested, for filling out forms. But the point needs to be repeated that the hon. member for York-Simcoe was making, that small businessmen need relief from this kind of government intervention in day to day business affairs.

Another area that was touched on in the budget was the write offs for the oil industry. I thought it was interesting that individuals are now to be allowed to write off 100 per cent of their exploration costs. It is interesting to note that the budget was silent on the treatment of development and acquisition costs in the oil industry. I am not sure how useful these provisions would be because in Canada, I suggest, there would be very few individuals who would go into the oil exploration business, which is a very high risk business requiring immense amounts of capital usually not available to individuals. However, there is the possibility of forming syndicates which result in a co-operative effort, and the individuals in the syndicate are treated as individuals for tax purposes.

As I said, the budget was silent on the matter of development and acquisition costs. I was able to get the latest figures available, which were for 1974. We find that in 1974 exploration expenditures were just over $900 million for oil, and development expenditures in that year were $600 million. Both of the figures are admittedly small when compared with the royalties collected from the oil industry in that year which were $1.3 billion, almost equal to the total exploration and development costs. The point is that fully 40 per cent of the total exploration and development expenditures have not been dealt with in this budget, and I feel the minister has done a disservice to the industry and to individuals who might wish to go into a syndicate to explore for oil which Canada and the world needs so badly when he failed to deal with $600 million figure in 1974, which undoubtedly will be larger in the current year.

Today I met some officers of a major Canadian oil company and I find that under the present rules, which were not changed by this budget, it is still better for a Canadian owned oil company to explore in a foreign country. This strange set of circumstances arises because the government has not given sufficient encouragement to Canadian companies to explore in their own country. The combined operation of world oil prices and government involvement by way of taxes and royalties has combined to produce a situation where Canadian oil is less profitable to the Canadian oil company than U.S. oil or oil from some other foreign land.

I was most disappointed with the budget for a number of reasons. I suppose I can summarize them and say it was because the budget in no way deals with the basic problem. I think it was called a stand pat budget, or a few other calm words like that. Certainly it was not much different from last year's budget in regard to the bottom line, so to speak. We have another deficit of some $4.5 billion. The government does not seem to realize—although the hon. member for York-Simcoe explained it very carefully, I thought, and certainly the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) did not agree—that the only way to balance the budget and to change things materially in this country is to cut down government expenditures. The government at the federal level is the only one that can control these things.

There is no way that any other government, any other corporation or business, or any individual could operate as irresponsibly as the federal government itself operates. In the budget the minister even ignored the advice of the Economic Council of Canada which earlier this year in a lengthy report had recommended that one of the solutions for the unemployment insurance dilemma was to create government jobs. There is no suggestion in this budget to create government jobs, and I sense from the feeling of the House that many members will have trouble going along with the proposed regulations on unemployment insurance cut backs, the extended period for qualifying, because of the situation in their areas. Certainly the government should have had a closer look at the creation of government jobs in order to cut down on the abuses, because if a man is offered and refuses a government job which has been created to fill his needs then he has no right to continued benefits.

One of the big expenditures still is the carrying charges on government debt, which I believe amount to $400 million, and yet there is nothing in the budget, and the government apparently continues to refuse to consider, any method that might reduce government investment and therefore reduce the interest charges contained in the budget. If we got rid of a few of these huge government investments we would find the annual deficits reduced on these various government enterprises. I do not want to go into a great deal of detail on these but I would like to mention a few examples. One of them is the hotels which CNR runs for no apparent need.

There are many hoteliers in this country who are able to provide adequate if not luxurious hotel rooms and make a profit at it. Our government requires the CNR to invest the taxpayers' money in hotels and, not only that, they create a loss and a cash drain every single year. I have asked before, and I repeat it now, that the government consider the reduction of investment in such things. I do not restrict it to these ventures only; I refer also, for example, to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I do not think there is any reason for the government of this country to run a radio system or television system and incur huge losses every year. Those installations are a drain on taxpayers' capital, and interest and operating cost are enormous as well. Someone may well say that we would not have that service if we did not have the government providing it, but it is easy to point to telephone companies all across this country which are not government operated, and with licensing it is a simple matter to ensure that the licence holder provides service in unprofitable areas.

I deplore the investment of taxpayers' dollars in this country in public works. There are huge, huge investments. The Department of Public Works is the largest landlord in the country. There is no evidence to indicate that the department is able to provide space for government departments at anything like a competitive rate because there is not any competition. The stories of waste and inefficiency in that department are legend, and I think some examination of the problem in that enormous area is warranted, but we see none.

The Post Office bears consideration. There is a licensing possibility in the Post Office which is going to need over $1 billion in funds this year, and that is a questionable use of taxpayers' money when there is a huge deficit year after year.

I was interested to read and to compare two statements which I would like to read. One of them was by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It was made in Ottawa in January of this year at the Canadian Club. The Prime Minister said—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra.

Mr. Clarke: I had no idea that my time was—

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When the consent was requested, I shook my head, and I did not wish the hon. gentleman to continue. The hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) will be seeking the floor in order to contribute to this debate, and I think we should continue in that manner.

Mr. O'Connell: Never mind.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest that the parliamentary secretary should say no. I cannot recognize a head shake. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blais: No.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais). I distinctly hear the question, but unfortunately we did not hear the headshake of the parliamentary secretary, and I would question the procedure of putting the question twice when unanimous consent has already been given.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Does the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is the Parliament of Canada, not a gathering of Shakers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: The only way a contribution can be made in this Chamber is surely by word of mouth and by voice, and I heard nothing at all when Your Honour put the question. With all due respect, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) received unanimous consent to continue.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the debate, and I share the view expressed by the hon. member who has just spoken with respect to the shaking of a head. Moreover, if that was not enough, the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), being the gentleman he is and who would have been the next speaker on the list, rose and indicated that he was prepared to allow the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) to finish his speech.

Frankly, I do not think Your Honour made a ruling on the second and third occasion. I think, however, that Your Honour did make a ruling when you called upon the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra to finish his speech. That was the ruling you made, and I say that with respect. If that is the case, and if Your Honour agrees with that—and I hope you do, and I hope you agree with the spirit of good fellowship displayed by the hon. member for Scarborough East—I would ask that you allow the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra to finish his remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The Chair does not operate by sign language, and I suggest that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra continue with his speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Go shake your head behind the curtain. What a jerk!

Mr. Clarke: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, there was more than one no, but apart from that I just point out that the reason we are not acceding to the request is the misuse which has been made by the opposition of the privilege to continue. On two separate occasions I have been held up, for half an hour while the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was supposed to be finishing a speech, and again today for twenty minutes while the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) was finishing his speech. I think the rules should be changed to allow two or three minutes for a member to finish his speech, but not a continuation for another speech on top of the speech already given.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Hogan: Yes, I am.

An hon. Member: He is infallible.

Mr. Hogan: Do you guys think that's funny? You get paid for it.

Despite the ignorance on the other side, Mr. Speaker, in making reference to a member of this House getting up on a point of order, and making religious overtones, I want to protest strongly that the rules as I have seen them used as a result of gentlemanly courtesy in this House ought to be extended to hon. members when they go overtime for a few minutes, and even though there was an abuse by an hon. member who has served as a prime minister of this country, and so on, that should not be a reason to stop somebody from having a few extra minutes, especially when we consider that Tuesday night we sat here for an hour and a half while outside the whole thing had been given to television and the press before hand, and a big farce was made of this parliament. Let the man go on for a few minutes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am given to understand that unanimous consent was given, and the only member who seemed to have opposed in time was an hon. member who shook his head. Only after the Chair recognized the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) so that he could complete his remarks did somebody stand up and raise the question again.

Rather than hon. members asking the Chair to read the minds of hon. members on both sides of the House, I think it would be very much more simple if we would allow the hon. member to complete his remarks within the next few minutes, and then we can proceed to another hon. member. At the same time I understand that some members might complain about some unanimous consent that they might have given in the past, or even this afternoon. But this is their choice and their responsibility. The Chair should not be put in a position where it has to decide how much reasonable time should be allowed to another member to complete his remarks. If consent is given to allow the hon. member to complete, I am sure the privilege has never been abused, so I think the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra should be allowed to complete his remarks.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform hon. members opposite that I would have been finished several minutes ago if I had been given the opportunity. As far as the deputy House leader for the government is concerned, I would simply say that next time he should shake his head a little louder.

I was going to read two short paragraphs which I thought were significant, Mr. Speaker. One was a statement made by the Prime Minister in January this year before the Canadian Club in Ottawa. I should like to compare it with the statement made a few days later in the National Diet in Tokyo by Prime Minister Miki.

The Prime Minister said:

> The most pressing reality is inflation. The most urgent national need is for all of us to co-operate in making sure that our anti-inflation program works. An essential part of the program is to search for ways to make the economy work better in the future . . . ways which will prevent a serious recurrence of inflation, promote healthy growth, reduce unemployment, and reduce the need for imposed controls.

In the same month Prime Minister Miki of Japan said:

> We are surrounded by many pitfalls, recession, unemployment, and increasing prices. But we must promote economic development without inflation, without stumbling into any of these pitfalls, and we are determined to achieve this goal, without resorting to autocratic economic controls, by liberal and democratic means based on intelligence, forbearance and co-operation, of the government, corporations, labour unions and individual citizens.

I would end my remarks by saying that the problems facing these two great countries are similar. I think it is interesting that the Prime Minister of each stressed co-operation. It is obvious from this budget that the Government of Canada does not intend to seek co-operation in a meaningful way. That is evidenced by the fact that it announced cuts in expenditures, but in fact expenditures are going up by 16 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to follow the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke). In my remarks I should like to refer to what appear to me to be some of the general questions arising at this time on the matter of economic management and I am going to include, to some extent, social management.

Before getting into that I want to add my words of congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), and I want to do this, in a broader context than on this budget alone. The budget has, I think, been accepted by the public as pretty finely tuned to the needs in the economy of today. The general acceptance of it and the fact that it has been described by some as a neutral budget is in itself testimony to the broader economic policies set in motion by the minister and the government eight or ten months ago. To the extent, and I believe it is a significant extent, that the minister and the government have their role in managing the economy, the course has been well set, and this budget is not required to alter it in any significant way. I offer my congratulations to the minister on a general economic management role that I think is being carried out very effectively.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Connell: It is at that level that I should like to talk about some economic questions. I want to do it in the shadow, one might say, of the constitutional discussion that is again in front of us.

Some people look upon the shared-cost programs—the DREE type of program where the federal and provincial governments are quite closely interwoven in their economic and social activities—as reflecting intrusions of the federal government into provincial spheres. Other people might say there is so much ambiguity in our constitution that it invites this kind of intrusion and what we need is a constitution that has more clarity in it; that we want to get it back to Canada to change the respective legislative responsibility of the two levels of government; that we want to amend sections 91 and 92 to place the fiscal resources in the hands of those who have certain legislative responsibilities and, perhaps, change the whole level of responsibility. I am one of those who does not believe the latter course is necessary. I think the ambiguity itself of the constitution is one of the benefits of the Canadian Constitutional process for it permits the process in which the political dynamics are more important than the nice legal questions that arise when a constitution is clearly set out. That is a general reflection, Mr. Speaker.

When one discusses these questions in terms of the shared cost programs one finds that today there is the federal desire to put a cap on some of the programs. I am going to use the word capping to refer to the federal and, I suppose, provincial desire to bring some general control to the open-ended character of the shared-cost programs.

The other approach is for the provinces to say, "We want you to transfer tax points to us and let us clarify our jurisdiction; ours is the health jurisdiction; ours is the educational jurisdiction; give us the fiscal resources; let us disentangle ourselves from this rather ambiguous circumstance of shared costs."

We all know too well the arguments about pre-empting provincial priorities for me to try to repeat them here. I want to suggest that the capping process hopefully will succeed in bringing expenditures under control without leading to the disentanglement and the transfer of tax points to the provinces, since it is really the provinces with the greatest incomes where a transfer of tax points, one percentage point, for example, will yield the greatest revenues and that we are likely as the parliament of Canada to lose the capacity to perform the role of the parliament of Canada in inter-regional equities, was through the DREE program, for example, as through other shared-cost programs, and also the role of inter-personal equities through various programs that some would say are more logical in the provincial jurisdiction, such as, for example, family allowances.

I should like to make an argument to the House that capping is the right expenditure policy to follow, that it should not lead the parliament of Canada to agree to the disentanglement approach that some of the stronger provinces are seeking.

If we are to stay with the shared-cost approach, an approach permitted by our constitutional ambiguities, then we owe it to the provinces to make changes and not maintain a rigid stance. And here I criticize the government stance, as I understand it. It seems to me that if present legislation means that we shall have to put caps on shared-cost programs, we ought to be prepared to consider closely relevant legislation.

In introducing programs we have laid down rigid national standards to which we say the provinces must adhere. That is to say, we have asked the provinces to participate in high cost programs, when lower cost programs which would not be cost shared may have been available to the provinces. We are, in that sense, by passing rigid legislation, forcing on the provinces high cost programs which do not seem appropriate in light of over-all national policy. Instead of putting a cap on such expenditures would it not be better to introduce more flexible programs of the kind I mentioned? Would that not be more advantageous than puting a cap on expenditures?

I think, too, that capping, or tying these expenditures in areas of the national economy to the percentage increase in the gross national product obliges us to respond to provincial overtures for greater provincial participation in or influence on national economic policies. Surely if we have drawn provinces into social programs in fields of health, hospitalization, education and other fields which require high expenditure flows, we should give the provinces some assurance that the economic policies of the government will lead to economic growth and, therefore, that tax yields on provincial resources will be great enough to permit the provinces to meet the growth of their social programs. I say, therefore, that more than capping is required.

We need a closer interweaving of federal and provincial economic and social policies. I would add, and I am thinking in terms of the post-control period which is now being discussed, that there must also be a greater involvement in policy-making of the major elements of the economy, including the labour movement, the industrial sector, and the agricultural sector. Let us in general say that we must adopt a different approach from the one we adopted in the past when we thought too much in terms of the federal-provincial approach and neglected other elements of the economy.

All this is possible because of the ambiguities in our constitution. These areas are not so clearly spelled out that we can say that they are confined within certain jurisdictional boundaries. Our constitution makes possible a planning process under which some programs are centralized in one period, and decentralized in another. It permits a shared approach to problems of national significance and permits the government to play a role in equalizing income as between one region and another.

Our DREE programs are perhaps the clearest model of this process involving a sharing of policy formulation and management. Perhaps such programs will not do as models for other areas of concern, yet we should stop to consider what is taking place under DREE by virtue of the ambiguities in our constitution. One sees the provinces involved in the administration of programs; at the same time policy is developed jointly with the federal government, as is the management of some programs. I trust hon. members will agree that this is not happening because some provinces are fiscally weaker than others and have therefore allowed the federal government to act in areas under their jurisdiction because they are weak. Instead we should see in such examples signs that it is possible to undertake, federally and provincially, joint planning in these areas.

I shall now raise what may be a heresy on my side of the House and ask hon. members to consider whether, when they talk about patriating the constitution, they are prepared to bring it back with the addition of a rigid amending procedure which allows various regions of the country a veto. It is possible that unanimous consent would be needed to amend sections 91 and 92. That might make no sense, until we remember that our history and experience show that these things do not matter all that much. Yes, there is in that ambiguity—I use the word again—room for us to come to a consensus through the political process. In that way we can develop programs which meet national concerns and which are sometimes under federal and sometimes under provincial jurisdiction.

Having levied criticisms at the federal government for not seeing this process as a two-way street, and having suggested that we are prepared for the sake of national objectives to participate in DREE programs, and that the provinces by allowing us to participate are allowing us to share in the management, development, and planning of policies which fall under provincial jurisdiction, I now ask are we prepared to let the provinces play a bigger role in over-all economic planning?

An hon. Member: That is a very good question.

Mr. O'Connell: Can we reach our social objectives by following that route? Perhaps we could respond to the opening the Minister of Finance gave us in his budget speech when he suggested that perhaps we might adopt a new approach to the budgetary process, and approach different from that of the past. I hope and trust that he was talking not only of secrecy in the formulation of the budget but also of greater federal-provincial collaboration, and of collaboration by other elements in the economy which play a necessary role. If there is any reluctance in this regard surely it is a reluctance of the federal government. We must ask ourselves why is this so?

Does the government feel, having followed for the last 40 years the prescriptions of the Keynesian approach to economics, that it cannot devolve the responsibility for fiscal resources to the provinces? Is that the reason? Or has the government felt that so great is its responsibility for managing the economy that it cannot permit the intrusion or intervention of provinces in the development of general national policies? In this regard let me allude to the industrialization of western Canada, and to the kind of policy which might emerge if there were greater provincial input in that particular area.

I now wish to refer to government revenues. Before me I have a table which shows revenues by level of government before and after intergovernmental transfers on a national accounts basis. If we go back 25 years to 1950 we find that the federal government's share, after intergovernmental transfers, was 61 per cent. Today that figure is 40 per cent. Clearly there has been a significant drop in the federal government's share of revenues, from 61 per cent to 40 per cent. In the same 25-year period the provincial share of revenues rose from 22 per cent, in round numbers, to 39 per cent.

Is our reluctance based on the fact that we feel we need all the control that is left at the margin so that the leverage we do have in fiscal and monetary terms does not have to be over-utilized in order to get effects on the national economy to perform a stabilization of growth? I do not think that is a satisfactory argument. However, there may be some validity to it.

It seems that the way out of the dilemma, if there is one, is to involve the provinces and other segments of the economy, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) is attempting to do in his tripartite Council to involve them in the process of policy development. I am sure it would be performed in a responsible way so that the provincial fiscal policies would be adjusted to some extent with national policies. The social policies at both levels of government could be in accord with some consensus as to the capabilities of the economy from time to time and the appropriate policies which would enlarge those capabilities, which must be both levels of government. The federal government cannot do it on its own nor can the provinces on their own.

What one sees happening is that over the past 25 years where we have seen a dramatic shift in the control of revenues between the two levels of government, the total spending of the state has risen dramatically. I have here a statistic that is important for the case I am trying to make—total expenditures of all levels of government as a proportion of the gross national product over 25 years. In 1950, 21 per cent of the gross national product was spent by the three levels of government. Today it is 41 per cent. Therefore the state as a whole plays a much larger role in the national economy.

The federal government's leverage in spending has been a reducing share while the others have grown, it might be argued from the point of view of a reluctant federal government to see more provincial participation in policy making. It might be argued that the provinces have so much control over fiscal resources now that they could frustrate national economic policies. They do have that leverage, but what they are asking for is to get into the national policy making where they could play a more responsible role than if we disentangle.

If we say, "Here are some tax points, go your way, this is your jurisdiction". I do not think that would not serve the best interests of the country as a whole because the problems arose in a comprehensive context. They arose in different ways in different regions. Therefore we must be implicated as a national government and they must be implicated because of their jurisdiction.

As I see it, the approach to the post control period lies in the fact that problems are more comprehensive. There is greater uncertainty with regard to policy because of the great degree of change and more interrelatedness between one thing and another.

We can only meet these difficulties by developing an institutional framework for a more interwoven process. We have a constitution that has sufficient ambiguities to permit this. We have experience in such programs as DREE plus the federal contribution to education, medicare, and hospitalization. We have all that background to guide us.

We have needs that involve both levels. The plea I make to the minister is that he not fall for disentanglement. Do not go that route. Instead, have an institutional structure that will permit capping to be the right process. The price is to make our legislation more flexible so that programs can change. The provinces should be able to choose lower cost programs over the most expensive ones because they happen to be cost shared. That would bring in a process of much greater involvement of all levels of government. In my opinion the problem in the past has resided in a rather reluctant federal process.

I again congratulate the Minister of Finance for opening that corridor, as it were, giving us that opening through saying I would like to look at a different approach. I hope that other members of the House will agree that it lies in federal-provincial action rather than disentanglement.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to begin by congratulating the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) on his address. I was particularly interested in his latter remarks with regard to increased co-operation in an institutional way between the federal and provincial governments. He has brought to the attention of the minister and the House a very interesting and useful concept.

The past few years have seen the growth of regional difficulties and divisions within this country. This has caused a great deal of concern to a lot of thinking Canadians. I share many of the views of the hon. member for Scarborough East. This arises from the fact that I have considered this particular problem and possible ways of arriving at a solution.

One notion that intrigues me is the possibility of an institutionalization of the federal-provincial conference in a manner that might work toward accomplishing the sorts of goals the hon. member has brought to the attention of the House. I notice the minister paid attention to that address. I hope that tonight has seen the germination of an idea that will grow, bringing with it political institutions in this country that will better serve the needs of Canadians.

I am sure this is a first for me. After congratulating one member opposite, I move to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) on one part of his budget. In particular I am referring to the amendments to the Income Tax Act as they apply to individual taxpayers investing in the oil and gas industry. This is in reference to the principal business test.

It may be of value to outline a bit of the history of this particular aspect of the Income Tax Act and the effect it has had on this country. There is a lesson there that we would do well to learn in order to prevent similar mistakes in the future. The Income Tax Act rightfully provides that when filing an income tax return and paying income tax, one must consolidate one's income. Otherwise someone who makes, say, two incomes of $5,000 from two separate sources and files two separate returns would pay less than the man who made $10,000 from one source of income, which would be unfair. That applied almost universally as a principle thoughout the Income Tax Act with one solitary exception, and that had to do with the oil and gas industry.

In the oil and gas industry, if one formed a company and drilled an oil well and the hole turned out to be dry, that was an expense which could be deducted from one's income if one were in the oil industry. But if one were not in the oil industry as a principal business one could not deduct that expense from business income. This meant that fresh capital for the industry had to come from outside sources. In this respect Canadian law was unique, at least as far as developed countries were concerned. It had no equivalent in the United States or in Europe. The result was that Americans came to drill wells in Canada. Doctors, lawyers, those with discretionary income could use pretaxed dollars for this purpose, but Canadians could not.

This aspect of Canadian law more than any other single aspect is responsible for the oil and gas industry presently being 90 to 95 per cent foreign owned. It has been a source of grievance on the part of the oil industry for as far back as anybody can remember. It has been a grievance felt by the people of Alberta as far back as anyone can remember. Delegation after delegation came to Ottawa to seek amendment to this law. There are scores of examples of geologists coming up with what is called, in the terms of the trade, a "good play", seeking people willing to invest, but finding it difficult to interest Canadians, or, to put it in a more positive way, finding it easier to attract Americans to invest, with the result that a number of American millionaires were created—American owners of Canadian oil and gas businesses. This situation has been with us these last 25 years and, as I have said, it is the single most important reason for our oil and gas being largely foreign owned.

Finally, in the budget last Tuesday the minister removed that restrictive provision, and for doing so he deserves the thanks of all Canadians because it is a move which is long, long overdue. It is a temporary provision as matters stand but I am certain that after three years of examination the finance minister, whoever he may be, will realize that this was a positive step and will make it a permanent part of our taxation system.

My hon. friend from Vancouver Quadra raised the question of the application of development and acquisition expenses in regard to the principal business test. This is an area which warrants examination and I am hopeful the minister will look into that aspect of the provision and see fit to improve it so as to place Canadians on an equal footing with nationals of other countries when it comes to investing in their own industry. This makes such good common sense that I am at a loss to understand why it took so long for the government to come around to that point of view. I notice that the minister has departed and perhaps that is appropriate since I have just voiced the last compliment I intend to pay him, maybe for a long time. There are other features of the budget which are far less laudable.

One most important omission as far as I am concerned is the lack of any measures addressed to Canada's outstanding trade deficit. "Outstanding" is almost too mild an adjective to apply to our trade deficit in manufacturing, in high technology, because in 1975, the last year for which figures are available, it amounted to $8,400 million, an astronomical figure. Had it occurred in any other country in the western world it would have shaken the government; it might even have brought it down. Think of what that represents in jobs. Think of what it represents in terms of the capacity of our economy. That sort of trade imbalance is what caused the government of Britain to bring in the draconian measures to which Britons have been subjected, measures which have included devaluation and currency controls, as well as other forms of control.

The mere existence of this horrendous trade imbalance has caused a considerable number of Canadians, more than just a few, to examine their personal portfolios—I am speaking now of those Canadians who have a few dollars invested—from the point of view of transferring their assets abroad before the government is forced to impose currency control to prevent such transfers. This feeling is abroad in Canada based on the figures which have been published, and it is startling to find that the government has failed to address itself to this problem with positive measures intended to reverse a disastrous trend. The figure I gave was for 1975 but it reflects a five or six year trend which is devastating in its implications. Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

MANPOWER—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO FIND EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, two nights ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) brought down his budget. It was at best what the economists call a neutral budget. It was neutral in the sense that the minister saw no reason to cut taxes in order to give Canadians more purchasing power or to indicate any intention on the part of the government to begin a program of public works which could create jobs in large numbers.

It was, to say the least, a surprising budget in view of the fact that unemployment for the month of April, the last month for which we have figures, stood at a 15-year high. The national employment rate jumped sharply to 7.4 per cent of the work force during April. According to Statistics Canada, 769,000 people were out of work, the highest number of unemployed and the highest rate, seasonally adjusted, which Canada has seen since the year 1961.

The only two provinces in which the unemployment rate did not rise in April over the month before were New Brunswick and Manitoba. In British Columbia the rate rose to 9.7 per cent. In Ontario it rose to 6.2 per cent, and in Quebec to 8.3 per cent. In Nova Scotia the rate increased to 9.1 per cent. Newfoundland had the dubious honour of having the highest rate of 14 per cent. That unemployment rate is particularly serious for the young people, the students.

According to studies completed by the Department of Manpower, last year the unemployment rate among students was 10½ per cent. That was at a time when the unemployment rate for all Canadians was much lower than it is now or will be this summer. Last year close to 1½ million young people, students, were looking for jobs at some time during the summer; 10½ per cent of them were unemployed during the summer at a time when the Government of Canada had established programs which provided well over 50,000 jobs for students who were looking for work.

This year we have seen the end of the Opportunities for Youth Program and the LIP Program. We have also seen the end of most of the programs which the Government of Canada operated in other years. This year the government proposes to hire not more than 12,000 students, a decrease of more than 30,000.

The minister's answer to my plea was that the government is working with private employers and is encouraging them to hire more students than they hired in other years. I am sure the government will try. I am sure the public servants will work at that, but at a time when unemployment is at the highest rate at which it has been for 15 years employers will not be in a position to give much help in this way. It is obvious to me this is one more instance of government bungling.

The concern of the government about inflation is so great that no attention is being paid to the serious problem of unemployment. The Globe and Mail reported a few days ago that the Department of Manpower and Immigration had in fact realized the gravity of the situation and had worked out very detailed and complete plans for job creation programs, programs which would employ somewhere between 100,000 and 200,000 of the people now unemployed. Of course such programs would be expensive. The department has estimated that such programs would cost $1 billion.

I do not suggest for one moment that $1 billion is a small amount of money. However, we must realize that the Government of Canada last year had to subsidize the unemployment insurance fund to meet the claims of those people who were unemployed and eligible to draw unemployment insurance by an amount of $1½ billion. This is money that was collected in the form of taxes, to be paid to people who were not working. That seems to me to be a form of insanity. Surely it would be far better that people who want to work and are able to work should be working at productive jobs. There are many things which need to be done in Canada, there are people to do the work, and there are projects which need doing.

I urge the government to stop focusing its attention on the problem of inflation and to begin to pay attention to the very serious problem of the unemployed, particularly of the unemployed students who need jobs this summer if they are to go back to their studies this fall.

[Translation]

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the active student population is expected to stand at 1.3 million this summer, the federal government encourages the private sector to hire students during the summer, as temporary employees.

In the past, the private sector used to provide 85 per cent of the jobs to students during the summer. In order to encourage Canadian employers to hire students, the Department of Manpower and Immigration is organizing an advertising campaign whose theme is "Hire a Student". We sought the cooperation of five major Canadian banks which agreed to display our advertisements in about 6,000 branches throughout the country. The purpose of this campaign is to urge employers to hire students for the whole summer or on a temporary basis. This program has been broadened for the past years without however any increase in costs. We managed to save money by taking up last year's campaign, which enabled us to spend more money on advertising in the medias, thus increasing the diffusion of publicity material.

Moreover, it is expected that our network of some 300 manpower centres for students across Canada will contribute to finding jobs for about 200,000 students. The staff in those centres will directly contact prospective employers and urge them to hire students, either for the whole summer or for casual employment. In this respect, the first reports indicate an increase in placements made by manpower students' centres amounting to 54 per cent in some areas while the average increase rate reaches over 8 per cent.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) has personally written his provincial counterparts requesting that they do their utmost, in spite of the present budget cuts, to create as many summer jobs as possible. Canadian provincial authorities are expected to spend some $48 million to create 60,000 jobs.

Federal government action is two-fold: 1): The students' activities and summer employment program, within which eight federal departments administer 18 specific programs which make it possible to hire 12,000 students for a total cost of $24 million and to involve 109,000 people in volunteer work; 2): Direct hiring of students by federal departments to substitute for permanent staff on vacation or expand their normal activities during the summer months. However since funding for this program comes from the regular resources of each department, it is difficult to assess the total cost of the direct hiring of students. In September 1975, the various departments provided for the creation of 10,000 jobs in 1976, for a total cost of $17 million.

AIR CANADA—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF FINANCE BRANCH AT WINNIPEG BY AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, over the last couple of weeks I have been requesting an investigation into the Air Canada finance branch in Winnipeg and an assurance that the finance branch will not be moved to Montreal. I have received some rather ridiculous answers from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). The Prime Minister stated that the government should not run one of its Crown corporations from the floor of the House of Commons. I certainly agree with that. If Air Canada appeared before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on a regular basis, then we most certainly would not have to discuss this Air Canada operation on the floor of the House. But Air Canada has not been before the standing committee since the last parliament, in 1973, and thus this is a lot of utter nonsense.

I would also like to point out that we recently spent almost $400,000 doing an Air Canada inquiry report on the operations of Air Canada, and all through the whole document the problems within the finance branch in Winnipeg and problems of communications right through the whole Air Canada operation are pointed out. All we can assume is that this has been dumped into the garbage and that the only thing which has been done is that the former Air Canada president has resigned and we have a new president. I certainly hope we get an explanation from the parliamentary secretary tonight as to why this $400,000 study has been completely ignored by the government. I see that there is a smirk on the face of the parliamentary secretary. Obviously he is picking this up from his minister, who is always quite jovial about the matter.

Yesterday we found out that the president of Air Canada, Mr. Taylor, said that he is going to be applying for an air fare increase. There is an absolute catastrophe in the Air Canada finance branch in Winnipeg, a complete breakdown in the auditing system, a loss of millions of dollars, and he has the utter audacity to say he is going to ask for a fare increase. I have taken some steps myself because I do not expect the government to do a damned thing about it. I have written to Mr. Benson, the head of CTC, and requested that he not allow any more fare increases. I asked him to review the last one. Obviously the CTC was not aware of the financial fiasco and the financial mess in Air Canada, and had he known, perhaps Mr. Benson would not have allowed the last increase, which took place on April 18.

I have received much information from CALEA members with regard to the financial breakdown, and it would appear that they are more concerned about Air Canada's financial problems and its operation than the government and Air Canada management are. I would just like to point out some of the problems they are experiencing. Here is an example. This is a document which came out of the Air Canada office at Heath Row, London, England. That office points out the following:

> Several times a year we have been traced and on one occasion threatened with legal action by our Grosvenor Hill landlord for non-receipt of quarterly rental payment (14,000 pounds). Last year the manager, disbursements, was provided with copies of twenty representative letters from suppliers all relating to their need to have invoices paid within ten days or 'cash on delivery'. Cash flow is a very real problem in the U.K. firms today.

The information that office received from the Winnipeg finance office was as follows:

> I understand from the accounts office supervisor that we cannot expect any positive action for the next 12-18 months as he has been informed that the delay is due to a backlog of programming time in the C & SS branch in Winnipeg.

What an embarrassment to an Air Canada office overseas. They cannot pay their bills and, as I pointed out about six weeks ago, this Air Canada office was threatened with having its gas and light cut off because the finance branch in Winnipeg could not get money over there to pay the bills. This is a lot of nonsense.

In addition, billings to Air Canada from other airlines do not receive a complete audit. Items billed for $75 or less are assumed to be correct and paid without question.

Air Canada's own internal auditors endeavoured to audit the refund bank drafts account in 1975. This account is not less than $2.5 million per month, about $30 million per year. They finally gave up, and that account remains unaudited since 1972. Therefore over the past four years a $120 million account has been in question. When I bring matters like this up, what do I get? I get a snickering grin from the Minister of Transport and he says that he trusts Air Canada to do a great job. Well, I do not think it is doing a great job. I also wrote a letter to the Auditor General asking him to get his staff in there and to get this ungodly mess straightened out.

In the CALEA members' bulletin dated September 12 they mentioned that there was at that time a backlog of 250,000 unreported Air Canada tickets in the ticket inventory and control section of the revenue accounting department. Those are tickets sold by Air Canada sales offices, travel agents, commercial accounts, etc. Those are the very reasons why Mr. Taylor should be before the standing committee, so that we can ask him and get this mess straightened up rather than putting out news releases to tell us that he needs a fare increase.

This is one of the highlights of the reports from CALEA. When we hear corporate management talk about a $90 million loss in revenue this year, and when we see load factors reported that refuse to accommodate such a large loss, it takes little intelligence to determine that something is wrong.

It has been much belaboured by the media that Air Canada has an antiquated "Mickey Mouse" accounting procedure—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Goodale).

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to dwell at any length on the hon. member's rude, insulting, and thoroughly ill-founded allegations with respect to the status of the Estey report or the other items which are on the agenda of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. If the hon. member were to attend that committee from time to time, or talk to members of his party who sit on the steering committee, he might be better informed about what is going on.

In his allegations this evening the hon. member is wrong, of course. But in view of his performance on this particular issue and others in this House that is not particularly unusual.

To deal specifically with the issue that prompted the hon. member's original question, Air Canada deals with approximately 500 different commercial accounts every year, including Warnock Hersey Ltd., and the total annual amount involved in transactions with these accounts is approximately $33 million.

A simple clerical error on the part of Warnock Hersey resulted in ticket sales reports not being forwarded for a period of several months, but when this error was discovered the matter was rectified and any outstanding amount paid immediately.

During the past few months Air Canada's finance branch in Winnipeg, has been subjected to a series of disruptive actions by its clerical workers, who are members of the Canadian Airline Employees Association. These disruptions have hampered the over-all performance of the company's finance branch. Consequently Air Canada has implemented portions of a contingency plan in an effort to maintain fair and reasonable levels of productivity. This initially involved supplementing the normal work force with management and other non-union clerical employees on a temporary basis. This arrangement is quite properly within the authority of the management of the company.

Contract negotiations between Air Canada and the Canadian Airline Employees Association, which represents the finance branch clerical workers, are currently being conducted under the guidance of a federal labour mediator. It has been pointed out to the hon. member already and repeatedly that the kind of commentary he is trying to engage in this evening on the floor of this House is not a helpful or constructive exercise.

Generally, it should also be noted that as a basic matter the management of Air Canada operations should, in the proper course, be left to Air Canada management personnel who have been employed to do that job and to do it well.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CONSIDERATIONS ENTERING INTO SALE OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on December 3, 1975, I asked the then acting Prime Minister for information on Canada's sales of military equipment. This was but one of many efforts through oral and written questions to learn the facts of this country's extensive dealing in arms.

After being on the order paper for over a year, a question of mine elicited the reply that we sold arms to 73 countries, ranging from A to Z—Abu Dhabi to Zambia. Taiwan bought arms as recently as 1974.

While the minister declared that we did not sell arms of any kind to countries in the Middle East, I found the list included Iran, Israel, Kuwait, Muscat and Oman, Saudi Arabia, Union of Arab Emirates, countries either in or very interested in the Middle East.

In reference to the Middle East one notes in the reply at page 9367 of Hansard for November 24, 1975, that Israel appears on the list for every year from 1963-1974 while the few Arab states noted are much less frequently on the market. One is struck by the fact that none of the so-called confrontation states, Egypt, Jordan or Syria, are shown as having been sold any Canadian military equipment.

In such a sensitive area and in regard to a situation of such delicacy, this seeming discrimination may be serious indeed. This is especially the case in light of the minister's denial that the government viewed sales of conventional arms as purely business transactions where the dollar value was the only value worth considering. Indeed the ministerial disquisition on arms sales was one of the most fascinating if totally mystifying verbal exercises I have heard in my 19 years in this Chamber. Some of the gems were, "We do have regard to sales of military equipment of all kinds in all directions"; and again: "We also have some categories that might be termed military equipment of a rather innocent character . . ." The minister also declaimed, "There are certain types of arms and equipment for war-like purposes that we do not supply. Many of the things we supply are not intended for the purpose of killing people." So moved was he that the sedate and normally restrained member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), could not forbear the comment, "They are 'soft arms' are they?"

But while the response may have had its hilarious aspect, the subject matter is far from amusing. In absolute terms Canada ranks sixth among the world's arms salesmen, exceeded only by the U.S., the U.S.S.R., France, the U.K., and Italy. Among the merchants of death our peace-loving country is by no means in the background. Although Canadians are often accused of lacking aggressiveness in seeking world markets, we are not such shrinking violets when it comes to peddling death-dealing weaponry or related implements of military conflict.

It is very difficult to get a clear picture of what exactly is our role in the field of arms sales. We are told that much must remain secret lest the breach in confidentiality injure the competitiveness of certain Canadian firms. Because of changing formats and departmental reorganization it is not easy to obtain data on the full role of government in the process. The annual report of the Canadian Commercial Corporation is about as quantitatively informative as the average container of breakfast cereal. To those hon. members desirous of information on this very serious matter I would commend the book "Making a Killing" by Ernie Regehr, and the article in Saturday Night, volume 86, 1971, "Dealing Out Death Discreetly: The Traffic in Canadian Arms", by William Cobban.

I believe we must be more realistic and more revealing on this question. I do not think we can on this or any other question have it both ways. We cannot trot out our self-righteous purity in the nuclear field and then sell arms of another kind to anyone who wishes to buy them, whether they be in the Third World or elsewhere. If we are to adopt the attitude that business is business and who kills whom with Canadian arms is not an issue, then let us say so. But to suggest seriously that Canada sells only gentle, kindly items of military hardware is a bit much even in this age of double talk and slick salesmanship. If our considerations are based on moral judgments and values it does not matter whether we are talking about the nuclear destruction of 100,000 people or the killing of a few hundred so-called political enemies by rifles or machine guns which were in their heyday in the second world war.

In my school days I recall a poem which reflected upon the then sophisticated armaments of the so-called civilized west and their destruction of the peoples of other areas. The author described these machines of mass killing as, "means of death, and so may be a dagger in a damsel's hand."

I hope we will have an end to the notion that Canada sells not hard but soft, not bad but good military arms. I hope, Sir, that we will have the whole matter examined, and check out the relationship of principles to pocket books.

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this subject is of great concern to all Canadians, and quoting Saturday Night, with all due respect to the magazine, is making a farce of providing proper information on this most important and serious matter of arms sales.

I suggest that the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) cannot be serious when he suggests that arms are necessarily for killing. He quoted the House leader who answered in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) and who, in all good faith, gave as many details as he could. The mixing of answers made to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) and taking them out of context is, in my opinion, tantamount to intellectual dishonesty.

It is obvious to anyone who takes five minutes to think about it that there are commercial sales of equipment that are not military in nature, not specifically designed for military purposes or that do not have a military function. For example, there is the laser, not to mention almost the complete electronic industry.

I find the rhetoric of the hon. member for Hillsborough nothing more than words; very moving in the way he presents them but absolutely empty. What is worse, they are misleading the Canadian public. It would have been more helpful if he had asked questions about the statistical categories under which fall the so-called sales of arms to foreign countries.

It is important to note that we should distinguish three categories of arms. The first is weapons and ammunition; then military support equipment; and then commercial equipment which may have a military application. I underlined what this might be. The joke of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) was really not appropriate in the debate on December 3, 1975.

In general terms our policy is based on the principle that weapons and ammunition and military support equipment will not be supplied to countries considered as representing a possible military threat to Canada; to countries involved in hostilities; to countries where there is an imminent threat of hostilities; to those countries to which U.N. resolutions forbid the export of such equipment, or to regimes pursuing policies contrary to Canadian standards and practices.

I will finish with one additional piece of information, although we should be discussing this question at length. The fact of a sale to an individual country may indicate either that the product sold was military in nature or that the end user would be the military in that country even though the equipment itself was of a purely commercial nature. Some of the countries mentioned by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) fall into that category.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 28, 1976

The House met at 11 a.m.

THE LATE W. ROSS MACDONALD

TRIBUTE TO FORMER MEMBER AND SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will be saddened to learn of the death this morning of a most distinguished Canadian, the Hon. W. Ross Macdonald.

Mr. Macdonald served Canada with great distinction for many years. He was a soldier in the first war, a member of this House, a minister, a senator, and finally, Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario.

The particular aspect of his work that will be remembered by this House, was his illustrious career as Speaker of the House of Commons during which time he presided over our affairs with great dignity and wisdom.

I am sure all members would wish me to convey their sympathy to members of Mr. Macdonald's family.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED ADOPTION OF MEASURES TO ENSURE RECYCLING OF WASTE PAPER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. This matter is explained in a letter to all members of parliament this week by the combined Pollution Probes of Ottawa, Nepean and Kanata. Waste paper accounts for over one third of solid waste in municipal garbage dumps at a time when there is a scarcity of solid waste sites which meet environmental standards. Newsprint consumption in Canada is roughly 66 lbs. per capita, and no more than 8 per cent waste newsprint without de-inking is recycled, and more de-inking plants are needed. The Canadian government endorses waste paper recycling as a means of conserving energy and our forests, but it has given no incentive to the paper industry to use more post-consumer waste paper in production, and it continues to overlook waste content in its paper purchases and discards 17,000 tons of waste paper every year.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House urge the government of Canada to adopt policies which would:

(A) encourage industry to use greater amounts of recycled waste paper in paper production;

(B) ensure greater use of recycled content in paper purchased for government use; and

(C) require that government waste paper be recycled whenever possible.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF PROPOSED CHANGE IN MINIMUM ATTACHMENT PERIOD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering that a report from Statistics Canada produced yesterday indicates that the number of full time and part time job openings available to Canadians during the first three months of this year was only 48,100, a drop by 22 per cent from the number available at the same time last year, and considering that more than 760,000 Canadians are unemployed, and notwithstanding the support given to the government by the official spokesman for the Conservative Party for its proposed change in the Unemployment Insurance Act, which he described yesterday in the House of Commons as a small step in the right direction, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House urges the government to withdraw its proposal to change the minimum attachment period for unemployment insurance benefits from eight weeks to twelve weeks.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

REASON FOR DELAY IN REVISION OF PRICE AND PROFIT REGULATIONS—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF PURPOSE OF CHANGE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance—

An hon. Member: And of the government.

Mr. Stevens: —and, I might add, in the absence of many other ministers, I will put my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

The revisions in the price and profit regulations of the anti-inflation program, announced in the budget presentation of the Minister of Finance Tuesday night, have been described by a Montreal panel of accountants as a three page memo loaded with dynamite. Regrettably, there has been further confusion added to the question as to how the controls apply to business generally, and as the statements of the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board on Wednesday did little to clear the air, would the Acting Prime Minister make a positive contribution to public understanding of the program by telling the House why the announcement of the new regulations has been delayed until June 7 when the government supposedly knew what its intentions were in the budget? In addition, could the Acting Prime Minister inform the House whether any of these regulations will apply retroactively to pricing policies of business before May 25?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government made its announcement of the changes in the Anti-Inflation Board regulations as soon as a decision had been made by the cabinet. The first opportunity to make these announcements came in the budget.

The question of the applicability of these changes is to be found in the regulations themselves, and I would not presume in this House to answer the last part of the question. The purpose is to make the regulations apply in a fairer manner to all business and to buttress the efforts of the government to contain price increases.

Mr. Stevens: With special reference to the latter part of the Acting Prime Minister's answer to my earlier question, as the chairman of the AIB stated that the new regulations will establish the type of program which was intended in the first place, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House exactly what the purpose of these regulatory changes is? Is it to help business, is it to clarify the program as far as business is concerned, or is it in fact to remedy the situation in the sense that the control program did not appear to be working and tighter regulations were required?

Mr. Sharp: As the hon. gentleman knows—I am sure he has been following the course of events very closely; his many interventions in the House indicate that he has been—the purpose of these regulations is to make the rules with respect to prices fairer in their application as between companies of various kinds. Hon. members will recall that there were various alternative ways of determining whether prices were within the guidelines. After review it was found more fair to apply a general rule than it was to provide for the alternatives that had previously been in effect. This is something that could only be determined by experience. The government makes no apologies for the review nor for the changes that have been made.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO FURTHER UNANNOUNCED CHANGES IN PRICE AND PROFIT REGULATIONS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary question. Noting that the budget speech of the Minister of Finance summarized only the highlights of the changes to the price and profit regulations, would the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that all the changes to the regulations not announced in the speech of the Minister of Finance are really consequential to the highlights, that is, that no additional major changes to the profit control procedures are lurking unannounced in the forthcoming regulations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I could not give an undertaking, and I am sure it would be most inappropriate if I did, that there would not be further changes based on experience. In his speech the Minister of Finance announced the purport of the changes that are to be made. These will be spelled out in the regulations of the Anti-Inflation Board. It may be that on the basis of experience we will find it necessary to make further changes. That is to be expected and, I hope, would have the co-operation of the opposition.

POSSIBLITY OF CHANGES IN REGULATIONS AFFECTING BANKS—REASON FOR DELAY IN REVISION OF BANK ACT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary. Would the Acting Prime Minister indicate if it is planned to make any changes in the government's anti-inflation program, by regulation or otherwise, as it affects the banking community and could he indicate why the Bank Act revision has been delayed once again as indicated in the budget speech in that the Minister of Finance had indicated it would be tabled before the end of this month?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I said, I cannot give any undertaking about further revisions in the program. Our purpose is to bring about stability in costs and prices. We will take whatever measures appear appropriate for that purpose. It is not our desire to produce any more uncertainty than is necessary, but some changes are bound to be necessary in a program of this kind which is without precedent. It is bound to be modified as we have further experience. As for the revision of the Bank Act, the Minister of Finance has found himself otherwise engaged and it is necessary to postpone the introduction of the bill until after the end of this session.

REASON FOR CHANGES IN PRICE AND PROFIT REGULATIONS—EFFECT OF CHANGES ON CAPITAL FORMATION

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Acting Prime Minister. The Minister of Finance stated that the new Anti-Inflation Board regulations were being formulated to achieve greater equity and effectiveness. Can the Acting Prime Minister explain exactly what was meant by this action, especially noting the need for expansion of business capital base?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all these matters were taken into consideration when the decision was made to change the regulations. In our view they are more fair in their application to the business community as a whole. They remove anomalies that existed when there were various alternative ways of determining prices. The government is very much aware of the necessity of promoting capital investment and in our judgment these regulations are fair and equitable and will not interfere with the expansion of business.

Mr. Kempling: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Reports from the business community indicate that the capital base of business has been seriously eroded by inflation with only the government gaining. Can the minister advise if the government has studied the effects on the formation of the capital base of the change in the base period profit average from 95 per cent to 85 per cent, coupled with high interest rates? Have they studied the effect of this on the formation of capital which is required to expand business to offset inflation? Will that study be tabled? I think it is very important.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has said, inflation is causing disruption. The purpose of the government's policy is to stop inflation and, if it is necessary, to take unusual action. If the hon. gentleman is suggesting it is more important to achieve some other objective, I do not agree with that.

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF PROPOSED CHANGE IN MINIMUM ATTACHMENT PROVISION—REQUEST FOR FREE VOTE ON PROPOSED CHANGE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, based on the fact that the figures released yesterday by Statistics Canada indicate a 22 per cent drop in the number of jobs available in the first quarter of this year compared with last year, and that proposed changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act which the government has announced will most seriously affect those parts of Canada which already have the highest and most persistent levels of unemployment, and keeping in mind that the government has not the support of one provincial premier, will the government reconsider its position and withdraw its proposed intention to change the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as various government spokesmen, including the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, have said the purpose of the government in proposing these measures is to reduce the number of people on unemployment insurance and to increase the number who have jobs. I wish to confirm the government's intention to replace any of these adverse effects with the creation of new employment.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I remind the minister that if he reduces unemployment he will reduce unemployment insurance pay-outs, which is exactly what we in my party want. As the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said in Montreal yesterday that he was opposed to the change on which the government has decided, I ask if he was in any way reflecting a change in the government's attitude? For example, will the government take the position that, on this important issue which affects Canadians from coast to coast, it will permit a free vote in the House?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not accept such an interpretation of the remarks of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. So far as I know, the minister did not say that. He will be here and can be examined on that question. I understand from his office that he has been misrepresented. The House will consider a government measure. We believe, and I hope the hon. gentleman believes, too, that it is better to have people employed than on unemployment insurance.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister suggests that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs did not mean what he said. I suggest that the Acting Prime Minister has trouble distinguishing night from day. I ask, since the government adopted an earlier Conservative proposal for indexing income tax which has brought major beneficial effects to upper income Canadians, if the government got this brilliant idea for changing the Unemployment Insurance Act, a change which will have a negative effect on low income Canadians, also from the Conservative party?

REQUEST THAT PERIOD TO QUALIFY FOR BENEFITS BE REDUCED IN CERTAIN CASES

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

In view of the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act extending from 8 to 12 weeks the eligibility period, and I am now referring to owners and seasonal workers, owners of summer hotels and farmers who will need temporary manpower for a period which very seldom exceeds 7 to 8 weeks, and also to students who will have to find a summer job, has the minister or his officials considered some kind of mechanism to cope with this situation?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the government's policy in relation to the suggested revisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act has only been represented in one aspect. The government has also made it clear, I repeat, that it intends to replace any of the reduced benefits with the expenditures of public money, in order to create alternative employment.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

I think the minister did not answer my question. I asked him if he had something in mind to remedy the situation which will soon arise with regard to seasonal workers, particularly students.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, in so far as measures being proposed, for example, through the extension of the LIP program and in other ways to create useful jobs in areas of high unemployment. I think the policy we have announced will meet the hon. member's problems.

AIR TRANSPORT

ASSURANCES GIVEN AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS NO EXTENSION OF BILINGUAL AIR-TO-GROUND COMMUNICATIONS PENDING REPORT OF INQUIRY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I am sure we are all pleased to learn that the air traffic controllers and Treasury Board have reached agreement on the outstanding issues involving the air traffic controllers' dispute.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Will the minister tell the House what assurance he has given the air traffic controllers that there will be no extension of bilingual air-ground communications until the commissioner of the inquiry has presented his report to the government and the report is made public?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in addition to some explanatory changes in the terms of reference, we have reached considerable agreement about the satisfactory progress that has been made on bilingual air traffic service in the five airports where it was first introduced, that the introduction would go on progressively at Val d'Or and Bagotville, that the air advisory radio service for VFR would continue to move forward, that the use of French in emergency situations would be permitted as under the current rules and that the commission work would go forward. We would not undertake any further introduction of bilingualism until after the commission has reported and the report has been made public, except with the agreement of the controllers and Transport Canada. I put it that way because we have found that a good deal of progress can be made by sitting down together and continuing to assure everyone that safety is our prime consideration and, when procedures are available which allow the introduction of the two languages with safety, they will go forward.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS ON BILINGUALISM

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

In light of the current negotiations in St. John's between the Air Traffic Controllers Association and officials of his department, can the minister tell the House whether an agreement has been reached, not only on wage conditions, but also on the question of bilingualism in airground communications in Quebec?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as regards the second part of the question, the Minister of Transport just gave an explanation which clearly indicates that the government intends to proceed while ensuring that public security is fully protected.

As to the first part of the question, I should say that last night we were able to agree to the satisfaction of both parties on a labour contract between the Air Traffic Controllers Association and the Treasury Board.

TRANSPORT

ALLEGED PROPOSAL TO REMOVE RAPESEED FROM CROWSNEST PASS RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. All of us are very pleased that this week he inaugurates "Canada on the Move". I would like to get him on the move with reference to removing rapeseed from being within the purview of the Crowsnest Pass agreement. All over western Canada there is strong complaint about this. I bring this to his attention and ask him whether he still intends to remove rapeseed, which my administration brought under or supported under the provisions of the Crowsnest Pass rate. Is he going to stubbornly stay with his present stand and lose western Canadian farmers millions of dollars?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. I am delighted that the right hon. member has given me this opportunity to make clear that I have no proposal to put before anyone to move rapeseed away from the Crowsnest rate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: My specific decision has been to indicate to the Canadian Transport Commission that they ought not to charge more than the compensatory rate, which is well below cost, on rapeseed oil. However, I did point out to the western premiers when they objected to that, that at that rate oil is at a higher cost, even though below cost, than shipping rapeseed. They asked for equity between oil and rapeseed. I asked them to state clearly whether what they meant was an additional subsidy on rapeseed oil instead of hiding behind the word "equity". I got some kind of a reply to the effect that they want equity but not subsidies and, therefore, I am no further ahead. The dilemma is there. The low rate creates distortions. There is no doubt about the fact that with rapeseed at the low rate and oil at the high rate, there is a disincentive to processing in the west just as there is in the case of feed grain and meat, because of the discrepancy between the rates on those products. Those in the west have to face up to that situation in a very realistic manner. I ask them to do so clearly and honestly, instead of hiding behind generalizations that are meaningless.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can only designate the minister's reply as an oily one. I ask him specifically: can he give an assurance that there will be no removal of rapeseed from the Crowsnest Pass freight statute? That is all I want to know, not this mass of words by way of explanation. Are we in Western Canada to be able to say that the minister from Saskatchewan is going to protect a major industry in our province?

Mr. Lang: I think my previous answer said exactly what I wanted to say and what I meant to say in that regard. I think I can say it would be impossible for me to see how we could justify asking the taxpayer to pay an additional part of the cost of the movement of either meat or rapeseed products from the prairies, even though that cost may be related to a rate which is compensatory and therefore not fully cost covering. I therefore say to the right hon. gentleman that there is a real challenge facing him and those in the West who have favoured the Crow as a low rate on grain to recognize that that will be a discouragement to processing there.

About a year and a half ago I said in Edmonton that while I would fight to try to preserve the benefit of the Crow rate I thought the farmers would be better off if they got the benefit of that rate in some other way, equally assured. I made that statement without having received the approval of my colleagues in the government for any such change; no such change has been put before them. I was, in effect, making an offer to the West about what I would try to fight for for the good of the West, hoping I could persuade my colleagues. But up to this point I have not been able to get the support from the West in favour of something which would, in my view, be extremely good for the West. I wish the politicians out there would recognize that now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Listening to the minister's answer, it is very clear that out go the rights of the western farmer growing rapeseed to be protected under the Crowsnest Pass Agreement.

Mr. Lang: The interesting thing, of course, is that there has been some growing realization in the West of the nature of this problem. Just recently I had the support of the Government of Alberta for the proposition that the Crow rate on domestic grain ought not to be continued because it discourages the production of meat in Alberta and is seriously to the disadvantage of Alberta. So at least some Conservatives in one province seem to know what the facts are, though I am not sure they all do.

REQUEST FOR FREE VOTE ON PROPOSED CHANGES IN ACT—REASON FOR PROPOSED CHANGES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statements made by Liberal backbenchers from Newfoundland—for Gander-Twillingate, Bonavista-Trinity-Conception, Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, from the member representing the New Brunswick constituency of Gloucester and by the hon. member from Cornwall, speaking on television last night, raising serious objections to the proposal with regard to lengthening the working period before people can qualify for unemployment insurance benefits, would the hon. gentleman assure members of the House and back bench members of his own party in particular that on this question, when the vote is taken, they will be given the right to a free vote?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I cannot give that assurance. When the legislation comes forward the government will take full responsibility. I hope the hon. member, when he is dealing with this subject, will bear in mind what the Minister of Finance said and what the Minister of Manpower and Immigration said, that the government's purpose would be to compensate for any particular disadvantages which might arise in any particular area of the country by a program of employment. I hope he agrees that this would be better than receiving unemployment insurance.

Mr. Orlikow: Would the minister tell us why the government insists on coming forward with this proposal in the light of the fact that organizations such as the Economic Council have made it very clear that measures of this kind are counter-productive and that what is needed is not a clamping down on unemployment insurance but a massive job creation program involving expenditure in the neighbourhood of a billion dollars?

Mr. Sharp: While the government has not gone as far as the Economic Council has advised, we are moving in that direction and that is one of the purposes of the new policy which has been announced—to endeavour, by creating useful works of social value, to replace the benefits of unemployment insurance by wages.

FINANCE

BASIS OF FORECAST OF INCREASE IN REVENUE FROM DIRECT TAXES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister, I would like to direct my question to the Acting Minister of Finance. Since average annual wages are expected to rise by no more than 12 per cent and since personal exemptions are indexed at a rate of 11.3 per cent to neutralize the tax impact on individuals, how can the minister predict an increase of 26 per cent in revenues from direct taxes on persons shown in the tables attached to the budget speech?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): May I say on behalf of the minister that this is the sort of question which should be directed to him when the budget is under discussion and when the bills flowing therefrom are before the House?

INDUSTRY

PROPOSED CLOSING OF RCA LABORATORIES IN MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister yet in a position to report to the House as to whether the government has been able to prevent the RCA research laboratories in Montreal from closing at the direction of the RCA head office in the United States? Inasmuch as such a closing would clash directly with the principles of international business conduct which when tabled in the House last July were stated as reflecting government policy, could the minister tell us whether the government will take steps to make a reasonable degree of compliance with these principles mandatory and to fully monitor the extent of such compliance on the part of all foreign-controlled enterprises in Canada, the firms to which the government has said these principles apply?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): On the specifics with regard to RCA, I advised the House a few days ago that I had already met with that company's chief executive officer and other officers and had expressed our disappointment over the decision. What action we may be able to take in law or what kind of enforcement measures we may be able to undertake are questions I am considering at the present time. But I am at present carrying on talks with the RCA company in an effort to see whether they can be persuaded to change the policy. The second part of the question was somewhat more complex than I could follow, since it was related to the RCA issue. Perhaps my hon. friend would wish to ask a supplementary.

POSSIBILITY OF MEASURES TO COUNTERACT THE EFFECT OF INCREASED PRICE OF OIL IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Since it is now obvious that the price of oil is going up, a situation which will result in people having to pay fantastic oil prices in Atlantic Canada, may I ask the minister whether he is considering suitable measures in order that firm proposals might be placed before the Atlantic premiers when they come to the first ministers conference in June?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as I have repeatedly stated before in the House in reply to similar questions, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is certainly concerned with the impact of increased energy cost on the economy of the Atlantic provinces. It has provided for higher expenditures in that area for the current year. Indeed the department is now concerned and is doing some research, and it has been commissioned to a degree to submit alternative proposals to the cabinet. I hope soon to be in a position to propose, along with my colleagues, a solution which could help go through the difficult period with regard to energy in the Atlantic region.

ENERGY

OIL—POSSIBILITY OF MEASURES TO COUNTERACT EFFECT OF INCREASED PRICE IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the minister of energy. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister, I think on Wednesday, in answer to the hon. member for Don Valley said that he was not sure exactly when a decision would be made as to whether there will be any proposals to meet this fundamental problem, which will completely destroy the effects of regional economic expansion in Atlantic Canada unless something is done about the situation, is the minister, with his colleague the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, in a position to put a firm proposal before the cabinet so that at the first ministers' meeting something firm will be offered the Atlantic premiers? In order that the Atlantic premiers will know that something will be offered to them, can the minister tell the House whether he will indeed say something that is firm, so that we will not be playing any cat and mouse games?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, work is indeed going on in a number of different areas. I should like to take this opportunity of conscripting the assistance of the hon. member in persuading his colleagues that Petro-Canada is doing one hell of a good job.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO AID ECONOMIES OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance, but in his absence I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. The premier of Prince Edward Island has been quoted recently as stating that the federal government's influence through its fiscal and cost-sharing policies threatens—that is his word—to shape the course of events in the maritimes more than ever before. Is it the minister's intention to adopt a more favourable attitude to the maritime provinces, or is the government's intention to continue to deny this part of Canada the opportunity of developing to its full potential; and will the minister do his part, in response to the premier of Prince Edward Island, and offer direct and immediate aid to the Atlantic provinces, where soaring energy costs are threatening the already frail economies of this part of the country, to which the minister of energy seems to be insensitive.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the spokesman for the Minister of Finance this morning, I wish to say that the problems of the Atlantic provinces are seriously taken into consideration by the government. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion said that we are now studying the problems confronting the Maritimes in the field of energy. We hope to find short and long term solutions. I must say that the situation is very complex and it is not caused only by measures taken by the federal government. On the contrary, we continue to take great interest in those regions.

PENSIONS

POSSIBILITY OF DEFERRED PAYMENTS INTO SUPERANNUATION ACCOUNT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday I asked the President of the Treasury Board whether the government, in whole or in part, had exercised a right to defer a contribution to the pension plan of civil servants and members of the armed forces. Would he now have the information he indicated he would try to get?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to give an answer to the hon. member today, but I hope to be in a position to do so on Monday.

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO AID SMALL BUSINESSMEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Acting Prime Minister. Because of the fact that this government continues to lend large sums of money at no or low interest rates abroad while those who form the backbone of our economic way of life—and I am referring, of course, to the small businessman—are in many cases fighting for survival as a result of high-cost lending rates, would the minister advise the House whether or not the government is contemplating any future improvement in interest rates both within the federal business development bank as well as our monopolistic chartered bank system; and more specifically, is there a possibility of having the Small Businesses Loans Act amended in such a way as to ease the way for the small businessman?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will recall that very substantial measures are proposed in the budget for the benefit of small business. The question of interest rates is a very difficult and complicated one and I hesitate to give any undertakings about bringing in special measures in addition to those already being proposed in that field. What is quite clear is that the best way of reducing interest rates in this country is to get inflation under control, and I only wish we had a little more support from the opposition in those endeavours.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INDUSTRY

POSSIBILITY OF MEASURES TO AID SMALL BUSINESSMEN

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Because of the fact that the small businessman does in fact form the backbone of our economic way of life, and as a result of continuing disregard for this small firms sector by federal budgets, as witnessed earlier this week—regardless of what the Acting Prime Minister says—is the minister or his department considering initiating a comprehensive policy, with emphasis on incentives and stimulants, aimed specifically at the small business sector; and can he assure the House that such a policy will be backed by appropriate legislation to show the seriousness of this matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, a number of special programs with regard to small business are already in place. There is a review of the nature the hon. member referred to underway at the present time, along with consultation with small business representatives in Canada. A number of proposals have been put forward and I have no doubt that those will be implemented. Whether it will be necessary to use legislation for their implementation or existing programs is not a matter on which I can give the hon. member a definite answer at the present time.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. A. C. Abbott (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a relatively tranquil day in the House to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday in the Mother of Parliaments at Westminster strife broke out among members resulting in a reported flattening of the Sergeant at Arms and outbreaks of fisticuffs. Noting the growingly intemperate behaviour of the opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: —would the Acting Prime Minister advise the House whether he and Your Honour are studying contingency measures to deal with such a potential outrage in this House?

Oral Questions

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF HALL REPORT ON PENSIONS OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I should ask a supplementary following that last question: If not, why not?

May I direct my question to the Minister of Labour in view of the fact that the Minister of National Revenue is not here at the present time. It concerns the report of Dr. Noel Hall and railway pensions. Can the minister give the House and the country some indication of the progress in the preparation and completion of the report; and in particular, will the many, many people in Canada who will be affected by this report be able to look forward to completion within a very short time, since this process has gone on for a considerable period of years?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right; Dr. Hall has been working on this report for a longer time than either he or the government anticipated. I have talked to the various union officials involved, who are very concerned about this on behalf of their membership. I believe it is fair to say that they are entirely satisfied that Dr. Hall is proceeding in a very thorough fashion indeed and that the report will be a thorough one; so, for that reason, they understand the delay. In short, I hope to have the report soon; before the end of June was my last firm indication.

MANPOWER

POSSIBILITY OF PROGRAMS TO CREATE SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the government has done away with OFY, and with it two-thirds of the jobs that were available through the SSEAP program, in view of the fact that without this program unemployment among students last year would have been above 14 per cent according to the government's own evaluation of the program, and in view of the fact that the lack of summer unemployment will mean many students will be unable to return to school in the fall and this will hit hardest on working and low income families, making it even more difficult for them to send their children to post-secondary schools, is the government prepared now either to bring in an emergency summer employment program to allow these students to work and pay their way back to school or admit that they find an unemployment rate of 14 or 15 per cent among students acceptable, since it is clear private sector hiring will not pick up the slack?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this question should be put to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration when he is here. There is a very considerable array of programs and I think he should have the opportunity of replying in detail.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF ALLEGED NEW PROPOSAL

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services and has to do with the fact that Lockheed have indicated that they have put a new proposal to the government for the purchase of LRPA's. I know that the minister cannot give us the details of any proposal that has been put, but in general terms can he advise us whether it involves a renewed attempt on the part of Lockheed to borrow funds, or a proposal to delay the start of the project until the Department of National Defence has more funds available, presumably with some cost change, or is there now some sort of United States government backed guarantee on the viability of Lockheed against which the Canadian government might itself feel tempted to borrow? Would the minister advise us in general terms?

● (1150)

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, I cannot give a specific answer to the hon. member because, to my knowledge, we have not received any new proposals from Lockheed. I have the same information as the hon. member that Lockheed is reported to be working out a new proposal. We have, of course, indicated that the previous proposal was turned down because Lockheed could not secure financing. However, if they want to submit further proposal in line with the budgetary requirements of the government and the military requirements for the implementation of the program, we would be quite willing to consider it as well as any proposal from other companies.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—BASIS ON WHICH LETTER OF INTENT SENT TO COMPANY—ASSURANCE FROM NATIONAL DEFENCE OF NEW PROPOSAL

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the lack of communication between the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Supply and Services with regard to this matter, and in view of the fact that the Minister of Supply and Services has laid the blame pretty heavily on the Minister of National Defence for having entered into this large transaction on only a verbal assurance, could the minister advise the House of two things: When the letter of intent was sent in December to Lockheed—and that letter of intent was tabled here—was it on the basis of verbal assurance from the Minister of National Defence or did the Minister of Supply and Services make any attempt to back up that verbal assurance in any written way in the form of a commitment and, second, having regard to the attack the Minister of Supply and Services has publicly made in respect of the negotiating abilities of the Minister of National Defence would he assure us that he apprise himself that there had been in effect an offer made to the Minister of National Defence by Lockheed in respect of this matter because the minister's answer to the first question indicates that apparently he does not know. Would he ask the Minister of National Defence what is going on?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I want first to clear up a point about which I believe the hon. member has some misgivings. I never blamed the Minister of National Defence. I said, as he said himself in the House, that a general had verbally accepted an offer from Lockheed for the financing of the project by that company. I feel it was a big mistake, and the general should obviously have asked Lockheed to put that offer in writing. That is quite clear.

It was also quite clear that if Lockheed had made a new proposal to the government, it would have made it to the LRPA project management group, and then I would have been informed at the same time as the Minister of National Defence. Therefore, if I say that we have not received any offer, it is because neither I nor the Minister of National Defence have heard of any offer.

ENERGY

GASOLINE—PRICE DIFFERENTIAL BETWEEN URBAN AND RURAL AREAS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since government policy has again resulted in a rise in the price of gasoline, and since these increases will soon be felt at the retail pumps, as well as the fact that in most areas of Canada there is a large spread in the retail price of gas between larger urban centres and rural areas—as an example, in Manitoba the spread in gas prices between Winnipeg and rural communities only 50 miles away is 16 cents per gallon at stations owned by major oil companies—has the minister had a discussion with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and is there an intention to take action against these oil companies because of this price discrimination against residents of rural areas.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the combines section of the Department of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs already has this particular industry under investigation.

THE QUEEN

DATE OF STATEMENT ON PLANS TO CELEBRATE HER MAJESTY'S SILVER JUBILEE

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. It arises out of the Prime Minister's apparently disinterested answer to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants question concerning Canada's efforts to celebrate Her Majesty's Silver Jubilee. I wonder when he will be ready to make a statement to this House and to the country concerning the way we as a nation will celebrate our sovereign's anniversary?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member got his impression of disinterest. It does not seem to be based on fact. A statement will be made in June.

COMPENSATION FOR COMPANIES WORKING ON CANDU REACTOR FOR INDIA IN VIEW OF CANCELLATION OF CONTRACT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It relates to a matter he has had under review as has his predecessor over the last two years. In view of the announcement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs of the cancellation of the sale of the CANDU reactor to India, is the minister able to tell us now what the position of the government will be in relation to compensation for those companies which have completed or partially completed the equipment for that reactor.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the hon. member with precision because the matter is now being examined and one or two of the issues involved are in fact before the courts. However, I think I can assure the hon. member that a satisfactory settlement will be achieved quite rapidly now that a decision with regard to any further shipments to India has been made.

GASOLINE—POSSIBILITY OF REDUCTION IN EXCISE TAX IN VIEW OF PRICE INCREASE

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by my colleague the hon. member for Marquette and is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the fact that the extremely regressive effect of the government's 10 cents a gallon excise tax on gasoline will involve complications for those people who have been forced to move out of urban areas because of the high housing costs and have to commute to the city from rural areas, can the minister indicate whether the government is giving consideration to a reduction in the excise tax which would be phased in at the same time as the government's announced plan for an increase in gasoline prices?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that the budget was presented two nights ago.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When can we expect the discrimination embodied in legislative changes in the extentions of old age pensions and the supplement that were passed last year to be corrected so that single persons, widows, and separated and divorced spouses who are past age 60 but not yet age 65 will be assisted under the old age security scheme?

FILLING OF VACANCIES ON CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour who is in charge of multiculturalism. On May 17, 1976 the terms of one third of the members of the Canadian Multiculturalism Consultative Council expired. What steps is the minister taking to fill these vacancies?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, recommendations with regard to replacements are now being considered by the government and are being processed. I hope an announcement can be made shortly.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, when will the minister take steps to correct this gross insult to the multicultural community and do we have to wait until 1978 before he will get off his backside and do something about it?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a gross exaggeration on the hon. member's part. The fact of the matter is that many ethnic cultural communities are sending in recommendations concerning people who might fill these vacancies.

Mr. Paproski: This government just does not care about the other third of the people of Canada.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I am sure the hon. member would want those communities to be given every consideration. I would be pleased to receive some suggestions from the hon. member.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DREE FUNDING FOR AREAS IN WHICH MILITARY BASES WILL BE CLOSED—REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROVIDE FUNDS

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): My question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that yesterday in the minister's response to my question he indicated—will you guys, shut-up?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I should say to the hon. member that I was reluctant to intervene, as he did so forcefully, to quieten down his colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: I return to my question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister indicated yesterday there was close consultation on the DREE program with the Department of National Defence and with the Minister, will he now indicate why there is no provision in the supplementary estimates for DREE funding for the areas in which these military bases will be shut down, and why this issue has never been raised in discussions with reference to DREE programs?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): As I said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, in our budget we cannot provide for sums of money that might be required to face hypothetical or possible situations. We lined up our estimates for the coming 12 months. No decision has yet been announced, that I know, and if such decisions were taken by the cabinet they would be announced, at which time the effective date of any shut down of military bases, if any, would also be made known.

The government would also announce at that time what steps it has decided to take to remedy the negative effets of the closing down of the military bases in question. Discussions are now going on in cabinet in this regard. I am also in the process of discussing with my colleague for national defence what steps could be taken if we were to decide to close down a given military base or other. But until such time as a decision is reached, my department cannot announce programs nor provide moneys for such programs.

ATTITUDE OF DEPARTMENT TOWARDS PROGRAMS FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this is all theory, can the minister also say, in light of comments from senior officials of the provincial government of British Columbia dealing with economic expansion, that DREE is also applying lip service to British Columbia in that British Columbia has responded that it is apparently one of the have provinces and the DREE program is of no interest there. What is the minister's attitude towards British Columbia?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, once again, I should like to say that our department has not in the past been much involved in the Western provinces, it is true and we admit it, but gradually it has become increasingly involved. British Columbia is now facing a new situation. Unemployment is on the increase. In recent years there have been more problems and that is why the Department of Regional Economic Expansion intends, this year as well as next year, to participate with the provincial government in a job-creating program in that province.

I mentioned this involvement to the hon. member when the estimates of my department were being considered by the committee a few days ago, and I intend to pursue this objective, that is to implement more of our programs in British Columbia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR TODAY

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday when dealing with House business, there have been discussions with the House leaders about the possibility of dealing with Bills S-34 and S-35 today. These discussions were continued yesterday and today. I understand it is now agreed that second reading of Bill S-35 will be the first order of government business today. This will be followed by Bill S-34. Because of the urgency of this piece of legislation which relates to airport security, and its non-controversial character, I shall seek unanimous consent to consider it in committee of the whole, rather than in the standing committee, and dispose of all the stages today. We shall then return to debate on second reading of Bill C-84.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there were some things happening around me. I should like to be quite certain that I understand the intention of the government. Are we to deal with the health and welfare matter first?

Mr. Sharp: Only the second reading.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A few moments ago, during the question period, in putting a question to the Acting Prime Minister the hon. member for Winnipeg North made reference to an interview with myself on the CBC national news last night. As usual, the opposition has distorted the facts. I think that a careful check of the record will show that this member of parliament endorses the government's change in the UIC policy based on the commitment that these funds will be reallocated into job creation and job training programs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lumley: The backbench of the government party is conscious of the fact that Canada is the envy of the western industrialized world in job creation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. I think that a perusal of Hansard will show that I stated that the hon. members I quoted had expressed reservations and opposition to the proposals unless there were certain conditions set. I think the record will show that I did not distort the facts.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Supply and Services has come back to the House, in view of the answer he gave to my friend the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. I understand the minister will be catching a plane, so my point will be brief. But it is very fundamental, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker. As I understood the answer given by the minister to my friend, he did not agree with my friend that there was a difference of opinion between the Minister of National Defence and himself, but he spoke about some mythical general, I assume in the Department of National Defence, and it seemed strange in the opinion of the minister that he should have made a verbal commitment which got us into this whole fiasco—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nowlan: —of financing the front end or the tail end of the Lockheed plane. I say this is fundamental, because when you speak about something called ministerial responsibility—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): What do you know about it?

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for St. Boniface would not understand about ministerial responsibility, but his seatmate might. I am speaking about ministerial responsibility with regard to a public servant or a general in the Department of National Defence. I do not think the minister should stand in the House and evade a question from my friend, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, by saying that there is some general who made a verbal commitment and yet there is no difference of opinion between the minister and the Minister of National Defence. I do not know what we can do about it today, but if such an answer is to be allowed, then, goodness gracious, we will be doing a great disservice. Perhaps the minister did not intend to give that answer, but he can certainly do a great disservice to the public servants, of whom a general is one, who obviously cannot come to this House and reply. Basically, if there was someone under the minister's responsibility who made a mistake, then certainly in this day and age the minister must take the responsibility, not some general or some corporal.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am quite surprised at the hon. member's violent outburst, since the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) a few weeks ago had already explained to the House the circumstances which I pointed out myself where a general from his department had got the verbal assurance from Lockheed Corporation that the LRPA project financing would be borne by that corporation. He himself indicated that unfortunately the general had not got the written agreement and, of course, as the one responsible for government purchases I feel that was a serious mistake.

At that time, I heard no violent reaction as I just did from the hon. member about the ministerial responsibility or the revealing of this fact. This fact has been well known for a few weeks and I do not understand why today one would want to make a fuss about it. I for one regret that the government was placed in such a situation. I can assure the hon. member that I was not made aware of such a possibility before sending a telex—which constitutes a letter of agreement—to Lockheed authorizing that company to start some preliminary work before the final contract.

● (1210)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, the minister might be surprised at the violence of the intervention by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley, but I hope he is not surprised about the propriety of the principle with respect to the point raised by the hon. member. I think it is an old tradition that one does not attribute to public servants the responsibilities which are those of the ministers who occupy a very special position.

However, the interesting thing about this matter is that at the time the transaction collapsed, the Prime Minister also indicated that the source of the problem was that the cabinet had been told that Lockheed could provide the money. Each minister seemed conveniently to forget that not only the Minister of National Defence, a brother minister and a member of the ministry who has responsibility, believed in the verbal commitment, but the whole cabinet apparently believed in it, too. Not one cabinet minister, least of all the Minister of Supply and Services, has said that he looked for a written assurance before Lockheed was authorized to start on December 2.

The point is being made by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—and I think it is being made quite well—that there is a responsibility upon all ministers with respect to this matter. There may be the intervention of public servants who act within the course of their duty or outside the course of their duty, but I think the point has to be made, reinforced and hammered home here that the responsibility for what has happened, regardless of where the trouble began, lies with the ministry. The hon. member for Annopolis Valley is quite right in suggesting that out of the answer today and, indeed—as the minister said—out of the answers of his colleague, the Minister of National Defence, there has been an attempt to deny what is fundamental to our parliamentary practice, that is, the question of responsibility of ministers of the Crown for what their employees do in their name in the course of their duties.

May I say that that also applies to another affair in this House with regard to officials acting outside the course of their duties when those officials are directly responsible to a particular minister. I think it is a very important principle and it ought not to be forgotten in this parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point of order, in so far as it goes beyond a disagreement with the interpretation of the minister's remarks, raises a question about the theory of ministerial responsibility, and perhaps it would be well for all hon. members to reflect, having received over the weekend the Hansard transcript of exactly what was said, and to see whether it does in fact attack that fundamental and important consideration, but it is a point too fundamental and too important to be given a rather cursory treatment on the basis of an oral answer today.

[Mr. Goyer.]

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I think that in view of the fact that my intemperate outburst did not specifically point to any particular member or to a particular part of the House, it should be clearly understood that I was not labelling my fellow members on this side of the House as being noisy and intemperate but, rather, my hon. friends across the way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

MR. RICHARD O'HAGAN

Question No. 5,292—Mr. Cossitt:

1. On what basis is Mr. Richard O'Hagan associated with the Prime Minister's Office including (a) term of employment or contract (b) exact annual salary?

2. What is a full description of his duties and (a) does this include improving public relations of the Prime Minister (b) was the last Gallup poll a factor in determining Mr. O'Hagan's duties?

3. Did Mr. O'Hagan schedule an interview with the Prime Minister for Allan Fotheringham of the Vancouver Sun and MacLean's Magazine and, if so (a) was this cancelled at the last minute by the Prime Minister (b) was one of the reasons for the cancellation complaints about the pending interview from British Columbia Liberal Members of Parliament and, if so, does this indicate a new policy on the part of the Prime Minister to grant interviews only to members of the news media approved in advance by Liberal Members of Parliament?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. A copy of the public communiqué announcing Mr. O'Hagan's nomination and functions is being sent to the honourable member. (a) and (b) Mr. O'Hagan is on loan from the Department of External Affairs and will be appointed to the Prime Minister's staff under Section 37(1) of the Public Service Employment Act in the salary range $35,500-$47,500.

2. See communiqué referred to in 1.

3. Arrangements that may lead to interviews with the Prime Minister with representatives from the media is not of public record.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PROPRIETARY OR PATENT MEDICINE ACT, AND TRADE MARKS ACT

MEASURE TO EXTEND LICENCE DATE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill S-35, to amend an act to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will no doubt recall that approximately one year ago parliament enacted Bill S-9, an act designed to repeal the Propriety or Patent Medicine Act. The PPM Act, as it is commonly termed, has served Canada well for over half a century, but certain of its provisions—notably, that relating to the secrecy of the ingredients contained in patent or proprietary medicines—were considered anachronistic.

Accordingly, Bill S-9 provided for repeal of the PPM Act effective July 1, 1976, with control of proprietary or patent medicines then to be carried out under the Food and Drugs Act and regulations. Royal assent for Bill S-9 was received on April 24, 1975. On the basis of the best information available then, it was believed that the period of time allowed to both industry and the provinces was adequate to ensure the orderly transition from control over proprietary medicines under the PPM Act to the Food and Drugs Act.

During the intervening period, industry has found considerable manufacturing difficulty in achieving the necessary labelling changes in order to meet the July 1, 1976, deadline. Problems related to the availability of labels, the need to have new registration numbers and adequate production lead time have created a situation whereby manufacturers of proprietary medicines have advised the government that they would be unable to continue having their products available to the general public unless the date of repeal was extended.

There are various classes of drug products and differing legislation controlling their sale. Prescription drugs may only be sold on the authorization of a prescription issued by a practitioner, and the medication can only be sold in pharmacies. Non-prescription drugs may be sold without the authorization of a practitioner, and by virtue of provincial legislation, non-prescription drugs not presently registered under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act can only be sold in drugstores or pharmacies. By virtue, also, of provincial legislation, exemptions are made for proprietary medicines presently registered under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act so that they may be sold in non-pharmacy outlets. In consultation with the provinces, there has been general agreement that the public should continue to have access to products for the self-medication of the symptoms of minor, self-limiting ailments.

Repeal of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act requires, therefore, that the provinces amend provincial pharmacy legislation to refer not to the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act but to proprietary medicines in division 10 of the Food and Drugs Act and regulations. The federal government, based on assurances at the official level, had expected that the necessary changes in provincial legislation would be undertaken in time to accommodate the change in federal legislation. Some of the provinces have not as yet made the changes necessary to permit the sale of these products as proprietary medicines. Barring unforeseen circumstances, it is expected that all the required changes in provincial legislation will be enacted by the proposed repeal date of April 1, 1977.

These two factors make it necessary to extend the repeal date. Otherwise, Mr. Speaker, there would develop a situation in which the general public, after July 1—which is only one month away—could not legally obtain products for self-medication to which they have normally turned for treatment of minor ailments such as headaches, indigestion and other symptoms of minor disorders. The bill before this House today is designed to ensure that there is an orderly and appropriate transition period in which continuity of availability of proprietary medicines is assured.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, this bill was before the House about a year ago and we expressed agreement at that time. I am now a little sorry that we rushed it through all stages at one sitting, I believe, on the assurance of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and his parliamentary secretary that they had done their homework and all was in order. It now appears that was not the case, for we are dealing with the same bill again. We have to ask ourselves why this is necessary and, Mr. Speaker, we can come to only one conclusion: the gross incompetence of this government or at least its arrogance and failure adequately to consult with the drug manufacturers.

I am sure some information must have been available about how long it would take to change the labelling and get new materials printed. On the basis of the general behaviour and attitude of this government, I am inclined to think there was no real consultation with the drug manufacturers a year ago which would have enabled the government to make a better prognostication of the time required. We have seen this attitude in its dealings with the provinces in the past.

The parliamentary secretary carefully worded his comments so as not to say whether there had been consultations with the provinces when the bill was first proposed and passed a year ago, or whether there has been consultation now. He said he has reason to believe it will be ready by April 1, but did not say that he had consulted the provinces and did not give any assurance that April 1 is a satisfactory date. On the basis of the government's past performance, we cannot tell that it is a suitable date. There is no evidence that the drug manufacturers will be ready by then, or that the provinces will have amended their pharmacy acts by that time.

Before passing this legislation we would need to get some assurances from the people involved so that next April we will not, again, find ourselves pressured to pass all stages in a matter of two or three seconds. If the government is to put legislation through in a responsible and serious way, it should do so after a good deal of forethought so that it does not have to come back for amendment within a year, as is happening now.

I should like to conclude by indicating that I am very dissatisfied with the approach the government has been taking in pretty well all spheres of its activity. Its approach consists of a good deal of arrogance—

Mr. Paproski: What else is new?

Mr. Yewchuk: —and no consultation with the people of the provinces or their governments. Unless the parliamentary secretary can give us some more information, I think we will have to insist on calling witnesses before the committee to clarify matters so that we will know that if this bill, as it is now presented to us, passes it will satisfy the needs of the people affected by it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. As the previous speaker said, we debated this bill, or a similar one, approximately a year ago. At that time we indicated our support for the intent of the legislation, which was to remove the secrecy aspect of proprietary medicines, a move long advocated by members on this side of the House. I see no objection to prolonging the period to introduce the legislation, but I think that the parliamentary secretary or the minister could provide more information on the reasons for this.

I just want to raise two points, Mr. Speaker. During the previous debate I raised some serious questions regarding regulations that would flow from this particular bill to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act. I wondered how it would be encompassed in the total program of the Food and Drugs Act. To date I have not seen any information with respect to that matter, and I think it is pertinent.

With much of the legislation that comes before this House, the regulations are in fact more important than the actual principle of the bill. I make a strong plea to the parliamentary secretary and the minister that far more information should be provided with respect to the ultimate regulations and how they will be intertwined with the Food and Drugs Act.

The second point I want to make is that it is unfortunate the government has only dealt with one small aspect of the many recommendations made in the past regarding changes to the Food and Drugs Act. There have been many reports over the years, the most important being the report of the Le Dain commission which met over a long period of time at a cost of several million dollars. When one reviews the report carefully, one finds numerous recommendations that would improve the Food and Drugs Act. Unfortunately, we have seen only one small aspect of those regulations improved.

In closing, I would say that we support the principle of this bill and the extension of the period for a short time. I emphasize, the government has tended not to make known the extent of the regulations, without which it is difficult to evaluate the thrust of the bill. These regulations are most important. Second, and equally important, I feel that the government has not acted on some of the comprehensive recommendations made in the past by the Le Dain commission.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in connection with Bill S-34. When I was dealing with the business of the House for today, I indicated that I would seek unanimous consent for two propositions: first, that the bill should be referred to the committee of the whole House rather than to the transport and communications committee, which now appears on the order paper; second, that if it is agreeable and the House gives unanimous consent, the House should consider the bill at all stages today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AERONAUTICS ACT

MEASURES RESPECTING SECURITY PROGRAM TO BE CARRIED OUT BY FOREIGN CARRIERS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill S-34, to amend the Aeronautics Act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole House.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon—Mr. Turner in the chair.

On clause 1—Security Measures.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Chairman, perhaps at the outset I might usefully touch sketch the gist of this legislation. May I say that we appreciate the co-operation of hon. members in expediting consideration of this bill. Hopefully, we shall finish all stages by one o'clock.

Canada has been one of those countries which has expressed growing concern about the threat to international air transportation posed by unlawful interference with civil aviation. This concern is, of course, heightened by the approach of the summer Olympics in Montreal and the UN conference on human settlements which is just beginning in Vancouver.

A security program for civil aviation in Canada has been developed over the past few years in co-operation with air carriers. This program follows closely the standards and recommended practices for the protection of civil aviation as set out in annex 17 of the International Civil Aviation Organization. It began with the amendment of part 5 of the Aeronautics Act which was passed in the House of Commons on July 27, 1973.

In effect, the Aeronautics Act now authorizes the governor in council to make regulations requiring the owners or operators of aircraft registered in Canada to establish, maintain and carry out such security measures as may be prescribed by the regulations. Accordingly, regulations have been enacted imposing the obligation of security measures on the owners and operators of aircraft registered in Canada. The act, however, does not authorize regulations which would impose the obligation of similar security measures to be established and carried out by foreign air carriers operating into and out of aerodromes in Canada.

Under the present wording of the act, security measures in respect of flights by foreign air carriers from aerodromes in Canada can only be established and carried out by the Ministry of Transport itself, the result being that Canadian air carriers are burdened with the expense of establishing and carrying out their own security measures, while the Ministry of Transport must bear the burden of establishing and the expense of carrying out security measures in respect of passengers departing Canada with foreign air carriers. This is, obviously, somewhat discriminatory.

In addition, the absence of security measures by foreign air carriers transporting passengers into aerodromes in Canada is of considerable importance as many European countries do not screen passengers or goods leaving their country by aircraft. The coming international events in Canada point out the necessity of requiring foreign air carriers operating into aerodromes in Canada to adopt a security program in respect of all passengers and goods intended to be carried into and out of aerodromes in this country.

The amendments to section 5(1) as proposed in Bill S-34 are to clarify the authority to require all owners and operators of aircraft, whether registered in Canada or otherwise, to comply with security regulations in respect of flights into or out of Canadian aerodromes. The foreign air carriers would be required to use security measures equivalent to those now followed by Canadian air carriers. As I have said, the operators of Canadian registered aircraft are now required to comply with security regulations at their own expense, whereas foreign air carriers are not so required. The amendment would correct that situation.

The amendments also authorize the Ministry of Transport to institute, on its own, security measures at airports applicable to all carriers, both domestic and foreign. This would enable the ministry to impose charges for any such security services provided. If this service had to be provided without a charge to the carriers, the cost to the department is estimated at approximately $200,000 annually. This provision would only be used on the failure, particularly of foreign air carriers, to adopt a security system equivalent to that used by Canadian air carriers.

The amendments also make it an offence for a foreign-registered aircraft to land at an aerodrome in Canada without having subjected its passengers to security measures equivalent to those followed by Canadian operators. This provision will provide a measure of enforcement. It would, perhaps, be interesting for the House to note that over the past year the government of the United States has similarly moved in this direction through its anti-hijacking act of 1974 and subsequent regulations which came into effect on October 9, 1975.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, in a broad way we welcome Bill S-34, amending the Aeronautic Act, which is to provide, by way of regulation, that foreign air carriers using Canadian airports shall operate under the same security procedures as those applying to Canadian carriers. As the parliamentary secretary mentioned, our concern for security is heightened by our knowledge that in the next few days many thousands of people from all over the world will visit Canada for the Habitat conference.

Our reservations with respect to the bill have not to do so much with the intent of the bill as with the principle inherent in it, namely, that the user of the service shall pay for protection. Clearly, under the bill the airlines must accept the additional cost of security measures connected with visitors who will come to this country for Habitat and the Olympics. We contend that security is the business of the RCMP in this instance. We note, from our own figures, that RCMP security measures will account for between 60 cents and 70 cents of the cost of each air ticket. We wish to voice our reservations about this aspect as we think security is, and has always been, the responsibility of the state. It is up to the state to provide adequate security and police protection for Canadian citizens and visitors to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: We argue that at any Canadian international airport at almost any time of day there might be 1,000 emplaning or deplaning passengers and up to 4,000 friends and relatives seeing them off or welcoming them to Canada. Clearly, friends and relatives are not users of the airlines, but the security measures are there for their protection as well as for the protection of shopkeepers and others doing routine business near our airports.

● (1240)

The Minister of Transport deferred announcing the new regulations with regard to the security aspect at our airports. We understand he will be making an announcement early next week. In order to comply with certain undertakings, that will have to be by June 1 or 2. As that is only a few days away, perhaps it is a bit premature for us to be required to do something today with regard to something that is not already in place. I hope we turn a blind eye to it. I understand the pressures. We do not object to it on that particular ground. However, we urge upon the parliamentary secretary our concern with regard to what the regulations will be and how they will be applicable to foreign carriers.

We hope that foreign carriers will not have to bear the security costs for their own policing at international airports in their countries. We hope the minister will heed this representation with respect to these costs and continue, as is right and proper, to require that the general revenues of Canada bear the cost of security and police protection.

I wish to make one comment that has to be made every once in a while. We are constantly faced with the question of why there is a $5 add-on per airline ticket for screening of passengers and baggage at our airports. At Seattle, for example—the parliamentary secretary will be very familiar with this—the cost is only 20 cents per ticket. Even if the cost here is as high as 70 cents, what happens to other $4.30? We are concerned about this in these days of inflation. Any add-on costs have a tendency to be inflationary.

In conclusion, we welcome the bill. It is required if there is to be uniform integrity with regard to security of people moving in and out of our airports on our national carriers as well as carriers of foreign nations. This bill goes a long way toward that, and we welcome it.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I wish to echo the comments of my colleague from Dartmouth-Halifax East supporting the principle of the bill, and to concur with the reservations he has pointed out. Naturally, we have always supported the principle of security at our national airports. Indeed, many of us were instrumental in the passage of the amendments to the Aeronautics Act to, in effect, put this into force. The parliamentary secretary alluded to the fact that this necessitates the co-operation of the air carriers and, indeed, the support and co-operation of all passengers. However, we must point out that the costs for this service have escalated far in excess of that which we were led to believe the costs would be at the time we considered the bill.

I took issue with this particular point on March 11 at the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. I questioned the minister about the proposal to impose an additional 66-cent charge for RCMP persons at airports, in addition to the 26 cents per passenger which the airlines already collect to cover their security. I asked him to rationalize and justify a cost of that magnitude when evidence indicates that the cost of similar armed guards and security persons at border airports in the United States amounts to something in the area of 14 cents. The minister indicated at that time that negotiations and consultations were going on with the air carrier industry. I understand that a counterproposal has been advanced to the industry. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary is at liberty to advance that information to the House at this time.

Our fears have not been unfounded. We took it upon ourselves during the committee hearings at that time to emphasize the fact that this should not be another burden placed upon the shoulders of the air traveller. That falls in line with our view that security at our national airports is indeed a matter for a national over-all approach. It is part of total national security, not necessarily security attributed to air travellers, which was elaborated on by my colleague from Dartmouth-Halifax East. We continue to hold that view. The minister gave some indication that he was prepared to reassess the policy of the government in that regard. That is recorded at page 4115 of the proceedings of March 11.

I certainly do not want to hold up the passage of this particular piece of legislation. However, I hope the parliamentary secretary will give us that information at this time. The minister did indicate last March that a definitive position would be arrived at within a couple of months. Therefore, I hope the parliamentary secretary will provide that information to the committee at this time.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take a few moments to respond to the concerns expressed by the two hon. members who have just spoken. I will try to deal as specifically as I can with some of the precise issues they have raised.

The first general question had to do with the expense of RCMP operations at airports in Canada, and the concern that the total burden of that kind of operation should not be borne by the air carriers and, through them, by the air travelling public in Canada. I want to assure both hon. members that the charges with respect to the RCMP operations are only in relation to the actual security work which they do in connection with boarding passengers. The other functions that they might have in an airport dealing with the ordinary policing function is not paid for by the air carriers and, through them, the travelling public. It is the security aspect only that is dealt with in that way. I hope that will alleviate some of the concern which those hon. members have. The expense incurred in connection with the RCMP is an expense directly related to the security of passengers boarding aircraft. Whatever else they may do in their normal policing function elsewhere at airports and aerodromes in Canada is not a matter that is covered by the particular issue before us today.

The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East made reference to a $5 fee or charge. That is not related to security costs of airport operations. The hon. member for Vegreville asked questions specifically with regard to testimony which was put forward earlier this spring in the transport and communications committee. The charge referred to in that instance was 60 cents or 66 cents. It is my understanding that the actual cost factor is considerably less than that. I am afraid I cannot be more definite today, but I will undertake to provide this information to the hon. member as quickly as possible; indeed, I will try to give a breakdown showing exactly what the security costs are and how they accumulate to the final total, whatever that total is.

Mr. Forrestall: I should like to draw attention to the principle involved here. Some Canadians, for example, find offence in the fact that members of the Canadian armed forces are employed on services in penitentiaries. Our military forces are established to defend all Canadians, whether they happen to be law-abiding or not. The principle with respect to the employment of the security services of our national police force should not be diluted so as to change the character of those services for all Canadians. It should not be diluted by using the services of that national force for a specific purpose or a specific reward.

The protection of all Canadians is the responsibility of the state, and it seems to us that if from time to time we impair the purity of the principle to which I have referred, at some time in the future it will be a lot easier for abuses to take place. This should be kept in mind when considering whether or not any portion of the charge proposed should be set against the cost of our national police force. In our judgment, there should not be.

Mr. Mazankowski: I understood the parliamentary secretary to say that the cost in relation to the RCMP presence covered only the boarding of passengers. Is it not true that the proposal involving the suggested cost of 66 cents was to include the presence of the RCMP on the ground as well as air side?

Mr. Goodale: That is not my understanding, but in order to clarify the situation further I think it would be more informative if I could provide the kind of breakdown to which I have referred. I will bear in mind the question just asked, so that we can be satisfied about which costs are directed to each particular function.

Mr. Mazankowski: If my interpretation is correct, it reinforces the argument we have been advancing. Surely the presence of RCMP personnel on the ground should not be a cost attached to air passengers. If that is the case, and it is my understanding that the 66 cents per passenger boarded would go to defray the cost of RCMP personnel both on the ground and air side, we believe the air traveller is being taxed rather heavily in the interests of national security.

Mr. Goodale: Again, I hope I can resolve that dispute or argument, whatever it might be, arising out of information which was given earlier to the transport committee, by means of the material which I shall be bringing to the House and in particular to the two hon. members who have spoken. I assure the committee that it is neither our desire nor intention that the proper function or role in Canada of the RCMP should be in any way impaired. That function is, of course, primarily one of ensuring peace and security. The questions we have been discussing are really questions of government accounting, the bookkeeping necessary to pay for the kinds of services which are provided, and to ensure that payment comes from appropriate sources. I do not think there is abuse here of the proper function of the RCMP. There is certainly no intention to dilute or downgrade the important role they play in Canadian life. I hope this question can be resolved at least in part by the information on the monetary aspects which I shall be providing.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate, I have the impression of having to fulfill a very difficult duty. It is perhaps the heaviest responsibility I have had to carry out since I had the privilege to attend the debates of this House and to represent a federal constituency.

In my opinion, it is extremely important to know the environment in which I live and the category of citizens I represent in this House to understand the way I intend to fulfil my responsibility. It is also important that hon. members be aware that my constituents are largely workers. Most of my electors are honest people who work for two large companies, Alcan and Price. The other citizens are small businessmen and I must unfortunately point out that I have to face extremely difficult social conditions because the unemployment rate is 20 per cent and because a large number of citizens, far too many, are poor.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the decision I have to make today must be based on the mandate I received on the category of people who will be affected by our decision. How can the death penalty influence those people who gave me the terms of reference to represent them? Mr. Speaker, a few years ago already I had the opportunity to take a particular interest in that extremely important debate on capital punishment. On many occasions I met citizens from all walks of life. I discussed with them. I explained to them that the decision I had to make should not be emotional; in other words, I should try not to make a decision after reading newspapers featuring a sordid crime committed the day before, I should try not to react when meeting a group of people who are in an emotional state of mind, which is quite understandable sometime, because of a tragedy some place in this country.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, one also has to recognize that with such an important decision, my personal opinion should not prevail. It is known and admitted—and I never hesitated to say so—that I never believed violence could solve any sort of problem, either in my family or in my province, my country or within the government. It is a stand that I am prepared to take any time, anywhere and in anyone's presence.

However, as I have said, this personal opinion does not necessarily reflect the decision I must take.

Mr. Speaker, in order to make a valid, thoughtful and responsible decision I should not follow an emotional reaction of mine nor my own view on this matter.

Above all, I must ask myself where lies the real interest of all the citizens I represent in this House and how I can uphold and protect it. Mr. Speaker, I feel that the only way to deal with the issue of capital punishment is to consider scientifically the effects of its retention or its abolition. Indeed, one cannot overemphasize the danger of false conclusions based on of vague terms and inaccurate figures found in reports on crime, particularly when such reports can lead to changes in the policy on crime.

The five major questions which, in my opinion, should be asked and which influenced my position are the following: first, are murders on the increase in Canada, and if so, is it due to the suspension of the death penalty? Second, is the death penalty effective as a deterrent? Third, how effective is the death penalty as a means to control and prevent crime? Fourth, what is the age and profession of the people charged or convicted of murder? Finally, the fifth question, what relationship is there between murderers and their victims?

Is it necessary, Mr. Speaker, to specify that the problem of capital punishment will not be solved, I admit, only through scientific research with moral and theological aspects related to the only basic question: Is life the most precious of all possessions? Does society have the right to take it away from a human being considered undeserving? Does the action of the state doing away with a criminal for good become revenge? Is it an act of violence by society against someone blamed of having been violent?

Regarding the first question, Mr. Speaker, about the impact of the increase in murders and criminality, I would like to make one point clear. Some rather interesting statistics in this regard show that the number of murders as such has increased at an average rate of 0.5. In other words, between 1965 and 1974, the average increase in murders has not been what certain people say. This average has been constant. What has gone up, though, is the number of criminal offences, and an important distinction must be made. Aggravated thefts, assaults and attempted assaults have increased. This indicates, Mr. Speaker, that violence is on the increase in our society, all forms of violence, verbal violence, written violence, violence in families, in society everywhere. This is where the real problem is. This violence, which we foster about everywhere, leads to murder. But when we want to control murder, we do not come to grips with the root of the problem but only with its head.

Mr. Speaker, the second part of the question I was asking myself a few minutes ago is this: did the abolition of the death penalty increase crime in general? I would like to remind you of a very important and useful comment of the British committee in the conclusions to its studies of the death penalty.

The general conclusion that they have reached is that, in all the figures which they have studied, there is no definite proof that the abolition of the death penalty may have led to an increase in the homicide rate or that its re-establishment may have led to a decrease.

Mr. Speaker, this brings me to study very important statistics. I do admit that statistics are not sufficient indications, but they are very useful. For example, between 1970 and 1974, a study was made in the United States in various abolitionist and non-abolitionist states. These statistics are extremely precise and interesting. You can notice than in ten abolitionist states, where the death penalty does not exist, the crime rate varies between 4.6 and 5.8 per cent, which means that it is rather low. The same study has been made in 40 non-abolitionist states, where the death penalty does exist. In these 40 states, the murder rate varies between 7.8 and 8.8 per cent. This is an indication that the death penalty has such, and this is what I assert, does not have a real effect on the crime rate. For example, in Georgia, which is a state where the death penalty exists, the crime rate is 17.8 per cent. If we also look at the statistics in other countries of the world, we can notice, for example, that in Europe in general, the countries which have abolished the death penalty have rather low homicide or murder attempt rates. For example, among these nations are Austria, Denmark, Finland, Norway, Sweden and the United Kingdom. This means, Mr. Speaker, that we should not be mistaken about the real significance of the death penalty.

The second question is: is the death penalty a useful deterrent. The arguments of those who claim that the death penalty has a deterrent effect are usually based on common sense rather than on empirical data, for these data tend to the contrary. Schuster asserted that the statistical studies always came to the conclusion that the death penalty has no important deterrent effect and that the relative frequency of murders in a given population depends on the cultural conditions in which this population lives.

The proponents of the death penalty claim that it is the most powerful of deterrents. They reason this way because of the fear that can influence human behaviour. This reasonlng is based on the theory that when man can predict the consequences of his actions, he will deliberately choose between two opposite behaviour patterns and that personal reward will be the criterion of his choice. Schuster notes that such a conclusion is not in accordance with modern psychology and sociology that believe that human behaviour, far from being calculated and conscious, obeys to a large extent to habits and inspiration of the moment.

I also have here a very interesting quotation from Dr. Roche: "The argument that the death penalty intimidates criminals can be valid to the extent that it is based on the hypothesis of a state of mind that we imagine to be unchanging, but experience has shown rather that a given community always includes a group of people with criminal tendencies which transcend the intimidating effect of any penalty."

The argument of retentionists gives much too much importance to the power of fear. Fear does not prevent people from doing what they want, Mr. Speaker. The attraction of immediate pleasure wins easily over the far away possibility of death. We must not forget that the life of everybody involves all sorts of risks. You can be injured or killed by a car or killed accidentally in certain professions like the mining or construction industries.

The threat of lung cancer does not stop our friends from smoking. Certain people drink themselves to death or entertain other vices which will cause their downfall. In one word, Mr. Speaker, to shorten my comments, which I now find are taking more time than I had expected, I shall simply say that deterrence, in my opinion, is not a factor in the case of the great majority of criminals in our society, since, and those are the last two questions that I want to answer, how are murders committed and by whom?

Mr. Speaker, the one thing that should not be overlooked is that statistics on murder include those committed by the underworld, by people who believe that violence is the answer. There are also murders committed by mentally ill people, those committed on impulse; the latter make up the greatest number of murders. Statistics indicate that 70 per cent of murders in Canada are committed by people who know one another through a financial, romantic or any other type of relationship.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, in considering the way murders are committed in Canada we must conclude that if the death penalty were enforced, it would not apply in most cases, it would apply only in 2 or 3 per cent of cases.

I am not coming to my main argument. What type of people commit murders in our Canadian society?

If we examine the statistics, Mr. Speaker, we note that 50 per cent of murders in Canada are committed by workers, by those who are in difficult social circumstances, who have been living in a divided family, in a climate of uncertainty and affliction and who are left alone, when their parents are divorced, or drunkards, people who have not assumed their responsibilities. Those people now commit murders in society.

Let us examine the list of murderers. People like Cotroni and Obront who have some standing never appear on the list of murderers. Is it because those individuals are more intelligent than others? No. It is because they were given some advantage by society, because their living conditions were more normal and their education, training and their circumstances did not prompt them to commit reprehensible acts.

Mr. Speaker, the death penalty is an action taken against the worker, the underprivileged, the one who does not have a lawyer competent enough to get him a fair trial, to defend him and get him out of trouble. As concerns the worker, whatever the seriousness of his crime he is unable to defend himself. The punishment is unfair as it is never applied in a rational, real and fair way. This measure is against workers and in a riding where most people are workers I shall never accept to vote for a measure which is against the majority of the people. I think I have to make those people understand that if I vote for that kind of measure I vote against their interests.

I recognize that there are sordid crimes. I recognize that we all have the same reaction: let us eliminate those people. But who are they? They live in difficult circumstances. Criminals are created by society, by everyone of us. There should not be scapegoats of our own mistakes in every field.

I wish to conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying this: as a member of the House of Commons I think I have the responsibility of not choosing the easy way out, not following the trend before people whose first reaction is often to say: We want capital punishment! My duty is to explain to those people that we must help each other—eliminate crime, we must help the less privileged, people with problems and not depend only on government legislation. Every individual at any level from any government on any side of this House, whether man, woman, professional or worker, is part of a big family and we are all responsible for each others' actions.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation will be passed. However I am a Democrat and what ever the result I shall be ready to accept it. But I am convinced that if we provide stricter measures to go with capital punishment, because if there were no strict measures going with it I would not agree, as criminals can be released in the streets after two or three years and the people are very concerned and that is what they want. We should not necessarily take the life of those individuals but they should be excluded from society long enough to pay for their mistakes.

Mr. Speaker, I close on this wish: I trust that, regardless of the result of the vote, we will understand that the real interest of the citizens lies in the fact that we work with them, for them, by placing at their disposal all our resources as members of Parliament, to help them solve the basic problems; when those problems no longer exist, I expect that the crime rate we deplore at this time will have lessened considerably. At least, that is the hope I cherish. I offer all those who want to work with me towards that ideal—I know they are the vast majority if not all hon. members—my co-operation. As for me, I am willing to help them, that we might truly help the people in the right sense of the word.

[English]

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I hope that I will abide by what most hon. members have been saying at the beginning of their speeches, and that is to be brief. My intention is to be brief because practically everything that has to be said has been said in this debate. However, I think it is essential that on issues such as this members of parliament go on record so that their constituents will have an opportunity to judge their stand, because this is an extremely important issue. It is not an issue upon which parties can take a stand, but we as individual members will have a free vote, or a supposedly free vote. I hope to speak a little more about that later in my remarks. Let me state at the beginning that while I believe in capital punishment for all premeditated murder or planner murder, which makes up approximately 1 per cent of the murders committed, I also believe a more humane form of execution should replace hanging.

Violent crime in Canada increased 90 per cent in the ten-year period 1965 to 1974, and the murder rate doubled in that same period of time. In 1965 there were 243 murders, and in 1974 there were 545 murders. As I stated, the murder rate doubled in that period of time from 1.2 per 100,000 population to 2.4 per 100,000 population. Despite the fact that 38 policemen and prison guards were murdered in this same ten-year period, no convicted murderer has been executed. In essence, what we have had for a number of years is the abolition of capital punishment, and the murder rate has doubled.

Evidence is inconclusive as to whether capital punishment is a deterrent. Any discussion of the merits or otherwise of capital punishment goes beyond the area of politics and each person makes up his own mind according to the dictates of his conscience and his judgment. It has also been shown that few people will change their mind or their opinion as a result of reading statistics, studies or reports on this subject; and the shame of it is that far too often we, as individuals, are concerned with justifying our own reasoning when we should be searching for a just reason.

The abolitionists claim that capital punishment is not deterrent to would-be murderers. In my opinion this is an empty argument and completely beside the point. There is no way to determine how many murders were not committed by those who wanted to commit the act but did not for fear of execution. The question should be, does the supreme crime demand the supreme penalty? In effect, do we place the highest possible value on the life of the victim?

The abolitionists say capital punishment has no deterrent effect. There are no facts to prove it one way or the other. But to say that the death penalty is no deterrent is to say that men do not fear death, and I find that to be a rather incredible assertion. Fear of death, in my view, is an instinctive reaction. I ask, how many of us in this chamber do not value or fear for our lives? Life is regarded by man as a precious possession which he wishes to preserve more eagerly than anything else. He would therefore defend it to the utmost against every threat, including the threat of capital execution. Every such threat arouses his fear, and as a rational being he would try to conduct himself in such a manner that that threat would be avoided. It is assumed that the potential threat is made vivid to him by the fact that he knows the death penalty exists. If capital punishment is never carried out, it loses its deterrent effect. There must be a serious and real risk of execution for the death penalty to be an effective tool, because crime will not decrease until being a criminal becomes more dangerous than being a victim.

In my view, fear of death is an instinctive reaction, and to conquer or subdue that fear is a feat some people are not capable of. In wartime, fear of death operates on the battlefield itself. No one who has seen death in its many forms can say, and be believed, that fear of death is not a powerful factor in determining any course of action.

The abolitionists usually state as an argument in favour of abolition that a mistake can be made in carrying out capital punishment. Although this is a valid comment, it is not a valid argument in a debate on capital punishment, because what we are discussing now is what the price should be for an individual who commits premeditated or planned murder. We are not arguing or discussing the merits of our judicial system. If there are errors in that area, they must be safeguarded against; but that statement is not a valid argument in this debate because, as I said, what we have to resolve here is what to do with individuals who have been found guilty of taking another individual's life intentionally.

The very individuals we ask to give us protection deserve protection themselves. If what is known as capital punishment today is done away with, they will have no protection. What will a criminal imprisoned for life have to lose if he kills a prison guard? In reality, he will gain his freedom if his bid for escape succeeds; if it does not, he has lost nothing if capital punishment is done away with, even though he has killed a prison guard.

I believe it is the prime duty of the government to offer its citizens protection against violent crime, and in my view capital punishment is a necessary tool to ensure this protection.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I wish to register a few other comments. There was a debate on capital punishment in my constituency in which I participated. Assisting the stand on retention was an extremely capable man, Tom Forgrave, the city's intergovernmental officer, while Edmonton lawyer, Robert Newton and the Reverend George Rodgers of Sherwood Park United Church supported the abolitionist view. A vote was taken from the audience before the debate began, and again afterwards, and I should like to record it in Hansard. The meeting was sponsored by the Pembina Federal Association Zone Two of the Progressive Conservative party. An audience poll showed 35 in favour of retention, 20 for abolition, and 17 undecided. Two hours later, after the debate, 37 backed the death penalty, 7 were still undecided and 27 favoured abolition.

I should like to pay tribute to the individuals who debated for abolition, Mr. Speaker, for, as the figures show, they gained votes in this debate. It is also noteworthy that in a questionnaire I sent out to the constituency in the fall of 1975, the results showed that 6 per cent of those who returned the questionnaire were in favour of abolition, 20 per cent were in favour of the law as it now stands and 74 per cent were in favour of capital punishment for premeditated murder. A report of the meeting I referred to previously appeared in the Edmonton Journal and referred to Mr. Forgrave's participation as follows:

"My father tells me—Canadian people—are generally right" on social issues, Mr. Forgrave said. That's why there is such massive support for the death penalty at this time.

Mr. Forgrave said capital punishment is "almost always more humane" than capital murder. "Somehow or other there has to be a way of dealing with premeditated murder," especially of policemen and prison guards", he said.

My sentiments are very much the same, Mr. Speaker. When I hear members of this House debating on the side of abolition, I am puzzled to know what makes them think their individual conscience is so much wiser than the collective conscience of their constituents. I think far too many members are trying to hedge their bets by taking both sides of the argument so that they can send something out to their constituents which will make good reading for both points of view.

I have personally found this to be a very trying issue, as I am sure all hon. members have: I must commend my colleague and good friend, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), for making his views known in this debate. I can imagine how trying it must have been for him, and when I compare it with my own experience, I respect him all the more.

Yesterday the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) said that in reality there will not be a free vote in this chamber. I am inclined to agree with him. I have the record of the last three times this matter came before the House and have examined the voting pattern of some members. There is one member, now in the cabinet, who voted for retention in the past. If members opposite are ambitious and wish to gain a place in the cabinet, I suggest they vote for abolition—the possibility of a retentionist gaining admittance into the cabinet is very slim.

It will be of particular interest to see how the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lessard), the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, votes. In the previous three debates he voted for retention each time. Now he is a member of the cabinet. Did he have to sell his soul to receive that position?

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) on a question of privilege.

Mrs. Appolloni: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I object to this kind of debate. The hon. member on the other side is imputing to those of us who are abolitionists a complete loss of integrity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest that the hon. member should stick to Bill C-84.

Mr. Elzinga: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is amazing to see the hon. member rise on a point of order, and interesting to note what she said after my good friend and colleague spoke in this debate. She called him a Pontius Pilate, yet she feels she can object to what I have to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elzinga: What I am trying to get at—and I mean no reflection on any member of this House—is that if we were to have an honest and free vote in this chamber it would have to be, as it was in 1966, upon a motion sponsored by various private members. That is not the case today, because this government wishes to push abolition down the throats of the Canadian people whether they like it or not. In 1966, when the motion was introduced by four private members, Messrs. Byrne, Nugent, Scott and Stanbury, six members of the present cabinet voted for retention. That is the only time they voted for retention. The subsequent votes were on government-sponsored bills and cabinet members felt compelled to vote for it. Is this not a clear indication that this will not be a free vote?

In closing, Mr. Speaker, let me say once again that I feel it is a prime duty of the government to offer the citizens of this country protection against violent crime. In my opinion, capital punishment is a necessary tool to carry out such protection.

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, a member of Parliament does not often have the opportunity to take part in such an emotional and attention-getting debate as the one on Bill C-84.

Is it any wonder, since everyday some media feature the most loathsome and sordid crimes. As a result, many people feel that our society does not know any other law than the law of the jungle and that only stronger action on the part of the government would bring criminals to their senses. No one can deny that our country is going through an unprecedented crime wave. One needs only mention that violent crimes of all kinds have increased by 90 per cent in the past 10 years. As regards the worst of all crimes, murder, its rate has gone from one per 100,000 in 1961 to 2.4 in 1974.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that Canadians are justified in calling for strong government action in order to stop such raving madness. That is precisely what this government intends to do and after close consideration, I cannot but agree with the plan of action they are submitting to Parliament and the Canadian people for this purpose.

Many Canadians think that the retention of capital punishment is essential to public security. I can understand myself their position because sometimes some murders are so revolting as to prompt us to seek a revenge that would probably be as cruel as the murder itself. It is precisely this public indignation at the vileness of some homicides which explains why a large number of Canadians would be in favour of the death penalty, according to public opinion polls. However, I do not think that the legislators' decision in this regard should be influenced by such feelings. Mr. Speaker, in this case it would be too easy for a member of parliament to hide behind the results of public opinion polls in order to evade his responsibilities.

Indeed, his first duty is to see that his constituents are well informed of the intentions of the government and then to explain to them why the government deems advisable to take such action and try to meet their objections. It is only after having exhausted all those means that a member of parliament can really come to the conclusion that his constituents are against the bill.

Shortly after the law and order program was introduced in this House February last, I sent to all residents in my constituency the main lines of Bills C-83 and C-84, urging them to tell me about the changes they favoured. Furthermore, I invited them to public meetings which actually took place in March and April, so that each and everyone could make their views known on the subject. Following those consultations, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the people first want the government to wage an all-out war against crime and they accept that the death penalty be replaced by life imprisonment provided the Parole Board does its work seriously and competently.

Mr. Speaker, nothing illustrates more the will of the government to ensure the security of all the people than the 27 per cent increase this year in the estimates for the federal administration of justice—from $61 million to $78 million. That such a substantial increase should be provided at the very time when the federal government must resort to severe budgetary cut backs is the best proof that law and order is a vital concern of this government.

But is it true to say that peace and security will be more easily protected if we retain capital punishment? Retentionists believe that the death penalty is a deterrent which can bring a potential murderer back to better feelings. It goes without saying that I would unconditionally support the retention of that penalty if it had been shown that the fear of death really deterred murderers from committing their crime. Now, there is no evidence that such is the case.

Mr. Speaker, in 1962, a total of 11 policemen on duty were killed, even though at that time the death penalty was in force and in spite of the fact that during that year two hangings took place in Canada. In 1975, only two policemen we killed on duty although for all practical purposes capital punishment was abolished during the last few years, since the cabinet systematically commuted death sentences into life imprisonment.

And what about the fact that in 1974, Mr. Speaker, the ten American states that abolished the death penalty had a homicide rate of 5.81 per 100,000 population while that of the retentionists states was 8.85? Mr. Speaker, the case is often mentioned of the two criminals who, having kidnapped someone in an American abolitionists state, crossed two other abolitionists states to finally end up by killing their victim in New Hampshire where capital punishment still applied and where in fact they were condemned to death.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, whoever is familiar with the workings and officials in the world of justice and its courts, knows that the individual stands a chance of being found guilty if the possibility of the death penalty is not there to influence the decision of the jury. So, as noticed in Great Britain, after abolition of the death penalty the number of accused found mentally unsound decreased considerably. We must therefore conclude that before abolition juries were more inclined to find a murderer insane and thus spare him the supreme penalty. It would also seem that the existence of capital punishment too often inhibits punishment of the murderer at the hands of the law.

We also know that a large number of Canadian police officers oppose abolition because they feel retention will mean less danger in their work. Quite the contrary, I believe that a murderer will be much less reluctant to kill a policeman attempting to arrest him, if he knows that his earlier murder entails death anyway. In other words, that murderer has nothing to lose, he is facing the same ultimate penalty no matter how many murders he commits.

Mr. Speaker, we must also remember that our system of justice is not above error, that the risk of judicial errors can never be totally eliminated. No one has forgotten the case of Wilbur Coffin who was hanged in 1956, although in the eyes of many his guilt was never clearly established. Similarly, there was the case in Alberta of Raymond Cooke, who was executed in 1960, although his guilt has been seriously questioned since then. For these reasons, it is not sensible in my view to retain such an irreversible punishment, which has never been proved to deter potential murderers anyway.

Abolition is so much the more acceptable that Bill C-84 substitutes punitive measures that should adequately protect society. It does not seem to me that many Canadians believe life imprisonment does not protect society as much as capital punishment. However, many want safeguards, in the fear that the National Parole Board may show unwarranted clemency. Bill C-84 provides that an individual convicted of planned and deliberate murder, or of the killing a police officer or a prison or penitentiary employee is eligible for parole after 25 years' imprisonment.

Under the new legislation, when reviewing parole applications the National Parole Board will be bound to invite to its proceedings two citizens from the area concerned who will be entitled to vote and will be chosen among local policemen, municipal executives or professional or business association members. The board will then be able to rely on sensible advice from people representative of the local community, who are especially concerned about their fellow citizens' security. The contribution of those people, deep-rooted in their community and known for their good judgment, should eliminate to a large extent the errors of judgment too often made by the board and allow the latter to regain the confidence of the population.

Mr. Speaker, the act also provides that an individual condemned to life imprisonment may, after serving 15 years, ask three judges of a superior court to declare him eligible for parole. One can assume that such applications will only be agreed upon in exceptional cases. Be that as it may, the National Parole Board may still deny parole even though the applicant has been declared eligible by the court.

Mr. Speaker, I think the legislation should have provided for parole. Indeed, we should not refuse any hope to the inmate who sincerely wishes to get rehabilitated and whose goodwill is above suspicion. Moreover, such provision should encourage prisoners to behave correctly and this in turn would appreciably reduce the violence which may be directed against prison guards and prison staff in general. One must keep in mind indeed that the proposed legislation provides that any remission will have to be deserved through model behaviour. Thus the prisoner will keep hoping to be released before the end of his sentence if he behaves decently during his imprisonment. In refusing him such a hope, the inmate would have nothing else to loose and could become dangerous for his guards and the prison staff.

Mr. Speaker, one often hears that it would be better to execute murderers rather than keep them at the expense of the taxpayers at an estimated annual cost of $14,000. It should be pointed out, I think, that this is the average cost per prisoner, including the fixed costs of the overall operation of penitentiaries. But, those fixed costs would not be reduced at all if the 13 people now on death row in federal penitentiaries were executed tomorrow morning. In fact, studies have shown that the marginal or additional annual cost incurred for the presence of each of the 13 prisoners in Canadian penitentiaries is about $1,300.

Mr. Speaker, some retentionists like to quote from the Bible to support their position. I would like to remind those people of the message of the Canadian Catholic Conference issued on January 26, 1973, in which Canadian bishops said, and I quote:

> We believe it is an abuse to turn to the Bible—and particularly to the Old Testament—to justify the retention of the death penalty. The Bible where it recommends the death penalty must be analysed in the light of the historical background in which it has been written; it cannot be applied to the letter in Canada today. As a matter of fact, each of the quotations from the Old Testament must be examined in the light of the numerous parts of the New Testament where Jesus Christ condemns this habitual tendency in man to react to an insult by another insult and invites us instead to be magnanimous. Violence and hostility are not offset by measures of violence and hostility.

Furthermore, on March 4, the same group stated in a press release, and I quote:

> The Board of Directors of the Canadian Catholic Conference states that it is in favour of the abolition of capital punishment in Canada and at the same time urges the government to undertake immediately the fair reforms needed in our penitentiary system and in the whole area of justice.

Mr. Speaker, I know that a number of my fellow citizens whose sincerity is beyond doubt are convinced that the well-being of our society requires the retention of capital punishment. I urge them however to consider the arguments put forward by those who do not share their views. I want them to know especially that abolitionists want just as much as them that order prevail in our country, that violence disappear from our streets and our homes. As for me, the dictates of my conscience compel me to support Bill C-84, and I could not do otherwise.

I trust my constituents who might not agree with me on this issue, and I know that they will judge me on my parliamentary work as a whole when I stand for re-election, and not on the position I have taken during one debate, however important it might be.

[English]

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset that I do not welcome participation in this debate. It is a debate which for many of us raises many questions. I recall in 1972, shortly after my election to this House, we were faced with the bill that initiated the second five-year moratorium on capital punishment, with the exception of the killing of police officers and prison guards. I recall the agony a number of us went through at that time. That agony today during this debate does not seem to be any less, especially in view of the fact that the bill now provides for the permanent abolition of the death penalty where before it was for a five-year period only.

I also recall from the 1972 debate the divisiveness that was in the House. Sad to say, I see that divisiveness, that dividing one member from another just underneath the surface in this House at the present time. While I might not agree with many people who feel that Bill C-84 warrants their support, I will respect them for their decision and for the conclusion they have drawn after, I am sure, as much soul searching as I have done.

Possibly I should give a bit of background and the reason why I have come to my conclusion. I find it somewhat difficult to begin to discuss this whole issue in view of the fact that in 1972 many of us voted for another five-year moratorium, thinking at that time the five-year period would in fact be implemented and that the government would observe the provisions of the bill it itself introduced. That has not been the case.

After but a short period of time we are now faced with an abolitionist bill. I can only conclude that in 1972 the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) was biding time in a minority House. The first five-year moratorium had ended. Knowing that complete abolition would not carry at that time, he brought in another five-year moratorium hoping that would carry in a minority House, The government, having gained a majority, we now have before us a bill to abolish capital punishment.

Looking at my participation in 1972, and again today, and also at the comments the Solicitor General made at that time, I can come to no other conclusion than that was the best he could get in 1972. He did not have any intention of finding out whether during that second five-year period capital punishment was a deterrent or not. We will now never know because since 1962 the government has chosen to commute all death sentences.

One can only conclude that the Solicitor General, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), knowing that by the end of 1977 the second five-year moratorium would have ended and, faced with a possible general election in 1978, did not want this issue bouncing around at that time. While that might sound somewhat cynical, there may be a fair bit of truth in that statement.

There is another reason why I am somewhat cynical. We have before us the so-called peace and security package, Bills C-83 and C-84. The Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice both stated that the provisions of Bill C-83, the gun control legislation, will not reduce the incidence of crime in Canada. However, they persist in combining Bill C-83 and Bill C-84, stating that once those two bills are passed there will be peace and security on Canada's streets, and the incidence of crime, especially violent crime, will diminish. Again taking the words of the Solicitor General, that is absolutely false. He himself has said on many occasions that Bill C-83 will not affect the operations of the criminal element, so there is justification for the feelings now prevailing that the government has failed to protect society adequately. Many law-abiding citizens believe more attention is given to the person who commits a crime than to the person who suffers as a result of it.

The point which is to be made is that all of us would like to live in a society where punishment is not necessary but we just do not happen to be fortunate to live in a society of that kind. I agree that no one can prove conclusively, by using statistics, that capital punishment is a deterrent to murder. Nor for that matter can the abolitionists prove that the peace and security bills, C-83 and C-84, will act as a deterrent, though on one hand they claim that the arguments of the retentionists, who say capital punishment is a deterrent, are not valid, but on the other they claim that the longer prison sentences will be.

Up to the present the government has seen fit to commute every death sentence despite the legislation brought in by the Solicitor General in 1972 which provided for the death penalty in certain cases. What we have no means of knowing is the number of murders which would have been prevented had the death penalty been exercised. Criminals knew, and they know today, that if they are given the death sentence it will automatically be commuted. They know that in effect abolition does prevail at the present time.

One thing is crystal clear. We have seen the murder rate double over the last ten years—I am talking in terms of the rate per 100,000 of population. We know for sure that the suspension of the death penalty and its replacement by the use of the prison system has not been an effective deterrent. We know it has not reduced the incidence of murder; in fact there has been a doubling of the murder rate. As a result there is a restive mood in society; citizens feel the law has been too lax and are calling for the return of the death penalty.

Much has been said in this debate about opinion polls. I find it interesting to hear it argued that members of this House should not be influenced by the results of polls on capital punishment. Yet every four years or so we go out on the hustings to engage in what amounts to a general poll across Canada and to ask for continued support. That poll, Mr. Speaker, is a conclusive one because whoever gets most votes is able to sit in this House and represent the people. I hear the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) mention the name of my right hon. friend from Prince Albert. I am quite sure he can speak for himself and will do so at the appropriate time.

I may say that I conducted a poll in my own riding on this question. I am not a scientific pollster but when I get a return in which 90.3 per cent are in favour of the death penalty in the case of premeditated murder I draw the conclusion that a large majority of the people in my constituency are not happy about the way in which the cabinet is commuting death sentences passed on people who have killed prison guards and police officers.

The opposition likes to portray those of us who are retentionists as being bloodthirsty, as being unsophisticated or as being less educated than others in society. I do not know how this reflects on the opinion of the electorate if the electorate is also in favour of capital punishment. No, Mr. Speaker, I believe retentionists have the same sense of responsibility as the abolitionists claim for themselves alone.

What about the length of the prison term proposed in the legislation? The bill before us would replace the death penalty with a fixed term of 25 years for first degree murder—there are provisions for parole which I shall not go into at this moment. The penalty for second degree murder is 15 years imprisonment. The question which immediately occurs to me is this: is a fixed minimum sentence less barbaric than the death sentence? What happens to a person who is placed in prison for 25 years?

We know that the rate of recidivism increases with the length of time a person is in prison. I thought I should go to an authority on this aspect so I turned to an authority the Solicitor General likes to quote—I call him the high priest of the movement in favour of abolition of capital punishment. My authority is Dr. Fattah, and I understand he did a fair amount of research for the minister before coming to the conclusion that capital punishment was not a deterrent. In an article contributed to a weekly publication put out by Simon Fraser University on March 11, he wrote:

> On February 24, 1976, the Liberal government tabled one of the most retrogressive pieces of the legislation ever presented in the House of Commons—the so-called peace and security program. Abolition of capital punishment is in itself a very commendable move, a move long overdue, but substituting a mandatory life sentence with a minimum of 25 years imprisonment is, to say the least, illogical, irrational, inhuman, arbitrary and unscientific.
> A minimum of 25 years creates a distinct category of men without hope and a man without hope is capable of doing anything and everything to draw attention to his cause and to his condition, as has been amply demonstrated in two recent incidents in the B.C. Penitentiary at New Westminster.

● (1520)

On the last page there is this paragraph:

> I still remember back in January, 1973, when Marcel Prud'homme, MP for Montreal St. Denis and James Fleming, MP for York West, suggested that the government bill be amended to imprison killers for a minimum of 25 years. Solicitor General Warren Allmand and other members of the cabinet were the first to declare their opposition. It is disconcerting and disenchanting to see the government, after only three years, adopt the same retrogressive suggestion it once condemned.

[Mr. Epp.]

Abolitionists often say that those of us who are retentionists are swayed by opinion polls. Yet the very man who presented the background papers to the Solicitor General's peace and security package calls the bill irrational, inhumane, and uses various other appropriate expressions.

The United Church of Canada, which has taken an abolitionist stand—and I respect them for it—in a letter dated May 18, 1976, a copy of which I received on May 28, wrote to the Solicitor General and stated that the mandatory sentences were not acceptable to them. I should like to quote Nos. 5 and 13 of their reasons:

> 5. What happens to the inmate when he gets out of prison after serving 25 years? Most sociological data in this regard would say that the person would be more dangerous coming out than going in.
> 13. In your publication entitled "Highlights of the Peace and Security legislation", in the introduction on page one is the following statement: "In a society that places such a high value on the dignity of the individual the use of the death penalty must be viewed as an unacceptable and essentially purposeless form of punishment". It is our view that the proposed legislation does nothing to uplift the dignity of such individuals. We seem to be substituting one indignity for another.

The last point to be made on that sentence is that if a person who is convicted of first degree murder is placed in prison for 25 years with minimal hope, we are asking our fellow citizens, those who serve as prison guards, and other personnel in our prisons, to take care of this person. We are asking them in the course of duty to put their lives on the line, so to speak, every day because a person without hope, as it has been expressed by the various people I have quoted, is liable to engage in further killing. We are really asking prison guards to give a service well beyond that which I think should be expected of them.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, the United Church letter goes on to refer to the prison system and the negative effects that they see resulting therefrom. Let me quote reasons 4 and 12 in their letter:

> 4. There will be an increase in prison population and therefore increased human pressures as well as increased cost.
> 12. This will of course lead to far greater institutionalization of human beings who would be unable to function without the institution.

Putting those arguments aside, Mr. Speaker, the main reason that I am a retentionist is that I take a moral or theological position. In entering that argument I am not trying to say for one moment that those people who are not abolitionists do not take a moral position on which to base their argument. Neither am I saying that in their conscience they have not looked at the theological question in coming to a decision different from mine. In fact one of the best pieces of work that I have seen on this very dilemma is by Rabbi Plant of the Holy Blossom Synagogue in Toronto who, being an abolitionist, after looking at both the abolitionist and retentionist arguments, concludes that the one thing we must remember is that we come to our conclusions honestly and sincerely, and that a luxury we cannot afford is to try to say, "I am right and you are wrong".

One issue should be clarified immediately, Mr. Speaker. I do not like to get personal in this House but I feel that to a point I have to because of my background. The conclusion has been automatically drawn that I am an abolitionist. I imagine that this has given rise to certain press releases by the Canadian Council of Churches, some of which I should like to refer to briefly this afternoon. In a press release dated January 16, 1975, a little better than a year ago, the Canadian Council of Churches stated that the Mennonite Church had taken a position on capital punishment, namely, an abolitionist position. I wrote to the Canadian Council of Churches on February 6, 1975, in response to that press release and I should like to read in part the letter I wrote to them:

> While the Anabaptist view generally opposed capital punishment, most churches adhering to the concept of Anabaptist faith and, specifically, Mennonite doctrine, have not officially endorsed abolition of capital punishment. Particularly the denomination that I am a member of is divided on this issue and has not been able to formulate a policy which has widespread acceptance in our Brotherhood. Therefore, I would suggest to you that you correct the press release that you have issued with the hope that a wrong impression will not be created by the material that you have published.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I did not receive a reply to my letter. In an almost identical press release a little more than a year later, on March 2, 1976, the Canadian Council of Churches stated that certain bodies had spoken in favour of abolition of capital punishment, and they listed among them the Mennonite Church. I know this press release went to all members of parliament, obviously to create the impression among members of parliament that a number of churches, among them the Mennonite Church, were in favour of the abolition of capital punishment.

In response to that press release I wrote to the Canadian Council of Churches on March 10, 1976, and in part I said:

> Further, in my letter of February 6, 1975, I stated that I found in view of the fact that your press release was incorrect that it would be in your interest to correct the false impression that you had created through the press release. Unfortunately, I have not received a reply to my letter of February 6, 1975.
> In your letter of March 2, 1976, you again stated that the Mennonite Church has spoken in favour of abolition of capital punishment—no such thing has happened. Again I repeat that the General Conference of Mennonites which is but one denomination among a number of Mennonite circles has passed a resolution opposing capital punishment. While the debate on capital punishment is taking place in most Mennonite Churches as I am sure it is being carried on in other Churches, I would like to point out that your letter of March 2 is wrong and in fact needs correction. I know that the letter has caused wrong impressions among members who have come to me and inquired as to the position the Mennonite Church took in its stand against abolition of capital punishment.

On April 23 I received a letter from Reverend R. J. Scott, who is the secretary to the task force on the abolition of capital punishment for the Canadian Council of Churches. He wrote in part, after first stating that he had not received my letter:

> Our reference to the Mennonite Church may have been inaccurate in view of your reference to the different independent sections of the Mennonite Church. We included the name in our list as we had a representative on our Committee from the Mennonite Central Committee, Kitchener, Ontario. We were not aware of other groupings.

So the wrong impression has been created.

In his speech on May 19, 1976, as reported at page 13681 of Hansard, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) used the argument that among other churches the Mennonite has also spoken out in favour of the abolition of capital punishment. But he made what I imagine was an innocent mistake, because although there are a number of denominations in our background he used the following words:

● (1530)

> I think of a wonderful statement by the Mennonite Brethren—

He continued:

> —who are convinced abolitionists and who, at the risk of worrying those who profess to be followers, make clear and unequivocal statements in favour of abolition.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I happen to be a member of the denomination about which the hon. member speaks. He was confused in that our denomination never passed a resolution. We are debating that resolution now, so, unhappily the wrong impression has been created by the press releases which have been brought before the public by the Canadian Council of Churches.

As I say, I do not question the abolitionist stand that such a person has an honest conscience. However, I think it should be very clearly pointed out for the record that what some people take to be facts are in fact not facts at all. The main issue for me, and I imagine for many other members of this House, is a moral one. All of us have already heard the quotation from Genesis 9:6. The quotation "thou shalt not kill" raises the question: are we justified in taking a human life? Are we justified in taking the life of another human being in judgment for the crime he or she may have committed?

Quite frankly I cannot accept the humanistic view of society which seems to argue that man from his own position, from his own innate goodness, can inject a will to do good. I cannot accept that. We are agents of a free will; but the very fact that we are debating this subject today gives mute evidence to the fact that man is exceedingly wicked and that man does not stop at anything in respect of raising his hand against his brother. I do not think any of us should be so smug or complacent that we feel we are exempt from that possibility.

It is true that in our present society there are many countervailing forces which, to my mind, debase society. I need only mention the violence on television. This is a medium which affects virtually every Canadian. Day after day violence is pumped into the homes of Canadians to the point where it seems almost to take on real life at tributes for many Canadians. We have seen a tremendous increase in pornographic material of various kinds. I submit all this diminishes the moral fabric of society.

I do not wish to sound as being holier than thou, but I think it is important to place before this House and the people of Canada the suggestion that if society is to survive it will survive only if it accepts a moral basis for its existence. While I realize that as a legislator one cannot legislate morality, I do not accept the argument that one cannot show moral leadership. In fact I believe it is our responsibility, so I reject the so-called permissive or humanistic society in which every man is allowed to do his own thing, the only qualification being so long as it does not hurt someone else, because then it is no business of yours or mine. The fact that we are brothers precludes a situation in which the actions I take would not in some form or another affect if not the major society of which I am a member, the closest society in which I am intimately involved.

Many social engineers today seem to think that by behavioural changes, in one form or another, society will almost attain a Utopian quality. That just is not the case. I realize that in the Old Testament many crimes are mentioned for which capital punishment was prescribed, and therefore the argument is made that if that be the case in respect of the Old Testament why should it not be prescribed for present society if we are to use Biblical quotations. I have also heard the argument of people who say that because of the New Testament we do not now live under the law, that we now live in a period of grace. That is true. They argue that because it is a fact we live in a period of grace the death penalty no longer is necessary, because we are creatures who have a high regard for human life. But, Mr. Speaker, although the God is a God of grace and love he did not lose the attributes of justice or holiness. He retained those attributes. Today the state is God's agent in making sure that people in today's society can in fact live out their lives in peace and harmony, so the state has a responsibility well beyond that of the individual.

It is not right for me as an individual to ask for retribution, an eye for an eye or a tooth for a tooth, but the state has another role because we must keep in mind that setting the brakes on law drags down everyone in society. In fact in the Old Testament there are references to the fact that crime pollutes the land. Judgment and punishment are not retributive. Punishment must follow actions in which God's laws are broken. We hear so much, for example, of Romans Chapter XII in which the Apostle Paul speaks of the God of Love, the God who is willing to bless his people, the God of forgiveness; but so often we do not read on to the early verses of Chapter XIII in which the same apostle writes:

> Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers—

> it is there by God's appointment. So those who refuse to obey the laws of the land are refusing to obey God, and punishment will follow. For civil authorities do not frighten those who are doing right, but those who are doing wrong. The government is the agent of God for your good. But if you do evil, you should be afraid. For the civil authority does not bear and wear the sword for nothing. It is God's agent to execute his punishment and vengeance on the wrongdoer.

I know reference has been made in the House to the crucifixion story. As we recall, there were two malefactors who were crucified with Christ, one rejected the salvation, the other one did not. But what is significant is that Christ did not offer physical salvation from pain of death but today he offers spiritual salvation. So while I would like to live in a society where punishment is not necessary, where reconciliation of man and his God can take place, that is not the society in which I live. I must finally come to the conclusion that the state is an agent of God, responsible to him to see that justice is carried out and that those who obey the laws of the country are in fact protected. It is on that basis that I cannot support Bill C-84.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, this is the second occasion since 1972 that I participate in a debate on capital punishment. I would like to say at the outset that I am a retentionist. I believed in capital punishment before I came to Ottawa, I spoke in favour of it in the 1972 and 1974 election campaigns, and my position has not changed.

[Mr. Epp.]

Despite the fact that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) says that capital punishment is not a deterrent, I firmly believe it is. The Solicitor General referred to various statistics and suggested that they are conclusively in favour of the fact that capital punishment is not a deterrent. I have examined these statistics and I suggest they can be used either way. If you an abolitionist you can use the statistics to support your argument, and if you are a retentionist you can use them for the same purpose.

The Solicitor General in the debate on this subject on May 3, as recorded at page 13089 of Hansard, said the following:

> The burden of proof is on those who propose retention of the death penalty. They must show that retention does some good in society and has positive effect. Furthermore, I do not think retentionists can logically or ethically discharge that burden of truth.

I find that statement rather illogical. Why should the burden of proof be on the retentionist and not on the abolitionist? What the minister is saying is simply that he is right and the rest of us are wrong, and he will be right unless we can prove that he is wrong.

In March of 1975 the Solicitor General sent out a document entitled, "The Prevention and Control of Violent Crime in Canada: Some Comments on Violent Crime, Capital Punishment and Other Related Issues". At page 5 of this document we find the following statement:

> One or more of the following factors are usually present:—

He is referring to murder.

> —quarrels or a history of quarrels between friends and family members; situations where alcohol or drugs are present; situations where immediate access to firearms exists, situations where the eventual offender feels threatened by others present in the situation, and cases of mental or emotional instability and derangement. Given the sudden, unplanned nature of most homicide it appears unlikely that most individuals who commit murder take into account the existence or non-existence of capital punishment before carrying out the act.

The Solicitor General is not really being fair when he makes that statement because the type of killings he refers to in this paper do not and never have called for capital punishment. Generally speaking they have called for life imprisonment or imprisonment for a period of time. These killings to which he refers are not premeditated murders, and I believe that 80 per cent to 90 per cent of the public according to the polls, and some 87 per cent of the people in my constituency believe in capital punishment for premeditated murder. They are not calling for capital punishment in situations such as were described by the Solicitor General.

I believe that in instances of planned murder, in cases of contract murder, and in cases of killings during the commission of a crime, capital punishment is a deterrent because in these particular situations the individual is fully aware ahead of time what he is doing. If he goes into a bank to rob it and takes a gun with him, he knows perfectly well that the circumstances may be such that he will use that gun. What I am suggesting is that if the individual is aware of the fact that because of his action he might have to face capital punishment, that is certainly a deterrent.

To some people capital punishment is abhorrent. I listened the other day to a member on the other side of the House when he described a hanging in some detail, suggesting it was cruel, bloodthirsty, and revengeful. But he did not look at the other side of the coin; he did not consider the terror experienced by the victim, nor did he consider the heartbreak and the effect of a killing on the victim's family. I suggest to that particular member that he talk to members of a family who have lost someone in a killing, as I have. He would have second thoughts, I am certain. If his argument is simply that he is opposed to the particular method of capital punishment, hanging, I would suggest that this is not a valid argument for an abolitionist. The answer is that that particular individual should press for changes in the law which will provide for a different method of execution, for example, the injection of a drug or the giving of some particular type of poison by putting it in the guilty person's food.

● (1550)

In the same report put out by the Solicitor General in March, 1975, to which I already referred, the minister had this to say:

The commandment, "Thou shalt not kill" is part of our Judaeo-Christian heritage. It emphasizes the value of human life and should make us ponder whether we should take yet another life in retribution.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), who preceded me, discussed the religious aspect in some detail. Over the past four years I have received a great deal of correspondence on the subject of capital punishment, and much of this correspondence has come to me from religious organizations, the Council of Churches, and individuals who have religious backgrounds who have made studies of the Bible. It is very interesting to note that the theologians themselves are divided on the interpretation of the Bible as it refers to capital punishment. It is interesting to note that both sides make use of quotations from the Bible to support their argument for or against, but a few days ago I was interested to receive in the mail a bit of correspondence which indicated to me that the American Revised Standard Version of the Bible in translating from the original, rather than saying "thou shalt not kill" says "thou shalt not murder." In other words there is a distinction between the act of killing and the act of murder.

A short time ago I had occasion to read an article in one of the Toronto newspapers written by a rabbi of the Jewish faith. It was referred to by the hon. member for Provencher, and I was impressed by that article. It went into some detail and gave arguments both pro and con. In summing it up the rabbi said that he himself believed in the abolition of capital punishment, but I found the final sentence in the article very interesting because he concluded by saying, "Who is to say that I am right and you are wrong?"

Finally, I say this to the abolitionists: because one is a retentionist does not mean that he is cruel, coldblooded, hardhearted or has utter and complete disregard for human life. I suggest that it is much easier to be an abolitionist than it is to be a retentionist because, if capital punishment is retained, when an execution does take place each of us who has voted in favour of retaining capital punishment must bear part of the responsibility for the carrying out of that execution.

May I call it four o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it four o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTIONS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Am I to understand that there has been some agreement to stand motions Nos. 2, 15, 19, 20, 4 and 9 and proceed with the consideration of motion No. 47 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it also agreed by unanimous consent that all other motions stand in their place on the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: At the request of the government.

EDUCATION

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL OFFICE OF EDUCATION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing a national office of education for the purpose of (a) collating and disseminating education research and information throughout Canada (b) arranging inter-provincial and territorial exchanges of teacher-personnel and/or students (c) providing a focus for Canada's contribution to the improvement of educational opportunities in other countries (d) providing the agency through which educational concerns, affecting the Canadian people, may be brought to the attention of the Council of Provincial Ministers of Education.

He said: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sorry, but I just want clarification as to whether there is a difference between notice of motion No. 45 and notice of motion No. 47. I understood it was to be No. 45, and I just want clarification from the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) in that regard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Well, as far as I am concerned, it is too late. I have put the question, with consent, on motion No. 47.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is No. 47.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No papers reached the Chair and, unless there is some agreement, we will proceed with this debate. The motion before the House at this time could be withdrawn only by unanimous consent, and then the other motion could be put. Whatever change we want to make at this time would have to be made by unanimous consent, so I will call upon the hon. member for Nickel Belt for his point of view on the remarks of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay).

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I understand it is to be motion No. 47 which stands in my name, a motion to establish a national office of education, and I am prepared to debate that motion this afternoon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Besides, motion No. 45 stands in the name of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), and it has already been debated. However, the hon. member not being in the House, we will have to proceed with the motion as suggested unless there is agreement otherwise, so the motion having been put to the House I am calling upon the hon. member for Nickel Belt to make his presentation.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, the motion which I am prepared to debate this afternoon calls for the government to consider the establishment of a national office of education. Maybe I should first explain the aspects of the current situation in education that led me to consider the need for a national office.

When I was first elected to this House in 1973 I introduced this motion, and again in 1974 when I was re-elected. Having come from a background of education I felt there was need for such an office. As you know, Mr. Speaker, education is primarily a provincial matter, but several federal departments are involved in educational schemes. The Department of the Secretary of State funds much of the post-secondary education in Canada. All government concerns are facing a strong financial squeeze at precisely the same time that we have reached a watershed period in education. At the same time that governments are cutting education budgets there is a questioning among educators, students, and parents about where education should go. There is no national focus on this question nor has a national defender come out in defence of education budgets.

We have just finished a major expansion of post-secondary education to the point that we now have over 600,000 students in colleges and universities. Secondary school enrollments have expanded to include a greater proportion of the age group and a far greater total population as the baby boom passed through the system; vocational education has mushroomed.

The system will have fewer students after the baby boom and there may have to be cutbacks. Meantime there is a widespread questioning of educational goals in Canada ranging from those who want to see the return of the three Rs to those who still want to implement the free spirit of the individual and creativity of the Hall-Denis report in Ontario as set out in "Living and Learning".

Recently several perennial problems have occurred that still must be faced and solved. Regional barriers to good education still exist; economic barriers abound, and equity demands that these be removed.

When I began teaching in 1957 the community I was in experienced great mobility. I was amazed to learn that when students came from the east coast, for instance, to Ontario their grade VI was not evaluated in the same light in Ontario. The reason given was that their curricula were not the same as those of Ontario. Teacher training was not co-ordinated and teachers coming into Ontario were not accepted on par with Ontario-graduated teachers.

Mr. Paproski: And vice-versa.

Mr. Rodriguez: Exactly. Out of all these considerations came a judgment that a national office is necessary to focus attention on this national issue and to provide co-ordination and information to a national debate on these issues.

I should like to explain some of the details of the motion before the House this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. One might ask why the federal government should get involved. I have already said that this is a national issue. To those who say that the federal government has no jurisdiction or interest I would point out that the federal government is already involved in several ways through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Department of the Secretary of State, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the Department of National Defence, the Department of External Affairs, CIDA, the National Museums, the National Library and Public Archives, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of the Solicitor General, and the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Let us not kid ourselves that we are not already into it up to our necks.

We hide behind the facade that the federal government has no place in education, but we are certainly involved in terms of finance, training programs, and upgrading programs.

The recent OECD report on Canadian education estimated that over 20 per cent of all expenditures on education come from the federal government. I am not arguing that we should immediately get into it more deeply, but primarily that we should establish a national office to allow the provinces, the educators, and ourselves to make more co-ordinated decisions about the future education of our children. If we do not have this co-ordination on a national level the education questions of direction and budget will be decided willy-nilly in over ten different bureaucracies across the country.

Incredible as it seems to non-Canadians who visit Canada, we do not have a national office to administer even the minimal dissemination and collation of research into education. The result is often a tragic ignorance in one province about what goes on next door. The result is also major knowledge gaps for planners. What is the demand for adult training going to be in ten years so that we can plan for it? No one has the answer. What is the critical age at which economic disparity will lead to decisions to curtail education in a student's mind? We do not know. But we do know that in poor working class areas the number of high schools per capita is much lower than in affluent areas, and that the proportion of age groups in school varies greatly. What are the implications for vocational schools if more students attend regular high schools? What are the job training needs that we must anticipate for 15 years from now?

Without national co-ordination of the effort to collect and disseminate basic information, decisions will continue to be made in ignorance of future trends and possible solutions that are being tried in other parts of the country.

Similarly I have recommended in this motion that the national office arrange for staff and students to travel to other parts of the country to learn first-hand about the practices outside their own areas.

The third function of the national education office would be to focus the contribution we make towards improving educational opportunities in the Third World. At present we have students applying from these countries to universities and colleges in every province, facing a variety of different educational requirements and offerings. At the same time our federal agencies work with the countries concerned to assist them in improving the level of education of their students and, ultimately, their society. The provinces take no part in this nor do they assist the federal government in determining which programs are more suitable, or in providing financing for those students. So we have the recent situation where Ontario announced an increase of fees for students on visas at the same time that the federal government is trying to increase the number of students from abroad for training in our universities.

Finally, the education office could act as a channel for bringing educational issues to the attention of the Council of Ministers of Education of the provinces. I have said earlier that I believe that the discussion of the educational goals for our country is essential, that it is of immediate concern, and that it must be done nationally to be most effective and equitable. It is my hope that by bringing the issues to the ministers they would be encouraged to discuss them more seriously and more frequently than they have up to the present.

It seems to me, for example, there is a need to set some kind of national goals for education. One major example is the whole question of bilingualism. Recently we had the Director of Official Languages, Mr. Keith Spicer, telling us that we should have started with the schools. Mr. Speaker, that is one very obvious area. Parliament having adopted a national policy of bilingualism, it seemed to me and many Canadians that the best place to have began implementing that program was in the school system. If bilingualism is to be a national goal, a federal office of education ought to provide national direction. One of the great short-comings of the present program lies in the lack of such direction. The lack of national direction has hampered considerably our efforts with respect to bilingualism.

It seems to me that if we bring this issue to the attention of the ministers of education, through a national office of education, we could encourage more frequent and wide-ranging discussions of the subject; hopefully, provinces could co-ordinate their actions. Hopefully our aims in education could be co-ordinated and provincial hopes fulfilled. Without a national office to co-ordinate the collection of such information and to arrange that the appropriate material is circulated to those who need it, I believe decisions will continue to be made in isolation from these national goals.

Notice, Mr. Speaker, that my proposal calls for co-ordinating and encouraging the dissemination of educational information. You will notice that it would provide the national education office with no real powers apart from the ones I suggested. In truth I should like to see a stronger office. This will not be possible unless the provinces wish to strengthen their role in the field. I see the establishment of this national office as a first small step. Establishing this office would establish a body which can ensure that discussion proceeds on the basis of proper information. The office could act as a catalyst to stimulate discussion. It would go no further without the willing co-operation of the provinces, and could not go much further owing to the limited jurisdiction of the federal government in this field.

As I say, I see the establishment of such an office as a first step. Hopefully we could proceed beyond that stage in terms of a national educational policy. Some, I know, feel that the establishment of this body would be beyond the scope of section 93 of the British North America Act, but such people ignore the major role the federal government already plays in the field. Its activities go far beyond the degree of involvement proposed in the motion before the House. I therefore suggest that any who say the federal government should not set up a national educational office are hiding behind what I call the flim-flammery of the constitution, particularly section 93.

My view that the constitution is not a block to the setting up of a national education office or policy in the field of federal action is supported by the constitutional authority, Mr. J. A. Corry. He has stated:

> ... so whatever the dilemma about education in the Canadian federation is, it is not a constitutional one. Indeed s.93 becomes a model of flexibility. Whenever it becomes clear that special educational provision is needed to carry out responsibilities undertaken by parliament in the exercise of its exclusive powers in section 91, parliament is entitled to manage that provision by whatever means and instrumentalities are required in the circumstances. As so often turns out in this country, obstacles to action that are declared to be formidable constitutional barriers turn out to be merely political.

Our children and their education are too important to be played with politically. Until we treat education as a national priority and work with the provinces to eliminate national disparities, economic barriers to educational advancement, poor distribution of resources, ignorance of new advances, and fear and confusion in the discussion of educational goals there will be no solution of the problem. Not until we stop treating education as a tool of an economic stabilization policy will it be given the high priority it deserves in our cultural and social priorities. I hope that the formation of a national office will allow the provinces and federal government to do something they have never done before in the absence of a national focus on these issues, think in terms wider rather than narrow jurisdictions about the real educational issues which face us now and will face us in the future.

Finally, I hope the next time an international team of experts evaluates our education they will not be able to say, as was said in a recent OECD report, that:

> Canada has trodden down its own path with an array of exceptionally active programs for quantitative expansion and significant qualitative change of education systems that are however derived from no explicitly stated over-all national conception of the country's interests ... The general tone of (provincial) policy-making appears to be adaptations to short-term pressures doing a little more than what already has been done and above all pressing for economies and reductions of expenditures.

I hope government members will not talk out this motion but accept what it represents, the initial, official federal thrust in this area, a thrust which will be given recognition by the establishment of the particular office alluded to in the motion.

I do not make my comments in isolation. The Canadian Teachers Federation, which represents a federated body of teachers right across this country, since 1971 has consistently recommended to the federal government the establishment of an office along the lines outlined in the motion now before the House, Indeed not only the Canadian Teachers Federation supports such an office; the Canadian Trustees Association, an association of school trustees of this country, has also urged the government to move in this direction.

Surely, if we concede that in a democracy the people ought to have some say in these matters, if we concede that there ought to be some dialogue, then the group which is elected to represent the best interests of education in the country ought to carry some weight with the government. Surely their attitude ought to indicate to the government their willingness to work actively within the kind of framework suggested this afternoon.

As I say, I hope hon. members opposite will not talk out this motion but, instead, accept its concept and let it come to a vote. Let us set about the business of establishing national goals in education in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentioned that the Canadian Teachers Federation as well as the Canadian School Trustees recommended setting up such an agency. Does this include the CEQ and the Quebec School Board Federation?

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: No, Mr. Speaker. CTF does not include CEQ for reasons best determined by its members. When I speak about CTF and the Canadian Trustees Association I am referring to all teachers and trustees in Canada except those in Quebec. Who have freely chosen to remain outside these national bodies.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to speak on the motion proposed by the hon. member on my extreme left. I was once a member of the Canadian Teachers Federation. In my relatively early youth I became a member of the Canadian Trustees Association. Now, of course, I am in that most omniscient of all groups, the parents of the products of our educational institutions.

The hon. member is to be commended for bringing forward a suggestion that is reasonable, reasoned, and timely. If I may say so, I think he was wise to discuss a national office rather than a national department. As he points out, to suggest the establishment of a national department might involve too direct an attack on well-established constitutional principles and patterns. I believe that much can be gained if there is a more informed, active, and uplifting role on the part of the national level of government in the important field of education.

The strengthening of national ideals and national purpose surely involves the educational process most heavily. The one level of government whose goals are national, not regional, not provincial, and not local, surely must be and is indeed the national government.

It is clear that much has happened since those years when we assumed from the provisions of the British North America Act that education was solely and purely a responsibility and function of the provincial jurisdiction. Federal presence has been felt in many, many ways in education, and nearly always in beneficial ways.

I believe that the university grants established, if I remember right, under the Prime Ministership of Mr. St. Laurent were one of the most forward steps ever taken by a national government. Who can say how many universities and how many thousands of university students were enabled to obtain a better life through that move, which was regarded by some of that time as an improper invasion of provincial jurisdiction? I am convinced that nothing but good came from that initiative.

If we look at the matter carefully we see that the federal presence, the federal fiscal presence in particular, is omnipresent. How many of our scholars depend upon assistance which emanates from Ottawa? How much research is encouraged from Ottawa? Indeed it is our claim that there has been a diminution in the national contribution to this important field.

I agree profoundly with the hon. member when he directed our attention to the role of our young people in the international scene and vice-versa. It is a matter of most profound concern that Canada and its educational institutions should be open to the young people of the world. We should encourage young people from different cultures to come and participate with our young people in the learning process. I suppose one of the most worthwhile endeavours in the last generation is the activity of the CUSO program—excellent ambassadors of this country, a world contribution to what one might call the Canadian outreach abroad.

I agree too with a view that is now becoming acceptable; that in the whole question of language training we must begin at the elementary school. There were many who thought that the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages was breaking new ground in his recent report. However, it was a quarter of a century ago that one of the greatest Canadians, Dr. Wilder Penfield, with his great learning and scientific and medical background, suggested exactly the same thing. Therefore this aspect of the hon. member's argument commends itself to me most strongly.

I think that it would be better to have an even stronger presence than he suggests, but I am pragmatic on this which shows that both Conservatives and socialists can be pragmatic if they put their minds to it. If they want to accomplish things, it is just as well that they both do.

I am never given to long speeches. I think that brevity is the soul of wit, as a great man once said. I will simply say that this is a positive contribution. It is the kind of subject that our national parliament, on a sunny Friday afternoon, should be directing its thought and attention to. I commend the hon. member for his initiative and the well reasoned presentation with which he brought it forward.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has done a service by raising for discussion the matter of the federal presence in education.

I am not sure that the national office of education which the hon. member proposes would, in fact, do anything which is not now being done by the education support branch of the Secretary of State. I also think that the establishment of such an office might be perceived by the provinces as a direct assumption of their responsibilities as opposed to the collaborative sharing of responsibilities that now occurs in the field of education.

I think that the discussion of federal-provincial roles in education is very timely, particularly in view of the fact that the Fiscal Arrangements Act is due for review and that letters from the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) to the ten provincial ministers of education were tabled in this House yesterday. I hope, therefore, that today's discussion will be useful in this broad consideration of the federal role in education.

The Secretary of State, in a speech in Toronto in March, 1974, said:

> One of the dangers of the current attention being focused on federal-provincial relations is that it makes for such sensational copy. As so often happens, the debate that rages around some initial question eventually comes to obscure that question altogether. Our attention is turned from what we are fighting for (if that is not too belligerent a term) to the fighting itself, and we as a nation can ill-afford to pay the social and political costs which such recklessness must surely entail.

The motion before us today allows us an opportunity to consider in a dispassionate way some of the arguments for or against direct federal involvement in education; the non-partisan atmosphere of private member's hour may assist us in assessing alternatives and trying to arrive at solutions on the ground of what Aristotle called "reason free from passion".

In the history of federal-provincial relations, education has been a central concern for a long time. The British North America Act of 1867 defined legislative jurisdiction over education "in and for each province" as exclusively a provincial matter. But the Fathers of Confederation could not anticipate the changes in education—both adult and childhood education, part-time and full-time—needed to deal with technological and other changes in the last century.

What the Fathers of Confederation did realize, however, was that the unity of our nation might not infrequently be subject to stresses and strains, that there was need for vigilance if the federation were to survive, and that the primary responsibility of the federal government was to protect the interest of the nation. In order to respond adequately to the needs of all Canadians the federal and provincial governments developed a continuing working relationship out of which came a series of formal or tacit agreements to deal with specific areas.

It has been said that federation is the most difficult and inefficient of all forms of government, that every time attempts are made to reach agreements our national strength of purpose is tested more or less severely. However, in our great nation there are very great regional differences and, while the effort to reconcile differences is often difficult, it is also true that as a nation we have learned a good deal about reconciling differences and working together in ways that use our collective energies most productively. The task of establishing in Canada an education system which will enable Canadians to respond creatively to the demands of the present and of the future is a task which calls for the fullest and most effective use of those energies.

Although the terms of the BNA Act of 1867 defined education as a provincial responsibility, direct federal support came quickly, beginning in 1874 with the creation of the Royal Military College. The Agricultural Instruction Act of 1913 similarly applied federal moneys to specific educational purposes. During World War I the federal government of the time recognized that a national research effort would be essential for post-war development of Canadian industry and the growth of the national economy and in 1916 the National Research Council was created, although it was not until the 1930's that the National Research Council set up its own laboratories and began its extensive program of research grants to universities.

With the reduction in provincial expenditures in education during the depression years, universities turned to the federal government with requests for direct financial assistance. The difficulties of the universities elicited in 1940 a sympathetic response from the Rowell-Sirois Commission on Dominion-Provincial Relations which, while re-emphasizing the provincial responsibility for education, recommended small per capita federal grants to universities in order to ensure "equal participation of all regions in the national life". This recommendation was not in fact implemented at that time and universities continued to be largely self-financed and autonomous and increasingly concerned about their ability to survive. With the anticipated post-World War II influx of war veterans into universities the federal government enacted the Veterans Rehabilitation Act of 1945 which provided institutions of post-secondary education with temporary relief only. By 1949 the universities had renewed their appeal for federal funding.

There seem to have been two main issues raised by the universities at that time—the possibility of damage to the country's economy if the universities' financial crisis forced them to reduce the training of professional manpower, and the possibility of raising fees to a level which students from lower income families could not meet, thus threatening the principle of equal opportunity for all Canadians to which the national government has always been committed.

In 1951 the Massey Commission on the National Development of Arts, Letters and Sciences recommended that a small per capita grant of 50 cents be made to the universities, and this recommendation was immediately implemented by the federal government. The Massey Commission, however, was concerned with much more than financial rescue on an ad hoc basis. The preamble to the Commission's terms of reference included the following: "It is in the national interest to give encouragement to institutions which express national feeling, promote common understanding and add to the variety and richness of Canadian life, rural as well as urban". The report recommended continued active involvement on the part of the national government to ensure the cultural and intellectual development of the country as a whole. I quote from that report as follows:

> . . . all civilized societies strive for a common good, including not only material but intellectual and moral elements. If the federal government is to renounce its right to associate itself with other social groups, public and private, in the general education of Canadian citizens, it denies its intellectual and moral purpose, the complete conception of the common good is lost, and Canada, as such, becomes a materialistic society.

Implementation of the recommendations of the Massey Commission from 1951 on saw the federal government develop its current role as patron of arts and culture and patron of education and research.

The activities of such national institutions as the CBC, the National Film Board, and the Canada Council represent part of the federal involvement in education in the broad sense of the word. The activities of the Medical Research Council and the National Research Council are two examples of more specific clearly defined efforts to ensure the advancement of knowledge and the development of Canadian technology.

Adult education has been supported by the federal government in a variety of ways for a long time—grants to such organizations as Frontier College, the Canadian Association for Adult Education, the training grants administered through the Department of Manpower in collaboration with the provinces, are all part of the continuing effort to provide Canadians with education and training appropriate to a variety of situations and needs.

In 1966 the Secretary of State was assigned the task of advising cabinet on post-secondary education, and an education support branch was established in that department. It later became responsible for the administration of that part of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act of 1967 which relates to post-secondary education.

In 1973 the Department of the Secretary of State was designated by cabinet as the agency within the federal government responsible for co-ordinated development, formulation, implementation and review of federal policies and programs relating to education. The responsibilities of the branch are broad and appear to me to include all the functions which the hon. member for Nickel Belt proposes for a national office of education. Areas in which the branch now has responsibilities include:

1. Federal policies and programs in support of post-secondary education generally;

2. Communication with provincial governments, the academic community and national organizations on matters of education;

3. Co-operating with the Department of External Affairs in co-ordination of Canada's effective participation in international fora on educational questions;

4. Evaluating the effectiveness of federal policies and programs in support of education against national goals.

Among other activities the staff of the branch participated in the OECD review of education policies in Canada and the preparation of a federal-provincial report entitled Education in Canada for the International Bureau of Education—UNESCO. I shall refer later to that UNESCO document which raises exciting new prospectives in education.

In the international field the staff of the branch have participated with Department of External Affairs officials in meetings of major international organizations and agencies—OECD, UNESCO and the Commonwealth Secretariat. The branch was represented on Canadian delegations to the OECD Education Committee and the Biennial Conference of the International Bureau of Education—UNESCO—as well as in preparations for the Commonwealth Conference on Educational Broadcasting.

At the present time one hears two conflicting opinions on the issue of direct national or federal involvement in education. The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, for instance, has claimed that "... national involvement of Canadian universities requires a federal presence . . ." and, "The universities wish to deal directly with the federal government in matters of national interest". The Canadian Association of University Teachers has expressed a concern at the current tendency to view post-secondary education from a purely regional perspective, arguing that a wider viewpoint is necessary if universities are to be allowed to make their full contribution to Canadian life. On the other hand provincial governments are now seeking to play a greater role in the distribution of educational moneys. In times of restraint, questions of priorities and resource allocation arise, and educational objectives that were largely unexamined during the period of unrestrained growth are now being questioned and re-evaluated. We probably had unrealistic expectations of education, but certain there is a fairly high degree of disillusionment in the country because education has not provided a better social and political order and the realisation of many ideals.

Because education enjoys so large a proportion of public funds there is increased concern about accountability. The Fiscal Arrangements Act of 1967 ties federal contributions for post-secondary education to the operating expenditures of each institution which, in turn, are dependent on the allocation of provincial resources. This means, in effect, that certain provincial disparities in the provision of post-secondary education across Canada continue and this is certainly an area that should be examined in anticipation of the expiry of the present arrangements in 1977.

Apart from the federal government's concern about equality of opportunity for Canadians, the federal government also has a particular interest in education, particularly in post-secondary education in terms of preparation for the job market. It is the national government that has the responsibility for keeping in view the manpower needs of the whole nation. Since 1964 the Canada Student Loans Plan has represented an important source of assistance to provide Canadians with equality of opportunity to further their career goals.

The UNESCO report to which I referred earlier, published in 1972 and entitled "Learning to be", suggested a very radical transition in our traditional views on education. Modern technology, it suggests, has made the mere aquisition of information the function of the computer and has released man from the routine of mental labour. In the light of these advances the report claims that "liberating the energies of the people, unleasing their creative power, heads the list of future prospects for the development of education in the world of tomorrow." Demographic changes in Canada will impose other changes in education. As future populations include fewer children and proportionately more adults who may need to retrain and re-adapt a number of times in their career lives, changes become implicit in childhood as well as in post-secondary education, if, the words of the UNESCO report, people are to "learn to live, learn to learn, so as to be able to absorb new knowledge all through life, learn to think freely and critically; learn to love the world and to make it more human".

As we approach this exciting and difficult task I think that the solutions will be found, not in establishing one new agency as the motion before us proposes, but rather in a very sensitive working out of formulas which neither infringe on provincial jurisdiction nor deny the responsibility of the national government in this area.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to congratulate the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) on his excellent recitation. Unfortunately, while I find it intellectually extremely timely, because of our present restraints program I think it is hardly economically feasible, and this I regret very much. However, I am so enthused by many of his thoughts that I might suggest that this be put on our agenda for our post-AIB controls program.

I should like to refer to some of the points he made with which I thoroughly agree. He spoke or the unequal educational opportunities that exist for the youth across Canada. This is a fear that haunts every concerned parent in this country. Is a child who has to move from one province to another, especially during mid-term, going to have equal opportunity because of the move? It is not only moving from one province to another; it is also moving from one board of education to another. The riding that I have the honour to represent has two different boards of education, each with quite a different system. If a child moves just three blocks away in the same city, he goes to a different system of education with different opportunities offered. As I say, this is a fear that haunts parents.

The hon. member also referred to the long-term demands of the labour market. This too is of extreme importance. It is often foolhardy, even cruel, of us to insist that youngsters stay in school and become highly educated, only to have them pushed into intellectually bankrupt jobs. Then there are questions like job satisfaction, pride is one's activity, and so on. Which of us at this moment would dare criticize the youth of this country because they are dissatisfied with their jobs, since we have not prepared them perhaps for the right job? We just tell them to get educated; we do not have the foresight to proper jobs.

The hon. member also mentioned national goals. Obviously bilingualism should receive high priority. I should like to mention some of my own priorities. For instance, Canadian studies. I should like to refer the House to a test that was conducted, I believe last year, by Mel Hurtig among 3,500 final year high school students across Canada. It was quite a simple test on Canadianism, yet 62 per cent of those students failed and 61 per cent did not even know that the British North America Act is the Constitution of Canada. Many of these students believed that Toronto or Montreal was the capital of Canada. After receiving the results of his test, one student said, "After going through this I found myself wondering what it was that I had learned in 13 years of school". Another said, "I can't believe how ignorant I am about Canada".

Is it not reasonable to expect that Canadian children should be learning elementary facts about their country in Canadian schools? A research group at Glendon College, York University, showed that only one third of Canadian schools surveyed had courses in Canadian literature.

As for the matter of text books, a study by the Independent Publishers' Association of Canada shows that 88 per cent of school library money goes to foreign books. Some Canadian school boards spend every cent of their money in the United States. What I am preaching is not narrow-minded nationalism; I am asking that Canadian children should have some knowledge of this country and its history, how government works, world issues and how they affect Canada. They should be taught pride in Canada, and concern for its survival as an independent country. Our children should be taught concern for the rich multicultural heritage that Canada enjoys. Here again, why is it that only children lucky enough to live in the bigger centres of Canada can really appreciate the rich multicultural heritage that is now ours?

How many Canadian children know about native rights? How many of them know how our native people live and what their aspirations are? As I said, these are some points that personally I should like to see added to this list of things to which an office such as the hon. member suggests could dedicate itself.

Coming back to the subject of textbooks I shall quote from the "Canadian Journal of Studies" for May, 1975, a statement by William Clarke, President of Clarke-Irwin & Co. Limited:

> While the federal government may not have direct involvement in the process of determining curriculi, the federal government of course is directly involved in many aspects of education through grants to provincial governments for French language instruction, metric conversion and so on, and of course the federal government has a role to play in stimulating if nothing else the creation of Canadian educational material in co-operation with provincial governments. This is a role which is desperately needed.

I first became interested in the question of federal co-operation, shall we say, in education in our country when I received a letter shortly after my election in 1974 from the Canadian School Trustees' Association. One paragraph of this letter reads as follows:

> . . . we believe that there is a national context to education; one that must be recognized to a far greater degree than at present if we want students in all schools of Canada to be able to compete on equal terms for the good life this country can provide. We further believe that recognition of the national context of education can be given without offence to the British North America Act.

I am not a constitutional expert and therefore I do not intend to go into those aspects. It is interesting, however, to note that further to my expression of interest the Canadian School Trustees' Association further elaborated their aims and objects. They state:

The values are as follows:

1. There is a growing national complex to education in this country. It requires a recognizeable office of the federal government to assist in the co-ordination:

a) national objectives whereby we want the children of Canada to become Canadians and not Alberta Canadians, Quebec Canadians, Ontario Canadians, etc.

(b) levels of equivalencies whereby parents can move from one province to another and feel assured that their children will encounter educational requirements that are similar from one grade to another.

(c) assistance in the co-ordinating and effective use of the newer media available, especially in programs that can be used in any one province at any time. There is not only a need for materials to use in the newer media, but also for effective methods of distribution.

(d) there is a need to develop instructional technology that school boards can use in any province.

(e) bilingualism is a fact of life in Canada now, but the children in the schools must be prepared for a bilingual Canada in terms of cultural values, and in terms of competing for employment. There is a need to provide for some co-ordinating agency, and instructional materials that are effective and quick.

(f) leadership and co-ordination in all facets of education.

(g) Canada is really handicapped in its communications with other countries who have federal offices of education of various kinds. We need to be equipped with an office that can speak for Canada in educational matters at UNESCO, OECD and other international meetings.

(h) there is not equality of opportunity to education in Canada at the present time, despite many attempts to provide same. If Canada is to be one country from sea-to-sea, the children in this country must have such equality of opportunity. The parochialism of Canada needs to be tempered considerably, and an Office of Education in Ottawa could assist materially in such matters.

2. There are constitutional problems that inhibit the formation of an Office of Education—but such problems have not presented the massive sums of money that the federal government contributes to post-secondary education. The provinces agree to the federal government being involved, in fact are seeking more involvement in financial terms at the post-secondary level. There is no reason why such co-operation could not be developed in the interests of Canadian children who are entitled to inherit a country that is Canadian first.

3. Federal government policies, especially in programs that require contributions from the provinces, affect the over-all budgets in the provinces, and hence the budgets for the provincial departments of education. There is no office in Ottawa at the present time to remind the federal government that social programs of cost-sharing nature will affect educational resources both financial and human. The situation has grown to the point where we feel that there must be an official office in Canada to speak for education and protect its interests in every part of Canada.

4. There is also a very great need for research and development of education in Canada, and we have just witnessed the cancellation of an educational technology department which was doing valuable work in giving counsel and leadership to education in such matters as audio-visual aides, videodiscs, computer assisted learning etc. If there had been an Office of Education the cancellation could have been averted.

5. Generally speaking, we are a growing nation that needs to have a well prepared generation to take over—a generation that will be understanding, co-operative and compassionate to the very great diversities of this country in cultures and languages. Without leadership in such matters through an Office of Education the requirement is not being adequately met. The future of this country calls for such an office.

6. The Secretary of State is involved to a great degree in education, and the work being done by him is appreciated—but more is necessary—the Secretary of State has many matters of concern. The fact that the Secretary of State is in education, with the consent of the provinces, is a strong argument in favour of a national office.

The fact that the ministers of education in Canada have formed the Council of Ministers of Education/Canada is another strong argument—there was a need, and they are trying to fill the need.

Trustees, teachers, administrators and parents all have—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It being five o'clock this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

SUPPORT FOR AIMS AND OBJECTIVES OF UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON HUMAN SETTLEMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In order to mark the opening of what is perhaps the most important and certainly the biggest conference in the history of the United Nations, to which Canada is today playing host—and this motion will commend itself to the support of the House—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That this House supports the aims and objectives of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements opening today in Vancouver as it attempts to cope with the growing problems of shelter, diet and environment for the peoples of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House before presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SUGGESTED ANNOUNCEMENT CONCERNING 200-MILE LIMIT AND POSITION IN ICNAF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, under Standing Order 43, to move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That this House orders that Canada, in view of the decline in fish stocks off our coasts, and the lack of precise information regarding existing stocks in the areas to be retained under Canadian jurisdiction, should immediately announce its intentions with regard to establishing a 200-mile limit, as well as Canada's related position in ICNAF, and that announcements concerning these matters should first be made in this House.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED COLLABORATION BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND BOARD TO PRODUCE EQUITABLE WAGE SETTLEMENTS IN MINING INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the growing portion of the mining industry which is tied up by strikes against rulings of the Anti-Inflation Board. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That this House direct the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to collaborate with the Anti-Inflation Board in producing a formula which would bring equitable wage settlements in that industry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PAKISTAN—POSSIBILITY OF SIGNING AGREEMENT TO SELL NUCLEAR TECHNOLOGY—SAFEGUARDS AGAINST BUILDING OF BOMB

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs but in his absence I shall put it to the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the statement made by the Prime Minister of Pakistan this week-end that Canada and his country were virtually at the stage of signing an agreement on nuclear exports and nuclear activity, and that the delay that has taken place so far has been on Canada's part only, until the resolution of the problem of India; now that that is behind us can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House how close we are to entering into an agreement with Pakistan?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot be sure about the time it will take to conclude negotiations but I can assure the hon. gentleman that we have not had the same problem in dealing with Pakistan that we had with India.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Given the fact that the Prime Minister of Pakistan made the statement after the explosion of the Indian nuclear bomb that they were in fact looking for nuclear devices in order to balance the weapons situation between the two countries, what assurance do we have in Canada that we are not going to see a repetition of the Indian situation if we go ahead with negotiations with Pakistan? May we not find at some later date that Pakistan has built a bomb? What assurance are we going to have from the government of Pakistan before an agreement is signed that that is not going to happen?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman will recall the agreement we had with India said that the co-operation between Canada and India could not be used in order to enable India to produce a nuclear bomb. We had assumed from that agreement—and it turned out that our assumption was inaccurate—that it would also prohibit a nuclear explosion of any kind. In any negotiations with Pakistan, we will ensure there is no such ambiguity.

Mr. Gillies: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Can the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that the terms of the safeguards agreement between Pakistan and India will be tabled in this House before that agreement is signed?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I could not give that undertaking. The government takes responsibility for agreements of this kind and for all agreements with sovereign countries. This is a long standing rule that has prevailed in Canada, that the government does take responsibility for such transactions. I can assure my colleague, however, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would have no objection after the agreement is reached, of tabling it and having whatever discussion is necessary.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SAFEGUARDS AND SANCTIONS IN EVENT OF NUCLEAR SALE TO PAKISTAN

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister with respect to the present negotiations with Pakistan concerning nuclear assistance. I wonder if he could give an assurance to this House that if it is not possible to table the actual agreement that the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs will make a statement on motions shortly indicating what improved inspection procedures might be in effect with respect to Pakistan? Could he also inform the House whether any sanctions will be imposed in light of the completely unacceptable situation, and apparently unworkable situation, with respect to sanctions applying to India?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I said in answer to the previous question, in any agreement we have with Pakistan there will be no ambiguity on this point of confirming that nuclear explosions will be prohibited under the agreement.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A further supplementary question. I am not sure that the Acting Prime Minister fully understood my question. I am interested to know whether in this case—as was not present in the agreement with India—there will be sanctions that will have some impact? Perhaps either he or the Prime Minister would elaborate on the question I asked the Prime Minister on May 4 with respect to some kind of collective agreement and sanctions resulting from the London Club agreement. I believe the Prime Minister at that time offered to give me that kind of indication or assurance, so that we might know that negotiations with Pakistan would provide real protection.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I will take that request under consideration and discuss it with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I return to my previous answer to the hon. member's question. In the case of India, the problem was that India claimed that it had not broken the agreement it made with Canada and therefore that it had not in any way merited the kinds of sanctions we found it necessary to employ by way of withholding aid for certain purposes and denying further nuclear co-operation. That arose because India would not agree with our interpretation of the agreement. Therefore, on this occasion, we will try to enter into an agreement with Pakistan, if one emerges, an agreement which avoids the ambiguities which led to the difficulties with India.

POSITION OF PAKISTAN ON NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As President Bhutto has said that there would be an attempt to achieve nuclear parity with India, I wonder if the Prime Minister can say if the government of Pakistan, as an indication of its own intentions, has made any decision regarding the ratification of a non-proliferation treaty, and would this be in conformity with Canada's own condition concerning any final agreement with Pakistan.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure about the ratification process. Certainly, any indication by Pakistan that they intended to go the route of having nuclear weapons would make it impossible to have the kind of co-operation between Canada and Pakistan that they desire.

FINANCE

ALLEGED USE OF ERRONEOUS UNITED STATES PRODUCTIVITY FIGURES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Considering the finding of the C.D. Howe Research Institute that data used during the past many months for comparing United States and Canadian levels of productivity increases was in serious error, that instead of Canadian productivity increases being half that of U.S. for the period 1969-74 Canadian productivity increases were twice as great as the United States, would the minister confirm that the government itself based a number of its recent major economic decisions on that erroneous data?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the economic review dealt with the updated United States information pointing out that the disadvantageous situation which had appeared to exist as between Canada and the United States was not as severe as we had anticipated.

ALLEGATION WRONG DATA USED AS BASIS FOR IMPOSITION OF PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, that is some understatement. We have gone from a claim to being only half as productive to being twice as productive in terms of increases. That's some difference. As the minister, when introducing the wage and price control program last fall, said that cost-push inflation threatened to price our goods out of world markets, will he now admit that his data then was wrong and that it was the major justification for a wage and price control program? If that is so, if he has now changed his mind, as he just acknowledged in his answer and admitted that the data was wrong, does the program have any further justification?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had occasion last fall and many times since, both inside and outside the House, to point out that until the middle of the summer of 1975 we could not justly blame wage settlements in Canada as being the basis for the creation of inflation in Canada. As we pointed out in introducing the anti-inflation program, we were concerned because in the fall of 1975 the level of demands in wage negotiations and, indeed, wage settlements themselves, running up to between 20 per cent and 30 per cent had created, in the words of the hon. gentleman, a threat which would put the Canadian economy, in time, in a disadvantageous position. We were faced with the threat of a substantial cost addition to the Canadian economy which would affect our competitive position. As I pointed out many times, for that reason we introduced the program not because of figures existing prior to the middle of 1975.

POSSIBILITY OF TAX CUTS FOR AVERAGE AND LOW-INCOME GROUPS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. For the first time in five years Canadian wage increases were running ahead of United States wage increases for a number of months, and the minister says the government had to bring in a program to deal with that. We do not agree. The minister said more recently that 50 per cent of the goods we produce is intended for export. I point out that only 28 per cent of the manufacturing sector in Canada is in the export business, or primarily in the export business. Considering this correction of his own recent figures, will he now reconsider the government's position announced in the budget on the issue of the tax cut and bring forward a tax cut soon for the average and low income people as the principal means of stimulating the Canadian economy?

● (1420)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on the first assertion made by the hon. member, indeed it had to be of concern to a great many Canadians, if not to the hon. member and his colleagues, that the rate of inflation last October was 10.6 per cent. There was a widespread feeling in Canada that action should be taken, if necessary by direct controls. It was not as the hon. member seeks to represent. Simply the fact that there had been this move in the wage rates in Canada had to be of serious consideration. The fact was that a 10.6 per cent rate of inflation was more than we felt Canadians should bear. The hon. member has never given any indication as to what, if anything, he would have done about the increase.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO USE OF FRENCH AS WORKING LANGUAGE BY QUEBEC RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Could the minister tell the House whether he has received some complaints lately from Quebec French-speaking railwaymen apparently frustrated since, as a security measure, they are unable to use French in their work? If so, does the minister soon intend to make an inquiry in this connection to avoid similar conditions as those which have prevailed and still do in the airports and which could extend in the near future to the entire communication sector?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly inquire to see if such a complaint has been registered. I have not seen it personally, but I will check to see if it has been received in my office.

INQUIRY WHETHER FRENCH RECOGNIZED AS SECOND WORKING LANGUAGE IN AVIATION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. The other evening I saw on television that in Italy, for example, in aviation, English and Italian and elsewhere English or Spanish, English and Chinese and English and Japanese are used. I accept his premise and recognize that English is the international language of aviation. Is the President of the Treasury Board in position to state that there is no cowardice on the part of the government, because it is serious to hear the member for Matane say that the cabinet is cowardly or unreliable when it comes to bilingualism. Is he in a position also to say whether indeed French will be recognized in Canada as in other countries as a second language in aviation?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the facts are self-explanatory. There are already five bases in Quebec where French is officially used. The question, as so aptly explained by the Minister of Transport, is that in large airports as in Montreal, the safety problem is a very important factor and we are having an inquiry commission on that matter. I wish to confirm to the hon. member that bilingualism in Canada is non negotiable, it is a Parliament legislation and we will abide by the legislation voted by the House of Commons.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TESTING OF NEW UNITED STATES TORPEDO AT NANOOSE BAY—FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS FOR USE OF TEST STATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence, I will direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. He has been given notice of the question. Has the United States been testing or are they going to test their new sleeping torpedo, sometimes called the Captor, at the underwater test station at Nanoose Bay?

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of the question. The delivery system of the Captor is indeed being tested at Nanoose range. I might point out that the Captor carries a charge of approximately one pound.

Mr. Forrestall: One pound is about all that a nuclear warhead weighs. Can the parliamentary secretary advise the House as to the financial arrangements between Canada and the United States for the use of the Nanoose installation? We carry out so little in the way of weapon development ourselves that I imagine it is used mainly by the Americans. Can the parliamentary secretary tell us just what are the financial arrangements between the two countries with respect to the use of this station?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The Nanoose range is an acoustic range for testing underwater devices; its facilities are shared between the Americans and ourselves. We supply the range itself and half the personnel, while the Americans supply the test equipment and the other half of the personnel. There is a sharing of information. The range is used for underwater testing because the water there is relatively quiet and deep and because it is one of the few sites available on the West Coast for such a purpose. It is not unusual for Canada to share the range with other nations. As a matter of fact, not too long ago the Russians, with Canadian concurrence, used the range for testing the Pisces.

REASON BOARD USES PERSONNEL LENT BY PRIVATE SECTOR—POSITION OF PRIVATE SECTOR ON REMUNERATION AND LOSS OF SERVICE OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance with respect to hiring practices under the Anti-Inflation Board. Can the minister confirm that major banking and trust institutions have on occasion been approached by government to lend personnel to the Anti-Inflation Board on the basis that the employers will be reimbursed for salaries paid to their personnel in their absence while working for the Board? Is this done in order to give the appearance to the public that the AIB has, in fact, less staff and expenses attributable to its operations than is actually the case?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to confirm whether or not there has been an approach to that specific area of industry. The principal purpose, in going to the private sector is, of course, to obtain the services of people who are familiar with the private sector costing and pricing practices so that the Board can act on the basis of actual experience in the private sector, rather than a view of the private sector as seen by various departments of government.

Mr. MacKay: I thank the minister for his answer, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask him by way of a supplementary question whether or not he is aware this subject has been under discussion at meetings of financial institutions and that the question of remuneration for the loss of employees' services while employed by the AIB as well as disruption to the particular companies involved, caused by the loss of these key personnel, was a matter of concern. Would the minister be good enough to check on this matter and report to the House in due course?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that this matter has been discussed by any financial institution. It seems to me it is both in the interests of the program and of the private sector itself that a program for which the private sector has expressed support should be made to operate most effectively with the help of experienced people who have been in a particular line of business. It has not been unusual in the past, and I hope it will not be in the future, to get the benefit of the private sector in formulating and carrying forward government programs.

FINANCE

REASON FOR CHANGES IN TARIFF ON PORK

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to address my question to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with the recent budget. Since there appears to be unanimous agreement among industry spokesmen that the tariff changes brought about in the budget will have a detrimental effect on the pork industry in Canada, would the minister tell us why the government felt it necessary to make these changes, bearing in mind that the pork industry was just recovering after two poor years and the proposed tariff changes will certainly set back that recovery?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I do not believe that would be a universally accepted opinion, Mr. Speaker. The change involves an amount of half a cent per pound, which is not considerable, but the feeling was that it would be of some assistance from the consumers' standpoint in protecting them from an increase in food prices.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

METRIC CONVERSION—ALLEGATION THAT ADVANTAGE TAKEN OF CONSUMERS—METHOD OF SURVEILLANCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, recognising that the minister shares responsibility in this area. During the committee hearings on the resolution on metric conversion an undertaking was given by the government that there would be surveillance in the marketplace to ensure that metric conversion would not be used as a means of ripping off consumers. Since evidence is now coming to light that this is occurring in certain parts of the country, may I ask the minister what steps he and his colleague have taken to ensure that this consumer rip-off does not continue in the name of metric conversion?

● (1430)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of the question. Unfortunately, there was not an opportunity for me to consult over the last few days with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In a general way, however, we have talked about it and I understand that the program or system of surveillance is conducted by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and it is, of course, open to anyone to lodge a complaint with that department.

I am not sure whether I am anticipating a supplementary question so perhaps I had better let it go at that for the moment.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. What procedures are entailed in this system of surveillance for laying charges, since evidence is now coming forward that retailers, especially food retailers, are in fact using metric conversion as a means of packaging smaller quantities while charging either the same price or one which is higher?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, so far as the conversion to metric is concerned, I believe that the hon. member is aware that it is essentially a voluntary program. There are, therefore, no penalties within the metric conversion program itself. I would ask him to have a little patience and to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs directly whether there is any other legislation under which action could be taken. I would also say to him, because I think it will be of interest, that it is my intention to bring forward the first of what will be four omnibus type bills which were recommended unanimously by the committee last fall. I shall be doing this during 1976, but I do not anticipate it is likely to happen before the summer recess.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—CONDITIONS TO BE MET BEFORE CONTRACT SIGNED

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. On May 20, as reported in Hansard at page 13700, the minister confirmed to this House that he had sent a Telex to Lockheed on December 3 authorizing them to begin work on the LRPA and saying that the government intended to sign a contract with them if certain conditions were met. I wonder whether the minister would tell the House what these conditions were?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, one of the conditions was that Lockheed would have to get permission from the American government to transfer to Canada the equipment to be used for the manufacture of part of that plane as well as that of a similar plane to be supplied to the American Department of Defence.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON MINISTER UNAWARE OF DEFENCE DEPARTMENT'S LACK OF FUNDS AND COMPANY'S ASSURANCE OF FINANCING

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. On Tuesday, May 25, the minister told this House that the representative from his department on the LRPA project team was not aware that Lockheed had given a verbal assurance that it could provide funds to meet DND's shortfall. On March 29 the minister told the House that he himself was unaware that DND had a shortfall when he authorized work to begin. Would the minister tell the House whether his deputy minister prepared for him a brief prior to the Treasury Board meeting of December 1, a brief which specifically discussed DND's shortfall? Would the minister also tell the House whether he attended that Treasury Board meeting and, if so, how was it possible for him to remain unaware of the fact that DND lacked funds and that Lockheed had given a verbal assurance it could provide these funds, given that both these facts were mentioned in the brief to Treasury Board?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is making very gratuitous statements; it is a serious matter for him to put questions in that fashion. I shall reply simply and briefly that, before December 2, neither myself nor my deputy minister nor my representative on the management team of the LRPA project were aware of the possiblity that Lockheed might supply the money required to finance the project.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—ALLEGATION MINISTER BLAMING DEFENCE DEPARTMENT FOR NOT INFORMING HIM ABOUT LACK OF FUNDS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. As there appears to be a continuing disagreement between the minister and the Minister of National Defence about the Lockheed deal, and since the minister has expressed the view that General Allan should have gotten assurances about the financing in writing and that General Allan was guilty of a fundamental error resulting in the government having to assume a liability for $16 million or thereabouts, would the minister say what was the function of the Department of Supply and Services in this field, and was it not to check on the financial details? Was not his representative, Mr. L. H. Stopforth, a member of the special interdepartmental committee on the project, and did he know or should he have known of the financial difficulties in question?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I should like to refresh the hon. member's memory. In every reply I have given to the questions put to me in this House, I have indicated clearly that financing is always the responsibility of the purchasing department. The hon. member should learn how the government operates: that is elementary. Second, the hon. member should refer to the answer I have just given. Third, I would ask the hon. member to consult Hansard for March 30, 1976, where, on page 12265, the Minister of Defence mentions the part played by General Allan.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

[English]

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether it would not be reasonable for him, instead of talking about attempted blackmail by the military, to accept at least some of the responsibility for his department's failure to fulfill its financial responsibilities?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is being very generous in trying to cast blame right and left. I will do just that for him since he has asked. The hon. member should know that the government operates in such a way that whenever a department asks us to proceed with a purchase, it must ascertain that it has sufficient funds to do so. The hon. member will understand that we have no other alternative since there are hundreds of purchase contracts each year and since we cannot possibly go back to the purchasing department and check its books to see if the funds are available. Perhaps the hon. member could check his own books to learn how the government operates.

AIRPORTS

ST. LÉONARD, NEW BRUNSWICK—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF GOVERNMENT'S PLANS

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the legislative assembly of New Brunswick will be considering a motion later this week dealing with an airport development in northwest New Brunswick, which development is almost entirely within federal jurisdiction, would the minister now inform the House of recent developments and plans by his department to build an airport at Saint Léonard, New Brunswick, with jet capability?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate being given responsibility for the main part of the judgment in relation to this airport, though I would see also a certain involvement for both the province and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in this connection. However, I can tell the hon. member that following the very strong representations that I have received from him and other members of this House from northern New Brunswick, I have been re-examining the position of the Saint Léonard airport and have asked my department to put before me a possible plan from which I can attempt to sort out the terms of funding, either by ourselves or with the co-operation of the other agencies to which I have referred.

HAMILTON—DECISION ON FUNDS FOR UPGRADING AREA FACILITIES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of his interest in airports, may I ask the minister whether in fact the government is still committed to $25 million with respect to the upgrading of airports in the Hamilton area, or has restraint allowed the government to have second thoughts? This matter is a little fuzzy back in Hamilton.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are still committed to providing adequate service in the Hamilton area and would want to do that as soon as we can reach some conclusions about the forward look of their airport services in that area. There is at the present time a committee, including a strong community involvement, determining such issues as the location and the timing of an airport, and obviously we need that kind of input before making a final decision. But certainly it is our intention to offer improved airport service to the Hamilton area.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the answer that the minister gave but I specifically asked him about the $25 million which was offered by his counterpart some two or three years ago. I am asking the minister now whether the commitment of $25 million still stands, in light of the fact that inflation could have some bearing? I just want a yes or no, I do not want a long answer as to what the minister intends to do in certain circumstances. Is there a commitment?

● (1440)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I hope he will accept this slightly longer answer. The amount involved is probably higher than that.

Mr. Alexander: That is great.

FISHERIES

CANADIAN POSITION ON ICNAF AFTER DECLARATION OF 200-MILE LIMIT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of State (Fisheries). In view of the fact that Canada's fisheries resources are constantly declining, while at the same time Ottawa is making bilateral fisheries agreements with foreign countries without knowing the actual amount of existing fish stocks and, I might add, without consultation with the premiers of the provinces concerned, will the minister give an early indication of what the Canadian posture will be concerning the future of ICNAF after we secure the 200-mile fishing limit?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, we have made it clear that the regulations will be consistent with the regulations that would normally apply to a coastal state for the coming year, that is 1977. As to the statement by the hon. member about bilateral treaties, I wish he would read those treaties very carefully. They make it clear that the allowable catch would be fixed by Canada and not by an international organization. They make it clear that Canada would have its needs completely satisfied in relation to conservation measures, and that surpluses will be allocated by Canada to foreign fishing fleets. We are trading away nothing. To the contrary, we are claiming what will be ours within that zone.

CALGARY—DATE OF COMPLETION OF FACILITIES—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN PLANS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact the Minister of Finance has talked about an expansion in exploration and development of natural gas, and in light of the fact that over 2 million people visit southern Alberta as tourists, will the Minister of Transport now tell us, and he has been promising this since 1965, that the air depot in Calgary will be completed for use? I would point out that at the present time there is still a question about sanitation and working conditions at that depot.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, regarding the more detailed and different phases of construction at Calgary I will be glad to report to the hon. member. There is, of course, a massive amount of construction going on there which I think is on schedule, but I will be glad to look at the schedule of the particular items to which he refers.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, while he is checking that perhaps he might look to see whether the original plans have been scrapped because the facilities have now been found to be too small, requiring a redrafting and complete change of the whole plan? Will he check that out also?

PENSIONS

POSSIBILITY OF DEFERRED PAYMENTS INTO SUPERANNUATION ACCOUNT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. I believe at the end of the question period last Friday the minister had the answer to the question I asked earlier during that question period and also on Wednesday last.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker, following the questions asked by the hon. member for Edmonton West on May 26 and 28, I checked, and all the payments have been made by the treasury. We have met all our obligations as far as the pension funds mentioned by the hon. member are concerned, and I have made a check for the previous years. The last time a government did not meet their obligations for pension funds was under the Conservative administration, in 1958 and in 1962.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE PURCHASERS THAT AUTOMOBILES WILL PRODUCE ADVERTISED GASOLINE MILEAGE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has demonstrated his intention to clobber the automobile owner through taxation, and particularly those with large families who must possess larger cars, what steps does he or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs intend to take against the automobile industry to ensure that a customer is guaranteed at the time of purchase that a particular vehicle will produce a certain mileage per gallon? What protection does the purchaser get if it does not perform, or is the automotive industry too big to tackle?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have made it clear that the automobile industry will be required to label all new automobiles; that is, to say 1977 models, as to mileage standards.

POSSIBILITY OF CONSERVING GASOLINE BY DISCONNECTING EMISSION CONTROL DEVICES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, since the minister indicates he is interested in the conservation of energy, is there any intention to conserve further energy by allowing the owners of vehicles operating in sparsely populated areas the right to disconnect emission control devices which also increase consumption of gasoline by 15 per cent to 20 per cent, or is this just a revenue producing exercise rather than an energy conserving one?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I know of no proposal to remove the emission control standards the government has imposed. They have been imposed for very important reasons, namely, to support and protect the environment.

INQUIRY AS TO PLANS FOR PRODUCTION AND DISTRIBUTION OF ELECTRICITY IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources developed any master plan for the most efficient production, transmission and distribution of electric power in the Atlantic provinces? Does he have a system of incentives to encourage the provincial governments to follow such a plan and, if so, what are those incentives and where is this plan?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there are a series of incentives already in place, as I think the hon. member knows, including studies and inter-regional connections and plans of that kind. I hope to meet with the premiers of the Maritime provinces within about ten days' time to discuss with them an over-all approach, which perhaps might be described as the Atlantic-Canada approach, to problems of electrical generation and transmission. I very much hope it will be possible to work out a plan with them to deal on a long term basis with their indigenous resources and their transmission.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH—EFFECTS OF REDUCTION IN FUNDS ON HEALTH PROGRAMS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, in view of the devastating effects the freeze on the Medical Research Council budget has had on research in this country, and in view of the fact that the addition of $2 million covers only about one-third of what is required to bring research up to last year's level, will the Minister of National Health and Welfare reassess his ill-considered decision, and increase the budget by the $4.6 million which will be required to bring the activity up to last year's level?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, contrary to the hon. member's assertion, the budget for medical research has not been frozen, it has increased by $3.4 million over last year.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could clarify for the House and the country whether he feels that freezing the budget, or, if he insists, raising it by $1 million this year, will in the long run save money in health expenditures throughout the country?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for me to answer the hon. member's question since I have just said that, contrary to what he said, the budget for medical research has not been frozen.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE LAND CLAIMS IN YUKON

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In light of speculation over the weekend, could the Acting Prime Minister confirm whether a settlement of the native land claims in the Yukon has indeed been reached and, if so, what are the terms of the settlement?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think this question should be answered by the minister on his return.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact a draft agreement has been submitted to Cabinet, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House when the Cabinet hopes to reach a settlement?

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that both negotiators requested an extension of time we do not as yet have the date the hon. member requests. The speed of negotiations has been somewhat slower than anticipated, but I believe some action will be forthcoming within the foreseeable future.

POSSIBLE TERMINATION OF ASSISTANCE WITH FREIGHT COST ON FEED GRAIN FOR MARITIMES AND EASTERN QUEBEC

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Transport assure the House and the country that it is not the intention of the government in the near future to terminate freight assistance on feed grains going to the Maritimes and the province of Quebec?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it has always been known to hon. members that our policy on feed grain contemplated a retention of feed freight assistance into the Atlantic area and eastern region of Quebec. As to a termination in respect of the major feed consuming areas of the country, an announcement on this subject is expected very soon. Indeed, there will be discussions on this subject this evening.

COMMUNICATIONS

POSSIBILITY OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY ON PAY TELEVISION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications, and I should like to welcome the lady back from her travels. Is she going to be making an announcement this week, either in the House or at a meeting in Toronto, on the policy of the government regarding pay television?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, indeed I am scheduled to make a speech on Wednesday to discuss the problem of pay television, as well as other problems relevant to the meeting which will take place in Toronto.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not trying to anticipate the lady minister's speech, but will it be a statement of firm policy or will it be a statement inviting those interested in this very complex question to submit briefs either to the minister or CRTC?

Mrs. Sauvé: I think the hon. member can wait until Wednesday when he will find out.

Mr. Nowlan: It better be in the House if it is policy.

DISPUTE BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND QUEBEC OVER CHURCHILL FALLS POWER—ACTION OF MINISTER

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister indicated earlier that he would be meeting with the Atlantic ministers on energy problems. In view of the fact that tonight is the deadline in the dispute between Newfoundland and Quebec, would the minister indicate whether he will meet with the two ministers from Quebec and Newfoundland before that deadline to resolve the problems existing with the Churchill Falls power?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the question is whether I am going to meet the ministers of the two provinces before the deadline tonight, the answer is no.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I certainly could not expect the minister to meet with them today, but have representations not been made to the minister on behalf of either Quebec or Newfoundland asking the minister to enter into the dispute to try to resolve the problems which exist?

Mr. Gillespie: There has been no formal communication to me asking me to intervene in any way or arbitrate the dispute. There has been some indication that the over-all plan might be the kind of approach they would like to discuss. But I go on to say that such indications are very tentative and I would not want to raise expectations unduly with respect to that.

Mr. Marshall: Could the minister indicate what is the latest progress with regard to the National Energy Board and its relationship to the holding of power by the province of Quebec on the granting of export permits?

Mr. Gillespie: Those areas are to be discussed in hearings about to get under way before the National Energy Board.

TRADE

VIEW OF MINISTER ON DESIGNATING EGG MARKETING AGENCY AS RECEIVER OF IMPORTS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that recent answers in the House by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have disclosed diametrically opposite positions between the two ministers with respect to the designation of CEMA as the receiver of imported eggs, and in view of the fact that in reply to a recent question by the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex the Prime Minister indicated that it was the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who had this responsibility, is the minister now in a position to cast the deciding vote and, we hope, break up this deadlock which apparently exists?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, without acknowledging the premise of the question, I must confess I do not relish the idea of having to cast the deciding vote between the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Let me put it this way: I will try to make as constructive a contribution to the discussion as possible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Maybe you could blame James Richardson.

Mr. Jarvis: In order to determine how constructive the minister is or will be, could he tell us what his position is? Is he in favour of designating CEMA as the sole receiver of imported eggs or does he support the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who prefers to leave that to the private sector? Can we have the minister's opinion?

Mr. Jamieson: That is the kind of constructive opinion I am going to express to my colleagues.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

RELATIONSHIP OF RULING ON WAGE INCREASES AT THOMPSON, MANITOBA TO WAGE SETTLEMENT AT SUDBURY

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the strike by the mine workers now set for tomorrow at Thompson, Manitoba in rejection of the AIB ruling on wage increases, can the minister tell the House whether the AIB ruling on wage increases was in line with the wage settlement at Sudbury which is the historical relationship that is used in the nickel mine industry?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I could refer the hon. gentleman to the decision of the Anti-Inflation Board in this regard and he will note their conclusion that the historical relationship between the Thompson local and the one at Sudbury has been made quite clear to support the ruling. I quote: "Although a strong historical relationship with another group of INCO employees at Sudbury has been clearly demonstrated, it is not the intention of the restraint objectives of the program to permit the complete restoration of that relationship by approval of the settlement as negotiated." As the hon. member knows, in light of the additional facts the board did make some adjustments in the limits that it had set for this and subsequent years of the contract, but it felt that the amount as negotiated could not be accommodated within the over-all guidelines.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY MINISTER WILL MAKE STATEMENT ON ALLEGATIONS OF NEGLIGENCE BY STAFF

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence in the absence of the minister. Is it anticipated that the Minister of National Defence will be issuing some sort of clarifying statement in the House in view of the rather alarming new doctrine that has crept into our usage in that the Minister of Supply and Services has castigated senior members of the armed forces for alleged negligence in so far as the LRPA contract is concerned. Will the Minister of National Defence come to the support of his staff?

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, may I point out for the information of the House that today my minister is at the Royal Military College attending the convocation and anniversary celebrations there.

An hon. Member: Is he that old?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, there are other people in the House who could join the class if that were the case.

In answer to the hon. member's question, I would commend for his reading the report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence of last Thursday. I think he will find the answer to his question in that report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PENITENTIARIES

MILLHAVEN—DATE OF PUBLICATION OF HANSEN REPORT ON BEATINGS—POSSIBILITY OF ACTION AGAINST GUARDS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. When does the minister intend to table the Hansen report on the Millhaven gassings and beatings, and has the Hansen report gone to the Attorney General of Ontario, and, if so, has he replied to it in terms of criminal charges being laid against any of those involved?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received the report on the Millhaven gassings and beatings. I am meeting with Miss Hansen tomorrow to discuss the report and receive it from her.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: In March the Solicitor General asked the Canadian penitentiary service to look into the continued employment of some guards in the segregation unit of Millhaven penitentiary. Apparently the same guards who administered tear gas in the November incident were still working in the unit. I assume that this study has been completed. Will the Solicitor General tell the House what the results of the investigation are?

Mr. Allmand: It has not, Mr. Speaker. Officials of the penitentiary service and I have been waiting for the report from Miss Hansen on the gasing situation. Once we have that report and have examined it, we will decide what disciplinary action must be taken. During the investigation itself some of the guards had been removed from Millhaven to other institutions, but now the inquiry is over they are back as a result of an appeal they made through the union, I believe. But we will have to examine the report before taking further action.

HEALTH

LEVEL OF POLYCHLORINATED BIPHENYLS IN GREAT LAKES—REASON FOR DELAY IN GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that polychlorinated biphenyls have been found in the Great Lakes to be eight times higher than the permitted level of two parts per million, with the result that all fish now caught in the Great Lakes are highly contaminated and people eating these fish also become contaminated with a deleterious and toxic substance that is both cumulative and remains in the body indefinitely, I should like to ask the minister what immediate steps he is contemplating to counteract this serious human health problem?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this matter is being discussed jointly with my colleague, the Minister of the Environment. I would be pleased to consider the question and give hon. members an answer on the first occasion.

● (1500)

Mr. Mitges: In view of the fact that the danger in the Great Lakes has been known to exist for some ten years now, why has no action been taken before now not only to make the facts known to the public, but also to take the necessary steps to stop this dangerous pollutant from entering the lakes before it became the danger to human health which it certainly is now?

Mr. Lalonde: I would first of all ask the hon. member if he has known about it for ten years, why has he not brought it to our attention before now? Secondly, it should be realized that this situation is mainly the responsibility of the government of Ontario, which has responsibility for the plants.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On Friday last the hon. member for Annapolis Valley raised a point of order in which he was supported by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. There was a brief response by the Minister of Supply and Services. The point of order concerned a reply of the minister to which reference was made in a question today by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal and whether that reply in any way attacked the rather fundamental doctrine of ministerial responsibility and the importance of that doctrine to the practices of this House.

I want to re-emphasize, if it needs re-emphasizing, the importance of that doctrine to the practices of the House. The question was not concerned with the sanctity of that doctrine but only whether the kind of reply which was given at that time constituted disorder in the House or a matter of procedure in so far as the Chair was concerned.

In re-examining all that was said at that time, I have come to the conclusion that no question of disorder exists with respect to the reply made by the minister on Friday. That is not to say that that is any reflection on the importance of the doctrine, nor is it to say that the matter is closed, because obviously, by the question of the hon.

member for Fundy-Royal further questions may be put to either or both ministers involved.

If in fact there is any threat to that doctrine in the answers and the performance or attitude of the ministers, there may be other remedies. I doubt very much if they are procedural remedies, but there may be substantive remedies which would have an effect on that area, and only on the elicitation of further information might those remedies be tried. The only decision to be made is: As a result of the answer of last Friday, was there disorder created by that answer? The conclusion I have come to is no, and I think I ought to report that to the House at this moment, again subject to whatever further information may come to light or to whatever other remedies exist.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, naturally, I am not disputing what you have said. I was almost halfway to my feet when you rose to give your ruling, to suggest that it might be appropriate if the matter could be held in abeyance until the Minister of National Defence could be present. According to your ruling perhaps this matter does not involve a disorder in the House, but it certainly does involve a very important principle with respect to the relationship of the government to the people of Canada, its responsibility to the people of Canada and its relationship of the public service of this country, whether armed or otherwise, to the government. It may well be that in another context, when the Minister of National Defence is here, the matter will be raised again. I felt I should mention that.

ITEMS TO BE DEALT WITH PRIOR TO SUMMER ADJOURNMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government House leader is prepared today to give a definitive statement—I use that word advisedly—with respect to the business the government proposes to deal with to the extent that the government intends to deal with it prior to the adjournment of this House, whenever that adjournment might occur.

Mr. Speaker: Before hearing the President of the Privy Council on what is a separate point of order, I notice that the Minister of Supply and Services was seeking to make an intervention with respect to the previous point. I think I have clearly ruled in respect of Friday. There may be other questions to the minister and other questions to the Minister of National Defence, and certainly there is every indication that there will in fact be such questions, and on the basis of whatever information may come forward, other arguments might be made. My only decision to make was whether a point of order had arisen and whether there had been disorder on Friday. I decided I did not need to hear further interventions unless further information came to light at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I would not want that my remarks be considered as being against your decision. Of course I accept your ruling, but you referred to a question put by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) and I would simply like to draw the attention of my hon. colleagues to this so they might consider more in detail two answers given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson), the first on March 30, 1976, as recorded in Hansard, page—12,265 . . .

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect, the minister is simply enlarging on the answer he made today, and I cannot permit that unless I am prepared to permit further questions.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in response to the question put by my hon. friend, the House leader of the official opposition who gave me notice he was going to put this question to me today, it is the government's desire, and I believe it is the desire of hon. members generally, to adjourn not later than June 30.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: For that purpose, we have deliberately decided not to proceed with certain items on the order paper at this session, and we have proposed an extension of hours of sitting so that the remaining urgent business can be disposed of without an undesirable curtailment of debate. The items which remain on the urgent list are the following: Bill C-68, which is now at third reading; Bill C-81, which is now at report stage; Bill C-84, which is now being debated at second reading; Bill C-87, debate on which has not yet begun; Bill C-88, which is now at report stage; and Bill S-35, which is now before a standing committee.

These six items, all except one of which has already been the subject of extensive debate, plus the budget resolutions and supply, constitute the government's program before adjournment. Unless some emergency arises, the government has no other items which it considers essential to be disposed of before the adjournment. The parties may, of course, be ready to agree on the approval of minor housekeeping matters such as motions Nos. 33 and 34 under government business.

Let me add a word or two about Bill C-83, which is now before the standing committee. It is desirable that progress be made in dealing with this piece of legislation, and the government will be proposing amendments resulting from public representations which will, we hope, be helpful in ensuring its approval. The government, however, will not keep the House in session for the purpose of advancing this bill. If the standing committee has not reported by the time of adjournment, it may of course decide to sit during the recess. I shall be discussing with the other parties an agreement to take up the bill in the new session at the stage which is reached at the time of prorogation of the present session. To be as precise as I can be, the government will propose the adjournment of the House when the six items to which I have referred, plus the budget resolutions and supply, have been disposed of, whether that happens before or after June 30, except for the usual provision by which Mr. Speaker could call the House back for royal assent.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker, seventy speakers have taken part in the debate on Bill C-84. I am informed that there is still a long list of speakers who wish to be heard. I have proposed to the House leaders an extension of hours for the purpose of that debate only, two additional hours in the mornings on Tuesdays and Thursdays, and the temporary suspension of private members' hour.

May I also remind those who may be concerned about the timing of the vote on second reading that the House has already approved an order which avoids a quick, unexpected vote. The timing of the vote will be decided by the House leaders within a week after the end of the debate, so that those who are absent from Ottawa can get here for the occasion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say that we welcome the statement the minister has given us, and we hope that the necessary arrangements can be made so that the recess can begin not later than the end of June. I should like to say, once again, that toward that end we will be prepared to agree to the extra hours of sitting which the minister has proposed, although the proposal is that the extra hours of sitting are for that bill only.

However, I should like to register my objection to one little trick the government has employed. The minister says all he wants is those six bills, the budget resolutions—obviously not the bills—and supply. Supply includes, presumably, the supplementary estimate that was tabled the other day. I object very much to this tricky way to get the House to decide, without any time to debate it, a matter which some of us are opposed to in any case and which certainly should be the subject of legislation. The government is using a supplementary estimate to get at something that is difficult to get through parliament, like a state lottery. If they can do that, they could have done that for capital punishment or anything.

An hon. Member: They did not even bring in a supplementary estimate for capital punishment!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They may just do it. I object to what I call a tricky way of dealing with this matter of a national lottery.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, about the same question put to the President of the Privy Council, I would like to tell the House that at our caucus meeting held last week, we did consider at length the possibility of extending the hours to debate Bill C-84 and we thought it proper to voice our opposition to longer sittings because Canadians are against the adoption of this bill.

So the Social Credit Party will not endorse any extension of the sittings of the House.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RECOMMENDATIONS OF FINKELMAN REPORT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, just over three years ago the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, Mr. Jacob Finkelman, was asked by the government:

—to examine the Public Service Staff Relations Act and its administration and to make recommendations, having regard to the experience gained since that act came into force, as to how it should be amended or revised in order to meet adequately the needs of the employer and the employees in the public service and the employee organizations that represent them, and to serve the interest of the public.

This undertaking was given the full support of both government and opposition parties of this House, as well as that of the employee associations of the public service. The confidence in Mr. Finkelman which was expressed at that time was demonstrated to have been well placed when, about a year later, the results of his exhaustive study were tabled. I think it is a tribute to Mr. Finkelman, who is now coming to the end of his distinguished public service career, that this confidence should have been expressed in such a concrete way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: In recognition of the importance of the questions raised in Mr. Finkelman's report and of the many far-reaching recommendations which he made—I recall they totalled some 230 specific recommendations—the report was given very careful examination by the Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. The joint committee involved a variety of interested parties in its deliberations, including—and I quote from its report:

Bargaining agents representing employees in the public service of Canada; unions representing views outside the public service of Canada; the Treasury Board secretariat representing the government as employer; employer groups in the private sector; the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board and the chairman of the Public Service Commission; personnel and labour relations specialists; university professors; and interested individuals.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that many people, and particularly some of those who, through interest or vocation, are closely associated with public service employer-employee relations matters, have from time to time expressed impatience at the length of time the review of the legislation covering collective bargaining in the federal public service has taken. I have shared this concern. I can only say, however, Mr. Speaker, that it is better to take the time if that time is necessary to ensure that the action proposed is the wisest and best course to follow.

The joint committee issued its report in February of this year, and since that time the government has been actively studying its conclusions and its recommendations, as well as going over again those proposals of Mr. Finkelman which were not touched on in the committee's report. All of this work is being conducted in light of the extensive hearings of the committee and of the many discussions which have been held informally over the past several years between government officials and representatives of the interested parties. The issues are extremely complex and the factors and considerations which must be taken account of are numerous, interacting, frequently subtle, and sometimes conflicting. In view of the time already spent in laying the foundation for definitive proposals to be put to the House by the government, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that members would not want the government to table prematurely, hastily prepared and inadequately considered legislation.

In any case, the legislative calendar for the session we are now engaged in is already very full. We have heard some protests on the six items that I thought constituted very limited scope for the rest of the session. You will not disagree with me I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that we are in a rather congested state as far as the rest of the session is concerned. The government intends, therefore, to complete its internal deliberations relating to public service collective bargaining as quickly as possible, and to introduce legislation in the next session of parliament which, hopefully, will begin in the fall.

With regard to the Public Service Employment Act, the joint committee recommended that the Public Service Commission, after consultation with the bargaining agents and the employer, develop proposals for early revision of the act and that a task force be set up to undertake a longer term and more fundamental review of the role of the commission. The consultations relating to early revisions have been completed and the commission's proposals are now being considered by the government. The related amendments to the Public Service Employment Act will be introduced in the next session, probably at the same time as new legislation covering the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Mr. Speaker, the government will also, as part of its ongoing examination of government management and organization, be looking into the more fundamental and far-reaching questions which prompted the joint committee's recommendations for a special task force to study the role of the Public Service Commission in relation to employer-employee relations matters. The government is sympathetic to the concerns which underlie these questions and will ensure that they are examined.

Initially, an interagency task force including representatives from the Privy Council office, the Public Service Commission, the Public Service Staff Relations Board, the Treasury Board secretariat, and the Department of Labour is being set up with terms of reference authorizing it to examine the principles and practices relating to appointment, staffing and training in the public service and to make recommendations for changes calculated to serve the interests of the public, to contribute to the over-all improvement of the public service and to foster good employer-employee relations. Such a task force will obviously need to consult extensively with all interested bodies, with special emphasis on the many and varied employee associations. I trust that the task force will undertake its work as expeditiously as possible, and barring unforeseen difficulties that the government will be able to report on its results during the next session of parliament.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with tradition, I wish to thank the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) for supplying us with a copy of his statement in advance—by 20 minutes—of this sitting. Having read the report, I wonder why it was not possible to give it to us last Friday so that we could have looked it over, or why it was not given to us today and the statement made tomorrow.

Aside from that rather mild admonition, speaking on behalf of this party I should like to say that we welcome this long-awaited declaration, even while we confess to some dismay that it contains little more than another indication of governmental delay. At least now we have some sort of timetable, if only in the form of a promissory note. The government has produced a timetable, and that is about all. It intends to proceed in accordance with the priorities of its own program. That is about all the statement says.

At the beginning of his statement, the President of the Privy Council stated specifically that three years ago the government had asked the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board to review present legislation on public service staff relations and its administration, with a view to making recommendations on how to improve the public service generally to better meet public interests.

That was over three years ago, Mr. Speaker, and we have just learned, with the excuses to which we have become accustomed, that for the time being the government does not want to formulate final proposals in that regard.

[English]

Three years ago the government asked for an examination of this question and for recommendations. On November 13, 1974, a joint committee of this House and the other place met to study the proposals put forward by the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board. That examination was carried out most fully. On behalf of my party, may I associate myself with the high words of commendation describing the work performed by the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, Mr. Finkelman.

After innumerable meetings and after hearing the evidence of interested parties, the special joint committee produced a detailed report of its findings and made recommendations relating to a variety of employer-employee relations aspects in the public service, including such matters as the right to strike, managerial exclusions, designated personnel, the entire bargaining process, and so on. In February of this year the report was tabled. It included 72 recommendations or resolutions.

The government all along was aware of the proceedings of the special joint committee and could have formulated detailed guidelines to cover each of the important sectors being considered by the committee. I suggest that at the very least the government should now have brought forward a series of broad proposals outlining the areas with which the legislation will deal when it comes forward. It would not have been necessary to put these proposals in legislative form, but they could have outlined areas with which the legislation would deal and explained omissions in the legislation of areas covered by the committee. For example, each of the 72 recommendations could have been reviewed, and in an appropriate space opposite each recommendation the government could have said, "Yes, we will accept this," or "No, we will not accept this", or "We will look into this particular matter", or "We find that it will be impossible to change this particular matter."

As matters now stand, we have nothing but another promise to consider, a not unusual performance. If the kind of broad propositions to which I have alluded had been put forward, we might have had the opportunity during the summer to elicit reactions of interested parties. Without doubt, the government will expect us to rush the legislation through whenever it chooses to bring it before the House. I assure the government, and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), that my party considers the proposed legislation so important and so serious that it does not intend to be rushed in its deliberations, but looks forward to fair and extensive consultation.

[Translation]

The special committee has also made recommendations on legislation governing employment in the public service, and in particular the part the commission must play. According to the government, final proposals with regard to that aspect of the report will also be postponed; we hope, for our part, that they will not be put off indefinitely. We are therefore awaiting with some impatience the two bills to be introduced by the government in this regard. Those two bills, once introduced, should enable us to solve the many problems posed by present legislation.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since the House of Commons changed the rules and provided for a more appropriate response to statements of ministers, the government has made fewer statements than it used to, largely, I suppose, because it does not want to submit to an extra question period. Despite the admonition the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) directed to the President of the Privy Council for not having given us copies of his statement earlier than he did, I wonder why he bothered to make the statement at all. Somebody on the government side could have asked the minister something like, "How is the government getting along with the special joint committee's recommendations?" And the minister could have said, "We are not ready yet, but we hope to be ready in the fall."

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The government wants headlines.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Really, that is all the statement says.

Mr. Reid: The question could have been planted on the opposition side.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On this side of the House planting is more difficult than it is on the other side. The statement says that the government has studied the report; it noted that the committee wants revisions made in the Public Service Staff Relations Act, that it wants a study made of the Public Service Employment Act, and that it wants the appointment of a task force. The minister now says, "We are making the first study, but we have not yet got the new bill. We hope to have it in the fall. We are carrying out the second suggestion and have had a study made of the Public Service Employment Act, but are not yet ready to introduce a bill. As for the proposed task force, one is being set up, and in the fall we hope to have a report." I do not know why the minister employed the device of the ministerial statement to put so little before the House. Perhaps he wanted to indulge in the following choice comment when he said:

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that members would not want the government to table prematurely hastily prepared and inadequately considered legislation.

You know, that sort of thing happens so often around here that I am surprised the minister would bother to say that. I suppose, as the hon. member who spoke on behalf of the Conservative party said, we now at least have a kind of timetable, a promissory note for legislation in the fall. The minister did not say which fall; I presume he meant the fall of 1976.

Sir, having said that the statement is hardly worth all this fuss, I had better be brief, and I shall be. I warn the minister and the government that the adoption of the report by the special joint committee was not unanimous. Some of us feel strongly that suggestions in the report give the government too much of a green light to go too far in terms of imposing excessive fines on union members and unions, in terms of other restrictions, enlarging the areas of designation, enlarging managerial exclusions, and so on. If the government is really concerned about good employer-employee relations, I urge it to look at the good things in the report but to beware of some of the pitfalls in it.

In the latter part of his statement, the minister said that one of the aims of the government is to foster good employer-employee relations. May I draw one item to his attention, after which I shall conclude. The matter has come to rest in the Privy Council office. I refer to a document called a "Personal history form" which many public servants are called upon to complete as part of a security check. It is being used widely in the Department of National Revenue and in other departments as well. The form has all the earmarks of a witch-hunt. One of the questions public servants are asked to answer is, "Where was your mother-in-law born?" What possible connection can that have with a public servant's right to a promotion?

I mention this today because I have been working on it, without bringing it to the floor of the House, for a couple of years. I have been in correspondence with the former chairman of the Public Service Commission. However, only recently I was told that matters have bogged down and that I had better write to an official in the Privy Council office. I did so and received a courteous reply from the official. But the writer of that reply could not tell me when something would be done about this, despite the many protests. I give the minister that assignment to work on since it is now in the Privy Council office. If he wants to have good employer-employee relations, he should not be asking public service employees, before they can get certain promotions, the birth place of one's mother-in law.

I said that we need to take much time on this, so I better not take any more. I am glad we shall get some action in the fall. I hope it will be the fall of 1976, and I hope the government will pay attention to some of the comments being made today.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, it is rather surprising to note that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) stated in the House today that the government is prepared to introduce measures or make recommendations about its relations with the civil service as early as next autumn.

Mr. Speaker, the President of the Privy Council has just said to the House that more than three years ago the government gave to Public Service Staff Relations Board Chairman Jacob Finkelman a mandate to study the relations between the federal government and the civil service. Now, the minister says that a year later the chairman did report the results of his thorough study. This means that for over two years the government has been well acquainted with the recommendations of that committee appointed by the government to consider relations between the government and the civil service.

It is hoped the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) will keep his promise and bring forward next fall legislation or recommendations in the field of relations between the public service and government. One thing I wish is that we would not see on the federal level the mess we are seeing in Quebec in the relations between the public service, that is the public and quasi-public employees and the government. There has been friction for too many years already at the expense of the taxpayer who must pay for both sides, for both the employees and the employer, because it must be owned that the federal government today is the employer who levies the highest taxes in Canada, the most labour intensive industry. The same can be said for the provincial level in Quebec as well as in Ontario.

Yet we hear those public servants yelling: "Higher pay, higher pay!". They do not realize that they are not paid from the profits of a business, but from the taxes of Canadians.

When they yell rightly or wrongly: "Higher pay!", they should display at the same time cards which read: "We want more and higher taxes, so as to get higher wages". I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that we will not see that here in Canada from the government, the unions nor the public service. Let us hope that as soon as the parliamentary business will resume, the government will bring forward specific legislation to foster understanding and cooperation between the public service and itself.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As this is a report indicating action in the future, and as it is a subject that has been studied rather extensively in committee, in exercising the discretion given to me under the rules I do not believe it appropriate to proceed to questions unless the situation is such that by disallowing questions at this time I am catching hon. members by surprise. Bearing that in mind, and the nature of the report that has been the subject of comment today, it appears the action is indicated for the future when there will be a more appropriate time for questions and comments from all sides of the House.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There has been some discussion among the House leaders and representatives of the parties about a special kind of procedure tonight at eight o'clock when the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Agriculture will wish to make statements on the same subject. Therefore, I would like to seek unanimous consent that the House shall revert to routine proceedings at 8 p.m. tonight in order to permit the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Transport, who is also responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, to make statements. The Minister of Agriculture will speak first, followed immediately by the Minister of Transport. This will be followed by spokesmen for each of the opposition parties. Both ministers will then be available for questions.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we have had some consultations with respect to this. That procedure is agreeable to us. As the minister was speaking, I was trying to think of problems that might arise with two ministers making statements this evening. There may not be any, aside from the fact that they may be opposed to one another. I do not know about that. In any event, we are agreeable to this procedure. I do not know of any difficulties that will arise, except for a feeling that I have that there may be some. I hope the spirit of the rules will be observed to the greatest extent possible. On that basis, we are prepared to consent. To the extent that he can, I hope that the President of the Privy Council will ensure that the statements are delivered early, since there are two of them.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we, too, are prepared, as we already indicated, to agree to this procedure. As the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has stated, a problem could arise, but we cannot tell until the two ministers speak. If they display the lack of cabinet solidarity that we see around this place from time to time, we may have to ask that two speakers from each party be permitted to respond. However, we will not worry about that bridge until we get to it. I simply want to underline the last words of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, that when we agreed to this it was on the understanding that copies of both statements would be in the hands of the spokesmen on this side of the House well in advance. I hope this can be done not later than six o'clock.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we also agreed on this procedure to enable the two ministers to make a statement this evening. As requested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), we would very much appreciate having a copy of these statements before six o'clock so that we may be able to take part in the debate following the ministers' statements at eight o'clock.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Subject only to the rather general misgivings that are harboured, there seems to be agreement that we will depart somewhat from the regular practice and revert to routine proceedings at eight o'clock this evening to permit statements on motions to be made by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Transport, followed by one spokesman from each of the opposition parties, then followed by a question period, again in the discretion of the Chair, when questions can be directed to either, or both, ministers by any questioner. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

KEJIMKUJIK FISH HATCHERY, NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 4,014—M. Crouse:

1. Was a decision made to close down the Kejimkujik Fish Hatchery in Queens County, Nova Scotia and, if so (a) on what date (b) who made it?

2. How many permanent staff members were retained since the retirement of the Hatchery Superintendent in July, 1973?

3. Was the Superintendent replaced and, if so (a) on what date (b) how many permanent staff were employed since the new appointment?

4. Was there a fungus problem affecting the fingerlings at the Hatchery and, if so (a) what was its nature (b) what steps were taken to clean it up (c) what is the name of the man who assessed the depth of the problem?

5. Was the decision to close the Hatchery based on the efficiency ratings since July, 1973?

6. Was the assessment and the fungus problem the reason for closing the Hatchery last July and, if so, for what reason was its closure announced as due to budgetary restrictions?

7. Will the Hatchery remain closed and (a) if so, will the house, buildings, ponds and grounds be sold (b) if not, on what date does the government plan to re-open the Hatchery?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fisheries)): 1. Yes. (a) the announcement of closure was made on July 7, 1975; (b) the Regional Director-General approved closure of the Station which was announced by the officer responsible.

2. The Superintendent went on sick leave in July, 1973. At that time there were two other permanent employees (M. Hill and C. Canning) and two term employees. The Superintendent died following his departure on sick leave. One permanent employee (C. Canning) retired on December 30, 1973, and the second (M. Hill) was transferred to another station.

3. The Superintendent's position was filled on an acting basis on November 1, 1973, by R. Eisner. He was later transferred to the Halifax office. In 1974 there were two permanent employees (A. Stannix and R. Ritcey), the Acting Superintendent and three term employees. In 1975 Mr. Stannix won a promotion to Yarmouth Station and Mr. Ritcey was transferred to Mersey Station in Queens County.

4. (a) Eruptions on the body surface of the hatchery fish at first suggested that the outbreak was fungal in nature. It was later diagnosed by disease specialists as an internal bacterial infection (Pasturella sp.) which causes lesions on the dorsal fin and sides of the body; (b) Initial treatment was the oral applications of antibiotics. After the bacteria was identified and found to be the first outbreak of this bacteria in North America, it was decided to destroy all fish at the Station to prevent the possible spread of the organism, (c) Identification of the bacteria was made by Dr. P. Bullock (Eastern Fish Disease Laboratory, Leetown, U.S.A.) and Dr. W. D. Paterson, Halifax, Fisheries and Marine Service.

5. No.

6. Budgetary restraint was the reason for closing a hatchery. The disease outbreak, the ability to relocate production effectively in the area and the limited staff dislocation were the reasons for selecting Kejimkujik.

7. The Station will remain closed for 1976-77 at least because of current budget restrictions. The Department does not intend to sell or transfer the buildings or the land at this time.

DONATIONS TO SWIMMING POOL AT 24 SUSSEX DRIVE

Question No. 5,155—Mr. Cossitt:

Are any businesses, companies, corporations or similar entities who have done, or who are doing business in any way with the government, involved with donations either of money or materials to the swimming pool constructed at the Prime Minister's official residence, 24 Sussex Drive?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): See reply to question 1,233 answered October 28, 1975.

Question No. 5,156—Mr. Cossitt:

Are officials, officers, etc. of any businesses, companies, corporations, or similar entities who have done, or who are doing business in any way with the government, involved with donations either of money or materials to the swimming pool constructed at the Prime Minister's official residence, 24 Sussex Drive?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): See reply to question 1,233 answered October 28, 1975.

AIR CANADA AIRCRAFT RENTED TO CUBA

Question No. 5,214—Mr. Cossitt:

1. How many aircraft have been rented to Cuba by Air Canada and, in each case (a) what type of aircraft (b) how long is the lease and (i) what are its renewal options (ii) does it contain any provisions as to who is responsible for damage to any aircraft while under lease to Cuba (c) by year, what is the (i) rental fee per aircraft (ii) total rental paid per year for all aircraft?

2. How many Cuban personnel have been or will be trained to operate such aircraft by Air Canada and (a) what is the training location (b) what is the total training cost and who is responsible for paying such costs?

3. With reference to the recent mid-air collision near Havana involving an Air Canada DC8 rented to Cuba, what is the estimated total cost of damage to the aircraft and what is a description of the damage (a) who will be paying the full cost of repairs to the aircraft (b) what investigation of the incident has been made and what are the results insofar as responsibility for the accident?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. Two; (a) Douglas DC-8-43; (b) Two years (b) (i) none (b) (ii) Yes. Cubana Airlines; (c) (i) (ii) The rental fee includes all scheduled and specific unscheduled maintenance and is information which for competitive commercial and other reasons is considered confidential.

2. Eight flight crews and 20 cabin attendants have been trained. Training for flight crews is still in progress; (a) Montreal, with a very limited amount in Havana; (b) Cost of training is considered confidential for competitive commercial and other reasons. Cubana Airlines is responsible for all costs.

3. The aircraft suffered a total construction loss due to damage sustained to the left wing and left wing power plants; (a) Because the aircraft suffered a total construction loss, it will not be repaired. The insurance which is carried by Cubana is payable to Air Canada; (b) the accident investigation is under the jurisdiction of the Cuban authorities because the aircraft is now registered with Cuban nationality. Until the investigation is completed, the results are unknown.

MAINTENANCE OF AIR CANADA AIRCRAFT RENTED TO CUBA

Question No. 5,215—Mr. Cossitt:

1. (a) Who is responsible for the maintenance of Air Canada aircraft rented to Cuba (b) in what location is it carried out (c) who pays for it?

2. Are the aircraft restricted by any agreement to operate between Montreal and Havana only and, if not, what other routes are permitted?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. (a) Air Canada is responsible for all scheduled maintenance and any unscheduled maintenance performed in Canada and Cuban Airlines for all unscheduled maintenance performed outside Canada; (b) Montreal and Havana; (c) Cubana Airlines.

2. Cubana may use the aircraft exclusively in relation to the ordinary and normal conduct of its commercial operations as a civil carrier for passengers, cargo and mail.

MR. GUY D'AVIGNON

Question No. 5,268—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Mr. Guy D'Avignon, former head of Information Canada, appointed as a Special Advisor to the Privy Council Office and, if so (a) is he receiving a Deputy Minister's salary (b) what is his salary (c) what is a detailed description of his duties (d) what are all the considerations that led to his appointment (e) what qualifications does he have for the job?

2. Were his duties undefined at the time the appointment was made and, if so, what are the reasons justifying the appointment at Deputy Minister rank for undefined duties?

3. Was such appointment used to keep Mr. D'Avignon on the government payroll following abolition of Information Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1 (a), (b), (d) and 3. Mr. D'Avignon was appointed Special Adviser to the Privy Council Office at the salary he had been receiving in the DM-1 range ($41,000—$54,000). The appointment was made to enable the government to continue to use Mr. D'Avignon's services for special tasks until he assumes the position of Chairman of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal on July 1, 1976.

1 (c), (e) and 2. At the time of his appointment Mr. D'Avignon was assigned to assist with the program of information to the public relating to the anti-inflation measures currently being undertaken by the government. There was no detailed description of these duties. Mr. D'Avignon's qualifications for the work derive from his experience as Assistant Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Administration and Finance) and later as Director of Information Canada.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Question No. 5,312—Mr. Nystrom:

What was the total government participation in the cost of grading, paving and building interchanges of the construction of a four-lane highway along the Trans-Canada Highway route between Calgary and the Banff National Park east entrance gate?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): $13,173,103.84

COST OF ICE FORECASTING PROGRAMME TO TRANSPORT CANADA

Question No. 5,347—Mr. Forrestall:

What is the Department of Transport's best estimate of the annual cost for the past two years of maintaining the Ice Forecasting Central Branch of the Department in respect of the ice monitoring in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the St. Lawrence River?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Ice Forecasting Programme is administered by the Department of the Environment and is implemented through their Ice Central Office in Ottawa. Transport Canada does not share in the cost of this programme other than for the cost of operating two long range ice reconnaissance aircraft. The Department operates Marine Traffic Centres at Dartmouth and Montreal, and these centres provide ice information and recommended routes to shipping in the Gulf and River of St. Lawrence. The costs to Transport Canada for the operation of these aircraft and centres during the ice navigation seasons in the last two years are as follows: 1974: Aircraft, $1,557,000; Marine Traffic Centres (Ice Operations Portions)—$61,300. 1975: Aircraft, $2,849,250; Marine Traffic Centres (Ice Operations Portion)—$68,500.

ANNA MAE PICTOU AQUASH

Question No. 5,370—Mr. Fairweather:

To the knowledge of the government, was Anna Mae Pictou Aquash, a Canadian citizen, killed on or about February 24, 1976 on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota, USA and, if so (a) was her body mutilated (b) was an inquiry regarding the circumstances surrounding her death requested by Canada and will the results of such inquiry be communicated to her family?

[Mr. Cossitt.]

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): (a) Yes. The Canadian Consulate in Minneapolis, whose territory also includes South Dakota, was informed by United States authorities in Rapid City, South Dakota, that the body of Anne Mae Pictou (Aquash) had been found on February 26, 1976, on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota. According to the Doctor who performed the first autopsy, the body appeared to have been dead for a period of 10 to 18 days. According to the lawyer engaged by the Pictou family and the doctor who performed the second autopsy it would appear that the victim's hands had been mutilated, presumably for identification purposes; (b) Yes, the Canadian Government has asked the United States authorities to conduct an enquiry concerning the circumstances of Miss Pictou's death and the results of such enquiry will be communicated to her family.

CONSUMER HELP OFFICES

Question No. 5,407—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

1. From 1970 to date, how many Consumers' Assistance offices has the government established in Canada and what is the number in each province?

2. For each year, what amount of money has the government invested in the establishment of such offices in the Constituencies of (a) Témiscamingue (b) Villeneuve (c) Abitibi?

3. How many jobs have been created following the establishment of the offices in the Constituencies of (a) Témiscamingue (b) Villeneuve (c) Abitibi?

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. 1. Seventeen Consumer Help Offices have been established in Canada; one in B.C.; two in Alberta; two in Saskatchewan; two in Manitoba; five in Ontario; three in Quebec; one in New Brunswick; and one in Nova Scotia.

2. (a) none; (b) none; (c) none.

3. (a) none; (b) none; (c) none.

ANNUAL REPORTS

Question No. 5,418—Mr. MacKay:

1. What was the cost of producing the Annual Reports of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in 1974 and 1975?

2. (a) Were the publications printed by the Department or by a private firm (b) if contracts were let, were public tenders called?

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. 1973-74, $2,381.12; 1974-75, $6,612.48.

2. (a) Private firm; (b) yes.

COST OF TV-IN-THE-HOUSE OF COMMONS

Question No. 5,437—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. What was the cost of preparing and presenting the TV-in-the-House programme now available to Members and to what portion of this cost has CBC contributed?

2. From the budget of what department are such costs being met and on what date were they approved by Parliament?

3. What wiring has been installed in the House of Commons to accommodate the proposed acceptance by the House that its proceedings be televised and what was the cost?

4. Is it proposed to use the existing sound system in the House or is a separate audio system to be installed?

5. What is the estimated (a) capital (b) operational cost of implementing the proposals?

6. Do the estimates cover the special air-conditioned storage vaults to be used for the archival library of the video-tapes and, if not, what is the estimated cost?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): 1. Direct costs attributable to the Privy Council Office are $1,905.10. This total reflects the following costs: United Nations, $980.10; Patrick Watson, $500; Rental of presentation equipment, $425. Costs attributable to the CBC are $2,750. This total reflects the costs of preparation and assembly of the audio-visual presentation, rental of lighting equipment and lighting experimentation in the Commons Chamber and incidental expenses. Costs of Special Advisors to the President of the Privy Council.

NOTE: These costs include research and advice on all aspects of broadcasting Parliament as well as preparation of the audio-visual presentation.

Robert Anderson Associates Ltd., 1975-76, $35,539.45; 1976-77, $3,625. Douglas Wilkinson, 1975-76, $18,775.35; 1976-77, $3,600.

2. Costs attributable to the Privy Council Office are being met through Vote No. 1 authorized by an Appropriation Act in the normal way for 1975-76 and by the Appropriation Act (Interim Supply) for expenditures incurred in the relevant portion of the 1976-77 fiscal year. Costs attributable to the CBC are being met through the normal operating budget of the Corporation.

3. None.

4. Modifications in the existing sound system are being studied by the Speaker's Office in order to improve the efficiency of the sound facilities within the House of Commons. The modifications planned for the existing system will be adequate for television and radio broadcasting. As the resolution proposing the approval of the radio and television broadcasting of the House of Commons and its Committee proceedings, standing in the name of the President of the Privy Council, is still before the House, no decisions with regard to any technical installations in the Chamber have been taken.

5. The resolution mentioned in part 4 proposes the appointment of a special committee composed of Mr. Speaker and seven other members to supervise the implementation of the resolution. As the motion is still before the House of Commons, and therefore no committee has been constituted, no proposals have been submitted or approved. Technical information provided by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation indicates that capital costs of installing appropriate television broadcasting equipment in the Chamber, including architectural and engineering modifications, would be in the order of $3,200,000. Annual operating costs including cost of videotape stock to provide continuous coverage of House and Committee proceedings is estimated at approximately $935,000.

6. The National Archives has been consulted on the question of videotape storage but pending approval by Parliament, no decisions have been taken.

MR. PIERRE JUNEAU

Question No. 5,442—Mr. Cossitt:

1. On what date did Pierre Juneau join the staff of the Prime Minister's Office (a) what is his annual salary (b) exactly how much in remuneration and expenses has he received from the date of his appointment to the date the answer to this question is prepared?

2. (a) What is a full list of all duties and details of specific tasks performed by Mr. Juneau since joining the Prime Minister's Office (b) do these duties include policy advice of any kind and, if so, what are the exact subjects on which he has given policy advice?

3. How long will Mr. Juneau be retained on the staff of the Prime Minister's Office?

4. (a) Is the Prime Minister considering appointing Mr. Juneau to the Senate and, if so, for what reason (b) what other appointments is the Prime Minister considering for Mr. Juneau?

5. On what date was the answer to this question prepared?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. November 6, 1975; (a) See reply to question 2,984 answered February 6, 1976; (b) Remuneration, see 1 (a). Expenses, $2,661.78.

2. A copy of the public communiqué announcing Mr. Juneau's nomination and functions is being sent to the Honourable Member.

3 and 4. See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, Citation 171 (g).

5. The Government takes responsibility for the answers it provides to questions on the Order Paper and for the process involved in replying to such questions. It is not appropriate therefore to provide information such as asked in this question about internal administrative workings.

COST OF TELEVISING OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Question No. 5,454—Mr. Beatty:

1. What is the cost of the audio-visual presentation concerning the televising of the proceedings of the House of Commons, prepared for the Office of the President of the Privy Council and what are all the details of the cost?

2. By whom was the presentation prepared and what instructions were given by the government with respect to the preparation of the presentation?

3. Were any capital expenditures for equipment such as television monitors required for the preparation and presentation of the audio-visual materials in question and, if so, what was the equipment and what was its cost?

4. When was the audio-visual presentation completed and how many times has it been shown since?

5. (a) What is the name of the group selected by the President of the Privy Council to make the presentation to Parliamentarians (b) what is the total amount they will be paid for their services (c) were they chosen by tender (d) what are their qualifications?

6. Did the Office of the President of the Privy Council specifically request that both the positive and negative aspect of televising the proceedings of the House of Commons should be fairly represented in this presentation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): 1. See reply to part 1 of Question 5,437 tabled this day.

Order Paper Questions

2. The presentation, consisting of a videotape record of information available in relation to television broadcasting of the proceedings of public bodies, including the United Nations, Swedish House of Assembly, House of Commons of the United Kingdom, legislature of the Province of Alberta and the United States Senate, was prepared under the direction of Robert Anderson Associates Limited with the cooperation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. No instructions were given by the Government other than a request for an audio-visual compilation of available material in a readily assimilable format.

3. No.

4. English language 2 inch tape presentation completed February 12, 1976. ¾ inch production completed February 16, 1976. The English production has been shown 17 times. French language videotape presentation, 2 inch production completed March 19, 1976. ¾ inch tape production completed March 25, 1976. The French language presentation has been shown 3 times.

5. (a) Robert Anderson Associates Limited; (b) The amount of fees payable to Robert Anderson Associates Limited will not be available until their services are terminated. (See answer to part 1 of question 5,437 tabled this day for amounts paid in 1975-1976 and up to May 10th in 1976-1977); (c) No; (d) Robert Anderson Associates Limited has completed numerous audio-visual productions including both film and television documentaries in Canada and the United States and has been awarded international recognition. Robert Anderson has acted as audio-visual consultant to various agencies including the Centennial Commission, the National Research Council and the United States Educational Television Network. Douglas Wilkinson, who assisted in the preparation, of the audio-visual presentation, is a film-maker, television producer, lecturer for his books on the Canadian Arctic and his award-winning films.

6. No instructions were issued as to the orientation of the presentation. This was a responsibility of the producers.

REVENUE ACCRUING FROM CARGO FROM VESSELS IN THE BEAUFORT FLATS AREA

Question No. 5,472—Mr. Forrestall:

What was the total revenue to the National Harbours Board accruing from cargo loaded/unloaded to or from vessels at berths 53 and 54 in the Beauport Flats area of the Port of Quebec for each year since the completion of such berths?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows:

Year	Berth 53 ($)	Berth 54 ($)	Total ($)
1969	6,377	1,061	7,438
1970	102,907	5,650	108,557
1971	118,255	71,666	189,921
1972	143,113	113,812	256,925
1973	168,830	84,552	253,382
1974	180,186	74,002	254,188
1975	132,239	41,858	174,097

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed from Friday, May 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the last ten years hon. members of this House have had to give their opinion on capital punishment and to take part in four important debates on this subject.

On October 24, 1973, the Parliament of Canada decided for the abolition of the death penalty by 119 votes against 106, except for the murder of security guards, prison guards and policemen. On that occasion, Mr. Speaker, I voted for Bill C-2.

Today, I would like to enumerate the reasons why I changed my views and I shall describe the process of the consultation I had to undertake.

I for one attach great value to the general attitude we have toward life, the dignity of the human being and the character of people and that prompts me to act prudently while deciding whether the state should intervene in the life or death of a human being. If we refuse to the state the right to take the life of one of its members, we should, to be consistent, deny it the right to deprive someone of freedom for his lifetime and to remove all hope of freedom.

Is it not just as cruel to imprison a human being for 25 years without any rehabilitation opportunity as prescribed by Bill C-84 now before the House? First, I wish to explain the different categories of murders and see if capital punishment has a deterrent effect or not and what are the possibilities of hanging an innocent victim. As I said earlier, we must first place the debate in its actual context and define the procedure concerning the identification of the presumed offender or define the categories of murders punishable by death.

But we should not think that the retentionists are potential jailers and that they would be ready to apply capital punishment for all murders. I am favorable to rehabilitation policies and during my experience in Parliament I dealt with some cases and I have two examples of persons who have been rehabilitated in the riding I have the honour to represent and I can say that I believe in rehabilitation as those two people are now well adapted and very active in society and are not parasites living off society. On the other hand, I love life too much to let those who have no respect for the life of others walk freely in the streets.

So, I wish to clearly classify murders in two categories as prescribed by the legislation that makes a distinction between first degree murder, that is a planned and deliberate murder including contracted murder, the murder of a policeman or a prison or penitentiary employee acting in the course of their duties. First degree murder is also the murder committed during the highjacking of an aircraft, a kidnapping or some sexual offense including rape and attempted rape. Those are first degree murders. Second degree murder includes all other murders including crime due to jealousy. The definition of first degree and second degree murders should be well understood.

What are the new penalties applied under Bill C-84 now under study? A person convicted of first degree murder will be sentenced to 25 years' imprisonment before being eligible for parole for the first time.

A person convicted of second degree murder may be eligible for parole only after 10 full years in prison. However, the judge may, if the jury so recommends, extend to 25 years the mandatory prison sentence without parole.

So, there are the differences between the two categories of murders and the penalties provided for in Bill C-84.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to answer some of the questions we may ask ourselves or make a few comments about some of the statements made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) when he launched the debate on this bill on May 3 last, when he said that those who believe in the deterrent value of the death penalty are maybe a little more simplistic, a little more narrow-minded. I do not want to report him as saying things he did not say, that is why I would like to remind him of his statement as recorded on page 13089 of Hansard.

I also heard some members take a stand against the death penalty because they think is has no deterrent effect and, here again, we are provided with statistical data. The solicitor General said that those who claim that the increase in the number of murders is due to the fact that there has not been any execution in Canada since 1962 are wrong and mislead those who listen to them.

I will refrain from quoting a whole part of the speech because my time is limited, but in any case I respect the view expressed by the Solicitor General, although I do not agree with the terms he used, and I also respect my colleagues who expressed the same view. But I have a lot of reservations before using this argument in favour of the abolition of the death penalty. Those figures do not single out the deterrent effect because they were not established with a view to drawing conclusions, but with a view to confirming a conclusion which was already made through a moral and philosophic reasoning or else, by intuition.

Statistical data give rise to various interpretations. It is almost impossible to make useful comparisons between various countries because of the differences in the legal definition, in crimes, in the practices of the various departments concerned, in the different courts, in the way of gathering criminal data which differ from one country to another, in the morality and behaviour standards and finally in the political, economic and social conditions of those various countries.

I believe, however, that we can quite naturally assume that the professional criminal who views prison as a trade hazard considers the death penalty as something quite different. Clearly, when a murder is committed, there has been no deterrent. But this in no way implies capital punishment did not deter other inmates from committing murder. Statistics are impossible to obtain on that possibility, on the number of people who did not commit murder. Offences only are reported. Those cases where the offence was not committed appear nowhere in statistics. It seems to me that on the basis of statistics only, it cannot be stated that capital punishment is not a deterrent, because it is said that since it was abolished, there does not appear to be a rising crime rate.

Even referring to the research centre report entitled: A study of capital punishment as evidenced by Canadian associations, which was published by the Solicitor General and which very clearly refers to the criminal behaviour trend from 1962 to 1970, while in 1962, the rate was 1.7 per 100,000 people 7 years old or more, the rate was 2.3 in 1970. Looking at statistics of attempted murders appearing in the same report in Table 33, we see that the rate went from 0.5 per 100,000 in 1962 to 1.4 in 1970. Therefore, the rate is on the increase. I believe there is always a danger in comparing statistics from different countries with and without capital punishment. This is always subject to errors.

My decision was taken in the light of information received, a document I consulted, and also my personal experience. I would like to stress to the hon. members that there is actually a deterrence, although some would argue to the contrary. I am referring to hangings at the Bordeaux prison, in the north end of Montreal. On the evenings where somebody was hanged, people used to gather in front of the prison. There was complete silence among those people. Everyone waited for the flag to be hoisted, confirming that the poor victim was dead.

I went there twice and I admit that I did not remain indifferent. One cannot remain insensitive to such a spectacle, if I may call it that. We were all silent and sad and in favour of mercy on the part of the jury or the Supreme Court. As to the inmates inside the prisons, a chaplain confirmed to me that it was a day of mourning for all of them, and that the mourning did not last only one day but several days before and after the hanging. The inmates really refected and realized that this penalty given for a crime, I am still talking of premeditated murder, gave a true idea of the horror it inspires to most people.

That day certainly included for inmates and members of criminal circles outside, that is members of the mafia or organized crime, moments of refection which, in my estimation, were and are likely to prevent other crimes by the inmates who are spending jail terms of 25 years such as proposed in the bill and will at least act as a deterrent for the inmates. Prisoners are not motivated in any way toward good conduct because they are in for 25 years. What will they loose by committing a second murder? For them, there is no possibility of rehabilitation. Following this process, Mr. Speaker, I for one believe that capital punishment acts as a deterrent.

Secondly, what is the danger or risk of making a mistake and hanging an innocent victim? It seems to me that the development of social legislation and gratuities, and the advantages of legal assistance for court defence and of identification of the true victims by medical procedures, by the unanimous decision of the jury, the Appeals Court and the Supreme Court eliminate all possibility of error during the trial. And speaking about unanimity of the jury, I would like to refer to the trial of Jean-Guy Dubois and Jacques Ouimet, where the ninth member of the jury had some doubts and the judge asked for a new trial. This trial will take place in the fall. I believe that this is certainly a precaution which aims at preventing innocent people from becoming victims of the death penalty.

In my opinion, the present situation is much more dangerous to the extent that innocents are victimized without a trial. If we continue the present system, that is if we maintain the abolition of the death penalty, and even if we eliminate the exceptions that I mentioned at the beginning of my speech, if we completely abolish the death penalty, I believe that such an attitude will greatly increase the danger that innocent people would become the victims, and without benefit of a trial.

I am very concerned that simply to defend themselves, people will shoot to stop the first criminal attempt. For instance, you will recall the pharmacist who saw someone go into his store and simply to defend himself, chose to shoot first instead of becoming a victim. It seems to me that the present situation is more dangerous, that is that Canadian citizens run a greater risk of being innocent victims now than if the death penalty were established within the framework that I mentioned at the beginning of my speech.

As concerns social defence theoreticians who blame society for everything, it seems to me that they have a tendency to negate individual responsibility. It is true that we have established all sorts of services or social and even protectionist policies, and I have always been in favour of such initiatives, which form the basis of civilization, of love, of friendship, and I would even say of human society. But for some people, the establishment of these structures becomes a means to evade their responsibities.

For some, all these programs constitute a way to evade their responsibilities, and they rely only on others and prefer letting the community do everything instead of developing a personal interest or motivation for work, and a discipline for life. If they have a problem, they prefer to dilute their responsibility on the rest of the community.

Generalization of that belief leads to the conclusion that society alone is responsible for the mistakes of individuals. I think a criminogenic virus more powerful in itself than all its pharmacopoeia and likely to ruin its action is being maintained and fed. Capital punishment should not be considered as pure vengeance, nor those who are in favour of capital punishment as more simplistic minds than others. It is healthy for society to be able to condemn symbolically a sordid crime. To deny society that right would be to urge it to show more severity for crime and downgrade its standards of public morality.

In concluding I will support all rehabilitation measures for inmates who accept to live within society. And I hope to have the opportunity at other times to speak on the measures I would like to see implemented in the area of rehabilitation, measures that I already advocated at the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary before, unfortunately, a decision was made to wind up in three stages all farm production material on that 400 acre farm where vegetables, meat and dairy products were produced on the farm, and an unfortunate decision was made to close that farm altogether and buy at retail prices all the food required for the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary and the Archambault Institute. I think in that context we could have got a rehabilitation policy going.

So I suggest that the courts make it a priority to proceed with the trial of an alleged murderer and that deliberation take place in a reasonable delay rather than cases being postponed for two or three years. Quite often witnesses could not be found; I am not talking about a very short delay so that public opinion, feeling and emotion can be aroused through the papers, but a reasonable delay. I think we should make it a priority to hear those trials, and in a reasonable delay. Mr. Speaker, if Parliament votes the abolition of capital punishment I ask the government to amend the law so at least a second time murderer will be subject to capital punishment, and that his trial be proceeded with as soon as possible.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow my good friend, the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy), and I congratulate him on a well reasoned and well thought-out speech. As the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) indicated today, this has been a very long debate, with in the order of 70 speakers participating so far. This reflects the great importance members place on this issue and the deep sense of conviction members hold on both sides of the question. Because of this, they feel compelled to speak and place on record their views and, indeed, the views of their constituents.

As other speakers who have preceded me have indicated, this is certainly not one of the most pleasurable debates in which one might participate. There have been a number of speeches covering, in essence, every aspect of this important subject. There have been excellent presentations on both sides of the issue. I have listened to a great number of those speeches and have read many more, and regardless of the view one might hold on this subject, one cannot be anything but impressed by the very high calibre and sincerity hon. members have displayed in their approach to the issue.

I do not wish to minimize the contribution of any member who has taken part in the debate, and certainly not of the hon. member who preceded me for whom I have developed a great amount of respect and admiration over the years. But I must say, after reading the speeches, I was most impressed by the contribution of such members as the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk), the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik), the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) and, on Friday, the very thoughtful presentation by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). To those hon. members who did not have an opportunity of hearing those speeches or have not as yet had an opportunity of reading them, I would certainly commend them for reading.

There is no question but that the issue of capital punishment has once again caused widespread concern and further active debate in all parts of Canada. As one hon. member has put it in this House, there is a feeling of anxiety and quiet desperation toward the whole issue of violent crime in our society and the manner with which this government in particular has approached it. The anxiety, quite frankly, involves the safety and security of all citizens in Canada. There is growing apprehension as to what will be done, if anything, to restore safety and security in Canada.

Most of us have received a great deal of mail on this subject, and some of us have conducted surveys. Some of the comments we have heard from our constituents can be summed up by phrases such as: murderers should be treated as a threat to society and not as a menace to society; either keep them in prison and a long way from society, or definitely reinstate the death penalty. Perhaps their feelings can be summed up by a phrase of this order: we do not need murderers walking around to murder again, or the expense of keeping them in jail. There is a general feeling of desperation and frustration. I can assure the House that the feeling of concern is widespread and most genuine.

Through this bill we are once again asked to place our positions on the line. A vote for this bill will, in fact, be a vote to abolish capital punishment and a vote against will be a vote to reconfirm the five-year partial abolition which expires, I believe, in 1978. The first question which arises in my mind is why we have to be dealing with this piece of legislation at this particular time. This law still has another 2½ years or so to run. We have a law on the statute books and it is amazing to me that we find ourselves dealing with this particular issue at a time when we have so many other important issues facing the country. One can only assume that this is an attempt to divert attention from the real issues facing the country, or an attempt to divert our attention from getting at the root causes of violent crime. For whatever reason, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and the government have seen fit to bring this bill forward, we as members are called upon again to render another decision.

Most members will agree that this is not a clearcut issue. Nor is it easy to rationalize or decide which is the best route to choose in casting one's vote on this issue. It is perhaps the most agonizing deliberation I have ever engaged in, and I am sure it is agonizing to all hon. members, at least judging from the sincerity and the manner in which hon. members have made their individual presentations to the House. The issue is associated with religious, philosophical and traditional connotations. It is related, as well, to such factors and considerations as rehabilitation, the question and philosophy of punishment, the philosophy of revenge and reform, and whether or not capital punishment is a deterrent to murder. There have been convincing arguments on both sides of the issue.

Moreover, we have been bombarded by reams of statistical data as well as the historical evaluation and study of capital punishment—courtesy of the Solicitor General's department! We have been subjected to a fair amount of so-called expert opinion, if you will, from those who conveniently endorse the Solicitor General's view. Quite frankly, I really must question the objective validity of some of those so-called expert opinions placed before us. Those people, in my view, have an obvious bias, as does anyone who participates in this debate, and in my view they simply set out to rationalize or justify their views by applying selected statistics, and interpreting those statistics to the best advantage in support of their viewpoints.

I suppose that is fair and part of debate, or part of putting forward one's own particular point of view, but I say that this circumstance should be made abundantly clear. Quite frankly, I question whether in fact there are any real experts in this particular field. If so, who are they, because, as the hon. member for Laval just pointed out, you can manipulate statistics to prove any point of view—and we see it happening in this case. We see statistical evidence used to support either point of view quite effectively.

So I believe that one has to rely upon one's own beliefs and whatever view one has, supported by his evidence and supported by one's constituents—if you will, one's own gut feeling. If the bill should pass, it will in effect give approval to the past actions of the government, since the law which we now have on the books has not been implemented. In my view, the government has failed to enforce the spirit and the intent of the law. Yet I am aware of the fact that the governor in council may commute a sentence of death to imprisonment for life or invoke the royal prerogative of mercy, but I wonder whether, by applying those two sections in every case, the real intent and spirit of the law is complied with. I submit it is not. What is irritating Canadians more than anything else is simply the failure of the government to comply with the spirit of our laws. In that connection, I circulated a survey to my constituents in response to which I received some comments which appeared on the form from a resident in the Vegreville federal constituency. The comments read:

> Can we be certain after the last legislation in which, when police and prison guards were murdered and their murderers were supposed to get the death penalty and didn't, that this new legislation is going to help the situation? If that was not enforced, how can we be certain that this will be? Will these murderers be out on the streets again in a year or two, or will we finally stand behind our legislation? In the way in which our legislation is getting more lenient, in a few years will murder be legalized?

I think that sums up the irritation and the frustration of many Canadians across this land. To a large number of Canadians this government has simply flaunted the law. I suggest, also, that this sort of action by the government contributes to cynicism and mistrust of politics, politicians and our institutions. The failure of the government to enforce the law which currently exists on our statute books has resulted in the downgrading of respect for the law and has made a mockery of our legislative process. Moreover, we have had a widespread feeling in the country that law enforcement has not been sufficiently stern, that it has gone soft, creating a coddling of the criminal environment, to the detriment of the safety and security of Canadians. Because of this attitude on the part of the government in the administration of justice, many Canadians have serious doubts and reservations about the sincerity and determination to apply this new law firmly and effectively.

Our law states that the murder of policemen and prison guards will result in the death penalty, and in all other cases the punishment is life imprisonment. This law has been in existence since 1968. If we look at the figures which have been provided by the Solicitor General, we find that in the period from January, 1968, to December, 1974, the average time served by murderers convicted of capital murder whose sentences were commuted was 13.2 years. Those convicted of non-capital murder and sentenced to life served an average of 7.7 years. As I said, most Canadians fail to believe that suddenly with the passage of this bill the government, given its past record, will extend the mandatory period to 25 years, or 15 years in certain circumstances in the case of first-degree murder and to ten years in the case of second-degree murder. What makes this law more rigid, than the existing one presently on our books? I do not believe that the spirit of this law will be complied with. I suggest that this is merely an attempt to hoodwink Canadians into believing that they will be more secure with this measure than with the existing law which the government has failed to carry out.

We know all too well that there are ways of getting around the application of the spirit and intent of the law through parole measures with rehabilitation, through regulations, and through so called measures of reform. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians have lost confidence in the administration of justice as it relates to crime and violence in this country and it will not be restored by the passage of this bill.

I intend to vote against this bill because I believe that capital punishment is a deterrent for all forms of planned, premeditated or "contract" murders. In my view, the essence of life is the struggle to avoid death, and if death is not a deterrent, then why do we fight so vigorously to live? I simply cannot accept the view that a prospective murderer deliberately planning to take another man's life would consider the death penalty to be no more severe than life imprisonment. Furthermore, any person who takes the life of a fellow human being by contract or in a planned or premeditated ways deserves nothing more than the same. I say that whether it is in the name of revenge, punishment or the protection of society.

My second reason for voting against this measure is based on the view of my constituents, supported by the views of the vast majority of Canadians in this country. Quite simply, they want the death penalty returned. In that connection I have conducted a survey based upon this legislation. It is not a general questionnaire asking whether one is in favour of or against the death penalty. I based my questions on a summary of this legislation and sent out 20,000 copies, of which 4,000 were returned—a 20 per cent response. The question is whether the federal government proposes to abolish capital punishment for persons convicted of murder and replace it with a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment.

I stated that under the new law, murder will be divided into two cagetories: First, first-degree murder, which includes planned and deliberate murder including contract murder, the murder of police officers and persons working in a prison in the line of duty, murder committed in the course of hijacking, kidnapping and certain sexual offences; and second, second-degree murder, which includes all other murders such as murder of passion. I also stated that the death penalty for both first and second-degree murder is a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment.

The questionnaire goes on to say that persons convicted of first-degree murder must serve 25 years of imprisonment before being considered eligible for parole. Persons convicted of second-degree murder will not be eligible for parole until they have served a minimum of ten years of their sentence. This period may be increased, however, to 25 years, depending upon the discretion of the judge and jury. There are provisions for a review of the parole eligibility date by three supreme court judges after an offender has served 15 years. The questionnaire asked: "Do you agree or disagree with this proposal," and 18.6 per cent agreed, 71.8 per cent disagreed, and 9.6 per cent expressed no opinion. The second question was: "If you disagree, do you feel the death penalty should be reinstated," and 82.9 per cent agreed, 5.9 per cent disagreed, and 11.2 per cent had no opinion.

The support for the death penalty was for premeditated murder and the murder of policemen and prison guards. This survey coincides with the feelings which were cited in the booklet entitled "The Canadian Public and the Death Penalty", a study of a social attitude by Professor Fattah, chairman of the criminology department, Simon Fraser University, Burnaby, B.C. While the learned professor concedes that the Canadian people in fact want the retention of the death penalty, he suggests, in the same vein, that such public opinion is uninformed, irrational and uneducated. Well, all I can say to this House is that I consider my constituents to be no less uninformed or no more irrational or less educated than the average Canadian. I have great respect for my constituents and for their views. When we are asked to pass judgment on an issue as complex and as important as this issue, on which I feel there are no real experts, I have absolutely no hesitation whatsoever in asking for and relying on the guidance and advice of my constituents, and this I have done.

As I said earlier, the views which have been expressed by my constituents coincide with the mood of the country. If we ignore the wishes of the majority on this issus, which has been consistently in favour of retention, based upon the statistics over the last seven or eight years which were presented by Professor Fattah, we are, in effect, questioning the validity of democracy, and indeed, the election of a government on the basis of who gets the most votes and in turn the most seats. I believe that to ignore public opinion on this issue is inconsistent and contemptuous of majority rule. That is an affront to one of the basic principles of democracy. After all, governments get elected by a majority, which is an expression of a majority opinion. For those who might disagree with my rationale, I suggest that we choose a national referendum to settle the subject once and for all.

I say once again that there is a growing amount of cynicism about politics, politicians and our democratic institutions. Much of this emanates from the failure of our politicians accurately to reflect the views of those whom they represent. I believe in democracy. The issue before us is indeed difficult and complex, and I believe that when we are faced with an issue as sensitive as this, one which goes to the very core of our social and moral fabric, we should solve it, not by ignoring the wishes of the majority of Canadians but by accepting the wishes of the majority. Very clearly, the majority of Canadians are opposed to total abolition. That is the position of the majority of my constituents, and that is the position I shall take when I cast my vote on this bill.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Supply and Services—Lockheed contract—Department's knowledge of financing difficulties; the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—Transport—Increase in container freight rates—Request for review by Transport Commission or government intervention; the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt)— Agriculture—Number of cattle and sheep destroyed under blue tongue control program.

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this debate on this occasion, under the circumstances of the economic ills facing this country, seems to me to be put a red herring designed strictly to captivate public attention and to turn aside from those matters which the government should really be addressing itself to rather than this. First, there was Bill C-83, an omnibus bill designed, one would almost say, to be sure that people would be taken away from the problems of wage and price controls, the problems of unemployment and many other important problems. Then to top it off, along comes Bill C-84.

Bill C-84 marks the fifth time in my career in this House that there has been debate on capital punishment. In 1958 there was a motion by the then member for Scarborough, Frank McGee. There was no vote on that occasion. Then is 1966 or thereabouts there was a government motion, a resolution which did not carry. It was defeated. Then in 1967, in a quick volte face, the government came forward with a bill restricting capital punishment. This was repeated in 1972 with the five-year renewal, and now we are faced with the total abolition of capital punishment. Considering what the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and other hon. members in this House have said, and public opinion being what it is, one wonders at the sanity and the purpose of the government in bringing forward this matter at this time.

If I may be permitted a personal note, some 70 hon. members have spoken. Perhaps I am about the seventy-third speaker on this subject, and there will be just as many more, if not more than that. I regret that in so far as this debate is concerned there have been far too many carefully honed, prepared transcripts which hon. members have read with varying degrees of success. There is only one purpose for that. It is a transgression of the standard of conduct of this House. No one, other than a minister reading a carefully prepared explanation of some legislation should use a text.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) can make his own remarks. I have seen far too many of those speeches. Let the hon. member check the attendances at committee and then he can make those allegations. I say, with all due respect to the Chair, that I think it would improve debate a great deal if not so many prepared texts were used.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Hon. members have had plenty of experience in this House. I realize that at the beginning this chamber can be very awe-inspiring and perhaps some members then require a prepared speech.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Certainly.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, does the hon. member who has the floor realize that the speaker who preceded him was speaking from notes that were carefully prepared?

Mr. Paproski: He was not.

An hon. Member: He did not read from them.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have not had any opportunity to consider whether my colleague the hon. member for Vegreville, followed a text.

Mr. Mazankowski: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Mazankowski: If the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) wants to strike at the arguments of my friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and cannot find any better weapon than by picking on me, I suggest he should remarshall his forces. I think it is very unfair for him to cast aspersions against my speech. I had notes written out in handwriting, and I do not think there is any law against that. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his statement.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I was watching the hon. member for Vegreville, and I certainly did not see him read his speech; but he did have notes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) on a point of order.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully submit that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has cast aspersions on all of us. I know I did not use my notes during my speech, and in fact the hon. member accused me of speaking to the angels because I was looking down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. In the opinion of the Chair, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain is always an angel.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, not all hon. members, of course, but far too many have spoken from texts. It seems to me that the sooner we get back to the practice of speaking directly, the better. After all, every one of us was elected by speaking directly to his constituents. No member would dare appear on a platform and speak from a text.

Mr. Roy (Laval): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) on a point of order. I would suggest that we get back to the subject of Bill C-84.

[Translation]

Mr. Roy (Laval): Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

[Mr. Caccia.]

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that if the hon. member refers to some member of any of the parties in the House, I think it is sometimes advisable to prepare one's speeches. Then they are much more consistent, relevant and concise and the time of the House is not wasted.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Chair would suggest that we are getting into a point of debate and we should get back to the terms of Bill C-84.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Very well, Mr. Speaker. The reason I raise this point is that I am not always too sure the speech is the view of the hon. member who is making it. I also find it a bad practice to have a copy of the speech and to hand it to the media. The media have access to the "blues", the working copies, and can get their reports quickly. There is no need for a written copy to be handed to the media.

Interest in capital punishment has waxed and waned. No capital sentence has been carried out since 1962, despite clearcut indications that the exercise of the royal prerogative by the cabinet has been nothing short of blatant abuse. In 1964-65 we had the Santa Claus murder case, and there was a sort of five minutes to midnight commutation. There had been no recommendation for mercy in this cold-blooded killing of policemen and yet there was a commutation.

There was another instance where I know hon. members on the other side were violently aroused by the crime, one of the most violent Canada has seen, when one, Dionne, raped and murdered four children in Quebec City. His sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. What for? He was subsequently killed in prison by other inmates.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make the point that I feel the sentence of whole life imprisonment is a cold, sadistic act. We read of the Roman dictators who are reported to have given slaves the right to life; they were turned loose in a pit of lions unarmed, and if they could kill the lions their lives were preserved. It is the same sort of thing today to put into the prison system a man who has been found guilty of murder, particularly certain types of murder. He is going to be killed. Pontius Pilate could not have been more cynical. The government claims that he has not been sentenced to death, that his sentence has been commuted to 25 years or 15 years; but the human wolves in the penal system will get him, Mr. Speaker. As sure as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) are drawing breath today, those men will die.

What do we do with a "Williams"? What do we do with that unfortunate individual in Saskatoon who killed those four children? Do we put them into the penal system because they have a right to their lives? That is the argument made to justify the abolition of capital punishment, that the state has not the right to take a life. But, Mr. Speaker, the individual who is put into the penal system will be killed. That makes it that much more sadistic on the part of legislators who say that for those humane and moral reasons they are going to abolish capital punishment. Instead of the hangman's noose, it is knife or it is strangling. Instead of the hangman's noose, are we to see beatings to death in prison? Does anyone think that altering the form of punishment will make society feel better? Does anyone think that we are wrapping a mantle of self-righteousness about ourselves if we decree the abolition of existing forms of capital punishment, yet send men and women to a much crueller, more sadistic death? What we are being asked to do makes a travesty of our system of justice.

I think the 1967 restrictions were the result of an abandonment of so-called moral principles which provided for the abolition of capital punishment. Before 1967 we heard about those moral principles; we have not heard much about them in this debate. One can cite Scripture any way one chooses. It is almost like statistics. Scripture can be used to justify almost any case. Surely to goodness, what is law if it is not the formal expression—

An hon. Member: You have lost your place.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) wants to know how many notes I have, I tell him that I have a foolscap page full of definitions.

An hon. Member: Table them.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I will table the hon. member, too.

For the benefit of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, I say that law is the formal expression of a rule of conduct of a human society, for the benefit and protection of that society, which is accepted by that society. Why is the government proposing the change to the Criminal Code, in the guise of Bill C-84, a change which Canadian society does not want to accept? Either I am right or all our mail, surveys and polls, are wrong. Canadian society does not want to accept the abolition of capital punishment, does not accept the punishment for murder as contained in Bill C-84, life imprisonment only, and has shown that it is concerned about its own protection. The law shall be for the protection of society. If the law protects adequately, why, as the hon. member for Vegreville asked some moments ago, is there the present preoccupation, in the public mind, with protection? The reason is that the law is failing to protect the public. Certainly, there is a great deal more violence these days; but the law should protect the public from violence, and it does not.

By introducing a bill providing for partial abolition, the government of 1967 threw a sop to its backbenchers who wanted to protect prison guards and policemen. The principle of that bill involved limited protection; of course, immediately the bill became law, that principle went out the window. Without doubt, the 1967 bill was based on arguments of so-called higher moral values. In order to get Bill C-2 through the House, the government had to agree on two categories of capital offences, capital murder and non-capital murder. Once those categories were established and the bill passed, the cabinet went through what I consider a most cynical exercise. I think between 1967 and 1972 it really went to the point of misleading parliament as it had no intention at all of having capital sentences carried out. Despite all the protection given in the courts, it was never intended to carry out a capital sentence.

Now we are considering Bill C-84. The reason, I suggest, is that there is a backlog, a waiting line of men who have been found guilty of capital murder within the restrictions of the present law. By having the present bill passed, the cabinet hopes to avoid the responsibilities of the law which it brought forward in 1972. I do not like Bill C-84. I do not believe in the abolition of the death penalty, and never have. Since 1958, in every debate on capital punishment in which I participated I have been against the abolition of the death penalty. I favour the law which was introduced in 1961 and in force until 1967, a law providing for the division into capital and non-capital categories of that heinous crime, murder.

I anticipated that this year there might be a debate on capital punishment and therefore conducted a survey in 1975, which continued from September until November. I sent out 47,000 questionnaires to homes in Edmonton West, and received about 7,300 returns, or 15 per cent. Incidentally, the returns were carefully analysed as to the sex of the person replying, age group, whether male or female, and marital status. I sent a copy of the results of the questionnaire to every member of the cabinet. I must tell hon. members that several cabinet ministers privately indicated to me that when they see results like these it shows how sadly out of touch they are with public opinion. Let me read the first question on the questionnaire, and the result:

> Capital punishment (death by hanging) is presently limited to those convicted of murdering an on-duty police officer or prison guard, and conviction can be commuted to life imprisonment by the cabinet. Are you in favour of:
> (a) retention of the law as it now stands?
> "Yes", 2 per cent.

In other words, 150 out of 7,300 answered that they were satisfied with the retention of the law as it now stands. I continue:

● (1650)

> (b) retention of the present law with the addition of severe limits on the rights of commutation?
> "Yes", 6 per cent.
> (c) any sentence of life imprisonment for capital murder being with (8 per cent—605) or without (50 per cent—3,681) provisions for parole?

In other words, that is a sentence to life imprisonment and throw away the key.

> (d) having the death penalty applicable to anyone convicted of premeditated murder, murder for personal gain, or murder resulting from a crime of violence such as armed robbery, rape, etc., without distinction as to the victim?
> "Yes", 76 per cent.
> (e) the total abolition of capital punishment?
> "Yes", 9 per cent.

That is what the people of my constituency think about the subject of abolition of capital punishment. There was a further return on a question asked by the Edmonton Police Association. The question read:

> I believe in extending the sentence of capital punishment to all premeditated murder and murder committed during the commission of a crime. Yes or no.

I received 1,700 copies of this newspaper clipping which is very simplistic in its terms. Of those, 89 per cent replied yes, they were in favour of the extension of capital punishment for all premeditated murder and murder committed during the commission of a crime. Many years ago there was a royal commission on capital punishment in the United Kingdom, 1949-1953. I quote from that report:

> We think it is reasonable to suppose that the deterrent force of capital punishment operates not only by affecting the conscious thoughts of individuals tempted to commit murder, but also by building up in the community, over a long period of time, a deep feeling of peculiar abhorrence for the crime of murder. "The fact that men are hung for murder is one great reason why murder is considered so dreadful a crime."

Murder is a dreadful crime. We use a very awesome and dread-producing penalty. It has been said by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and many others that capital punishment has not been a deterrent to murder because murder is still committed. Capital punishment is not a 100 per cent solution to preventing murder. There is no punishment that is a 100 per cent deterrent or preventer of crime. I suppose one might say that capital punishment is right because the person who is executed will not commit any crimes thereafter, but that is the only sure one.

I find it passing strange that in all this argument, abolitionists say to those who would retain capital punishment "prove your case". Why? After all, is it not up to those who advocate a change to prove their case? It is the abolitionists who wish to change the law. Let them prove their case. Do not ask those who would retain capital punishment to prove their case. The onus is on those who wish to make the change. That is a principle of law and it will always apply.

In so far as deterrence is concerned, there are no statistics with regard to why a person was deterred. If I asked the hon. member who is just leaving the chamber whether he had ever been deterred from committing crime, since he did not commit a crime, he would not come forward to say so. No one who has been deterred from committing a crime will come forward and say that they were prepared to shoot or knife an individual, but because of capital punishment they did not do it. Therefore, the question of statistics is a totally bogus argument. In the report of the royal commission on capital punishment in the United Kingdom, Lord Justice Denning, as he then was, said:

> The punishment inflicted for grave crimes should adequately reflect the revulsion felt by the great majority of citizens for them. It is a mistake to consider the objects of punishment as being deterrent or reformative or preventive and nothing else... The ultimate justification of any punishment is not that it is a deterrent, but that it is the emphatic denunciation by the community of a crime: and from this point of view, there are some murders which, in the present state of public opinion, demand the most emphatic denunciation of all, namely the death penalty.

My former colleague, Davie Fulton, in the second reading debate of the 1961 bill, as reported in Hansard for May 23 of that year, said:

> Society's concern for its basic rules is expressed in its commands—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being five o'oclock, pursuant to order made Friday, February 27, 1976, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on todays' order paper, namely, notices of motions.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, as a result of the usual negotiations, we have agreed that we will deal with motion No. 9 standing in the name of the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark)—

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who?

Mr. Blais: —the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, as he then was, now the Leader of the Opposition; page 63 of today's order paper.

Mr. Paproski: That is agreed, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is so ordered.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

THE MINISTRY

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF POWERS, PREROGATIVES AND PRIVILEGES OF OFFICE OF PRIME MINISTER

The House resumed from Monday, December 9, 1974, the motion of Mr. Clark:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a committee should be selected to consider the powers, prerogatives and privileges attaching to the office of Prime Minister and to report what safeguards are desirable or necessary to secure the constitutional principles of the sovereignty of parliament and the supremacy of the law.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am indebted to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) for underscoring the change in status of the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark), as he then was—a change in status which I feel confident will be changed even further as a result of the next foray in our political system before the electors of this country. I think it important that all members of parliament, backbenchers, cabinet ministers—yes, even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—should read and reread the speech of the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, now Leader of the Opposition, which was delivered in this House on December 9, 1974, when the motion before us was introduced in his name.

There are a number of reasons why the office of the Prime Minister should be subject to scrutiny by all of us as we look ahead as representatives of the people of this country. First is the increasing ease with which all of us, particularly the Prime Minister, are able to communicate with the public. Then there is the effect of the changes in the rules of the House, which has been to emphasize the pre-eminent position of the government and, in particular, of the office of the Prime Minister.

I do not propose to reread the speech delivered by the Leader of the Opposition in 1974, but I do think it is well worth quoting from his remarks as recorded at page 2071 of Hansard. Speaking briefly about the office of the Prime Minister, he had this to say:

> The Prime Minister comes to the question period on most days, but the questions are usually about his judgment, seldom about his powers; and anyway there is no requirement that he answer. After the so-called Pearson precedent of 1968 there is a real question whether parliament can defeat a Prime Minister by vote in this House except on matters of obvious confidence, like a budget. If our capacity to defeat a Prime Minister is so limited, so is our capacity limited to control him by the threat of defeat. As the chief minister, he is less bound by Treasury Board than any of his colleagues, and appointments to or by his office can be made without recourse to the Public Service Commission. His estimates are brought before the miscellaneous estimates committee. However, they are not dealt with there by him, but by a parliamentary secretary to another minister.

The Prime Minister reports to no standing committee and there is no statute to define his responsibilities. Ironically, parliament probably has less real control over the Prime Minister than we have over the president of Air Canada or the president of CNR, because a Crown corporation is established by statute while the Prime Minister's office is not, and its officials must appear regularly before standing committees while the Prime Minister's officials do not. No matter how loosely you define "responsible" government, parliament should have some direct control over the actions of its Prime Minister beyond his mere appearance for questions in the House. If that has been important in the past, I suggest it will be even more critical in the future, for reasons I will enumerate.

I believe the phrases I have read lay the groundwork for the consideration of the motion before us. There were four main points which the Leader of the Opposition brought out on that day, and I believe he did so most eloquently. Initiative, under our parliamentary system, lies with the cabinet. The conduct of public business and accountability for public business rests with the cabinet. Government itself is growing and, as a consequence, the powers of the Prime Minister appear to be growing to a corresponding degree.

The reform of our Standing Orders in 1969, and the way in which the revised rules have been used since that time both in this chamber and in the committees, have made it clear that the effect was to remove from backbenchers on both sides the right to scrutinize and, where necessary, to delay. In other words, the cabinet is no longer the servant of the House but the House has become the handmaiden of cabinet. This is particularly the case when there is a majority government, but the situation is notable even in a minority situation where one might think the effect would be minimal.

Consider the way in which access to television has affected the role of the Prime Minister. The House will recall that recently, on the occasion when the right hon. gentleman changed his mind and turned his back on what he had said earlier with regard to price controls, he spoke outside the House of Commons, away from the ministry, making the announcement directly over television. Other members of the cabinet have used television in similar circumstances. Notable, recently, was the way in which the budget was handled in terms of the dissemination of information to the public. The Prime Minister has access to television by virtue of his office. He has shown an ability to use this medium in a way which affects the operations of the House and in a manner beyond the capacity of any other member of the House, including those who sit with him around the cabinet table.

Then, again, the point was made that the Prime Minister really has a department of his own. That is exactly what the Privy Council office has become. It is a department whose power is contained only within limits set by the Prime Minister himself. It operates in the complete absence of scrutiny by parliament. This, in itself, makes the establishment of a committee of investigation, such as is proposed in the motion, an urgent matter. Comments have been made in the House from time to time concerning the right of the Prime Minister to control, through his office, access to television. My hon. friend from Halifax, the former leader of the official opposition has a bill on the order paper calling for the establishment of procedures which will permit other party leaders to have similar access to the media.

If the result of the imposition of television upon the parliamentary process is the one we have seen so far, then surely it is only fair that the Leader of the Opposition and other party leaders should have a similar right. I mentioned the Leader of the Opposition in particular because according to our precedents he is the leader of the alternative government. I hope I shall not be hurting the feelings of hon. members opposite if I say that backbench MPs on the government side are, under our system, largely dependent upon the personality and style of the Prime Minister for their influence, and that if MPs are, in the words of the Prime Minister, nobodies, then he has made them so as a result of the way in which he has used his office and the power in his hands. He is really the first among equals, as was traditionally the case. He has no equal when it comes to status within our parliamentary system.

Improvements in House procedures in the direction of greater accessibility to information would help government backbenchers as well as members of the opposition. If government backbenchers were able to take advantage of these improved procedures, perhaps they would have more credibility as critics than they have today, and the Prime Minister might be forced to listen to them. The fact of the matter is that, unlike the operation of the parliament of Westminster, backbenchers opposite sit mute and do not criticize the Prime Minister. I would ask any of my colleagues who have witnessed the House at Westminster in operation to compare the questions that are asked by government backbenchers of their own ministers with the kind of planted questions and the floating of questions that seem to characterize the operations of this House.

An hon. Member: We are not in such a bad way as you.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If the members of the opposition in this House of Commons, in terms of scrutinizing public business and public affairs and particularly the office of the Prime Minister, are in a bad way, then in view of the way the backbenchers on the government side are dependent upon this office, I suggest they are in a very bad way indeed.

It cannot be expected that the Prime Minister would voluntarily loosen his hold on the backbenchers and on the media. Therefore, I think it is time for us to consider at this point in our parliamentary life whether or not the role and office of the Prime Minister and his powers ought to be examined by a committee. It is time we considered the extent to which the power of parliament can be a check on the Prime Minister's office as well as on the operations of the Prime Minister himself. We do not have that opportunity now. There does not seem to be any willingness, in this House at least, for even a government backbencher to take on the Prime Minister in the House of Commons, and I find that most unusual.

An hon. Member: We do that in caucus.

Prime Minister's Office

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): They may say they speak to him in caucus, Mr. Speaker. If they honestly agree with every utterances of the Prime Minister both in this House of Commons and outside, if they can sit mute and agree completely that everything the Prime Minister does is beyond criticism by any backbencher, then I think they are not only affecting the life of this parliament but they are probably not representing the people who have sent them here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think I have touched a nerve, Mr. Speaker. If there is anything that underscores the necessity for an examination of the operation of the Prime Minister's office, it is the reaction I have just heard from hon. members opposite. Any Prime Minister, whether past, present or future, being a human being is subject to err. He is indeed subject to all the vicissitudes that affect our daily lives and is incapable of being right on every occasion. However, what strikes me about this parliament, Mr. Speaker, and the backbenchers opposite is that since I have come here I have never heard any criticism from them of the government in power.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Thank the Lord you are not in our caucus.

Miss Bégin: You just do not know politics.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member who interjects says that I do not understand politics. What bothers me is their lack of concern about parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is nothing more demeaning or degrading to a member of parliament than to sit mute when he or she knows something is being said which he or she does not agree with. I just cannot believe that on every occasion every one of the silent ones over on that side always agrees that the position that the government takes accords with the principles that they share. In other words, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Lévis on a point of order.

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the opposition House leader. He seems to be attacking me personally, and this is why I rise on a point of order. This concerns me very deeply because if one wants to speak about the structure of a political party, it should be done quite openly without distorting the facts.

I remember that not too long ago, when I took part in the debate on the last budget, I aimed certain criticisms at the opposition. During my speech, I made some positive and constructive criticism of the budget, and this is what caused the press gallery and CBC reporters to ask me if I was against the budget. I said no. Unlike the opposition, I accept the budget as a whole, but I see things that could be added to it, constructive things, Mr. Speaker.

I do not know if what the opposition House leader (Mr. Baker) wants to suggest in this House is that a party should be divided like the opposition now is, and if we consider what happened after the leadership crisis—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest to the hon. member for Lévis that that is a point for debate. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), I suggest, should return to the terms of motion No. 9.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is exactly what I am doing, Mr. Speaker, but I do want to thank the hon. member for clearing that up. At least there is one member over who protests from time to time. Let me just say that the reaction we have just had underscores the point that I have been trying to impress upon hon. members opposite. I believe I am getting through to hon. members opposite when I say that this silent majority in parliament is the vehicle that has enhanced the power of the Prime Minister and his office. That is why, in the face of this silent majority, there ought to be an examination of the office and the operations of the Prime Minister.

Let me compare for a moment the office of the leader of the opposition with the office of the Prime Minister. The office of the leader of the opposition operates within certain financial constraints. The Prime Minister's office operates within no such financial limits.

Miss Bégin: It operates within electoral limits.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): By contrast, the financial constraints on the office of the leader of the opposition are set by the internal economy commissioners of this parliament who, in effect—and this has been the whole point that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has been making for a long time—are controlled by the cabinet, which means ultimately control by the Prime Minister. In other words, we now have within our system of operation a parallel public service, if you will, one which is not nearly as responsible—because it can choose its own terms of reference—as is our bureaucracy in terms of its operation and appointments. I think if members of the House will think about it, they will agree I am not trying to be partisan.

● (1720)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Thank you very much. I appreciate the kindness of my friends, and I take it they are truly concerned about the operation of the office of that man who has them under such firm control.

What is happening here is that the powers of the office of the Prime Minister, the Privy Council office, have been growing to a much greater extent than have the powers of any other office of this institution and, I suggest to you, greater than the powers of the institution itself as those powers have been delineated and lessened by rule changes. The powers of that office have also been growing to a greater extent than even the bureaucracy that is appointed under certain rules. As a result, there has been an intrusion into the field generally occupied by the bureaucracy to an extent that is not healthy in our system. That is really the point of my speech.

I hope members on the other side will not stand up and argue the principle that from time to time we ought to take a look at institutions that flow from the new circumstances of our times, because this is what is happening in parliament and this is what is happening to the Prime Minister's office. The motion is sound and the time has come for an examination and an assessment of how far these powers ought to be allowed to grow and under what control they ought to be placed, either political or financial. We must discuss what mechanisms we can hopefully agree upon to arrive at a proper balance within our modern parliamentary system.

May I just say, in conclusion, that it becomes even more important to us, as members of parliament, in a period of time when bureaucracy is growing to such an extent that our access to information becomes less and less, that the motion of the Leader of the Opposition—or the hon. member for Rocky Mountain as he then was—be considered in light of what has been put forward, accepted and apparently agreed upon in principle by the government in respect of this whole matter of freedom of information.

We have to examine this intrusion into the parliamentary and bureaucratic balance and the growth of this office, just as we must examine the whole question of the right of each member of parliament to access to information. That was the point of the member for Rocky Mountain and I commend the principle of that resolution and of this resolution to the House of Commons.

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to leave the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) under the impression that I waited after his speech to speak, because I intended to do so in any event.

Mr. Speaker, it is fortunate that the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) gave us by his motion the opportunity to reassess an important aspect of the Canadian government process, in this instance the office of the right hon. Prime Minister.

Indeed, that very process underwent profound changes in the last fifteen years and it is vital to recognize the critical development of its growth and emphasize its underlying patterns, particularly in the light of the harsh criticisms arising there from.

Public administration in Canada is a very vast area of which political power is but a part, the legislative power being one of the two main components, that is Parliament on the one hand and the executive power on the other.

With this debate on the office of the Prime Minister and its prerogatives it is the whole matter of the responsibility of the executive before the House of Commons and consequently the means made available to the elected representatives to exercise effectively and intelligently that very control that is being questioned. There is talk about it periodically, and the matter itself is not new.

However, none of the hon. members who spoke before me it seems has yet explained the very operation of the office of the Prime Minister nor brought to light its structure and components. In fact, the office of the Prime Minister is not a new concept, its present size and influence being the main source of the many criticisms, sometimes warranted, most often unwarranted, voiced by elected representatives in the last few years out of spite, impatience or frustation.

It is not my intention here to open the file of the lack of information available to partiamentarians, nor to criticize the procedure used in our deliberations. May I simply say that there is a deep feeling of uneasiness which is reflected by the impatience directed towards the executive and its head.

To explain the enlarged staff of the Prime Minister's office, one must understand once again that for about ten years the whole governmental system has been suffering from an acute crisis of gigantism which results from a change in the philosophy on the role of the state and from a serious questioning of the Keynesian neo-classical theory of economic mechanisms.

In short, let us simply point out that it is now obvious that the market is no longer self-regulating and that for the survival of our institutions and of our standard of living, it is now essential, even at the risk of being branded as interventionists, that the state take a more active part, sometimes very bluntly and aggressively, through monetary, fiscal or socialistic policies, to put private interests in line with those of the whole collectivity, and thus prevent the resource redistribution, dear to the defenders of the so-called classical economy, from becoming a lure.

Yet this increased interference resulted in the creation of new governmental or quasi-governmental organizations first aimed at informing the government on the tendencies and economic indicators and acting as a consultative body for the development of the necessary policies and regulations. On the other hand, within the departments, new orientations were developed when it was not whole new departments as those of Regional Economic Expansion, Manpower, Housing and Environment. So, we have seen the staff of the public service grow considerably to meet those new responsibilities and those new spheres of activity.

The Prime Minister is by definition—I should say by tradition—the one who must coordinate the legislative and executive activities of the government system and as such, he must stay in continuing communication with the departments through his ministers, with the provinces through the officials of the division of federal-provincial relationship, with Parliament through the House of Commons and last, with the public through information media.

Prime Minister's Office

It is a fact that the size and the influence of the Prime Minister's office have considerably increased since the accession to power of the present Prime Minister. I shall comment later the main effects of that boulimia but, first, it is important to understand that rather than to establish a parallel structure it was necessary to keep contact or try to keep contact and consequently to control the main structure. But to some extent, and at the risk of making unfounded statements, I shall say that the Prime Minister's office succeded better in that respect than ourselves the members of Parliament.

For some time, the public service has been accused of being tentacular, self-sufficient and syndromatically uncontrollable. I agree with that to some extent but I think there are good motives for its original impulsion as I said earlier and that practical considerations made it inflate itself like the frog in Lafontaine's fables.

In principle, it is Parliament's function to make sure that the public service is operating adequately. In practice, in the present circumstances and with the available means, the only person in a position to hold it back, on occasion, is the Prime Minister—through his influence more than through his real powers. Therefore, by necessity, the office of the Prime Minister has become a service organization having as a secondary but indispensable and important function an advisory function. There is every reason to applaud at this new trend: when one considers our inefficiency, that of the legislative, one must be glad that someone is controlling the monster the public service has become.

The motion of the hon. leader of the opposition asks that we set up a special committee to examine the role and influence of the office of the Prime Minister with regard to Parliament's right to scrutinize and criticize the executive. In fact, the extent of the powers, I should say the influence of the office of the Prime Minister is already known. That influence results from the necessities of daily life, from those of the changing public administration, from the Prime Minister himself assuming the powers of control and supervision over the government machinery, powers which he already had under the Constitution, but had never been exercised to their full extent. In short, it does not stem so much from the preparation of a putsch, as has often been suggested, but rather from the daily necessities of administration. My concerns are not, a priori, in respect of that, for the executive must administer, and so much the better if it finds the tools to do so.

But where does Parliament come into the picture? Is the House of Commons really losing some of its influence, some of its powers? And at a higher level, could we go so far as to say that at this time of exponential acceleration of changes in values and accepted ideas, the British parliamentary system, which can be described as traditional and rigorous, is no longer capable of adapting to new conditions to meet effectively the needs of a modern state? This is indeed where the question lies. Does our system still answer our needs today, as it is, and has always been, without change, without major adjustment, without a will to progress?

The Prime Minister is still responsible before his elected peers, the cabinet is still collectively accountable before the legislative body, but are we, as parliamentarians, in a position to make a judgement on the activities of the executive that would be well-informed and exact? My answer is no. Without trying to analyse the rights and wrongs of our system, which has certainly rendered great services in the past, and has even demonstrated on occasion an extraordinary versatility, and has even been the guardian of democracy which we all cherish, our dear good old system has grown old and will have to undergo a serious lifting to show a new and acceptable look.

Instead of studying the prerogatives of the Prime Minister's office, we should rather take a look at ourselves, make a serious self-examination. To me, the very principle of ministerial responsibility is partly gone because it deprives the House of Commons of the very power it is supposed to wield, the sanction of the legislative or administrative measures taken by the executive. Except in some extraordinary circumstance, or in case of some never-heard-of crisis, government members will very unlikely take the risk of bringing the government down, except, as I said, in case of some essential question, or if the representatives, for serious personal reasons, cannot approve the position of their party, as expressed by the bills introduced by the cabinet, and which bind them, as they bind in their favour the government members, and as they bind the opposition members.

The party line is a gaping wound in and otherwise healthy body and I am surprised that few people have not seriously questioned it yet or have not proposed its mere abolition. There should only subsist, occasionally and in very special circumstances, what is usually called non-confidence votes, whereas all the members should interest themselves in the existence of the government and be able to judge in conditions similar to those that prevail today in all divisions. Abandoning the party line would give more value to the primary function we are supposed to hold in system of government, that of a law-making body, a role which has been disguised and which does not mean a word in the present situation. We should underline that, according to the fact, it is no longer sure that, since the precedent of 1967, the government can be brought down otherwise than with a non-confidence vote, but the threat still remains and prevents the members from acting according to their own conscience. Parliament has become a moral sanction for the actions of a small group, a moral sanction which abides by the necessity of politics and not by judgement and reason. This same little group is the instrument of a bigger administrative system, an arrogant and self-satisfied machinery.

I do not necessarily advocate some republican system as in the United States where the president freely choses his ministers and advisors without taking into account the contingencies of an election, although it would however be very fortunate, at times, to have the necessary flexibility so that the Prime Minister could bring into his cabinet a non-elected person, some authority in a particular area, when this authority is not available "on the bench". The present sacrosanct principle of ministerial responsibility is fiercely against it, but by substituting to it another type of real responsibilities through votes of non confidence against the Prime Minister, such impediment is thus removed as well as the attendant sclerosis.

The decision which must or will have to be taken one day or another will be whether the legislation is really a public responsibility or that of the government which approves it through a minister who introduces it as the consequence of a partisan policy but not a necessarily valid one of the party in power whose members are bound by a context of penalties and rewards, the carrot and stick, but this is much more serious by the fear of suddenly plunging the country in the confusion of some general election. The opposition should not rejoice too loudly, because it is the victim of the same restraints, but in the opposite way and cannot have a good laugh at this deplorable situation.

I foresee the day when all members of this House—and that applies as well as to the opposition members as to the government members—may be able without fear of reprisals and especially without fear of harmful effects for the state's stability, to decide in all conscience of the intrinsic value of bills brought in through the executive or otherwise. Either we are idiots without any professional conscience, any competence, real idiots then! If we continue to act as puppets, I see absolutely no use for this institution, except to save appearances and to constitue a feed tank for ambition. Either we change the spirit that is prevailing here but not only the spirit but the game's rule as well, then we will see appear the very reason for our being here, for what we are fighting for relentlessly: democracy. We will represent the people and we will act as adults and responsible people.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, in principle—and until I am given proof to the contrary, which has not been done yet—I have as much confidence in the 264 elected representatives now present, in their efficiency and their sense of duty, as in the administration where anonymity prevails and which does not have to give any account to anyone, in spite of appearances, because we must always save appearances.

[English]

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I might say, in response to the hon, member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), that he is absolutely correct that it is the custom of the British House to recognize the backbencher, just as it is the custom of this House to have this party govern and that party stay in opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): First of all, I see some irony in the request contained in the resolution before us. The hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark), in his introduction to this resolution, as recorded at page 2071 of Hansard, the same page as was quoted by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, stated the following:

> ... the powers of the Prime Minister should not be developed or exercised in isolation but must be set in a federal parliamentary context and be subject to detailed and regular parliamentary scrutiny. There is no such scrutiny today.

All I have heard from the opposition is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has not exercised the power that he should exercise. Certainly they say consistently that we are guilty of inaction—they say the Prime Minister is doing nothing—so to remain consistent they would have to confirm that this resolution asks us to examine nothing. But I accept the inevitable fact that the opposition is inconsistent. It is perhaps a consequence of their inability to attain power in this country.

Getting back to the main thrust of the resolution, it asks for another chapter to be added to the sessional book of parliamentary procedure. The opposition, and especially the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, is unhappy with the accountability of the Prime Minister during question period, the most free wheeling, helter skelter free for all of any question period under the British parliamentary system. Again it is ironic that the track record of this Prime Minister in attendance during question period puts many hon. members on both sides of the House to shame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): The hon. member for Rocky Mountain, now elevated to the position of Leader of the Opposition, prefers at times not to be here during question period. He is out on the hustings, meeting the people, talking to party people. That is the supposed intention of his action. He is probably right not to be here to examine the Prime Minister's powers, but this is certainly not consistent with this resolution.

The question period itself is the most liberal of all mechanisms we have. If this parliament were to follow the lead of other parliaments, this free, open questioning would not take place. It remains the most prized period for visitations by the public and the press, and perhaps that is the way it should remain. That is a matter of judgment. The press is the most important outside element of this Chamber, and this system of question period we have provides an opportunity to cover accountability in action.

I rather prefer the British system, and I know that here the greats minds in this House would disagree. Under the British system they give notice of all questions and have designated days on which ministers appear. Apart from accepted methods used to hide the real question I believe it would give opposition members and the press more meat in the answers. What has happened to question period by custom over the past couple of decades is precisely what this motion suggests. Beauchesne, if it were followed to the letter, would have most of the questions ruled out of order. Let us examine the guidelines and rules of question period as they appear in Beauchesne and in Erskine May's and discover where custom has brought us recently.

Mr. Paproski: You shouldn't criticize Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): I am note criticizing Mr. Speaker or anyone else.

Ours must be the most lively question period of any parliamentary body in the world.

A government is elected to govern, and that is what the word means. The members of the opposition lost their chance to govern in the preceding election. Parliament is a place to speak, but a government must govern. The government was given that right by the people. The legislature, the word commonly used which refers to such bodies, examines and debates legislation brought in by the government, not by the opposition.

Our parliament remains, but the hon. gentleman asks that parliament be permitted to add to its duties by fully examining the office of the Prime Minister. Let us consider what is being asked. I agree that parliament should be able, if it is possible, to examine everything which is done by the government. I suggest to the hon. member, however, that he is putting the cart before the horse. First we should be examining parliament itself and the priorities and functions of this Chamber, and then perhaps his request would be granted in another way, or in the form he obviously prefers. He says that the question period is no good for his purposes, and I am sure that the cabinet ministers would agree.

This Chamber, quite frankly, is a rather unworkable entity in 1976. The hon. gentleman's motion attempts to aggravate an already overworked system of parliamentary procedure which should be swept into the ash can of history.

What is wrong with second reading committees? The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton referred to the British system. I will tell him something about the British system. I visited there with him. What is wrong with committees being able to initiate their own terms of reference, and what is so wrong about committees being able of their own volition to examine the real problems confronting this nation? In our protective and isolated manner we refuse to appoint outside experts to suggest a new role for this Chamber, as has been done under the British system.

The hon. member for Rocky Mountain asks for a regimented, structured procedure to examine the actions of the Prime Minister. He did not suggest anywhere in his address opening this debate that parliament is already bogged down.

It is my contention that this parliament examines the role, the powers, and the actions of the Prime Minister as completely as any parliament in the world. Because of the freedom exercised by the Chair during question period—which I am not questioning—hon. members of the opposition have a field day. That is good. It is good to have the opportunity every day for ten months of the year to grill the Prime Minister. Any member can ask questions, any number of questions is allowed, and questioners have a chance to become overnight heroes if they have done their homework, or overnight national flops if they have not.

There is a duty incumbent not only on the government side but also on the opposition side to keep things in perspective. The hon. member for Rocky Mountain, in a roundabout way, alluded to this. There are energies and money being expended in this Chamber and it is important to keep things in perspective. Canada is not just Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver; Canada is Canada, and Canada's problems are many and diverse. It is important always to keep that in mind.

Habitat may have adopted a role in world-wide ventures and considerations. It is fine to say that Canada is a rich nation and that Canada has to distribute its wealth around the world, but it is interesting to note that participants from all over the world were told in a pre-conference agenda to visit my riding first. With unemployment at nearly 30 per cent most of the year, the lowest provincial welfare payments in Canada, and a high cost of living, it is important to keep in mind that a chain is only as strong as its weakest link. So it is with this parliament; if we add to our present cumbersome list of activities, we will go nowhere.

I said earlier that the opposition has as great a role to play as anyone else in defining our direction. I call on the hon. member for Rocky Mountain to demand a completely new set of procedures for this Chamber and not to burden it further. I also ask him to try to be here every day with the Prime Minister during question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): I predict that the introduction of television into this Chamber will accomplish many things. All hon. members will be in place, and then the question which will be asked by the public will be. "Is that all there is to the House of Commons?" Of course if it is during question period people will say of government backbenchers, "Where are they?" Then and only then will we be forced into adopting another procedure of the British House, out of context. Backbenchers here will be standing up, and the Chair will have to do what is done in Britain: recognize first on the left, then on the right, and back and forth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Then the great tool of the question period will be gone for the opposition and that is what this motion wants to maintain, and perhaps it should be maintained, if we do not change everything else.

I said "taken out of context" because the system in Britain goes hand in hand with other procedures—designated days for ministers and a whole system of select and special committees, which we do not have.

I say that the priorities of this House have nothing to do with when the Prime Minister last had a bath, nothing to do with who or who has not a driver's licence, and not even with the accepted procedure in this country under which the opposition tries to discredit the government on issues which have nothing to do with the problems of the country.

All hon. members know of the lack of opportunity in certain parts of the country; they all know that all Canadians are not equal, and they all know about the real problems of unemployment, pollution, and cost of living. I have great respect for the hon. member for Rocky Mountain for moving many amendments connected with the Contaminants Act which was passed during the present session. Mr. Speaker, I ask him to return to that constructive direction and not to be diverted by the immaterial and obviously subordinate information which could be gained from that great time waster, a structured look at our present great Prime Minister.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, for a moment I was afraid I would not be given the chance to respond to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I have nothing but praise for my two predecessors on this side of the House for the excellent way they spoke on this subject. My only regret is that the hon. member for Rocky Mountain has already shown his disdain for backbenchers. He left when the House was debating a motion he introduced when he himself was a backbencher.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to suggest that the parliamentary secretary has gone beyond the bounds of good taste but he knows, I think, that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was present at the beginning of today's private members' hour, which is quite unusual.

An. hon. Member: But he left.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is most unusual for the Leader of the Opposition to attend during private members' hour. I regret very much, of course, that the pressure of public business has kept the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) away from the House. Frankly, on some occasions I think some hon. members ought to show more good taste than—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member has not raised a point of order but a point of debate. The parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I wish the opposition House leader would not rise on points of order when so little debating time is left. His points of order usually are tenuous. As the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) suggested, it is ironical that the Leader of the Opposition, having presented this motion when he was an ambitious young politician, now after having been chosen by his party—

Mr. Paproski: And the people of Canada.

Mr. Blais: —to be his party's leader, is unable to attend the debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if there is any possibility of having the remaining portion of this hour devoted to a consideration of the motion before the House.

Mr. Paproski: It would be a good idea.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are asking for too much, Stanley.

Mr. Blais: It would have been nice if the hon. member for Rocky Mountain had remained in the House to discuss this important matter. I and other hon. members would have appreciated knowing if he were still of the same mind as when he introduced this particular motion, or whether his experience as leader of his party has caused him to alter his perspective. I suggest that he made statements in his speech of December 9, 1974, which he may now regard as erroneous. For example he said, as reported at page 2072 of Hansard for that date:

> Without dwelling on them too long, I would suggest that certain other forces which traditionally have restrained a Prime Minister have been weakening recently. For example, we accept the notion without much evidence, that Canadian political parties control their leaders and, in particular, prevent them from the excesses we associate with Watergate.

Prime Minister's Office

I wonder if he is now of the view that his own party controls him or does he think he controls the party. I am thinking of the gumshoes hired to follow members of my party. Does he think that he is in control of his party, or does he think the party controls him?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Nonsense. You have some pretty thick gumshoes on your side.

Mr. Blais: The hon. member for Rocky Mountain went on to say:

> Parties do not behave in that way because they know that in attacking their leader they attack themselves. This is particularly true now that campaigns are so heavily influenced by national media and voting is more often for the personality of the leader than it is for the local candidate or a specific issue.

Is the hon. member still of the same view? Does he not think that his election represents the result of a popularity contest?

The hon. member for Rocky Mountain suggested that the Prime Minister's power is derived from television coverage. Is that not a passing strange position for one who has evidently nurtured the electronic media in order to enhance his own image? I wonder if the hon. member is still of the same view, that television enhances his power as leader of his party. I say to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that by introducing television in this House we could do away with many of the hon. member's concerns in this regard.

I suggest that the hon. member for Rocky Mountain would benefit if there were an increase in his staff. With additional staff he would be able to formulate policies which, so far, have not been formulated. What was the hon. member's position, when we were dealing with energy prices? He did not indicate his position.

Mr. Paproski: The people are behind our leader.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You should pay attention to what the Gallup poll says.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to order of the House made earlier this day the House will now revert to Routine Proceedings for the specific purpose of receiving statements by two ministers, the first statement by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the second by the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board

(Mr. Lang). The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

STATEMENTS ON FEED GRAIN POLICY BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE AND BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, at this time I should like to make a joint announcement with my colleague, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, concerning the government's domestic feed grain policy.

In May, 1974, we outlined a new domestic feed grain policy. The main objective of that policy is to encourage the growth of livestock and feed grain production across the country according to the natural potential of each region, and to have a fair pricing system for all Canadian feed grains.

This is still our objective. But we are making modifications to the policy in order to make it work more effectively. As some hon. members know, we have experienced some problems in domestic feed grain pricing during the past year. We want to avoid similar problems in the future. For that reason we are taking action to assure that domestic feed grains are available at corn-competitive prices. We are relocating part of our reserve stocks. We are changing rates of feed freight assistance to some parts of the country. And we are using some of the funds we had been putting into feed freight assistance to set up new programs to assist feed and livestock producers.

These new developments in our domestic feed grain policy will guarantee a dependable flow of western feed grain to the domestic market at competitive prices. They should also relieve any temporary shortages and disparities in regional markets. Our actions will benefit both eastern and western farmers. I know that eastern Canadian livestock producers will be pleased to have their feed grain supplies made more secure. And we are protecting the domestic feed grain market for our Canadian producers by ensuring that prices stay competitive with United States corn.

The minister responsible for the Wheat Board will explain what actions the Canadian Wheat Board will be taking to keep prices corn-competitive. I would like to fill in a few details for you on the other points.

Modifications in feed freight assistance rates will go into effect on August 1 of this year. In British Columbia the rates will be reduced by $4 per ton. In Ontario and western Quebec all rates of assistance of $6 per ton and less will be eliminated. Other rates in these areas will be adjusted accordingly.

Most of the rates in eastern Quebec and the rates in the Maritimes will not be changed. Livestock producers in these areas have a greater reliance on outside supplies of feed grains. Feed freight assistance will also be available—

[Mr. Speaker.]

I repeat, will also be available—on shipments of Ontario corn and wheat to the maritimes and eastern Quebec.

Because western grains are going to be available at corn-competitive prices I do not expect the reduction in feed freight assistance to increase feed grain prices in eastern Canada or British Columbia. Imported corn has and will continue to set the ceiling on feed grain prices in Canada.

We have informed the provincial agriculture departments in Quebec, Ontario, and British Columbia about these policy developments. And we have discussed with them setting up adjustment programs in areas where feed freight assistance has been reduced. During the next five years we will use the funds released from feed freight assistance to develop the feed and livestock industries in these provinces. To date we have not determined the actual locations and amounts for the re-allocation of domestic feed grain reserve stocks, but the Reserve Stock Management Committee will be moving stocks closer to feed grain deficient areas of the country.

If temporary regional or national shortages of feed grains are identified in the future by the Canadian Livestock Feed Board and the Canadian Wheat Board, import permits will be made available by the Wheat Board.

As a final check that our domestic feed grain policy is doing its job I will be monitoring the domestic feed grain market through the Canadian Livestock Feed Board. If there is evidence of bad pricing or supply practices in the market place, the Canadian Livestock Feed Board will be permitted to intervene directly in the market place should intervention be required to eliminate such practices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), in reporting upon this change of policy and the further implementation of the feed grain policy as announced in the summer of 1974. With the announcement today of the partial change in feed grains assistance there is an accompanying indication by the Canadian Wheat Board that from August 1, 1976, it will be offering western feed grains to the domestic market at prices competitive with United States corn. The Canadian Wheat Board will offer grain at a daily flat base at Thunder Bay and western country elevator points. Prices at these points will be the Montreal corn-competitive price less transportation and handling costs.

The actual timing and technical nature of the change to this pricing structure between now and August 1 will be established through consultation between the Canadian Livestock Feed Board and the Canadian Wheat Board.

● (2010)

The opportunity for prairie producers to make direct non-board sales of western feed grains will continue. Board offers to the domestic market will help keep the market corn-competitive and preserve it for domestic grain producers.

As the Minister of Agriculture has indicated, we will be arranging the move forward closer to feed-grain deficient areas of the major portions of the reserve stock of feed grains which was set up following the 1974 announcement with these arrangements, with feed grain available at corn-competitive prices, and with direct purchases from producers available when that is the desirable option, we have every optimism that the supply of feed grain in feed grain deficient areas will be cared for.

However, in order to reassure temporary situations, as the Minister of Agriculture has said, import permits will be made available by the Canadian Wheat Board when the Canadian Livestock Feed Board and the Canadian Wheat Board identify the need in that particular situation. This policy is a benefit to all of Canada because it allows for a continuation of the move in the policy set out in 1974 of the development of agricultural production in Canada according to the natural advantage. In those circumstances, as with free trade, it is not as though there always has to be a loser with a gainer. There can be net gainers on both sides by the additional production of goods in Canada, and a more economic way for the better of all. This, of course, is what our objective is in this as in other areas.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not have in front of me a copy of the statement which the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board just made. I have a press release and a copy of the statement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). As far as I can tell the minister read some sentences from the press release, but we do not have a copy of his full statement.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I was indeed paraphrasing in speaking to the issue as I thought in this House it might be desirable. The gist of the material is in the statement which the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) has before him. It is all there in terms of the policy that is being announced. I was speaking to it.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. The not unprecedented practice of more than one minister rising to participate in one general announcement gives us some concern. Perhaps it is a matter of regret more than a point of order that the minister has not seen fit to join the press release and in the accompanying information that has been made available to members of the opposition with respect to this very important matter. This practice should not continue.

If Your Honour finds there is a point of order, it is that when this practice has been followed in the past it has been objected to by members of the opposition. I simply draw to Your Honour's attention that this is not a practice to which this House is accustomed. It does not permit members of the opposition to respond to the statements by both ministers in their different capacities, one responsible for transportation and the wheat board, and the other for agriculture. The point is that the government has had two spokesmen and we will be allowed only one. That is not in accord with the acceptable practices of this House.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the ministers involved for the courtesy which they have extended to us by forwarding copies at a relatively early hour. I particularly want to thank the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) for recognition of the fact that they did not arrive on schedule and his telephone call to offer his apologies for that. It was very considerate of him.

As I heard the two ministers talking I wondered whether the left hand does not trust the right hand when it gets behind the back. This certainly indicates to the people of Canada that agriculture is a divided industry and that the Government of Canada does not know whose responsibility it actually is. They want to play it safe.

I was rather confused and somewhat concerned as I read the statement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). It should be recognized as classic "Whelanese" at its best. It had to be drawn from the lessons taught by Mackenzie King, so that he could say something which meant everything to everybody and nothing to anybody, and he could say anything he liked thereafter and agree with what he said earlier.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: That is the greatest compliment you have ever paid me.

Mr. McCain: This is going to be the decision of the Minister of Agriculture. It certainly leaves agriculture in a dilemma. They are not sure which way they are going nor from whence they have come after such a dialogue.

There is a very important aspect of this in so far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned. The recognition of the imperative requirement of the livestock industry of the Atlantic area by the revision of the feed grain subsidies is something which the Atlantic area feared might be overlooked by the Government of Canada to some degree. That has been left in place. I would be remiss in my duty if I did not point out that there has been no recognition of the erosion of the effectiveness of the feed-grain subsidy as it applies to the Atlantic area. May I give two quick examples.

When the initial concept of feed-grain subsidies was brought into place the disparity of cost in grains east of the Great Lakes was 50 cents per ton as you went from station to station throughout eastern Canada. That disparity has increased because the feed-grain subsidy has been frozen at its specific level. It has not taken up the increases in freight rates which have been added year after year.

The disparity in prices now at various points in eastern Canada on grains is $10 per ton. In the mill-feed sector, and this is an important requirement of the industry, the disparity in price from Thunder Bay to the extremities of eastern Canada is as much as $35 per ton. Therefore the value has eroded to a very large extent.

It has reached the point in the Atlantic area where the livestock and meat producing industry find that cost-wise in respect of production they are barely competitive with meats shipped from western Canada, particularly the Winnipeg area. They have been asking for an improvement in the structure by recognizing the increments in cost that are contained in the cost of other ingredients in the feed industry such as minerals, vitamins, and protein concentrates. To date this has not been recognized.

We ask that one of the two ministers give this consideration, whichever is responsible, and we are not quite sure who it is at this time. I ask that minister to take a cost benefit and see just where the Atlantic provinces meat industry stands with regard to competition with other sectors of Canada. Has the grain subsidy in fact attained the objective for which it was intended, namely, to make the cost of meat production in the Atlantic area competitive with supplies from other areas of Canada?

At no time has Atlantic Canada asked that meat be produced there more cheaply than in other areas of Canada. However, it has asked that the subsidy allow it to be produced as cheaply there as in other areas of Canada and delivered to our markets. After all, we are a meat deficient area and we would like to encourage that industry.

I am concerned about that area of Canada from which this subsidy has been removed completely. As I understand it, any subsidy of less than $6 per ton will be gone as of August 1. Where does this leave the feeder in eastern Ontario and western Quebec? They are far from the sources of corn which is supposed to be the substitute for western grain as far as possible. They do have onerous freight charges to bear. They are in competition with other areas which are closer to feed sources. I believe the ministers should jointly reconsider this question. I note the minister's statement that he has discussed this statement with Ontario and Quebec, but he does not give us any indication of what those provinces said in reply to his proposals or what the effect is likely to be on the livestock-poultry industry in Eastern Ontario and Western Quebec vis-à-vis other areas of Canada.

I am puzzled about this nebulous something-or-other upon which the savings are to be spent by way of promoting the livestock industry in Ontario, Quebec, and British Columbia. The words are, as I understand it—"The savings shall be used for the development of the industry in those provinces." There are a multitude of ways in which this money might be used. It might be used, for example, to construct grain storage facilities at strategic points. But the phrase "development of" or "improvement of" applicable to the industry in those provinces is, indeed, nebulous.

What will be the effect on British Colombia? This is a subject on which I am not an expert. However, I submit that having regard to the support which the industry in that province has been receiving from its provincial government it can ill afford grain which will be more expensive than the grain it has been feeding to date. The statement contains no suggestions to the contrary, so perhaps the government of British Columbia can afford to chip in a little more.

The location of the reserves referred to in these statements is important. What is even more important is that these reserves of grain be available on demand to the feeder. In the past it has been government policy to place grain in position and in reserve. If an eastern feeder anywhere in eastern Canada required a car of grain which was not available it could be drawn from stocks at a particular point, but it had to be replaced by the buyer. This program was not usable in the main by eastern feeders because the replacement cost was under the control of the Wheat Board. It was not a case of drawing a car from Prescott and having it replaced in Thunder Bay or even at Prescott; it was a case of withdrawing a car from a point of reserve and paying the price determined by the Wheat Board for its replacement. Is there any cure for this? Will the minister, through the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, be able to eliminate the cost of drawing from reserves in particular locations? The seller should be able to negotiate with the Wheat Board directly at no cost for withdrawal from reserves.

Will Wheat Board permits be available on call in emergency, or only after cutting through a great deal of red tape? I realize that the minister's remarks were very brief. Perhaps had they been longer and more detailed it would have been easier to make a short reply. But the indirect and oblique approach taken to this subject makes it difficult to reply except by asking questions and being somewhat critical.

There is one notable omission from this statement. During the election campaign of 1974 the Minister of Transport, or the minister responsible for the Wheat Board—I am not sure in which capacity he has spoken tonight—promised there would be a recognition of the inequities which exist in the meat industry of western Canada with respect to transportation costs. Every agriculturalist in Canada was expecting that this statement tonight by the associated ministers would cover that item. The undertaking was initially denied, but on January 28, 1975, if my memory serves me correctly, in response to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) it was acknowledged that this had been an election promise and the undertaking was made, and that a statement would be forthcoming in the future. A year and several months have passed since that date. A statement has been made and this aspect has not been touched upon. The trading policies of the government have treated the industry in a cavalier manner. Trade with the United States has been difficult. We have put up artificial barriers which have been countered with further artificial barriers.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but the time used by the two ministers combined was about seven minutes. The hon. member has already been speaking for ten minutes and if he were allowed to continue a few minutes longer he would double their time. Bearing in mind, also, that we are to hear two other speakers on the same subject I should have to ask him to conclude briefly.

Mr. McCain: I respect your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and will sum up shortly. We are tinkering with a very important industry—the grain industry and the feed industry. We are not being specific. We are not being direct except in certain respects, and for some of those things we are grateful. But there are some areas which will suffer and others which will benefit. There are aspects to which greater attention must be paid. I would ask the two hon. gentlemen who have made statements to keep in mind the requirements which still exist. A total policy should now be brought forward, one which would result in complete equity for the grain and meat business in Canada.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was hoping that when the minister in charge of the Wheat Board rose tonight he would at least have had the grace to blush. With this announcement he is admitting through the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) that his feed grain policy of May, 1974, is a total failure.

An hon. Member: Nonsense!

Mr. Benjamin: The Canadian Wheat Board has always been ready to maintain access of western barley and other feed grains into the eastern market. It has been to the advantage of western grain producers to stay in the eastern market. But now, if I read the statement correctly, feed grain prices to western grain producers are to be reduced by the amount of reduction in feed freight assistance. In effect the announcement means lower incomes for western grain producers. That would be bad enough, but with these lower returns to feed grain producers there are no guarantees of any kind for the producers.

The minister has been horsing around for two years and now he has turned full circle. He is back in the court of the Canadian Wheat Board. The Board will be required to offer feed grains at prices competitive with those of U.S. corn and feed grain, and I would like to know what effect that will have on the bargaining position of the Board. If they have an export market available at 20, 30 or 40 cents a bushel more for barley, the Board's capacity to sell will be limited by the amount they are required to hold in reserve to maintain prices competitive with U.S. corn. That in turn will mean either lower feed grain prices on export markets for some portion of the Wheat Board's product, or it could mean lower export sales because we are holding back bushels at U.S. government competitive prices. If the Wheat Board is subject to the Livestock Feed Board the board will also have to supply the prairie market and the B.C. market with feed grains.

I should like an explanation either from the Minister of Agriculture or the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board as to how much, if any, U.S. corn moves into British Columbia, and what relationship there is between the barley price and the U.S. corn price in British Columbia, or in southern Alberta for that matter. I suggest there is none whatsoever. Any feeder is entitled to call on the Canadian Wheat Board for corn at competitive prices, which usually means lower prices for western Canadian grain.

The minister in charge of the Wheat Board has fooled around with feed grains on the open market and on the commodity exchange for the last two years. Since he is putting the Wheat Board in this position he has to admit that the open market for feed grains has been a total failure. My question to the minister, which if he does not answer soon I hope he will answer later, is this: why do we need an open market and commodity exchange in light of the joint announcement of himself and the Minister of Agriculture?

It seems to me that the eastern feed grains market takes whatever it requires from local markets on the prairies, and British Columbia now takes priority for what is required over the export market. The Canadian Wheat Board is required to hold and maintain its stocks.

Let me make another point. What is meant by the relocation of these reserves? Is the Canadian Wheat Board now going to be required to hold stocks in Halifax, St. John's, Montreal, Prescott, and Port Colborne, at U.S. corn prices? We would like to know. In a short year for U.S. corn the Canadian Wheat Board must provide buffer stocks. If that is the case, when are the Minister of Agriculture and the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board going to get rid of the commodity market, since it is obviously not working? The western grain producers are being made responsible for feed grain supplies. What now about a guaranteed price for feed grains? If the Wheat Board is going to be required to guarantee reserve stocks which will be relocated somewhere, what about a guaranteed price? According to these two ministers they are now subject to the whims of the U.S. corn market, which I submit will be of no benefit to the consumers of meat and of very little benefit to the feeders in the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario, and British Columbia.

I am also wondering what are the government's plans regarding the eight cent per bushel tariff on U.S. corn that is presently in existence. Will the government give that up? If so, what will it get in return? If the Minister of Agriculture does look a little paunchy I wish he would not start reaching for Santa Claus clothes. I think it is a mistake to require the Canadian Wheat Board to hold reserves. If they are the marketing agency, then let them market. They have responsibility for marketing, so let the Canadian Wheat Board do the marketing in all of Canada.

In conclusion, we feel that what we really need is a Canadian grains board that is the governing body over grains from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean. Prices, from the producer of feed grains to the consumer of feed grains, should be negotiated and agreed upon as between one end of the country and the other. We do not need a commodities exchange and open market. In fact a Canadian grains board, as and when we cannot meet our own needs for barley, oats and other feed grains, would do the purchasing of U.S. corn at the best possible price. The cost of feed grain would be pooled among the users of feed grain. Yet these people opposite have the imagination of a door knob; they keep clinging to nineteenth century concepts even when these concepts have not worked for two years.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board has been fooling around with feed grains on the open market, but he has not retreated. He did not say so tonight; he had the Minister of Agriculture get up and say it for him. This concept has not worked and it will not work. We should like to have a lot more detailed explanation about this from the minister in the days to come.

We want to know what is meant by the relocation of reserve stocks. We want to know what effect this will have on feed prices to western grain producers under the feed freight assistance rates. We would like to know what are the government's intentions as to the involvement of the so-called open and free market now that the Canadian Wheat Board has been delegated additional responsibilities that have nothing to do with marketing but with reserve stocks at U.S. corn-competitive prices. We will be interested in hearing from the government on those points.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question. Does this statement mean that finally we will get some assistance to provide the long awaited additional terminal facilities for the storage of corn in southwestern Ontario, close to the minister's home area, or shall I have to ask the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board whether he would allow that?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I hope an announcement will be made shortly regarding the grain storage program that has been talked about for several months. I am sure the hon. member knows there is more interest in that area than just a grain storage depot; there is a whole agricultural complex to be developed in that great part of southwestern Ontario.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board will state whether or not there will be any compulsion to sell grain from the Wheat Board. Are they going to be forced to compete with the market, or will they have a choice?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as the statement indicates, I have reported the agreement of the Canadian Wheat Board to sell on this basis. They are therefore prepared to give the assurance, so there is no doubt about it, that there will be daily flat pricing of barley and other feed grains for the domestic market at Thunder Bay on a basis equivalent to bringing the grain to Montreal at corn-competitive prices.

Mr. Towers: The minister did not answer my question. If they see fit to sell this grain at some other place and corn is available in the United States, will they be forced to put the grain on the market at competitive prices, or not?

Mr. Lang: The corn-competitive offering really means that it will be close enough to the corn price, and it will depend on the particular needs of the moment in the area concerned whether or not American corn, Ontario corn, or western feed grains are taken. The Wheat Board will be offering, but whether anything is taken or not will be a matter for bargaining.

Mr. Towers: I have a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister said that the Wheat Board will be offering. What will happen if the Wheat Board chooses not to offer?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, they have indicated that they will choose to offer. They have so indicated in order to give an assurance to those who might otherwise be concerned about supply. In fact this really only confirms something that has been a policy of long standing, namely, that the Canadian Wheat Board will always protect domestic supply in the sense of not exporting if they leave themselves short. I am surprised that the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) suggested that any other policy was the case. The Wheat Board has always protected Canadian supply and it has no authority to make any change in that policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, some of my colleagues from the province of Quebec may be wondering whether their region will be affected. As far as I am concerned, I am sure of it because western Quebec is mentioned in the press release and I am very surprised that the government has not waited for another review of its freight rates policy. Both ministers have announced they have informed the Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia representatives of this policy, and for the next five years the amounts saved will be spent on livestock and feeds in those areas which will be affected by the removal of transportation subsidies. Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) a specific program, or is it a study and the program would soon be brought forward, I would be very interested to know whether there is at present a program to assist those regions that will no longer benefit from subsidies to transportation?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, a program will be announced I think before August 1. We have done a lot of work on it and have discussed this kind of program with the provinces. The areas that are basically affected are these: the $6 comes off Quebec City at Montreal; Rimouski has a slight reduction to avoid backhaul; there is no reduction in the Gaspé or the Maritimes, and there is no reduction in the Lac-Saint-Jean area of Quebec. We will be publishing a complete detailed form of this within the next couple of days showing exactly how it affects the areas of Quebec that we call western Quebec.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, recently the Canadian Livestock Feed Board suggested that it be given the power to buy and sell so it could establish a price in eastern Canada which the farmer has to pay for the grain. I should like to ask the minister whether he contemplates a seat on the grain exchange for the Canadian Livestock Feed Board in order that it can purchase directly from the market?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, in my statement I said if there is evidence of bad pricing or bad supply practices in the market place the Canadian Livestock Feed Board will be permitted to intervene directly in the market, if required, to eliminate such practices.

Mr. Peters: One of the reasons why this problem has developed has not been the shortage of supply but the inability of the board to get into a large enough position to supply the market because brokers would not buy early enough to put the grain into the elevators in eastern Canada. What has been done to ensure the farmer that even if we do have additional storage inland in eastern Canada the supplies will be put into position in the elevators by the brokers?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think we recognize that problem in the very fact that we say the grain will be supplied and priced at the competitive Chicago price. We say also that if supplies are not available import permits will be issued for grain if they can find these supplies someplace else. I repeat what I just said, that if there is bad pricing we will allow the Canadian Livestock Feed Board to operate in the market.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated there are to be additional facilities provided under the present system. Mainly we use national harbours, but some other government agencies have elevator space in eastern Canada. Is it the intention to have the new elevator space in eastern Canada under the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, built by them, licensed by them, and operated by them, or how is it anticipated that this storage space will be put into effect? The government is really not going to make any savings if we do not bring grain into eastern Canada by boat, but somebody has to have control and I am wondering if it is to be the feed grain agency.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, feed reserves come under a joint committee made up of various representatives of government agencies, under the chairmanship of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, and that committee will make recommendations to us in respect of the allocation of stock. A certain small part of the stock is now lying in Halifax, but the balance has been at Thunder Bay. The intention would be to place this in whatever elevators seemed more desirable for moving the supply between these two points.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said that in some cases, as regards supply and prices, the Canadian Feed Board would have authority to intervene. In what way, Mr. Speaker, would the Canadian Feed Board have such authority? With additional funds.? And if the board asks for import permits from the Canadian Wheat Board and the latter say no, which board will take the decision?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think part of that was just answered in that the Canadian Livestock Feed Board will be involved. If they cannot find ample supplies and there is nothing priced at the proper price the board will be given the authority to enter the market and, if necessary, enter the market outside Canada, which will then require permits to bring the grain back to Canada. Naturally it will be funded by the government in order to be able to do so.

Mr. Clermont: I have a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker, I asked the following question to the Minister of Agriculture: If the Canadian Feed Board asks for import permits from the Canadian Wheat Board, if the latter rejects its application, will the government intervene either through the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board or through the minister who is responsible for the Canadian Feed Board?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the government has the authority under the act. That board operates by order in council, and that is the authority under which it would do so.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to whichever minister would choose to answer. As I mentioned earlier, the cost of drawing from reserves by eastern feeders was prohibitive. As a result they were transferring grain within regions rather than drawing from reserves supposedly in place. Will that prohibitive cost of drawing from reserves be eliminated and, if so, how will it be done?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the rules in relation to feed reserves are carefully set out and are available. It is not our intention that reserves should be drawn upon at any particular moment for no particular reason, because that would interfere with the ordinary placing of stocks into place by those who had the foresight and responsibility to do so. It is, therefore, not considered to be a simple draw-upon with regard to transportation costs, but rather taking them into account in emergencies when stock is available with, of course, a proper accounting for the forward cost of freight.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister missed the point of my question. When they found themselves in an emergency position, as I stated in earlier remarks, and had to go to that reserve, the expense was very, very high because of the replacement cost imposed upon them by the Wheat Board or any other replacement agency that might be involved.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member is confusing the ordinary reserves which the Wheat Board had held in position for export, in which case, when it had to replace those reserves, the real cost to them of replacing them had to be taken into account or it would have been a switch completely at the expense of western grain producers. We are now meeting that problem by establishing a reserve which would be available for the domestic market at domestic prices. That problem in respect of previous switching before we had the reserve arose because the price of that grain was really to be applied at the export price and not at the lower domestic price. At this point in time a switch available at the domestic price will be possible with this reserve in place, as it has been for the past year and a half at Thunder Bay.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the hon. gentleman be able to inform the House of the rate of subsidies for the Rimouski area?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, it would take quite a lengthy time to explain what I meant by "backhaul", but it covers the cost of feed at Rimouski because of a backhaul. It will not be the full $6 reduction. This will be outlined in the paper in the next day or two.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the generosity of our two ministers who have maintained part of the subsidies for Gaspesia as it is one area in Quebec which does not produce fodder or livestock.

In view of the fact that starting in August, the subsidies will be discontinued, which will result in an increase of some $6 a ton for feed grains which means $2 more for pork and almost 75 for each chicken, I would like to ask the minister if he is considering setting up a specific program to assist the Ontario and western Quebec cattle raisers?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, if the price of grains stayed at the same price as the Chicago corn price there would be a saving to the Gaspé producer who uses western grain of approximately $14 a ton and maybe more, so the $6 would be insignificant. The dairy producer producing dairy products and the poultry producer producing poultry under the present prices would find that the grain they buy would be one of the main input costs they would have to contend with in producing those products, and this would be to their advantage.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard that freight rate assistance on feed grains will be reduced or eliminated and we will have a corn-competitive price. No one said anything about the delivered price. We all know that—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is giving a good imitation of someone making a response on behalf of his party. He is supposed to ask a question. Could he do so now?

Mr. Whittaker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The freight in U.S. haulers is cheaper than in Canada. I put this question to the Minister of Transport. Will this be the delivered price or is the difference in the freight rate of U.S. corn producers to be absorbed by the producers of grain in western Canada, in British Columbia, in Montreal, or especially in the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Lang: When the Wheat Board is selling corn at the competitive price in Montreal the price is then quoted in terms of Thunder Bay, which of course will be the Montreal competitive price less freight. This really means that with feed freight assistance gone in Montreal, the price at Thunder Bay for those who want to feed animals west of there will indeed be $6 a ton lower by the equivalent amount. This tends to mean that the same basis will be used in bringing that grain into grain deficient areas in British Columbia where the lower base price will be the price used by the Canadian Wheat Board in pricing the grain in. In fact that price had been artificially high before because of the effect of feed grain assistance upon the price at Thunder Bay.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In recognition of the number of hon. members who for some time have been seeking to put questions, it seems to me that the questioning could appropriately be concluded by the following hon. members in the order of their appearance: the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), and the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Bussières).

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it is with regard to what he stated, if I understand him, namely, that the grain position for the export market can be used or tapped in terms of reserve. Given the announced loss of the so-called add a lease rate with respect to grain for export, is there any implication with respect to this on the ultimate price of grain that may have to be taken out of that stock pile for the local market? In general, what are the implications of the loss of the add a lease rate fairly shortly with respect to feed grains for Nova Scotia or Atlantic region users?

Mr. Lang: There is no implication at all because the add a lease rates apply only to the export movement of grain. The fact is that with the retention of feed freight assistance in the Atlantic region at present levels and with the effect upon the price of feed freight being off and therefore off at Thunder Bay, there will be an economic tendency for feed grain to be available at a slightly lower price than would otherwise be the case. I have to stress that in a moving market that would have been the case in the Atlantic region. The feed reserves we have been talking about will be available to be drawn upon and those would ordinarily be priced at their destination plus freight from Thunder Bay. Very often that would be the most economical rate for grain moving there.

Mr. Forrestall: This gives rise to some concern. May I ask the minister whether I can infer from his comments that there will be no overtaxing of storage? I admit the usefulness of it to our own people who might want now, in a stable situation, to use the storage and to buy ahead. Will this overtax our storage capacity for export grains?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, there is really fairly adequate storage. There are some places where additional storage is needed and there are of course DREE efforts to correct the situation directly. There will be further programs in time to improve storage in storage deficient areas in the country.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. He is quoted as saying in the press release that the reduction in feed freight assistance should not increase feed grain prices in eastern Canada. Having regard to the fact that feed freight assistance rates will be reduced by $6 a ton, are we to assume that this differential will have to be made up by the producers of grain in western Canada? Is that correct?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, they are going to meet corn-competitive U.S. prices. That is all we are asking and that is all they have agreed to do.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is being done now. I am simply asking the minister to confirm or deny the conclusion I have reached. Is it not true that if in fact reduction in feed freight assistance will increase feed grain prices, that the western grain producer will have to make up the differential in order to be competitive, yes or no?

Mr. Whelan: They asked me a question, Mr. Speaker, and then they tell me how to answer it. I think that is going a little far. The price of feed grain will be the same for the western producer exactly as it will be for the eastern producer. The hon. member was talking about British Columbia. This year they brought in ten times more American corn to British Columbia than they did the year before. The producers of livestock and grain will be on a more equitable basis.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the Reserve Stock Management Committee has recommended to the ministers the relocation of the major portion of the reserve stocks of feed grains, can the minister give an example of one or two storage locations?

Mr. Whelan: I think that one of the areas would be where the largest buyers of feed grain are so that there are adequate stocks, if there is not ample storage in that area. Western Quebec would probably be one of the places, and as the minister in charge of the Wheat Board just said, DREE has a program. They have built one grain elevator in New Brunswick, one is under way, there will be one in P.E.I. A program is to be unveiled in Nova Scotia and there will be similar kinds of programs in the area to help them become more self-sufficient. Storage locations are not just limited to areas of use. They are also extended to areas of production.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): If it is given to some places, it is taken from others. Would these two other places from which reserve stocks would be drawn for domestic use be Montreal and Quebec City?

● (2100)

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker. The current reserve had initially been located totally at Thunder Bay to be available on call from there. At a later date, with the special demands from Halifax, a certain portion, 400,000 or 500,000 bushels, was located at Halifax. This will simply mean a better distribution of the stock which up to this point had been held at Thunder Bay. It will be placed at forward positions as the committee decides.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, in the answer he gave earlier to the hon. member for Gatineau, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) indicated very clearly the important role the Canadian Feed Board would have to play in the implementation of some aspects of this policy.

Recently, before the Committee on Agriculture, the chairman of the Canadian Feed Board indicated that he lacked powers to fulfill the present objectives of the board.

Can the Minister of Agriculture assure this House that he is prepared to give the Canadian Feed Board more powers, through legislation, to make it easier for them to fulfill their new objectives? I would also like to know whether, if this new policy proved unfair for eastern producers, the Minister of Agriculture and the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board would be prepared to assure this House that financial measures will be introduced to correct an unfair situation for eastern producers?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: I do not know how we can say it any clearer than we have already said it about bad pricing, etc., and the fact that the Canadian livestock Feed Board, which is under my jurisdiction, will be the one which will do the monitoring to make sure there are supplies and not bad pricing. I already repeated that if there is evidence of bad pricing or poor supply, the Canadian Livestock Feed Board will be permitted to intervene directly in the domestic market by proclaiming that part of the act giving them authority to enter the market.

Mr. Speaker: I see two other hon. members seeking the floor. Throughout the question period I took great care to observe all those who were seeking the floor, and attempted, even as I gave advance warning that I would only recognize certain other questioners, to look for those who I thought would be interested in putting questions as a result of their earlier interest in the subject matter. I do not like to cut off hon. members inordinately from asking questions, but I was surprised that no others were seeking the floor at that time. Since I said there would only be certain other questioners and there are two others, I will conclude the questioning with the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) and the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski).

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I was not jumping up and down earlier because there were so many others and I have had one kick at the cat, but I would like to ask two questions in one, in order to take account of your kind indulgence.

First, since the Minister of Agriculture did not quite answer the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) I will ask a question of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In relation to U.S. corn prices now the statement says "Because western grains are going to be available at corn-competitive prices, I do not expect the reduction in feed freight assistance to increase feed grain prices in eastern Canada or British Columbia."

In relation to U.S. corn prices now, can the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board tell us what effect that will have on barley, oats or feed wheat in relation to Canadian Wheat Board prices? Will it not mean a reduction in the price to western Canadian grain producers?

Second, would the minister now tell us what he is thinking about in terms of a plebiscite, which has been asked for, regarding feed grains in the open market? Is he now prepared to call one?

Mr. Lang: While we are clearly getting closer to that point there remain one or two items under the feed grain policy which still have to be put into effect before it is fully there, but I think it is becoming better understood and operating more fully now. When the sale of grain in question is Wheat Board grain at corn-competitive prices rather than grain farmer to farmer or region to region on a direct basis, which is still possible and raises different issues, then the effect of not having the artificial feed freight assistance to the Montreal and Ontario regions is to lower the price at Thunder Bay by that amount, and therefore also to lower the price of feed grains in the elevators to the buyer of those feed grains who raise animals in western Canada. It is exactly that.

It is the removal of an artificial factor which had been distorting natural advantage, and I was always pleased to note that the western organizations discussing this subject did not divide on product lines, but the grain farmer and the meat farmer joined together in wanting this artificial factor removed.

Capital Punishment

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister just answered my question, but I would like to know, after that lengthy question by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Bussières), what the government is doing for Sudbury.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, at the five o'clock adjournment I was beginning a quotation from the second reading debate in 1961 of the remarks of the then minister of justice, as follows:

> Society's concern for its basic rules is expressed in its commands and corresponding sanctions that together constitute our criminal law. The degree of society's concern with respect to individual rules is reflected in the method of expression adopted. In this sense, therefore, the sanction for the law against murder may properly reflect the importance which society attaches to the maintenance of that law. In our view, Canadians properly attach so high a value to the sanctity of human life that the law which translates this feeling into effective form should provide the maximum sanction for its deliberate breach, and no other penalty would be considered adequate.

In my view those remarks of the Hon. David Fulton in 1961 have as clear an application today as they did then. In fact the Canadian people reflect an even higher concern, and it is for that reason that we see from one end of the country to the other this expression of public opinion—not just by a minor margin, not by 10 per cent, not by 20 per cent—in proportions of 80 per cent of 90 per cent for the retention of capital punishment and the carrying out of the law.

What does Bill C-84 do? For one thing, of course, it abolishes the word "capital." It abolishes capital murder and non capital murder because it wants to get away from that. So we are going to get Hawaii Five-O's and all the multitude of American police television programs' versions of murder one and murder two. It will be great to hear them calling out, "Book him on murder one", in the most dramatic voice!

But what is being substituted for the equivalent of capital murder is a sentence of 25 years and the possibility, under certain circumstances, of an individual applying for parole after somewhere between 15 and 18 years. In other words, these people are to be put into a jail and the key effectively thrown away.

Much is said about rehabilitation. There is not one person, here in this Chamber or outside, who can say that a man having served 15 or 18 years is rehabilitated. He has become so institutionalized and so bereft of the practice of living in ordinary society that he cannot be rehabilitated.

Man is strange; but perhaps I am a little subjective with regard to being incarcerated. I have not done time in any prison, but I was a prisoner of war for nearly three years. Even during that time some individuals acted with great desperation and tried to break out. They were reckless about their safety and one or two that I know unfortunately never made it back, not even in a "klim tin" because they were liquidated. On the other hand, I know that if any of us in the camp that I was in, or those in scores of other camps in Germany, or those in the hands of the Japanese, had been told that we were to be there for life, there were three options for a great number of people. They could hang themselves or do away with themselves in a sheer blue funk. I have seen this happen to men who could not stand the pressure. Another option was to take the life of a guard, in desperation. What could a man lose under those circumstances?

How can one pile 25 years on top of 25 years and make it meaningful? This is the attitude of the wolves in prison—what do they have to lose if all they are going to get is a further life sentence? Is it going to be incarceration in solitary, in segregated custody? Now the do-gooders and the bleeding hearts and the nice Nellies complain about isolation in the newspapers, on television, everywhere. They say solitary confinement is inhumane, but in many cases protective custody will be the only answer. What about Williams and the chap in Saskatoon? What about many other cases where we know there has been a dastardly crime, particularly when it involves children? Those people have to be put in isolation if they are to live, but on the whole society says we are not going to kill them—we will eliminate capital punishment, we will just turn them over to the wolves in prisons and they can do a job of capital punishment.

Mr. Caccia: What about—

An hon. Member: Just listen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has the floor.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote against this bill because I support capital punishment. Those who insist on the right to life and say that the state has no right to take a life should consider the victims. Did they not have a right to life? Surely the person who has wrongfully taken the life or lives of others has forfeited his absolute right. To me, Mr. Speaker, the substitution of life imprisonment is even worse. It is coldly sadistic in so many instances.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I shall finish in a moment, Mr. Speaker. I respect the right of others to hold a contrary opinion, and many do; however, I resent the high moral tone of so many so-called abolitionists who somehow or other feel they have been called upon to wrap around themselves a self-fashioned cloak of some alleged higher morality, whether Christian or otherwise. Who says theirs is a higher morality? Then there are those who allege that the abolition of capital punishment is the characteristic of a civilized society. Who says so? Only an abolitionist. Is a retentionist, to use the simplistic term, any less civilized? The burden of proof in any argument in favour of the abolition of capital punishment rests on those who wish to make the change. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion they have failed to discharge the burden of proof imposed upon them.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was curious about the last few remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) in view of the lecture he gave us this afternoon because I imagine he was quoting something.

I participate in this debate because I should like to propose a number of solutions that I do not think have been discussed. Members who have spoken on both sides of the debate have been sincere, have reasoned and wrestled over a period of time with their consciences. They have considered the information supplied by their constituents and to a large extent the testimony of those who appeared before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on at least four occasions in the last eight or ten years. They have taken a position honestly, in my opinion.

Many members do not believe in the idea of consensus. Few have suggested, with any degree of honesty, a desire to have a plebiscite on this issue. If they really believed that, then they would have a plebiscite on everything. As all members know, circumstances change, situations change, many arguments are based upon personal experience, and happily those arguments change many times too.

I can remember a few debates where a definite opinion was taken by all members of the House. On the War Measures Act a few were on one side, the majority on the other. I can honestly say with hindsight that maybe the majority was wrong and the very small minority was right.

The flag debate was another of those emotional subjects on which one forms an opinion based on background. Now we have a flag and it is fairly well accepted by most of the country. I was rather surprised a couple of weeks ago when driving on the road to my home to see a Union Jack on a flagpole. I wondered why he was not flying the Ontario flag, until my wife reminded me it was the Queen's birthday. Probably that was why he was flying the Union Jack. We debated the issue of the Canadian flag. Certainly the country does not begrudge our discussing those issues, and does not begrudge exchanges which take place in the heat of debate. But once we decide, the country accepts our decision, knowing very well that we may modify our decision from time to time.

I have always been of the opinion that we should not hang people. I have heard members suggest that we should use the guillotine instead of a rope. Well, I oppose the use of the guillotine, the use of the electric chair, the use of the firing squad, etc. Rightly or wrongly I think society has less right to take a life than an individual has, if an individual has such right. When a man kills another, he probably does it for some reason. But society executes on the excuse that it protects. I have heard it suggested that society executes out of revenge. Be that as it may, I say that any society which executes is none too civilized.

This afternoon the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) used the example of a man who raped, then murdered a couple of young children. Surely a layman could only conclude that the man was not in his right mind. Sane people do not do that; therefore hanging them or putting them in jail for life is not the civilized way of curing the problem. People like that probably need medical attention. They should be confined in an institution for the insane, not imprisoned in a penitentiary for life.

I agree with what has been said about the cabinet's commuting death sentences. I agree that since we retained the death penalty for the murders of prison guards and policemen those convicted of such crimes should have been executed—save and except in cases when the cabinet's prerogative of mercy could be properly exercised. The cabinet did not choose to allow any murderers to be executed, which I think was wrong.

I am concerned about how the different categories of murderers are to be treated. In my opinion the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has brought in few, if any, reforms. He has done little in the field of penal reform, or in any other field for that matter. Why Mr. Speaker? The government is backward, cautious, and totally incompetent in this regard.

Mr. Blais: Surely the hon. member does not mean that.

Mr. Peters: Yes I do. It is totally incompetent. Actually it is going backwards, like a kid trying to pedal a bicycle when the chain has fallen off.

The previous hon. member who spoke said that he thought a 25-year sentence of imprisonment for murder is more barbaric than hanging. I agree.

Mr. Leggatt: It is 15 years.

Mr. Peters: With respect, it is 25.

Mr. Leggatt: Look at the bill again.

Mr. Peters: How can we expect judges to render impartial decisions when we clamour for 25-year sentences? Only on the most rare occasion will a judge impose a sentence of less than 25 years. It seems to me that the 25-year sentence is probably the most barbaric penalty our system can meet out. Consider the feelings of a person of, say, 40 years who faces a 25-year prison term. He knows he is without hope of release and will make no contribution at all to society. I am prepared to support the idea that a man should be sent to jail for 25 years, on this condition—that he be provided with a potassium cyanide capsule so that if he feels his punishment is intolerable he can take his own life. There must be safeguards, of course, to make sure that the capsule does not end up in the warden's soup. Prisoners have been known not to like wardens.

I suggest that if the prisoner feels he cannot face a jail term of 25 years he should have the right to take his own life. Society should not make that decision for him. Actually secret service agents now are provided with potassium cyanide capsules. After a United States spy plane was shot down by the Russians, a United States committee which investigated the case suggested that if Gary Powers had swallowed a lethal pill he would have avoided all the fuss and embarrassment which followed his capture. If hon. members were to propose the retention of the death penalty in the form I propose, I might support such a bill. But I cannot support the idea of imprisoning a man for 25 years, without any hope of release.

Mr. Leggatt: It's 15 years.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) insists it is 15 years. I suggest that he is not aware of the changes taking place in present day society.

Mr. Leggatt: The hon. member is not aware of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. Peters: It is interesting to note that when skirts get longer, society feels insecure. At present our citizens are concerned about personal security and loss of income. We have not seen such fear for some time. Normally hemlines come down either before or during a war or just before a serious recession. Most of the 700,000-odd unemployed think the recession is here, now. People want collective security. As I said, when recession is upon us, hemlines drop. When hemlines go up, it means things are free and easy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: But when they start coming down, watch out. They are a pretty good economic indicator. I suggest to the hon. member for New Westminster that as time passes, our judges will become more and more conservative and react more to the general tone of society as society becomes less progressive and people draw together for collective security. They will be more like the Ku Klux Klan five years from now than the progressive judges of five or ten years ago. They react to the society they are in, the same as members of parliament.

● (2130)

We have paid no attention to the protection of society. We spend a lot of money to keep people in jail. Every once in a while the Solicitor General announces that a new penitentiary will be built. Statistics indicate that there are more people in jail in Canada than in any other civilized country. That is no honour.

I have visited some of our penitentiaries on numerous occasions. I met many of the prisoners, guards, and officials. I was pleased with the changes that were being made in the penitentiary system a few years ago, but since that time very little has been done. As a matter of fact since Commissioner McLeod left the penitentiary service there has been very little progressive thought in the whole service. He had faults, there is no question about that. However, he had an excellent mind and knew more about criminology than most people. His dream was that by the time he left the penitentiary service more people would be rehabilitated than when he took over.

There has been very little progress with regard to rehabilitation. Society is scared. Any time someone does not return after being granted a leave, the Solicitor General is jumped on. When he tries to explain, he puts his foot in his mouth and the problem sounds worse than it did originally.

When there was a problem at Millhaven two members of parliament visited there. I was one of them. That section of the act that permitted members of parliament to visit a penitentiary at reasonable times was removed by a former Solicitor General. That had been a British tradition, but we had a non-British Solicitor General. He felt that the visits caused problems, and therefore members could no longer visit a penitentiary without his permission.

Since that time I have not visited a penitentiary. If I cannot go there on my own to talk to those people and intervene if necessary, I am not going to go. I suggest there are many members who have never visited a penitentiary. They should do so.

It cost $20,000 a year to keep a person in jail. The government is now talking about keeping murderers in jail for 25 years. At $20,000 a year that is a fairly expensive proposition.

In my limited experience I have found that it is often easier to rehabilitate a murderer than any other type of prisoner. It is very difficult to rehabilitate a dope addict, forger of con artist. It is almost impossible to rehabilitate a bank robber. In many cases a murderer could be set free the day after his trial. There are lawyers here who know that. Even though the murder may have been premeditated, it was carried out under extreme provocation. That provocation likely would not occur again during that person's lifetime.

One day you have a good citizen with no criminal intent and no criminal record. He commits a murder. He is either sentenced to jail for life or executed. In my experience it would be easy to rehabilitate that person.

I think I have told the story before of intervening on behalf of a young man who committed an atrocious murder. He was released. After five years he completed his course at Queen's University. That man is now married and has a number of children. I am sure he will never again be in trouble. I believe that story could be repeated by lawyers hundreds of times.

A law abiding citizen may commit a murder. However, the chances of that happening are very small. The chance of him committing a second murder is almost nil. His neighbour is more likely to commit murder than he is likely to murder a second time.

This must be explained to society. The little old lady walking through the park believes that if we execute the murderer, she will not have her purse snatched. I fail to see the relationship, but she understands it. She believes there is a total breakdown in society. This fits in with the change that I see in society.

A few years ago we changed the homosexual laws, abortion laws, and divorce laws. A number of changes were made in the social field. I respectfully suggest those changes could not be made today because society would not allow it. Society is moving very far to the right. If members of parliament are going to be limited in that way with regard to changes in society, all we really need is a machine and we can let the public vote. Everyone could vote on every subject. There could be vigilante committees established all over the place, such as there are in some countries. The strong will be right and the weak will be eliminated. Surely that is not civilized society.

We must not only look at what we are doing with regard to capital punishment but with regard to the rehabilitation of prisoners. Many of these prisoners could be sent to our "Siberia". We need a highway to the Arctic, as well as a pipeline down the west shore of Hudson's Bay. This involves a great deal of work. Why not have the prisoners do it? We hear about Christian principles. One Calvinistic principle that is very strong in Canadian society is that work is good and to work makes you good. If that has any merit it would work well with some of our prisoners.

Our prisoners are only given very menial tasks, if any. Time weighs heavily in their hands. They scheme, plan, and do all sorts of things. However, they are not being rehabilitated. There are many jobs in the Arctic that could be done by machine, but there is still a great deal of manual labour required. If we are going to have sovereignty in the Arctic, we need to build airports. We would not need guards for these prisoners, only foremen. The prisoners would be paid for their work. In addition, they would develop a trade that could be marketed when they return to society. If they were willing to accept the discipline necessary in that environment, they could be rehabilitated. If not, they would again be sent there.

Surely it would be possible to develop a work program which would lead to the rehabilitation of a great many prisoners, allowing them to return to society making use of the trades they have been taught while in prison. You do not have to go much further than my new riding, Mr. Speaker. You would not need any guards there. If you were to leave the area you would be eaten alive by mosquitoes or drown in the muskeg. For nine months of the year you would be frozen to death.

Mr. Reid: What riding are you speaking of?

Mr. Peters: I am speaking of the area north of Moosonee. I question the minister's attitude. He seems to take great pride in building a new penitentiary every few months.

An hon. Member: He announces one.

Mr. Peters: Well, he announces it and keeps moving it around from one riding to another. I have known him for some time. He is a very honest person and a very dedicated person. I am sure that many of the goals he has in mind could be achieved. But what we have to find is some way of reducing our prison population. The reason they are in penitentiaries is because they cannot adjust to the demands of society. Surely it is necessary to train them in such a way as to make them fit for release into society. This change in approach must be made known in such a way as to make everyone in the country familiar with it. If this is done sympathy will be developed and the public generally will be in a better position to understand the achievements and problems of a penal reform system.

It is not good enough merely to read from time to time a newspaper headline announcing that a prisoner has escaped while on leave to attend his mother's funeral. The department must be prepared to state plainly that last year thousands of people were allowed out of prison on a weekly basis to rejoin their families with the result that, when the time for their release came, they were much better prepared to return to their communities in a different frame of mind. Obviously this is easier for them if they are familiar with the life of the community as it is today rather than it was five or six years ago, before they went to jail, or else they would return to it as if it were a foreign environment.

An hon. Member: What do you mean by "foreign environment"?

Mr. Peters: I did not hear that interruption but it was probably made by someone who had looked at all the difficulties and had never considered any of the advantages.

When Commissioner MacLeod was in charge the character of many of our penal institutions was changed. From being merely jails with security guards they became institutions where prisoners were given advice and helped in every way possible to develop a sense of responsibility to the community.

Mr. Blais: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Peters: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blais: I paid particular attention to the hon. member's comment concerning the day parole system—he spoke of its success and the need to develop it further. In the light of his evident approval of that program as carried out by the Department of the Solicitor General I was wondering how he could justify his earlier statement that the policies of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) had been a total failure.

An hon. Member: Shame. You have given him another hour!

Mr. Peters: Perhaps I should not have said they were a total failure. The day parole system has been in effect for some time. It has been expanded so as to allow people out of prison to attend educational institutions. What I am saying is that the minister has not developed any system which was not already in effect. I am suggesting, too, that he has done very little to explain some of his problems. I have in mind an occasion when one particular incident was disclosed, and the minister threw in two or three more that nobody knew about, and then the fat was in the fire. He has done that on a number of occasions.

If the Solicitor General does have any new proposals he certainly has not told people about them. All I ever read in the papers is his intention to build a new jail somewhere. If any evidence of his own attitude to some of these situations were needed one need look no further than the subject of the present debate. Murderers are not to be hanged but they are to be put in jail for 25 years. Under the old system, Mr. Speaker, some of them got out after five years and, in my opinion, they were totally rehabilitated. In my view, that is possible. Mr. Speaker, if there were anything which might make me consider voting for hanging it would be the length of the sentence the minister is proposing.

If the hon. gentleman really wants to get this debate over, one way would be to arrange for eight or ten hangings on July 1 on the front lawn of the Parliament Buildings with coverage in colour television. I am sure he would then have no problem.

I am sure that if you asked most people who are in favour of hanging whether they would be prepared, as a member of a jury, where each vote counts, to bring in a verdict which would ensure such a penalty, they would tell you they wanted no part of such a decision. Nevertheless they are willing to allow society to make such a decision for them, and they do so because they fear hard times are coming and they are scared; they are willing to accept any measures which it is felt might protect them. Members of parliament, even those who believe there is a certain role for vengeance, a certain role for deterrence can only do that in good conscience, surely, if they are prepared to adopt a totally different way of eliminating the people society wishes to reject.

In my area not long ago a man hung a dog to a clothesline with a piece of wire. He was taken to court and received a two-year sentence for cruelty. I do not think he served any time in jail. It was a suspended sentence. But he got two years for hanging that dog. We are being asked to do that in the name of society. On occasion a man hangs from the gallows and suffocates for up to eight or 10 minutes before he dies. And we call ourselves a civilized society! I would question that, and so would anyone who witnesses such a barbaric way of disposing of people.

I would sacrifice the six or eight people who are now on death row awaiting passage of this legislation by hanging them in front of the Parliament Buildings on July 1 to celebrate our development as a "civilized society" because, Mr. Speaker, there would be such revulsion against that act that there is no question that the Canadian public would support the abolition of the death penalty, and of that method in particular, forever.

If we are to keep people in jail for 25 years, which is the period the minister has had to settle for, we should also provide them with the means of leaving this world. To me, this is just as barbaric as eliminating them. We should let these people make a choice between the two.

An hon. Member: How about giving them a colour TV?

Mr. Peters: The hon. member says we should give them a colour television set. No doubt some people in that category would appreciate a colour television set. If we are giving them away we should give them to other institutions, not penal institutions. We could put these people to work in the uranium mines at Eldorado or wherever they may be. Let us pay them a good wage. Certainly this would not cost us as much as keeping them in solitude, without hope, without reform, without fitting them for a return to society. In many instances we make sure that these people will remain in penal institutions for the rest of their lives; they will continue to return to them because our penal system makes them even less fitted for society outside.

[Mr. Peters.]

I suggest we give reform serious consideration. The minister should ask members of parliament to pass some progressive legislation in the field of penal reform. Reformation of our prisoners and of those who have offended against society should be made an important part of our legal structure. If it is not, we will continue to have the unenviable record of having the largest number of people in jail per population of any country in the western world.

Despite this retrograde step it seems to me that the minister still has some support in the House for progressive legislation. If that is not the case, if he has frittered it away, then the three or four votes for abolition that I have heard today will go down the drain, just as did the larger number that we had on the last occasion. The amendment that may be moved by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) may in the end have to be the solution if the minister does not give some consideration to putting members of parliament in the picture about what he hopes to do. He should not attempt to satisfy public opinion by passing a stupid piece of legislation. Better that it is not passed than to perpetrate a hoax in the form of these long mandatory sentences, which in many cases will not be served and will certainly not serve society for the next three or four years before the law is once again changed.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, it is slightly more than three years since I last had the opportunity of speaking on this subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schumacher: I see that my absence has been noted by the other side. As a matter of fact I last spoke on this subject on May 29, 1973. We heard today that about 70 members of this Chamber have participated so far in the debate on Bill C-84, which I guess the government House leader considers to be quite a number. Nevertheless this means that less than one third of the members of the House have so far taken the opportunity of expressing their opinion on a subject of very deep concern to the general public of this country. I hope a way will be found to enable practically all members to have an opportunity of stating their positions on the capital punishment question.

A number of the Canadian people are beginning to wonder about the efficacy of the principle of representative government. Opinion polls—I know the government spends a lot of money on and pays a lot of attention to polls—indicate that Canadians in general want the principle of capital punishment retained as the law of this land. They are very concerned about the recent attitude of the government which ignores with impunity one of the basic laws of the land. Somehow or other the members of this Chamber will have to pay some attention to the question of representing the population of Canada, though I know some of them hate to be reminded that they are representatives.

I see Your Honour is moving in your chair and it is about ten o'clock, so may I call it ten o'clock and continue on Friday?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Parent: Mr. Chairman, I seek unanimous consent of the House to revert to the presentation of reports by standing and special committees.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows he needs unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member for St. Catharines to present a report from a committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DEPARTMENT'S KNOWLEDGE OF FINANCING DIFFICULTIES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, while the Minister of National Defence's (Mr. Richardson) handling of the LRPA purchase can hardly be termed competent, his colleagues in cabinet have shown no great skill either, except in attempting to put all the blame on the Minister of National Defence's shoulders.

● (2200)

In interviews over the Victoria Day weekend, and again in the House on Tuesday, May 25, and Friday, May 28, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) let it be known that he did not think much of a process whereby multi-million dollar contracts were agreed to on the basis of nothing more than a verbal agreement between two individuals that financing would be available.

At the time the deal collapsed the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) also indicated that the source of the problem was that cabinet had been told Lockheed could provide the money. Each conveniently forgets that not only did the Minister of National Defence believe in the verbal agreement, but the whole cabinet apparently believed in it too.

Not one cabinet minister, least of all the Minister of Supply and Services, has said he looked for a written assurance before Lockheed was authorized on December 2 to start work on the contract.

In addition to all the blame for the verbal agreement being pushed on the Minister of National Defence and "a general" whom one assumes is General Allan, the manager of the LRPA project office, we also have the interesting spectacle of the Minister of Supply and Services saying he did not know the Department of National Defence was short of funds, nor that Lockheed had agreed to provide these funds when he authorized work to begin. I refer to Hansard of March 29 at page 12217. Later he said that officials in his department were not aware of these facts either which, given the relationship of the project office to the Department of Supply and Services, is surely asking too much of our credulity.

The story, as it has emerged so far, is that the project office negotiated a contract for 18 LRPA's. Though the project manager was General Allan from the Department of National Defence, the deputy project manager, with principal responsibility for negotiating the terms of the contract, was L. H. Stopforth, an official from the Department of Supply and Services. As Mr. Crutchlow, the assistant deputy minister of the Department of National Defence explained to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on March 23, at page 33:30:

—the contract has been negotiated by the contract office. That office, as the minister has said, is led by General Allan as the project manager, but his deputy is a member of the Department of Supply and Services, a senior officer of that department. He is primarily responsible for the actual composition of the contract, along with his line branches that work in the DSS.

The project office negotiated with Lockheed a contract based on Lockheed's most cost-effective schedule and based also on the premise that there would be more money available in the defence budget. As it turned out this was a mistaken premise, for it was only in November that cabinet gave consideration to the long term budget, and it was only at that time it became apparent there would be shortfalls in 1976-77 and in the two subsequent years. I refer to General Allan's evidence to the standing committee on April 13, 1976, at page 35:9.

General Allan said that when it was realized there would be a shortfall "we" contacted both suppliers, Boeing and Lockheed, and asked whether they could finance the shortfall, and both replied in the affirmative. It was on this basis that cabinet documentation was prepared. I refer to General Allan's evidence to the standing committee on April 13, 1976, at page 35:7. When asked about this on Thursday, May 27, General Allan told the standing committee that he personally made the phone calls to Boeing and Lockheed, and the results of these conversations were reported to his deputy, Mr. Stopforth.

The whole organization of the project office makes it appear very unlikely that the Minister of Supply and Services did not know of the financial problems of the Department of National Defence. General Allan explained to the standing committee on May 13, as reported at page 39:6, that he was responsible to the deputy ministers of four departments; Defence, Supply and Services, Industry, Trade and Commerce, and DREE. He reported to the deputy ministers through a senior management board, which had representation at the assistant deputy minister level from the four departments concerned. This senior management board was chaired by Mr. Crutchlow, assistant deputy minister of the Department of National Defence.

When asked whether the Department of National Defence's lack of money and Lockheed's verbal commitment to provide financing were communicated to this management board, General Allan said:

> Yes, the senior management board was aware of that, as were the cabinet and the Treasury Board, that we had a shortfall between the funds that were available to the Department of National Defence and the cash flow that was required in the contract which had been negotiated in this case with Lockheed, in our judgment.

When asked whether cabinet also was aware of Lockheed's verbal commitment, General Allan said:

> Yes, our judgment in the recommendations we made up the line was that this we could negotiate with Lockheed to solve this shortfall in the cash between what was available and what was required in the contract.

On Thursday, May 27, General Allan was even more specific about who knew about the shortfall and the verbal promise that financing would be available. He said:

> The phone calls to both Boeing and Lockheed were made by myself. The results of those conversations were reported back into the project office to my deputy. The gist of the conversations were put in the submission to cabinet; they were put in a submission to Treasury Board; the cabinet submission was dated November 14 and was considered by cabinet on November 27; the Treasury Board submission was briefed on the basis of a draft document on November 27; the formal Treasury Board submission for the program was on December 1. The shortfall was pointed out in all these documents. There was a briefing prepared for the Department of Supply and Services on November 30 to . . . my understanding was that the Deputy Minister of Supply and Services briefed the Minister on December 1.
> MR. MUNRO: Including the shortfall.
> GEN. ALLAN: Including the shortfall.

The Minister of National Defence intervened here to support General Allan. He said:

> To confirm what Brigadier General Allan has said the fact that cabinet approved interest payments and which as I said are in the blue book, indicates that cabinet knew there was a shortfall. If they were not going to finance anything then they would not need interest payments. So, I am just confirming what General Allan has said. This was known to the cabinet and certainly known to any minister who was at cabinet.

This comment is interesting in view of the Minister of Supply and Services' repeated statements that he negotiated on the assumption that since DND placed the order it had the money available. Though one does not know whether the Minister of Supply and Services was actually at the cabinet meeting on November 27, is it not very unusual that he was not informed of the results of that meeting, either by a colleague, or through circulation of the minutes? In other words, even if one ignores General Allan's testimony that officials from DSS, including Mr. Stopforth and the Deputy minister, knew these facts, how was it possible for the Minister of Supply and Services not to know that DND was short of funds?

General Allan's comments bring into sharper focus the contrast between what DND says, and what DSS says. Given the organization of the project office, one would assume that the whole project team, not just those members from DND, knew about the shortage of funds, and General Allan has indicated he did tell Mr. Stopforth.

Certainly Mr. Stopforth knew about DND's shortfall in the previous year since he wrote the letters to Mr. Heppe of Lockheed inquiring about alternatives, and there appears to be no reason why he would not have been told about the 1976-77 shortfall and the attempts to overcome it.

However, the Minister of Supply and Services claims that Mr. Stopforth did not know about the shortage of funds for 1976-77 and Lockheed's verbal assurance that it could provide financing; he told the House on Tuesday, May 25, in answer to my question, that he did not know whether the information had been deliberately kept from Mr. Stopforth but,

> . . . be that as it may, the representative of my department on the management committee of that project was not advised of the possibility of that financial arrangement.

The Minister of Supply and Services did not answer the second part of my question, which is whether his deputy minister knew of the shortfall problem. Again because of the structure of the project office, and General Allan's testimony, it seems to me that the deputy minister of Supply and Services must have known.

The misunderstanding with Lockheed, as the Minister of National Defence likes to call it, arose in the period from December 2 to December 22, when Lockheed told General Allan that it could not provide the financing after all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please, I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Walter Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the LRPA project has a significant involvement for four departments: DND which as the user of the defence supplies is responsible for funding the requirement and defining the specification, DSS which as the procurement authority in the government negotiates and administers the contract, ITC which determines and evaluates Canadian industrial benefits, and DREE which applies its concern to realize opportunities for regional economic development that might flow from a major procurement such as the LRPA. Accordingly, because of the multi-departmental interests a project office was established to ensure good management among the four departments directly involved. Staff from the concerned departments were co-located in one office to do the job in a unified and effective manner, taking into account the responsibilities of their respective department. Because DND has the main involvement and interest, the project leader was selected from that department.

The organization of the project office reflected the functional interests of the four departments and contained the following elements: operational; technical; logistical; contractual; industrial development; regional economic development. These six elements worked together in the one office to administer the project.

The LRPA project had three phases to it. In Phase I starting November 1, 1972, five contractors submitted proposals for an Argus replacement. This phase was unfunded. Phase II commenced on May 6, 1974, but only included two, not five, contractors. During this phase Boeing and Lockheed were funded in the amounts of $5.5 million and $5.7

million respectively to define the LRPA requirements. This phase was completed in November, 1975. Phase III covering the design, development, production, test and delivery by the successful bidder was to commence when a definitive contract was placed.

DND has always been responsible for funding all contract demands or requisitions sent to DSS or its predecessors for procurement of defence goods and services. This responsibility lies within their internal delegation of authority for program funding. It is not or never has been a DSS responsibility.

The LRPA project was duly approved by Treasury Board and cabinet and was ready to proceed to the contract stage. The Department of National Defence was responsible for providing the necessary funds out of their capital budget. Because of a non-recorded conversation which the project manager had with an official of Lockheed, it was assumed that DND funding would be supplemented by some financing from Lockheed.

As things developed, this possibility did not materialize, and this is why Lockheed proceeded to attempt to interest a Canadian bank consortium to make the funds available through the assignment of the contract.

Officials of DND are responsible for managing their capital budget and this was entirely their responsibility. The question of a shortfall of cash to be financed by Lockheed did not become known to the minister and to the senior management of DSS until January.

The reason for issuing a telex on December 2 was to preserve the price, deliveries, and industrial off-set benefits contained in the Lockheed offer before the offer expired on December 2, 1975. This is normal procedure until all the clauses of the contract have been finally developed in legal terms and are agreed fully in detail by both parties. Up to the time the financing problem arose there was reasonable assumption that the contract could be signed in the middle of January.

As it turned out, considerable delay was involved in the negotiations between Lockheed and the Canadian banks as to the possibility of financing and, while these negotiations were going on, it was essential to protect the price, deliveries and off-set conditions on a week to week basis.

Eventually, an option agreement was signed with Lockheed when the possibility of Canadian bank financing appeared reasonably certain.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. His speech is very interesting, but I have to interrupt him.

Mr. Smith (Saint-Jean): I have only about 15 seconds left.

Some hon. Members: Let him finish.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Fifteen seconds are long sometimes.

Mr. Smith (Saint-Jean): This is the letter of agreement the minister tabled on May 25 in the House, and I am sure this provides all the necessary information as to the undertakings of the government and the specific limitation of $16 million which was contained in this agreement.

As to the specific point as to whether the minister was aware of the possibility that Lockheed had agreed to finance the shortage of cash in the early phase of the project, the minister has previously replied to this. This afternoon he also emphasized that his department was not responsible for financing.

TRANSPORT—INCREASE IN CONTAINER FREIGHT RATES—REQUEST FOR REVIEW BY TRANSPORT COMMISSION OR GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, that was an awful lot of balderdash we just listened to, but my concern is the movement of container traffic out of the port of Halifax and Saint John into central Canada, and specifically the proposed freight rate increases on containers to be effective on July 1.

Within the United Kingdom and the continental area of northern Europe there is a freight conference of lines serving the east coast Canadian ports which permits shippers to charge the same ocean freight rates as those serving the ports of Montreal and Toronto directly. In other words, it does not cost any more to ship by way of Halifax than it does by way of Montreal or Toronto into those particular destinations.

This saving has been dependent upon the cost charged to the carriers by the CN system, which in fact is the captive shipper. Without getting into the difficulties which lay behind the questions we asked—the disastrous rate wars in the North Atlantic in 1972 and 1973, the resolution of these problems in 1974 by the introduction of agreements between the Canadian and American lines which permitted cargo to move freely to and from Canada by way of U.S. ports provided Canadian rates were charged, and again with respect to American lines which were permitted to absorb the inland trucking costs from Montreal and Toronto and their base ports in the United States—in spite of this the cargoes continued to flow by way of the United States for a substantial period of time. Indeed we are now looking at some 60,000 tons of cargo going by way of U.S. ports, and in a down period in the movement of containers in the North Atlantic conference we notice that while Canada's total number—and we will use the units, the 20, 35 and 40 foot units—has been down in the period of the last couple of years, probably reflecting trends in world trade, we notice that movement through U.S. ports has not been down.

There is a reason for this, and the reason, of course, lies in the fears that we on the east coast have with respect to the increase in the cost of moving containers, an increase of 7 per cent in the cost of moving containers from Halifax and Saint John into Montreal and Toronto. This increase has been imposed at a point in time when no similar increase is being imposed upon other movers.

Of course any mover of freight has to absorb the total cost of the particular piece of freight permitted under the rules of the North Atlantic Conference with no opportunity for movers on the east coast, for example, to absorb the 7 per cent increase in cost which must perforce come out of their ability to earn dollars. All the 7 per cent increase will do, particularly with respect to the 40 foot containers moving from Saint John and Halifax, is place them in a competitive position with the ports of Montreal and Toronto through the Port of New York which can in turn offer about a 2½ or 3½ day advantage in time over the Port of Halifax. Time being dollars with respect to the movement of cargo, it will not go any other route than through the Port of New York. This is what we are afraid of if the government permits Canadian National to impose the additional 7 per cent.

The problem is compounded by the fact that it is the United States east coast ports that traffic out of Saint John and Halifax will move and not other east Canadian ports. There would be no advantage for large ships that use the ports of Halifax and Saint John to try to get into Montreal or Toronto because they would lose the advantage of the large size containers, which is part of the way that entrepreneurs moving containers in world traffic find the margin for profit.

I should like to see the government review this situation from the point of view of the movement of these containers through Canadian ports. For example, Dart, ACL, Hapag Lloyd or any other line are not in a position to take their customers and get an increase in rates. They cannot do that under the terms of the conference until some time next March or April. It is now the end of May and the increase faces us on July 1. If we are to ask the shippers of 40 foot containers from Halifax to absorb 7 per cent and take into consideration the fact that Dart Lines own about 60 per cent of the port facility at Port Elizabeth in New Jersey, they are not going to move through Halifax. They are going to move their 40 foot containers through their own ports into Montreal and Toronto. They can use the single rate based upon trail of usage.

We would like to get some kind of deferral of any increase until such time as the shipper is in a position to go to his customer and get the appropriate increase to absorb the increase in rail cost. Short of that it would only be fair if the government were to consider an increase in cost to those using the Port of Montreal or the Port of Toronto with respect to the movement of containers and the Conrail service from New York into either Toronto or Montreal. Essentially those are the two points I wished to make.

It is unfair to the people of Halifax and Saint John to put shippers using the ports in the position in which they must absorb out of their own profits the full 7 per cent when a similar amount is not imposed on those using other ports directly and CN is not imposing such increases on movements from New York to Toronto and Montreal.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) for the analysis of the freight rate situation which he placed on the record of the House this evening. I assure him that I will make certain that all the factors he brought forward this evening will be brought to the attention of the responsible authorities both within the Department of Transport and outside, and I hope they will conduct a full analysis of the important concerns he raised this evening.

Originally, when my hon. friend addressed his question to me in the minister's absence during the question period, it had to do with the impact, if any, which the anti-inflation program might have on the specific freight rate increases to which he alluded. Essentially the hon. member asked me at that time whether the government intends to ensure that the Canadian Transport Commission will review the increase in container freight rates out of the ports of Halifax and Saint John into Montreal. The short answer is, yes.

I remind the hon. member that under the anti-inflation legislation the Canadian Transport Commission has responsibility for monitoring increases in freight, passenger, and express rates, and the increases in revenues to be derived therefrom. It is carrying out those duties which, among other things, require it to report to the governor in council where, in the opinion of the Commission, an action on the part of the railways is likely to lead to a breach of the guidelines.

I should like to confirm to my hon. friend that the commission is monitoring the recent increase in the container freight rates from Halifax and Saint John to Montreal and Toronto and has called on the railways to furnish it with all the information it requires in the pursuit of its anti-inflation duties.

As I said earlier, I will ensure that the important considerations my hon. friend described to the House are brought to the attention of responsible officials in order that his concerns may be alleviated.

AGRICULTURE—NUMBER OF CATTLE AND SHEEP DESTROYED UNDER BLUE TONGUE CONTROL PROGRAM

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I begin my remarks this evening by quoting from pages 92:30 and 92:31 of issue No. 2, Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Agriculture of Wednesday, May 26, 1976. I do this to show beyond any shadow of doubt that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) acted too hastily on the blue tongue issue. The following exchange appears in the committee proceedings. I quote:

MR. HURLBURT: . . . Mr. Chairman. The first question I would like to ask is on blue tongue. Mainly, what type of blue tongue do we have? How many cattles have been destroyed to date? How much money has been paid out? And what are the results of the tests in the other provinces?

MR. WHELAN: Dr. Reid has been doing most of the work. He has given me a report here that is quite detailed and shows the wonderful job that the CDA is doing to eradicate this horrible disease from the nation.

MR. HURLBURT: Mr. Chairman, I would just as soon take that to my office to read it rather than have you take up the time.

MR. WHELAN: We can make all this available to you. It is not confidential; it is factual. While we are talking about blue tongue I want to put it on the record that it was stated here the last time we talked about blue tongue that they had never had blue tongue in Europe. Mr. Chairman, they did have blue tongue in Europe; it was in Spain. I could remember that they had it but I could not remember what country and I did not want to say it. But Spain had blue tongue in the late fifties and they had to slaughter sheep. They used inoculation for their sheep.

MR. HURLBURT: They could not have had any effect, though.

MR. WHELAN: They still cannot export cattle.

MR. HURLBURT: Was it the same type?

MR. WHELAN: They still cannot export cattle into the other parts of Europe unless they have a certificate indicating that they are free of blue tongue.

MR. HURLBURT: Was that the same type, Mr. Chairman?

MR. WHELAN: You know as well as I do, Mr. Hurlburt; there are several different types of blue tongue.

MR. HURLBURT: Yes, well that is what I am saying. You could be telling us that the type they had in Europe was altogether a different type than we had in the Okanagan.

MR. WHELAN: Which type do you want to know about?

MR. HURLBURT: I want to know if the type we had in the Okanagan is the type they had in Europe.

MR. WHELAN: I will let Dr. Reid or Dr. McGowan comment.

Dr. Reid said:

Mr. Chairman, we have not as yet recovered any virus from the animals we have slaughtered from the Okanagan Valley. The diagnosis has been based solely on the results of the Kaufmann fixation tests carried out on blood samples collected from the cattle. So we cannot answer your question yet; we have the virus but we have not been able to type it.

MR. HURLBURT: So what we are saying is that we jumped the gun and we announced an eradication program and went against the B.C. cattlemen's recommendations before we even knew what we had.

DR. REID: We do not know the type of virus we have. We know that we have exposure to blue tongue virus based on serological results from tests that have been carried out, and we are confident that they are accurate to the best of our ability.

As I pointed out at the beginning of my remarks, the minister stated, and I quote:

We can make all this available to you. It is not confidential; it is factual.

As of four o'clock this afternoon I had received absolutely no information from the minister's office. However, I found out on my own that 524 head of cattle have been destroyed in British Columbia, that $269,654 has been paid out for herds that have been destroyed, that 49 herds are infected in British Columbia, plus eight deer that are positive reactors.

After talking to my colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker), I am convinced the following questions are uppermost in the minds of all ranchers in southern British Columbia: what is going to happen to our herds this fall after roundup—isolation, quarantine or eradication? How can we plan if wild game are affected? Why are our armed forces in Europe eating American beef if the disease is so terrible? What enabled the United States to pioneer the Japanese market if the disease is that serious?

In my remarks this evening I have proved that the Minister of Agriculture implemented a program of eradication before he had proof of the most important point: what type of blue tongue do we have? If the type is altogether different and much more serious than the type now prevalent in the United States, the minister has gambled and won. However, if the minister has gambled and lost, we all know who the loser will be; not the Minister of Agriculture but the B.C. rancher.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to respond to the hon. gentlemen this evening and as I begin may I express the regret of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and of his parliamentary secretary for their inability to be present tonight to answer personally.

The hon. member, on May 17, asked how many cattle and sheep have had to be slaughtered under the blue tongue eradication program and how the program related to wild game. Before I answer those questions in detail I would first want to state for the record the minister's firm and well-founded view that Canada has the most disease-free animal population in the world, and we intend to maintain that enviable record.

As of May 17 the numbers were as follows: Cattle; herds tested, 65; positive herds, 49; negative herds, 16; cattle tested, 7,908; positive cattle, 875; negative cattle, 7,033. Sheep; flocks tested, 2; sheep tested, 140 (two sheep were being re-bled as the first samples were unsatisfactory for test); positive sheep, 0; negative sheep, 138. Wild game; deer tested, eight, positive deer, four, (two of which were on the Elkink Ranch); negative deer, four; bighorn sheep tested, four; positive bighorn sheep, zero; negative bighorn sheep, four; mountain goats tested, three; positive mountain goats, zero; negative mountain goats, three.

A permit to shoot 30 deer for testing purposes has been obtained from the provincial authorities. The bighorn sheep and mountain goats are being taken by capture gun and as many as possible will be tested.

At this point there is no indication that blue tongue is widespread in the game in the area and it should be noted that two of the deer which reacted positively were in close association with the heavily infected herd initially uncovered. Deer are not usually any threat to livestock as carriers of the disease. Researchers working in endemic areas have found that blue tongue usually kills deer; any that survive are considered to be immune, non-carriers.

The staff of the Health of Animals Branch is now involved in the process of tracing and testing cattle which have moved from the infected area to other parts of British Columbia. Cattle which moved into Alberta from the infected area have already been slaughtered in the normal course of events with feeder cattle. Movements from the area to Ontario are now being traced and submitted to test.

Officials are now arranging to collect at least 1,000 blood samples from Canadian cattle bordering on the United States in Alberta. This sampling procedure will be extended along the U.S. border into Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Ontario.

It is apparent that the officials of the Health of Animals Branch are making every effort to rid Canada of this foreign disease as soon as possible. With the full co-operation of everyone, hopefully the success of this program will be as great as that which has been evidenced by this country on previous occasions in the complete eradication of foreign animal diseases.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.33 p.m.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF EFFECT OF BILLING PRACTICES OF TRAVEL AGENT ON AIRLINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 relating to a current problem affecting our national air carriers; in view of the fact that on March 4, 1975, the group vice-president, sales and service, Air Canada, Mr. Maurice D'Amours, and his counterpart from CP Air, Mr. H. B. Renwick, by a joint memorandum to all appointed travel agents emphatically warned of abuses in agency commission practices, and since I raised this matter in parliament on November 26, 1975, at which time the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Goodale) indicated he would draw this matter to the minister's attention, and in view of the fact that I have since received additional complaints that large amounts of money are still being improperly claimed by travel agents, to the detriment of the financial well-being of our major airlines, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Minister of Transport take immediate steps to investigate the situation with respect to improper commission over-ride charges and other matters relating to billing practices of travel agents, and the effects of these practices on our air lines, and report to the House before the end of this session.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED PROVISION OF FUNDS TO MAINTAIN HIGH LEVEL OF MEDICAL RESEARCH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43 which deals with matters that are of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the government to take note of the appeal of the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada for a review of the decision to restrict the growth of Medical Research Council funds, it being the view of the society that it would be a crime against future generations of Canadians to interrupt research in Canada with respect to multiple sclerosis, heart disease, cancer and other ailments, and that this House urges the government to continue to provide the funds that are necessary for the maintenance of a high level of medical research in this country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented to the House only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF COMPENSATED DISCOUNT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact, according to a survey conducted by the Canadian Press, food prices have kept increasing during the past month to the extent that bread has gone up again by 4 cents to 43 cents, and apples by 6 cents, from 27 to 33 cents a pound, and since also those foodstuffs are essential to all Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House instruct the government to look immediately into the possibility of establishing a compensated discount for consumer prices which would apply to all essential foodstuffs so that those who now cost too much be made available to all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF AMOUNT CANADA PREPARED TO CONTRIBUTE TO COMMON FUND ESTABLISHED BY UNCTAD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) has assured the House that Canada would contribute to the common commodity fund discussed at the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development. UNCTAD IV is over; however, the participants are to meet again to negotiate a common fund to stabilize prices of commodities in which the developing world is especially interested. Since many other nations are pledging specific amounts that they are prepared to contribute to the fund, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That this House direct the government to state the amount in dollars that we are prepared to contribute to the common fund.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there consent?

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—ALLEGATION MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES UNAWARE OF CABINET DECISION ON FINANCING

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I hoped to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services. I see he is not yet in the House. I have heard of waiting for Godot, but not of waiting for Goyer. In the absence of the Minister of Supply and Services, may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister? I ask him how common an occurrence it is for a minister who heads a large and important department to remain ignorant for more than four weeks of an important cabinet decision affecting that department? I am speaking of the cabinet decision to finance the shortfall in the Lockheed project of last December.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Supply and Services will be in the House later. I think this question could more properly be directed to him when he arrives.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSSIBILITY IMPROVED EXPORT MARKETS WILL PRODUCE ENOUGH JOBS TO TAKE CARE OF INCREASED LABOUR FORCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Since the drop in export production as a proportion of our total production between 1973 and 1975 was only about 2 per cent, and since in his budget address of last Wednesday the minister based his job forecast figures on a recovery in the export market, I ask, does he think that even if the 2 per cent drop which took place between 1973 and 1975 is fully restored it will be sufficient to produce enough jobs in the Canadian economy next year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, although I do not have the actual text of the speech before me, my recollection is that we estimated that the export drop last year was at a rate of 7 per cent. Of course, that is in the budget text. The recovery on the export side will be a major factor in creating increased employment in Canada, which will in due course enable the economy to provide jobs for the substantial numbers of people, particularly young people, coming into the labour force.

Mr. Broadbent: Since it is forecast that 250,000 new jobs will be created next year, which is about 100,000 less than the anticipated increase in the numbers of people coming on the job market, is it the minister's view that, even if the international economy recovers as fully as he seems to anticipate, as an absolute minimum during the coming year Canadians can expect an increase of 100,000 in the numbers of the unemployed?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the estimate is that there would not be that additional number of people coming into the work force. The estimates indicate a rough balance, which is one reason why we did not anticipate during the current year, at least, being able to take the level of unemployment substantially below the levels we have been incurring in the last six to eight months.

AREA IN WHICH NEW JOBS MIGHT BE CREATED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a final supplementary question? I should like the minister to be specific on my last point when he replies. Is he saying that next year he anticipates only 250,000 more people coming into the labour force? Is that the anticipated increase in the labour force? In conclusion, has the minister estimated where the new jobs are to be created? If, in the main, they depend on improvements in our export business, does it mean that most of them will be created in central Canada? Or can the Atlantic provinces, which will be badly hit by the Unemployment Insurance Act changes, anticipate an increased share in the numbers of new jobs?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is useful nor particularly helpful to try to break down into small figures or divisions what is, after all, an estimate only. Basically, the feeling is that the number of new positions to be created will roughly equal the number of people coming into the work force. Naturally, areas of the country which have suffered a downturn in business because of the drop in exports, for example, areas producing base metals, forest products and manufactured products such as automobiles will, with the recovery of export markets, see a recovery of employment. This will, therefore, involve those commodities which we have customarily exported, but sales of which have dropped off in the last year or so.

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF SLOW ANSWERS TO APPLICATIONS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

At a time when most Canadian citizens feel that unemployment is growing a little too fast, projects are presented to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and there are complaints that it takes an extremely long time before these applications from citizens throughout Canada are answered. Could the minister indicate to the House why it takes so long before reaching a decision which could mean work for many unemployed people in Canada.

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say to the hon. member that the offers of monetary assistance to industries are issued every week by the department, and I believe the hon. member has been able to realize that there is a substantial number of projects processed each week by the department.

But in reply to the specific question of the hon. member, I would like to say that the department endeavours to reach a decision, make an offer or reject the application within a period of 90 days. That is our objective. Unfortunately this period starts to run from the time when the applicant has supplied us with all the information related to his or her project. Most applications, when received, do not include all the elements required to allow our analysts to assess it and reach a decision. They have to contact the applicant several times and that explains in most cases the long delays before a decision is made.

Of course, there are also exceptional, complex and difficult cases where we have to conduct a detailed analysis, check throughout the country for the types of businesses that exist in the same field, the degree of competition, and to what extent the market is already supplied by Canadian producers. For all these reasons, we do need a certain period of time.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. I thank the minister for the elaborate explanations he has just provided me about it being necessary to have 90 days to make a decision. But let us assume that an application for a summer job has been made, for example, last December or last October. If the minister tells me that his bureaucrats or his technocrats have to go to Vancouver to decide whether a project in Saint-Romuald is valid, then I ask the minister first why the department inspectors do not go to the place of residence of the applicant to know the exact nature of his project or of his construction and to see on the spot the number of unemployed they would be prepared to hire when the department would make a decision. Instead of sending civil servants to check in Vancouver, I think the minister can certainly tell us why they do not send immediately his department inspectors to see the applicant who asks for government support?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to add this. Fairly frequently, our civil servants go on the site but you will understand that it is difficult to do this in every case. I think that normally communications by telephone or simply by letter are sufficient to obtain the information the applicants must give to the department. But you will understand, Mr. Speaker, that despite all the diligence we can ask from our civil servants, it remains that some applications are difficult to process because of specific projects. I admit that there have been shortcomings in the past but unfortunately, there are sometimes human factors involved and we always endeavour to expedite the study and the decisions on all files.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE FORCE NOT INVOLVED IN BREAK-IN OF DON McNEIL'S APARTMENT

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. I have already given him notice. In light of today's newspaper reports that the apartment of press gallery reporter, Don McNeil, was recently broken into and ransacked in what Ottawa police investigators have described as a highly unusual manner with overtones of political harassment, can the minister give this House his absolute assurance that no member of the RCMP or his department's security service was involved in any way in this criminal act?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I checked with the RCMP before coming into the House. They know nothing about this. No complaint has been made to them by Mr. McNeil.

Mr. Reynolds: Can the Solicitor General also give this House his assurance that no member of the RCMP or his department's security service has been the recipient of any information that may have been gained as a result of this break-in?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, at this point we have received no information as a result of this break-in.

BILINGUALISM

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NIAGARA AREA NOT DESIGNATED BILINGUAL DISTRICT

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board and deals with the fears of the people in the Niagara Peninsula that their area will be designated a bilingual district. In view of the fact that the tranquility and harmony of the region is threatened by this proposal, would the minister assure the House that he will not attempt to have this area designated a bilingual district by Order in Council when the House is in recess this summer?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the recommendation made in the Fox report is now being reviewed by the cabinet and we will announce which districts will be bilingual when we are ready to do so. The policy has not been changed, but we want to find a fair solution based on the same criteria used in Quebec to protect both the English minority in Quebec as well as the French minority outside Quebec.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

STUDY INDICATING RUSTING OF VEHICLES SAFETY HAZARD—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. Last week, officials of his department said that after a five months study carried out both in England and in Canada, it was clear that even a small degree of rust in motor vehicles produced a serious driving hazard. The same officials said that neither the minister nor the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would take these findings seriously. So, I ask the minister why is it that neither he nor his colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will give credence to these findings and take action on behalf of Canadian consumers? Will the minister assure the House that the findings of the Motor Vehicle Safety Branch will be made public for the benefit of Canadian consumers and that immediate action will be taken?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The main reason for not taking those findings seriously was that those were not the findings. There were reports of a study by someone who was attached either to a department or to an agency but the view of the department is that while rusting is obviously a serious matter in terms of the economics of motor vehicles it is not a safety hazard. Our department has been carrying out tests on vehicles rusted to various stages and has found there is no significant additional safety problem. Naturally, if the rust has caused defects which are noticeable that is another issue, but in terms of the rust itself as a safety hazard, apart from the economics, it is not such a hazard as the hon. member implies.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question. I also mentioned the British findings which were made in conjunction with the Canadian findings according to which a serious safety hazard was evident. In view of those findings I ask the minister whether legislation will be introduced which would require vehicle manufacturers to rustproof parts before they are assembled. I would also ask the minister whether he would outline to the House the current status of his negotiations with the Ford Motor Company of Canada regarding the rusting problems which affect thousands of Canadian consumers today.

Mr. Lang: The studies on which the hon. member is relying, including those referring to other countries, amounted only to an examination of some literature on the subject setting out someone's theory of what might happen as a result of rusting. On the other hand we are performing actual tests and it is upon this evidence that we are relying.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEASURES TO REPLACE LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the previous questions I put to the minister concerning the extension of local initiatives projects and the minister's replies, namely that he would advise the House about other projects to replace the local initiatives program, could the minister tell us when we can expect a statement on this subject in order to assure promoters that they can pursue their projects on a permanent or seasonal basis as is the case at present?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the announcement will apply to the local initiatives program which will be in effect the fall of 1976-77; in other words, this coming winter. The program the hon. member is alluding to now has currently been operating and will cease to operate, I think, within a very short time. No extension of the 1976-76 program is planned, though new application for next year will be taken when I announce the criteria within a week or two.

AIR CANADA

ALLEGATION COMPANY IS ANTI-FRENCH—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Due to the surprising allegations that have been made to the effect that Air Canada is anti-French and that Mr. Pierre Nadeau, a CBC broadcaster, has dissociated himself from Air Canada advertising campaigns saying that the company is anti-French, and since this is a rather startling revelation, would the minister make a statement on the charges and inform the House if he is planning any investigation on his own?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish that the hon. member would not associate himself with the statement by calling it a "revelation" when it is at best an allegation. The president of Air Canada plans to make a statement clarifying the particular issue which was at the root of the controversy; I understand he will do so later this week.

POSSIBILITY OF REVIEW OF DECISION IN CASE OF COAL MINERS AND KAISER RESOURCES LIMITED

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Considering the importance of the export of coal in improving our growing trade deficit, and considering the spreading unemployment caused by strikes in the coal mining industry and related industries, is the minister's department considering a governmental review of the ruling by the Anti-Inflation Board which rolled back the settlement negotiated by Kaiser Resources Limited with the United Mine Workers?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, by way of a preliminary may I refer to the hon. gentleman's use of the term "growing trade deficit". In fact, in the month of April the deficit was reduced. With regard to the decision of the Anti-Inflation Board and the Kaiser Resources wage settlement, no decision has been taken to intervene.

POSSIBILITY OF APPOINTING MEDIATOR FOR STRIKES AGAINST BOARD DECISIONS

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Labour. As there are a series of strikes underway in the mining industry which are not strikes involving workers against companies but are strikes against Anti-Inflation Board rulings, has the Department of Labour considered appointing a mediator in these strikes which are literally without precedent?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in many cases these matters fall within provincial jurisdiction, as I am sure the hon. member is aware, so it does depend on the particulars of the case to which the hon. member is referring. Although we may encourage mediation through the provincial departments of labour, this is a decision for them to make. I understand that they are assessing the situation.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY IF MORE MEMBERS WILL BE APPOINTED TO KEENAN COMMISSION—DATE OF REPORT

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Considering that commissioner-enquirer John Keenan's mandate was considerably broadened to include all aspects of security in bilingual air communications and considering that initially he has been given 90 days to produce his report, can the Minister of Transport tell the House whether he is willing to consider appointing to the Keenan Commission of Enquiry other members whose impartiality and competence in the field of aeronautics would be acknowledged, and whether he intends to assign a time limit to the Commission for the production of their report?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, our basic approach to the commission was to appoint a commissioner and then to invite him to gather such expertise as may be required for him to assess the procedures. I should say that he will be working closely with various people in the department and in the air industry and with the simulator in the national capital region to determine the nature of the procedures which we are establishing. I should indicate as well that the report is expected not in terms of a specific time from now but within 90 days following the termination of those experiments and the determination by ourselves that we believe procedures are available for the safe introduction of bilingual IFR.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ALLEGATION ADVISORY COMMITTEE IN MIDDLESEX AREA EXPRESSED OPINIONS ABOUT NATIVES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago the Minister of Manpower and Immigration received complaints that some members of the constituency advisory committee for LIP grants in Middlesex-London-Lambton had expressed opinions about native people who had submitted applications, such as "they are shiftless and lazy", and "you can't trust them with money", etc. These are very serious charges, if true. Will the minister indicate whether he or his department have taken steps to find out the truth of these allegations?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I must admit to the hon. member that this is the first I have heard about it. There may be some correspondence which has not reached me yet. I will have a look into it to see what the details are.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, when the minister is looking into these charges, to which he did reply in the way of a form letter, and if he is given more information about the charges, will he also look into the question of whether in respect of making recommendations the prejudices of the people concerned have resulted in adverse decisions regarding the amount of money the native groups eventually received in response to their applications?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to make that part of my investigation into the matter.

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATES—REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM ON PROPOSED CHANGE IN RATES ON RAPESEED PRODUCTS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In light of reports that many rapeseed crushing plants may close down, including the plant at Altona, Manitoba, due to the raising of freight rates on rapeseed products to the minimum compensatory level, and noting that the terms of reference of the Snavely Commission presently underway give instructions in respect of looking into the cost of moving grain, including rapeseed, would the minister for the good of the rapeseed industry in western Canada be prepared to place a moratorium on the proposed policy he has enunciated until the Snavely Commission places its recommendations before the minister, which will be sometime later this year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the problem in respect of rapeseed crushing plants really emerged when very high competitive conditions began to exist in the oil industry and they were faced with an existing discrepancy between the low rate on rapeseed and a much higher rate on rapeseed oil. Our recent disposition of the appeal has not raised the rate as such, but has ordered the CTC not to allow rates to be charged higher than compensatory. This will, for instance, lead to a lower rate than the one faced by the Lloydminster plant. It may have a marginal effect on the rate on rapeseed to other plants. Really the problem relates to the long existing differential between the low rate on rapeseed and the higher rate on rapeseed oil. In fact, no change has taken place in the rates. The direction from us was simply not to allow a rate higher than compensatory, and so far no change in rates has been filed. I do not know how many months it will be before the actual filing and assessing of that rate will take place. It quite likely will be after the Snavely Commission has reported in any case.

SUGGESTED RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH POSTAL SUPERVISORS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that postal supervisors are being compensated at a lower rate than the employees they are supervising because of the recent increase in postal workers' salaries, will the President of the Treasury Board now issue a mandate to post office officials so they can continue negotiations to remove this obvious inequity?

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations are currently going on. I received representations from other members, including the highly dedicated member for St. Boniface, and I am looking into this problem. No later than this morning we mandated our negotiators, but this House must recognize that it itself did pass a legislation fixing the maximum rates applicable under the price and wage control legislation.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the supervisors' contract expired at the end of March and there will be a further aggravation of the inequity when the terms of the postal agreement go into effect on July 1, will the President of the Treasury Board move immediately to remove this inequity which requires a mandate from the Treasury Board that has not as yet been forthcoming?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I already said that no later than this morning I did authorize offers which were more generous than the previous ones, but these offers, however, must remain within the scope of the guidelines issued by the House of Commons last October.

GRAIN

EFFECT ON PRODUCERS OF NEW FEED GRAIN FREIGHT ASSISTANCE POLICY

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether, with the introduction of the new feed grain freight assistance, he has in fact brought out a new policy which will result in a lower return to western producers? I would also ask him how this policy of "producer pay" squares with his "user pay" policy?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the policy is not new since it was announced first as an intention of feed grain policy in both 1973 and 1974, specifically on May 22, 1974, in this House. It may have a marginal impact upon grain returns, although it applies obviously only to a small portion of the grain market and, therefore, it can only affect that portion. In particular, of course, it can benefit not only the full region of the country but to the whole country because it may lead to more sensible use of transportation than happens when one form of goods is subsidized and another form is not.

Mr. Korchinski: This feed grain has to be considered in relation to U.S. corn, the price of which in many instances is going to be lower than the asking price the Wheat Board has been quoting. Does that not in turn give a lower return to western producers, and how does that square with his user pay policy which he has indicated as far as transportation is concerned?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that is a different matter. The question of the Wheat Board's willingness to price on a corn competitive basis is really a choice to use the North American pricing system as a fallback position, because ordinarily grain will be obtained on the open market for the domestic market in Canada. Instead of using its export price it will be using a corn competitive price in Montreal. It would always have been willing to offer at an export price. Over time it is quite possible that the same return will result to farmers from the corn competitive price as from the export price. There will be sometimes an up side and sometimes a down side, but the Wheat Board is perfectly willing to go to this system in marketing grains.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, recently the Minister of Manpower and Immigration announced to this House he was going to put UIC and Canada Manpower back together, a policy we have encouraged for some years. Will the minister indicate whether he is physically going to merge the manpower centres and unemployment insurance offices at the local level and, if so, what effect will this have on the regional office at Belleville, or, if he is going to join them together physically at headquarters, does he intend to move the Canada Manpower headquarters to Belleville to join the regional unemployment insurance headquarters there?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the proposal is to phase this integration probably over as much as three years because we want to ensure that the delivery of service is not jeopardized, and that sort of thing. The local office amalgamations will probably be in the third phase after regional and headquarters arrangements are complete. I cannot be specific with regard to the Belleville operation, which is a pay centre and not one necessarily affected. We will have to await further details of the plan before I can give the answer.

TASK FORCE TO EXAMINE EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONSHIPS—STUDY OF COMPARABILITY WITH PRIVATE SECTOR COUNTERPARTS

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. Yesterday the President of the Privy Council stated with regard to Public Service collective bargaining the Finkelman Report and the recommendations of the joint committee of this parliament, that an interagency task force would be established to examine among other things, the principles to foster good employer-employee relationships within the public service. Will this task force be mandated to examine the principles and practices of fair comparability of compensation of public servants with their outside counterparts as an alternative to the adversary or conflict system which is fast outliving its usefulness?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the statement was made yesterday by the President of the Privy Council who is responsible for that act. Naturally, Treasury Board is involved in the matter and before we introduce new legislation in the House we will consider all aspects of the problem including that mentioned by the hon. member. However, I must say that even now the Senate and Commons committee has prepared an excellent report on this problem on which any new legislation we propose will certainly be based.

INDUSTRY

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF PRATT AND WHITNEY IN UNITED STATES TO ALLOW CANADIAN SUBSIDIARY CONTRACT WITH ROLLS-ROYCE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has to do with the Pratt and Whitney case and the potential loss of up to 1,000 jobs in this country. I should like to ask the minister whether or not he has had an opportunity yet since we questioned him last to talk to those companies and to his political equivalents in the United States? If so, can he tell the House what the future is of this contract between Pratt and Whitney and the Rolls-Royce Company?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I did indeed take up this matter with Commerce Secretary Richardson shortly after the matter first came to light in Canada. He undertook to have it examined in more detail in the United States. So far as I am aware the situation is unchanged from the last time I described it to the House, namely that no, in a sense, formal request has been made to the appropriate United States department for a ruling. I think it is fair to say in the best diplomatic terms that I made it perfectly clear to Secretary Richardson that we would look upon this as a most unsatisfactory situation if indeed extra-territoriality were to be applied to the United States law. I think as a result probably some solution will be found. I might add that I have not yet spoken with the company but propose to do so in a matter of a few days or I think at the outside a week.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is not in the House and perhaps the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce could answer this question. On May 4 the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs brought this matter to the attention of the Combines Investigation Branch and asked it to investigate whether or not there was a breach of the act. I wonder if the minister could tell us if that investigation is complete, if the Combines Investigation Branch has made its report, and if indeed there has been a breach of the act?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, regrettably I cannot give the hon. member the answer because I have not heard directly from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. So I am afraid he will have to await the minister's attendance in the House to get the answer from that side of it.

AIR TRANSPORT

ALLEGED IMPROPER BILLING OF AIRLINES BY TRAVEL AGENCIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister, who can hardly complain about lack of notice on this matter, looked into the serious matter of long-standing improper billing practices by Canadian travel agents, as set out in a joint letter by the responsible officers of Air Canada and CP Air over one year ago which I brought to the attention of his parliamentary secretary in his absence on November 26 last year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not have a report at hand on that but I will be glad to see what stage the work has reached.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. In view of the fact that only last week I had a very serious complaint from a major travel agent on this matter who also informed me that the RCMP had the matter brought to their attention recently, would the minister continue his not so intensive efforts and report to the House as soon as possible?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will see if there is anything to present to the House. I am basically satisfied with the way in which the matter is being looked at.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF SALE OF OLYMPIC LOTTERY TICKETS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that the Olympic lottery is coming to an end to be replaced by Loto-Canada under a Crown corporation could the minister advise this House whether or not an investigation by members of the RCMP and other police agencies is taking place with regard to improprieties and irregularities in the sale and distribution of Olympic lottery tickets, particularly in the case of one Marcel Lambert, not to be confused with the illustrious member for Edmonton West, who is alleged to be selling these tickets in Montreal and elsewhere without having gone through the appropriate distribution sources? If he is not aware of such improprieties is the minister prepared to look into the matter?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there is an investigation by the RCMP into possible fraud in respect of the distribution of Olympic lottery tickets. I understand the investigation is in Ontario. I do not have more details at this time.

OLYMPIC GAMES

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF RECORDS TO ASSURE ACTUARIAL SOUNDNESS OF LOTTERY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I should like to put my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that several weeks ago the Postmaster General assured this House that the Olympic lottery program had changed its procedures regarding its draws in accordance with the lottery advertising campaign and because of the fact that the second to last lottery had 980,000 unsold tickets left on its computers thus reducing considerably the chances of ticket holders and at the same time making the advertising program in this case misleading to the public, could the Acting Prime Minister assure this House that for the sake of fairness to the consumer the government will check into the records of Salmon, Blair and Associates in Montreal to determine once and for all the actuarial soundness of the Olympic lottery program?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the House is aware my colleague the President of the Treasury Board put before the House the other day the supplementary estimates A which have been referred to the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. I should think that is the place where the administration can be cross-examined and where questions on that case can be answered.

BRITISH COLUMBIA FERRIES—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL SUBSIDY

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As the minister is aware many residents of British Columbia view the Vancouver-Nanaimo and Vancouver-Victoria ferries as an integral part of the Trans-Canada highway and since the Government of Canada subsidizes ferries operating between the maritime provinces, can the minister advise this House if the province of British Columbia has requested federal funds and is the Minister favourable to financial relief for British Columbia and in particular Vancouver Island?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of a recent request from British Columbia in this connection but that may well be explained by the possibility that they know our answer which is that we are attempting to elaborate a broad policy toward ferry services in this country and will be undertaking discussions with the province about it. It is not the policy to support ferries serving between points within a province. As well as the existing questions there are other questions which apply to the discussion where we are attempting to resolve what should be the responsibility of the provinces and municipalities for ferries of this type.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the President of the Privy Council. Earlier in the question period he undertook that the Minister of Supply and Services would be in his place today to answer certain questions. We had contracted his office to ensure that he was still in town and he was. Has the minister sent out a search party to find the Minister of Supply and Services and, if not, would he do so because we are quite anxious to ask those questions.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the detective-like qualities of the opposition are such that they know that the minister is here. He will be in the House. He intends to make a statement on a question of privilege at three o'clock, according to my understanding.

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBILITY IMMIGRATION DETERMINED ON BASIS OF UNEMPLOYMENT RATES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In a press release issued from the office of the Prime Minister dated May 28, 1976, the Prime Minister announced the establishment of an employment and immigration commission. I would like to ask the minister whether all future immigration to Canada, with the exception of refugees, will now be determined on the basis of unemployment rates and job vacancy rates, and will immigrants be forced to settle in areas of high employment activity for a specified period of time?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the proposed amalgamation of the department and the Unemployment Insurance Commission will not have any policy or process effect on the matter the hon. member is raising. As the hon. member knows, we are looking at some of those options and suggestions which were made by the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate which referred to some of those points. We are reviewing that preparatory to introducing the new immigration bill in the fall session.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO CONTINUE PROJECTS WITHOUT FURTHER FUNDS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

As some LIP projects will not be completed by the prescribed date, and as there is still money left at the disposal of their promoters, will the minister be willing, in cases where for serious reasons, a project cannot be completed within the time limit prescribed, to make it possible for those promoters to continue the work so that projects may be completed generally without further funds?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think I could only reply by asking the hon. member to give me specific cases, suggestions or recommendations dealing with individual projects, and while I cannot guarantee an answer which will be yes, I will be prepared to consider this.

PUBLICATIONS

POSSIBILITY OF ACTION TO CONTROL DISTRIBUTION OF MAGAZINES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State. The minister has frequently expressed concern about foreign domination of the film distribution industry in Canada and has in fact encouraged provincial departments to initiate legislation in this area. I would like to ask the minister whether he has worked with the same intensity to bring magazine distribution under domestic control and in a way which would limit exploitation of sex and the almost unabated flow of pornography into this country.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I would approach that with the same degree of zest.

Mr. Friesen: I would like to ask the Secretary of State why it is that he is anxious to preserve a choice between Penthouse and Oui but not between Time and Maclean's.

Mr. Faulkner: Because I read the latter and not the former.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN BUDGET OF DEPARTMENT IN VIEW OF NEW PROGRAMS

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. On Friday last the minister mentioned some exciting new research, new programs and new proposals to the cabinet to solve the economic problems of the Atlantic provinces. Does the minister expect to have his budget increased or supplemented to achieve these things?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am not looking for an increase in my budget this year.

COMMUNICATIONS

POSSIBILITY OF REVISING DECISION TO GRANT TELESAT CONTRACTS TO RCA LIMITED

Mr. Frank W. Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Communications.

The next contracts to be entered into between Telesat Canada and RCA Limited will make RCA Canada the major supplier for Anik IV, the first satellite of the Anik B series. Since RCA in New York has decided to rationalize its operations in North America by closing its research facilities in Canada—which reduces Canada to the rank of 51st state—would the minister seriously reconsider the decision to award the Telesat contracts to RCA?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I do not see what good it would do to the Canadian people if I decided to review the contracts. Under the regulations governing Telesat, it is mandatory that the contracts awarded by Telesat to any company be reviewed by the Minister of Communications to make sure that those contracts have a Canadian content. Telesat has therefore ordered a number of parts from RCA to build its satellite, and if I were to review those contracts, I do not see how I might increase the Canadian content of the satellite. The contracts awarded by Telesat are carried out in Canada by Canadians and will create jobs for Canadians here in Canada.

SOCIAL SECURITY

ALLEGED CONSIDERATION OF ELIMINATION OF COST-OF-LIVING INCREASES FROM FAMILY ALLOWANCE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, may I address a question to the minister answering for him today or perhaps to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of a report in today's Ottawa Journal that the federal government is considering the elimination—not just for 1976 but on a permanent basis—of any further cost-of-living increases in family allowances, may I ask if the government is giving consideration to such an incredible course of action?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to inform hon. members that there is no such proposal being put forward by the federal government at the federal-provincial welfare ministers conference, which the minister is chairing this afternoon.

An hon. Member: Prove it.

Mr. Kaplan: Further, no such proposal has been made to Cabinet—

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Kaplan: —and further, the minister has no intention of making any such proposal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR ANALYSIS OF PROCESSING COSTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fisheries). In the knowledge of the fact that the capital investment of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation is the money of fishermen and not tax money, would the minister now consent to have an analysis of the processing costs and to have an open and frank discussion with the fishermen whose money the corporation is using?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I certainly take issue with that suggestion. There has been a considerable amount of money coming from the people of Canada to the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. With that I do not quibble. I think it is a good idea. The return to fishermen has improved ever since. Obviously, if by hindsight we knew that the lakes could produce only a certain level of catch, we might not have built a plant which would be as expensive as we now have, but we must proceed with the plant we have, and that plant is subject to direction from a board which is representative of the provinces and of the fishermen. The hon. member must make up his mind; either he wants the corporation to try to help the fishermen or not, and on that issue I would like to hear his views.

Mr. Whiteway: In view of the fact that I will be on the late show tonight, the minister will have an opportunity to hear my views.

GRAIN

EFFECT OF NEW FEED GRAIN ASSISTANCE POLICY ON CERTAIN AREAS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, and it is with regard to the announced intention yesterday to phase out in certain parts of our country the domestic feed grain assistance program. My concern is about the province of British Columbia, and I would like to ask the minister whether consideration has been given to specific regions of that province, particularly the central regions where cattlemen have found this program to be essential to the survival of their industry.

Further, since the goal of the policy is to encourage local grain production, how is the production in the Peace River country, the major area in British Columbia producing feed grain, which is 800 miles north of Vancouver, going to be helped?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the programs for encouraging grain production will be essentially aimed at those areas where there is a deficiency of grain and a grain potential greater than is now being realized. The province of British Columbia has had a smaller deduction in feed freight assistance than generally elsewhere, recognizing the slightly higher freight cost in view of the difference in cost of moving grain west rather than east in the domestic market, which is something of a long standing anomaly. In fact, most regions of British Columbia may well be better off in terms of being purchasers of grain under the new program because whenever the Wheat Board is selling on a corn competitive basis, the western elevator price will be lower to the extent that feed freight assistance has been removed, and that may end up benefiting British Columbia.

PARLIAMENT HILL

INCLUSION OF EAST BLOCK WITHIN JURISDICTION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: Before we continue our proceedings, I have an announcement which I feel may be of some interest to hon. members, having to do with a decision to bring the East Block under the jurisdiction of parliament.

I think it is safe to say that a great majority of members on all sides of this House and in the Senate have found it anomalous that this building, which is so evidently an integral part of Parliament Hill, remains outside our jurisdiction, while we continue to occupy buildings outside this area as necessary accommodation for members and support staff.

It was, therefore, not surprising that this opinion came through quite clearly during the deliberations of the Abbott Commission on Parliamentary Accommodation which is headed by the very distinguished former minister of this House—in which capacity he incidentally occupied an office in the East Block—and consists of Speakers of both Houses of Parliament, as well as many members, senators and former parliamentarians of all parties of this House. It also came to light during discussions in the Abbott commission that a number of conditions were coming together in this year which might maximize the opportunity to bring this building within parliamentary jurisdiction. After consultation with the Speaker of the Senate and with House leaders and other members, I raised the question with the Prime Minister in a letter dated March 18, 1976, a copy of which I am tabling for the information of hon. members.

The Prime Minister acknowledged my letter on March 26 on an interim basis, and followed that with a letter to me dated May 15, indicating that the request had been favourably received, subject to certain reservations, the most significant of which are as follows:

(1) the future occupancy of the East Block should be predominantly by parliamentarians and necessary support staff, rather than by support services;

(2) the historic quality of the East Block should be preserved in accordance with the existing plan developed by the Department of Public Works;

(3) more particularly, the rooms in the East Block that have been identified as having historic significance should be restored and open to the public;

(4) amongst these rooms, the East Block cabinet chamber, the ante-chamber, the Clerk's office and adjoining office, should not only be preserved for their historic interest but should be available as required for occasional use by cabinet committees and particularly for ceremonial occasions;

(5) improved cabinet and cabinet committee facilities should be provided for in the Centre Block.

I should also tell hon. members that, as members of the Senate are obviously involved, the Speaker of the Senate will be advising members of that House of these developments, through a similar announcement at this next sitting.

I trust that all hon. members will welcome this event which will bring this very historic building into the parliamentary ambit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order dealing with a question I put yesterday in the House to the Minister of State for Fisheries with regard to the government's intention to declare a 200-mile limit and the effect of such declaration on ICNAF quotas. In reply the minister stated that I should read these agreements, and he stated that they make it clear that the allowable catch would be fixed by Canada and not by an international organization. Without burdening the House with all the agreement, Mr.

Speaker, I have in my hand the agreement between the government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on their mutual fisheries relations. The third paragraph begins:

Recognizing that the government of Canada proposes to extend its jurisdiction over the living resources of its adjacent waters pursuant to and in accordance with relevant principles of international law—

On the second page, article II, paragraph 1, begins:

The government of Canada undertakes, upon the extension of the area under Canadian fisheries jurisdiction, to permit U.S.S.R. vessels to fish within this area—

I raise this matter because of the tremendous economic importance it has for Atlantic Canada. I think it is incumbent upon the minister and upon the government to indicate whether the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics recognizes Canada's right unilaterally to declare a 200-mile limit under this particular agreement. If they do, then Canada can declare a 200-mile limit and the terms of this agreement would be applicable.

If the interpretation that I have placed upon this agreement is correct, I think it is mandatory that the minister should also give an indication of whether it is the government's intention to declare a 200-mile limit before all the resources on our continental shelf are raped, pillaged and plundered to the point where they are no longer available to anyone.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This may be a matter of great interest to Atlantic Canada and Canadians everywhere, but I have the greatest difficulty fitting it into the pattern of a point of order in any respect. The minister may want to contribute, but it is, in a sense, more a legal point rather than a point of order.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I would have to look at the hon. member's question in Hansard, and I have not had time to do that yet. We have made it clear that these agreements will cover the relationship that will exist between Canada and those nations with whom we have concluded bilateral agreements when, and if, Canadian extension of jurisdiction takes place without specifying the way in which this extension may take place. These bilateral agreements will come into effect with extension of jurisdiction. As to whether Canada will extend jurisdiction, that is a matter which is before cabinet with the decision on policy to be announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct a statement that I made in the House yesterday in response to a question from the hon. member for Victoria. This question was in relation to whether a representative from my department on the LRPA project team was aware before December 2, 1975, that Lockheed had given verbal assurance that it could provide financing to meet the Department of National Defence's cash shortfall in the first three years of the project. But first I should like to reiterate two points which I have repeatedly stressed both in this House and outside parliament. First, the financing of any contract entered into by the Department of Supply and Services is the prime and exclusive responsibility of the customer department, in this case the Department of National Defence.

An hon. Member: Pass the buck.

Mr. Goyer: Second, on December 2, 1975, when a telex was sent to Lockheed confirming the government's intention to purchase 18 "Orion" aircraft, neither myself nor my deputy minister was made aware, directly or indirectly, of a telephone conversation held between an official of the Department of National Defence and a representative of Lockheed to the effect that Lockheed would furnish the financing for the LRPA project. In any case, I repeat that not obtaining a written agreement from Lockheed was a serious error. It is elementary that an agreement involving a loan of millions of dollars should have been confirmed in a written document. This was not done. Furthermore, the offer never did materialize. In this respect, I refer to the statements of my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, which appear in Hansard dated March 30, 1976, on page 12265 and March 26, 1976, page 12177.

Personally, I might add that it was also a very serious mistake that the minister responsible for negotiating the agreement with Lockheed was not informed of the basic funding difficulties before December 2, 1975, and that the proposed solution rested upon a verbal agreement. The statement I made yesterday was that neither myself nor my deputy, nor my representative in the LRPA project office was aware of the possibility of Lockheed furnishing the financing for the LRPA project. The factual statement is that neither myself nor my deputy nor, as I stated in the House on May 25, 1976, on page 13794 of Hansard, the representative of my department on the management committee was aware of the possibility of that financial arrangement. For the information of the House, the representative on the LRPA management committee was my former assistant deputy minister, the late Eric Booth. The portion of the statement that I wish to clarify concerns Mr. L. H. Stopforth who, as my representative on the LRPA project group, I now find was aware of financing discussions held between DND and Lockheed in mid-November 1975.

During the past months I have repeatedly attempted to ascertain whether or not any officials of my department were aware of the financing negotiations held between DND and Lockheed prior to December 2, 1975. I repeatedly was assured that no one had prior knowledge of this problem, and I conveyed this information to the House. On May 19, in view of the numerous questions raised by members in the House, I personally met, in the presence of my deputy minister, Mr. L. H. Stopforth, who assured me that he had no prior information concerning the financial negotiations between DND and Lockheed. Ministers, acting on the representations and advice of their civil servants, must rely on the information they receive on these matters on the basis of trust. Last evening, however—and it was confirmed to me this morning—I learned that Mr. L. H. Stopforth had modified his version to state that, while he had not been privy to conversations between DND and Lockheed, he was aware of the financing discussions with Lockheed in November, 1975.

I take my ministerial responsibilities very seriously with regard to the policies and administrative practices of my department. Accordingly, I will stand by my officials and I accept responsibility for errors of judgment, mistakes made in good faith and inadvertent errors. But I do not believe that ministerial responsibility extends to cases of misinformation or gross negligence. In this case, a serious error was committed. Not only were I and my deputy minister not informed of financial negotiations between DND and Lockheed prior to December 2, but subsequently, when I personally checked on this situation, I remained misinformed. This is unacceptable. My view is that while ministerial responsibility is of prime importance, every public servant, regardless of his interest in politics, also holds the public trust to some extent. Every public servant is in a position of responsibility, and the responsibility here was to ensure that the minister, the House and the public were correctly informed.

I feel very strongly about officials who misinform their minister. While I am not against any man or any organization, I believe that preserving the integrity and the efficiency of our system of government comes first. The public must believe that the system serves it well. The public must respect the public service. The public has a right to be accurately informed. My ministerial responsibility in this case is to see that these rights are preserved. Consequently, Mr. L. H. Stopforth has been removed from his functions as deputy head of the project office.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I find it incredible that the minister, having pilloried General Allen for weeks about this matter, has now turned on Mr. Stopforth and criticized him for the same offence.

Mr. Paproski: If anybody should resign, it should be you, Goyer.

Mr. McKinnon: At least the truth is now beginning to come out. I do not want the minister to think for a minute that this is the end of the Lockheed, LRPA case. Far too many questions remain unanswered. The minister carefully neglected to say anything of his knowledge, or lack of knowledge, of the shortfall in the National Defence budget, which is implicit in the details and record of this sorry case. I wish to express my regret and that of most members of this House for the disservice which has been done to an officer and a gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: General Allen, throughout this entire case, told nothing but the truth. It was hard going to be the only one giving evidence before the defence committee or, when, everyone else gave conflicting evidence, to see nothing happen to them. That was difficult for him to understand. As one goes over these events, one is puzzled to understand why the two ministers of the Crown were the last to be able to learn from the record, whereas the opposition had only the shards of evidence, the little word here and the small answer there dragged out of the government on which to form the conclusion which the minister eventually reached last night, that he did not know what was going on. I do not wish to go on an length. I suppose we can at least be thankful for General Allen's reputation having been cleared in this. Please do not think this is the end of it.

Mr. Paproski: The minister shakes his head, as if to say no.

Mr. McKinnon: I notice that the Minister of Supply and Services shook his head when I suggested General Allen's reputation has been cleared. I hope we shall be able to straighten that out, too.

Mr. Paproski: Say it. Say his reputation is cleared.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Chicken!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, let me say, in commenting on the minister's question of privilege which strikes me as being more in the form of a statement on motions—but that is a quibble—that we of the New Democratic Party agree with part of the course of action the minister outlined, which was based on the set of facts he described. If a man in a position of responsibility, a position like that of Mr. Stopforth, does not carry out his responsibilities in the way the minister described, the least the minister should do is remove that man from his position. We are in agreement with the minister on that.

I wish to make two further points. First, we do not agree with the minister's description of his ministerial responsibilities up to this point with regard to his negotiations with Lockheed. We cannot understand how he could say, as he did in the House recently—and I am giving the gist of his remarks, not repeating his exact words—that his only responsibility is to pass some kind of final judgment on a financial arrangement which had been principally worked out by another department. He also said, if I remember correctly—and we shall check Hansard with care, as is appropriate in these circumstances—that his department could not be responsible for going into all the details of such contracts with all departments.

If that is his view, a number of questions arise. One may ask, what was his representative doing on the multidepartmental committee which for months, indeed years, was investigating the Lockheed project, if in fact he was not looking into the financial details of the kind of contract which would be entered into. On the face of it, it seems clear to me that on a national, major project his representative on the committee should have been doing just that. Indeed, that is what the committee was all about. I repeat, we approach the question of the minister's description of his own departmental responsibilities with considerable skepticism. We shall say more about this later.

Second, to allude to what the minister said in the House, without question one minister and his officials were clearly at fault. We cannot shift the ultimate blame to the officials in this case. The blame must reside with the minister, in this case the Minister of National Defence. There can be no question of that, and the Minister of Supply and Services reiterated the point this afternoon, that the one man who had immense responsibility, given the amount of money that was involved in not only negotiating but getting in writing the details of the financial commitments on the Lockheed projects, was the Minister of National Defence. There can be no question about that. The minister directly asserted his belief on that point again today.

I repeat, on behalf of my colleagues, that the Minister of National Defence—and we will see later about the Minister of Supply and Services—must now, in the words of a fellow member of the cabinet, acknowledge the colossal blundering on this project. He should at long last assume his responsibility to the taxpayers of Canada and resign his position.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has raised a question of privilege and has taken certain steps which are quite important to the House. I have concern, also, because this day has been set aside for a motion in the name of the opposition, specifically, the Social Credit party. While there is much interest in the topic, it is obviously one on which further information and development will unfold.

It has already been indicated that there will be further questions of this minister as well as the Minister of National Defence on this matter. The discretion of the Chair must be exercised in such a way as to ensure a proper and full debate on the subject set down for discussion in the name of the Social Credit party. My preference at the moment would be to discontinue. However, because there ought to be a spokesman from the Social Credit party on this subject, it will be their option to discontinue the subject completely and get on to orders of the day and permit them to proceed.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I will make some very brief comments on the same point, considering your earlier remarks.

I listened with great interest to what the New Democratic Party leader (Mr. Broadbent) said, which pretty well sums up our own concerns about the announcement just made by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer). He indirectly held the Minister of National Defence responsible for this whole affair. What remains less clear, Mr. Speaker, is the minister's own definition of ministerial responsibility. As far as I know, any minister is responsible for his department and for the conduct or actions of that department.

Yesterday the minister was telling us that these were the answers he could provide the House, and he was asking us to believe what he was saying. Today, because an incident took place, the minister is asking us again to have implicit faith in him, which I am willing to do, and then he goes on to announce the transfer of a senior official.

Mr. Speaker, he is a victim of the system and the transfer will not basically alter the system. Senior officials are still the ones who actually run the departments. Ministers are only so-called spokesmen in the House. Ministers do not run their departments, they are controlled by their source of information, their senior officials and deputy ministers who have more power than the ministers. They even have a regulatory power which often goes beyond the instructions given by the legislators.

Our party is quite interested in this matter. Today's motion deals precisely with this subject. When we state, among other things, that "this attitude distorts the purpose the legislators have in mind and deprives this House of its real customary powers", this is what we mean.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Speaker, I will take this opportunity to tell the Minister of Supply and Services who is proving to us today, or at least trying to do so, that he is responsible for his department and that whenever he is informed of unusual events, he takes appropriate action. Good for him! However, Mr. Speaker, while he is in such a mood, let him try to convince his colleagues to put a stop to this practice of hiring defeated Liberal candidates to entrust them with official or special assistant positions on account of their political affiliation and not because they are competent.

Mr. Speaker, if the minister and his colleagues are consistent, if they really want to prove that they actually manage and control something in their departments, let them hire people according to their competence and not because of political ties, or else they will continue to be the joke of the system.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

COURT COSTS IN RESPECT OF MINISTER OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS CONTEMPT OF COURT CHARGES

Question No. 3,965—Mr. MacKay:

Were any of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs' legal or other costs in respect of the contempt of court charges preferred against him borne by the government and, if so (a) what were the costs (b) the amounts involved (c) under what authority were they assumed or paid?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): No.

DIRECTOR GENERAL OF COMMUNICATIONS

Question No. 4,986—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. Who is the current Director General of Communications in the Canadian International Development Agency?

2. On what date was he appointed and with what (a) classification (b) salary range?

3. Was such appointment made following (a) an internal (b) a public competition and, if so, for what reason?

4. (a) What was the successful candidate's previous employment record prior to such appointment (b) what was his experience and other factors on which he was judged qualified for the position?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Mr. Paul-Émile Doucet.

2. Mr. Doucet was assigned on January 19, 1976, through the Interchange Canada Program. (a) SX-1; (b) $27,500-$36,500.

3. (a) No; (b) There was no public competition because the assignment was made through the Interchange Canada Program coordinated by the Public Service Commission. This program provides opportunities for senior persons to broaden their experience in different milieux. In this case it arranged for a communications expert to work within a government Agency.

4. (a) From 1963 to 1967, Mr. Doucet was Assistant Director of Maintenant, a monthly magazine published in Montreal. Since 1965, he has been a frequent contributor to public affairs programs of CBC (radio and television), in various capacities, i.e. as researcher, host and supervisor. In 1971 and 1972, he was responsible for the creation of a Division of Communications in the Department of Social Affairs of Quebec. He was later a journalist on the public affairs radio program Présent of Radio-Canada, and has been following closely events related to international development, including the seminar organized by ECOSOC on Multinationals, the 7th Special Session of the United Nations on the New International Economic Order (September 1975), and the Paris Conference on International Economic Cooperation; (b) Mr. Doucet holds a Master's degree in Philosophy. He pursued further studies in Sociology of Organization and Communication at l'École pratique des Hautes études in Paris and McGill University in Montreal. Mr. Doucet has a strong background in the field of communication and based on this along with interview results, he was declared qualified to perform the functions of the Director-General position.

AIR CANADA PENSIONS

Question No. 5,030—Mr. Whittaker:

1. Are Messrs. Pratte and Menard, recently resigned from Air Canada, in receipt of a full pension?

2. Are they receiving first class travel privileges?

3. What other fringe benefits do they receive?

4. Are any of the privileges, they presently receive, for life?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1, 2, 3, 4. Air Canada does not disclose information respecting pensions and other compensations received by executives.

CANADA COUNCIL GRANTS

Question No. 5,143—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 4,023, which stated in part that the Canada Council bases its decisions on awarding grants on the recommendations of "assessors chosen for their expertise in the particular subject or research area" (a) by what methods are the assessors selected or chosen (b) what are the names and job designations of those on the Canada Council who chose the assessors (c) what remuneration, if any, is received by an assessor and for how long does such an individual hold a post (d) what are the reasons that the names of such assessors are regarded as confidential and not available to Parliament?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: (a) Operating as it does under a "peer review" system for the assessment of applications, the Canada Council has built up over the years a large pool of international specialists in the humanities and social sciences. The lists are kept up to date through consultation with scholars and experts in each field and through perusal of learned journals and other academic publications. About 6,000 assessors are consulted each year, including those named as referees by applicants; (b) Approximately twenty officers holding a master's or a doctoral degree in the humanities or social sciences are involved in the selection of assessors and they inform applicants of the comments of assessors. The Council's Advisory Academic Panel, in reviewing all major applications, considers the appropriateness of the chosen experts. The members of the Panel are listed in the Council's annual report; (c) An assessor receives an honorarium of $25 for each project he assesses, although on rare occasions when the proposal is extremely complex, he may be offered $50 or $100. Assessors are not employed on a retainer basis—they are consulted as the need arises; (d) When assessors are asked to evaluate a project, they are guaranteed anonymity. It is felt that otherwise scholars might be reluctant to express judgments on the work of their peers.

Question No. 5,219—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Are Messrs. Pratte and Menard receiving a pension from Air Canada and, if so, how much per year?

2. Do they have any free travelling privileges with Air Canada?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1 and 2. Air Canada does not disclose information respecting pensions and other compensations received by executives.

AIR CANADA PASSES

Question No. 5,265—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Have any members of the families of Cabinet Ministers or the Prime Minister held Air Canada passes during 1975 or hold such passes for 1976 and, if so, in each case, what are their names?

2. Are such passes valid on all domestic and foreign routes travelled by Air Canada?

3. What are the reasons for this free government transportation for persons who are not employed directly with the government?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. See Following list. Also see reply to question No. 2,315 answered on June 19, 1975 and supplementary reply answered on July 18, 1975.

2. Term or "annual" passes are valid for all Air Canada routes. Individual trip passes are valid for use only once on the specific route designated on the pass.

3. These passes are issued so that the spouses of Cabinet Ministers may travel with them on certain specific occasions. 1975: Individual Trip Pass Issues—Family Members of Cabinet Ministers. Mrs. W. Allmand, Mrs. R. Andras, Mrs. R. Basford, Mrs. J. Buchanan, Mrs. J. Chrétien, Mrs. G. Danson, Mrs. H. Faulkner, Mrs. J. Jerome, Mrs. D. Jamieson, Mrs. J. P. Goyer, Mrs. M. Lalonde, Mrs. O. Lang, Mrs. D. Macdonald, Mrs. B. Mackasey, Mrs. J. Marchand, Mrs. A. Ouellet, Mrs. R. Perrault, Mrs. J. Turner, Hon. M. Sauvé, Mrs. E. Whelan. 1976: Individual Trip Pass Issues—

Order Paper Questions

Family Members of Cabinet Ministers (to April 28, 1976). Mrs. W. Allmand, Mrs. R. Andras, Mrs. R. Basford, Mrs. J. Buchanan, Mrs. J. Chrétien, Mrs. G. Danson, Mrs. H. Faulkner, Mrs. J. Jerome, Mrs. D. Jamieson, Mrs. M. Lalonde, Mrs. O. Lang, Mrs. J. Marchand, Mrs. A. Ouellet, Mrs. R. Perrault, Hon. M. Sauvé, Mrs. E. Whelan.

MR. ERIC MILLER

Question No. 5,290—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Mr. Eric Miller, former Deputy Head of Information Canada, appointed to study general communications problems of the government for the Treasury Board and, if so (a) is he receiving the same salary as he did with Information Canada (b) what is his salary (c) what is a detailed description of his duties (d) what are all the considerations that led to his appointment (e) what qualifications does he have for the job?

2. Was such appointment used to keep him on the government payroll following abolition of Information Canada?

3. What duties will he perform that could not be performed by another recent appointee to the Treasury Board, Mr. Claude Lemelin?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Eric Miller was appointed to the Temporary Assignment Pool which is housed in the Treasury Board Secretariat. (a) Yes; (b) Mr. Miller is a Senior Executive (SX-3) in the salary range of $35,500 to $47,500; (c) The Temporary Assignment Pool is a pool of executives and other officers of demonstrated high levels of performance, who can be assigned individually or in teams to departments for specific periods to carry out policy reviews and similar activities. As his first assignment, Mr. Miller will conduct an assessment of the experience and lessons of Information Canada. This study will focus on the functional responsibilities undertaken by Information Canada, its successes, failures and the difficulties encountered. After the completion of this study, Mr. Miller, like other Temporary Assignment Pool members will be assigned to another area according to the policy issues and priorities at that time; (d) Mr. Miller, a senior civil servant with extensive private sector experience, was appointed to the Temporary Assignment Pool following established PSC procedures; (e) Mr. Miller's qualifications met those required by the Temporary Assignment Pool's recruitment review procedures (Circular T.B. 727241) and as outlined in (d) the normal PSC procedures were followed in his recruitment.

2. The government has attempted to find positions within the public service for as many civil servants as possible who were attached to Information Canada. As outlined above, Mr. Miller, the most senior ranking civil servant at Information Canada, was judged to be a suitable candidate for a position in the Temporary Assignment Pool and was therefore offered a position after the termination of Information Canada.

3. Mr. Claude Lemelin is also a member fo the Temporary Assignment Pool with experience in the communications field. He has been assigned to a different task, namely the assessment of the Treasury Board Secretariat's own communication with the general public, the media and employees of the Public Service.

PUBLIC WORKS—RENT—FONTAINE BUILDING, HULL, QUEBEC

Question No. 5,325—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

What is the monthly rent paid by the Toronto-Dominion Bank to the government for the office space occupied in the Fontaine Building, Hull, Quebec?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): The Department of Public Works receives no rent from the Toronto-Dominion Bank for space in the Fontaine Building, in Hull, Quebec. The bank rents its space directly from the owner of the building without the involvement of the Department.

CANADA MANPOWER MOBILITY PROGRAM

Question No. 5,406—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

1. From 1967 to date, how many moving allowances were granted to workers in each province by the Department of Manpower and Immigration?

2. For each year, by province, what were the amounts granted to workers?

3. How many workers, by province (a) applied for (b) received the $1,500 allowance to purchase a house?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Relocation Grants—Number by Province (see Statement A).

2. Relocation Grants—Amounts by Province (see Statement B).

3. (a) No statistics available for the number of persons who applied for a Home Purchase Allowance; (b) Home Purchase Allowance—Number by Province (see Statement C).

*Prior to April 1, 1973, workers who received Relocation Grants could receive $1,000 if they sold their house in the old locality and $500 if they purchased a house in the new locality. The worker, therefore, would not necessarily receive the maximum of $1,500. For this reason, statistics relative to the number of workers who received the Home Purchase Allowance during this period are not available.

PEI—PRODUCTION OF SUGAR BEETS

Question No. 5,430—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. How many acres are devoted to the production of sugar beets on Prince Edward Island?

2. Where in PEI are the production centres?

3. What assistance has been given by the Department of Agriculture to the growth of sugar beets?

4. How many PEI farmers are at present involved in the production of sugar beets?

5. Is it the aim of the Department to increase sugar beet acreage and, if so, to what extent?

6. What assistance has the provincial department extended to this project?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Planting intentions for 1976 are estimated to range from 600-900 acres.

2. Farm locations are not concentrated in any particular region.

3 and 5. The Department of Agriculture, under the Agricultural Stabilization Act has provided assistance to sugar beet production in areas of Canada where such production is refined in Canada for subsequent consumption in Canada. There has been no decision to change such practice. It is understood that Prince Edward Island producers have contracts with a U.S.A. refinery for returns attractive to such producers.

4. An estimate of 20-30 growers.

6. Unaware of assistance, if any, provided by P.E.I. provincial department.

QUEBEC EGG PRODUCERS

Question No. 5,452—Mr. Beatty:

1. Have Quebec egg producers paid the $190,000 penalty assessed against them for production of eggs and, if not, has the government received any firm assurances as to when the penalty will be paid?

2. Have Quebec egg producers posted a performance bond promised to the National Farm Products Marketing Council and, if not, have any firm assurances as to when the performance bond will be posted been received?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. The National Farm Products Marketing Council has received assurances about payment of the $109,000 penalty assessed against Quebec producers earlier this year but to date the penalty has not been paid.

2. A performance bond was posted in 1975 by Quebec egg producers and by mutual agreement used to settle certain debts owing CEMA. The National Farm Products Marketing Council has received assurances about replacement of the bond but to date it has not been replaced.

"THE KNOW CANADA GAME"

Question No. 5,537—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. (a) What was the cost of (i) developing (ii) producing "The Know Canada Game" distributed by the Official Languages Commissioner (b) who (i) developed (ii) produced it?

2. How many were produced?

3. Was the developer and/or producer selected by tender and, if so (a) in each case, how many bids were received (b) what was the range of such bids?

4. (a) How was the "Game" distributed (b) how many have been distributed (c) what was the cost of distribution (d) what price is being charged?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): The Commissioner of Official Languages reports directly to parliament and not through a minister. Questions can be made directly to him.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—GOVERNMENT LEGISLATION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford) moved:

That this House finds highly deplorable the attitude the government has demonstrated by taking advantage of its majority to draft many of its bills in such a way that different matters are dealt with in a single text, as well as its obvious tendency to extend the scope of regulations under which pieces of legislation are to be implemented, an attitude which distorts the purpose legislators have in mind and deprives this House of its real customary powers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, like some officials that we know quite well, perhaps we have drafted a motion which is a little too lengthy. It could have been summarized as follows—on purpose: that the House finds highly deplorable the attitude of the government which is depriving this House of its real customary powers. We could have summarized this motion with this one sentence.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that if we go back over the history of Canadian Parliament and if we look at what we are doing today, we must unfortunately recognize that at the present time, what the hon. minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) stated in this House and the development of the long term policy of former governments and the present administration aims simply at placing the administration of the federal government in the hands of people who were not elected for this purpose.

The statement made today by the minister proves without the shadow of a doubt, like the hon. member for Lotbinière just said, that he does not know and never knew what is going on in his department, as the other ministers have demonstrated many times before. I think that it is too easy to blame a public servant for a mistake which was made by the government. Yet, two ministers and two departments are involved in the Lockheed affair, and today, the minister of Supply and Services thinks that he will get out of it simply by transferring, by removing—perhaps with a future promotion; in any case, we shall see later—by transferring a senior public servant who is now accused of having been the cause of this serious mistake by the government, without making a further investigation to find out who are the true culprits, when the government seemed well aware of what was going on in the two departments concerned and when the minister tells this House that because of erroneous information on the part of the department, the government, which means the Canadian taxpayer, will now have to pay this mistake between $16 million and $30 million.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to summarize my thinking before getting into a more detailed explanation by quoting part of an editorial published in the Vancouver Sun of January 18, 1975. This article is entitled:

How powerful mandarins confiscated from members of parliament—

—and we could add "from the ministers"—

—the right to legislate

The truth, not easily admitted by the members in the opposition as well as those in the government, is that more often than not the senior officials are those who are running, sometimes interpreting the legislation according to their views and at times in having passed the legislation they see fit.

The Committee on Statutory Instruments has been set up following a 1969 committee report, whose conclusion surprised no one in the capital, that a large part of our laws do not emanate from legislators but from bureaucrats.

Parliament alone may pass legislation but those acts are so general that for the average citizen the noble intention of the elected representatives are often less important than the restrictive regulations laid down by the bureaucrats after the legislation has been passed.

Today, bureaucrats have by law the authority to lay down regulations.

Regulations appear less redoubtable than legislation, but the difference is more in words than in reality. A lot of regulations have force of law because they can be enforced by the court and officers, much like all regulations passed by the House.

● (1530)

The McCleave committee which had a small group of law students at its disposal received no fewer than 1,900 delegated legislative measures, that is regulations which were drafted by people who rule but were not elected and which were applicable in 1972, 1973 and 1974. That is the pace at which bureaucracy is passing legislation and that pace has not slowed down since the survey made in 1969 by the McGuigan committee, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville. The committee found that from 1956 to 1968, 6,992 regulations were published in the Canada Gazette covering 19,972 pages, and most of them have force of law. Moses was satisfied with ten commandments but that time is over and it is quite different today.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) said it is a fact that the many laws governing us are not promulgated by Parliament but scores of departments and organizations which were given the necessary power. Echoing the committee, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) said that the increasing threat posed by statutory instruments, decrees and orders in council are a plague that affects most democracies. The Liberal member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) stated that the overflowing activity of the government can have the dangerous effect of bringing specialized senior public servants to run the people they are supposed to serve.

Mr. Speaker, today members of Parliament serve public servants and yet members of Parliament were elected to serve their voters. We are living in a democracy where bureaucracy makes up democracy. Mr. Speaker, a little further one could read:

> The committee proposes to demand that every legislation emanating from senior public servants be presented to Parliament so members will discuss it openly before it is implemented.

This article was written many years ago, Mr. Speaker.

If the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has unlimited powers to investigate abuse resulting from legislation drafted by senior officials, it has none to specifically correct such abuse. Mr. Speaker, this committee has inquired and reported and nothing has changed, so that before tabling the motion in this House, I had to have my secretary do some research to try to find out whether in the federal Parliament, there existed an administrative consolidation of the major social measures. I wanted to know if there was an index through which it could be established that an act on housing and regarding the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was not inconsistent with—through an indexation or administrative consolidation system—with a regulation or an act on housing in respect to veterans.

Much to my surprise, after some research, I found that several regulations of a given department were completely inconsistent with the same regulations of another department in the same field. We also made several telephone calls which I would like to enumerate: We first inquired of the Department of Veterans Affairs at number 6-4649. A lady, who knew nothing about this, referred us to the public relations section of the department.

We called the public relations section of the Department of Veterans Affairs, at number 2-4234. A unilingual English-speaking lady answered us and seeing that we insisted on speaking French, she referred us to another person. A kind lady, who had much difficulty understanding and speaking French, referred us to the public relations section of Information Canada. Yet, we know very well that the office of Information Canada no longer exists.

After several phone calls, we finally got in touch with the government of Canada bookstore, at 2-4474, where a very nice lady finally answered us. We heard very good French spolen in the Mail Order section of the Publishing Directorate. We were told that the only codification that existed was in the post office department. This is the only information she could give us and, besides, this lady told us: I have already done my own research to try to find some administrative codification in the other ministries but I wasted my time. Lawyer Lise Mayrand who belongs to the regulations and other staturory instruments committee, or orders in council, and who studies the legality of the regulations said that an administrative codification exists for very few laws and that this codification is not official when it does exist.

Mr. Speaker, our motion today intends to show that, as the farmers would say, in this government, in the ministries, in the bureaucracy, as we are told the farmers will be here on Thursday, it is as hard as finding a needle in a haystack for anyone would be completely lost in the maze of the regulations of the House, which have become so intricate that we hired thousands and thousands of public servants this year, as each year, whose task is to try to interpret and apply the regulations.

Mr. Speaker, bureaucracy is the basis of regulations, which it interprets and applies. The drawing up, interpretation and application of the regulations accompany each and every law. Bureaucracy is complicated and ambiguous, and it needs each day a more important number of public servants who, in turn, draft new regulations, the interpretation of which will be done by an even more important number of bureaucrats, and so on and so forth. Mr. Speaker, this is how we get into the vicious circle of bureaucracy which now stifles all public administrations, and this government which claims to be ever more socialist interferes in all areas, controls everything, spells everything out and breeds a bureaucracy which dictates everything, crushes everything and ruins everything. So the worker is no longer motivated and is overburdened by bureaucracy. As a result, socialist countries have experienced a collective loss of motivation. In order to be more readily promoted and to justify their existence bureaucrats devise projects or regulations they consider as brain waves, when their suggestions would not even be taken into account in private industry. In order to implement those brain waves, they find it necessary to set up a new work unit whose head will be responsible for carrying out this bright idea. He has just devised a project to be carried out at the expense of the taxpayers while creating for himself an executive position in a new department. He will need an assistant as well as a task planning officer, a private secretary, a secretary and his assistant and a staff officer.

And there you are, the whole bureaucratic process is in motion. From now on, they will become bureaucratic big wheels with very heavy responsibilities, as they say.

Mr. Speaker, in La Presse of May 5, 1971, Pierre O'Neil made the following comments about Mr. Eric Kieran's resignation from the cabinet:

> And what does he say on going?
> He suggests that ministers are more influent in Quebec than they are here.
> He feels that politics—economic politics at least—are far too much under the control of a certain calcified establishement lacking in imagination.
> What happened to the fine and great system developed by Prime Minister Trudeau to curb the establishement, take away the political power from the non-elected specialists and give it back to the politicians who received a mandate?

Nobody knows.

The civil service tightens its grip on power.

... the civil service adapted to the new method of governing and is in the process of taking back the power from the politicians.

Mr. Kierans' resignation was not keenly felt in the civil service.

It did not have much of an impact.

Five years ago, in an article published in MacLean's Mr. Peter C. Newman said, and I quote:

● (1540)

[English]

—the parliamentary process work has imperceptibly shifted a good deal of influence to a largely invisible sub-government best described as the Ottawa Establishment.

The existence of a powerful bureaucratic elite in Ottawa is by no means new; its roots go back to the depression of the 1930s, when Ottawa first became the decision centre of Canada's economy.

... the mandarin class—that race of faceless experts, protected by the anonymity of a government department, operating beyond the range of the people's control ...

—a sort of sinister clique of bureaucrats attempting spuriously to rule the nation—does not in fact exist. What does exist is a group of intellectually sophisticated, uncannily like-minded individuals in the top echelons of the civil service. These men set the style and the outlook of official Ottawa.

... the power of the bureaucrat transcends administrations. Governments change, but the civil service abides. Most of the men who make up the current Establishment have been in the forefront of power in Ottawa for at least two decades, many even longer.

... the Ottawa Establishment—like adherents to any elite—disavow the possession of power, though they value its exercise ... invisible barriers are unaccountably raised against people and policies they judge undesirable ...

All the serving members of the Establishment hold top jobs in the civil service. But not all the men in the top jobs are members of the elite ...

—like the one cabinet ministers have—to bring its members together ... Establishment members are quietly engaged in a process of continuous consultation. Their communications are swifter and more effective than the politicians'. "If you picked the thirty or so men who matter in this town and put radioactive tracers in their pockets, then watched their daily movements on a giant fluoroscope, you'd be amazed how often their paths cross," says one deputy. "And out of these comings and goings constantly flow memoranda with limited but important circulation."

Most of these exchanges take place outside office hours ... —the only noontime meeting place that counts now is the Rideau Club ... One ambassador who recently left Ottawa recalls: "Whenever I wanted to report on the reactions to any important policy to my government, all I'd have to do was wander into the Rideau Club—

And he concludes with this last paragraph:

[English]

It is relatively simple for the Establishment to perpetuate itself. The sixteen hundred government officials who earn more than $13,000 a year—

This was five years ago.

—are rated for promotion every two years, and the final test is the judgment made by a board consisting of a deputy minister, an assistant deputy and one member of the Civil Service Commission. With a majority of the votes, the emissaries of the Establishment can choose those men they find acceptable and leave others to less important appointments.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, these few remarks were to demonstrate what Social Crediters believe and have said for many years, namely that unfortunately the government is a ghost government led by bureaucracy as its predecessors were.

We are surprised to hear the Minister of Supply and Services make a statement such as the one he made a few moments ago and which only confirms what I have just said and what we have been saying for many years.

I would like to deal now with the strength of the Public Service. Almost 17,000 public servants have an income of more than $20,000 a year. They do not care a damn about members of Parliament who must vote their own salary increases and have them rolled back later on, because they have to bow before public criticism. That is not the case for public servants. Statistics show that 16,868 public servants from 28 federal departments had an income of more than $20,000 during the last financial year, compared to 1,225 during the 1968-69 financial year. In the Department of National Defence, 5,663 public servants were earning more than $20,000 a year in last October compared to 241 in 1968. That is to say that from 1968 to 1975, the number of public servants with an income of more than $20,000 a year has increased from 241 to 5,663 in the Department of National Defence alone.

In the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, this number has increased from 145 to 876 during the same period, and in the Department of Transport, from 46 to 1,269. In the Office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), only one person earned more than $20,000 a year in 1968. Today, there are about 20 of them, including Mr. Jack Austin, principal secretary to the head of the government. The latter's salary is really a shame Mr. Speaker, ranging from $50,000 to $55,000 a year.

In the January 1975 issue of the Reader's Digest, one can read the following, and I quote:

● (1550)

[English]

—1.2 million or 1 in every 8 Canadians in the labour force (this includes 727,000 Provincial and Municipal employees) are employed by Government today ...

Before World War I (approximately 60 years ago) Canada had 23,000 civil servants. Since then our population has tripled, and the civil service has increased by 1200 per cent to about 300,000 ... over the past nine years.

[Translation]

And in a Vancouver paper, one could read recently, and I quote:

[English]

The government's top civil servants—deputy ministers—may now earn up to $48,000 a year each, according to a cabinet order released Friday ...

Effective last October, the new scale for deputy ministers announced Friday ranges from $39,000 to $48,000.

[Translation]

In the Ottawa Citizen on the same day, it was reported, and I quote:

[English]

The number of federal civil servants earning $20,000 a year or more rose by almost 1,300 per cent in the last six years, statistics tabled yesterday in the Commons indicate. The figures show that 16,868 civil servants in 29 government departments were earning at least $20,000 a year—

Mr. Speaker, the latest figures for 1975 show that the Public Service numbers 296,467 people; the Armed Forces, 78,000; the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, 15,000. There are 15,127 other federal employees. Mr. Speaker, the federal government has spent 44 per cent of its budget, that is $12.5 billion for its operation; 5 per cent on investments, that is $1.5 billion, and $14.3 billion on grants, pensions, contributions or transfers to the provinces. This means that the aggregate amount of grants, contributions and transfer payments to the provinces is almost equal to the amount spent on the government's operation with the present bureaucracy.

In 1960 there was one civil servant for 87 farmers. In 1966, there was one civil servant for 59 farmers. In 1975, one civil servant for 44 farmers. It means that the fewer the farmers, the more civil servants. So, if farming is in good health it is not because of the efficiency of civil servants but rather the contrary.

Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Advisory Group on Executive Compensation in the Public Service, Mr. J. V. Clyne, in a brief submitted on January 13, 1971 to the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), said on page 5 that civil servants were not badly treated—because he would have made a fool of himself—but he went on to say:

Accordingly, we recommend that steps be taken as quickly as possible . . .

. . . Mr. Speaker, because it was urgent. So they were not paid enough.

. . . that steps be taken as quickly as possible to revise the SX-DM salary framework as follows:

And here is what those mandarins recommended to the government: For DM3, $45,000 to $50,000; for DM2, $40,000 to $45,000; for DM1-SX4, $34,000 to $40,000; for SX3, $28,000 to $35,000; for SX2, $25,000 to $31,000; for SX1, $22,000 to $28,000, Mr. Speaker. If we listen to them, Mr. Speaker, in a few years from now they alone will take the whole federal budget.

I have here the Toronto Star of May 22, 1976 which reads as follows:

[English]

"Jack McArthur estimates we waste $5 billion on needless forms and letters every year."

[Translation]

It is to demonstrate the efficiency of our civil servants.

[English]

"What do I do when the government doesn't send me my proper old-age pension? . . . a few weeks ago, some 50,000 Canadian old-age pensioners were asking the same question. Most had received only portions of their total pensions . . . The paperwork explosion.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Department of Environment that was created to identify and fight pollution in Canada should first study and fight the bureaucratic pollution, the red tape pollution as we are in a situation where in every department, in our offices, we are submerged by red tape because of the attitude of the federal government that wants to intervene in every field, thus forcing private entreprise to hire experts, civil servants, accountants, consultants to extricate itself from all that red tape.

And I continue with the Toronto Star:

[English]

It was said that annual reapplication forms hadn't been filled out. There was some vague talk of a failure to send out forms and reminders, or the pensioners' failure to respond, or a computer breakdown.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, whenever we ask these gentlemen for explanations, we are always told that the fault lies with the computers, whether unemployment insurance or old age security pensions are involved. About two hours ago, I came to my office with more than 150 complaints, and I am sure that a good number of people have not complained yet to my office, I mean, people who, this last month, had further deductions from their old age security pension cheques; all of us members of this House have to cope with this massive red tape, this cumbersomeness, this lack of competence and efficiency which prevails in our bureaucracy and this is why we thought it appropriate today to denouce such a system.

[English]

—between 25 and 30 per cent of personal income-tax returns are wrong in some way . . .

More than 3 million forms a year are incorrect. Hundreds of thousands of others are incomplete if you believe the tax consultants . . .

If the average cost of correction—in time and money, including both sides—is $25, that bill would be more than $75 million annually.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I could go on and on, but I would like to mention a few specific cases to show that this bureaucratic problem does not exist only in Quebec but also in the other provinces.

[English]

J. A. Thomas, of Thomas Nameplates Ltd. of Orillia, complains in a letter to the independent business federation about the delays which become possible.

He says he became interested almost a year ago in PAIT—Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology—a federal program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I also wish to thank my honourable colleagues for allowing me to complete my remarks.

[English]

"We responded," Thomas writes, "and have since been involved in a continuing Orwellian struggle with bureaucrats. We have complied with suggestions, acceded to requests and patiently attempted to supply data as required. In return, we have been diddled by departmental people who take weeks to reply"—A century ago, almost all you needed to be a success in business was that old get-up-and-go.

Now, it's absolutely necessary to have a mountain of paper, combined with a vast expertise and devotion of time to collecting the information wanted by scores of government departments and agencies, by internal paperwork collectors and by associations, customers and suppliers. Some companies, for example, are filing thousands of annual compliance reports with the Anti-inflation Board—one of Canada's most flourishing companies is Toronto-based Moore Corp., the world's biggest maker of business forms.

Its sales top $1 billion a year, at last report making it Canada's 16th largest industrial company.

● (1600)

Mr. Speaker, those paper manufacturers are doing extremely well thanks to our bureaucracy. In The Guardian of October 27, 1975—I believe this is a newspaper published in P.E.I.—here is how are described the frustrations of a businessman.

[English]

Mr. Sark says that in June of this year he made an application for a housing loan under the Indian off-reserve and Eskimo re-establishment housing regulations. But he said to even have this application looked at he had to send a cheque in the amount of $835 to the Department of Indian Affairs for survey costs, legal charges, property tax adjustment and insurance premiums.

Mr. Sark said he was told his money would be refunded if his housing application was not approved but on July 15, Mr. Sark received word his application had indeed been approved.

Believing he could have his house completed by the end of this month he took a loan of $835 from the bank. He said the reason he did this was because he had been told by CMHC he would be eligible for the $500 grant from the federal government for new home owners.

By the middle of this month Mr. Sark says he was told by CMHC the $500 grant had been used and he did not qualify for the assistant home ownership plan. Mr. Sark said CMHC explained to him he did not qualify because his salary was too high as a result of a part time job.

He said he also found another amendment in the same report stating 'make loans to Indians for the purpose of assisting in the purchase, improvement or construction of housing projects on Indian reserves'.

Mr. Sark said he now 'wonders if it is possible that there are two NHA acts, one for CMHC and a completely differently one for the public. It is also strange indeed that the Department of Indian Affairs and the Department of Veterans land act were not notified of this particular CMHC policy'. He added, 'CMHC should make public their policy regarding Indian off reserve housing, but before they do, they should educate their staff so that one hand will know what the other is doing'.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if we go on like this, we will find out that one department's regulations are in conflict with those of another.

I could quote a good many examples of people who have had to fight for weeks, months and even years with bureaucracy, of corporations who have had to spend thousands of dollars in order to avail themselves of an existing statute, because the bureaucratic process is so confusing, so huge that it has become almost impossible to satisfy those mandarins.

I therefore suggest that my hon. colleagues should reconsider the federal government's policy, that the government should revise its attitude towards bureaucracy, in order that Parliament may have more power and that regulations may no longer be hatched behind closed doors because of the powers handed over to civil servants.

Whenever we want to utilize our statutes, we unfortunately find that the legislation in this House have enacted for a good purpose has been totally rehashed and has been made inefficient by an army of bureaucrats who are exceedingly well paid, compared with us members of parliament. They do not have to meet standards set by the population while we the elected representatives of the people, have to deal with the general public which does not understand the spirit behind the statutes passed with good intentions but enforced contrary to the purpose debated in parliament in committee and in this House.

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I think it is always a pleasure when a number of beautiful parliamentary performers such as myself have a chance to speak in such an important debate. I wish to thank the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) for presenting the motion which allows me to participate. I shall be dealing particularly with the part of his motion that relates to the obvious tendency to extend the scope of regulations under which pieces of legislation are to be implemented.

I speak, sir, from the standpoint of being chairman of a committee of both Houses of Parliament, the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, which deals with what I call the conduct of the subordinate parliament in respect of orders in council and the rules and regulations which flow out of that subordinate parliament. I note that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) is here. I understand he will follow me. I understand, also, that his parliamentary secretary will speak later in the debate. All I ask is that the parliamentary secretary be allowed to get out of here in due course so that he can attend a meeting at which he is to be a principal witness this evening at 8.30.

This subject, surprisingly, can be of a great deal of interest among the members of the press at certain times. I note that one of them is in the press gallery now. I commend him for being present. I shall not say anything about those who are not. This is a subject that can exercise Canadians. It exercises them, for example, with regard to the subject of the gun control provisions of Bill C-83, now before a committee of the House, and yet when one proceeds from the general thought of whether there should be a subordinate parliament and what we should do about this subordinate parliament, then the numbers, as they say, tend to fall off.

I shall make some points this afternoon thanks, again, to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Shefford. I look around and note that the party which has proposed the motion does not have a member in the House at the moment. In any event, I shall be making some points and suggestions. I hope that if I should run out of time some member of parliament will be good enough to stand and suggest that I might have the floor for one more moment of suggestion.

I think it is true that parliament should not be overburdened with details concerning legislation. I think this is perhaps why orders in council, rules and regulations and the like as well as directives, have grown in our time. I do not think there can be any question about the need for that. Otherwise, we would be meeting 24 months every year instead of 24 months every two years.

May I start my dissertation about a practice which has grown up in the past 12 or 15 years. I do not comment about the governments which brought this practice about, but let me start with a letter which was written by the Hon. E. A. Forsey and myself, as joint chairmen of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, to the Auditor General. It was written on April 26. I will quote part of it but, of course, anyone who wants to see the whole thing may do so. It is to Mr. Macdonell and reads in part as follows:

One of these abuses is the drawing of the subordinate law-making powers in such a way that the documents flowing from their exercise are not regarded by the Crown as statutory instruments and are thereby excluded from parliamentary scrutiny.

That, by the way, is a big problem, but perhaps I should not burden the House with the technical detail of it at the moment. I will burden the House with this from the same letter:

The other is the making of statutory instruments under a series of votes commencing at some point in the immediate or distant past and amplified in scope or altered in some one or more particulars by successive votes.

I will give an example of this sort of thing later on, if time does not run out on me. The letter goes on:

These successive votes are often expressed "to extend the purpose" of an earlier vote and the extensions in some instances are but barely related to the particular objects of the original vote.

That is really an amendment to legislation, but the legislation in itself happens to have been a vote, so nobody becomes particularly exercised about it. The creeping camel's foot suddenly becomes the whole camel in the tent. The letter goes on:

The combination of the accumulation of extensions and the extreme generality of language in which almost all enabling powers in votes are expressed renders the task of the Standing Joint Committee so difficult as to negate any effective scrutiny. To the extent that scrutiny is rendered ineffective, parliament's control of the purse is subverted.

I underline those words. The answer of the Auditor General of Canada, Mr. J. J. Macdonell, is interesting indeed. On May 14, 1976, he wrote to Senator Forsey and myself to say the following:

—we have been concerned with any practices which lead to uncertainty about the nature of expenditures that appropriations are intended to cover because, in addition to affecting adversely parliament's ability to control expenditure, it makes it difficult for my office to discharge its statutory responsibilities under the Financial Administration Act.

Skipping over a couple of paragraphs, he says:

To sum up, it is our view that to the greatest extent possible vote texts should be specific and unequivocal, contain all wording having legislative effect and any delegations of authority to the executive. We also feel that legislating by means of dollar votes and altering the purpose of previous votes by a number of successive votes should be discouraged in the interests of clarity and good parliamentary control.

I know when I say that that my good friend, the President of the Privy Council, who has the responsibility of trying to get a certain number of measures though parliament, is going to ask what else we can do. My suggestion—and it does not fall within the ambit of this particular debate—is that somehow this parliament has to come to terms with itself and we have to impose upon ourselves certain restrictions as far as debate goes.

I have argued this before in the House of Commons, and perhaps I am a lone force with regard to certain of my associates. But I also say that we have to have provision for good housekeeping measures and the like. However, we still must have regard for parliamentary practice, and the Auditor General and I are as one in saying that the practice which has been followed about the $1 votes, the votes upon appropriation bills, and the like, is not in keeping with good parliamentary practice. I say, also, that there is no other legislature or parliament of which I am aware within the so-called British system which does what we try to do here.

I have quoted Mr. Macdonell, and when we deal with things later on in the procedure committee and in the House of Commons arising out of the procedure committee, I hope we will pay some heed to what he has said. It is perhaps the strongest criticism he has made, and yet in a sense he is echoing what many of us within this chamber have said—that somehow we have to find ourselves a better way of doing things.

In the few minutes which are left I would like to draw examples of the points I am trying to make to the attention of the House this afternoon. First, may I quote from a letter which Senator Forsey and I sent to the President of the Privy Council, the minister who is listening so avidly now. It is a letter dated April 8, 1976, and it reads in part as follows:

—the committee objects to the drawing of enabling powers in votes in such a way that the resulting exercises of delegated law-making power are not regarded as statutory instruments by the legal advisers to your office.

This is one of the fights we have had, and it has been going on for some considerable time. Probably since the fight is still going on, I will not overburden the House with that particular point. It will come before us as a matter of debate at a future time. I will now turn to some of the difficulties we are facing in terms of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, Issue No. 56, to be found at page 38, where our counsel made comments about the Indian off-reserve and Eskimo housing regulations arising out of Appropriation Act No. 4, 1971, as follows:

Finally, by Vote L16a, Appropriation Act No. 4, 1971, the purposes were once again extended, in respect of both Indians and Eskimos, to authorize loans "for repairs or improvements to houses at the time of purchase in areas other than Indian reserves".

It is not clear what this last extension means: must the loans (for repairs and improvements) be made at the time of purchase; must the repairs and improvements be projected at the time of purchase; must the repairs and improvements be carried out at the time of purchase? The last is in any event probably a legal impossibility. What is clear is that the loans and advances under the several appropriations are to be made to members of the class, Indians, and to members of the class, Eskimos, on the same terms and conditions, subject to the same provisions, (and for the same purposes). Yet section 3(1)(b) imposes a restriction on a loan to Eskimos which does not apply in the case of a loan to Indians, namely that the location of the house must be acceptable to the Minister.

These are broad powers, are they not? Mr. Speaker, you and I would probably be free to move about if we could meet the necessary conditions with regard to mortgages in the marketplace, but what I have just read, if hon. members will examine it, will be found to be a pretty strong infringement on the rights of individuals. Our counsel went on:

(The restriction that the house must be on land outside a reserve exists in respect of loans to members of both racial groups. It is expressed in the case of Indians. It need not be expressed in the case of Eskimos for they, like any non-Indian person, would, in any event, be unable lawfully to build or acquire a house on an Indian reserve.)

So that point was made with regard to the regulations we have under an act we ourselves passed years ago. Mr. Speaker, I have three or four more examples, but I am running short of time to develop this argument. There are many questions that can arise with regard to these particular votes within appropriation acts, and I do not think we have given ourselves a procedure capable of dealing with them. I have a remedy, however. May I deal with SOR/75-24—the home buyer grant regulations which were passed more than a year ago. Our counsel, Mr. G. C. Eglington, wrote to the Department of Urban Affairs on July 14, 1975, as follows:

● (1620)

—this provision amounts either to the payment of the grant to the association, a provision ultra vires vote 12B of the enabling statute which specifies grant payments "to an individual", or to a condition of payment, namely that the payment be applied to a specific purpose, the reduction of the indebtedness of another. The committee was doubtful as to whether the terms and conditions which the governor in council might properly prescribe under Vote 12B can extend to requiring that payments be used in the manner specified in section 5(2).

The committee referred to is the joint committee. The letter goes on to say:

The committee will appreciate your response on this point and, after considering it, will also deal with the further point as to whether or not such substantial rules should be made by regulation—

That is the point made by my hon. friend in opening this debate:

—pursuant to skeletal enabling powers in votes.

That is the point on which I should like to base my contribution this afternoon. I am coming to the end of my time so I will not burden the House, but there are two more instances, both important. May I suggest that in dealing with the procedure of the House, in order that the House may have some control over what I call the subordinate parliament of Canada, we probably have to take one more step. I realize that the work of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments is very important. As a matter of fact, I am dismayed that the press gallery has not sent people to it. I am also dismayed that members who are not on that committee have not used it more often. Only one member has used it so far. The committee has procedures and remedies available to approach some of the problems which exercise myself and other members of it.

In supporting the motion of the hon. member for Shefford, I should like to point out that there are committees of this chamber and the other place which have special interests; they deal with fisheries, mining, energy—and if one wants to look at a catalogue of horrors, they need only look at the regulations affecting energy and mining. When we make changes in parliamentary procedure we should find a way of referring the regulations to a regulations committee for examination and also to the committee which I have the honour to head. They could then be referred to the appropriate standing committee which could pronounce upon them.

This is a new procedure that I am suggesting for the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, I hope I have made a case that can find its way into the hearts and minds of hon. members.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I believe that this motion aims at drawing the attention of all hon. members, whatever their political party, on the importance of reassessing the role of Parliament in a democratic society, in a country like ours. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) explained quite clearly and accurately the objectives of his motion, and the hon. member who just sat down also supports the reasons for presenting this motion today, that is to clearly show the important role that Parliament must play in administration, in the administration of national affairs, of Canadian affairs.

Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, we had a striking example of the inefficiency of ministers, and even of hon. members as concerns the implementation of legislation. A minister makes some statements in the House, some bureaucrat does the opposite outside the House, and we suddenly discover that the minister has been fooled, that he has not been informed, and the deputy minister of a certain department is transferred. He is transferred to another department, in a manner reminiscent of that in which ministers are appointed. Someone is appointed minister, he keeps his portfolio for three or four years, afterwards when he starts to bother the bureaucracy, it is the deputy ministers, simple secretaries who force the government to appoint another minister. The bureaucracy if not accountable to the general public, we do not know individual deputy ministers, we do not know the secretaries of the deputy ministers, and they do not have to be elected. Moreover, they are employees.

Mr. Speaker, we must not play politics at certain times or allow public servants to do so. I am a politician. I would not want Crown corporations, like the CBC, to be accountable to a political party. I recognize that these corporations must be absolutely independent from political parties, but not from the Canadian Parliament. Those are agencies or corporations created by and responsible to Parliament.

Those people are sometimes seen mocking the minister, or members of Parliament. In certain cases indeed, in nearly any constituency be it represented by a Liberal, a Conservative or a Social Crediter, constituents come up and ask their M.P.'s help to settle a problem they cannot solve in matters of unemployment insurance for example, of welfare or that sort of things. When those constituents call at a government office saying that they have consulted with their member of Parliament, they are immediately snubbed and told there is no use to consult with a member, because members account for nothing, nobody needs them and they have no business coming up and telling public servants what to do in government offices. Mr. Speaker, I will relate something which happened to us, the members of the Social Credit Party of Canada, in 1974. We had passed a legislation here in August—

An hon. Member: That does not happen only to you!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The legislation—yes, yes; that happens to you too!

Mr. Speaker, the Canada Elections Act clearly provides that any political party has the right to receive donations and to issue receipts for these gifts in favour of their electoral organization. The act provides that rendered services may be included. This means that the travel expenses of a constituent or party worker who goes from one riding to another or anywhere in Canada can be figured out and deducted on one's income return as political contributions, under the electoral legislation passed by Parliament. That is what we did under the terms of the act.

But the bureaucrats the Department of National Revenue, and namely those of Sherbrooke, said that the act of Parliament was no good and that the legislation concerning bureaucrats is the valid one. They say that rendered services are not deductible. And it should be noted that they refused to refund some taxpayers certain amounts claimed as gifts to political parties, namely our party. Maybe the same thing happened to other political parties.

Mr. Speaker, The Royal Canadian Mounted Police was even used to intimidate our respective constituents, the Mounties went into the homes telling the electors of taxpayers that they were thieves, that they had submitted false returns and that if they did not sign a document to the effect that they had not helped the party, they would be thrown to jail!

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, if the RCMP want proofs, I have witnesses in my own riding where they went one night to the home of Mr. Maxime Lord, 2345 Saguenay Avenue in Noranda, and his wife, my chief organizer. Take note of this: two RCMP agents went in saying that they were liars, crooks, that they had lied to National Revenue, that they had claimed $200 which they had never given the party. The devoted work of those people, Mr. Speaker, is worth much more than $1,500 or $2,000 a year; but the two Mounties, two youngsters, went in there calling them liars and thieves. Fortunately, my two fellow-citizens, who are not easily intimidated, told them in turn that they had better sit down and be polite otherwise they would get thrown out! Then, things calmed down somewhat.

An hon. Member: That is not the general reaction!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): No, indeed, everyone would not greet them that way. Mr. Speaker, when that happened, I went to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) in this House, I went to his seat—

An hon. Member: He's never understood anything!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): How true! He told me that there had been anomalies, irregularities that some of our people were not honest.

That is what Solicitor General Allmand said to me, and I challenged him to prove it. Anyway, the whole file is in the hands of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) who said that he was not aware of the matter, that he would enquire to his official to ascertain what had happened, but that the whole matter might be in the hands of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen). I went to see the Minister of National Revenue at his seat and asked him a progress report on the matter. The minister told me that the file had been sent to his office but that it had been returned to the Minister of Justice, who, in turn, would return it to the Solicitor General.

Mr. Speaker, as to the tax returns made in 1975 for the 1974 taxation year, some people were in fact granted the recognized deduction for donations to political parties, after which the RCMP was asked to inquire. The ministers know nothing about the whole matter: three dummies they are! Deputy ministers do know what is going on, and they are the ones who decided to sue people. Now, in 1976, we file our returns for 1975. Apparently, 1975 political donations are accepted more easily. That is not all: assessment notices are presently being sent to some taxpayers requesting them to pay back what they received in 1974 for donations made in 1974. What nerve the National Revenue people must have to ask for the repayment of amounts paid out after May 1975.

Mr. Speaker, it is surprising that the ministers should not be aware of that. At this very moment, we have three representatives with the chief commissioner of income tax to check the record—

An hon. Member: The RCMP.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The chief commissioner of the RCMP, that's it, Mr. Nadon. Three of them are there this afternoon to check the record. What is in it? We will know tomorrow probably, or later today. But the trouble we are having, I realize that other constituencies may well have it too. I simply want to state that Parliament is being laughed at. We passed that legislation here in this Parliament to allow your constituents to give you donations deductible for income tax purposes, not from the taxable income but the income tax, the tax payable. The act was passed here. But bureaucrats say, you, members of Parliament, are not right. They are the first to come here and beg for salary increases, higher pensions, to live fatly at the expense of Canadian taxpayers while members of Parliament who are elected representatives responsible to the people are being laughed at by little secretaries in the office of the deputy minister or minor employees who actually rule the roost.

Mr. Speaker, I am talking about the elections act. There are others. The CBC, a Crown corporation—there are other Crown corporations—but the CBC was asked in this Parliament to be more explicit, more national, to talk more about the role of the Canadian Parliament. I will give you another rather recent example: on May 25, when the budget was tabled by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). The whole Parliament was here. I am sorry I could not be here. However, my colleagues were here and most members also. That evening, on Radio-Canada, when the news came on, I said: Now we are going to hear about the budget. I listen to the news in my area; we have freedon of choice.

We have a television station, Radio-Nord Inc., which is affiliated to Radio-Canada. Therefore we have one alternative: either we turn off the set or we turn it on. That is our only choice and we must hear the news on Radio-Canada because there are no other stations. So, in the evening, I listen to the comments about the budget. In the afternoon some hon. members were locked in for 2, 3 or 4 hours before the budget was brought down at 8 p.m. My colleague for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) was one of those along with other Liberals, Progressive Conservatives and New Democrats who studied the budget beforehand to be able to comment on it in the evening. So, in the evening I listened to the commentaries. They introduce the budget, they talk about the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and then they give the comments by federal representatives of other political parties. I think my colleague for Shefford was asked to record a three-minute commentary which was taped in the afternoon or evening—

Mr. Rondeau: No, five!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): —or a five-minute commentary on Radio-Canada—

Mr. Rondeau: In colour!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): . . . in colour, besides. At least, they have it colour! Not our political colour, the actual colour. Mr. Speaker, in the evening, I think the hon. member for Shefford was allowed less than half a minute . . .

Mr. Rondeau: 40 seconds; on channel 10, 4 minutes.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): . . . 40 seconds on the government network and 4 minutes on channel 10, a Montreal private company's station. The other party representatives were not allowed more than 2 minutes.

Mr. Rondeau: Not even the Minister.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Not even the Minister. I do not think he even had his 2 minutes, the Minister of Finance! This is the measure of CBC's impartiality, a coporation which is totally independent from political parties as well as from parliament. That same evening, the Inquiry Commission on Organized Crime, CECO as it is called, was allowed about 7 minutes to show the notorious Dubois family from Montreal. What the hell can that mean in Winnipeg? How does that concern . . .

Mr. Allard: Halifax!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): . . . Yes, Halifax!

Some hon. Members: There are Frenchmen there!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Or how do scandals in Montreal concern the people in Vancouver? Even in toronto, they do not want to hear about it. People have enough troubles of their own, they have no need for Montreal's problems. Mr. Speaker, those in charge of the CBC do not to give a damn about members of Parliament. They are the first to laugh at us, they are the first to send us to hell . . .

Some hon. Members: And ministers for that matter!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): . . . yes, both ministers and members of parliament. They say "We may or may not give them coverage". Who in CBC are those powers who decide that? They are the same people who come here "wacking" for their votes, not thousands, but hundreds of millions, to pay for those pale-faced people in the CBC's Montreal offices, for giving coverage to those awful organizations. "We must go everywhere, we must cover every organization", says the Corporation. And to every organization they go. But the CBC should be held responsible for the division that now exists in various regions of Canada. It was shameful the way Canada's Parliament was treated last week on the occasion of the budget speech, which is of concern to every Canadian. The CBC cast aside such a serious issue, in favour of the Board of inquiry on organized crime, to show Justice Dutil and witnesses stating that they attempted to kill someone, they sold marijuana or haschish or what have you, that they had a prostitution ring in Montreal. That is quality indeed to improve the standard of public morals. Directly on TV it went.

Do they say anything about Parliament, about the important role played by members? No, they do not give a hoot. And I will tell you why. Because we, members of Parliament, we are not named for life. We have to get elected. Come the next election, we cannot take it for granted, we are not elected for life but for one term only. There is a new election every two, three or four years. Who knows what can happen in four, three or two years from now? Job security, that is not for us.

Employment security is requested for the CBC employees, employment security in journalism, employment security in the damned bureaucracy, employment security for civil servants. By the way, there is something else I would like to say. From all the members who were in this House when I was first elected in 1946-49, only three are still here: the member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself. Out of 264 or 265, only three members from those days still have a seat in this House. This is to show that we know what parliament is all about.

If we are here, it is not because we had employment security but because we fought hard in each election. But I do feel a little bit sick whenever I hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), even rightly so, say: "We have to treat our civil servants well." Employment security and better salaries are things we hear discussed every so often. "When are we going to increase their pensions, pay them decent salaries, and so on and so forth?" Good enough. I agree that our civil servants should be well paid. However, whenever federal members who have no employment security ask for a small salary increase, the civil servant is the first to object. I just cannot figure that out.

Federal members are paid $24,000 a year. Some of our civil servants earn as much as $40,000, $45,000 and $50,000 a year and we are still asking salary increases for them. Whenever a small increase of $2,000 or $2,400 is requested or suggested in Parliament civil servants are the first to fight against it despite the fact that members of Parliament do not have any job security and are never assured of being returned to the House at the next election. As soon as members start talking about a possible increase, the press objects to it. The newspapers then say that the members voted themselves a salary increase for their expenses in their ridings. Mr. Speaker, why is it, if it is so interesting to be elected member, that those fellows from the press do not run for Parliament? Why do they not come here to sit as members?

First because they do not have the ability and second because nobody wants them. Third, they should just shut up and show some respect for the Canadian Parliament instead of trying to ridicule everything that happens here, to ridicule the members of Parliament who do something, to ridicule the ministers in front of civil servants and deputy ministers. I have great respect for deputy ministers. The organization—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues but I think it is true, I just started to be good. Mr. Speaker, I shall not take too much of the time of the House but I had to clarify the role that Parliament must play in this country so that the bureaucrats "stay in their hole." It does not mean they should be ill-treated but they should be respectful of Parliament and the ministers. Today, we have a Liberal government but tomorrow I hope we shall have a Social Credit government.

But we should be respectful of the authority at a time when everybody complains about the lack of authority, the lack of respect for those who are supposed to administer public funds and the nation's business. Mr. Speaker, we should be respectful and we should start in the media for instance where they always call out for the freedom of the press, yes, the freedom to lie to the people as filthy beasts can do. It is the freedom to deprive others of their freedom. Let us see who is calling louder for freedom in Montreal: the common front, Charbonneau, Pépin, Laberge. What respect do they have for the authority? What respect do they show for the National Assembly in Quebec? Those people are stirring up public opinion against law and order. But the freedom they are asking for is the freedom to deprive others of it and to end up with the kind of freedom they enjoy in Moscow or in other socialist countries in the world where people no longer have the right to speak loud, to say what they have to say.

Mr. Speaker, thank God we have not reached this point yet in Canada or in the province of Quebec. Should we however let the bureaucracy get hold of power in Canada we will be in exactly the same situation as those socialist or communist countries in the world. Mr. Speaker, I want to add that all the world countries which have allowed their bureaucracy to gain power are in a desperate situation today. They would like to restore this parliamentary freedom which still exists in Canada, thank God.

Mr. Speaker, let the ministers take their responsibilities and we, parliamentarians, we, members of Parliament, let us require at least that government agencies be respectful of the Canadian Parliament. We have the duty to pass the votes concerning their salary, we are responsible for all these people. And we are going to allow those officials who work in small offices, in riding offices here and there, to make a mockery of us and tell us: Just watch, Mr. MP, your case will not be dealt with because you mixed it up with politics. Mr. Speaker, politics is not an electoral policy nor a party policy between elections. It is a government policy, a Parliament policy and therefore public servants should be respectful of members of Parliament. They should consider that the law has to be enforced.

I referred earlier to the electoral legislation. In this regard, I suggest it is time—and I draw the attention of the President of the Privy Council to it so that he stresses the fact to the bureaucrats of the Departments of National Revenue, Justice and the Solicitor General—that Bill C-74 be strictly enforced instead of being tampered with as these people are doing at present.

Mr. Speaker, the members, whoever they are, should demand that public servants perform their duties and give the results expected and required from them, not golf games, yacht trips or extra-parliamentarian activities. What we want from them are results reported in Parliament and then Parliament will be brought back into favour before public opinion; we want the mass media to be attached to Parliament, be made available to the Canadian public so there will be no more deceptions by individuals who want to destroy us instead of promoting the self-development of the country.

Mr. Speaker, my appeal is directed to the members of all political parties and to the government to assume its responsibilities and put bureaucracy at the service of Parliament which will legislate to meet the needs of the people.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald)—Transport—Rationalization of transport policy; the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway)—Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation—Proposal to grant export licence to sell fish outside corporation; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Air Canada—Allegation of poor billing procedures.

Legislation

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—GOVERNMENT LEGISLATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau):

That this House finds highly deplorable the attitude the government has demonstrated by taking advantage of its majority to draft many of its bills in such a way that different matters are dealt with in a single text, as well as its obvious tendency to extend the scope of regulations under which pieces of legislation are to be implemented, an attitude which distorts the purpose legislators have in mind and deprives this House of its real customary powers.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the motion which is before us—and I should like to remind the House of this—is not exactly the same as the subject which has been discussed so eloquently by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette). However, I can sympathize with the hon. gentleman. Having been a bureaucrat myself at one time, I can understand the situation very well. Having been a bureaucrat, a member of parliament and a minister, I understand what he is saying.

I suggest to him, however, that we should preserve as an essential principle of our democratic system the notion that the government should be responsible for its acts. This is a principle which is sometimes extremely difficult to interpret; As my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) said earlier today, there are circumstances over which ministers can have no control. However, I hope the House will agree that in general ministers should be accountable to the House for their actions, and this includes the actions of their departments. It is a principle which has been accepted by the government ever since I have had anything to do with it, and it has been adhered to on numerous occasions when the opposition wished to go behind the government and begin to deal with civil servants. I believe such efforts should be resisted and that ministers have a responsibility to the House for the acts of their departments as well as their acts in a personal capacity.

May I now refer to the very interesting remarks made by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) who is joint chairman of the Committee on Regulations and Statutory Instruments. I am sorry he is not here now. I should like to congratulate him and his committee, including the senators and, in particular, Senator Forsey who is the co-chairman, on the very useful work they have been doing. They have had some difficulty in defining what constitutes statutory instruments, but that is to be expected. I hope we can clarify this situation so that the committee can carry on its work effectively.

I was interested in the suggestion made by the hon. member toward the conclusion of his remarks, that we might adopt new procedures to deal, not with the question whether regulations and statutory instruments are in the proper form and within the ambit of legislation but, rather, whether they touch on substantial matters which are of importance to policy rather than simply to the carrying out of a statute. The suggestion that we might set up a procedure to carry the matter further if the statutory instruments committee felt certain regulations were of such a character as to justify a closer examination in another standing committee is one which I would not reject out of hand. I believe it is a proposal well worth considering.

Mr. Speaker, the motion in the name of the Social Credit party deals with two matters, the first of which has not been debated at all, as yet. Neither the first speaker for the Social Credit party, nor the hon. member for Témiscamingue made reference to this part of the motion. I would remind the House of the terms of the motion itself—the first part. It reads:

That this House finds highly deplorable the attitude the government has demonstrated by taking advantage of its majority to draft many of its bills in such a way that different matters are dealt with in a single text—

In other words, as I understand it, the motion condemns the government, for bringing in omnibus bills. I believe the House is right to be cautious when asked to consider bills which cover a number of unrelated matters. But I suggest the government has been careful when bringing forward what are loosely called omnibus bills to observe consistency and confine the subjects to closely related matters.

I could pick out one or two pieces of legislation to illustrate my point. One is the measure presently before the House, Bill C-83, which deals with certain aspects of the criminal law. It has one theme—measures to provide greater peace and security. If it is argued that it would have been better to have brought forward a whole series of amendments by way of separate bills, I would answer that not only would we have found greater difficulty in dealing with the essential and urgent legislation which is before the House, but we would be repeating the debate on each of the items of legislation. I suggest the government has done the House a service by bringing forward in one bill amendments to the Criminal Code concerning peace and security.

I should also refer to another bill introduced some time ago early in the session, Bill C-16, dealing with the status of women. That bill did amend eight separate statutes, but the common theme was to provide equality of status for male and female persons. Surely the House would not have thought it desirable for the government to have introduced eight separate pieces of legislation simply because the bill purported to amend eight existing laws.

Various speakers, particularly the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, have referred to the rules of procedure of this House. As President of the Privy Council and, for the time being, chairman of the House committee on procedure and organization, I should like to express my hope that we will bear these considerations in mind when we are dealing with changes in the rules which are now under consideration in the committee.

We do not as yet, in my judgment, have rules that enable us to deal effectively with the legislation that comes before this House, nor with the bills that we are being encouraged to introduce nearly every day to deal with other matters and for which we have not the legislative time. Moreover, I thought the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants was quite right in saying that under our present rules we do not have adequate time to deal with what he called the subordinate legislation made under existing statutes.

I believe that these comments are well justified. It seems to me that in this House we often substitute length of debate for careful consideration. There are so many occasions when an attempt is made to hold up legislation rather than to bring it to a conclusion and reach a decision. I can understand, Mr. Speaker, the desirability of giving the public time to understand the nature of the proposals that are put before the House so that members of parliament can get the reaction of the public; but there comes a time when an excessive dependence upon that particular principle simply inhibits this House from doing the job for which its members were elected.

I am quite satisfied, in my own mind, that this is not a contest between the government and the opposition. So often it seems to me that the proposals that are made for changes in the rules are represented as an attempt by the government to push its legislative proposals through the House. I, personally, do not think that is so, nor that the opposition should look upon it in that light. Perhaps some day they will be in government and will understand the problem from our point of view. If they work hard and show responsibility, they will have a better chance in the future, I suggest.

At any rate, one of the problems I feel we have encountered in amending our rules is that there are stereotyped reactions to proposals. The opposition says, "This is a government move to expedite undesirable legislation", and they take that attitude toward it. In the United Kingdom, where the rules are so much tighter and there is much greater control over time in the House of Commons, there is very little difficulty on that score because the two major parties alternate in office and know that one or the other will either be in government or in opposition at some time in the future.

May I also point out that there have been changes in the rules which enable us to deal much more successfully, and with less risk, with omnibus bills—for example, the provisions now in the rules enabling us to bring matters back into the House at the report stage. This was not so easily done in the past. Prior to this rule change, bills were considered in committee of the whole. But as someone has pointed out, there is a great deal of difference between considering a bill in committee of the whole and voting upon it in the House. Nowadays, a member has the right to put down amendments at the report stage and these are voted on individually and a recorded vote is taken. This is why omnibus bills can be dealt with more effectively than they were in the past.

I could say a good deal more on this subject, Mr. Speaker, but I believe hon. members are familiar with the problem and the changes that have been made in our rules enabling us to deal with omnibus bills without risking the possibility of dealing with a whole series of unrelated matters in a single piece of legislation.

Another development that has occurred recently and which is reflected on the order paper is the introduction of a bill to deal with technical amendments of a non-controversial character. This will be, in the truest sense, an omnibus bill. It will deal with many, many statutes. I look upon this—and I think the House should, too—as a very great improvement in the procedures for dealing with legislation. I hope in the future it will avoid the necessity of bringing in a whole series of minor bills to correct technical errors.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the second part of this motion, which deplores the "obvious tendency to extend the scope of regulations under which pieces of legislation are to be implemented . . ." We are all aware of the increasing complexity of government. I should like to read to the House the opinion of one of the acknowledged experts on parliamentary procedure, Professor J. R. Mallory, who appeared before the special committee on statutory instruments on April 29, 1969. He put the problem forward in very clear language, and this is what he said:

> The development of delegated legislation is one of the things that is necessary in the kind of modern urban and highly technological society in which we live. But necessarily parliament itself does not have the time or the capacity to produce all of the regulations which are necessary for the regulation of living in modern conditions. It is more important that parliament should devote itself to the big questions and keep a constant and wary eye on major questions of policy.
> This, of course, was not in the beginning. At the time of confederation we lived in what is commonly called the night-watchman state. Nobody thought in those days that much regulation was necessary to protect the essential interests of the citizen. But now so much needs to be regulated to protect our health and welfare and safety because of the complexities of travel by air and sea and land, because of the need to develop provisions for the health and welfare of people under modern urban conditions. Also this kind of regulation by its nature requires very often rapid adjustment. We cannot live forever with a set of regulations about aircraft safety which were designed in 1918. We may have to change them with some rapidity. So that parliament simply has to delegate the power to make many regulations to subordinate bodies in the executive: ministers, government departments, the Governor in Council or some other kinds of Crown agencies.

That is the nature of the problem, Mr. Speaker. All of us who are members of parliament, including the government, may deplore the necessity to delegate in this way to ourselves, to our agencies and to other bodies the right to make subordinate legislation. But when we come to deal with practical issues that are facing us, we really have no other alternative.

● (1710)

That is why I believe the arrangement of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments and Regulations was a great step forward. First of all, it reinforces the government's own efforts to ensure that regulation is within the authority granted by parliament. Secondly, it does open the way for a review of what is done under this subordinate legislation.

As I have said, I thought this was a very useful suggestion made by the co-chairman of the committee, that there might be some new procedure developed which would enable a committee of this House, if not the House itself, to have a look at substantial measures enacted under regulatory authority.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, we now have a system whereby all orders that have legislative effect are tabled here in parliament, are automatically referred to the standing joint committee and are also published so the public can know what is being done. So we have established the machinery.

I do not think we in this House can ever be less than very wary of the extending power of government. We must always be very careful to ensure that it is this House of Commons which makes the ultimate decisions. I must say, however, that there is no way—indeed, even if all the rule changes I might favour as a member of the government to promote the reaching of decisions on government proposals were to be adopted—by which this parliament could avoid granting to the government delegated authority, because it could not legislate in time to deal with the changes that arise because of changing circumstances.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to enter this very high-level debate during which we shed our partisan clothes and look at this resolution of the Social Credit party on this opposition day, at the time when we are apparently pressed for time in dealing with more important matters facing parliament. I must admit, with the greatest deference to the Social Credit party, that I find some difficulty in interpreting the subtlety of the motion, particularly when the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) referred to the fact that the lead-off speaker for the Social Credit party had not been speaking with reference to the motion. My own interpretation and assessment of the motion leads me to the belief that there is virtually nothing which could be said in this House today that would not come within the ambit of the resolution. It is a very broad resolution indeed.

This is a resolution which deplores a tendency which I think any member who has any sensitivity toward this institution would have to assume is a downgrading of parliament and this institution. I say that without pointing the finger of accusation at this or any other government. It deplores the tendency to, in fact, abdicate our responsibilities as parliamentarians by accepting the suggestion far too often that we should delegate responsibility by way of regulation and by other orders to the civil service or members of the public service of Canada. This is one thing that certainly has impressed me in my short time as a member of parliament.

I have had what I suppose is the distinct pleasure and honour of serving on that Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments and Regulations, referred to many times by the President of the Privy Council. I like to mention on each occasion we have a debate relating to that committee that it was my initial impression that the whip of our party, who is now my seatmate, sent me there for the purpose of administering a form of punishment, in the belief that a new member had to go through his own form of purgatory by sitting and looking through the mounds and mounds of regulations and orders in council which are promulgated by the government from time to time.

I was rather interested, from that point of view, in determining what kind of experience we have had in Canada in respect of the enactment of regulations and statutory instruments. The information I have from the Canada Gazette, part II, indicates that during the period of years from 1972 to 1975 there have been a considerable number of regulations promulgated. To give the House some idea of the scope and the extent of this delegation of power under statute to officials of various departments, it is interesting to note, for example, that in 1972 there were no less than 580 regulations and statutory instruments published in the Canada Gazette. In 1973 the figure was 755; in 1974 there were 560, and in 1975 there were 780. This is a very substantial number of regulations for any government, let alone the government of Canada, to have promulgated.

This does not tell the whole story. The fact of the matter is that in addition to these documents which are published in the Canada Gazette there are, as yet, an undetermined number of orders passed which have the effect of regulations affecting the citizens of our country on a day to day basis.

As I indicated at the outset of my remarks, I think there should, and will be, on both sides of this House a general approval of what I perceive to be the intent of this resolution. It is not good enough for the President of the Privy Council to have pointed out that we have, in terms of parliamentary time, simply not enough opportunity to deal with the technical aspects of legislation, or that things are getting so complex in the society of this country that we have to turn over the responsibility of passing regulations to the bureaucrats, the civil servants and departmental officials. That is an oversimplification of the situation and an easy "out" for the government.

We must be extremely vigilant in parliament regarding this growing tendency which is a very easy way for government to deal with matters. We must try to encourage the government to propose legislation which has not just a skeleton or bare-bones outline of principle but, rather, gives us in some reasonable detail the kind of information we, as parliamentarians, require in order to make a proper assessment of the merits of the proposed legislation.

One of the prime and most important pieces of legislation we have dealt with in current days, it seems to me, was the legislation relating to the anti-inflation program and the Anti-Inflation Board. I do not want to go over that debate as the facts have been repeated on a number of occasions. However, I think this is a good example of the situation.

We now see the anti-inflation legislation in operation. The Anti-Inflation Board and its administrator have been given a mandate under the act. We find that parliament has effectively lost control of the anti-inflation program, with the exception of one or two instances where the government of the day feels inclined, for whatever reason, to give instructions to the board or the administrator. When this happens, the government does so as though it were infringing or impinging upon a god-given right of the Anti-Inflation Board.

The government seems to take the attitude that it wants to avoid any form of leadership in respect of decisions by that board, sort of removing itself from the political considerations that go into the decisions of the Anti-Inflation Board. It seems to me that in the legislation creating the Anti-Inflation Board we have a prime example of legislation that affects the vast majority of the people in this country and the country itself in terms of its future economy.

We find that although the bill consists of very few clauses, it contains an important clause relating to the ability of the governor in council to pass regulations to give effect to the over-all principle which is stated in, practically, one clause of the bill. It refers to the government's intention to fight inflation. It seems to me that this example and the resolution of the Social Credit party at this particular time, when we have had an opportunity to assess the work of the Anti-Inflation Board over a period of some months, at least gives us an opportunity to consider the direction in which we are moving in respect of this kind of legislation, and an opportunity to remind ourselves of the general alarm we all felt about the Prime Minister's statement about the end of the year in which he said we should continue to look at a new society with the idea that perhaps controls might be a way of life. We should take a second look at the situation on this basis and hope that we will be able to bring this concept to an end before the next election.

As I have said, I wish to keep this above partisan politics, so I mention that merely as a possibility. The fact of the matter is that there have been some fundamental changes in parliament over the years. I had the opportunity to work, not as a civil servant, as did the President of the Privy Council, but as an executive assistant in the government when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister. At that time I had an opportunity to observe the role of parliament and the role the opposition played in that whole scenario.

I recall that the government at that time had a majority consisting of 208 members. I believe there were something like 48 or 50 members of the official opposition. I remember very well the situation at that time. In those days there was a very fundamental prerogative of parliament which now has been removed. I refer to the whole question of supply. I remember when the ministers came down to the treasury benches, to pass their estimates, how concerned they were about having to face the opposition at that time because the opposition had the right to withhold the granting of supply until such time as answers were forthcoming from the ministers concerned.

Simply because I am a member of the opposition, I am not suggesting we should have any greater rights than the government. However, I suggest there is a role the opposition plays in the parliamentary system, although the idea apparently has now being given up of returning supply to the House and giving the House the ability to withhold the granting of supply. This idea of returning supply to the House is not a bad idea at all. We have had the experience of the past few weeks and months of seeing ministers delegate their ministerial responsibility.

I suggest to the government House leader and to members of the cabinet who are present today that some of the problems we have had may not have arisen if, in fact, supply had remained in the House and if, in fact, the ministers were not in a position to slough off their responsibilities. As I say, some of the problems we have had would not have occurred had we had supply in the House and an opportunity for the opposition to withhold supply by carrying on the debate. Of course, the opposition has a responsibility in this regard because of the need for supply to go forward at a certain time and because otherwise certain people might not be paid.

As I say, that is a responsibility which rests with the opposition. I suggest that the minister, at least, should be in the position of having to answer for the activities of his own department and not be in a position to slough off any part of that responsibility by saying he received improper or unreasonable advice from some poor career public servant.

I think it is unfair, as we saw today, for the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) to suggest that a public servant in his department, Mr. L. H. Stopforth, had given him wrong information. I wondered then, and I wonder now—aloud—whether it is good practice for a minister to get up and simply blame someone under his authority and have him moved to another position, as opposed to the minister taking the full responsibility for his department and suffering the consequences even to the extent of tendering his resignation if his department is not functioning.

I think we will pursue the whole question of ministerial responsibility on subsequent days, because it is not clear to me that the Minister of Supply and Services is completely fault-free in this regard. There are other circumstances which have come to our attention which indicate that the minister either did know or ought to have known the full circumstances of the LRPA negotiations and should not have used one of his civil servants as a scapegoat in order to avoid responsibility for his department.

As I say, I intend to deal with this motion on a non-political basis. I am sure hon. members opposite will agree that I am doing very well in this regard. I think our committee system, which is part of the over-all process of government, is relevant to the motion the Social Credit party has brought forward. One thing I have noticed since I have been here as a member of parliament is a tendency, which I do not recall being apparent at the time I was here previously as an executive assistant, of ministers not to appear even when their estimates were before the standing committees but, rather, to send their deputy ministers.

I notice that there also has been a tendency to send deputy ministers to field, and occasionally attempt to answer questions of policy. I think, first of all, we should take a look at this development in respect of our committee system. If we do not have supply in the House of Commons, I think at least the minister should appear at each committee meeting, without exception, to deal with matters of policy. If the hon. member opposite thinks it is an exception to the rule when ministers do not appear, I suggest that he look at the situation in respect of legislation. The tendency there is to have the deputy minister appear and answer questions concerning particular legislation. I could give an example of occasions before standing committees when a member of the public service has come in and has been asked questions relating to government policy or, as we refer to it euphemistically, departmental policy.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question? I have been very interested in this line or argument. My experience was that when I appeared they did not want me; they wanted the Clerk of the Privy Council. Does the hon. member support that point of view, or does he think it should just be the ministers?

● (1730)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I am glad the minister raised that interesting observation, because what I think should be the case, and what the practice is, are different. I think there should be consistency, and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) points out in very vivid form the defect in the course the government is following because the fact of the matter is—

Mr. Goodale: Inconsistent.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Inconsistent is the word, and I am glad the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) brought this word to my portfolio of ammunition for this particular point.

The fact is that the government has allowed deputy ministers to come forward and give evidence in these cases as a matter of practice, but in certain instances they have denied that right. The outstanding example was when the Prime Minister refused to let the equivalent of his deputy minister come forward. You cannot have it both ways, and I agree with the minister that when you open up the proposition that deputy ministers and civil servants are going to be speaking on behalf of the government, you should be consistent and have it right across the board. All I am saying is that we in parliament should give consideration to whether this is in accord with the parliamentary tradition we have in this country. Should we be allowing deputy ministers to answer on questions of policy, or should it be the strict responsibility, with some sanction attached, of the minister always to answer and to be advised by his civil servants and his deputy minister?

I simply pose that, not in a partisan manner, but simply to point out that the tendency, at least while I have been here, has been to have the civil servant appear before these committees, and I wonder aloud whether that is a good development as far as our parliamentary practice is concerned, and whether it does not lead to some of the questions with respect to ministerial responsibility which have arisen in question periods and in debate in this House over the past few months.

I want to endorse what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) yesterday with respect to another tendency of the government, to deal with matters without legislation and bills passing through this House. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre quite rightly brought to the attention of the House the question of Loto Canada. Whatever our point of view is with respect to that initiative and whether or not we are in favour of the way the government is proceeding, we in this House have been denied the right to speak about Loto Canada on the floor of the House or to deal with it other than by reference in a supplementary estimate to a standing committee.

Mr. Sharp: Or on a supply day.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: As I understand the Government of Canada, the cabinet gives leadership and the opposition tries to give constructive criticism. I suggest that the overriding responsibility of any government I know is to initiate legislation so that it can be considered by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and other opposition parties for the purpose of their giving constructive criticism. However, in this case a tendency which I do not appreciate has been followed with respect to Loto Canada. It has been a tendency to shove this particular initiative through the back door.

I see that you are moving to your feet, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion may I say that I appreciated the opportunity of participating in this debate, but I did want to make that one point with respect to Loto Canada. I would have thought the government would have had a sense of responsibility and leadership, and would have brought forward specific legislation so that we would know exactly what we were getting involved in and so that we could argue the merits of the case. Unfortunately we have been denied this right, and I think the Social Credit resolution, for that and other reasons, should be supported.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, anyone following this debate today without making reference to the motion which has been put down might not know what it is we are discussing. The amount of time which has been spent debating the actual terms of the resolution has certainly been at a minimum.

There are a few things I want to say which I think are related to the essence of the motion, but first I want to take three or four minutes as an individual member of parliament to protest very strongly against the attacks made in this House today on public servants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I not only resented those attacks, I also resented the amount of applause which came from government supporters across the way when those attacks were made. We were told that public servants treat members of parliament with ridicule, that they laugh at us, and that they tell us where we can go. I have been in this House of Commons for more years than any other member except one, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and I want to say that I have never been treated with discourtesy or lack of respect by any public servant. Like other members of parliament, I have a great many dealings with them. I write them letters, I call them on the telephone, and I go to see them.

An hon. Member: What about judges?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not telephone judges. If I telephoned a judge, I hope he would say something critical.

My friend, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), is sitting here. I pick him out because he is here, as he is so often, and I pay tribute to him for his attendance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He can be proud of his officials. As he heard me say in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs the other day, I think he has a tremendous staff in his department. I deal with them a great deal. I deal with the chairman of the Canada Pension Commission, with the chairman of the War Veterans Allowance Board, with the chairman of the Pension Review Board, with those who are charged with treatment services and with the Veterans Land Act and all the rest of it.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My namesake is echoing what I said: we get nothing but courtesy from them. They do not always grant us what we want or what we ask for, they cannot always accede to our requests, but they treat us with the utmost respect and courtesy.

I have the same multiplicity of dealings with the Department of National Health and Welfare, particularly on the pension side. I receive service and courtesy all the time. I could go on and speak of the Department of Labour and the Department of National Revenue, those tax people. Even those nasty tax collectors treat us with respect. I also deal with the Department of Manpower and Immigration, particularly the immigration side.

I will go on and say that I can remember that 25 or 26 years ago, when I was on a very important committee on social security, there was a relatively senior civil servant in the Department of Finance who was more or less attached to that committee. I do not know what he thought of some of my ideas—and if I may say so, we pushed our ideas at him until we won—but even that senior civil servant—they were civil then, not public—in the Department of Finance treated us with respect and courtesy, and he sits here today as the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp). In fact he has said things about me—not to me—since he has been a minister which he never said when he was a civil servant.

Mr. Goodale: He is right.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Which time?

Mr. Goodale: All the time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is a popular indoor sport to blast the public service, and I think we should remember this is one place where they do not have the chance to fight back or to defend themselves. I ask all hon. members, where would we get and how would we make any headway in our attempt to play the ombudsman role of representing our constituents if we did not have the help and co-operation of the Public Service of the Government of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1740)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad to have a fair amount of support from other members, but speaking for myself I want to pay tribute to our public servants. I said something else privately a moment ago and did not intend to say it publicly, but having got this far I might as well. On occasion some retired public servant will write me a letter and say that now he is retired he can say something he could not say when he was in the public service—that within his particular department they appreciated the way I presented my case and fought for my constituents. I tell that not just to put on the record a bouquet that has been given to me but to suggest that this is a two-way street. If we treat public servants as they deserve to be treated, they will give us service; but even if we do not treat them that way, they treat us with courtesy.

An hon. Member: What about members? What about respect?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sorry that my hon. friend has not understood me. That is exactly what I am saying—my experience is that the public servants treat members with respect and courtesy. I object to the tirades against them this afternoon.

Part of this motion has to do with the multiplicity of regulations, the amount of governing that has to be carried on in that way. I have the same concern as everybody else that there are too many regulations and that too much is done by way of order in council and regulations. But when you have an operation as gigantic as that required to govern 22 million or 23 million people, an operation that is carried on by 250,000 or more public servants, you cannot settle every last detail in this Chamber. You have to delegate some of the authority to make some of those decisions.

That leads me to say that I think one of the most important statements made this afternoon was that made by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) about the way we use our time in this House of Commons. It is a plain fact that we cannot deal with everything. That being the case, I hope we may yet come to the point where we can use our time to deal with the most important things, the major issues of policy. Let us deal with them here on the floor of this Chamber. The ministers should be responsible to this House, but let us face the fact that details will have to be worked out at the administration level. As the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants pointed out, that means we must find some way of coping with the problem of time.

The President of the Privy Council and others can turn up certain pages of Hansard and show where at times I have resisted the government's attempts to impose closure or the use of Rule 75C. I simply say to them that my aim is that we come to a means whereby we can co-operatively decide on the use of our time. What I cannot accept is one side saying how we should use our time. To me that is closure or dictatorship. We must have enough sense on both sides of the House to plan the use of our time so that we do not waste it in great lengthy debates on unimportant issues, and thus deny ourselves the right to debate issues that are really important.

I have said that I think a government should tell us at the start of a session what its total program is. The government pretty well does that now, except when it keeps the session going for two years. Then we have lost track of the beginning of things. Having given us the list of what is to come before us, then the opposition parties should have the right to pick four or five items on which we want unlimited time. In return we should agree that there are 10, 15 or 20 items that are so routine they ought not to have debate in the House at all but should go to second reading committees, consideration in committee, and even third reading outside of the House, and in between the very crucial issues and the relatively unimportant ones there are issues to which we could give some maximum time limit.

The purpose of this is not to accommodate the government—although the government is always seeking accommodation—but to accommodate parliament so that we have time to deal with the major issues and not feel, as is being expressed so many times today, that we do not get at the issues and that therefore the public servants are doing things by administrative methods, getting orders in council and regulations and so on. There are times they have no option. When matters have to be dealt with and cannot get on the floor of parliament, the administration has to go up through the deputy ministers and ministers to try to get something done. I want to commend the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants for his suggestion, and I hope the House will take it seriously.

The third thing I had intended to speak on has already been mentioned by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), and I do not quarrel with his having done so. I suspect that he might not be as opposed to state lotteries as I am. I shall put my cards on the table—if that is the proper phrase when speaking of lotteries.

I do not believe we should have a national lottery at all, but apart from where we stand on that basic principle, surely we must all accept the fact that this Loto Canada, especially if it is for all time—and I have a suspicion that is what will happen—but even if it is for three years, is a totally different way of raising funds than the parliament of Canada has ever authorized. It is a form of taxation, in my view; it is not levied according to ability to pay, it is levied according to the instinct for gambling, the desire to win something for nothing. The result is that the tax bears heaviest on the poor.

The first time this parliament of Canada goes in for that method of raising public funds we are doing something pretty crucial. For it to be done in a way other than the standard practice of a bill that comes into parliament, has second reading debate, committee debate, and third reading, is scandalous. For the minister to say there can be debate in the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates is begging the question; to say that the opposition can bring it back on an opposition day—since when does the government get out from its responsibility to bring its measures before parliament?

What happens is that the government wants this; the government is boss; the government is king; the government is God. It wants Loto Canada, and it sees it is not going to get it by the end of June through the normal process of bringing in a bill so it brings in a supplementary estimate, shifts it to committee, and knows through the way things have been working this month that come the end of June it will be back here in a supply bill and we will not have a word of discussion about it on the floor of the House of Commons. Mr. Speaker, I submit that is playing fast and loose with the way this place ought to operate.

That is all I want to say today. At first I was not even sure I would take part in the debate. The wording in the motion seemed a bit obscure to me, and as the debate got going I was not sure what it was all about. But I did feel I had to answer the charges against the Public Service, and to emphasize again, as the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants has done, the importance of our coming to grips with the problem of how we use our time.

I also want to protest again the way in which the government is bypassing the normal processes of parliament with respect to a change in the methods of raising money—a change which I think is very sad.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

[Translation]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise at the beginning of this debate, at least I thought it would be the beginning, but of course there have been unexpected interventions. I simply would like to state that I disagree with the last remarks by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who said that indeed the motion was ambiguous and left much to be desired.

At the beginning I tended to share his opinion but as I was preparing my contribution to this debate, it became more and more apparent to me that the Social Credit Party had spread a very large net which might include a series of comments such as those which were made by all the hon. members who took part in this debate.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Social Credit Party for giving us the opportunity to present our views on the operation of the House and the relationships between the diverse parts of Parliament, that is to say the political and administrative aspects of our institutions.

[English]

I take issue, as well, with the hon. member's comments relating to Loto Canada. If, as was suggested by the opposition House leader, an understanding could have been reached whereby we would debate a bill for a limited time while remaining fully conscious of the time limitation we face, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre might not have found it necessary to make the comments he made this afternoon.

In presenting legislation affecting this summer's Olympic Games the government has been badly served. Hon. gentlemen opposite will recall that after the 1972 election we debated—the hon. member was not present but he will recall the publicity—bills providing for coins and stamps. Hon. members opposite agreed that that legislation was essential, that it represented the federal government's minimum contribution to the success of this summer's Olympics. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated that it was the extent of the contribution we were to make. It was recognized that our contribution would be ancillary, not direct, and that that would help with the financing of the Olympic Games. But by keeping the legislation in committee for an unreasonable period while saying they approved it, the opposition impeded passage.

It is recognized now, in light to the present day situation, that the Loto Canada provision will do no more than continue for three years a system which has been working and in place for two years.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But not at the federal level.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: And that is the big difference.

Mr. Blais: Effectively, the legislation will establish a national lottery, which will do no more than continue the system which has been in place for two years. We are seeking start-up funds, and the minister introduced the measure in a way the hon. member finds objectionable. I point out that the measure will be debated in the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee and, as in the past, action could be taken to permit the appropriation bill to be debated in the House. This could be done through a special House order. There is nothing to stop that happening. It has already been done during the present session.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question? Does the hon. member suggest that, any time the government is in trouble because the opposition does not agree to something, it can deal with the matter with a supplementary item in the estimates?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with this summer's Olympics. The Olympics will take place this coming summer. As the government House leader has already said, the government would like the House to adjourn by June 30. The Olympics will begin in July. It is recognized that we are dealing with a matter of considerable urgency. If it were presented in the form of a bill, we know on the basis of experience based on other legislation that the opposition could use the fact that the government wishes to adjourn as a lever by which to prevent passage of the legislation and to achieve such other things as it deems appropriate. The government, in accordance with its own responsibilities, has chosen not to pursue that particular course of action.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So you did it the wrong way.

Mr. Blais: The opposition can incite public opinion against the legislation as much as it wishes. I merely say that the government has chosen a particular method of proceeding, and is acting in accordance with its executive prerogative. Surely the last judgment must reside in the Canadian people.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Give us a chance.

Mr. Blais: You will have a chance.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: When?

Mr. Blais: I made my first point. I come to my second point. I take issue with something the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) said. He suggested that a practice has developed in committee hearings whereby civil servants enter the meetings and make declarations on policy. Mr. Speaker, with respect, I have attended more committees than the hon. gentleman has, and have participated in committee meetings more than most hon. members of this House but I have never seen a member of the Public Service even try to make a declaration of policy. I fail to see why, in his partisan speech, the hon. member would make such unfounded allegations.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I will give you chapter and verse.

Mr. Blais: As is evident from the hon. member's question addressed to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), the hon. member fails to see the inconsistency of his position. He wondered if the Clerk of the Privy Council could appear before the committee studying the Privy Council estimates. No doubt the hon. member wanted the clerk to make policy submissions. But the President of the Privy Council quite properly said, "Look, I am here. I am the President of the Privy Council, and I am responsible for the Privy Council. Therefore direct your questions about my department's estimates to me." But that did not satisfy hon. members opposite. They wanted the public servant to appear. Mr. Speaker, they can't suck and whistle at the same time. When the hon. member was an ordinary backbencher I might have excused that kind of comment, even though it would have been irresponsible. Now the hon. member has been appointed to a responsible position and I therefore ask him to refrain from making such statements, and to be consistent. May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Translation]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, as I said before supper, the motion presented by the Social Credit Party of Canada was in fact motivated by their frustration in the face of bureaucracy.

As a matter of fact, they situated the problem within the parliamentary context and stated that backbenchers, which they all are, had serious problems whenever they wanted to discharge their responsibilities as ombudsmen, law-makers and spokesmen for their constituents. I feel justified in discussing this question, Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) has shifted the debate in that direction. I admit that there are rather serious frustrations and that the number of civil servants has increased quite significantly since World War II.

Of course, it has become obvious from the questions they put on the Order Paper, that the members of the Social Credit party are really anxious to see that their constituents avail themselves of all the programs. Of course, they are aware, as I am, and as are all hon. members, that there has been an increase in the federal programs of assistance to the electors. I need only mention the LIP projects, old age security benefits, family allowances, and subsidies to the farmers. I could spend hours listing them. Of course, such achievements require a substantial increase in the number of civil servants.

Actually, some way must be found to monitor those people more efficiently. I recognize, as do the other hon. members, that means are already available by which the House may monitor the bureaucracy and the executive. One need only mention the method used here, that is, questions that are put on the order paper. This year, Mr. Speaker, over 5,642 of them were put on the order paper. Improvements are necessarily needed. But the information used can help hon. members in their questions to the ministers, either here in the House or in the committees of the House.

It is obvious that if in answer to a question an hon. member is satisfied to be told how much money has been spent in his riding, he will not have enough information to be able to ask intelligent questions. There is also another way. Hon. members may submit a notice of motion for the production of papers. This would yield additional details which could be used when hon. members put questions to ministers and officials in committees. But members of the Social Credit Party of Canada must recognize that they should take a more active part in the Committees of the House, because that is where things happen, where hon. members can get relevant information from officials.

The first point raised by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau), which I consider the most important, relates to the lack of a codification system in public administration. I agree entirely on this point; there is a gap and we should remedy this situation immediately. As you know, the Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is now sitting. I shall appear before this committee tonight at 8.30 p.m. This committee is responsible for producing or suggesting to the government the legislation to be introduced.

I think a portion of this legislation should provide directly for the obligation for the government to codify their services, to offer a reference source to those people who want to know where to ask not only for information but for services.

Thus the hon. members of the Social Credit Party of Canada think that this codification should concern the Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, while they are not regarded as that much important. Mr. Speaker, the second point raised by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) relates to television. The members of the Social Credit Party of Canada consider that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) on a point of order.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member. He said that our representative did not very often attend the meetings of the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. I would like to point out to him that Mr. Laprise was our representative on that committee, and as we all know, Mr. Laprise had been seriously ill and unable to attend all meetings.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I readily admit that Mr. Laprise has been ill and I do not want my remark to reflect on him in any way. All I want to say is that there are means which members of parliament may resort to in order to have the situation improved. I am willing to help things improve. I invite the members of the Social Credit party of Canada to make their own contribution.

I will now deal with the introduction of television into this House, Mr. Speaker. The member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) has indicated,—and I can very well understand—that he was offended by the fact that, on budget night everything was happening outside the House while we, were here listening to the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). Indeed, our contribution was quite small, if not nil. I object to that. I think it is not fair that we, as elected representatives of the people, had to sit in this House to listen to a speech which lasted 90 minutes while in fact the press was already informed of all the content of the budget in order to broadcast this information over television.

I suggest to members of the Social Credit party that they too support the measure to introduce television in the House because if indeed our proceedings and debates were on television, this question would be at most an abstract question and we would wonder what to do with the press since everything obviously would be reported from the House. There would be no more need of a lock-up, or to hold interviews outside the House during the budget speech since everything would be done inside the Parliament. Of course—

● (2010)

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Oh, go on! You think they would listen for 90 minutes?

Mr. Blais: I can see why there is such a negative reaction on the opposite side. Looking at their pusses day in and day out I can understand why the electorate of Canada would never wish to elect again such poor figures.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, to conclude, all I wish to say is that, obviously, things should be improved in this House but I am not one of those who say that the House of Commons is losing some of the importance it used to have. It is not true. The Canadian public is already better informed, more interested and is asking for still more information. People want to know what is happening in this House. They want to get the information we can supply them.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, we must use the means at our disposal and let them know what we do in this House. It is not just a matter of using telephone, newspaper, and television facilities outside the House; but we should also use electronics in the House to convey to the population at large the information that is requested from us.

An hon. Member: To the public at large.

Mr. Blais: As for those who think that actually the House of Commons is no longer interesting, they are totally wrong, Mr. Speaker, since the major part of the federal government's business is carried on in this House and the major decisions made by the government are echoed here. It is also here in this House that the government replies to the accusations brought by the opposition and it is here that we account to the country for the management of the public affairs of Canada. All I ask the members of the opposition is to admit that the best way to let people know what happens in this House is to use the method acknowledged by everyone as the most sophisticated, the most advanced information media, that is television.

[English]

I wish to thank members of the Social Credit Party for giving the House the opportunity to engage in such a wide-ranging debate. I am sure no two members have talked about the same issue since we began this afternoon. It shows the importance of the place this House holds not only for the members of parliament within its precincts but for the electorate generally and all Canadian citizens wherever they may be.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate and to have the opportunity to congratulate my hon. colleague for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) for presenting this motion.

I would like also to thank all hon. members who have spoken so far for taking the trouble of learning more about the procedures and orders of this House. I would like in addition to reassure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Center (Mr. Knowles) that, in my humble opinion, the motion put forth by my colleague for Shefford was not intended to blame civil servants but rather to draw the attention of the government on some of the powers of bureaucracy. I for one can vouch for the honesty, sincerity and devotion of most if not all federal civil servants. Besides, the remarks I intend to make shortly will not aim at blaming civil servants but rather the present government and the preceding ones, which, in my view, gave far too much latitude to some high officials.

This being said, Mr. Speaker, the question that i would like to raise now is who is leading Canada, who is conducting the affairs of the country?

In general, I think it is not difficult to admit that senior officials and bureaucrats are now managing the business of our beautiful and big country, either by interpreting our legislation according to their views or sometimes by passing the legislation which they consider more convenient.

As all members of the House know very well, since 1969 the Parliament in Ottawa has had a committee whose duty is to consider all regulations. It is usually called the Joint Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. Its duty is to review all regulations normally called "delegated legislation" to make sure that regulations are not contrary to the British common law. By the way, I must say that I am not altogether against regulations, but the fact is that when those regulations are drafted by bureaucrats, they should come to the House so that the legislators might compare the regulations and the legislation and, if the former sometimes take precedence of the latter, the legislators should have the power to correct them.

We must find out whether those regulations do not actually violate the British common law, the Bill of Rights or the intent of the statutes themselves under which they are enacted, because their contents may never go beyond the terms of reference stated in the delegating statutes. Therefore it may be considered that in some way the so-called "delegated legislation" is also "subordinate legislation".

In 1969, the committee headed by Mark MacGuigan, member for Windsor-Walkerville, made an inquiry into that matter. I would like to show, through statistical data, the numerical importance of the process of delegating authority. To illustrate, I shall quote from the report by the House committee that inquired on that subject in 1969, concerning the extent of regulatory powers delegated to the federal Civil Service:

> The administrative authorities and their staffs play an important role in the preparation of the statutes enacted by Parliament itself, since that vast majority of legislative proposals originate in the Administration. However, it is also now commonplace for the Administration to make laws directly, without having to observe the complex but safeguarding rules of parliamentary procedure.
> Four hundred and twenty of the 601 Acts of Parliament examined by the Committee (constituting substantially all of the statutes now in force) provide for delegated legislation. Moreover, a substantial majority of the answers given to question No. 2 of the Committee's questionnaire stated that statutory powers to make regulations have been used very extensively.
> The following statistics confirm this impression: 6,892 regulations covering 19,972 pages were published in the Canada Gazette during the period from January 1, 1956, to December 31, 1968, an average of 530 regulations a year. This does not take into account those regulations which are expressly exempted from publication and also some documents which are perhaps in fact of a legislative nature but are not officially considered to be so by the regulation-making authority.

So during the past 22 years, 6,892 regulations were published in the Canada Gazette, included in the unbelievable number of 19,972 pages of the publication. Let there be no amazement if I state that most of those regulations covering a number of fields have been and still are in force unless abolished or superseded by others, without ever coming before Parliament.

I remember a few particulars: in 1969, 638 regulations were passed; in 1970, 540 regulations; in 1971, 656; in 1972, 564; in 1973, 729; in 1974, 676; in 1975, 709; and up to May 12, 1976, 291 regulations were passed. In all, since 1969, 4,803 regulations were passed for the federal administration, 600 per year on average in the past eight years. As far as Quebec is concerned, it is felt that there are as many.

Indeed, excluding the numerous municipal by-laws in force at the present time, the following data taken from au article by Mr. Raoul Barbe in the Revue du Barreau, on page 386, give some indication of the quantitative significance of the phenomenon of delegated authority, and I quote:

> The development of the rule of law by the excutive is an important source of law, since in 1972, there were some 1,400 pages of legislation while the regulations covered over 3,000 pages of the size of the Quebec Official Gazette. (A) search has permitted the consolidation of some 950 regulatory texts (in effect in 1972) covering nearly 8,000 pages and published in 10 volumes known as the Legislation Implementation Regulations.
> About 450 regulatory texts are approved annually by the Executive Council and about 150 regulatory texts are approved by other regulatory authorities: either a minister, the Treasury Board or a regulatory board.

Now, after demonstrating the quatitative importance of regulatory power delegation, I would like to show the qualitative importance of this delegation of powers by using an example taken from the War Measures Act which reads as follows:

> (1) The Governor in Council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may by reason of the existence of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it is hereby declared that the powers of the Governor in Council extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated, namely, (a) censorship and the control and suppression of publications, writings, maps, plans, photographs, communications and means of communication; (b) arrest, detention, exclusion and deportation; (c) control of the harbours, ports and territorial waters of Canada and the movements of vessels; (d) transportation by land, air, or water and the control of the transport of persons and things; (e) trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture; (f) appropriation, control, forfeiture and disposition of property and of the use thereof.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I believe that we should urgently get involved in this area, as we are being invaded by bureaucrats.

The Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments I referred to earlier came to the conclusion, to nobody's surprise, I think, that a great many pieces of legislation do not proceed from legislators but from senior officials, bureaucrats who earn $30,000, $40,000 and $50,000 a year. Mind you, I have nothing against such salaries.

Mr. Speaker, only Parliament can pass laws, but they are so vague that for the ordinary citizen, the noble disign of the elected representatives is very often less important than the restrictive regulations established by officials hanging out in their ivory tower of Tunney's Pasture or Wellington Street, or elsewhere in the national capital.

Before going any further, I would like to quote from a speech made by the hon. Guy Favreau, former federal Minister of Justice, on January 11, 1965, before the Lawyers' Club in Toronto and entitled: The State, the Citizens and the Ombudsman:

> Our laws are more and more like preambles. The detailed provisions remain to be drafted and amended at will by public service experts.

You know no doubt that quite often the law authorizes bureaucrats to make regulations. At first, the regulations seem less formidable than the statutes in general, but it can be said that the difference lies more in the words than in reality. The great majority of regulations passed by this House are in effect and quite simply because they can be enforced by officers or still by the court. I would like to give a rather concrete example, more specifically section 172, 4(b) of the unemployment insurance regulations. Unemployed are divided into three categories—unfortunately one is excluded, and I refer to farmers. That regulation provides that 50 per cent of the farmer's net income is deemed to be gains, even if his operations are in a deficit position. I think that is illogical and unfair, and I do not think this is what the legislator had in mind. In any event, that is not what I had in mind, I can assure this House.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the purpose of today's motion is not to deny the necessity for the government's regulatory action because, in the first place, it is readily admitted that Parliament does not have time to draft all regulations that become law, on the one hand, because Parliament does not have the technical knowledge and, on the other hand, because it does not have the flexibility and the capability to make quick and wise decisions. Suffice it to think only of two bills now being considered, Bills C-83 and C-84, to realize that it takes sometimes two, three or four months to consider a bill.

No, Mr. Speaker, this motion is aimed rather against the huge volume of regulations and particularly the dangers inherent in that legislative effort. Consequently, I would like to refer to the third report of the House of Commons Special Committee on Statutory Instruments, dated 1969, that is the MacGuigan's report which reads as follow:

> The more fundamental of the criticisms can be summarized as follows: the parliamentary tendency to enact statutes in skeleton form, leaving the "details" to be filled in by regulations—such regulations being often the very matters that are of most importance to the citizen; uncertainty in enabling statutes as to the extent of the area regulations are intended to cover; sweeping or subjective terms used in enabling acts which exclude the judicial control of the regulations made under their authority; lack of public debate, and inadequate consultation of all interested parties before the making of the regulations; lack of precision in the form and content of the regulations; inadequate publicity given to the regulations . . .

In other words, not much publicity. There may be some about legislation but when it comes to regulations nobody even hear about them. I continue to quote:

> . . . inadequate publicity given to the regulations after they are made; inadequate parliamentary control over the regulations; and the danger that civil servants may be transformed into our masters.

As a matter of fact, it is possible that the great activity of the government could have serious consequences and in saying this, I think of the fact that bureaucrats could one day direct the people they are supposed to serve.

Mr. Speaker, what is the percentage of regulations which are passed by high officials and which are sent to committee? In fact, I cannot answer that question now but I would be very surprised if there were many. In my humble opinion, the regulations are the servants of the laws and they should not receive more consideration than their masters. I sincerely think that the government must in the future submit to Parliament all the regulations drawn up by the bureaucrats so that the hon. members may get acquainted with them and debate them as openly as possible before they are enforced.

At present, the civil servants are rather more responsible for the government of our country than the representatives whose role is consequently less and less important. The civil servants have the opportunity and full discretion to draw up regulations which are often inconsistent with the spirit of the laws adopted by Parliament. Once again, I sincerely think that the present government must take all the necessary corrective measures so that members of Parliament will no longer suffer from the interference of civil servants, I mean the bureaucrats, and also to restore to them all the dignity they deserve.

Another point draws my attention, namely the various committees which are created. What is the real use of the hundreds of committees which are supposedly created to solve the various economic and social problems? Their only use is to spend the money of the people as a reward for the privileged classes of the present system. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is unbelievable to see the slump in which all the classes of our society find themselves. For example, in Quebec, it is not by setting up all kinds of committees that the future of Quebecers is going to be decided, because if we consider one moment the seriousness of these committees, of the inquiries launched by governments, we note that it is only an orgy of spending, of useless redtape, a waste of human energy, and all these committees cost millions of dollars. And with what result? Those who pay the bill would like to know!

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak about the staggering increase in the number of civil servants in Canada in the last few years. Before World War, I, around the turn of the century, the Canadian government employed an army of 23,000 public servants or so who were responsible for the administration of our beautiful country. A few years later, during World War I, it could be noted readily that the number of public servants had doubled, which was understandable since the country was going through a national crisis, and insurrection. But, since that time, one realizes that the population of Canada has more than trebled but beyond that, we can see as well that the strength of the public service, except perhaps—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: I want to thank my colleagues for granting me a few more minutes. I will try to be brief, Mr. Speaker.

I was saying that we note as well that the strength of the public service, except perhaps for Crown corporations, is made up of 300,000 people, that is an increase of 1200 per cent or so.

Mr. Speaker, surely it is during World War I that Canada has witnessed the fastest increase in this area—there were then approximately 46,000 public servants. Some time later, around the end of World War I, the number of public servants which was, as I have just said, about 46,000, had come down to about 40,000.

Thereafter, it has been noted that the strength of the public service remained constant until World War II. As soon as this one broke out in 1939, the number of public servants more than tripled, while continuing later on to show an upward trend.

But it must recognized, Mr. Speaker, that it is under the administration of former Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson, for whom I have always had a lot of respect, that the federal state in which we are living has taken the most new initiatives and that the growth of the public service as such has shown the highest rate.

Besides, it is easy to realize when we know that Canada has now at her service about 1,200,000 Canadian civil servants, that is one worker out of eight or 12 per cent of the labour force. How much does it cost the state in salaries and annual payments? Around $10 billion a year or almost 13 per cent of our gross national product. One can say therefore that government is the sector of the economy with the fastest growth. One cannot deny the fact that governments, whether at the municipal, provincial or federal level, is one of the most important tools in our country and is easily competing with the service sector, the manufacturing industries and so on.

When the right hon. Prime Minister came to power in 1968, the total number of civil servants was 50 per cent more than what it was in 1960. Then, in 1969, when the Trudeau government was fighting inflation, our Prime Minister promised the country to reduce the number of public servants by 24,000, or about 10 per cent. Once again, in its usual manner, the federal government broke its promise and after a whole year, it barely managed to eliminate 535 jobs, or one-fifth of its original objective. Later on, one could see that the public service had rapidly regained the lost ground.

Mr. Speaker, we are not in a state of national crisis and we wonder why the red tape is taking as much expansion as if we were in war time? According to University of Toronto Professor Richard Bird who had the opportunity to study these questions for the Canadian Association of Fiscal Studies, this constant race would be the consequence of pressures or of the tolerance of the public who demands more and more services from the government, influenced by politics or by officialdom. But does the Canadian taxpayer who demands more and more services from his government realize that he is thus putting himself in a position where he has to pay more taxes?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the subject chosen tonight by the Social Credit party of Canada. There was a time when the Social Credit Party of Canada would speak only on the monetary question. Perhaps this choice shows a new maturity, a new skill in the House or again perhaps a closer link with the Progressive Conservative party? I do not know.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: But I am a little surprised at the choice because it seems to me there were such excellent choices. I would have thought perhaps the Social Credit party might have chosen the common fund, for example, which is a monetary question and we could have had paraded before us this evening the unedifying spectacle of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) being dragged silently screaming, commodity by commodity, digging his heels at every commodity, into the common fund of the Third World, protesting all the time that that is what he really intended to do from the beginning. Or perhaps we could have had a resolution on the special drawing rights being discussed at the UNCTAD Conference at Nairobi and the special drawing rights in relation to the Third World because that, Mr. Speaker, is the closest thing to social credit the world has seen since Mr. Aberhart printed his own script in Alberta.

There are other areas that might have made a choice for the Social Credit party this evening. On the other hand, they have proposed this interesting motion that finds highly deplorable the attitude the government has demonstrated by taking advantage of its majority to draft many of its bills in such a way that different matters are dealt with in a single text. That I would submit, although unusual perhaps coming from that direction in the House, nevertheless is a problem for us all and one that deserves our attention this evening. I think the members of the Social Credit party have done us a service this evening by putting the finger on a problem which is not only a parliamentary problem but one which has widespread ramifications for the Canadian public.

I should like to mention, not bill by bill, a few of the topics which have been so-called omnibus bills. We had a bill on abortion and I think the public saw it as that, but it contained a number of other things as well. After it was passed I think many citizens were surprised by some of the other things that were removed from the criminal law, or placed in it, through the passage of that omnibus bill.

More recently we had a bill which at the same time combined rape and bail. It had an interesting passage through the House. I do not think the two subjects were served equally by their inclusion in the same bill. I should like to refer to the bill on citizenship which was not really an omnibus bill although it presented some of the same problems, because while it removed sex discrimination it also reduced the waiting period for citizenship. I know some members who were opposed to the second of the two clauses in the bill were criticized for holding up some very worth-while legislation to remove sex discrimination which has been on imposition on women in this country for many years.

One of the most flagrant and the most recent is the bill known to the public as the gun control bill, but known to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) as the bill on peace and security. While I do not wish to renew the debate on that bill which has been passed on to committee, nevertheless I might say that this relates to the subject of the motion. The problem that besets not only the House but the public is that the bill dealt with such disparate subjects as gun control, wiretapping, and dangerous offenders, all in the same omnibus bill.

There is a lack of clarity in the public's conception about what is happening in the House and what is before the House. I am quite sure that when the gun control bill is out of the way a good many people will wonder when if ever did parliament deal with wiretapping and dangerous offenders. There will be a sense that somehow those important parts of the omnibus bill did not receive the sort of treatment they should have, because one part absconded with all of the attention.

It is terribly important—and here again I think the Social Credit people have done us a service—that in the legislative process the public not see something as having been traded off for something else. Yet increasingly this is the perception. It is not a very flattering perception either of the government's ability to draw up legislation or of the way this Chamber should function. Never has the trade-off been so blatant as in Bill C-83. One would have a suspicion that the government, having tried omnibus bills a few years ago and finding that they work, has been using them increasingly until it has realized that it could get passed through this House something that would not normally pass this legislative body by combining it with enough other factors, with enough other issues. It would seem that the government realized that in this way it would be carried along because there would be a reluctance on the part of members to seem to oppose some rather worthwhile bits of legislation.

There is another thing I should like to mention as well, that is, the certainty that parliament has passed the unpopular part, that when one part receives too much attention then there is a losing sight of the fact that the other went through as well. One of the problems the Canadian public has at the present time is the sense that what is the law of the land did not seem to have been observed going through parliament, and yet was carried along in the wake of some popular items.

The real question always remains, do we really learn the will of parliament when it is confronted with four, five, or six highly different items in the same bill? Each of the items is defended by the government in committee, and although the government House leader talks about the opportunities which present themselves at the report stage to amend, I have found that by the time the government has shepherded its bill through second reading and through committee stage there is a fierce determination that no further change shall take place at the report stage. I think the government House leader is suggesting something really quite illusory, almost as much of an illusion as that which was presented to us a short time ago by the deputy House leader when he talked about television in a way which was irresponsible at worst and terribly funny at best, when we consider the role of that technological marvel in North America at the present time.

This situation is particularly abhorrent when the government has a majority. There may be some excuse for this practice during minority governments. Some of the legislation which was discussed was put through in minority situations, but if the government has a majority I think it has a responsibility to present legislation which is clear cut, to defend it, and to see that it moves through parliament. The responsibility then is where it should lie.

The government House leader said the government should take responsibility for its actions, and I say "Amen" to that. Of course it should, but if it were really accepting the responsibility it would separate some of these items and put them through on their own merits instead of putting them through with something else.

Let us consider, for example, the amendments to the Criminal Code which dealt with rape and bail. The hole in the Bail Reform Act was so appalling and the things which were happening as a result of people charged with murder obtaining bail, and of people charged with drug offences being able to go out on bail to continue their trade, were so appalling that there was a great need for a rapid movement of that legislation through parliament.

However, with regard to the section on rape I have a feeling it did not get the full and complete treatment it should have had, and having sat last weekend in Nanaimo and listened to some women's delegations there I know that they are not happy with the law on rape as it now stands. I think it is unfortunate that in order to plug one hole with a desperately needed amendment something else was moved through which will now remain on the books for quite a few years as rather bad law. This is one of the penalties the government and the country pay for this kind of preparation of bills.

No more clearly is this evidenced than in Bill C-83. I attended a meeting about a month and a half ago at Invermere, and the large public gathering there voted unanimously to urge that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) separate the gun control sections from the rest of that bill. I passed that on to the Minister of Justice, and he replied saying that Bill C-83 as a whole is aimed at protecting the public against violent crime and that as legislators we cannot present one bill for law abiding citizens and another bill for the criminally inclined. That was not at all the request at the public meeting to which I referred.

They asked clearly, as this party did through the efforts of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), that the gun control section simply be removed so that it would not be discussed along with wiretapping and dangerous offenders legislation, and so that parliament could deal with that one main issue free from the responsibility of the other two or more sections in that omnibus bill dragging along at the same time. We know from the furore those sections stirred up across the country that the public was very much in favour of having them separated. It does not matter what else happens to Bill C-83; it will always be known as the gun control bill. The words of the minister were particularly ironic because the bill does have something to do with law abiding citizens because they are being asked to bear an added load for the sake of the criminally inclined. Put together with Bill C-84, in a double back-to-back package, the situation becomes almost intolerable.

I think it would be better if the ministers would caution themselves and prepare pieces of legislation which are more specific. I feel that in the end it would shorten debate in this House rather than lengthen it. There are some bills—for example, the revision of the Bank Act—which will be before us in a year or so—which are enormous in themselves, and not much can be done about that, but it makes little sense to load up the legislative docket with maxi bills which contain so many clauses that many of them are almost lost sight of as they move through the House.

With regard to regulations, hon. members from the Social Credit party also have a point because too much is dealt with in this way. An example is Bill C-83. We members of parliament have to go out and talk to the public about such bills. We are asked how much it will cost, how often it will be applied, whether it will be varied according to the weapon, and what will be meant by due care in locking these things up. If we members of parliament over and over again have to say we don't know and that we will have to wait until the regulations come out, eventually this institution will begin to look a little ill informed generally, and we will again run into a problem which results from the approach to legislation which has been used far too much already and is being used too much in this parliament right now.

Examples of legislation which have to be separated are the redistribution bills and the Canada Elections Act. I am sure if this were not laid down by long practice and tradition, the government would have lumped the Canada Elections Act and the redistribution bills all together, along with several other items. If the government could have rounded this up in time, put it together and presented it all as one great mess to this parliament, it would have done so, but by the very nature of the redistribution bills and the process which has been traditionally used, this has to be dealt with province by province, and certainly that marvellously clarifies the debate on that rather far reaching move.

I think a service would have been done to parliament and to the country if several of the recent omnibus bills had been divided into their separate clauses and dealt with as individual bills, certainly none more so than Bill C-83. We know that it was only through the strongest protests from this side of the House that we did not get one single bill dealing with the abolition of capital punishment, the extension of prison sentences, gun control, wiretapping, and dangerous offenders. It was not planning on that side that sorted it out but only a fierce determination on this side that the abolition of capital punishment at least should go. Even then, it was sadly messed up, and as we debate it now on second reading we see the government was not prepared to put it as a central issue.

Again the government weakened and succumbed to the temptation to trade it off for the greatly lengthened prison sentences that are of concern to many serious thinking people in this country. Even there, Mr. Speaker, it was a clouding of what should have been a very simple, very straightforward bill on one topic and one topic only.

I congratulate the members of the Social Credit party—in a way they surprised me but did not displease me in presenting this motion to the House. This is a problem to which I hope the government will pay a little more attention. One thing is for sure, as long as this sort of general untidiness is presented to this House then televising the whole mess will not improve it in any way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I think this is an interesting resolution. It condemns the government in its majority position for producing bills that are not conducive to the understanding of hon. members.

The first thing we should do, if anybody is serious about this, is examine the bills produced in the last minority parliament and compare them with bills produced in this and the previous majority parliament. If we did we would find that the form of the bills and the content were not changed at all. Basically the same kinds of faults are found in bills produced in either a minority or majority situation. It seems to me, if you make the effort to look at the quality of the bills, it must be something deeper that causes bills to be written in such a way as to give rise to this motion and debate. I submit there are indeed a number of pressures at work which cause bills to be written in the way they are.

Without any difficulty at all I think one can identify at least five different kinds of bills. The first I would categorize as those which establish something new, something we did not have before. An example would be the creation of Petro-Canada or the Petroleum Administration Act. The first establishes a new institution and the other sets up the mechanism for an administrative tribunal.

The second kind are those which I would classify as amending acts. We have had a number of those in this parliament, perhaps the most prominent being the amendment to the Anti-Inflation Act. We have already passed a series of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. These acts may touch on a number of points within the main act, some of which may be related and some of which may not be.

The third kind are those which provide new provisions within an already existing legislative framework. Perhaps the most prominent one in the last few years was the amendments to the Canada Elections Act, called the Election Expenses Act. In this case we grafted something totally new onto the framework of an existing act.

Lastly, we have what might be called omnibus bills. Perhaps the most flagrant examples of omnibus bills are those we get after each budget. These are the bills that deal with the amendments proposed by the Minister of Finance—the sales tax in one sequence, in a second bill all the amendments proposed to the Income Tax Act, and in a third bill a set of amendments to the Excise Tax Act. These are omnibus bills in the true sense because those amendments will touch on a variety of things and have almost nothing in common except that they are presented by the Minister of Finance as part of a budgetary package. So it is with the ideas behind the peace and security package. They present a series of ideas in a package framework for amending the Criminal Code and are designed to deal with certain problems.

One of the problems we have in the House of Commons is that all members of parliament want to be loved; we do not want to vote for anything that might be nasty or might not have the unanimous support of our constituents. We do not want to vote for those things that may be necessary to accomplish certain aims and so we find it extremely difficult to vote for packages, some parts of which we may agree with and some parts with which we may disagree.

The point is that in the imperfect world in which we live we often do not have that kind of choice. We have to take some of the imperfections along with the perfections, and the perfections that I might see in a particular bill are not necessarily going to be the same as any of my colleagues on either side of the House might see. Beauty is in the eye of the beholder. It is never that way so much as when one is contemplating legislative packages.

The point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that if you look at what is going on you will find that the government behaves in the same way in a minority situation as in a majority situation when it is drafting and presenting legislation. The main pieces of legislation fall within the five categories I have given, and there normally is something to tie them together.

The previous speaker complained about amendments to the Citizenship Act when he was prepared to vote, according to him, for the amendments within the act dealing with sex discrimination, but had certain reservations about that provision which reduced the length of time a person had to be in Canada in order to apply for citizenship. That is an amendment to one act which is part of a package series. It does not seem fitting to me that it would be necessary for the government to present two legislative sets of proposals to deal with a series of amendments to one act. Surely you have to take amendments to the act and look at them as a package, because you are dealing with an already existing package and are providing amendments to it.

The way our system operates, members have an opportunity to vote for or against individual components on two occasions, once in committee at clause by clause consideration, and in the House of Commons there is the opportunity at report stage to vote against specific clauses. There is also the possibility of doing something in limited fashion at third reading.

I think if one looks at these speeches tomorrow, judging from what I have heard today, one will find that the fundamental problem members have, which has elicited this complaint from members of the Social Credit party, is a dislike of the way in which the House of Commons utilizes its time.

As an example, opposition parties have 25 days on which they are allowed to dictate the business of the House. We have set it out in our Standing Orders so that five days are used in the first term, seven days in the second term, and the rest in the third term. That means that 13 opposition days are jammed into May and June. This is simply too much, and we do not use that time properly. We should revise our Standing Orders so that this time is used more evenly throughout the year.

Instead of ending up in a situation where we run out of ideas and start seeking things to talk about because we have too much time at a particular point in our procedural year, we should be revising our Standing Orders so as to spread opposition days on an equitable basis throughout the year. That would leave the opposition parties far more flexible, and it would leave the government far more subject to attack by the opposition parties. It would be much better for the health of parliament. That is an example of what we have done in our Standing Orders.

Let me look at bills, Mr. Speaker. If one looks at the way bills are handled in the House of Commons it is important to realize that, by and large it is the opposition parties which dictate how much time is spent on legislation. The function of the government in our system is to produce an agenda of work, or bills, on which the House is to decide. The job of the opposition is to determine how much time we shall spend discussing each piece of legislation and which portions of the legislative package it wishes to comment on and object to. That is only proper and right. Taking any piece of legislation and dividing it into 25 separate bills does not mean that this process will change. Members will still pick and choose the parts on which they wish to comment.

One of the most difficult decisions we must make in any reform of our procedures is to decide how long the House of Commons shall sit, and how much time we are prepared to spend in the House. As members of parliament we have duties other than sitting in the House. In the last eight to ten years the average session has lasted 180 sitting days. Do we want to sit more than 180 days, or less? How long do we wish to sit? Further, how much legislation is the government to be permitted to bring before the House? I am speaking of legislation in addition to work already allocated to us under the Standing Orders. The question is, should the government be allowed to bring in 70 pieces of legislation, 80, 100, 50 or 40? How can we decide how long the House should spend discussing each legislative proposal unless we first decide how much time is available? Only then can we decide how much time to spend on each item.

As an institution one of our big faults is that in allocating the time we spend on legislative proposals we do not distinguish between what is important and what is not important. If you listed all legislative items on a priority scale running, say, from one to ten, you would find that we probably spend as much time discussing items low on the priority scale, say, occupying position No. 10, as we do on items high in priority scale, say, No. 1. This means that we are not really thinking about how we ought to operate this institution, and not thinking of how to get the best results for our time and effort.

Let me now deal with the point raised by the Créditiste speaker who preceded me concerning the question of regulations. This House, in Canada, produces legislation more detailed than that produced by any other legislative assembly in Canada. Anyone examining legislation passed by the provincial governments of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta, or any other province will find that such legislation is loosely defined, which means implementation at provincial level is a matter for the cabinet. Usually it is done by way of regulations. On the other hand legislation we pass is most detailed and, because it is detailed, much of it must be amended each year. We face this problem because the government, in order to bring such legislation up to date, must constantly change legislation previously passed by this House.

After all, society is not static. It changes. The focus of our concern changes. People move; economic conditions change, and legislation and the impact of legislation must also change. You can do this two ways. You can ask the cabinet to make the changes or you can bring the legislation back to the House of Commons for amendment. In our system we use both methods, probably on a 50-50 basis. That is why, as the hon. member preceding me said, we have established the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. It tries to keep track of regulations and the statutory instruments which flow from the cabinet, to make sure they are compatible with the legislation on which they are based. The committee has a difficult job to do and is, I think, doing a fair job. It is difficult to say how successful it will be in the long run; at present we have to give it full marks for enthusiasm and effort. But our difficulties will not go away. We must amend existing legislation to make certain that the law reflects the changes taking place in Canadian society.

Considering the overcrowded agenda of business with which parliament must now deal, and the ever increasing demand for time to be spent on ever more legislative proposals, it becomes most difficult to justify putting more detail into our legislation. I argue that this process entails trade-offs. Members on all sides accept more regulations as the price for the privilege of playing around longer than necessary with legislation going through the House. We can sing to our heart's content about what is in the legislation and what is not, but if we take more time than is really necessary we are allowing the government more regulatory making powers. I feel this is a bad bargain.

I feel that the House should examine the agenda placed before it and put more pressure on the government to produce its legislative list. We should know far in advance what bills we are to discuss so that we can sit down together, as a group, and work out an appropriate timetable, then ensure it is covered by an order of the House so that we can all know what is to happen. Not only will we settle many of our difficulties in terms of length of debate but we shall all discover far in advance what is to happen in the House. At present, apart from opposition days and budget debates, there is no way of finding out what is to happen here on any given day.

We are given no document on a daily basis which tells us that some matter is to be taken up at three o'clock, five o'clock, or eight o'clock. We operate by guess and by gosh. This is not good enough for an institution as big and as complex as parliament. That ought to change. But we can only eliminate the problem when we decide finally to move into the twentieth century. We must deal with the problem of the parliamentary agenda, with how much time we are to spend discussing government legislation and how long speeches are to take, so that we can program our time in a way which makes sense to us and to the Canadian people.

I recall when the House of Commons sat one summer, shortly after I had been elected to this place. I was visiting my constituency and somebody asked me "Well, Reid, what are you doing? I guess you are enjoying your summer holiday?" I said, "Hell, no, the House of Commons is still sitting." He said, "Do you mean to say you guys are not smart enough to be able to take the summer off?" Mr. Speaker, we do not get any marks for staying here because we have wasted our time. That only indicates our own inefficiency.

Mr. Stevens: Then why is the government keeping us here?

Mr. Reid: When we hear people making comments about the House of Commons we wish they would not make, we must take a certain amount of responsibility. We are in the dark ages when it comes to deciding what we should do with our time, and how much time we should allocate to the consideration of all our business to make sure there is fair disposition.

My last point concerns the changes to which we should look forward in order to bring us up to date. It seems to me that our legislative style can change only if we move to the point at which all members of the House understand what the government's legislative load ought to be. That means that we would need to put certain restrictions on the government. We should try to determine how long in any given year the House of Commons should sit. That would put restrictions on us all. We should also decide how long individual members should speak on any given item, and the length of speeches could vary from item to item. One can see the foolishness of permitting 40 minute speeches on second reading and 20 minute speeches on opposition days. There is no logic to it. Perhaps we ought to limit speeches to 15 minutes; we ought to deal with that problem.

Mr. Paproski: Sit down, then.

Mr. Reid: We must also grapple with the difficulty of providing appropriate mechanisms for deciding how long we should spend on any particular item, and for ensuring that the opposition, whose duty it is to oppose legislative items brought down by the government, is satisfied that it is not being short-changed. This means that the opposition parties must act far more responsibly than they have in the past in allocating the time of the House and determining how that time is to be used. If the opposition parties are unwilling to accept that responsibility, or unable to work out such a system, it seems to me we must provide for a "fail safe" mechanism.

Mr. Paproski: Just wait until you are in opposition.

Mr. Reid: Certain possibilities have been suggested to the procedural organization committee by one of its subcommittees. I recommend them to hon. members. They are not perfect; in some respects they are flawed. We would appreciate your comments, and particularly your support.

● (2120)

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the fine oration by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid). He talked about a topic that he thinks he knows, procedure in the House of Commons.

We hear government members speak on this topic, and members of the opposition parties. It is unfortunate that we never get a balanced argument. For example, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River referred to the fact that there are 25 opposition days, 5 in the first semester, seven in the second, and so on. He neglected to explain that in 1969 a majority Liberal government introduced those proposals and forced them on this House of Commons by closure. Now he is trying to say that the House did all this in a very nice way. That is not quite the fact. If he had explained further and given the proper perspective, there would have been more truth.

The hon. member also stated that the opposition sets the timetable. Although I was not a member of this House in 1969, I recall reading in the papers that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that the government was going to introduce all bills at the beginning of the session so that the opposition would have an opportunity to examine them. That has never happened. The Prime Minister does not force his cabinet to do that.

With regard to bills that are to be dealt with before we adjourn for the summer recess, a week or so ago there was talk about two bills which the government desperately wants passed, but which members of the House have not even seen yet. If it so desperately wants them through, it should table them. In fact all bills should be tabled at the time of the Speech from the Throne, unless there is a genuine emergency. That would be a rare occasion, and a rare bill.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River tried to put the onus on the opposition. He did not mention that in 1972 there was an election. To a large extent that revolved around unemployment insurance. The government remained in power with 109 seats and the major opposition with 107. Even though the election was on October 31, the government did not convene the House until mid-January. What happened to November and December? I guess there was no urgency.

There was another election on July 8, 1974. The government always talks about its timetable and how it wants to get things done. However the House did not sit for the remainder of July, August or September. In fact it did not sit until October. We could at least have associated ourselves with school boys and girls and commenced at the beginning of September. The government must bear certain responsibilities which it does not bear at the present time.

One of the great concerns of the opposition is that the government uses railroad tactics to get legislation through the House. An example is the Time and Reader's Digest bill. The committee was frustrated. The committees do not work in the way they were intended. Concerns must be expressed on the floor of the House of Commons.

There were a number of government members on the committee which considered the Time and Reader's Digest bill. Some had been on that committee for two years. In fact one had been the chairman. The government removed them from that committee because they were going to oppose the bill.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has mentioned an area over which I have some responsibility in the committee. No one was replaced on that committee unless they were absent at that time.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the point of order is there. The hon. member should take his turn to speak on this matter. The fact is that there were Liberal backbenchers who complained because they were hoisted off that committee. One rose in the House of Commons on a question of privilege. That is funny. Members change on that committee. Everyone knows, including the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), that the memberships change back and forth on that committee. However, if a member is absent one day that does mean that member is kicked off for good, and that happened.

Mr. MacFarlane: On a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member who is seeking the floor on a point of order. However, I hope it is not the same point, which is not in fact a point of order. It is an opinion that the hon. member can express later. If he disagrees with the hon. member, all he has to do is seek the floor and express his own opinion in due time.

Mr. MacFarlane: The hon. member referred to the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain saying that he would know that another member stood up in the House. It is not true I would know that. That member was never on the committee. Therefore he could not have been taken off that committee.

Mr. Dick: The hon. member has just pointed out something, Mr. Speaker. I did not say he would know much. From the comment he just made, it is obvious that he does not know much.

I do not want to spend my entire 20 minutes on matters raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I just want to put his comments into the proper perspective to show that the government bears a certain responsibility, including the fact that when the government wants to railroad something through it will hoist members off a committee who might be opposed so that a bill will go through sweetly.

Governments in general, and this government in particular, like to run the country by means of orders in council, regulations, directives, and so on. Ministers try to get rid of the burden of being in the House where they must answer to members from all parts of the country. They would rather the bureaucrats run everything with some tangible or some intangible control, depending on how effective a cabinet minister might be. In the area of awarding contracts, they make sure that the right person receives them. This puts the cabinet in a more powerful position and keeps members of the House away from issues of concern. This is a substantial weakness in our democratic process.

Over the years governments have tended to use regulations, orders in council, and a number of other procedures to get around passing substantive law, or amendments to substantive law. It would be preferable for the government of the day to introduce short bills, possibly housekeeping bills. If necessary there could be a time limit such as that in Great Britain. However, a bill should be brief and deal with only one topic.

Making regulations or orders in council and having them published in the Canada Gazette is not a good way of reaching decisions which affect thousands of Canadians. Most Canadians do not see the Canada Gazette—they would probably be bored to tears after reading the first page of it if they did. These are not laws or guides for conduct which have been passed after discussion in the public forums such as the House of Commons. Regulations and orders in council are passed after private discussion in cabinet committee or in the cabinet as a whole. The public ends up not knowing about them.

I am particularly pleased that the Social Credit Party should have introduced this topic. It is a most worth-while subject of discussion because it goes to the core of our democratic system. The resolution expresses concern on two grounds, the first being that the government introduces omnibus bills. The second is that too much power is exercised by means of regulations and orders in council. With regard to the second point, which relates to an extremely debatable area affecting not only members of parliament but all the people of Canada, may I remind the House that in 1972 there was an election and that the government just about lost its right to sit on the treasury benches. One of the key issues in that election was the unemployment insurance fund.

Back in June 1973 the government announced its intention of introducing two bills on unemployment insurance. The first was to provide some $800 million to cover a deficit which had been hidden during the election campaign because the party opposite did not wish to explain that they had been dipping into the till to cover runaway costs. The second was Bill C-125 which would have had the effect of cutting out many of the misuses of the scheme. In a speech on television in the Kitchener area on February 3, 1973, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated that Bill C-125 would be introduced into the House within a few weeks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was Bill C-25.

Mr. Dick: I am sorry. Bill C-25. I am corrected by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). On February 27 I asked the then president of the privy council when this bill would be introduced. He said it would be very soon. On October 22 of that year, some eight months later, I asked the President of the Privy Council again when the government proposed to bring in that bill for debate. On that occasion the minister said he was trying to find some time in which to do so. Remember he had only had seven months or more, and this was a key issue in the election. What did they try to do?

I represent a constituency where unemployment happens to be running around 22 per cent in one community. Generally the unemployment rate is about 10 or 12 per cent. The main centres are only 40 miles or so from Ottawa and they happen to be on the Ontario side. People do not realize that there happens to be unemployment and considerable poverty in the Ottawa Valley. Mr. Speaker, the government tried to hold back that bill because it was afraid it would not get the support of the NDP to which it was wedded at the time—it was a minority government. What did it do? It then tried to change the regulations and alter the directives by order in council so that it could achieve the desired result without legislation. It did a lot of tinkering, but it could not come up with a satisfactory solution in the absence of legislation.

Then there was the election of 1974. Last year, in 1975, it introduced an unemployment insurance bill which, among other things, to the discredit of the government disqualified people aged 65 and over. It tinkered again with a number of areas, but at least this was substantive legislation. Now, in this budget delivered some three years and four months after it had promised to take action, the government has stated its intention to do something about misuse of the unemployment insurance system and the rip-offs which it is alleged are taking place.

I should like to ask whether the people of Canada know what is happening under the regulations which govern this scheme. For example, do they know that under the regulations they can find something like this—regulations pertaining to assistance to displaced workers in the textile and clothing industry. I would refer to one regulation which was passed in 1974. Its effect was that in certain areas where the textile industry had gone into depression any person who had worked for 15 years in a factory and who was between the ages of 54 and 75 could end up with a pension from the unemployment insurance fund for life. How many Canadians know there is a pension fund in there? This was made possible by regulation, not by legislation.

How many Canadians know there are regulations which give special status to certain individuals? About 9 per cent of the workers of this country belong to unions which have hiring hall agreements. These agreements fall into two categories as far as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned. There are some who will not co-operate with the Commission, and the people who use those hiring halls are allowed to draw unemployment insurance benefits for up to 16 weeks without having to complete a job search form or take an interview. Then there are a privileged few who go to hiring halls and who are not obliged to search for a job in a different type of employment because work cannot be found for them in the industry to which they belong. They can go on unemployment insurance for 52 weeks, stay at home drinking beer and watching television, and never even ask for a job anywhere, because there are union hiring hall regulations.

This practice discriminates against the remaining 92 per cent of the people in the work force. If they go on unemployment insurance they have to hustle around and prove to the commission that they have been out looking for work. If they cannot provide a job search form, or if they do not undertake to travel 30 or 40 miles in the event they get a job, they are disqualified from benefit. But the union hiring hall people have special status under the regulations. This decision was not made openly in parliament; it was a nice little thing done by regulation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say something about omnibus bills. Take the bill we have before us now called the peace and security bill, Bill C-83, which deals with firearms and offensive weapons among other things. I hope I shall be able to support that part of the measure if it were amended properly and intelligently.

Another subject dealt with in it is invasion of privacy—I objected to the form in which it was introduced and I see that further amendments have been introduced. Another topic dealt with is dangerous offenders. Then we come to special crime inquiries, a section which the government has now decided to wipe out. We find a fifth item in there having to do with the customs tariff. We also see the Parole Act, the Penitentiaries Act, and the Prisons and Reformatories Act amended. As it is, there happen to be about five of the minor items that I want to vote for and four I do not want to vote for, yet I am stuck with an omnibus bill that covers such topics as the customs tariff and special crime inquiries. I say that is wrong.

Lastly, I would point out that the government is proposing to insert an additional 24 clauses or subclauses into Bill C-83 under which it can delegate power to 13 different persons in the country to regulate firearms. Presently there are only three clauses. If the government gets its amendments through, there will be some 27 clauses granting regulatory authority under the Criminal Code. That is bad law. The Criminal Code should be clear and distinct, be in one book, and should not depend on the governor in council passing orders in council, or on the Minister of Justice granting regulatory authority, or the commissioner of the RCMP and the lieutenant-governors of the ten provinces. In this way we end up with a balkanized Criminal Code in this country. I object to the government's introducing this kind of regulatory authority and discretionary power into the Criminal Code; this is the wrong approach.

I could go on to other topics, Mr. Speaker, but I see that my time has now expired.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont.

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Lafontaine-Rosemont, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) charged yesterday that the Liberal backbenchers were not speaking often enough to state their views regularly. I merely wish to point out that it is the third time I have risen in two days to state my views on issues before the House.

Indeed I feel that the motion under consideration today can be considered as an extension of the matter raised yesterday during private members' hour when we had the opportunity to resume the debate on the motion of the member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) who is now leader of the opposition and who asked us to set up a committee which would examine the privileges of the Prime Minister's office with respect to its ability to control and supervise the House of Commons. I think it is an extension because we now realize that the House should really take a closer look at several mechanisms which have steered its operations for over a hundred years.

There has been a sudden awareness in the 20th century: perhaps the methods which were adequate in the past will no longer have rationale in the future. The tools we had to deal with the problem were good until very recently, but they will have no more use to serve in this capacity in the years to come, with the acceleration of life and the new values of society.

Why am I speaking in this manner on a motion which on the whole is expressed in rather specific terms, in spite of the rather woolly ideas it contains? Quite simply because opposition days evidently serve to discuss supplies; members thereby have the opportunity to indulge in reflections on their role and examine a little every topic which is of concern to them.

There are two points I want to go back to in the speech I delivered yesterday in the House of Commons, a speech which was precisely questioning some of the principles taken for granted by this House. Those two points are of course the House procedure which is deficient in my opinion, and the information available to members to carry out their business.

First of all, let us talk about information. It is commonplace to say that members of Parliament, although flooded, overwhelmed with various information, seldom have the means to make an exhaustive and in-depth study of the legislation they are asked to discuss and check. And it is precisely that lack of information which often results in situation like those we see in committee, where members ask for additional hours or days to have the opportunity to study the bills or receive the advice of independent experts. I do not want to deal at too great length with that problem of information, Mr. Speaker, but I think it would be advisable for the House, once and for all, to seriously consider giving members of Parliament access to adequate expertise, so that they may fulfil their duties as legislators, do what they were elected to do, that is to review and judge legislation with full knowledge.

The second problem is, of course, that of procedure. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) mentioned it and of course the Committee on Procedure and Organization is now in the process of looking into it. It may be that the House will know some changes, that the procedure will become more flexible, especially in view of the ever-growing load of legislation that comes before us, in view also of the restrictions now imposed upon us, in particular with regard to the very long hours we have to put in. It is now 9.50 and the House is still sitting while most Canadians are at home. To my mind, the procedure in this House must be looked into, and I trust all parties will prove their good will in this. That good will of course does exist to some extent but it must be even greater if we want to bring the House to change in ways that are absolutely necessary at this time. That is how I wanted to tie in the speech I made yesterday.

But with regard to the motion on the order paper, it really surprised me precisely because opposition days are so few that I was amazed to see the Social Credit Party of Canada move a motion in such general terms which, as I said earlier in my remarks, in fact is somewhat woolly. This brings up a problem, if there is in fact a problem, which has always existed in the House of Commons, problem which, as pointed out by one of the previous speakers, is neither new nor exclusive to this government. Even as early as between 1972 and 1974, the omnibus bill existed, or it was called thus; similarly the existence of regulations is far from new. Indeed, the Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments was not created yesterday, nor have regulations, as such, shown up recently in our statutes.

In fact, the purpose of these regulatory powers is to give a greater administrative latitude to the executive, which is necessary and which has been recognized by many countries. Hon. members are probably aware that in France, for example, the National Assembly legislates only in extremely general matters and leaves it to the executive to implement the general principles so that the regulatory power is excessively wider than the power our executive enjoys in some circumstances only, when it is expressly provided in the statutory instruments.

Thus, this regulatory power is not a problem as such except that the statutory instruments in question ought to be reviewed periodically in the House of Commons and this is the role the Committee on Statutory Instruments gave itself or which has been attributed to it and I think it does an excellent job. I had the privilege to be a member of this committee for a certain time, and I must say that its members have an expertise I want to praise here.

The second point is that of omnibus bills. And since I want to extend to my colleagues of the Social Credit Party the courtesy of concluding the debate, I shall end my intervention on that. I merely wanted to emphasize that the omnibus bills involved should have been defined. What is an omnibus bill? Every member has his own perception of the word or term. I made a quick calculation of bills that I could call omnibus bills. As everyone knows, we now have 89 or 90 Commons bills besides the 30 or 35 from the Senate which have been considered by the House, and I found five bills that can be called omnibus bills.

I shall take only one as an example. My predecessor referred to Bill C-83. It is an example that is perhaps a little particular, because it is now before the House and has been the subject of a second reading motion to divide it into two parts.

But as an example I shall cite Bill C-16 which was, as we recall, and I quote:

Legislation

An Act to amend certain statutes to provide equality of status thereunder for male and female persons.

That was the famous International Women's Year, as it was called. This bill amended 11 Acts. And I shall simply ask my Social Credit colleagues if they would have preferred to see 11 bills put forward in the House to amend the Canada Elections Act, the Criminal Code, the Immigration Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Pension Act, the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the National Defence Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Canada Labour Code, the War Veterans Allowance Act, that is altogether 11 acts which were amended simply to provide equality for male and female persons, the objective being specifically equality of status. Was it not really an omnibus bill? I ask the question. As far as I am concerned, it was a bill with only one purpose: to amend eleven acts. Therefore, technically it is an omnibus bill, but practically, is it really necessary to have or study eleven bills to change one legislation?

May I give other examples: the famous Bill C-44, on members' salaries amends four acts. Bill C-52 amends about ten acts, such as the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act and so forth, a bill on which my hon. colleague for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) spoke on many occasions. Then there is Bill C-87, and Act to amend or repeal certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures, and which also amends five or six Parliament acts.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I would simply say that there is room here for interpretation, and I do not think we are justified in criticizing the government for all evils, to criticize it especially for introducing omnibus bills, while this has been a practice in effect for a long time and which we did not initiate; on the contrary, I find it very useful.

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to take part in tonight's debate, although it is quite late. Before making my comments, I would like to congratulate and thank my colleague the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) for having put forward the motion now before us on the opposition day alloted to the Social Credit Party of Canada under the Standing Orders of the House.

I think that the motion of the hon. member for Shefford deserves the attention of all hon. members who sit here in the House of Commons. We were elected to represent our fellow citizens and to pass legislation governing all Canadians.

That responsibility, Mr. Speaker, is very great, and I believe that all members are aware of the consequences of decisions taken here. Each and everyone of our fellow citizens has to obey the laws voted by Parliament. The basic principle of the parliamentary system can be sumed up in one sentence: Parliament is sovereign.

This means that Parliament can vote laws, and does vote the laws it wants. Parliament is subject to no outside authority except for the will of the people expressed at election time. It has been said by parliamentarians, to describe that reality of a sovereign Parliament, that Parliament can do anything except change a man into a woman. This means of course, Mr. Speaker, that Parliament can do anything it wants, except for what is physically impossible.

Mr. Speaker, as it is getting late and my time is limited, I would like to give some specific examples of what we put forth by presenting this motion today. We only have to look at the Unemployment Insurance Act. Mr. Speaker, this act was published as a separate volume in 1974. As we all know, several sections of this act allow the Unemployment Insurance Commission to make regulations. If we look at this act as published in 1974, we see that the act itself extends over only 67 pages, while the text of the regulations covers double that amount of pages, or 140.

If we continue in this direction, we shall come to a situation where Parliament will approve legislation containing generally a page or two, and then an agency made up of public servants will prepare under the form of regulations hundreds of provisions which will modify the form, the spirit and the scope of the original legislation.

Mr. Speaker, there is another example that I would like to give, even if several members here tonight perhaps found the motion of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) ridiculous, that is an act that was passed in Parliament and to which 90 to 95 per cent of all members, including Liberals, Conservatives, New Democrats and Social Crediters, were strongly opposed, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, when we, the Parliament, had given a commission full power to redistribute the ridings. Several members, including myself, had to drive distances of 500 miles to represent about 60,000 people.

This commission has now submitted a project which, for myself, gives me about 800 miles to drive in my riding to serve a population of about 88,000 people. However, an exception has been made concerning part of the constituency which was not included in the 1971 census, but the people of this area would like a representative who can serve them. I believe that all hon. members will agree that the spirit of the legislation that we passed was very "grand", and that it is not only Parliament which will suffer, but especially constituents who will have to choose a representative in the next election.

Mr. Speaker, another issue has created a lot of controversy among the population. It is Bill C-83 now before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

● (2200)

Once again, Mr. Speaker, in this same bill, the government—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Unfortunately, I have to interrupt the hon. member.

It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on the motion have expired.

[Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve).]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—RATIONALIZATION OF TRANSPORT POLICY WITH OTHER PROGRAMS FOR THE ATLANTIC REGION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am grateful for the support. Obviously members realize the importance of the question that was raised last Thursday and that I wish to raise at a little greater length this evening, having to do with co-ordination of transportation policy and the sensitivity of the government at the present time to the situation in respect of transportation problems in the Atlantic provinces.

This is not new information, I assume, either to the minister or his parliamentary secretary who will be responding this evening. However, I would be less than frank if I did not say the comments last week by the Council of Maritime Premiers, and the appearance of the P.E.I. minister of tourism at one of our standing committees in Ottawa on Tuesday, gave a real indication of the depth of anxiety and, perhaps, the extent of neglect that currently exists in respect of those transportation problems in the Atlantic region.

First of all, I wish to elaborate slightly on the question I put last Thursday. I wish to place on the record some quotes from the communiqué from the most recent meeting of the Council of Maritime Premiers. Incidentally it was the fifth anniversary of the Maritime Premiers' Council, which is a most valuable body in terms of effective policies and programs for the three maritime provinces. In their communiqué the premiers said they were requesting an early meeting with the federal Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). The communiqué stated:

> The premiers re-affirmed their position that transportation systems should be used by governments as positive tools for the attainment of national and regional objectives . . . They stated that despite the federal government's agreement with their position, there is an alarming lack of hard evidence that transportation is, in fact, being used as a positive development tool. Indeed, there are examples of just the opposite . . . The premiers expressed concern that the federal government is increasing cost recovery within some transportation systems without considering the effects of this on the over-all economy.

Later on in the communiqué we find this:

> The premiers expressed disappointment that a revised intra-regional freight assistance program advanced by the Atlantic provinces to the federal government in February of this year had not as yet received an official response . . .
> The premiers expressed disappointment in the federal budgetary restraint program as it applies to transportation expenditures.

Members will recall that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) then asked a question in terms of this particular part of the communiqué. The premiers took issue with the discriminatory nature of the transportation sector of the announced program, noting that of a total reduction of $41.2 for the whole of Canada, $21.9 million or 53 per cent would affect Atlantic region transportation programs exclusively.

If we just think for a moment, this means that in fact over half the reduction in expenditures directly affected Atlantic transportation where we have somewhat less than 10 per cent of the population. Considering the frequent occasions on which the federal government has paid lip service to the idea of co-ordinating transportation policy with its regional development program, this seems at the least to be shortsighted and perhaps even somewhat disastrous.

The premiers concluded their statement with these words:

In view of the present economic situation in the Atlantic provinces and the effect which transportation has upon it, the announced allocations of transportation expenditure reductions was deemed to be inconsistent with programs designed to correct regional disparity.

That was on Wednesday last week. The previous day when the P.E.I. minister of tourism appeared before our Standing Committee on regional Development he said a number of things having to do with the difficulties he had encountered in co-ordinating federal-provincial policy in the area he administers, but in referring to the over-all problem of co-ordination of federal-provincial programs he said:

We could spend the complete afternoon discussing these in details, but I will simply say that there is not much evidence of co-ordination policy-making between federal entities such as the Ministry of Transport, the Canadian Transport Commission, the Canadian National Railways, Air Canada and Parks Canada, just to name a few.

I will not restate the question I put the other day, but all of this seems to fly in the face of what the federal government has announced for some years as its prime intention. I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members a paper presented in November by Mr. H. Ropertz, a member of the transport policy task force on the matter of inter-governmental co-operation in transportation policy. I shall quote two or three things from that document because it is an indication of the commitment at the official level in respect of dealing with the transportation problem in some sort of rational and sensible way.

He said there is, and I quote:

. . . a growing realization on the part of the federal government for the need to consult and not take unilateral action, even though jurisdiction at times is federal.

He went on to speak about a specific federal-provincial committee, known as the Federal-Provincial Committee on Atlantic Region Transportation, which was organized as far back as 1969. That is an important date because it followed the passage of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, the establishment of a new national transportation policy, and perhaps more important, the establishment of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The committee has been composed of senior federal and provincial government officials from the Ministry of Transport, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and from the provinces of New Brunwick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward island.

He went on to say that although the committee was mainly concerned with transportation problems as they affect their specific regions—and he was speaking, in effect, about three similar committees—one of the most significant aspects of the terms of reference of each of these committees is that they are working toward economic or regional goals and objectives. He also said that the idea that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) would sit down at least two or three times a year with each individual member to go over progress and tackle pressing problems was envisaged.

If there has been anything useful raised in this latest series of questions, it may be the frank admission by the Minister of Transport that he was somewhat surprised that the premiers should be unaware of the steps which are being taken by the federal government to co-ordinate transportation policy with the provinces in the Maritime region, and perhaps adding to that surprise there may be additional encouraging information from the parliamentary secretary about this problem this evening.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy an opportunity to respond at this point during our proceedings to my friend, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), and I hope I can satisfy some of his concerns this evening.

Tonight, and on previous occasions, in at least a part of his argument he has suggested that the Government of Canada has disregarded a request by the Council of Maritime Premiers concerning the intra-regional freight assistance program. Rather than a disregard in this area, or in any of the other areas which have been touched upon by the hon. member this evening, there has been careful consideration of the position including, in the particular case of the freight assistance program, a possible position which had been generally agreed upon at one point between the Atlantic ministers of transport and the federal Minister of Transport with regard to freight subsidies.

In that connection the original idea involved a $5 million cut at one point in the subsidy and, as I have said, there was agreement on this point from the Atlantic ministers. Our combined hope was that the smaller amount of money thereby available would in fact obtain more positive results over-all. After further reflection on this point at both levels of government, and some assessment of the technical challenges involved in that original suggestion, it has now been concluded that the desired beneficial impact of the arrangement is not likely to be attained in the time frame available, and action on the whole matter has therefore been postponed to allow for further analysis and genuine discussion between the two levels of government involved.

There is certainly no need for the kind of anxiety which has been expressed this evening and on other occasions in the House. There has been every assurance that the Government of Canada is taking regional problems—in this case in the Atlantic region—very much into consideration. This has been made patently clear during the course of a series of very frequent meetings at the officials' level and certainly also at meetings involving the ministers as well. We have an ongoing and regular system of meetings in place and under way. This will continue in the hope that during the course of the summer, in relation particularly to the intra-regional freight assistance program, an appropriate program can be worked out to the satisfaction of all involved.

Adjournment Debate

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION—PROPOSAL TO GRANT EXPORT LICENCE TO SELL FISH OUTSIDE CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR ANALYSIS OF PROCESSING COSTS

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, where is the minister? Where is the Minister of State for Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc)? Does he dare send only a messenger? Sir, that characterizes the attitude of this minister with reference to inland fisheries since he has taken on the portfolio of minister of state. Not only are the fishermen in this country intimidated by having something less than a full ministry but the minister has refused to stand squarely in his place in the House of Commons and articulate his policy on inland fisheries.

I tell you, Sir, I give him full marks for going around the country and the world and signing agreements with all nations, but when there is trouble on the home front he ought to face it. On this very day the minister stood in his place opposite and challenged me to stand and give my position with reference to inland fisheries. Here I am, Mr. Speaker, and I want to know where he is.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He is with the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer).

Mr. Whiteway: No doubt. Mr. Speaker, I want there to be no mistake and no misjudgement. I do not want the parliamentary secretary to be in any way in the dark as to where I stand on this matter. The minister ought to look at the historic facts and their relationship to inland fisheries. The agreement—and I have it here tonight—signed on June 4, 1969, between the Government of Canada and the government of the province of Manitoba, in section 2(2) reads as follows:

> The amount payable by the province pursuant to subsection (1) shall not exceed the sum of 25 per cent of $100,000.

That was the original amount of money—of capital investment by the federal and provincial governments to set up the inland fisheries known as the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation by the Freshwater Fish Marketing Act of 1969. That has grown from $100,000 to $5½ million. At the time of the inception of the corporation it was signed by a minister of the Progressive Conservative party, the Hon. Harry Enns who originated the concept of a single marketing agency for orderly marketing. That was what the fishermen expected and that was the intention of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Act, but this government along with its counterpart in the province of Manitoba, Premier Schreyer, and on June 25 twisted the act, invested $5½ million, and decided not only to go into orderly marketing or a single desk marketing agency but also to get into the processing business.

Neither in this House nor outside have I quarrelled with the concept of orderly marketing. What I have quarrelled with, and upon occasion have asked the minister to justify, is the existence of a corporation in respect to the processing. This is fishermen's money, not tax money. The minister was dead wrong this afternoon when he suggested tax money was involved. I will tell you why there is federal tax money and provincial tax money involved; it is because this government—perhaps not this minister—set up and spent $3½ million. I want to know who authorized that because the agreement was for $100,000. They blew it, Mr. Speaker. They could not administer it, and caused the corporation to lose $2 million in one year. The only reason federal tax money was involved was because they had to pick up what was their fault—not the fault of the fishermen.

I want to know who authorized the additional $2 million over and above the $3½ million that was never authorized. I want the minister to answer that. I do not want his parliamentary secretary to stand up and give me some song and dance about how great the corporation is and how great the concept is, because it was my party that originated the concept. What I want the parliamentary secretary and the minister to answer is who authorized the $5½ million. Who authorized the additional expenditure? I want them to agree to ask the corporation to open its books and do an audit—not the kind of namsy audit that the government is familiar with, but to answer the questions of the fishermen. This is fishermen's money and they have a right to know.

The minister claims to be the great knight in shining armour who fights the dragons that would gobble up the fishermen and their profits, yet refuses to give the kind of information that it is only reasonable to expect from such a corporation.

The fishermen want to know by species what it costs per pound to process the fish. Surely that is the right of people whose money is being used by this corporation. We are not asking for anything to be changed until we know the facts. If the minister who is in charge of the inland fishery as well as the offshore fishery refuses to provide that kind of information to the fishermen, he will be acting irresponsibly. I ask the parliamentary secretary, when he speaks on behalf of the minister, to answer this question: will he or will he not cause an audit to be undertaken so that, at the very least, the fishermen will know what they must pay to process their fish, and how those costs compare with those entailed in the orderly marketing concept?

An hon. Member: This whole subject is very smelly!

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that the corporation intends to provide the fishermen with a newsletter containing the information requested concerning production and marketing, information to which the hon. member referred.

It ought to be kept in mind that the corporation is not run by the minister in charge of fisheries. It is not run by any one group on individuals. The hon. gentleman has just criticized the people who provide an input into the corporation, all the provinces and the authorities concerned in the Northwest Territories, and the advisory committee of fishermen.

On several occasions during several question periods the hon. member went far to point out the problems he has encountered in connection with one particular group of fishermen who are within a relatively small, confined area. But there are other problems relating to fishermen in Saskatchewan. Those problems loom so large that the province to date refuses to contribute toward the deficit of the corporation, something which no doubt the hon. member knows. There are problems throughout Manitoba concerning transport costs. On each side of the hon. member each province was contributing to transport costs, but the hon. member's province was not. There are also great problems in northern Manitoba.

Mr. Whiteway: Why does the parliamentary secretary not deal with my question?

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): There are also problems connected with marketing and production. The hon. gentleman talked about an offer which was made in Motley. Mr. Speaker, the corporation thanks the hon. member for the information and says it will investigate the particular offer. That, essentially, is what the hon. gentleman requested.

Essentially the corporation as it exists today enjoys the support of all the provinces concerned, as well as of the fishermen concerned who act through the advisory committee. It certainly has the support of every single fisherman who was fishing before the corporation was set up when there were great rip-offs involving distributors, collectors, and buyers in certain parts of Canada and the United States.

It is important to remember that the corporation cannot exist if its efforts are splintered here, there, and everywhere. The minister responsible for fisheries and the present management of the corporation, which is perhaps one of the best management groups ever to have been in charge of the corporation, are working consistently with all provinces concerned and the Northwest Territories to work out the best possible deal.

If the hon. gentleman were to ask fishermen in the general area covered by the corporation if they are generally happy with prices, I believe the answer would be yes, despite the existence of problems. There are problems concerning provinces which have production plants which produce final products. Some provinces do not have such plants. Therefore adjustments must be made, within the accepted criteria. But it would be irresponsible of the hon. gentleman to suggest that the corporation should be disbanded because of the complaints of a small group of fishermen, I believe 21 fishermen of a total of 300 in the Lake Winnipeg area.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Our adjournment debate procedure does not allow for the raising of points of order. If the hon. member wishes to raise a point of order, perhaps he can do so tomorrow before orders of the day are called.

AIR CANADA—ALLEGATION OF POOR BILLING PROCEDURES IN FINANCE BRANCH, WINNIPEG—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, coincidentally two Manitoba members this evening are asking for a proper audit of a Crown corporation. Of course the answer given to the request of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) constituted complete evasion. We are used to that.

● (2220)

I have been asking for the Auditor General to conduct a complete audit of Air Canada's finance branch at Winnipeg due to the financial fiasco there, the huge deficits being faced, and the requests for fare increases. I received a most unsatisfactory answer from the Assistant Auditor General who stated, and I quote:

> As you are probably aware, parliament has directed that the accounts and financial transactions of Air Canada be audited by the same auditor that parliament appoints to audit the accounts of Canadian National Railways. Therefore, in my opinion, the Auditor General has no authority to conduct any inquiry nor has he any right of access to the financial records or documents of the corporation.

That statement is completely false. It is signed by J. R. Douglas, Assistant Auditor General. I wish to point out to Mr. Douglas and the parliamentary secretary that under Section 67 of the Financial Administration Act the Auditor General can be appointed as the auditor or joint auditor of the corporation. However, that has not been done in the past. It is certainly time that it was done, especially with regard to Air Canada.

There was a report of the independent review committee of the office of the Auditor General which was completed in March, 1975. In that report it states that the Financial Administration Act defines a Crown corporation as:

> —a corporation that is ultimately accountable, through a minister, to parliament for the conduct of its affairs.

When a Crown corporation such as Air Canada has a $12,473,000 deficit, an audit and accounting system that has completely broken down, and has the nerve to state they want a fare increase, the Auditor General should move in immediately. A directive should be issued by the government to have an immediate audit conducted. All the contracted work should be returned to the finance branch in Winnipeg. There were further recommendations by this committee. I quote from chapter six, page 116:

> The Auditor General should audit the financial accounts of all Crown corporations whose expenditures directly affect the budgetary accounts of Canada.

On page 117 it states:

> The Auditor General should have the right of access to the financial records and documents of all Crown corporations of which he is not the auditor, as he deems necessary to the fulfilment of his responsibilities as auditor of the accounts of Canada.

The Assistant Auditor General made reference to the auditing done by the firm of Cooper and Lybrand of Ottawa. In their submission to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), in the 1975 Annual report, they state:

> Our examination included a general review of the accounting procedures and such tests of accounting records and other supporting evidence as we considered necessary in the circumstances.

We are not interested in a general review of Air Canada. We are interested in a complete and proper audit. This document should be questioned as to whether it is worthwhile. I imagine it was very costly, yet all we get out of it is a general review.

One of the issues I raised two weeks ago was the Warnock Hersey account which had 400 tickets not accounted for. The following day after I raised the matter in the House, Air Canada received a statement for $44,000. The parliamentary secretary informed the House that the account covered a period of several months. That was not correct. It was for a period of three years. All that was showing on Air Canada's books was $1,600 owing, not $44,000. That account has now been closed. Therefore it can be seen why the Auditor General should move into Air Canada. This statement has, I imagine, been supplied by Air Canada, so the parliamentary secretary will see he has been misinformed by Air Canada.

A further reason for the Auditor General to move in was given by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) during the question period today when he pointed out that travel agents are not adhering to Air Canada warnings about improper billing practices and procedures. My hon. friend first raised this matter on November 26, 1975, and the Minister of Transport has been most negligent in taking no action to rectify the problem. This is a matter which I myself have raised. I pointed out there are no longer any enforced controls on the reporting of ticket sales by travel agents. As of October, 1975, in excess of the 96,000 travel agent ticket sales were unreported. This represents a minimum of $2,208,000 unpaid for transportation. Air Canada's lowest fare is $23—this is the basis of the calculation by which the figure of $2,208,000 is reached. Further, billings to Air Canada from other airlines do not receive a complete audit inasmuch as items billed for $75 or less are assumed to be correct and are paid for without question.

I might say also that there are in excess of 180,000 tickets which have been used but in respect of which there is no record of sales ever having been reported to the finance branch. At a dollar a ticket this represents a lot of money, but when one considers that the lowest charge on Air Canada flights is $23 there is cause for concern to the tune of a possible $3,843,000. Can anyone explain the many hundreds of thousands of ticket sales which have been reported but in respect of which the fares collected are insufficient to cover the cost of the transportation used? I hope the parliamentary secretary will give a satisfactory answer tonight, along with an assurance that we are to see a proper audit and an end to this financial mess in Winnipeg.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Well, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the argument raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) this evening I hope I can offer some reassurance by making three or four brief points.

On the general question of the financial management of Air Canada, its auditing and other procedures, the House will know that the whole subject was examined very thoroughly not long ago by Mr. Justice Estey, and his report, which was published last year, is a very helpful and important document. I know the hon. member has studied it closely and I know it has given some guidance to the government in connection with what future action might be taken to correct what difficulties or apparent difficulties were revealed in the course of Mr. Justice Estey's study.

The hon. member's second point has to do with the general accountability of Air Canada to parliament, or more particularly to a standing committee of this House. This was referred to, at least in passing, by the hon. member a few nights ago when he and I had an opportunity to discuss this same question during the adjournment proceedings.

The steering committee of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications has considered the question of an appropriate time at which to invite Air Canada to appear before members of parliament for a thorough discussion of the corporation's operations. I would imagine that such a discussion would include the subject raised this evening. Although a specific date has not been fixed by the steering committee, this is a matter which is receiving active attention and I do not think it will be too long before we can come to some agreement as to when an appropriate occasion will present itself.

On the question of auditing procedures which presently govern Air Canada's operation it is true that the Auditor General is not generally involved, simply because the present statutory requirements do not put the Auditor General or Air Canada in that position. The books of Air Canada are, of course, officially audited every year by a firm of chartered accountants, and that auditors' report is carried in every annual report of the airline as a matter of public record, so the House and the country can be well assured that the financial operations of the airline are subject to auditing procedures.

● (2230)

Finally, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the question put earlier today by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) to the minister with respect to certain problems in connection with travel agency matters, the minister indicated that he is following the question very closely and that if there is anything to report to the hon. member or to the House he will be doing so at the very first opportunity.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.32 p.m.

SUGGESTION CABINET ASSUME RESPONSIBILITY FOR FAILURE TO CONCLUDE CONTRACT WITH LOCKHEED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity with regard to the scandalous precedent of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) in his scurrilous attack on the Public Service of Canada. In light of the fact that cabinet as a whole knew and approved the LRPA purchase contract despite a significant shortfall on November 27, 1975, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather):

That this House deplore the recent attack upon the integrity of the Public Service of Canada made by the Minister of Supply and Services and direct the cabinet to publicly assume the entire responsibility for the failure of the LRPA contract, as both honour and precedent dictate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Paproski: Resign, Goyer. Mr. Speaker, Pierre said no.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RESPONSIBILITY OF FORCE FOR BREAK-IN AT QUEBEC NEWSPAPER OFFICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, with reference to the policies and responsibilities of the RCMP and the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Allmand), and in particular the report of the RCMP investigation into the break-in at the offices of the Agence de Presse Libre du Québec. On several occasions this year the Solicitor General has detailed in Hansard his promises to report to the House on this matter. On May 18, as reported on page 13613 of Hansard, he stated he had received a full report from the RCMP but indicated he agreed to let the Quebec solicitor general deal directly with the RCMP, to determine whether something illegal had taken place. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather):

That the Solicitor General, as minister responsible for the RCMP, make a statement on motions outlining fully the circumstances and the responsibility for the apparently illegal break and entry into the premises of this Quebec newspaper, above and beyond whatever action the Solicitor General for the province of Quebec intends.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST COMMITTEE MAKE INVENTORY OF STOCKS OF DAIRY PRODUCTS IN WAREHOUSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since the new federal government dairy policy was developed because of an alleged overproduction of dairy products, and since the findings of research made in some dairy warehouses, especially for powdered milk, where stocks are equivalent to only 15 days of production, show that those same warehouses are 15 to 20 per cent full, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That simultaneously and without notice, the Standing Committee on Agriculture visit all dairy warehouses to check and make the inventory of existing stocks so that farmers not be penalized for a surplus production which is apparently nonexisting.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT OF FRENCH-SPEAKING COMMISSIONER ON COMMISSION ON BILINGUAL COMMUNICATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the Minister of Transport thought it proper recently to make an inquiry on the application of bilingualism in air communications, and considering also that the minister appointed as responsible commissioner Mr. John Keenan, a former adviser to the Canadian Air Line Pilots' Association, which prompts quite a few people to question the impartiality of the inquiry, and recognizing that the inquiry must be conducted with the strictest impartiality, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey):

That this House unanimously ask the responsible minister to appoint immediately a French-speaking co-commissioner, if we want to give this inquiry the credibility required in such circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

SUGGESTED REVISION OF POLICY ON FEED GRAIN ASSISTANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the discontinuance of western feed grain freight assistance might result in the short term, in higher prices for pork, poultry and eggs and, in the long term in the closing down of hog breeding and poultry operations, according to Mr. François Dagenais, research director for the UPA, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House urge the government to reconsider immediately its feed grain assistance policies in order to protect the farming industry from bankruptcy following the discontinuance of feed grain freight assistance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

REQUEST FOR GUARANTEE OF HIGHER INCOME TO INDUSTRIAL MILK PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the disastrous situation industrial milk producers have experienced following the dairy policy announced by the Minister of Agriculture; since some of them even receive cheques on which the amounts are replaced by the word "cancelled"; in view of the fact that deductions and levies exceed incomes and also that thousands of producers will be here tomorrow to voice their grievances, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That the House instruct unanimously the government that industrial milk producers be guaranteed a higher income than last year's under the anti-inflation guidelines.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR RECOMMENDATION TO CABINET

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Supply and Services. It arises out of the attempt by the minister yesterday to transfer blame for this government's gross incompetence in the Lockheed affair to a middle ranking civil servant. Since civil servants do not place recommendations before cabinet, will the minister confirm that a recommendation to proceed with this deal was made to cabinet by a minister and can he tell us which minister took responsibility for that recommendation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I wonder what suggestions the Leader of the Opposition has in mind.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the agreement that has become known as the $16 million misunderstanding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: With regard to the proposal apparently submitted to cabinet in December of last year, will the minister advise this House and me whether the recommendation made on that matter with respect to the establishment of government policy was made by a minister, and, if so, by which minister?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the documents provided to the cabinet are of course presented by the responsible minister.

[English]

Mr. Clark: One of my colleagues suggests I would have been better off asking Mother Theresa. It will clearly be necessary to pull out answers one by one. Will the minister tell us by which minister that recommendation was made?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I really thought that the Leader of the Opposition had understood that the minister responsible for national defence programs was the Minister of National Defence.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—ACCEPTANCE OF RESPONSIBILITY BY MINISTER AND RECOMMENDATION TO CABINET

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday, the Minister of Supply and Services said, as reported in Hansard at page 14030 that the financing of this contract was the prime and exclusive responsibility of the customer department, that is, the Department of National Defence. Does the Minister of National Defence accept prime and exclusive responsibility in this matter and, if so, can he tell us precisely what recommendations he made to cabinet on this matter and what supporting documents he put forward?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): It is well known that the user department, the department making the purchase, is responsible for the funding. This is the responsibility of the Department of National Defence in relation to the purchase of long range patrol aircraft. When we come to the question how payment is to be made over a period of years, and how the progress payments are to be made, it becomes a matter of negotiating a contract and in that sense there is a dual responsibility because the negotiation of a contract belongs in the Department of Supply and Services.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Clark: One is led to ask which of the ministers we are supposed to believe because they are clearly in direct contradiction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Does the Minister of National Defence deny the suggestion made by his colleague yesterday that the prime and exclusive responsibility in this matter—I emphasize the word "exclusive"—lies with the customer department, that is to say, with the Minister of National Defence and that none of the responsibility is shared with the Minister of Supply and Services? Or does he disagree with the position taken by his colleague yesterday?

Mr. Richardson: I was not in the House yesterday and I am not aware of all that was said yesterday. I can only repeat that the total funding is the responsibility of the user department. National Defence had within its budget $953 million to purchase aircraft and in addition it had approval from the government for more than $100 million for interest payments. The program was funded by National Defence but it was not funded in the years in which payments were required in order to get the most cost effective arrangement with the Lockheed Company. The negotiation of the contract is very definitely not the responsibility of the Department of National Defence. That situation of divided responsibility has existed for many years. I have been Minister of Supply and Services and Minister of National Defence and I understand the distinction and the responsibilities that rest in each of those departments.

● (1420)

I am not at this time wishing to place blame; I am simply trying to answer clearly the question of the Leader of the Opposition. I would think the crucial point in these negotiations turns around the telex that was sent on December 2. It was signed by my colleague the Minister of Supply and Services, but I would share with him, and my officials I believe should share with his officials, responsibility for the sending of that telegram. Because at that time the telegram was sent in the belief that it was in the best interests of the government and the people of Canada, since we were protecting our rights, our price, our industrial benefits and the schedule that had been negotiated over many months. So, I would support the Minister of Supply and Services in the signing of that crucial document.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—MINISTER'S POSITION ON FAILURE TO OBTAIN WRITTEN AGREEMENT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary question for the minister. I presume it was a Freudian slip when the minister said that he had been Minister of National Defence. Yesterday the Minister of Supply and Services said in his statement that "not obtaining a written agreement from Lockheed was a serious error" and further that it was also "a very serious mistake that the minister responsible for negotiating the agreement with Lockheed was not informed of the basic funding difficulties before December 2". Does the Minister of National Defence's support of his colleague extend to agreeing with this criticism and accepting it as factual?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not been misled by any of my officials or by any officers, including General Allan. I believe they have performed their duties as well as they could and they performed them honestly in all of this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR SENDING TELEX ON DECEMBER 2

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I hope I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. Last Tuesday when I asked the minister why he had sent a telegram on December 2 over his signature in which for the first time, at least according to the information revealed by the government, the government of Canada committed itself in a serious contractual way with the Lockheed Corporation, the minister replied that "the matter had become far more imbued with politics than the main business principles that are essential to the negotiation of contracts with suppliers." I would like to know what the minister meant when he gave me that answer last Tuesday about the telegram. In particular, having said in the House yesterday that neither he nor the Minister of Defence on December 2 knew of the details of the financial arrangements that were being worked out with the Lockheed Corporation, then under those circumstances why in heaven's name was that telegram sent on December 2?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is quite simple. If the hon. member refers to what was said in the House and if he wants to use his brains, he will easily understand. As the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) indicated, the deadline to sign an agreement with Lockheed to protect the cost and industrial benefits offered by that company as well as the delivery schedule was December 2. Indeed, on that date, the government sent a telex to Lockheed indicating our desire to negotiate a contract with that company.

Of course, the government was then considering how to meet its financial commitments, as shown by the agreements negotiated between the Crown and Lockheed.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—RECOMMENDATION TO CABINET PRIOR TO DECEMBER 2—ASSURANCE AS TO FINANCING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister since this was a Cabinet decision. Can he inform the House whether the Minister of Supply and Services, the Minister of National Defence or, indeed, the President of the Treasury Board, recommended to the Cabinet the course of action which led to the sending of that telegram on December 2, and in that recommendation did they assure the Prime Minister and other members of the Cabinet that there was no problem in terms of financing the project?

[Mr. McKinnon.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is just to cheer you up, Pierre.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: I am sorry, did the Prime Minister say "yes"?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has obviously mastered the art of loving, and he is now trying to—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Get to the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON PRIME MINISTER DID NOT ASK FOR RESIGNATIONS OF MINISTERS CONCERNED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I will get to the point, Mr. Speaker. If the recommendation came to the Cabinet, for confirmation of this deal with Lockheed, with the understanding there were no financial problems involved, in light of what has since transpired, why does the Prime Minister wait so long either to demand the resignation of the Minister of Supply and Services, the Minister of National Defence or, preferably, both?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered "yes" because these facts are well known by the House, and a resignation would be a complete non sequitur in relation to the question. The answer was "yes" because those facts were given repeatedly to the House several months ago by the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Supply and Services. I do not know why the opposition is only beginning to understand this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—TREATMENT OF CIVIL SERVANT—POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the right hon. Prime Minister who has just said that the House was aware of all the facts for months, when facts were brought to light yesterday that they were not known previously. I find the Prime Minister rather mute about the question put to the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Supply and Services. When you see them tossing the ball around back and forth as they are doing, one wonders if one is dealing with a ministerial or a baseball team, so much so that I even wonder if it might not be better than the Montreal Expos.

In view of the very touchy situation, yesterday the Minister of Supply and Services announced the transfer of a high official who did not remember what had happened a few months ago, and the suddenly remembered. Does the Prime Minister intend at least to transfer either minister to another job to spare the public, the Canadian taxpayers, apprehensions about the situation?

● (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is mistaken. When I said the facts were known, I was speaking of those with which the question of the leader of the New Democratic Party dealt. Obviously, yesterday the Minister of Supply and Services told us about a development which had been brought to his attention, but it was not what the leader of the NDP was talking about. The hon. members were made aware of the fact yesterday. The minister expressed his surprise and asked, according to normal procedure, the deputy minister and the persons responsible to see whether there had been any wrongdoing, and if so, how serious it was. I don't see what there is to fuss about.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE ON WHICH MINISTER WAS AWARE OF VERBAL AGREEMENT ON FINANCING

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. On Monday evening in the House the parliamentary secretary to the minister stated that the verbal arrangement in respect of the cash shortfall that was to be financed by Lockheed did not become known to the minister or the senior officials of his department until January and the minister said in the House that he did not know about the shortfall until subsequent to December 2. Will the minister say when he did first know about this verbal agreement, how he learned about it, where it was and what was the date?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, that is obvious and has been said many times. I would simply remind the hon. member that according to normal government procedure, the client department must provide the funding and necessarily take full responsibility for it. Now, it is normal that my department, when the time comes to sign the contract, if a department asks us to purchase an aircraft of a given type with certain specifications, should include them in the contract. The same thing applies to financial arrangements. When a department tells us about its financial situation, we include that in the contract, and that is all. It is as simple as that, I see no problem.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT TREASURY BOARD AND CABINET MEETINGS WHEN FINANCING APPROVED

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, it is very clear that the minister is purposely avoiding the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bawden: I invite the minister to answer my first question when he responds to my supplementary. In view of the fact that all the details of the verbal agreement with Lockheed and the interest payment for the Lockheed loan were approved at the Treasury Board meeting of November 27 and at the cabinet meeting the same day—and this point was confirmed in a Commons committee by the Minister of National Defence—will the Minister of Supply and Services say whether he attended the Treasury Board meeting that day and the cabinet meeting that day when these payments were authorized? If he did not attend those meetings did he receive the minutes of the Treasury Board meeting and the cabinet meeting subsequently?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): So, if the hon. member is so well informed as to say that the cabinet and the Treasury Board approved the expenditure, I cannot see then why he asks whether the financing was provided for on December 2.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: A final supplementary by the hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, will the minister say whether he knew about these details as a result of the cabinet meeting and the Treasury Board meeting or did the minister feel that $16 million was not enough for him to be involved?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, if we agreed on December 2 with Lockheed to sign a formal contract with them in the near future, it is because at that time it was necessarily understood that the expenses incurred until then could be met by the Department of National Defence.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ALLEGED ATTACK ON PUBLIC SERVANTS BY MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES—SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Government House Leader. In view of this veil of secrecy that seems to have fallen from the lips of the Minister of Supply and Services through which in an unprecedented way he has taken shots at specified public servants, an action virtually unprecedented in the history of this House, and he has done this to people who have no opportunity to defend themselves,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —will the Government House Leader agree to an immediate reference of this matter to the appropriate standing committee with a specific understanding that these officials against whom his colleague has made serious accusations be given a full opportunity to explain their side of the story and produce any and all the supporting documentation for the purpose of this presentation. I think we should get at the truth in this, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I make two comments with regard to the suggestion from the House leader of the opposition. First of all, if the House wants to inquire further into this matter of the minister there are many opportunities when they can do so on opposition days if they are really interested or they may prefer to keep a veil of secrecy over this matter which is apparently what they prefer to do. Certainly, if the civil servant in question has a grievance, as the hon. gentleman knows since he had a good deal to do with the legislation, there are plenty of opportunities for him to express it and to get justice.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—FAILURE OF MINISTER TO TAKE RESPONSIBILITY FOR ACTIONS OF CIVIL SERVANTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. As it has always been accepted procedure in all governments for a minister to accept full responsibility for the actions of the civil servants who work in his department, I ask the minister how he can possibly try to justify his actions of yesterday when he tried to avoid his responsibility in the Lockheed case, known now as the $16 million fiasco, by blaming one of his senior civil servants for something which obviously is the responsibility of the minister.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, First, I feel precisely that I have taken my responsibilities, and I have indicated in the House how I did so. If the House prefers not to be informed, it is its right, but I will not play this game.

Second, to the hon. member's allegation that the rights and privileges of a civil servant have been encroached upon, I will simply answer that if this civil servant does not accept the decision, the law exists and is very clear: he has 14 days to file a grievance. He may also, thanks to an amendment brought in by this party, appear before the Federal Court and take an action against the deputy minister and the minister, if he so wishes. That is clear enough.

[English]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. It is very obvious from the minister's answer that his idea of how he, as a minister, should treat his civil servants is completely different from the idea of those who have served in the cabinets of this country for over 100 years.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF FINANCIAL NEGOTIATIONS—INFORMATION GIVEN CABINET

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Arising out of the statement yesterday by the Minister of Supply and Services in which he said that neither he nor his deputy minister were informed of the financial negotiations by the Department of National Defence and Lockheed prior to December 2, I want to ask the Minister of National Defence if he was aware of the financial negotiations which were going on, and if he was did he at any time pass this information on to the Minister of Supply and Services? Did he place these facts before the cabinet when it met at its meeting of November 27?

● (1440)

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think it will help the House and the hon. member if I try to make a distinction between the shortfall and Lockheed's inability to finance the shortfall. The shortfall is the difference between the funds that were available in the Department of National Defence and the funds required for payments by Lockheed. That was clearly known in November and it was in the cabinet documents. I have described many times, before the committee and in other ways, that the government approved $100 million in interest for financing. If you are going to have interest for financing, you must be intending to borrow. If you are going to borrow, there must be a shortfall—that is self-evident. So that any number of cabinet ministers who attended those meetings knew there was a shortfall—that is clear.

The timing of Lockheed's inability to provide the interim financing may not be so clear. That was not known to me or to my colleagues until at least mid-December because Lockheed only told us then after the cabinet decision that they could not provide the financing. If anyone has misled anybody in these days it was Lockheed which misled us by saying they could provide the interim financing. It was not known to me until I returned from the NATO meeting in Brussels that they could not do so. I remember very well coming back here on about December 15 at which time my deputy minister told me for the first time that Lockheed were not able to do what they had said they could do. If that is what my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, is referring to, I would like the House to understand the difference. It is one thing to know about the shortfall—which I think we all knew about—and it is another thing to know about Lockheed's failure to provide interim financing, which came at a later date.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBLE REQUEST OF COMPANY FOR WRITTEN COMMITMENT ON FINANCING

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister, since the minister now says the problem lay in the interim financing which Lockheed was not able to supply or negotiate when the minister made his recommendation to cabinet on November 27 which was followed later by the telex sent out on December 2, whether he asked Lockheed for any written commitment that they could supply the interim financing or, in the absence of that assurance, whether he insisted on any provision being placed in the agreement that in the event that they were not able to supply the interim financing the contract was null and void and the Canadian people would have no financial responsibility?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Richardson: The officials who were negotiating with Lockheed expected to continue these negotiations. It did seem at the time completely reasonable that as the government of Canada had approved $953 million and, as I said, had approved more than $100 million for interest payments, the project was financeable. When Lockheed said that they could provide the interim financing—and we must remember we were still at that time also dealing with Boeing, it was still a battle between the two companies—Boeing also said they could provide the financing. So there was no attempt by anyone at that time to get confirmation of the Lockheed statement.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I take it from the minister that what the minister is saying is that he accepted a verbal assurance. I would have thought that one with his experience would know that a verbal assurance is not worth the paper it is written on.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ALLEGED NEW LOCKHEED PROPOSAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It is reported now that the Department of National Defence and Lockheed are looking at a new proposal for an Orion with less sophisticated equipment. Can the minister tell us anything about this deal which is being discussed and whether or not there is any problem of interim financing and who will supply it, or will we have another re-run of this horror movie?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in response to the first part of the question I would like to say that I believe, in fairness to the officials who were negotiating with Lockheed at the time, that they were concentrating exclusively on the terms of the contract and that they were not concentrating at that time—perhaps as they should have been or as we all should have been—

Some hon. Members: Now you got it.

Mr. Richardson: —on the financing aspects. But I can only repeat that with the interest payments approved by cabinet, and with the assurances from Lockheed as well as the fact that we were working in a tight time frame, I think it is understandable that we proceeded as we did.

In answer to the second question, Lockheed submitted an unsolicited proposal to us yesterday, and Boeing have also submitted a new proposal to us; these are now being studied.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE MINISTER KNEW OF SCHEDULE OF PAYMENTS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the ones asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, and it is addressed to the Minister of National Defence. The schedule of payments which was set out in the part contract tabled by the Minister of Supply and Services on May 25, at page 8 or 4 depending on whether you read the top of the page or the bottom, called for an expenditure of over $120 million by the Department of National Defence this year for the LRPA. Can the minister tell us when he first knew of the schedule of payments, and can he assure us that he did not know of that schedule of payments before December 2, because if he knew of the schedule of payments he cannot possibly say that he was satisfied that Lockheed would be able to find the money. They were asking for that payment.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): A schedule of payments was drawn up during the summer months. As I have said on other occasions, it was not known during those months whether the schedule of payments would be met by direct funding by the government or whether the restraint program of the government would suggest the advisability of financing the payments in the first, second and third year of the contract. It was only in the final weeks of the negotiation that the decision was made by the government that it was better to proceed by the financing route. So we actually in that sense changed from direct funding—which had originally been the concept—to another form of funding.

Oral Questions

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MINUTES OF CABINET AND TREASURY BOARD DEALING WITH CONTRACT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, it being very obvious that it is impossible to secure any clear and truthful answers to the various questions that have been asked—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and the desire of the government to cover up is apparent—I would ask the Prime Minister whether the Minister of Supply and Services—the $16 million kid—will be able to get away with his explanations placing responsibility of others, civil servants and the like, and on the Minister of National Defence, and whether he will produce the minutes of the cabinet and of the Treasury Board dealing with this matter and table them in the House. There is nothing constitutional against this. All we want to get is the truth, which apparently is not being secured through the questions that are asked here because of the type of answers that are being given which negate each other.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear the words "cover up" used by a party which hires secret detectives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1450)

Mr. Clark: Any evasion will do, won't it Pierre?

Mr. Trudeau: —and not only tries to hide the use of those detectives from the House but tries to hide it from the detectives themselves by going under another name.

An hon. Member: You know you are on weak ground.

Mr. Trudeau: As to the suggestion of the right hon. member, he is quite right—there is nothing I know of written in the constitution about this but there are of course certain constitutional conventions.

Mr. Clark: Such as ministerial responsibility.

Mr. Trudeau: If he wishes us to begin making public the minutes of cabinet and of the Privy Council we will consider it, providing he gives me the privilege of making public the minutes of his cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Another diversion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this gratuitous observation by the Prime Minister indicates that his mind is most uncertain on this and that is understandable after all the holidays he takes.

An hon. Member: Just say yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I again ask him whether he would produce those records. There is nothing constitutional against it being done. The President of the Privy Council said they would not permit this matter to go before a committee. What are they hiding and why? It becomes very clear that the Minister of National Defence is to become the scapegoat here. As far as I am concerned he is the only one who has shown any proof.

[Mr. Richardson.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the right hon. gentleman did not hear my answer. I indicated quite clearly that there was certainly a convention—

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no convention of that kind at all.

Mr. Trudeau: If there is no convention, Mr. Speaker, I take it from the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman that I am now free to make public, documents and minutes from his cabinet.

An hon. Member: Are you going to produce them, yes or no?

Mr. Diefenbaker: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. We on this side of the House have nothing to cover up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What I am endeavouring to do is to uncover an obvious loss to the Canadian people as a result of the stupidity of the Minister of Supply and Services.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I just indicated in an answer to the leader of the Social Credit party that in so far as the conduct of my ministers is concerned, they have given to the House the knowledge they had when they received it and I add that in so far as their conduct is concerned, il n'y a pas de quoi fouetter un chat.

INQUIRY WHETHER STOCKS OF DAIRY PRODUCTS HAVE BEEN PROPERLY CHECKED

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Could the minister assure the House that the total surplus of dairy products mentioned in the various reports submitted by the Canadian Dairy Commission agree with the stocks stored during the given periods?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is so much noise in the House I did not hear the first part of the question.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Get in on the cabinet meeting over there, Gene.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to repeat my question for the Minister of Agriculture. Since we will have the visit of farmers tomorrow who are wondering about a number of serious questions, could the minister assure the House that the total surplus of dairy products mentioned in various reports of the Canadian Dairy Commission fully agree with the stocks stored during these same periods?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, if I understood the question correctly the hon. member has asked about dairy stocks, if they are accurate. They have these changed from month to month because we are always disposing of some stocks, selling them domestically or selling on the world market. They have a sales program. I would say the stocks we have on hand and on record are fairly accurate from month to month.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—FACTORS PREVENTING CANADIAN BANKS FROM FINANCING THE CONTRACT

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. What were the factors that prevented the Canadian banking consortium from financing the $300 million Orion deal and was there any exploration of the possibility of the government involving itself in any way to allow the banks to do this bridge financing?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I really believe that is a question that should be answered by the banks.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH CONTRACT WOULD BE SIGNED—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF TELEX

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. On Monday the minister was asked about the content of the Telex he sent to Lockheed on December 2 last informing them that the government intended to sign a contract with them if certain conditions were met. The minister was asked what these conditions were and he replied that one was that Lockheed would have to get permission from the government of the United States to transfer certain pieces of manufacturing equipment to Canada. Can the minister now tell the House how many other conditions were enumerated in that Telex and what those conditions were?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me right, we then indicated to Lockheed that we were prepared to sign a formal contract on the condition, of course, that industrial windfalls would be taken into consideration and that the American government would grant permission to Lockheed to transfer some pieces of machinery to allow them to face their obligations in respect of industrial windfalls to Canada. We also told Lockheed that we would sign a contract in the near future.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that the minister says there is no cover-up, would he be prepared now to table the Telex and any reply to the Telex in question?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I think I did fully satisfy the wishes of the House. I tabled the documents—

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Goyer: —maybe I could finish? I tabled the documents which constituted our contractual commitment with Lockheed and then, of course, all other agreements automatically became void. What is before the House is the contractual commitment the government has with Lockheed, and the document is complete.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE ON WHICH MINISTER AWARE OF SHORTFALL IN FINANCING

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Supply and Services. In several statements the minister has made in the House and if he wants I can give him the dates and page numbers in Hansard, he said that it was only on December 2 that he was finally made aware of the basic funding difficulties in this whole transaction. He is shaking his head—is he shaking it no? You mean you knew of these difficulties before December 2 or have you—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: All right. On Monday evening the parliamentary secretary to the minister told the House at page 14015 of Hansard:

> The question of a shortfall of cash to be financed by Lockheed did not become known to the minister and to the senior management of DSS until January.

Which was it? Was it on December 2 or in January that the minister finally realized the basic funding difficulties in respect of this transaction?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, once again I beg the hon. member to be honest. Let him say on what page I mentioned it was on December 2. The Minister of National Defence replied that we had been informed that Lockheed could not fulfill its undertaking in mid or late December. At any rate, the important point is that it was after December 2. I think the hon. member ought to check in Hansard.

● (1500)

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I repeat: as reported on page 14015 of Hansard, on Monday evening of this week the minister's parliamentary said in the House, and I quote:

The question of a shortfall of cash to be financed by Lockheed did not become known to the minister and to the senior management of DSS until January.

Can the minister explain this discrepancy, please?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I have just answered the question. Would the hon. member tell me how large this looms in his mind?

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) on a point of order.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like very respectfully to point out that the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) did not have the opportunity to ask a supplementary while several members in the House today were able to put supplementary questions on very important matters. I have a supplementary question and I would be thankful to you for giving me the opportunity to direct it to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

43-DAY STRIKE OF CUPW WORKERS

Question No. 3,988—Mr. MacKay:

1. In the recent 43-day strike of CUPW workers, did the inside workers receive a pay cheque including pay for days not worked because of the strike and, if so, for how many extra days?

2. Is action being taken to recover the extra days pay and, if so, in what manner?

[Mr. Lawrence.]

3. How many inside workers did not return to work after the strike was settled?

4. Does the government plan to recover the extra days pay from workers who did not return and, if so, in what manner?

5. How much will be lost to the government if it is unable to recover the extra days pay from those who did not return to work?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. Yes. Nine days.

2. Yes, by deductions from subsequent cheques.

3. To give a proper estimate would require a survey of each staff post office and in all probability would not give us an accurate answer. In addition, the cost factor would be prohibitive.

4. Yes, from any termination payments that may be due. Where necessary, legal action will be taken.

5. The policy is to recover all debts.

PSYCHIATRISTS—MILLHAVEN

Question No. 4,170—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

For the years 1970 to 1975, what was the number of (a) full-time (b) part-time psychiatrists at Millhaven Institution and, in each case, what were their (i) educational qualifications (ii) previous work experiences in Canada and abroad (iii) salaries?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Nil.

LIVING UNIT-OFFICERS—LAVAL

Question No. 4,566—Mr. MacKay:

1. For the years 1970 to 1975, what was the number of living unit-officers at Laval?

2. Was their education (a) less than grade 10 (b) grade 10 to grade 12 (c) some college (d) beyond a first university degree?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Nil.

B.C. PENITENTIARY—LIVING UNIT-OFFICERS

Question No. 4,802—Mr. Reynolds:

1. For the years 1970 to 1975, what was the number of living unit-officers at British Columbia Penitentiary?

2. Was their education (a) less than grade 10 (b) grade 10 to grade 12 (c) some college (d) beyond a first university degree?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Nil.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—OLYMPIC ADVERTISING

Question No. 4,995—Mr. Howie:

What was the cost of the 1976 Post Office calendar advertising the Olympic Games and, to whom was it paid?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): The 1976 Post Office calendar did not advertise the Olympic Games per se. The calendar contained 12 pages of copy and illustration in addition to the 12 monthly calendar pages. The copy and illustrations served to communicate the role of the Post Office and its many services, and how users may employ these services to their advantage. One of the 12 pages explained the ways in which the Post Office supported the Olympic Games. The cost for the 1976 calendar was $146,480. Ashton-Potter Ltd. did the printing, and B. and B. Advertising Ltd. handled the artwork.

EDUCATIONAL RECOMMENDATION OF B. AND B. COMMISSION

Question No. 5,043—Mr. Jones:

1. In light of the provisions of Quebec's Official Language Act has the government considered the educational recommendation of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism that "we recommend that when both types of school exist in the community, the right of parents to send their children to either the majority language school or the official language minority school be recognized"?

2. Are any communities in Canada not following the recommendation and, if so, in which communities and in what provinces?

3. Has the government considered opposing Quebec's Official Language Act if and when the Act or any section thereof is referred to the courts?

4. Does the government support the Act?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister's and Privy Council Offices as follows: 1. Official-language teaching is not the responsibility of the federal government but rather that of the provinces.

2. Not applicable.

3. There is presently an action before the Courts challenging some sections of Quebec's Official Language Act. The trial before the Superior Court of Quebec has been concluded but a decision has not yet been rendered. While the Attorney General of Canada did not take an active part in the proceedings at that stage, he is a party thereto and has been and will be watching the proceedings carefully.

4. The Government is sympathetic to the object of the Act, which is to ensure the continued strength and development of the French language in Quebec. The Government does regret, however, those provisions which are not consonant with current trends towards the expansion of linguistic rights in Canada.

CNR STATION CLOSURES

Question No. 5,087—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

1. In the past three years, how many Quebec station masters have been suspended or discharged as a result of CNR station closures?

2. How many had more than (a) ten (b) fifteen (c) twenty (d) twenty-five years of service?

3. What (a) are the names and addresses of the stations closed by CNR in these years (b) were the reasons given by the CNR to close the stations (c) will be the future use of the closed stations?

4. What is the current location of the services related to transportation, such as telegraphic services for each community now deprived of stations that provided CNR telegraphic services?

5. What is the situation in l'Île Verte in relation to the services offered to the population, such as, station master, telegraphic services, ticket counter, etc.?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. None.

2. Not applicable.

3. (a), (b) and (c) The stations at the following locations have been closed by authority of Canadian Transport Commission: St. Benoit, St. Jacques, Marieville, St. Placide, Beauharnois, Nicolet, St. Andrews East, Chambly, and, it is proposed to dispose of the buildings through public advertisement. At many locations Station Agents have been replaced by an On-Hand Representative or by a Caretaker who continues to provide the service required at each location. At stations where passenger traffic is very limited planning is in progress to replace the station building with another structure more suitable to meet customer requirements.

4. Telephone zenith service is available at locations where a Station Agent was previously employed. Customers can dial a Servocentre serving the territory and obtain the desired information at no additional cost. Telegraphic services are made available in a similar manner offering a 24 hour service, seven days per week.

5. Subject to CTC approval for closure of the station at Ile Verte, and On-Hand Representative will handle Express requirements. Other services will be available via zenith telephone. Passengers may purchase tickets on board the train or through the Rivière-du-Loup-Rimouski Servocentre on advance notice, with tickets being mailed to the customer, or they may be purchased from on open agency.

1975-76 SUBSIDIARY AGREEMENT ON HIGHWAYS

Question No. 5,250—Mr. Marshall:

As a result of the 1975-76 subsidiary agreement on highways between the government and the Province of Newfoundland, amounting to $22 million, what highways' work (a) was carried out (b) remains to be carried out in the present year?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: Under the 1975-76 Highways Subsidiary Agreement between the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Government of Newfoundland; (a) All contracts for highway construction as outlined in the schedule of cost to the Agreement were awarded, and construction to the value of $18.3-million was completed prior to the expiration of the 1975-76 fiscal year; (b) The remaining construction under these contracts (to the value of $3.7-million) will be completed in the 1976-77 fiscal year.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT—SPOUSE'S ALLOWANCE

Question No. 5,254—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. Since the inauguration of the Spouse's Allowance under the Old Age Security Act, how many Allowances, in each month, have been granted and how many are now being paid?

2. What is the average amount paid in the latest month for which records are available?

3. Since the inauguration of the Spouse's Allowance, how many Allowances, in each month, have been cancelled because of the death of the older spouse?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1.

Order Paper Questions

Month	Number Spouse's Allowance Granted	Total
October, 1975	7,901	7,901
November, 1975	28,770	36,671
December, 1975	5,567	42,238
January, 1976	3,679	45,917
February, 1976	4,476	50,393
March, 1976	3,801	54,194

2. $136.92, as of March, 1976.

3. October, 1975, 108; November, 1975, 149; December, 1975, 174; January, 1976, 197; February, 1976, 204; March, 1976, 200.

AIR CANADA PASSES

Question No. 5,266—Mr. Cossitt:

Have the wives or any members of the families of any Deputy Ministers or other senior public service officials travelled on Air Canada with passes or any other type of free transporation with Air Canada during 1975 and 1976 and, if so, what are the names of such persons along with the job designations of their spouses?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: Each year, a number of individual trip passes are issued, in accordance with CTC regulations, to spouses of some government officials who hold annual passes on Air Canada. These individual trip passes allow the spouses to accompany the official on certain specific occasions. Records of these issues, unlike those relating to Cabinet Ministers' spouses, are included with other general pass issues, and it would require an inordinate amount of clerical time and cost to search for and find the information.

HELICOPTER SERVICE BETWEEN DORVAL AND MIRABEL AIRPORTS

Question No. 5,308—Mr. Cossitt:

Has the government given any consideration to the establishment of passenger and baggage helicopter service between Dorval and Mirabel Airports to facilitate quicker and easier passage of passengers making connecting flights and, if not (a) for what reason (b) will the matter be given consideration?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Transport Canada has not given any consideration to the establishment of passenger and baggage helicopter service between Dorval and Mirabel Airports. (a) Reasons: (i) A bus service is already being provided by the Montreal Urban Transportation Committee, scheduled every half hour between 1330 and 2330 (peak period at Mirabel) and every hour between 0600 and 1300, for a total of 29 return trips per day; (ii) Current departmental policy leaves the provision of all such services open for competition; to this date there has been no application by private companies. (b) Future Considerations: Transport Canada has no intention of changing current policy with respect to the provision of such services. However consideration will be given to provision of services by other modes.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

MAGI CORPORATION

Question No. 5,356—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What is the government's actual cash contribution to date in respect of the MAGI Corporation in Halifax-Dartmouth?

2. How much has been spent on (a) administration (b) grants or loans of any type to the private sector made pursuant to the articles of incorporation?

3. On what date was the Corporation established?

4. Does the government expect the Corporation to be in operation (a) before (b) after the date of the next general election?

5. What factors are presently restraining the Corporation's operation, if any?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. March 29, 1973, $5,001,000 in share capital; March 30, 1973, $4,999,000 loan to Nova Scotia.

2. (a) A total of $3,168 was spent on administration to the end of the 1974-75 fiscal year. The audited statement for FY 1975-76 will be available shortly; (b) MAGI had not made any loans or grants to the end of the 1974-75 fiscal year.

3. The agreement with Nova Scotia to establish MAGI was signed September 22, 1972; consequential memoranda and articles of association were signed with the Province on March 21, 1973; and Mr. Haysom was appointed chief executive officer of MAGI on September 26, 1975.

4. MAGI is now operational.

5. Not applicable.

APPLICATIONS FOR EMPLOYMENT ON RIDEAU CANAL

Question No. 5,396—Mr. Cossitt:

How many persons have applied for employment on the Rideau Canal since January 1, 1975 and of these (a) how many were residents of the constituency of Leeds (b) how many were hired (c) how many were interviewed and by whom (d) what is a full description of the hiring methods of Rideau Canal officials (e) were any hirings made on the basis of politics and, if so, how many (f) were any representations whatsoever received from Liberal Party Associations or Liberal Party Executive members in respect to any persons hired and, if so, from whom were such recommendations received and who were the persons subsequently hired?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 651; (a) 102; (b) 282; (c) 529 interviewed by area superintendents and area supervisors; (d) hiring methods—Public Service Commission Acts and Regulations on hiring; (e) No hirings were made on a political basis; (f) No.

DREE—COST OF ANNUAL REPORTS

Question No. 5,419—Mr. MacKay:

1. What was the cost of producing the Annual Reports of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in 1974 and 1975?

2. (a) Were the publications printed by the Department or by a private firm (b) if contracts were let, were public tenders called?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. Refer to recently-tabled responses to Questions 5,034 and 5,036.

2. (a) The 1973-74 report was printed by the Canadian Government Printing Bureau. The 1974-75 Report and Review was printed by a private firm; (b) The printer was selected through regular Department of Supply and Services public tendering procedures.

MANITOBA GOVERNMENT AIR DIVISION LICENCES

Question No. 5,422—Mr. Epp:

1. Has the Air Transport Committee issued a Class 7 specialty licence to the Manitoba Government Air Division?

2. Has the Committee issued a Class 4 licence for charter to the Manitoba Government Air Division?

3. Is the Manitoba Air Division presently a holder of a licence that qualifies it to engage in charter work?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes, Licence No. A.T.B. 310/47(C).

2. No.

3. Yes; however, the licence was issued as Class 7, pursuant to Section 6 of the Air Carrier Regulations, as the service being provided is not compatible in its entirety with the definition of a Class 4 Charter commercial air service. By the terms of the licence, the Licensee is expressly prohibited from providing any form of commercial air service other than the following: (a) Flights required in connection with the health and welfare of the Indian population in Manitoba; (b) Transport of Government officials and staff of the Province of Manitoba; (c) Emergency service for isolated areas within the Province; (d) Transport of Federal Government personnel on passenger/mile basis only when the services of such personnel and their transportation is being paid by the Province of Manitoba and/or in exceptional circumstances where there is no adequate scheduled or non-scheduled services available to render the desired transportation; (e) Transport of members of the R.C.M. Police on Federal Government business in isolated areas only when a planned commercial flight or other means of transportation on which passage has not been booked requires a delay of more than 24 hours and no additional flying or landings are required to perform such transportation. In exceptional circumstances where there is no adequate scheduled or non-scheduled services available to render the desired transportation, such provision of transportation will be undertaken only with the authority of the Director of Air Service or the Deputy Minister of Mines and Natural Resources, and all such flights will be reported to the Committee on a monthly basis. The Licensee is restricted in its operations to Groups A, B and C aircraft (i.e.,—aircraft not in excess of 18,000 pounds maximum take-off weight on wheels).

MIRABEL AIRPORT—DE-ICING FACILITIES

Question No. 5,439—Mr. Herbert:

1. Was the tender call for the control aircraft de-icing facilities at Mirabel International Airport cancelled before the stated time for the opening of tenders?

2. Were any tenders received opened by officials of the Department of Transport?

3. What is the practice or procedure followed concerning tender documents received prior to the (a) cancellation of a tender call (b) announcement of an extension of time for the receipt of tenders?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The tender call for the aircraft de-icing facilities was scheduled to close on November 21, 1975. The tender call was cancelled by a telegram to interested parties on November 20, 1975.

2. No tenders were received.

3. (a) Tender documents received prior to the cancellation of a tender call are returned unopened; (b) Tender documents remain sealed until the officially published tender closing time. Tender documents received prior to the announcement of an extension of a tender call may be withdrawn at the option of the tenderer so that he may resubmit his tender to reflect any changes that he may deem advisable. The tenderer could also elect to leave his tender with the Department and amend his bid by registrered letter prior to the tender closing time.

CEMA

Question No. 5,451—Mr. Beatty:

1. When will the Minister of Agriculture appoint a third member to the three-man body overseeing the operations of CEMA?

2. Did the Minister appoint Mr. John Hyde Chairman to the body overseeing the operation of CEMA and, if not, who did?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. A number of individuals have been interviewed and an appointment will be made as soon as possible.

2. No. CEMA elected Mr. Hyde to act as temporary Chairman until a new one is appointed by the Minister.

COST OF TRIPS MADE BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

Question No. 5,474—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 3,240 which stated in part that one specific trip made by the Minister of Agriculture, his wife and members of his family cost the taxpayers $13,965, does this represent the average cost of each of the 32 trips made by the Minister and his family at public expense since January 26, 1973?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No.

NUMBER OF TAKEOFFS AND LANDINGS BY SCHEDULED AIRCRAFT

Question No. 5,483—Mr. Stevens:

For the years 1973, 1974 and 1975, by quarter, what were the total number of (a) takeoffs (b) landings by scheduled aircraft at (i) Toronto International Airport, Terminal 1 (ii) Montreal International Airport (Dorval) (iii) Montreal International Airport (Mirabel)?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The following table contains statistics on scheduled air carrier aircraft movements for 1973, 1974 and 1975. The data are presented on a quarterly basis for (i) Toronto International Airport; (ii) Montreal International Airport (Dorval); (iii) Montreal International Airport (Mirabel). The data in the table are for takeoffs plus landings. On a quarterly basis, there is a negligible difference between the number of takeoffs and of landings.

Therefore, the numbers presented can be divided by two to obtain either takeoffs or landings.

NOTE: Figures that appear for Toronto International Airport include scheduled traffic associated with both Terminal 1, Terminal 2, and the cargo terminal, as the same runways serve all terminals.

QUESTIONS NOS. 3,801 AND 3,802

Question No. 5,526—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 3,801 concerning $36,000, paid under contract to a language training school by Statistics Canada for which no services were received and with reference to the answer to Question No. 3,802 concerning failure of the CBC to record an amount of $14,053,000 interest owed on government loans in its 1975 financial statement and with reference to the answer to Question No. 3,803 referring to losses amounting to $40,000 and $48,000 to the Post Office Department on December 7 and 10, 1974 as a result of two forged certified cheques in payment of postage stamps and the subsequent answers thereto which stated such questions should be asked before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts (a) has it now become government policy that standing committees have priority over the House of Commons insofar as the asking of questions is concerned (b) is this the beginning of a new government policy to eliminate the asking of Order Paper questions in the House of Commons?

[Mr. Goodale.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): (a) It has always been government policy to comply with the rules and practices of Parliament. Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms has for many years been considered to be an authoritative guide in these matters. Citation 171(hh) of the fourth edition of Beauchesne clearly indicates that questions, oral or written, must not "seek information about proceedings in a Committee which has not yet made its report to the House."; (b) See answer to part (a) above.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 100 and 101?

[Text]

COPIES OF CORRESPONDENCE ON PROPOSED SWINE INFLUENZA VACCINATION PROGRAM

Motion No. 100—Mr. Yewchuk:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence and minutes of meetings between the Minister and officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the ministers and officials of the various departments of health of the provinces on the implementation of a national swine influenza vaccination programme.

[Translation]

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, considering the urgency of the action required following the meeting held on March 23 by the National Advisory Committee on Immunizing Agents (see Statements and Recommendations by this committee, tabled on March 30, Sessional Paper No. 301-7/51), no correspondence or minutes of meetings have been exchanged between, on the one hand, the minister and the officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare and, on the other hand, the ministers and agents from the various provinces concerning the implementation of the national swine influenza vaccination program. Consultations were made by telephone at that time.

[English]

In view of this, I request the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps this notice of motion for the production of papers might be allowed to stand until the next time such motions are called. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

COPIES OF CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO SWINE INFLUENZA VACCINE

Motion No. 101—Mr. Yewchuk:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all papers relating to calculations by means of which the Minister of National Health and Welfare arrived at his estimate for the cost of swine influenza vaccine at $0.60-$1.00 per dose.

[English]

An hon. Member: Stand.

Motion stands.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, May 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stevens (p. 13901), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Saltsman (p. 13905.)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like in my remarks today to provide further information regarding the budget announcement relating to employment matters, to deal with some of the unfounded criticisms which have been raised, and to outline the government's views regarding an employment strategy for Canada. I will try to condense my remarks into the 30-minute period allotted, but may need to ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes of extra time.

May I put the employment aspects of the budget in context by reminding hon. members that the June, 1975, budget announced a two-year program of expanded manpower activities. We are currently in the second year of that program and our regular manpower budgets are being augmented as follows: first, there is a $40 million increase in institutional and industrial training bringing the total available for training in the fiscal 1976-77 to $522 million, and enabling the training this fiscal year of over 305,000 Canadians; second, there is an additional $2 million for our mobility program, expanding our budget in 1976-77 to $13.7 million. This enables us to undertake the permanent relocation of 15,000 families, and covers other mobility grants to between 40,000 and 45,000 workers. Next, there is an enrichment of our job finding and placement services, costing an extra $3 million, and involving an additional staff of 150 for our Canada Manpower centres. Finally, there is a $100 million job creation program for next winter. It is untrue to say we are doing nothing this year for the unemployed.

We are continuing to analyse the labour market prospects and are carefully considering whether additional funds should or could be provided. In the meantime, plans are proceeding, based on the approved level of financing. I shall announce the details of the 1976-77 Local Initiatives Program in a few days.

While not minimizing the seriousness of the situation during the present fiscal year, 1976-77, I should like to focus my remarks today primarily on the longer term employment problems and prospects of our country for 1977 through to 1981.

Mr. Stanfield: Where is your crystal ball?

Mr. Andras: I am about to look into it.

Mr. Stanfield: I cannot see it.

Mr. Andras: Our best estimate is that labour force growth will be somewhat less over the next five years than it was in the past ten years, but I caution that labour force forecasts are extremely hazardous. We know fairly well how many youths will come into the labour market each year and we know how many workers will retire or die. We can and we will control immigration. However, we cannot accurately forecast what will happen to participation rates. Moreover, we know that while we have a labour force of about ten million people at any given time, there are actually closer to 13 million Canadians who work during the year, and almost five million job changes. How many of these part-time or intermittent workers will become or even want to become full-time regular employees, we just cannot tell with precision, but we can make some rough forecasts based on certain assumptions.

● (1510)

First, we are assuming a somewhat slower growth in participation rates than over the past few years. We are also assuming a reduction in immigration from a gross level of about 200,000 in the last two years to under 150,000. With these assumptions, we forecast labour force growth at from 1.1 million to 1.2 million over the next five years.

We also forecast that employment growth will exceed labour force growth by about 100,000. That will bring unemployment down only gradually. That is of great concern to us, and the government is therefore committed to reducing—

An hon. Member: Is that five years?

Mr. Andras: 1977 through 1981, five years, yes. The government is committed to reducing this unacceptable level of unemployment by direct job creation and other measures which I will outline today, and in more detail in the fall session.

Our goal is not necessarily a 5½ per cent or even 5 per cent unemployment rate. Our goal is the fullest employment rate possible in light of inflationary pressures and the international economic situation. It must be realized, as the Economic Council of Canada recently pointed out, that unemployment in Canada is not as simple or as comprehensible as it once was. There is an over-all shortage of jobs, but a significant proportion of current unemployment is caused by structural problems, problems such as the particular difficulties of youth, of women, of native peoples, the handicapped, or regional economic disparities, and skill mismatches.

Some unemployment, which we call frictional unemployment, results from the sheer dynamism of the labour market which even in the best of economic times always has some people between jobs. Some other unemployment is the effect of our lessening but still significant seasonal labour market fluctuations.

We analysed the available data. We concluded that the 1975 unemployment rate of about 7 per cent was composed roughly of four percentage points of frictional and structural unemployment, 2.7 percentage points of cyclical unemployment, and about .3 per cent of seasonal unemployment. We therefore see that over half of our unemployment is due to frictional and structural causes. This situation simply cannot be solved by any one program or policy nor by simplistic generalized solution. It requires an array of more fully developed and precisely aimed manpower programs focusing specifically on each element of the unemployment total.

It is clear that we must improve and expand our policy and programs to create jobs, to provide occupational training and mobility, to help the disadvantaged and the handicapped and to help young people bridge the growing gap between school and work. We have been developing comprehensive and effective manpower programs and services, but let's face the fact that, frankly, the costs are enormous.

It takes about $200 million to shave less than one quarter of a percentage point from our unemployment rate for a full year by putting the unemployed into training or job creation projects.

To reduce our current unemployment to 5 per cent would cost about $2 billion more per year using training, and a local initiatives type program which is by far the cheapest available to government.

We have scoured the world and we have concluded that the best job creation approach is one which does the following: first, expands the stock of regular jobs in the private sector as much as possible without generating a new round of inflation; second, maximizes our utilization of existing jobs by improved manpower services, mobility and training, and by a tighter control of immigration.

We are doing all these things, and in 1976 we shall receive 40,000 to 50,000 fewer immigrants than in 1975, and tighten up our issuance of employment visas to temporary workers.

An hon. Member: That is not what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said.

Mr. Andras: It is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said. I heard him last night. I say that in spite of the lead story of the CBC. I suggest that the hon. member obtain a transcript before making any further comments.

Third, we want a plan that creates as many jobs by direct job creation programs as we can afford, at the lowest possible overhead cost, and with the least possible disruption of the regular private sector labour market.

[Mr. Andras.]

We need resources to do the job. We need money. We also need a new policy approach and employment strategy. Our labour market is too dynamic and our problems too complex and fluid to be able to afford a fragmented, inefficient approach to employment policy and to the organization of the labour market.

That is why we are merging the UIC and the Department of Manpower and Immigration into the new Commission and Department of Employment and Immigration, and that is why I propose that the new organization should benefit from the continued and strengthened participation of business and labour in its work, both at the national policy level and at the local operational level. I shall have more to say about this when I introduce a bill in the next session of parliament to authorize the integration.

For the same reason I feel strongly that the activities of all levels of government in the labour market must be better co-ordinated. I have recently met with my provincial colleagues and we are unanimously agreed on this point. We plan to meet early in the fall to deal with a number of major issues involving not only the effectiveness of federal efforts and plans, but also such matters as the growing concern about the lack of effective linkage between the worlds of school and work which contributes to our high unemployment among youth in Canada.

With this strong institutional base, and co-operation with the private sector and between governments, we can reduce our employment problems in Canada if we can find the resources to do so, and I shall try to explain how resources might be made available.

I have long been concerned about the anomaly in Canada of substantial numbers of unemployed people receiving income maintenance on the one hand while there is a great deal of public work and training which needs to be done, and a shortage of public funds to do it. For that reason, I have proposed an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act which will allow the government to develop programs whereby Canadians who are in receipt of unemployment insurance can participate in public employment programs and occupational training.

The principle underlying this proposal is that unemployment is costly not only for our economy and society but most particularly for the worker who loses his or her job. Idleness brings loss of skills and of confidence, and erodes the worker's feeling of participating in his community. While he needs, and has a right to, income maintenance, we would like to be able to offer him something more.

● (1520)

We are now developing job creation models in which workers who are likely to be unemployed and on unemployment insurance for some months would be invited to participate in activities of social value for the betterment of their communities. We have in mind projects which could utilize many of the best features of earlier Local Initiatives Programs but which could be tailored more carefully to the needs of the individual and the community. There could be included arrangements for the individual to spend some time in a continued job search and in job counselling.

Our plan would be to have participants continue to receive U.I. benefits and we would provide other moneys, for example, for cost of work allowances and project overhead costs, from additional moneys which would have to be voted for this purpose.

Some people are repeatedly on unemployment insurance because they lack basic job skills and they would benefit from occupational training or retraining. There is already some integration of unemployment insurance and training allowances but the system is complex, and unfortunately the training program cannot accommodate all who need training. We have been experimenting in Newfoundland with a pilot scheme to use unemployment insurance more productively in financing training, and our experience to date warrants expansion of such projects.

Another potential developmental use of unemployment insurance is the short work week. A well-established system in Europe enables enterprises which propose to lay off part of their work force to retain all workers on the job but on shorter hours, with allowances being paid in respect of the difference between the hours worked and the normal work week. Naturally it would require the co-operation and agreement of both company and union, and initially it would be done on a very selective basis. It has the great advantage of maintaining job attachment and skills of workers during temporary business downturns.

Other aspects of the unemployment insurance program also require change, primarily for reasons of equity and to promote a more effective labour market. In the course of our comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance program we have identified certain categories of workers for whom present coverage can be regarded as inappropriate.

The efficiencies and savings in the unemployment insurance program which we will be able to achieve if parliament approves our proposed changes will provide us with additional resources to devote to the prevention and alleviation of unemployment—and that is how we intend to use those resources. Mr. Speaker, Canada has one of the most efficient and comprehensive unemployment insurance programs in the world, but it must constantly be adapted to meet changes in society and in the labour market. The proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act announced in the budget are designed to make that program more effective in protecting Canadian workers from the economic impact of unemployment, without in the process unnecessarily spending money which would be better allocated to employment programs.

During our comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance program we devoted particular attention to the benefit structure which in many respects is the core of the legislation. Based on our own analyses and the advice and comments we have received from many private organizations and individuals, we reached the conclusion that a recasting of the benefit structure is now in order.

The proposals we have in mind are designed to enhance motivation to work, to achieve a greater degree of simplicity, and to provide more equity. A greater degree of simplicity will be obtained by reducing the number of phases from the present five to three. There will be a more equitable relationship between the number of insured weeks and benefit entitlement in the initial benefit period. Greater equity will result from eliminating the national unemployment rate as a trigger for extended benefits, and basing regional extended benefits entirely on regional unemployment rates which are a better indication of the difficulty of obtaining and retaining employment.

While the benefit entitlement of those with a shorter labour force attachment will in general be curtailed, adequate income protection will continue to be provided for those with longer labour force attachment and for those residing in regions with high unemployment rates.

In summary, the benefit structure based on three phases of initial phase, labour force attachment phase, and regionally extended benefits phase will be designed to provide continuing adequate income replacement during periods, and in regions of high unemployment, but will result in curtailed benefits and reduced costs at lower rates of unemployment.

We also propose to increase the minimum entrance requirement for the unemployment insurance program from eight to 12 insured weeks. The purpose of this amendment is to bring unemployment insurance more in line with realistic principles of social insurance programs and with the realities of the labour market. The Canadian unemployment insurance program now ranks among the best and most generous in the world. At eight weeks our entrance requirement is the most generous in the world, and we will still be among the most generous national schemes at 12 weeks. Since the announcement of this proposal I have been gratified by the reaction in the Canadian press and from many people in both the private and public sectors.

Mr. Broadbent: Chambers of Commerce!

Mr. Andras: No, not Chambers of Commerce.

Mr. Broadbent: Name one provincial government, then!

Mr. Andras: Yes, I can. I will get the documentation about which I talked to the hon. member the other day.

However, in the past few days we have also heard from a wide array of critics who have either stated or implied that the government intends to throw 330,000 persons off the unemployment insurance rolls and on to the provincial and municipal welfare rolls.

Mr. Peters: That is right.

Mr. Andras: The alleged impact of our proposal has been denounced as tampering with a very fine unemployment insurance program at a time of high unemployment, and simply shifting the burden of cost on to the provinces. These critics have based their statements on a complete misunderstanding of the facts of the situation, which I would like to clarify.

Mr. Peters: Talk to Mackasey and Herb Breau.

Mr. Andras: Reference has been made to a figure of 330,000 individuals who would be affected by the increased entrance requirement. It is essential to interpret this figure correctly. It is an estimate of the total number of individuals who, on the basis of eight to 11 weeks of insured earnings, would receive benefits during the whole of 1976 at an unemployment rate of 7 per cent. This does not mean, as has been alleged by many commentators, that at any moment of time in the year 330,000 people would be affected. Because the average duration of benefits extends only for a portion of the year—17 weeks—at any moment in time only about 100,000 individuals would be affected. It is nonsense and irresponsible to argue that all of these individuals will, as a result of a higher entrance requirement, be prevented from receiving benefits and will be, in fact, taken off the unemployment insurance rolls.

Based on our analysis of the work behaviour patterns of the "eight to 11 weekers," we have estimated that a substantial number of them, indeed between 40 and 50 per cent, will be able immediately or within the qualifying period to work for the additional four weeks and thereby qualify at the higher entrance requirement. This in fact means that at any moment of time only abo ıt 50,000 individuals nationally would not be able to receive benefits.

Particular concern has been expressed about the Atlantic provinces where employment conditions are less favourable. In these provinces we estimate that at any point in time only 10,000 individuals would not be able immediately to find 12 weeks of insured earnings.

In order to assess the impact of the higher entrance requirement on the 50,000 individuals in Canada as a whole, or the 10,000 individuals in the Atlantic provinces, it is essential to bear the fundamental characteristics of those individuals in mind. The overwhelming majority of them, indeed about 80 per cent, have no dependants. This would mean that of those excluded from benefits at any point in time, only 10,000 individuals in Canada as a whole, or 2,000 people in the Atlantic provinces, would have dependants.

Moreover, the eight to 11 weekers, as we call them, are approximately four years younger on average than the remainder of the claimants. Almost half of them are under 25 years of age. Many of the eight to 11 weekers are in fact secondary earners, such as working wives and young persons living at home. They are members of families who already have a main breadwinner. Studies have shown that in many cases these families have incomes in the middle and higher ranges.

As a result of this analysis, Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that very few of the eight to 11 weekers will find it necessary to turn to welfare. Moreover, it is our intention to direct our developmental programs of training and job creation to those individuals and areas requiring assistance to establish more stable employment patterns.

Furthermore, I want to make the point that a study of 1974 claimants found that 64 per cent of the group with eight to 11 weeks' attachment at that time had dropped out of the labour force one year later, by March, 1975. We did not know these facts before; these figures have all come out of the recent analysis. Many of these people subsequently re-entered the labour force and worked for a sufficiently long period of time to establish another unemployment insurance claim. In other words, many of this group are particularly prone to move in and out of the labour force, in and out of jobs, on and off claim, and apparently suffer little or no hardship.

[Mr. Andras.]

Contrary to the popular impression, Mr. Speaker, seasonal employment patterns are not the prime cause. Only 30 per cent of the eight to 11 weekers have established a seasonal type repeat pattern. This compares with 43 per cent for those with major labour force attachments. Our belief that claimants with eight to 11 weeks of insured employment have little difficulty moving in and out of the labour force has been reinforced by other statistics. For example, eight to 11 weekers have a greater tendency to draw down their full entitlement under the act than the claimants with 12 or more weeks of insured employment. However, we cannot really conclude from this that things are tougher for them; quite the contrary. A 1973 survey showed that 70 per cent of all eight to 11 weekers have found work within six weeks of exhausting their benefits. And what happened to the remaining claimants who did not find a job after six weeks? This is the welfare question.

Despite the fact that of all UI claimants, exhaustees could be assumed to be the most needy—"exhaustees" are those people who have run out their full entitlement—it was found that only 8 per cent of exhaustees resorted to welfare, or less than 2 per cent of the total unemployment insurance claimants.

These figures may be taken as an indication of two things. First, eight to 11 weekers who want or need to take another job tend to find one very quickly once UI benefits are no longer available. Secondly, many of those who do not find a job do not do so because they were not seriously tied to the labour force in the first place.

Some critics have pointed to the fact that eight to 11 weekers tend to be low wage earners, and that is quite true. But these claimants usually have no dependants, as I have indicated; they are usually young, mobile, and generally more successful in finding new employment, and are often secondary workers and members of middle to higher income families. I think that places the fact that they are also low wage earners in an entirely different perspective.

Critics have said that this proposal for a 12 week entrance requirement will hurt the Atlantic provinces or hurt Quebec. I can assure hon. members from high unemployment areas that we will tilt our expanded manpower programs and services so that the unemployed in those areas will not suffer financially from this change but in fact will gain from the productive impact of these enhanced programs.

What is the effect on the cost of the unemployment insurance program of providing coverage to a group with such an unstable and marginal attachment to the labour force, a group which can move in and out of employment and in and out of the labour market, suffering little economic consequence? This is the effect, Mr. Speaker. The cost ratio of claimants with eight to 11 insured weeks is 20 times the ratio for the average claimant. I believe that this money could be better spent. I believe that priority and funding should go to programs which deal more directly with the underlying problems of the labour market.

It is and always has been one of the primary concerns and purposes of the unemployment insurance program to help workers maintain a steady, constant connection with the labour market. In retrospect, Mr. Speaker, now we have the experience and the analysis of five to six years under our belt, I think that the eight week entrance requirement has not been successful in furthering this goal and in fact has created a disincentive in the labour market.

I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that there may be some genuine hardship for a few in this group. In order to keep off welfare any eight to 11 weekers who are in genuine difficulty in finding and keeping steady employment, surely it would be much more appropriate to develop and strengthen special job creation, job counselling, and mobility programs targeted to specific groups and specific areas, and tailored to suit the needs of youth and marginal attachees to the work force. These new or expanded programs will, in my opinion, give the right kind of help to any eight to 11 weeker who really needs help.

It should also be stressed that even with the higher number of weeks of insured employment, Canada's entrance requirement for unemployment insurance will remain, apart from The Netherlands, the most generous of any industrialized country in the world. For example, Sweden's entrance requirement is based on 12 months of contributions, five being within the last year.

Mr. Broadbent: But what has been their average unemployment level over the last ten years?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the minister but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the minister have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Andras: In the United Kingdom 26 weeks in the previous year are required for minimum benefits, and 50 weeks for maximum benefits. In Germany the entrance requirement is 26 weeks within the last three years.

Mr. Broadbent: They have 1.5 per cent unemployment too.

Mr. Andras: This package of proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act will also bring about a change in the severance pay provision. The existing UI regulations treat severance pay as earnings for the purpose of unemployment insurance benefits. We have examined this and I feel that there is a very good reason to treat severance pay as a form of deferred savings which are accumulated during the period of employment.

The fact is that many employers and unions are able to work out mutually satisfactory arrangements for the purpose of getting around that existing regulation, so I think it should be revoked. Other amendments are designed to increase the incentive to work, for example, with respect to the so-called "four week rule". This rule now means that an individual who does not receive extended benefits for four weeks or more has his claim permanently terminated. Experience has indicated that this rule has clearly served as a deterrent for claimants to return to short-term work that last longer than four weeks, so therefore we propose to eliminate it.

They are the major changes that I propose to make in the unemployment insurance program at this time. The primary purpose of the changes is to promote a more equitable and effective labour market and to free funds for more productive use in job creation and training. With these funds, and the potential flexibility offered by the other amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, I expect to be able to recommend to my colleagues an employment strategy for the years ahead which would include these elements: a new, year-round, multi-faceted, direct job creation program which would build on the successes of earlier Local Initiative Programs; take account of the proposals of the Economic Council and others; and attack cyclical, seasonal, area-specific, and, to some extent, structural unemployment, in ways tailored to local needs and targeted to areas and groups suffering high unemployment.

For example, unemployed heads of families not eligible for unemployment insurance would be given a special priority in entry to this program, which would include a creative linkage of all labour market programs, particularly the more productive use of unemployment insurance in developmental activities; a strategy for youth employment covering not only student summer employment but the more serious and pervasive problems of unemployed school dropouts and graduates; it would require expanded training and mobility programs, and other employment policies which respond to the needs of particular groups of workers and employers, and which support economic and manpower adjustments and productivity improvement.

I have outlined today a number of legal and institutional changes which will facilitate, in my opinion and in the opinion of the government, a more effective employment policy in this country. I will be announcing details of that policy in the months to come, and in the meantime I truly invite hon. members' ideas and suggestions and will welcome them. This is going to require a lot of work and it will be a difficult exercise with all the interfaces we have to examine. I must emphasize again that we need amendments to legislation to give effect to this policy and to secure the necessary financial resources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, before the minister resumes his seat I should like to ask if he would give an indication—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Just a minute. Order, please. Will the minister entertain questions from two Progressive Conservative members and one New Democratic Party member in order that the time can be taken off for those questions?

Mr. Andras: If the House wishes.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief question for the minister. In the course of his speech he gave an undertaking, indeed I think he used the word "guarantee", that no one in any high unemployment area would suffer as a result of the proposed amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act changing the qualifying period for eight weeks to 12 weeks. Can the minister tell us if he intends to lay these programs before the House before he brings in the amendment to the bill, and when can we expect to see these programs which will ease some of the potential hardship of this measure?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will be in a better position to give the hon. member, and I am not hedging, the full details probably when the legislation is introduced in the fall. But I reiterate, and I think you can probably see exactly what I said if you want to look at Hansard—I do not want to equivocate as I do not have it here, but at the fall session we would see the legislation coming in for both the integration and the developmental use and the UI amendment, and whatever other authority we may require for the job creation projects. I doubt very much if the implementation of the UI amendment to which the hon. member is referring could possibly become effective until early next year, this is around January; this is my best guess now. By that time I hope to have in place and place before the House an understanding of the developmental programs I have talked about today.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if at some time he would table or make available the statistics about the UIC assignments which have been made in that category of the young worker in relation to the eight weeks.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member would clarify what he means precisely by "assignments".

Mr. Peters: In many of our northern areas people have to go on welfare because they do not have the money for the eight weeks, and the UIC has an assignment which it makes in respect of welfare. Would the minister give us an indication of how many in that age group during the eight weeks would in fact be applying for and receiving welfare, and then paying it back from unemployment insurance?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to make that information available to the hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as it was recognized by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in his budget presentation, and again by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) this afternoon, that there is recognition under these new proposals of the benefit structure with regard to the regional unemployment situation, for which I commend the minister, I wonder whether he can give some indication, since the qualification period is to be raised from eight weeks to 12 weeks—at the present time the figures I have looked at show that those who would fall most heavily in that group are in areas of chronic high unemployment, plus areas which have industries which are largely seasonal; I think for instance of the major industries in the Atlantic provinces such as fisheries, tourism, and agriculture, which by their very nature offer short-term employment, in fact even less than the new 12-week qualification period proposed by the minister—of any definite plan he has in mind in respect to flexibility in this area? Or can he offer any particular guarantee that the people who are available for employment, but because of their attachment to seasonal industry will simply not be able to obtain employment, will have a definite commitment of employment other than simply moving from unemployment insurance benefits to welfare?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the elements of the job creation plan, first of all, will be very definitely tilted, that is, weighted through funding and application, to those various high unemployment areas, and indeed Atlantic Canada is unfortunately one of them. In terms of the decision or the guarantee the hon. member is asking for, I would like to examine that as we work it out. I tell you frankly that there are a great number of things that we still have to put together, which will be in the next two or three months, and I hope I will be in a position to come to parliament in the fall to give then details of a more precise application to local situations.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): One supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I am sorry, but there will be lots of time for questions later on.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in Vancouver on Monday the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was in one of his philosophical moods. He said at that time that only "a conspiracy of love" can save mankind. That is what the philosopher, Pierre, is reported as having said. Well, talk is cheap. Such hypocrisy, to put it in its coldest terms, simply cannot be ignored. The only tangible evidence of a conspiracy as it is influencing the Government of Canada now is not one of love. On the contrary, it is directed at Canadian men and women among those most in need in our country. It is a conspiracy, in short, against the unemployed in Canada, and nothing the minister has said this afternoon, and I propose to deal in some detail with what he has said, has caused me to change my judgment on this issue one iota.

The minister said, just picking up a couple of details at the outset, that it was wrong for critics to allege that 330,000 Canadians are going to be affected as a result of the announced changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. He said it is very misleading, and that only 100,000 at any one time will be affected; that the 330,000 are spread throughout the year. Presumably those 100,000 people are to take some consolation from that fact. He said also that at any one time only 10,000 of those affected by the change from the eight weeks to the 12 weeks happen to reside in Atlantic Canada. Again I say to you, that is some solace to the 10,000 involved in Atlantic Canada.

It is almost impossible to imagine a more calculatingly cruel budget than the one the minister brought down last week. It has been said that the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has simply neglected Canada's unemployed. I emphatically disagree with that. He has consciously brought in a budget which, at every crucial point, touches directly those thousands of men and women in every part of Canada who find themselves unable to obtain jobs.

Let us first consider the tax policy. What was required in this budget was a tax cut for middle and low income families in order to stimulate an economy in which manufacturing is running at only 80 per cent capacity. Instead, the minister brought forward tax benefits for upper income Canadians who alone have disposable income at home, enabling them to invest more lavishly in registered retirement savings plans. Without the needed stimulus which tax cuts would have provided, the cruel result will be increased unemployment, and the minister knows it.

Second, in respect of fiscal policy, the minister has announced that he plans to reduce the deficit by a further $900 million at a time when there are more than 760,000 Canadian out of work. Such a step inevitably means fewer, not more jobs. Again I say the minister knows it, and knows it very well.

Third, finally and most brutally of all, the two major changes proposed in the Unemployment Insurance Act will mean a direct increase in the misery of our unemployed. There is no other conclusion that a fair-minded person could draw who knows the implications of the changes which would cut 330,000 people entirely off from benefits and which would reduce substantially the benefits of those who need them most, namely, those Canadian men and women in areas where regional unemployment is most persistent. The minister has attacked precisely those in Canada who are in greatest need.

Unlike certain commentators I do not regard the minister as he has been described in certain quotations recently. I do not describe him as tough-minded, or courageous, or practical, when he takes such a stand as revealed in this budget. Quite the contrary. I regard him as being politically cynical and chillingly smug. Who, I ask, is tough-minded when he kicks people who are down? Who is courageous when he yields to widespread indifference about the poor and the unemployed in Canada? Where is the political leadership which cashes in on the sad sentiment that our unemployed are responsible for their own misfortune?

In my comments today I want to show not only that the budget proposals are morally offensive, which they are, but that they are wrong from a purely technical point of view as to what it is possible to achieve now in 1976 in our economy. For if it is wrong to be cruel when it is possible to be magnanimous, it is equally wrong in politics to pretend that more justice should be done if it is impossible to do so. Hypocrisy, I say, cannot be a substitute for callousness.

Let me dwell specifically now on the changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act because I think, and my colleagues and this party think, and all kinds of sensitive people from one coast to another coast in Canada think, this is the most reprehensible aspect of the budget. A myth is abroad in the country. The myth is that we are in substantial debt in the unemployment insurance program, that somehow the taxpayers are being forced to make up this debt. Well, the reality is that the largest part of the program, that which is the direct responsibility of working Canadians and employers, has a substantial surplus. There is no debt at all. The surplus for last year was in the range of $400 million, and in the current year it is estimated to be in the neighbourhood of $200 million. This means that the working men and women of our country are fully paying their share of a program that was set up for their benefit. They are not, in respect of the overwhelming number of dollars being spent on the program, being subsidized by anyone. They are paying through an insurance scheme for their own benefits.

At present, unemployment insurance costs beyond the 5.4 per cent unemployment level are paid for by the federal government out of the federal treasury. The justification for this is that unemployment of such magnitude—and it is one of the worst of all the industrial countries of the world—is not by any conceivable line of reasoning the responsibility of the men and women who have to suffer its ravages. Rather it is the collective responsibility of all of us in this country, and in particular it is the responsibility of the federal Government of Canada whose obligation it is to manage the economy in a way in which jobs are available for everyone who wants to work. That is the first myth.

The second myth—and we have all heard this—is that there are plenty of jobs available for all those who want to get out and look for them. I am sure every member of parliament regardless of the party to which he belongs can cite stories about meeting people in his constituency office, or about meeting people in subways and on airlines, who come to him and say that if people want to get out and find a job they can find one.

What is the reality in 1976? The fact is that there are now more than 12 men and women in Canada available for every job that is open. There are more than 12 men and women available for every job from Vancouver to St. John's. What this cruel statistic means is that if every available job were taken up tomorrow there would remain in our country more than 700,000 Canadians who want to work, who are desirous of getting out and contributing to our economy, who do not want unemployment insurance benefits, who do not want welfare, but who want to make their contribution and are unable to find a job. That is the reality.

The New Democratic Party says that the only acceptable, sensible, and relevant way to bring down the cost of unemployment insurance in Canada is for the Government of Canada to manage its economy in such a way that jobs are available. That, Mr. Speaker, is precisely to what last week's budget should have addressed itself. Instead of taking aim at the problems of the unemployed, the budget brought in by the new minister took aim at the unemployed themselves.

Let us consider in a fair-minded way, but I hope with some sense of compassion, the two major changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act that were announced in the budget. First, the government plans to change the five-phase structure of benefits to a three-phase one, contending that this will help those in areas of persistently high unemployment. The minister in his remarks earlier this afternoon repeated the argument. Mr. Speaker, I say to that: what a cruel hoax, because a hoax it is. It is the case that some people will benefit from this particular change, but I will illustrate to you why, particularly for Canadians in Atlantic Canada, in Quebec, in northern Ontario and in southeastern Ontario, the change is, as I say, a cruel hoax that will mean disadvantages for those people, not advantages.

More often than not people in the areas I have just listed will suffer more, not less. Consider a man or woman in the province of Nova Scotia who has had 20 weeks of insured earnings, that is, he or she has been working and productive in the Canadian community for at least five months, and he or she finds himself or herself laid off for whatever reason. Under the present law such a person would be entitled to up to 51 weeks of benefits. I want to stress the entitlement to up to 51 weeks. Most such people are actively seeking employment, and if they are not they are cut off from benefits. People in our country who are fully employed have to be reminded of the fact that if the unemployed are not actively seeking a job, they are cut off.

● (1600)

I come back to the particular case of a man or woman who has worked for five months, is out of work, is in Nova Scotia and is trying to find employment. That person is trying to bring in money for a family at home. Under the present law that person can claim benefits for up to 51 weeks if he or she is unable to find a job. But under the proposed changes that the minister so glowingly referred to this afternoon, that same person would be entitled to at most 40 weeks of benefits—a reduction of some 20 per cent in the time of benefits to which that person is entitled. The New Democratic Party says, shame to that, and shame on a government that brings in a scheme that has this kind of effect on people in Canada who need more, not less, assistance.

Consider another person in the same province of Nova Scotia, this time one with 12 weeks of insured earnings. Under the present scheme such a man or woman could get up to 44 weeks of benefits, again I repeat, assuming they are actively seeking employment. Under the budget proposals announced by the Minister of Finance last Tuesday and reiterated here this afternoon by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), instead of getting up to 44 weeks of benefits that person would have a maximum of 32 weeks. This means a drop in the number of weeks of benefits by more than 25 per cent for a man or woman in Nova Scotia who happens to be in that particular situation.

The point I am making is that at a time when we have the highest level of unemployment in our country in 15 years, in a part of Canada where unemployment is even higher than the average, the government's change is one which cruelly hits at those most in need of benefits. Although I refer in my examples to Nova Scotia, it goes without saying that I could have selected New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, or whole regions in the province of Quebec. The same persistently high level of unemployment exists in all these parts of Canada. In all these parts of Canada these negative results will follow from changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Consider also the effects of extending the minimum employment period for any benefits from eight weeks to 12 weeks. Once again those parts of the country which need assistance most will be treated first. It is precisely in Atlantic Canada and in many parts of Quebec that seasonal or short run jobs are the principal source of income.

The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) was questioning the minister earlier this afternoon and very correctly pointed out that workers in those parts of Canada compared to the rest of the people in our country are disproportionately employed in the fisheries, in tourism, and in agriculture. And he was quite correct in the implication of his question that the people who will be most negatively affected by this cruel change from eight weeks to 12 weeks are precisely the same people. The fact is that people employed in these occupations very frequently cannot get a job that lasts longer than eight weeks.

That is the cold reality, and members in the House from Atlantic Canada and from the province of Quebec know that very well. Now that such people will no longer be eligible for unemployment insurance after working up to 11 weeks, the municipalities of Saint John, New Brunswick; St. John's, Newfoundland; Halifax, Nova Scotia, and Rouyn, Quebec, will be paying increased welfare costs.

I do not care what the minister said earlier today because the men and women who will not be able to work and to get the benefits that they were once getting, will need financial resources in order to feed their families, and at least in Canada we have reached the point where we will not permit people to starve. If we will not permit people to starve, it means that the cities in these areas will pay increased welfare costs for these people, and it means indirectly of course that the provincial governments in these areas will have to pick up a major part of the tab for the increased welfare costs.

Is it any wonder that every premier in every province in Atlantic Canada is opposed to these measures? Is it any wonder that any informed Canadian, no matter where he may live, with an ounce of moral conscience, who knows the facts about the implications of this proposed change, is disgusted with the whole thrust of the budget?

The minister this afternoon said he would be interested in providing more information about the discussions that have taken place between his government and the governments in Atlantic Canada. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have been in touch with most of the premiers of the provinces in Atlantic Canada and, without exception, they are fundamentally and totally opposed to this legislation. They are opposed to this legislation because they know it is cruel and callous and because their provincial treasuries, which are already hard pressed compared to the more affluent parts of Canada, will have to pick up the tab.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Why, one must ask, is this Liberal government doing what it is doing? I will offer a theory on what the Liberal Party of Canada in 1976 is up to. They are simply yielding to the concern—and I put that in italics—about unemployment abuses about which we have all heard. However, they are concerned not about Canada in general but mainly about the province of Ontario because they know that when the next election comes in 1978—assuming their relatively safe base in the province of Quebec—it will be the cities in Ontario that will elect most members to the House of Commons. I put forward for hon. members consideration that the kind of callous disregard that is being expressed in this budget and in these changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act is designed to appease the indifference in part and in part the legitimate concern with unemployment insurance of people in the more affluent province of Ontario. Instead of supporting these changes, we in this party are in favour of enforcing the existing law. We are in favour of getting at those who cheat this system, or cheat any other laws on the books of Canada.

Instead of dealing directly with these abuses, what the government has brought forward are these two major amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which would deal with the sentiment that is expressed in the big cities of affluent Ontario but has, as its effect, a kick in the pants and a little more to the people in Atlantic Canada. That is great disservice to the people of this country. Such a policy is nothing short of despicable. It provokes anger on our part with the government for bringing it in at this time. I would be less than straightforward however, if I said I was not equally concerned with the official position so far put forward on behalf of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada.

● (1610)

The official spokesman for the Conservative party said in his initial response to the budget that the one thing he thought the Government of Canada was sensible about in its budget was its announced changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. The same member has described unemployed Canadians as "lead swingers". He announced this change in this budget as one small step forward. I hope that a number of members in that party from Atlantic Canada who know reality and who, I think, speak honestly for the people they represent, will have some influence with the official opposition when it comes to the vote on our amendment and can bring some sense and some decency to the formation of their position.

I said earlier that it is not enough for a political party to make a moral criticism of a government. If we are going to suggest that a moral alternative is what should be pursued it is also obligatory, to avoid the serious political charge of hypocrisy, to suggest how it might be possible. In the conclusion of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I want to do precisely that.

As the Minister of Finance well knows, we now have in the Canadian economy a manufacturing sector that is functioning at only 80 per cent capacity. In straightforward economic terms that no economist would deny, this means that we could have had stimulation now, in 1976, by means of a tax cut for people on average and low incomes. This would stimulate the economy and cause manufacturing industries to call men and women who want jobs in off the streets. They would produce the goods that an increased supply of money would demand. And the point is there would not be an iota of new pressure on inflation. That is the crucial point, Mr. Speaker.

On budget night the Minister of Finance said that if we stimulate the economy it will cause inflation. He was only half right or, more correctly, only telling a half truth. If you have an economy that is already functioning at maximum capacity where there is no slack in our offices or factories and you stimulate it, then the minister is right; you cause great inflation. When you are only operating at 80 per cent capacity, however, and when you have more than 760,000 Canadians who want jobs, a tax reduction would cause stimulation and take people off the streets to work, but would not cause any increase in inflation.

The minister took a callous and cynical approach in this budget, Mr. Speaker. He announced forthcoming changes in unemployment insurance which will wreak havoc with many men and women, particularly in Atlantic Canada, who are going to lose the benefits we have built up over a period of time in a fine Unemployment Insurance Act. Beyond that, he did not stimultate the economy in a way that at least during this year could have brought the unemployment level below 7 per cent. Instead, throughout this year unemployment will remain above that grotesque level which no one with any sense of decency in politics finds tolerable.

I urge members in this House to give serious consideration to supporting the amendment put forward by the New Democratic Party which would have the effect of removing that disreputable change. If we had support from members on both sides of the House for the amendment, even though it did not carry, the message of concern that most decent people in the country feel about unemployment might even get through to the government.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Thank you for recognizing me at this time, Mr. Speaker. I take a very dim view of the minister and his predecessor continually telling us that we should be proud of our most generous unemployment insurance scheme. We do not want a generous unemployment insurance scheme; what we want are jobs. This is the only way we can reduce the significant impact of unemployment insurance—by the creation of jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I hope the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) will remember the undertaking he gave to me to table the documents, surveys, studies and statistics which allowed him to come to the conclusions urged by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) that certain amendments are necessary to the Unemployment Insurance Act. This is most important in order that we may be as apprised of the situation as is the minister. There are a lot of unanswered questions, and we want to know whether the minister has done his best with this horrendous problem of unemployment insurance.

Our friends on the left want to know whether we will give their motion very serious consideration. We have given it serious consideration, and by necessity we have to vote against it. What the New Democratic Party is attempting to put before the Canadian people is the idea that we should accept unemployment insurance as a way of life. They do not want meaningful amendments to this legislation.

I should like to refer to an editorial in this morning's Globe and Mail, Wednesday, June 2. I do not say this newspaper is the Bible, but I think the statements in the lead editorial mirror the thinking of the vast majority of Canadians. The article pointed out that:

> The majority of Canadians don't want a program that encourages people to work for a while with the carrot of months of rest. They don't want a program that discourages mobility in the work force or continuity in the job. They don't want any more of those hilarious stories about good life on the pogey.
> What do they want?

The article then makes reference to my friend, the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), but I will ignore that. It continues:

> ... but a good many people want an unemployment program that will be even more sensitive to the needs of individuals and the community at large. A program that will be related more directly to job creating schemes—particularly for workers in the 18 to 25 age bracket—and to the problem regions where high unemployment is chronic.

This is the gist of the situation. We want amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in order to bring it, as the minister has indicated, to a social insurance program, while at the same time making sure that those who live within high unemployment areas do not suffer. This is all that people are requesting. They want jobs, whether in the private sector or the government, and I will get into that a little later. What they want is a social insurance program that takes into consideration the needs of those in high unemployment areas.

I was amazed to hear the minister say that an eight week qualification period is a disincentive. I am not going to brag or seek any glory with respect to that, but I should like to refer to the debate on second reading of Bill C-229 in Hansard for April 19, 1971, where I said as reported at page 5054:

● (1620)

There are several sections in this bill raising questions of interest and concern and calling for deep consideration, not only by members on this side of the House but by members on the other side. Unemployment insurance programs should maintain a proper balance between providing temporary income maintenance and facilitating reabsorption into productive activity. Therefore, with all due respect to the arguments of the minister, I question whether the reduction of the qualifying period to an eight-week attachment to the labour market is practicable in view of the probable abuses that this will encourage. Further, such a short period of time does not indicate even a strong seasonal attachment to the labour force.

The bill was read the second time, referred to the standing committee, considered in committee, then sent back to the House for consideration at the report stage. On June 10, 1971, as recorded at page 6582 of Hansard, an hon. member—I will tell you shortly which one—moved the following motion:

That Bill C-229, An Act respecting unemployment insurance in Canada, be amended by deleting the word "eight" in paragraph (a) of subclause (2) of clause 17, line 16 at page 11, and substituting the word "twelve".

That Bill C-229, An Act respecting unemployment insurance in Canada, be amended by deleting from Schedule A at page 106, under the column titled "Weeks of insurable employment in qualifying period" in Table 1, the figure "8" in the first entry thereunder and substituting the figure "12".

After proposing those amendments I said, as reported by Hansard at pages 6582 and 6583:

All I can say in conclusion is that I am dismayed by this particular clause, and I am afraid that with all the good intentions the government may have, this clause is open to abuse. It removes the incentive that we are all seeking. It certainly does not enhance personal initiative. So, my two motions are an attempt to make the act more reasonable. What we are trying to do is to allow people to help themselves. I think this is what the government should be doing.

The philosophy of my party is that the government should not move in until it is actually and really required. In other words, the individual should be able to help himself, and this is what I like about our philosophy. Governments should not just look after people from their birth to their death, but we are starting to move in this direction. Whether or not Canadian people can afford this is questionable. But I hope that the minister, as well as my colleagues in the House, will appreciate what I am saying. It is not that the Canadian people are lazy. Heavens, no, I would never say that. What I am saying is that when you hold out these enticements, these inducements, these carrots, there is bound to be abuse. I hope that the administration which will be set up will be able to cope with these abuses effectively, because I can foresee problems for the department and for the minister. What he has done, in effect, has been to remove the initiative from people to continue to seek work.

[Mr. Alexander.]

That happened in 1971. I will not take credit for the government's present action. After all, it is my duty to tell the government how to show leadership; it is my duty to suggest policies. It took the government six years to figure out what we figured out in five months. I see the Minister of Finance laughing. Mr. Speaker, the facts speak for themselves. We impressed on the minister in that previous debate that the provisions then being proposed would constitute a disincentive to work. The government disagreed. They said, "No, we do not think so." Now the government admits that those provisions to which we objected are a disincentive to work. Consequently it has proposed the amendments now to come before the House.

Let me refer to another document to show that the government does not keep its promises. Six years ago, in June, 1970, the government produced a white paper on unemployment insurance. On page 18 of that report we find the following words:

... fishermen, who have for the past few years been covered as a total group will now be covered only if they are working for someone else ... the self-employed fishermen, however, will be provided for. Income stabilization is imperative in the commercial fisheries, with particular reference to the remote fishing communities, and pending completion of plans being prepared specifically for this purpose, self-employed fishermen will be covered by unemployment insurance.

Why has the promised incomes stabilization plan not been introduced? We have demanded it for the past five or six years. Certain people need that kind of help. I remender the minister saying in the past when we debated this matter, "Don't worry, just pass the bill we are considering and we will bring in an incomes stabilization plan." That happened some time ago; so far we have not heard anything about that plan. No wonder people in the Atlantic provinces are upset.

In his speech the minister spoke of savings he intended to effect, and guaranteed they would not involve hardship for people in our slow growth areas. But when I think of what the government has done with regard to our fishermen, am I supposed to feel happy and pat the minister on the back? I cannot do it. We have been too disappointed.

The minister alluded to certain interesting statistics. Apparently some 22 per cent of all unemployment insurance recipients receive benefits for the full 51 weeks and are known as exhausters. Of these, 8 per cent subsequently go on the welfare rolls and constitute between 1 per cent and 2 per cent of all people on welfare. Contrary to what my friends on my left think, there will not be any massive application to welfare offices. The statistics show it will not happen. Why? The evidence suggests, I think, that other sources of income are available to unemployment insurance recipients. In other words, our work patterns are changing. There may be more than one income earner in a family; therefore one member of a family may work off and on and, when unemployed, collect unemployment insurance.

The minister related other significant facts. He suggested that there are more than ten million people in our labour force, that actually our labour force is about 13 million people strong, but that between two million and three million people intermittently enter and leave the work force. Why, Mr. Speaker? I suggest we must blame the generous provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. We ought to be concerned about those who are not permanently attached to the labour force. The hard core of ten million people is in the work force to stay. Apparently the minister thinks that his proposed amendments will affect about 300,000 people who are included in the roughly three million people not permanently attached to the work force. Under the proposed amendments they will not get benefits.

The impact of the 1971 UIC revision was made apparent by the Economic Council of Canada study entitled "People and Jobs." I think the minister was waiting for the report to be made public before bringing in necessary amendments. Actually the Economic Council report is a scathing condemnation of the government's policies and attitude to manpower and unemployment insurance. Clearly the government has not kept abreast of the times. The Economic Council of Canada says on page 19 of its report:

> The wider coverage and higher benefits introduced into the unemployment insurance program in 1971 have probably had four general effects; some increase in voluntary quits, lay-offs and turnover because of reduction in the cost to individuals of periodic bouts of unemployment and an easing of the responsibilities of employers for lay-offs for sickness or maternity; less incentive for some unemployed individuals to search vigorously for work until the end of their benefit period; an inducement for others outside the labour market to seek work in the knowledge that they could thereby qualify for more generous benefits; and finally, in the larger sense, a selective stimulus to the economy through the transfer of hundreds of millions of dollars to individuals and communities affected by unemployment.

The Economic Council is of the opinion that our existing legislation induces people to join the unemployment rolls and is a disincentive to work. It estimates that present legislation induced between 70,000 and 80,000 people to go on unemployment.

Having said that I must indicate that both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration said that changes will be proposed. The House was told that the weeks during which benefits may be drawn will be related more directly to weeks worked, and that regional benefits will be related more closely to regional unemployment. By saying this the government is showing a certain flexibility. It realizes that we face a chronic situation in the Atlantic provinces, parts of Quebec, and other parts of this country which needs special attention. The government is therefore proposing an amendment which will deal with the matter.

It goes further and says that the act will also be amended to permit the payment of unemployment insurance to beneficiaries on a discretionary basis where they take part in such activities as selected employment training or short time work programs. Clearly the government wants to be flexible. It wants to provide for benefit payments on a discretionary basis. I do not know what that means, but will try to find out. The government realizes that it created tremendous difficulties by ignoring the needs of areas like the Atlantic provinces and will be flexible. Notwithstanding the position we have taken, I say that there is nothing wrong with flexibility which, enshrined in legislation, will determine the period of time benefits may be paid in high unemployment areas, and rightly so.

If the government is so concerned about that, why was not some flexibility given in that eight to 12 week formula in order to relieve the pressures and the problems which the minister has recognized in terms of the flexibility with regard to the extension or length of time for the benefits? I hope the minister will be able to answer that question because in many areas of this country people want to know what flexibility means, and who go this far and not further.

We will have to find out where these regions are, how they are going to be determined, how much saving there will be, where the saving will be directed, and what is meant by payments on a discretionary basis. We do not want any pork barrelling for which this government is famous.

I listened to the minister's speech. I have not yet had a chance to digest it. It was a very important speech with a lot of statistics, plans, and so forth and so on. However, the minister did not give it to us in detail. That is a requirement so that we can know what we can do when the bill comes before the House.

We have to see that our slow growth areas are protected. If the minister cannot give us those matters in detail, we will have to think them. I wonder whether the minister has given us another con job. I do not want to get mean with the minister, but we are used to being conned on unemployment insurance. I do not look at any minister in particular—

An hon. Member: Bryce is the only one in the House.

Mr. Alexander: I do not intend to mention any names this afternoon. My time is extremely limited. In fact I want to know if I can have a little more time because I have just begun the fight.

I sometimes wonder whether the government has any ideas of its own. During the 1974 election we had an incomes policy in which we discussed wage and price controls. The government said no, you will freeze wages, not prices. After the election the first thing we got was wage and price controls. I think the government is bankrupt in programs.

Another matter disturbs me. When the former leader of the opposition indicated that it was wrong to pay taxes on the inflated dollar, the then minister of finance said that was crazy, they could not do it, it would cost too much. But what do we have now? Relief from that.

When we suggested Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission in order to bring counselling, payment of benefits, and job placement under one roof, the government said no. It also said no to the eight to 12 week period. Now we will have the eight to 12 weeks. What kind of a government is this? Do ministers not have any ideas of their own? They always criticize us for not having any ideas, but every time we turn around they are stealing our ideas. They are the greatest bunch of thieves I have ever seen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Let me get back to the unemployment insurance proposed amendments. In 1965 there was the divorce. Why? As the present minister indicates, the government thought that a positive manpower program or policy could best mature if it were allowed to develop independent of an unemployment insurance program. What nonsense. What a costly error that was.

An hon. Member: It was not an error.

Mr. Alexander: There is another smart aleck across the way. If it was not an error, why is it not being continued in separation? It was an error.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: There was the frustration of error in payments, duplication of documentation, and a complicated system of payments between two bureaucracies. The right hand never knew what the left was doing, and neither did it care.

The Council of the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development called for a balanced development of income maintenance and positive utilization measures which would ensure the earliest possible return to employment. In the past the government has made it easy to get on unemployment but doggone hard to get off. It should be the reverse. I am pleased to see that the minister in his wisdom, with the backing of his officials, has now noted that the former was wrong and the latter is right.

The council implied that it would be preferable to have a one stop program. As a matter of fact the Economic Council of Canada referred to the same sort of one stop program with counselling, payment of benefits, and the placement of jobs all under one roof. The result would bring the two functions into closer harmony. It would reduce the incidence of pauses in unemployment insurance, and the staff should be able to determine how seriously recipients are searching for jobs.

We are all getting a little concerned about the search for jobs. We have seen some significant moves of late. Through the good offices of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration there are now Manpower offices in provincial welfare offices. This enables the matching of people with jobs. There is a feeling that there are too many people seeking welfare as a way of life when there are jobs going begging. I know there are a lot of problems with respect to the atmosphere in which a job may be, the amount of pay, and all the other matters that can make a job a little tough to accept. However, there are a lot of good jobs available. There is now a move in the direction of matching people with jobs in co-operation with the welfare officers and the Ministry of Manpower.

Severance pay is another matter of concern. Two or three years ago the minister not only said he would examine severance pay but holiday pay. I do not know why he is only bringing in severance pay in terms of relief and not holiday pay. There may be a matter of discrimination in this area.

I listened to the minister state something to the effect that unions and business could get together. Is severance pay universal? If the minister is talking about the unionized portion of the labour force, he is only talking about one third. What about the other two thirds? Are they entitled as of right to severance pay? I will have to look into that because I do not want the minister to bring in any bill that is discriminatory and not equitable. If the government is going to move in that direction, why not move in terms of holiday pay, which I understand through provincial legislation is universal? The minister will have to expand on that.

We are all concerned about jobs. The state of the economy is of major concern to all, particularly the unemployed. Here we are faced with the worst of both worlds, high unemployment and high inflation. There are 760,000 people, some 7.4 per cent of the work force, who would like to work but are unemployed. That is the highest for some 15 years. These are heads of families who cannot get jobs and who want to work in order to gain the necessities of life for their families.

The young people who represent the highest incidence of unemployment cannot find jobs. Now we have the students coming on to the labour market. What are we going to do about the students? We have raised this question many times. What is going to happen to some one million students who will be coming out—if they are not already out—and who will add to that total of 750,000 people already unemployed? These people are victims of a mismanaged economy, an inept government which is both callous and cavalier about the plight of its citizens.

The climate is one of concern, despair, and resentment. Imagine the situation. Here we are, a country the envy of most others in terms of wealth—wealth in natural resources, in human resources, wealth in technology—and yet we cannot achieve a 5 per cent real growth level. Is that not amazing? In the period 1974-75 we were short seven percentage points, the equivalent of $7 billion or $330 for every man, woman and child in the country. This is a situation which, in effect, leads to further unemployment.

What is significant, Mr. Speaker, is that for every percentage point of real growth we gain something like 30,000 jobs. So when we are seven points behind we are in effect 200,000 jobs behind. That is why we on this side of the House say the least the Minister of Finance should have done was to give us some indication that he was trying to get something in the region of at least 6 per cent real growth. But no, he is talking about some 4 or 5 per cent, as if that were some big thing. And with every percentage point we lose on real growth we are out some 30,000 jobs. It does not take long to figure that out.

Jobs are a most important consideration in our economy. In this regard the private sector should be and must be the primary source.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: When I say that, I do so in the knowledge that this cannot be achieved under the stewardship of the Minister of Finance. I say this because the private sector has no confidence in the government, because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) goes around talking about his new society—

An hon. Member: And love.

Mr. Alexander: Well, love is something we heard about the other day. And you know what Mother Theresa said about love. Then again, charity begins at home. But let me not get away from what I have to say. The new society musings of the Prime Minister, and his light dismissal of the free enterprise and free market system have caused the business community concern. There has been no meaningful restraint on the part of the federal government. It is increasing its expenditures by about 15 or 16 per cent but it wants everyone else to accept a ceiling of 8 per cent—there may be 2 per cent for productivity and 2 per cent for cost-of-living increases. Controls, according to the Prime Minister, may last for three years and one thing which should be of concern to all of us is the indication by the Prime Minister—and now I am paraphrasing—that there is likely to be not less authority exercised in our times, but more. All these things have created an intolerable at mosphere leading to less productivity and less profit.

It is the government's business to create a positive atmosphere in order to allow the private sector the opportunity to provide jobs, thus developing the economy. The budget could have been utilized to create this atmosphere, but the minister did not take advantage of his opportunity. He abdicated his responsibility in this regard. The government, in my humble submission, must get off the pot. It must say whether or not there is a meaningful role to be played by the private sector.

For the past five years we have been living in a vacuum—benign neglect. We must get together with business, labour, consumer groups and other levels of government to determine a game plan. We have to determine what ought to be our real growth; what our aims ought to be. How we can reduce our export deficits which today stand at some $5 billion? How can we place greater emphasis on the need for higher productivity? We must determine some kind of industrial strategy in co-operation with all these sectors of the economy, and outline the roles each have to play. These are important questions, Mr. Speaker, but the budget was totally silent with regard to them.

In terms of bringing about a climate of confidence the budget was an unqualified disaster, given the very serious economic problems we face. The budget will be known for what it failed to do rather than for what it accomplished. It showed, as I said earlier, that the government is bankrupt in terms of policy, is devoid of any constructive ideas. The economy, which needed a shot in the arm, instead got a shot in the head.

I see my time is about to expire, Mr. Speaker. If hon. members would agree to allow me about three more minutes I would have time to finish my remarks. I would appreciate that consideration.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure hon. members will agree to the hon. member's request. Is there consent to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Alexander: I shall not take the time of the House unduly but I think we should be apprized of the fact that, as the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has indicated, there could have been a cut of one billion dollars had proper restraints been exercised. I will not spell out the details, but what was significant was that he was prepared to give a tax credit of $250 million, of which $100 million would go to those earning $8,000 or less, the remainder to be given on the basis of a scale to those earning between $8,000 and $16,000, most of which would go directly into consumer spending, adding nearly three tenths of one per cent to the gross that would occur with such a tax credit. There would be a considerable impact on domestically generated demand, and thus on jobs.

A further proposal made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe involved a $100 million tax incentive program adjusted to ensure the greatest benefits to regions where disparity is greatest. That is what is bothering my friends from the Atlantic provinces. There has been no recognition of the need in areas where disparities are greatest. Not only would this incentive encourage the construction of research facilities, particularly in areas of regional disparity, but job opportunities for skilled workers would increase as well, as would those for the unskilled workers required to support the plant.

My hon. friend from York-Simcoe also advocated export incentives and promotions to the tune of some $75 million. This was part of the savings we were going to get by way of restraint. Then we would shift the priorities. In fact we had about $450 million left over in order to reduce other deficits. Other proposals included a program of tax incentives to encourage exports, and government spending directed to gain export markets, primarily for the benefit of small businessmen.

The government has time in which to reflect upon what it is doing right now. I refer particularly to the proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in terms of their impact upon job creation. I am not all that happy when I hear the minister say "We are going to extend LIP." That's good but it is only short term. All those jobs will sooner or later be eliminated. What we need is an approach along the lines the Economic Council of Canada indicated with respect to the $1 billion savings. I hope the ministers are looking at this suggestion with interest because we just cannot continue these ad hoc approaches, these piecemeal attacks on unemployment insurance. People want to work, but somebody has to create an atmosphere favourable to job creation. In this regard some attention will have to be paid to the question of whether in fact the government is interested in the private sector.

The musings of the Prime Minister have made a lot of people extremely nervous. Is there one rule for the public sector and another for the private sector? This is what we shall be looking at. Before the minister brings in his bill for first reading, what is to happen in the interim? Is there to be a serious effort to get away from this ad hoc approach to the serious problems I have outlined? As I said, this country should not have 760,000 people out of work.

The government has stolen our policy. We are not going to quibble about that; it is to be expected from that gang. Our policy was that the Unemployment Insurance Act, in terms of the minimum qualifying period, should allow entrance after 12 insured weeks, and since we have advocated such a policy since June, 1971, or prior thereto we have no alternative but to vote against the NDP motion which, in effect, does not want any meaningful amendment to be made to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The NDP want people to rely on unemployment just as the government does, and this is the matter we object to most strenuously.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this is the first budget brought forward by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald)—

Mr. Paproski: And the last.

Mr. Cafik: We will have to wait and see about that—I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister on his budget. He faced, as I think everyone in the country appreciates, an enormous dilemma in preparing a budget at a time of high inflation and high unemployment, a budget that would be satisfactory to all Canadians. He has met this challenge quite well from my standpoint. He has brought forward measures that I believe will stimulate the economy without over-heating it; it will be sufficient to improve employment opportunities in a significant way without at the same time undermining the anti-inflation program.

The key elements of the budget that I would briefly touch on before dealing with the primary issue that I want to deal with in my speech today are as follows. First of all the amendments to the anti-inflation program dealing with the price side are very important steps in the right direction so as to create a better degree of credibility for the whole anti-inflation program, which I think has been launched with some degree of success to date. But by and large the public have felt, rightly or wrongly, that the greatest emphasis has been on the wages side. Quite frankly I think there has been equal emphasis and even more stringent control on the price side, though it may not have been very visible.

The rulings of the Anti-Inflation Board have been primarily on the wages side, and this has created the impression that the controls on prices are in fact not working. This is not the case. The change proposed in the budget will create, I think, a better climate where the public at large will come to realize that we are very serious about fighting inflation, and particularly about controlling prices in Canada.

The other steps announced in the budget to inhibit increased government expenditure are, of course, welcome. For instance there is the proposal in the budget that in the year 1976-77 and in 1977-78 the actual increase in government expenditures will be kept below the increase in the Gross National Product projections. This is something many people have wanted to see happen for some time. We will now be moving in this direction, and in terms of getting a handle on the economic situation in this country these are extremely important steps. However, I would enter one caveat, one word of caution, and that is that we should be very careful that we ourselves as parliamentarians do not over-react and paint out ourselves into a corner of restraint in terms of government expenditures, because this will render it impossible for us to provide good government.

There is no doubt that governments have to spend money for socially desirable purposes, such as transfer payments and the basic necessities required by our citizens. I think it would be very unwise not to bear in mind our responsibilities in this regard. We should not over-react to people who have a distorted view of the impact of government expenditures on the economy. These people seem to think that if a government spends a dollar, it is a different dollar from the dollar spent by the private sector. it is true that private sector expenditures, like all expenditures, stimulate the economy, but the fact of the matter is that a dollar is a dollar. When money is needed in the economy it really matters not where it comes. The fact is that it is needed, and it has to be provided in one way or another. When the sector is not able to provide adequate job opportunities or stimulation of the economy, then the government itself has to intervene. However, it should do so only when there is a demonstrable reason for so doing.

I am also very pleased with the steps announced in the budget to improve the measure of assistance given the private sector, particularly the small business community. Perhaps we should move even further in this connection. I have spoken many times in this House about some of the programs in Industry, Trade and Commerce, where we should shift the emphasis from grants, interest free loans or forgiveable loans into straight loans to the private sector, particularly to small businessmen, so as to provide them with the growth capital they require to meet the needs of themselves and the rest of the community. More money could be loosened up in this way without increasing government expenditure one iota.

The basic change proposed in the budget to increase the rate of taxation for small business people from $100,000 to $150,000, and the cumulative figure from $550,000 to $750,-000, is going to provide a considerable incentive and stimulation to the small industrial sector and business community. When we think of the private sector many of us think almost exclusively in terms of multinational corporations and the giants of the business community. The simple fact of the matter is that the small businessman who employs a small number of people really provides more jobs and stimulation of the economy than all the multinationals put together. This is why providing assistance to these entrepreneurs and business people who have the incentive to move forward is very important.

I think the tariff changes that benefit consumers are very worth while. I have some reservations about the tariff cuts that relate to farm products because of my deep concern for the well-being of farmers. We must continue to have an adequate farming base in this country, and I do not think it is useful to achieve low prices for foodstuffs if this dries up the very source of these commodities because the farmers do not have an adequate incentive to produce food.

I think the energy conservation proposals were a bit of a surprise but quite useful in terms of increasing taxes progressively on heavy cars, thus bringing about some fuel economies. The measures to provide a two year tax write-off for equipment used in the private sector and by municipalities to convert industrial municipal waste into productive energy sources are also worth while.

One matter that concerns me about energy and energy sources is the price of oil and petroleum products. I have mentioned on a number of occasions the reservations that I have about increases in the price of fuel and oil products, which to a very significant extent are designed to assist the exploration activities of the multinational corporations. I realize there are many safeguards to ensure that this money is spent in that area, and I am pleased that there are these safeguards. But I would rather see the additional money received by the multinationals transferred to the government itself, and that we establish an appropriate federal agency that would reinvest this money in exploration activity. In this way Canadians will personally have some kind of equity interest in the development that must take place.

It seems to me to be inappropriate to allow these advantages to the private sector when we, through tax measures and other means, are providing them access to the funds to be able to do that. I think we need a national development fund for this purpose, and I believe it would provide some degree of credibility to the increases in petroleum prices the public is so aggrieved about at the present time.

In addition I am delighted with the personal income tax changes, particularly the additional deductible allowance for child care. This is very important at a time of high inflation when often of necessity both parents have to work. The additional allowance for deductions for child care from $500 to $1,000 per year is a very important measure, with the maximum deduction being changed from $2,000 to $4,000 per year per family. This will provide considerable assistance to people in this income category and in this condition of need.

The deferred income changes in relation to registered and non-registered retirement savings plans are also worth while in that they really escalate these levels so those planning for retirement can plan for a retirement income more consistent with what retirement needs will be in the future because of inflation that has taken place in the past and is taking place at the present time. The proposal is to change the level for registered plans from $2,500 to $3,500 per year, which is a step in the right direction, and for non-registered plans from $4,000 to $5,500.

Let me now address myself to what I think is one of the most significant aspects of the budgetary proposals. I should like for a few minutes to talk about those proposals relating to the unemployment insurance plan and to job creation generally.

I for one am very pleased to see the remarriage of the manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission sections of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The divorce that took place during the Pearson days in respect of those two elements of the same department I thought at that time was unwise, and I have felt so ever since. I have been a strong advocate of the need for bringing these two elements back together so we can provide a one-stop service centre for those in need of this service. This will provide greater efficiency, and I hope that in some small way this will contribute to a reduction in federal government expenditures, as I am sure it will when this program is fully put into place. In addition to this there are other things that need to be done. One thing that concerns me greatly in connection with the unemployment insurance program today is its credibility, or to put it more accurately, in some quarters its lack of credibility.

The UIC program brought forward by the new Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Mackasey), the Postmaster General, was a very important departure. It was a program I supported very strongly at the time, not only in the House but at all stages. That does not mean anyone at that time felt it was a perfect answer to a difficult problem, because clearly perfect answers to problems of this magnitude are rarely arrived at, in the House of Commons or anywhere else in society. Nonetheless I supported it then.

I am a great admirer of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for the concern he has had for the lower income people in our society. I do not want to detract from that feeling by any remarks I am about to make now, and I am sure I will not do so.

Credibility in the program is extremely important. If the public views this program as a rip-off, which I really do not think it is, and if it views the program as providing a disincentive to work, then we as politicians have to deal with that perception. It is not good enough to deal with it only by citing statistics. I happen to think that this perception, that it does provide some disincentive to work, has some degree of justification, and we have to meet that. At the moment, on the basis of the information and statistics I have seen, much of which have been developed in recent days by the Department of Manpower and Immigration relating to the whole question of the eligibility period, I think are convincing.

The present rules in relation to eligibility, which require somebody to be attached to the work force for eight weeks, as far as I can make out, with the exception I believe of Holland, represent the lowest entrance requirement in any country in the world. That is my understanding, but that does not mean to say it is wrong for that reason. In countries like England, which is considered by many to be an excessively welfare state, the entrance requirement is 26 weeks, and all over Europe the entrance requirement ranges up to a year and sometimes more, but rarely less than the figure of 26 weeks. I have just quoted for England. We have a program before us today under which the entrance requirement is eight weeks. That is technically less than two months. It is a small attachment to the work force, there is no question about that. The proposal is to change that attachment, not to the figure in England or even the much higher figures in Europe, but in a very modest way from eight weeks to 12 weeks. There is a significant impact, but a modest one nonetheless.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) has cited some facts in this case and I am not going to review them all today. I am impressed by a number of them. First of all, I am told that 64 per cent of those with an attachment of between eight weeks and 11 weeks drop out of the labour force after drawing their benefits. If that is the fact, and at the moment I have no reason to question the validity of it, that is a very staggering fact. Let us compare that dropout rate with the average of those who collect unemployment insurance. We find that the over-all average is 13.5 per cent, and for those who have been covered by insurance for a 52-week period the average is 1.8 per cent. I think that is quite significant.

The cost ratio of benefit payments to those in this category of eight weeks to 11 weeks is 20 times the average cost ratio. This does not mean we have to change the program by virtue of that statistic, but it does indicate in terms of insurance principle that there is reason to believe we ought to reconsider our approach in respect of such a short attachment to the work force.

I am informed that the savings involved here run into the hundreds of millions of dollars, and we ought to redirect these funds toward job creation. If that could be done effectively, particularly on a regional basis for the Atlantic provinces and other areas of high unemployment, we would be doing the wise thing. I have not met many unemployed people who would rather be unemployed than working. Our responsibility is to provide them with that kind of job opportunity. I am not convinced that the redirection of a modest $200 million or $300 million would in fact achieve that objective, but I think it would be a step in the right direction, although more has to be done.

It is really incredible in a society like ours, with all its wealth, its intelligence, its resources and so on, that we cannot find ways and means of more properly matching our labour force and job opportunities. We have to do that as best we can. I believe, therefore, that the changes being proposed in the UIC plan are worth-while changes. I think we have to do this in order to create credibility for the program so that the original UIC program will not die because people relate badly to it. I think that by the changes we would reduce the misuse of the law for personal gain.

Some people have argued that all we need do is tighten up on the administration and that would cover all the abuses which exist. I do not believe that. I believe we have to tighten up the administration in certain areas. However, the abuses which take place now are abuses within the law. These cannot truly be called abuses because people take advantage of the law which parliament gave them to use. If the law is wrong, if it provides a disincentive in some way which reduces the desire of people to get out and find work when they need income, then I think the law needs to be changed. I think the changes will provide more stability in employment patterns by forcing people to have longer attachment to the work force.

It is true it is not always possible for people to be attached to the work force for the period they would like. Obviously that is not possible in many areas. However, there is no doubt there are people drawing unemployment insurance after having been attached for eight weeks now because they do not want to work for more than the period required in order to become eligible for those benefits. I have known of such cases. I believe that although this may not be a widespread abuse it is something which ought to be corrected within the law.

I also believe more funds should be provided and targeted toward job creation. That is important. We also need to provide more funds and initiative in the area of upgrading job skills through mobility and retraining programs. The minister has indicated his intention in this regard. I support that move considerably. I think one further point in connection with the need for the creation of job opportunities is that we should have what I have advocated for a long time. This is what I would call a national advisory council, on education in relation to skills needed by our society in the future.

[Mr. Cafik.]

It seems to me, now that the Department of Manpower and Immigration is married to the UIC in one unit, we might well consider the advisability of sitting down and trying to determine in a sensible and reasonable way what job opportunities are anticipated in the future in all the various trades and professions, and non-trades and professions, not that anyone should have a mandatory requirement to be educated, to be streamed only into a particular area of need, but so that we might find a guidepost in respect of those who go to our universities and trade institutions so that a job would be available to them when they graduate a few years hence. This is done in other countries and I think it might be done to some extent here so that we do not end up training more people in one profession than society will require. I think this should be considered by the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

Furthermore, I believe a change in the formula for federal contributions into the UIC fund from the moving average which exists now on a national basis to an average on a regional basis would assist the department in directing funds and benefits into those target areas which require the benefits most, those areas of high unemployment. That would be a worth-while step which in some way would minimize the fear and concern many members of this House have in connection with the high levels of unemployment in their own regions and the impact of this particular program on that problem.

I also believe that the Department of Manpower should look very closely, with national bodies such as labour unions and so on, at appropriate methods of providing adequate apprenticeship programs within our society. I have a tendency to believe that far too many trades and even professions look upon apprenticeship programs, or even educational programs in such a way that they want to keep a closed shop to some extent to provide the maximum benefits to their own members. It seems to me that in the national interest we must ensure that such self-regulating bodies do not act in such a way as to deny job opportunities in skills and professions to many people in our population who at the present moment do not have an opportunity to enter into them. I think this is an important area of activity and one most appropriate for the consideration of the Department of Manpower.

I shall not continue any further in connection with the unemployment insurance program except to say that, on the basis of information I have, I believe it is important that we make adjustments in this program, not to destroy it but to preserve it, and to make sure that it does serve not only those people who are unemployed but all Canadians.

It would seem to me that by using our resources properly, which are contributed to in that plan by management, the employees, and the government, and that by earmarking those benefits in the right way we will serve all people in our society. I sincerely hope these proposals will play their role in providing more job opportunities and providing the kind of incentive we require in our labour force so that we may continue to have the kind of society we have had in the past number of years.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the two topics I intend to discuss, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) for having been invited by the Prime Minister to assume the responsibilities of Minister of Finance. From the economic and financial standpoint, it is one of the most important departments in the Canadian administration. The Minister of Finance has very heavy responsibilities, and a lot of courage was necessary to agree to make a speech which shows a lot of timidity in attacking the real causes of inflation, a generator of unemployment with all the attendant problems.

Mr. Speaker, if we look back at past budget speeches, we see that government policy has been changing from year to year. First the government fought inflation while taking the chance of seeing unemployment rise; the next year, the government conceived a policy to fight unemployment, while risking a surge in the inflation rates. This year, the new Minister of Finance is offering us a new formula when he says:

> We believe that the problems of unemployment and inflation must be solved together.

I am in complete agreement with this attitude. However, no new formula has been announced which would let us hope that an answer will be found to these two problems caused by an outmoded and distorted financial system which no longer corresponds to the economic realities of this day and age. To be fair to the minister, I must admit that the increase in the profit ceilings for small businesses will be an incentive for those who make considerable efforts to maintain their business in operation in spite of all the difficulties caused by legislation which is becoming more and more obscure and regulations which complement this legislation and are prepared by qualified public servants, but do not always reflect the true feelings of the legislators. I am convinced that if we took the trouble of really attacking the main causes of the problem, we could improve the economic situation of our country, and consequently that of all Canadian citizens.

As concerns the fiscal benefits granted to small businesses, I think that they are well deserved, and that they will promote further development. I always support private enterprise, and when I see that the government develops formulas and benefits to help the development of private enterprise, I am convinced that we are on the right track because the private sector allows businessmen to use their energy, develop their talent and prepare a way to encourage others who would be tempted to do more.

An aspect which the Minister of Finance did not really mention is that of benefits for single dwelling owners. We have been asking for a number of years that property taxes be deductible from the income tax. I believe that if this formula were approved, it would be a step in the right direction and would promote residential construction, create employment and assist home ownership.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to talk about a very important subject on which the minister did not dwell sufficiently in his budget. I mean the farming industry, and more particularly the dairy industry and the cattle industry. Dairy producers are now going through a very difficult crisis which threatens to eliminate a number of producers who have answered in good faith to the appeal of government authorities.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, in recent years governments at all levels have advocated a policy for larger farms assuming that they would be more viable. The government has even gone further in encouraging farmers to move along that line by increasing loans granted to those who wanted to buy a farm, build up a herd and mechanize their operations.

Building upon that policy for larger farms, a great many farmers got into debt for years and now the federal government refuses to recognize it is responsible for the higher dairy production and to fully assume its responsibilities. An increase in dairy production was to be expected with the launching of this policy for quasi-commercial type of arms. In 1973-74 and 1974-75, the government urged dairy producers to boost their production. A number of producers answered to that requirement by raising a good many heifers that have or will become milking cows.

The government told dairy producers that they are themselves responsible for this situation. However, what the government does not say and should say is that in 1975 Canada imported $56 million worth of dairy products and exported for $36 million—hence a deficit of $20 million.

In the whole, when it comes to farm products such as cattle on the hoof or carcasses, dairy products, eggs, veal, lamb, pork, horse and chicken meat, from a favourable commercial balance of $1 million in 1973, Canada accumulated a commercial deficit of $52 million in 1975. In fact, here is where we stand how: in April 1975, the levy for export costs was 45 cents a hundredweight. The support price was $11.02, the actual price was $10.52.

In April 1976, the export levy went to $1.35 a hundredweight and the support price was raised to $11.45 which reduced the actual price at the producer level at $10.10—a reduction of 47 cents a hundredweight. Furthermore, the quota subjected to subsidies was established at $9.5 billion. In Quebec it will result in a 16 per cent reduction from last year deliveries. The surplus will be penalized to the tune of $8.60 a hundredweight on the farm. But if the producer still delivers more milk in April 1976 than he did twelve months earlier, less 16 per cent, there will be a penalty of $8.60, plus transportation costs, plus the cost of publicity and the joint program which will cost in fact $9.13 a hundredweight.

A producer who marketed 20,000 pounds of milk in April 1975 will see his quota reduced by 16 per cent, or 3,200 pounds. Then his deliveries for 1976 will be restricted to 16,800 pounds. If he is paid $8.50 a hundredweight by the plant plus a $2.66 subsidy and less exportation and other costs, he will get $1,564 for the rest, the 3,200 pounds on which there will be a penalty of $9.13 a hundredweight and he will have to pay a penalty of $292.

If in April 1976, the same producer has turned out, as most of them do, 4,000 additional pounds of milk as compared with 1975 and if he delivers this milk to the plant, he will have to pay on this additional amount a penalty of $9.13 a hundredweight, that is $365.20. The aggregate of penalties will amount to $657.20, and therefore he will in fact be left with only $906.80 for a total production of 24,000 pounds of milk, that is $3.78 a hundredweight. To this the producer will have to add his production cost for the amount of milk produced on which he must pay a penalty of $4.13 a hundredweight.

This amounts in fact to a direct tax on the producer's gross income, the most appalling I have ever seen. This is only one example, Mr. Speaker, Some producers will lose a few thousand dollars this year. Their financial status will be bad, worse than last year, as a result of this reduction in income. And all this is reward for the work that the farmer, as the owner, his wife and children have strived to do.

This is their reward. How can the problem be solved? We must not simply note the facts, we must suggest solutions. Therefore, as a responsible member and spokesman for a large number of people affected by this measure—because my constituents are primarily farmers—I say that the answer of the government was that producers are responsible for this situation and they can manage to solve their own problems.

First of all, have we made all necessary efforts to promote the consumption of dairy products in Canada? Are substitutes not cornering an overly large part of the market? Could anything be done in this regard? Second, why not reinstate the subsidy on the quart of fresh milk? This measure was good in 1973, it would still be good today. It would contribute to increase the consumption of fresh milk and to cut down the substantial surplus of fresh milk and that of industrial milk as well.

In 16 months, in 1973 and 1974, the government paid $108 million in subsidies throughout Canada. That is much more than the industrial milk producers are now asking as compensation for loss of income, for submitting to the quotas the government has decided will apply this year. I shall now speak of the distribution of milk in schools. To achieve that, a practical way of doing so should be found: the government should ask its researchers and economists to work on the project. CIDA could also absorb some of the costs with part of the billion dollar budget it is allotted to help developing countries.

I really believe it is unreasonable to pour down the drain a product Providence enables us to have in Canada. Let us take care for, if we waste too much, some day may come when we are short of the basic necessities and we, in turn, become a famished people. It is unreasonable to ask that category of workers to accept lower incomes in 1976 when the government recognizes the necessity of increases for all other groups in our society to enable them to face the cost of living. Farm producers live in the same country as the others, and also bear the burden of the soaring cost of living. Canada, as compared with many other countries, devotes a smaller portion of its budget to agriculture. Producers are willing to agree with lowering their production.

But this requires that the government give them compensation for the loss of revenue relative to last year. This the Canadian government did in 1969, when we helped the prairie grain farmers faced with an overproduction of grain. The federal government spent $100 million to compensate for the revenue lost by western farmers in not seeding a certain acreage. This week, the government hit eastern farmers on the head, especially those in the province of Quebec, with the partial cancellation of the subsidy on feed grain transportation. I have here a telegram received yesterday from the milling association of the province of Quebec, begging the government to reconsider, because of the tremendous impact on the cattle industry.

In their name I ask the Minister of Finance to consider that request and take corrective measures before it is too late. Since Quebec accounts for almost 50 per cent of the total Canadian milk production and since this is the main farm industry in Quebec, that province will be more severely hit. The last two agricultural initiatives by the federal government are giving fuel to the arguments in favour of separation. Sensible people who firmly believe in federalism are seriously shaken by such measures. This is not an off the cuff suggestion. I have received communications to support that indication.

Last night on television, the Quebec Minister of Agriculture was quite categorical on the subject. Those who heard him must share my view. I will not quote him, but the import of his statement was that he could be anything but satisfied and he did not accept the government's decisions.

So, Mr. Speaker, I beg the government to be more flexible and to accept to spend a few million dollars to save the dairy industry from this disaster. Measures must be taken immediately to hearten the producers who send their milk cows to the slaughter house, which will inevitably lead us to shortages.

Mr. Speaker, during the few minutes I have left before the vote, I would like to deal with the second subject, which came to my mind after I read a release which the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) sent to hon. members on April 28, 1975, and which reads:

> . . . The Minister of State for Urban Affairs, the Hon. Barney Danson, and the Minister of Municipal Affairs and of the Environment, who applies the rules of the Quebec Housing Corporation, Dr. Victor C. Goldbloom, have announced that 38 construction projects for 1,435 housing units . . .

. . . will be built. Then the release says:

> Loans amounting to $30,193,489, refundable on a 50-year period at 10⅜ per cent, have been granted by the CMHC pursuant to the agreement of 1974 . . . These loans cover nearly 90 per cent of the construction costs of the projects and the balance will be provided by the Quebec Housing Corporation.

As two communities situated in my riding participate in this program, I asked a question to the minister, which is recorded in the order paper, and we were given the answer on February 23, 1976.

The question was: Were loans made in the riding of Bellechasse, in the municipalities of Saint-Damien and Saint-VAllier, to the Quebec Housing Corporation for building 30 housing units in Saint-Damien and 20 in Saint-Vallier? In answer I was told that indeed an amount of $537,863 was provided for 30 units in Saint-Damien and $292,473 for 20 units in Saint-Vallier. The interest rate, as I just said is 10⅜ per cent. The loans will be repaid over an amortization period of 50 years.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I did some figuring and on the basis of the figures I came up with if the Quebec Housing Corporation repays $57,617.24 a year over 50 years, it will pay $2,342,999 to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—the price of 120 units. And older people will get only 30 of them, the 90 others going to finance. So, on the basis of those figures, and I had them checked, I am told they are right. The Quebec Housing Corporation will have to pay back the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will have to pay back the government which will have to pay back those who control—the credit makers—and mint the credit of this nation.

So high finance is well organized, it uses government to put people in debt, to impose obligations upon them, and they do not have to put out money. So I say it is a method of financing that is too costly. We cannot afford to pay that financing—for $537,863 Canadian taxpayers will have to shell out $2,880,862. I feel this is usury. I made the calculations with the same figures provided by the minister at a simple interest of 10⅜ per cent, not compound interest—and that is compound interest. Considering the cost of compound interest in the public sector, I am beginning to understand why Canada's debt since 1867 went from $75 million to $55 billion today. That is why we have a financing system in the public sector that burdens federal government budgets, and it is the same thing with the provinces and the municipalities.

At simple interest, even 10⅜ per cent, the repayment would be only $1,423,667.39 that is $1,961,530.39 in all with capital. That is according to the debt credit system under which we are run. With the credit system based on what we believe to be true, that credit belongs to society with true social credit and of which only the administration costs would have to be paid, we would pay back $10,757.26 a year on the capital and we would pay administration costs at 1½ per cent. It means that at the end of the year through credit created by the Bank of Canada instead of chartered banks, because one must recognize that the public sector is different from the private sector, the money market would be freed for the private sector, interest rates would go down. Inflation would be fought effectively and so would unemployment. And I think it would be a good thing to accept that formula; that is what I am asking the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 5.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section (6) of Standing Order 60, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendment to the amendment now before the House.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment. All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Saltsman) which was negatived on the following division:

SUGGESTED RETENTION OF QUOTAS FOR QUEBEC MILK PRODUCERS—CANCELLATION OF FEED GRAIN SUBSIDY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important matter of national urgency.

Given the fact that under the new dairy policy Quebec industrial milk producers stand to lose over $100 million in income; that, by the Minister of Agriculture's own admission, producers have generally respected their quotas and are in no way responsible for the present surpluses, and that, consequently, those producers should not be penalized for an over-production to which they did not contribute, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle):

That the government accept the principle of a compensatory subsidy to those Quebec milk producers who, in the last dairy year, have respected their quotas, or that it exempt them from the pertinent provisions of its dairy policy; that, in addition, the government defer application of its new policy on the feed grains transport subsidy until such time as the producers concerned have been consulted and the new substitute programs promised by the government have been announced.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, his motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

SUGGESTION THAT SOVIET AUTHORITIES DEAL WITH CASE OF VALENTYN MOROZ ACCORDING TO HUMANITARIAN PRINCIPLES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. There have been consultations with all parties and I believe there is a disposition to have this motion passed. I am informed that a decision concerning the mental health of Ukrainian historian, Valentyn Moroz, by officials at the Serbsky Institute of Forensic Psychiatry in Moscow is to be made on June 10, following which Mr. Moroz may be transferred to a psychiatric prison hospital. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That this House express the hope that cases such as that of Valentyn Moroz will be dealt with in accordance with the principles covering human rights and fundamental freedoms and other relevant principles in the Helsinki final act.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 can be presented to the House only if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE OF MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF FUNDING SHORTFALL

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Sir, my question is to the Minister of Supply and Services. I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to precisely when he personally became aware of the shortfall in financing of the proposed contract with Lockheed. His parliamentary secretary is on record as stating that the minister did not learn of this problem until January. The minister himself said it was in mid or late December. Having now had full opportunity to check the record, can the minister confirm that he was not informed of the funding shortfall until after the telex of December 2 to Lockheed?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an essential distinction regarding the hon. member's question. Of course, I knew there was a cash flow problem at the Department of National Defence before December 2, but on December 2 they assured me that problem could be solved and the financing was assured; that is what prompted me to send the telex. However, it was not until the middle or the end of December that I learned that Lockheed was unable to supply the financing. If my parliamentary secretary said in his reply that it was in January, I apologize for it.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF CONTENTS OF MEMORANDUM FROM DEPUTY MINISTER

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder whether the Minister of Supply and Services has any further corrections he would like to make to the record he has given to the House in answer to questions with regard to the date of his knowledge and the extent of his knowledge of any shortfalls which were involved in the arrangements with Lockheed. Can he tell us, in particular, whether he was told in an aide-mémoire from his deputy minister, Mr. Desroches, dated December 1, before the telex was sent to Lockheed, that there was a financial risk having regard to the company's overall situation, that the approved budget of the Department of National Defence was not sufficient to meet the cash flow requirement of the early years of the contract and that there would be some $100 million in interest costs which had not been budgeted for?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised to find that an aide-mémoire addressed to me by my deputy minister is in the hands of the opposition. It is a lack of basic ethics. At any rate it is not the first document to fall by chance into the hands of the opposition, and I think it is unfortunate.

Some hon. Members: Just answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Who are you?

Mr. Goyer: I see that members opposite are very touchy when they are told a few home truths.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Goyer: At all events, Mr. Speaker, . . .

[English]

Mr. Fairweather: Truth is a five-letter word.

Mr. Goyer: Did the hon. member say that I am lying to the House now? Was that his remark? Stand up and say it!

Mr. Paproski: Just answer the question, that is all.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I repeat to the House that on December 2 I sent a telex with the agreement of the Department of National Defence. The latter was to see about financing the contract according to conditions stipulated in the contract draft, conditions that every party involved was aware of.

[English]

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the minister know at the time of the sending of the memorandum that the approved budget of the Department of National Defence was not sufficient to meet the cash flow requirements of the early years of the contract? Did he know that there would be some $100 million in interest costs which were not budgeted for? Did he know that there was a final financial risk because of the company's over-all situation? Did he know those three things?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the financial risk involved in dealing with Lockheed, the government felt that the risks were not so great at that time, therefore we could deal with the company. Such was the government's opinion.

Further, on December 2 I did not know yet that the Department of National Defence would need $100 million for interest charges. I said a moment ago that I knew there was a problem of cash flow within the Department of National Defence, but that it would provide for the budgetary deficiencies.

[English]

MINISTER'S ACCUSATIONS AGAINST DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIAL—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister prepared to change in any way the accusations that he made against officials of his department in the statement he made the other day, in light of this new information which he has now presented to the House?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member neither read nor listened to my statement.

Some hon. Members: He was not here.

Mr. Goyer: Or else he was ill informed. Then his information system is inadequate at the official level, if it is not as regards detectives. I will say to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, that the civil servant who was replaced on the project management committee by my deputy minister had changed a text he had read to me personally in the presence of the deputy minister. That is unacceptable. I took my responsibilities and if I had to do it again, I would, because I will not stand for being fed false information and then pass it on to the House and the public. That is essential.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR NOT ASKING FOR WRITTEN COMMITMENT FROM COMPANY IN VIEW OF INFORMATION IN DEPUTY MINISTER'S MEMORANDUM

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. In answer to my question yesterday the minister said that if he had had the information on Lockheed's shortfall he would not have signed a formal contract and sent the telex to Lockheed on December 2. In view of the memorandum to the minister of December 1 in which the financing requirements of Lockheed and the shortfall were made very clear, would the minister say why he did not make the contract with Lockheed conditional upon Lockheed firming up their commitment in writing?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the draft contract containing all the main items which had been negotiated and agreed upon by both parties had been prepared by the LRPA project management group, therefore with the knowledge of all the departments involved. That document was of course the basis of the contract which was proposed between Lockheed and the Crown.

● (1420)

[English]

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, in spite of the statements by the minister, it is clear now beyond the shadow of a doubt that the minister and a number of his senior officials were fully aware—

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INFORMATION ON FUNDING SHORTFALL AT CABINET MEETING OF NOVEMBER 27—DATE OF APPROVAL OF INTEREST PAYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister inform the House whether he and other members of the Cabinet knew of the existence of the shortfall on or during the Cabinet meeting of November 27, which was prior to sending the telex on December 2, and, when the government approved the payment of some $100 million in interest charges to the Lockheed Corporation, did this approval take place before or after December 2?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will want to give this answer to the House, but I must confess that I do not have the exact schedule of events and the calendar of them in my mind.

An hon. Member: Is it too complicated?

Mr. Trudeau: Maybe it is to you, but I do not see anything complicated about it. The hon. member has asked a legitimate question and I understand the interest of the House in having these dates. I am confessing to parliament now that I do not have those exact dates. I can give an explanation to the House of what went on in my mind. It is that we knew the Department of National Defence did not have the cash to finance an outright purchase; we knew that there would have to be some borrowing; and we knew, therefore, we would have some interest to pay for that borrowing; we were hoping that the LRPA bridge financing would be provided by Lockheed, but I cannot at this stage give the exact dates on which those facts came to my knowledge. I will undertake to look at the cabinet minutes and answer the hon. member's legitimate question.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, to refresh the right hon. gentleman's memory, it is my clear understanding that the decision to pay the $100 million was made by the Treasury Board subsequent to December 2. If that is the case, I would ask the Prime Minister why the telegram or the telex was sent off, clearly implicating the government of Canada in a legal commitment to the Lockheed Corporation that did not exist before, when presumably the government was not fully aware of the additional $100 million that would have to be supplied by the people of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having consulted the minutes for me, but I prefer to do it myself and perhaps give him an answer. I think the House will want to remember that the Minister of National Defence indicated yesterday that the beginning of December was a deadline for us, and if we went beyond that deadline we would certainly not be able to purchase the LRPA from Lockheed under the conditions which it had submitted. It was important at that point to keep the contract alive if we wanted to fulfil our commitment to the defence forces of Canada, our commitment to the NATO force and our commitment to our allies. That is the reason we did not want a hiatus between the expiration date and government action. Even with hindsight, I think we did the right thing.

I want to remind the House that we did decide very shortly before to be very strict in our fiscal guidelines and our expenditure decisions, and we knew we would not be able to buy these outright. Therefore, it was clear to us for several months that we had to find more financing. The misunderstanding was explained to the House several months ago by the Minister of National Defence. It was between the Lockheed Company and one of his officials. It was a verbal agreement on which I think the minister said perhaps we acted imprudently, but we did so in good faith based on this verbal agreement.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—AUTHORITY OF COMPANY OFFICIAL TO GIVE VERBAL UNDERTAKING ON FINANCING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister took a long time not to answer the question. I should like then to ask the Minister of National Defence if he would confirm to the House that the person from whom he or his officials received the oral commitment from Lockheed was in fact a person who worked in the marketing section of the Lockheed Corporation and not in the finance department of Lockheed and therefore was not likely to be in a position to know the details about the financial capacities of the Lockheed Corporation and certainly was not in a position of authority to give any kind of commitment to the government.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that the conversation which General Allan had was in the first instance with Mr. Dale Daniels who is in the marketing side of the Lockheed Company but General Allan asked Mr. Daniels to confirm with whatever officials he wished to in the finance department of Lockheed and it was a day or two later after those consultations with the proper authorities in Lockheed that Mr. Daniels called back—

Mr. Broadbent: What date was that?

Mr. Richardson: —and reported the Lockheed position. It was not just the opinion of one man in the marketing department.

AGRICULTURE

PRESENCE OF INDUSTRIAL MILK PRODUCERS ON PARLIAMENT HILL—GOVERNMENT POSITION TO SETTLE THEIR PROBLEMS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware that there are today on Parliament Hill from 8,000 to 10,000 industrial milk producers, and that many have come from 700 or 800 miles away, that is beyond Rimouski or Témiscouata? Would he then advise the House whether the Minister of Agriculture will meet with those producers this afternoon and whether negotiations are under way between the Canadian Dairy Commission and the management committees concerning the settlement of the industrial milk issue?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter was discussed a while ago at the cabinet meeting and we have delegated the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Communications to meet with them. The meeting took place, but unfortunately I have not yet been informed of its outcome.

Mr. Beaudoin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Would the right hon. Prime Minister tell whether he thinks it will be possible to have or to complete these negotiations this afternoon and whether farmers will be able to get an answer before heading back home?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have just indicated that that meeting has been held and that I have received no report. I know the farmers' case has been heard with an open mind. In addition to the ministers I have named some twenty Liberal hon. members were in fact at that meeting. I am expecting a report on the meeting.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, with your leave, I direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board, having just heard from the Prime Minister that he attended the meeting.

Considering that the President of the Treasury Board was at that meeting, is he in a position to inform the House of the decisions which were taken, if any?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for Sherbrooke, informs me that the meeting is going on now, that of course some ministers are in the House to answer the questions of the opposition but that the meeting is not completed. Therefore we have not received the final report.

TRANSPORT

CANCELLATION OF FEED GRAIN FREIGHT SUBSIDY

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary about this same matter is for the Minister of Transport.

I would like to ask him whether he has examined the protests raised by Quebec Agriculture Minister Kevin Drummond, and those raised by concerned groups against the removal of the feed grain freight subsidy and whether he intends to confer immediately with Mr. Drummond or the representatives of Quebec agricultural organizations with a view to finding a solution to hardships caused to Quebec producers by the government decision?

● (1430)

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, meetings of that type have been held and certainly will continue. The Minister of Agriculture and I met with Mr. Drummond some time during the course of the winter to discuss the matter. On Monday, prior to the announcement, officials were here discussing it and the implications for the future of the programs that will be available for grain deficient areas.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE ON WHICH CABINET INFORMED OF NEED TO PAY INTEREST BECAUSE OF SHORTFALL IN FUNDS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday we witnessed the unedifying sight of two ministers quarrelling over who was responsible for the $16 million waste—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: Could the Minister of National Defence advise the House if it was at the meeting on November 27 of the cabinet that the cabinet was informed of the requirement for funds to pay the interest on borrowing needed because of the DND shortfall?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say first of all that my statements yesterday and those of my colleague indicated very clearly that we were working together on this project.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: It was at the cabinet meeting of November 27 that the cabinet document containing the reference to the need for financing and the provision of approximately $100 million for that purpose was considered. I, like the Prime Minister, would have to check the records to see whether there was a cabinet decision on that subject or whether it was subsequently at Treasury Board but it certainly was very clearly before cabinet for consideration on November 27.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if the minister would check the minutes of that meeting. At the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on May 27 the minister supported General Allan when he said that the agreement with Lockheed was put to the cabinet on November 14, considered on November 27 and the minister said: "... the fact that cabinet approved interest payments and which as I said are in the blue book, indicate that cabinet knew there was a shortfall." The Minister of Supply and Services denied knowledge of the shortfall. He said that in reply to a question from the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. Does the minister wish to withdraw the statement which he made to the committee or are we to understand that one of the two ministers has misled the House and is continuing to do so?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the estimates from the Department of National Defence that are before the House in the blue book show $1,061,000,000 for this program of which $953 million is for the main project and the remainder, which is about $107 million, is the interest. It is in the blue book and it is before the House.

TRANSPORT

CANCELLATION OF FEED GRAIN FREIGHT SUBSIDY—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO COMPENSATE PRODUCERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Could the minister explain why, contrary to what he suggested, a significant part of the population of the province of Quebec was deprived of the subsidy provided for the transportation of feed grain before announcing the alternative programs or compensatory measures which he mentioned? When does the minister intend to announce those programs which could make up for the great loss which Quebec producers will suffer?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that last statement is not true at all. The program for the increased production of grain is a broad one and certainly always tended to favour in many ways, as indicated, those areas which are grain deficient but have potential. It is therefore a positive program on the side of making an area more self-sufficient. There is no detriment through the removal of the feed freight assistance. In many circumstances the grain is being purchased in the area of Ontario and Quebec because the adjustment will take place on an equivalent basis to the offering prices by the Canadian Wheat Board. It is only if grain is priced at very low levels the real freight will make a difference and at that point obviously by definition the grain will be at an economic rate.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Considering that with the recent measures included in the dairy policy, the Quebec milk producers will lose $100 million in gross revenue, that many milk producers are now in Ottawa, and that there is a meeting with some ministers and government officials, would the right hon. Prime Minister be prepared to recommend a direct subsidy to make up for those direct losses suffered by each milk producer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants me to consider his proposal, I must point out first that this year we increased the subsidy to about $86 million. The hon. member wants us to be more generous, but I know he will not take the money out of his pocket. He should indicate what other government program he wants us to cut if we are to find the $100 million.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the series of recent events which have created serious unemployment and severe economic conditions in the Moncton area, would the Prime Minister be good enough to advise the House of the following: What is the status regarding the rumoured closure of Canadian Forces Base Moncton; is the Department of Supply and Services establishing operations and facilities in Moncton; are there plans for the erection of a public service training school in Moncton; what other government facilities are likely to be decentralized to Moncton—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect to the hon. member I am sure that information ought to be sought by way of a question on the order paper.

POSSIBILITY MR. BENOÎT SAINTE-MARIE WILL BE APPOINTED MEMBER OF KEENAN COMMISSION AND USE EXPERT CONSULTANTS

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is intended for the Minister of Transport.

In view on the fact that following a meeting with representatives of the Department of Transport on Monday May 31, the representatives of the l'Association des gens de l'air du Québec asked the Minister of Transport in a letter to appoint another member to the inquiry commission headed by Mr. John Keenan, and that the terms of reference of the Keenan Commission provide for the hiring of experts and consultants, could the Minister of Transport inform the House whether he intends to comply with the request made by the association for the appointment of Mr. Benoît Sainte-Marie to the Keenan inquiry commission, and to hire the experts and consultants required by the commission to carry out the terms of reference given to it by the cabinet?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the matter is too complex to respond to at this point without some further reflection and indeed I propose to attempt to explain my view of the situation at a meeting I hope to have at a later date with representatives of the l'Association des gens de l'air. I indicated the last day my reasoning behind the appointment of Mr. Keenan and hon. members will know much of the background that concerns it. It is expected of course that Mr. Keenan will be selecting people to advise him, and I understand he may be making some indication of that in the very near future.

COMMUNICATIONS

REASON FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ESTABLISH PAY TELEVISION—EFFECT ON CANADIAN PROGRAMS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. In view of the fact that pay television would further reduce audiences for many Canadian television stations and hence would reduce revenues for production of over air broadcasts, thus subverting the intent of the Canadian Broadcasting Act, and in view of the fact that the CRTC in a policy paper of December 16, 1975 concluded it was premature to have pay television in Canada at this time, why is the government rushing to have pay television in place at the end of the year when it will have such a disruptive and negative effect on over air broadcasts?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would agree that pay television is inevitable. The fact that it is inevitable does not necessarily mean it should be disruptive to the system as we have built it presently; therefore we are not rushing into the introduction of pay television but, on the contrary, we are trying to envision how pay television can be introduced in this country in an orderly fashion. We are also trying to envision how it can be integrated into the present system, and most of all, how it can be used to generate more revenues in the broadcasting industry, thus enhancing our position in producing better quality Canadian programs.

Mr. Symes: In view of the admission by the CRTC that at least in its initial period pay TV will depend on foreign produced material for its financial success, what guarantee can the minister give that the majority of pay TV revenues will not go to acquire foreign programs, to the detriment of Canadian program production?

Mrs. Sauvé: If the hon. member had read the speech I made yesterday, he would realize that I said that in order to avoid that the revenues derived from the distribution of foreign programs for Canadian viewing, some kind of structure should be set up. I gave a few suggestions as to what these structures could be. I suggested some kind of structure which would ensure that those who purchased the programs would put the revenues derived from the viewing of those programs into the system of pay television to produce more Canadian programs which then could be fed back into the pay television system.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REPORT ON PCB IN GREAT LAKES FISH—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF FINDINGS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment I will direct my question either to the acting minister, the parliamentary secretary or possibly the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the federal government's task force background report regarding the presence of the toxic chemical PCB in great lakes fish—in fact, that report is now available, and I presume it will be tabled today—and in view of the fact that a press conference is scheduled for 3.30 this afternoon, I ask the minister or parliamentary secretary to tell the House, so that we might have the benefit of that knowledge at the same time as the press, some of the highlights. In particular, will the minister or the parliamentary secretary confirm that the report discloses levels of PCB which are eight times higher than acceptable levels, according to health authorities? If such is the case, what action will be taken—or will any action be taken—under the Environmental Contaminants Act, and if so, when?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct. The report will be tabled this afternoon. There are some findings in the report. It really depends upon what part of Canada the hon. member is talking about and what he means by health standards.

As the hon. member knows, we inspect all fish from the great lakes which is sold. The great lakes area is the most contaminated area, particularly the Lake Ontario portion. However, none of this fish is passed on to the consumer because we have the fish inspection branch, and our standards are very strict. In fact, they are some of the strictest standards in the world for PCB's in fish, so I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he read the report, and then the matter can be discussed openly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AIR TRANSPORT

ALLEGATION CONCERNING INQUIRY INTO BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL—POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I hope the minister is aware that a great deal of uncertainty has been created amongst air traffic controllers across the country by an ambiguous statement in the Globe and Mail this morning indicating that officials of his department have said to representatives of Gens de l'air du Québec that a planned inquiry into air traffic control is no more than a marketing operation to sell bilingualism. Is the minister in a position today to comment on that statement, and particularly on that marketing notion, or would he be prepared to do so tomorrow? It is very disquieting.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I followed up on the matter as soon as the report came to my attention, and what I suspected was confirmed: that any such reference was taken quite out of context. It is true that my officials had made the very obvious point that even after the report of the commission there would be a very important public relations matter to be dealt with in order to assure the public of Canada that safety is indeed protected in the procedures we have developed. It was in that context that the statement was made.

Of course, it has been our aim all along to reassure that safety is a foremost consideration. Consistent with that we believe that bilingual air traffic control can be developed in the province of Quebec with the appropriate procedures, and that, of course—to ensure that that is the case—was a purpose of the appointment of the Keenan Commission.

POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER ON BILINGUALISM FOR FLIGHT CREWS OF AIRCRAFT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, but he is not in his seat now.

An hon. Member: Don't rush him.

Mr. Nielsen: The Prime Minister probably did not hear the question from a member on this side and the answer by the Minister of Transport. The question had to do with the inquiry into the air traffic control requests with respect to bilingualism in air traffic control in the province of Quebec. In the interests of safety, and because the matter is of some concern as the Prime Minister discovered in his most recent visit to Vancouver, and in order to reassure the travelling Canadian public, would the Prime Minister adopt and enunciate as government policy just as quickly as possible the suggestion that the government has no business in the cockpit of the nation's airlines?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows about the government's official languages policy because his own party supported that policy, and it applies to all federal institutions. It would be useful if he would remind himself of that.

Since I am reminding the hon. member of something, let me remind him that the last time we had an exchange in the House he promised to look at a certain press clipping which indicated he did not believe what I said. He was either going to correct that or confirm it in some way. Let me just remind him that he has not found time to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I will do that immediately, but in the meantime, let me remind the Prime Minister that the cockpits of the nation's airlines are not exactly government institutions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I read the press clipping, which the Prime Minister's staff very kindly supplied to me, from, I believe, the Montreal Gazette at the moment of my departure on the day we had that exchange, and I found that in that article nowhere am I quoted as having said the word he says the article attributes to me. I found also that there were several errors in the article, including the statement that I am a former member of the RCMP. So, if the Prime Minister does have the kind of quotations in articles to which he was referring, I would be very pleased to consider them, and if any apologies are necessary, they will be forthcoming.

Mr. Paproski: And I hope it is vice versa.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MEMORANDUM FROM DEPUTY MINISTER DATED DECEMBER 1

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I endeavoured to secure from the Prime Minister his undertaking to place on the table of the House the minutes of the cabinet dealing with the mysterious matter which was referred to earlier by the Leader of the Opposition, and the Prime Minister's attitude did not indicate that passionate love he advocated internationally at the Habitat Conference.

However, I now presume to ask the Minister of Supply and Services whether he will table the aide-mémoire referred to by the Leader of the Opposition dated December 1. After all, it should be very easy to produce that, unless there is some reason to hide it, too.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is evident that there is a lack of communications between the previous Progressive Conservative Party leader and the present one, since the hon. member's query at the very beginning of the question period had to do precisely with an internal document. Then, the hon. member only had to ask his dear colleague!

● (1450)

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I simply ask whether the aide-memoires will be produced. If it is not, I remind the hon. gentleman of Cromwell's words in the Long Parliament, paraphrased: "In the name of God, go." We say, "Go Goyer. Go Goyer, now!"

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the continuing high unemployment rate in Canada and the further deterioration in postal service brought about by Treasury Board's decision to cut 305 man years from the postal service, would the minister now reconsider this decision?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I to take it from the President of the Treasury Board's answer, Mr. Speaker, that he favours expenditures for unemployment insurance and welfare rather than for payment of wages for urgently needed work?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are now under a budgetary restraint period, which is indeed supported by most members of the opposition, if not by the hon. member himself.

MANPOWER

JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF EARLY ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It has to do with his comments yesterday concerning the creation later this year of a new, year-round multi-faceted direct job creation program.

An hon. Member: What a phrase!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): As the minister referred to this program as being related to areas of high unemployment affected by seasonal or cyclical factors, can he indicate what consultation has taken place with the various provinces which obviously have a direct stake in it and whether, because of the extended time needed to make the program effective, there will be an announcement about the program before the summer recess?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there will be no further announcement about the program before the summer recess apart from my comments yesterday, in which I clearly indicated—

Mr. Paproski: What summer recess?

Mr. Andras: —that we intend to design the program for presentation to parliament in the fall.

Mr. Paproski: What summer recess?

Mr. Andras: If there is a summer recess. There will be, of course, discussions with my colleagues in the provincial governments. Ongoing discussions are naturally in order. As I said yesterday, we have a conference of federal and provincial manpower ministers scheduled for the fall.

ALLEGED CANCELLATION OF COMMUNITY EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY PROGRAM—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As some provincial premiers seem to be upset by the obvious lack of consultation in this area, and the cancellation last December of a program known as the community employment strategy, may I ask what information the minister conveyed, either to the premiers or the ministers responsible in the provinces, as to why these programs were terminated a few months ago?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is incorrectly informed. The community employment strategy program has not been cancelled. It was reconfirmed by cabinet decision last fall and is an ongoing developmental program in which I have a great deal of faith and commitment. There have been discussions with provincial ministers. I have met provincial ministers bilaterally on many occasions. I met with them regularly, in concert, and as recently as two weeks ago we definitely agreed that we have in place now a consultative mechanism which satisfies both the federal and provincial governments. Indeed, I think they were enthusiastic about my reaction on that occasion.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR RELEASE OF LIABILITY TO COMPANY AND ACTION AGAINST MR. STOPFORTH

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. In answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, the Minister of National Defence indicated that not only had he received assurances from the director of marketing of Lockheed, but had received confirmation two days later of the capacity of Lockheed to provide front end financing. The letter which the minister tabled recently, in which he extended the option for one month, provided for a full release of liability with regard to the Lockheed corporation. Since those assurances were given by Lockheed, why was it necessary to have a full legal release from Lockheed in the document? Clearly, when the minister sent the telex on December 2, there was no legal liability because of the assurances Lockheed had given.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking me for a legal opinion, and I am obviously not a legal adviser to the government. However, I will simply say that the document of March 30, to which the hon. member refers, had nothing to do with the verbal offer made by Lockheed to finance part of the contract.

[English]

Mr. Leggatt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the information which the Minister of National Defence gave this House concerning those assurances of Lockheed was information which Mr. Stopforth had, it means that if the Minister of National Defence and his officials were misled, surely the Minister of Supply and Services and his officials were misled. My question is this. Since there was this misrepresentation from Lockheed, why is Mr. Stopforth's head on the block? Clearly, he is as innocent as anyone else. Why is he carrying the can for this?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, it is quite simple and I already gave this explanation in the House. A first version was given me in the presence of my deputy minister, who is the administrative head of the department regarding civil servants. I thus received a version from Mr. Stopforth to the effect that he was not aware of such a verbal offer. Later on, Mr. Stopforth decided to change his version. In my opinion, this is fundamental: he misinformed me and under the circumstances I had no choice.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The minister's attitude is tantamount to conviction before trial. I do not like your way of going about this.

TRANSPORT

REPORT ON USE OF UNIT TRAINS TO CARRY GRAIN TO ATLANTIC PORTS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF SUPPORTING DOCUMENTS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a brief question to the Minister of Transport? Is the minister in a position to indicate to the House by way of report or otherwise the findings of the task force which was established for the purpose of reviewing Bill C-87? May I ask him, as a supplementary question, whether he will be prepared at the appropriate time to table the documentation accompanying that report, documentation particularly which relates to the integral train concept which is to replace the subsidy?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, any reference to a task force should be specifically in relation to the question of unit trains for grain going directly to the Atlantic ports. I have received an informal, preliminary report, but the final report is not available. When it is I anticipate being able to let the hon. member know about the results.

Mr. Forrestall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister give some indication of the time frame about which he is talking? As he knows, there is no money in the estimates to meet the requirements of that particular section of the Railway Act.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we will worry about the problem of money when the time comes. I cannot give a precise time. One of the elements involved is a satisfactory agreement about rail rates. One may begin by taking a certain position with the railways and, hopefully, end with another position. That is one of the difficulties. The process could take some time.

AIRPORTS

ALLEGATION FOREIGN COMPANIES HAVE MONOPOLY ON CONCESSIONS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Could the minister assure the House that the amendments soon to be brought to the Canadian airport construction policy will promote Canadian initiative and that no airport financed with Canadian public funds will be monopolized as at present by foreign firms as Budget controlled by Transport America Corporation or Hertz owned by RCA?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can review the hon. member's question with him, to ascertain the particular policy to which he is referring.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On Monday, the government House leader indicated what the business of the House would be down the line, so to speak. Has he anything to add to what he said then?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, basically, the government's program remains the same. I thought I might indicate our intention to call what I hope will be considered as two or three non-contentious matters. Today we will continue with the budget debate.

Tomorrow is Friday, the day that we traditionally try to clear the order paper of non-controversial items. I, therefore, intend to call first, tomorrow, items Nos. 33 and 34 appearing under government business on the order paper which refer certain documents to standing committees, followed by third reading of Bill C-81. We will then revert to Bill C-84 and will continue that business on Monday, followed by the budget debate for the rest of the week.

ENERGY

MEASURE RESPECTING DOMESTIC AND INDUSTRIAL USE OF SOLAR ENERGY

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-440, respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Caccia: Briefly, Mr. Speaker, the reasons for introducing this bill are the following. Time is running out before non-renewable resources will have been depleted. Future generations of Canadians, and their energy requirements, depend upon decisions made in this decade. The potential offered by renewable resources, such as the sun, needs to be pursued vigorously now. Solar power heating offers an opportunity for the development of a new Canadian industry. Considerable strides are being made in other industrial nations, particularly the United States. We must develop the solar heating technology suited to the Canadian climate.

The purpose of the bill is to establish an institute of solar energy applications. The institute would undertake intensive research leading to the development of a technology that will permit the use of solar energy.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS CONCERNING QUOTAS FOR SHOWING OF CANADIAN FILMS

Question No. 4,583—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

Were any discussions held between the federal and provincial governments respecting quotas for the showing of Canadian made feature films and, if so (a) between whom and on what dates (b) what were the results of such discussions (c) what objections or reservations, if any, were expressed by the representatives of provincial governments to the proposed voluntary quota agreement (d) which provinces specifically indicated an interest in implementing quotas for feature films made within their own province?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Film Development Corporation as follows: Yes, discussions were held: (a) Between Mr. Michael Spencer, Executive Director, Canadian Film Development Corporation; and Mr. Peter M. Roberts, Assistant Under-Secretary of State for Cultural Affairs; and on February 27, 1975 in St. John, Newfoundland: Mr. John Perlin, Director of Cultural Affairs, Government of Newfoundland. On February 28, 1975, in Halifax, Nova Scotia: Mr. Hugh Conrod, Deputy Minister of Recreation; Mr. A. J. Hickey, Deputy Provincial Secretary, Government of Nova Scotia, and officials. on March 7, 1975 in Edmonton, Alberta: Mr. Walter Kaasa, Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of Culture, Youth and Recreation, Government of Alberta, and officials. on March 10, 1975 in Victoria, British Columbia: Mr. A. L. Pearson, Associate Deputy Attorney-General; Mr. L. J. Wallace, Deputy Provincial Secretary, Government of British Columbia, and officials. On March 13, 1975 in Regina, Saskatchewan: Mr. Frank Bogdasavich, Deputy Minister of Culture and Youth, Government of Saskatchewan and officials. On March 14, 1975 in Winnipeg, Manitoba: Mr. Allan Early, Department of Industry and Commerce, Government of Manitoba, and officials. On April 10, 1975 in Ottawa: Mr. Douglas B. Boylan, Clerk of the Executive Council and Secretary of the Cabinet, Government of Prince-Edward-Island. On April 17, 1975 in Fredericton, New Brunswick: Mr. Harry Cochrane, Deputy Provincial Secretary, Government of New Brunswick, and officials. On April 18, 1975 in Toronto, Ontario: Mr. Malcolm Rowan, Deputy Minister; Mr. Douglas McCullough, Assistant Deputy Minister, Ministry of Culture and Recreation, Government of Ontario, and officials. On May 9, 1975, in Quebec City: Mr. André Gourd, Special Advisor to the Minister of Cultural Affairs, Government of Quebec; (b) The discussions indicated that there was no unanimity among the provinces as to the need for a quota, although some of them were prepared to give consideration to this form of support for the Canadian film industry. On the other hand there was little interest in the proposal that box-office levies should be imposed by the provinces; (c) The proposed voluntary quota agreement was not discussed with the representatives of the provincial governments; (d) While some provinces indicated that they were prepared to consider implementation of quotas for feature films, it is not possible to identify specific provinces due to the confidential nature of discussions.

CANADIAN MADE FILMS

Question No. 4,591—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

1. What Canadian participation will there be in deciding on the allocation of the $1.7 million set aside under voluntary agreement with Odeon and Famous Players for investment in Canadian made films?

2. For each of the seven major feature films produced in Canada since the voluntary agreement came into effect, what percentage of the financing came from (a) CFDC (b) the $1.7 million voluntary agreement with Odeon and Famous Players (c) other sources?

3. What new measures is the government considering to encourage investment from (a) public (b) private Canadian sources in the Canadian feature film industry?

4. Does the Secretary of State consider one of the effects of the $1.7 million agreement to be a centralization of decision-making with respect to which feature films in Canada receive production funding, and (a) if so, for what reason (b) if not, for what reason?

5. Does the Secretary of State consider decentralization of the Canadian film industry, away from its current concentration in a few major centres, to be a desirable goal and, if so, does he consider the current state of the industry appropriate to pursuing such a goal within the next decade?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Film Development Corporation as follows: 1. The decision regarding the allocation of these funds is being made by the executives of these companies which are registered as Canadian companies and are doing business in Canada.

2. Nine major motion pictures were produced in Canada since the voluntary agreement came into effect on August 1st, 1975: (a) 63.64 per cent; 62½ per cent; 63 per cent; 47 per cent; 50 per cent; 25 per cent; 30 per cent; 0 per cent; 0 per cent; (b) 14.14 per cent; 12½ per cent; 21 per cent; 35 per cent; 30 per cent; 10 per cent; 7½ per cent; 20 per cent; 14 per cent; (c) 22.22 per cent; 25 per cent; 16 per cent; 18 per cent; 20 per cent; 65 per cent; 62½ per cent; 80 per cent; 86 per cent.

3. (a) The government is considering changes in the CFDC Act in order to make it more flexible; (b) Private Canadian sources will only be interested in the Canadian feature film industry as an investment if producers manage to create a significant track record of financial returns, but a decision to provide more flexibility in the CFDC Act will create a better climate for private investment.

4. To be answered elsewhere.

5. To be answered elsewhere.

In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned: 1. To be answered elsewhere.

2. To be answered elsewhere.

3. To be answered elsewhere.

4. Decisions with respect to which feature films will receive production funding in Canada have been made in Montreal, Toronto and, to some extent, Vancouver and a change in this situation is not anticipated in the near future.

5. Decentralisation of the Canadian film industry away from its current concentration in a few major centers is only a desirable goal in so far companies established in the regions can operate successfully on an industrial basis. In the long run, such a goal appears to be feasible.

AIRCRAFT—PRIME MINISTER'S WIFE'S JOURNEY

Question No. 4,954—Mr. MacKay:

1. What aircraft was used by the Prime Minister's wife to return from Venezuela?

2. Who was the (a) captain (b) first officer during the flight?

3. Did the Prime Minister's wife occupy the pilot's seat at any time during the flight and, if so (a) for how long (b) over what territorial area?

4. Did the Prime Minister's wife operate the controls of the aircraft at any time and, if so (a) for how long (b) did she control the aircraft in a climb in controlled air space (c) over what territorial area was she at the controls?

5. Was the captain of the aircraft in a position to allow an unqualified individual to occupy his seat during cruise and climb manoeuvres and, if so, on what basis?

6. Did the captain allow the Prime Minister's wife to control the aircraft in cruise and climb manoeuvres through manipulation of the controls and, if so, for what purpose?

7. Was airways traffic control clearance received for the climb during which the Prime Minister's wife was at the controls?

8. Has a violation been filed against the pilots by the Department of Transport and/or the Federal Aviation Authority?

9. Have any instructions been issued to the Air Force VIP squadron to ensure that no such incident occurs again?

10. Has the Minister of Transport received any reaction to this violation of International aviation rules from the (a) Airline Pilots of America (b) Federation of Airline Pilots Association (c) Canadian Airline Pilots Association (d) International Civil Aviation Organization?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Defence and Transport Canada as follows: 1. Mrs. Trudeau returned from Venezuela on board the Canadian Armed Forces Boeing 707 aircraft that had been assigned to the Prime Minister and his party for this official visit.

2. (a) and (b) See Question No. 69 answered on February 3, 1976.

3. Yes. One of the two pilots seats; (a) Five minutes; (b) Over the Atlantic Ocean approximately 200 miles south east of New York City.

4. (a) and (b) Mrs. Trudeau was not in control of the aircraft at any time. Throughout the time that she was invited to sit in the left hand seat, the Captain was in control of the aircraft from the right hand seat; (c) The area as described in 3 (b) above.

5. The Captain was in the righthand flight deck seat and he retained full control of the aircraft at all times. Canadians Forces regulations stipulate that both pilot seats need only be occupied by qualified pilots during arrivals and departures when the aircraft is below 10,000 ft. and at all times below 1,500 ft.

6. No. The Captain was in full control at all times.

7. Clearance was received for a climb from 35,000 to 39,000 ft. during the period when Mrs. Trudeau was present in the flight deck.

8. No. DOT and the FAA have no jurisdiction over military aircraft.

9. No. Additional instructions have not been issued, because safety was not compromised and no regulations were broken.

10. No.

ROLE OF CBC BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Question No. 5,168—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

1. What is the role of the CBC Council?

2. What (a) is the number (b) are the names and addresses (c) are the functions (d) are the salaries (e) is the distribution by province or territory of the senior public servants on the Council?

3. How many are (a) English speaking (b) French speaking (c) bilingual?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. Under the Broadcasting Act, 1968, the Board of Directors constitutes the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. As such, the Corporation (Board) is established for the purpose of providing the national broadcasting service contemplated by Section 3 of the Broadcasting Act. The Act provides a mandate of broad objectives for the Corporation and the Board establishes Corporate policies to be followed by Corporation Management in achieving programming and coverage objectives as laid down in the Act. These achievements are assessed regularly by the Board. The Board also reviews all Corporate budget estimates and approves final budgets.

2. (a) Fifteen. One vacancy exists at present, (b) A. W. Johnson, Ottawa, Ont.; Dr. Stanley Bah, Windsor, Ont.; Brian Flemming, Halifax, N.S.; Mrs. Georgette Guay, Quebec, Quebec; Frank N. Hansen, Inuvik, Northwest Territories; Mrs. Mary Konantz, Winnipeg, Manitoba; André Lamy, Montreal, Quebec; Fernand D. Lavergne, St-Boniface, Manitoba; Michael Lypka, Hamilton, Ont.; Yves J. Ménard, Montreal, Quebec; James S. Palmer, Calgary, Alberta; Judge Dorothy Petrie, Willowdale, Ont.; Paul S. Plant, Vancouver, British Columbia; Bernard F. Trotter, Kingston, Ont. One vacancy; (c) See 1 above; (d) With the exception of the President, Directors receive an honorarium of $150. per day while attending a meeting of the Corporation or a Committee thereof; (e) See (b) above.

3. (a) Ten; (b) Four; (c) Six.

MIRABEL AIRPORT—DE-ICING CONTRACT

Question No. 5,440—Mr. Herbert:

Was a contract awarded by the government to GENAC, a joint venture of Air Canada and General Aviation, for aircraft de-icing at Mirabel Airport and, if so (a) what are the details of this contract (b) was a tender received from GENAC and was the content of any such tender made public (c) are any costs of this contract recoverable from airlines and, if so (i) what is the method of recovery (ii) what percentage of costs is the objective of such recovery charges?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No contract was awarded to GENAC; (a) Not applicable; (b) No tenders were received; (c) The facility was under construction during the winter of 1975/1976. The facility was declared fully operational on March 20. No weather occurred since March 20 requiring aircraft to be de-iced at this airport and thus no charges could be assessed; (i) Recovery of costs will be pro-rated to each airline on amount of usage to recapture operating, maintenance and material costs; (ii) The decision to construct a common de-icing facility at the new Montreal International Airport (Mirabel) was based primarily on ecological factors, to ensure that effluents (glycol) were not discharged into streams. This facility is an experimental facility from which design standards must be assessed, confirmed or modified as necessary for future installations as required elsewhere at Canadian airports. Until the results of a research project to be conducted during the forthcoming two winters can be evaluated, the parameters of cost recovery of capital costs will not be fully determined.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, June 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stevens (page 13901).

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my feeling indeed is that the best speech in this debate is now being made outside this House, a few steps from here on Parliament Hill, because some 10,000 farmers are now expressing to the government their dissatisfaction and anger with the inequities now being caused against the farming industry in Quebec, Ontario and elsewhere.

I hope their vibrant speech will be heard by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the government as a whole.

Before starting these comments, I had an opportunity to state, in a motion under Standing Order 43, that Quebec's industrial milk producers will face a loss of revenue totalling more than $100 million. I also indicated that by the Minister of Agriculture's (Mr. Whelan) own admission, those producers respected their quotas and are in no way responsible for the current overproduction. Therefore, they should not be penalized for something they did not contribute to. Mr. Speaker, I would extend to the Minister of Finance the usual congratulations for his tour de force in presenting us with a non-budget, for the know-how with which attempted to have us accept his wait and see approach as an action-oriented approach. Of course I share the views of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). I was pleased to second the non-confidence motion that he put forward as regards a budget speech of which he underlined the mistakes and deficiencies.

Even though our party has no majority in the House, it is obvious from what we hear from every region of this country that it reflects the view of the majority of Canadian taxpayers in this debate. The very fact that Liberal members have publicly indicated their reservations about the government policy is a very strong indication that it does not have the support of the public at large.

How times have changed, Mr. Speaker! Two years ago, we were in the midst of an electoral campaign and the Prime Minister was still refusing to recognize the impending danger of inflation. He was openly laughing at the program that the Progressive Conservative Party was suggesting. Fifteen months later, on October 13, 1975, the government leader appeared on the national radio and television network to recognize publicly that one year earlier he had cheated the people. He was introducing it as his party's initiative, but scamping it in such a way and with such clumsiness that today, everybody has to admit that his administration is a complete failure.

In his non-confidence motion, our party is asking most hon. members to support it because nothing justifies us to believe that the incapacity the government has shown since 1968, and which is aggravating every week, has suddenly turned into expertise. Nothing allows us to think that the congenital weakness of cabinet members has suddenly turned into energy. We are always faced with the same inert and inefficient cabinet and getting rid of them as soon as possible would do this country great service.

The mockery of a budget which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) introduced on May 25 is a further indication of this inefficiency. In this regard, some people have mentioned a status quo. Reality is even worse: We have here a policy of ultra-conservatism. The Minister of Finance was satisfied with making minor adjustments in the hope that others, the United States in particular, will come to his rescue. Being unable to conceive dynamic initiatives that would meet our actual requirements, the minister is merely following the lead of foreign economies.

When tax incentives were needed to stimulate the shaky recovery that was emerging, the minister only granted very small benefits to small businesses, but he further whittled down corporate profits. He has increased a little bit the deductions for child care and retirement savings plans, but, as a whole, he has not submitted to us any program that would really contribute to improve the difficult economic conditions this country is facing.

[English]

I deeply regret that the government did not see its way clear to provide this country with a limited quantity of something which is all too rare these days—a little bit of hope. No one wanted extravagant promises. Our leader and our party have pushed for realistic spending and for realistic spending restraint on the part of the federal government. But this does not mean the exclusion of hope—hope for the working people who wonder when controls will begin to operate in favour of the average man; hope for the small businessmen who wonder when exports and real economic activity will allow for expansion; hope for students who want nothing more greedy or self-centred than a chance to work their way through college or university; hope for the young people in the maritimes, Quebec and elsewhere who would like to find work, purchase a home and build a future.

I share with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) belief in the need for a responsible and balanced budget. But that does not necessarily mean a budget which is dull and unimaginative. Budgets are more than a prognosis of a government's spending activity; they are more than indicators of what the country can expect in terms of taxes and assistance. They are assessments of economic health and of the capacity of the nation to produce the wealth needed to sustain and improve the quality of life for its citizens. Where are the programs to produce more jobs? Where are the programs to assist the poor, the needy, the disunited?

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Wagner: Where is the humanity, where is the compassion? I believe the budget is one drawn up by men who revel in the status quo; indeed, they are prisoners of the status quo. It is a budget devoid of humanity, compassion, hope and optimism. If history is to say anything about the difference between our party and the party opposite on budgetary matters in the year 1976, I hope it might say that we in the Progressive Conservative party believed in the economic capacity of this nation, when the government did not; that we believed in the average man and woman in this country, when the government did not; that we believed in the future of this country, when the government did not.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there is no need to be an expert on economic matters to be concerned about a deficit of the order of $5 billion. Nobody can accept either expenditures which amount to $42 billion. As far as its spending is concerned, the government has not made any worthwhile cutbacks. And what about the adverse trade balance which amount to an astronomical figure.

Everyone is concerned about the government decision to maintain the interest rates at an artificially high level. It is true that after its long-standing slackness, the government simply had to check the growth of the money supply, but this belated policy can only hinder every more a shaky economic recovery. Without tax incentives, without tax cuts, especially for low income groups, this economic recovery will not be enough to absorb a significant number of the 761,000 unemployed registered last month.

This government is resigned to maintaining the unemployment rate to its present level. I say resigned but it is patently obvious that this government depends on unemployment to reduce inflationary pressures. It comes back to the old classical method: create unemployment to fight inflation, let thousands of workers idle so that demand will not be increased, all this in the hope that the inflation rate will get down to 8 per cent this year, a level which is not even reassuring.

So the minister resorts to the unemployment-inflation trade off. What a philosophy! What contempt for distributive justice, what irresponsibility in front of the dangers that all those Canadians maintained in unwarranted poverty represent for social peace. We have a good example this afternoon on Parliament Hill, we can see how angry citizens can get when they are provoqued to such extent by an irresponsible, insensitive, intransigent and unfair government.

If this is the new society promised by the Prime Minister, it deserves to abort like the just society about which, incidentally, we no longer hear anything. In its fight against inflation, this government maintains a false feeling of security in the public. It knows very well, for instance, that the recent and modest dip of the consumer price index will not last very long. The expected increase in oil prices will be felt this fall and next year in a wide range of products and services, particularly in essential sectors like food, housing and transportation.

Furthermore, in his predictions the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) did not take into account a new element which in recent months has influenced the cost of living—the almost general increase in provincial taxes and especially municipal rates. Without adequate revenues, the municipalities will continue to demand more from the homeowner. And how could it be otherwise? In 1975, local governments' revenues went up by only 13.5 per cent while their expenditures increased by 15.8 per cent. The small owner has also become one of the greatest victims of this government's policy.

Mr. Speaker, a moment ago, I spoke of unemployment. The budget offers no hope to the 11,000 textile workers who have been laid off in the last 18 months. I am sorry the minister did not concern himself with the critical crisis the textile industry is now going through, an industry that is very important to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and, in particular, allow me to point it out, to my riding of Saint-Hyacinthe.

It is urgent that the government should hear at last the cries of alarm Quebec and Ontario authorities have just put out. It is high time it take into consideration the admonitions of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and that it answer the dramatic appeal of the Congress of Democratic Unions.

Despite some initial success, after the 1970 reform, the textile sector fell back into stagnation. Still, thanks to increased productivity, it proved it could get back on its feet. What it lacks now for a decisive impulse, is very simply a sensible policy on the part of the government. Under the pretext of international commitments and aid to the underdeveloped countries, the government authorizes the import of textile products to a far greater extent than do other countries which have also signed the same agreements.

Studies have shown that the main problem facing our textile industry is not a lack of markets, but massive imports. Imports now account for 54 per cent of our domestic market, compared with 12 per cent for the United States, 10 per cent for Japan and 20 per cent for the European Common Market. It is therefore not surprising under theses circumstances that the textile industry has been constantly on the decrease in Canada. From 1973 to 1974, in a single year, the number of workers went down from 102,000 to 86,000. From 1969 to 1976, 33 plants closed down and 6,000 workers became chronically unemployed.

I know that the government talks about the need to help developing countries. However, at the present time, the textiles which constitute the worst threat for our industries come mostly from highly industrialized countries. I accept the fact that we must help developing countries by accepting their textile products, but instead of opening our boundaries indiscriminately, would it not be more logical to accept foreign textiles in a ratio inversely proportional to the standard of living of the country we want to help? In this way, the most needy would receive our help and we would be protected against competition from the wealthiest countries.

One thing is certain, the present voluntary quota system must be completely reviewed. The government should be more realistic and abandon a policy which is now leading our textile industry to a slow death. The Senate Comittee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and the CSD have shown the way: to sign, like the United States, bilateral agreements concerning the level and nature of textiles that we shall accept; to establish long-term objectives in relation to the potential of the textile industry, both as concerns production and employment. We could thus eliminate the uncertainty which is drying up investments and discouraging the workers. As Mr. Yvan Guay wrote in the newspaper La Presse of May, 19, Canada must finally stop playing boy scout because, and I quote:

> For Canada to assume alone the responsibility for a world free-trade policy would be ridiculous and the more so since clothing, like food, is a basic product. No country can ever rely excessively on foreign nations for its food and its clothing... That is why the textile and clothing industry, like agriculture, must be more or less subsidized if we do not want its workers to become under-proletarians.

And while I am talking about unemployment, Mr. Speaker, there is reason to be concerned about the general economic situation in the metropolitan area of Montreal once the works for the Olympic Games are finished. Economists, business and labour spokesmen have brought to the attention of authorities the need to avoid massive unemployment in the building sector. Layoffs have already begun and more will soon follow.

The situation appears all the more serious because the government of Quebec has just ordered that the work on the subway extension be suspended and the government in Ottawa comes in with postponements on the completion of Place Guy Favreau and the new postal terminal and cuts back on its budget for public or harbour works in the metropolis. It is imperative that federal, provincial and municipal authorities get together on an urgent basis to set up a works program capable of absorbing the greater part of the manpower made available. Construction workers in greater Montreal must be protected from massive unemployment. It would be unfair to let them bear the load of budget restraint. If expenditures must be cut back, let it not be by denying those workers their livelihood.

Just a word about Loto Canada for which the government is asking for $5 million in interim supply. I accept that in principle but on very specific conditions. The government must not permanently interfere with an area that is better left with the provinces and in which they have indeed taken the initiative. We are pleased to see that Loto Canada will contribute to make up the deficit of the Olympic Games in Montreal and will also bring a substantial contribution to those to be held in Edmonton. However, I regret that the government neglected to consult the provinces and failed to secure beforehand the agreement of those provinces which already operate loteries. And that is why I suggest that Loto Canada should stop existing after 1979 and that Ottawa should afterwards return that jurisdiction to the provinces.

So in this area the federal government recognizes belatedly, one must admit, the national nature of the Olympic Games and agrees now with the official opposition which has always called for the active participation of Ottawa in the carrying out of an undertaking it had morally backed up with the International Committee as was the case when Montreal requested the Games. But Loto Canada must not be a new source of division between Ottawa and the provinces nor between the citizens of the various regions of this country.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, in view of certain recently reported abuses by unconsciencious distributors one may wonder whether public authorities would not be well inspired to put the organization for the distribution and sale of tickets in the hands of some voluntary associations, and I am thinking of the veterans, the blind and the handicapped. The profits derived therefrom could be used to further the purposes of those associations even if they should give the sellers a commission. Those additional funds would help those organizations to alleviate the financial burden imposed upon them through the assistance they provide to the more needy of their members.

Finally, and this is how I want to conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, the budget speech on May 25 will have an impact abroad where, as is the case at home, the competence of this government is unreliable. Already suspected of being halfhearted with the Atlantic Alliance this government must now after the ridiculous Orion adventure restore its credibility with our allies. Let us also hope that we will not see another equally aberrant comedy when it comes to obtaining Leopard tanks.

The minister did not talk much about the major issues that remain undetermined between Canada and the United States, namely with respect to the Auto Pact and the irritants about which U.S. authorities are complaining. We are not much more informed about the nature of the discussion we have had with the Common Market and the importance of the barriers which up to now delayed the establishment of a contractual link between Canada and the European Economic Community.

Mr. Speaker, the same kind of silence persists about the negotiations entered into in the Tokyo Round and in which, however, the interests of our exporting industries are deeply involved. We are also completely in the dark about the specific projects of the government as regards the important problem which the conscience of the western world has to solve: that of the economic and food assistance to the underdeveloped countries whose inhabitants suffer from hunger. The news we had from Nairobi are far from being satisfactory. I hope we will soon know the position of the cabinet on all the questions which have been studied but which are far from being solved.

Either by bilateral or multilateral agreements, our country which, in spite of its present difficulties, is one of the most privileged in the world, must significantly increase its help to the millions of people who are without bread and who lack the minimal material comfort. Our generosity must be consistent with the hopes which the underdeveloped and underfed people have in us. If it is necessary, we must take ourselves the initiative of launching a new collective effort of the industrialized countries to this aim. Mr. Speaker, this is the price of international peace.

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to enter this debate today. I welcome it particularly as it provides me with an opportunity to speak on a number of important questions. I should like to touch on some of those mentioned by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), a man who has a reputation as a polished gentleman, an urbane man and an effective politician in his province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: I listened with a great deal of interest to what he had to say. I thought the first part of his speech was long on rhetoric. I thought the middle part of his speech dealt with some important questions, like the textile industry. But I am afraid he did not persuade me, and perhaps others, that he had any particular solutions. Of course, I listened very intensly to the end of his speech, because it was there that I thought I might see the dimension he is well known for—that dimension of a man with wide perspectives, that critic of external affairs.

The hon. member did touch on a number of broad questions. He dealt with NATO, but he really did not say much about it. He alluded to the auto pact, and he sort of established his credentials in the new economic era. I had the feeling, Mr. Speaker, that all of those comments were just sort of pushed into the record so he could say, "Well, you know, I do have some knowledge and understanding of these questions." I thought they were rather short, and lacked depth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: I thought that if the hon. member really wanted to establish his position as a man with a strategic sense of things, he would have said something about energy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: There was not a word about energy in his remarks, that I can recall.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: He is full of energy.

Mr. Gillespie: I suppose there is always a problem with the Tories, though. He referred to the fact that his party has a commitment to the future. I have a feeling that his party has a commitment to the future through a rear-view mirror.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: That is the only way they know for steering toward the future.

An hon. Member: If anybody knows, you should.

Mr. Gillespie: He made the comment that he hoped this budget debate would record—for posterity, presumably—the fact that his party, the Tories, and I want to use his words, "believe in the future and the government does not".

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Gillespie: I have already referred to the fact that one of the most strategic matters as far as the future of Canada is concerned is energy, and there was not a word about that.

An hon. Member: You sure don't know anything about long-range planning.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: I suspect that this may not be all his fault. He has a new leader now. I remember very well, and I am sure the hon. member followed a part of the debate himself, his new leader telling the people of Canada and those who were supporting him at the Tory convention, that the Tory party must stop criticizing in a destructive way and start telling the Canadian people what they stand for and not what they stand against.

An hon. Member: We will, in 1978.

Mr. Gillespie: I have been listening very carefully to him and some of his colleagues, and I have not found out what they stand for yet. It may well be that his new leader has not yet confided in him, so I do not blame him altogether.

An hon. Member: That's another cheap shot.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: No wonder the budget is in such a mess.

Mr. Gillespie: As I said, I welcome the opportunity of participating in this budget debate. There are some very important energy provisions in this budget, and I want to talk about them. It has been just a little over a month since I tabled an energy strategy for Canada in the House—self-reliance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1540)

Mr. Gillespie: This is one of the most important and comprehensive statements on energy that has ever been made. I recommend it to my colleagues opposite because, quite clearly, very few of them have taken the opportunity to read it.

An hon. Member: Including yourself.

Mr. Gillespie: I guess you do not want to be troubled with the facts. I recommend it to you, because you might learn something about the situation and some of the options and, indeed, some of the problems and opportunities for Canada. It might help you to have some kind of commitment and sense of direction toward the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, as I say, since that occasion when we tabled the strategy, a number of very important measures have been taken to support the main thrust, the priority areas enunciated and outlined in that strategy paper. First, we have announced a new set of oil and natural gas prices for Canada fully consistent with the strategy. Second, my colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan), and I tabled a policy statement that clarifies the terms and conditions under which the petroleum industry will operate on Canada lands—terms and conditions that will increase the exploration effort, increase our resource information and increase Canadian content and participation in the development of Canada's energy resources.

Last week, my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), in his budget, announced a series of further initiatives that this government is taking to further our objectives of energy self-reliance. These are very important measures which fully support and reinforce those to which I have already alluded. There are three particular aspects of those energy measures in the budget which I should like to identify for hon. members of this House and particularly, perhaps, the opposition. The first is the further stimulus to exploration. The second is the economic incentives for the substitution of alternative energy sources for oil. The third is provision to further enhance the energy conservation proposals I have already announced, particularly in so far as they affect the use of motor gasoline.

For the exploration of alternate sources of oil and conservation there is a series of measures in each one of these policy priority areas. I believe these budget measures reinforce the basic thrust of the government's resource policy. They will enhance our ability to meet the specific energy targets and objectives in respect of energy self-reliance. In assessing the energy related budget measures, it is necessary to consider them in the context of both the government's energy policies as they are continuing to evolve, and the current and prospective economic situation. As the budget speech makes clear, we are embarked on an economic recovery in Canada, but the policy course we must steer is a very sensitive one if we are to move the Canadian economy back to its potential growth rate in a sure and steady way. Inappropriate action at this stage would inevitably lead to problems farther down the road. The greatest of these problems is the possibility that inflationary expectations could lead to a renewed outbreak of cost and price pressures that would abort the economic recovery in Canada and that would lead ultimately to declines in real purchasing power, curtailments in production and increased unemployment.

At the same time as our short-term economic situation demands careful monitoring and prudent management, it is obvious that a number of structural changes in our economic system are necessary if we are to be able to realize our potential over the longer term. Nowhere is this more apparent than with regard to our energy situation. We need to move domestic prices to a level that adequately reflects the higher costs of finding and producing new energy supplies in Canada. We need to encourage and stimulate more efficient methods of producing, distributing and using energy. We need to facilitate the reallocation of manpower, equipment and financial capital that will be required to augment our domestic energy supplies and enhance our self-reliance. We need, as well, to move deliberately and in an orderly way.

The necessary adjustments that producers and consumers of energy must make will have to be phased in an appropriate manner. Attempts to move too rapidly to develop crash programs that do not take account of the realities of the Canadian situation will waste scarce resources and lead to distortions and bottlenecks that will endanger our anti-inflation objectives and our prospects for real economic growth and employment.

The pricing decisions I announced for crude oil and natural gas reflect the manner in which these considerations must be balanced. Crude oil and natural gas were specifically exempted—I emphasize this—from the anti-inflation program because it was recognized that upward relative price adjustments for these energy sources are essential. That is a point which not all members opposite seem to realize, or perhaps some members opposite have short memories in this regard. At the same time, in determining the actual increases that should be permitted, the government would be acting irresponsibly if it did not consider the state of the economy at the time.

The first portion of the increase I announced for crude oil prices will lead to increases of about 3 cents per gallon in the price of motor gasoline and other petroleum products, including home heating oil. These price increases will take effect 60 days after July 1 of this year. In addition, the price of natural gas in residential use can be expected to increase by about 7.2 per cent, although the timing and exact magnitude of this increase will be determined by provincial regulatory agencies. Through the balance of 1976, these higher prices will increase the CPI by less than one percentage point. They will not unduly impair the success of the government's anti-inflation program, nor will they threaten the recovery that we foresee for the Canadian economy.

Further increases will occur in the spring of 1977, amounting to about 2 cents per gallon in the price of motor gasoline and other petroleum products, and 4.3 per cent for natural gas for residential consumers. These increases will have further inflationary impacts, but we are confident that by that time the anti-inflation program will have reduced inflationary expectations enough, and the economy will be sufficiently resilient, to allow these further increases to be absorbed in a smooth and orderly way.

Let me reiterate, again, that while the steps we take are tempered by current economic considerations, there should be no doubt as to the directions in which we are going. Those Canadians making investment decisions now, both consumers and producers, would be well advised to make those decisions on the basis of more expensive energy in the future. With these remarks as background, Mr. Speaker, let me turn specifically to the budget measures as they affect exploration activities and energy conservation initiatives. There are a number of changes in the budget that will further increase the incentives to explore and develop that currently exist in the federal tax structure. All payments made to acquire Canadian resource properties after May 6, 1974, will be included as part of development expenses; provincial incentives for exploration and development drilling will not be included in income; to the degree that provincial governments reimburse industry for federal taxes collected in respect of provincial royalties, these reimbursements will not themselves be subject to federal tax; and the depreciation allowance for offshore drilling platforms has been doubled, from 15 per cent to 30 per cent.

These measures will increase the cash flow to the petroleum industry in Canada and will further enhance the already considerable incentives to exploration that exist in the federal tax system. In addition, the suspension of the principal business test for a three-year period will allow those individuals and corporations who choose to invest in exploration, even though this is not their principal business, to expense their investments immediately. This will increase the ability of the petroleum industry to attract the capital and Canadian equity that is required for the exploration that must be undertaken if we are to assess adequately the options that are available to meet our future energy requirements.

Mr. Speaker, I believe there has been very limited attention so far in the press, and very little appreciation so far as the potential of that particular measure—the measure of removing the principal business tax. I believe it could have, potentially, a very important impact on new exploration activities in Canada, particularly from the point of view of the Canadian investor who has not always had an opportunity to invest. As a result of the new regulations I have referred to, the Canadian investor will have more opportunity and it will put him on a more equal basis with foreign investors who have been investing in our resources.

Hon. members will recall that the federal government's share of total production profits accruing to the petroleum industry in Canada is in the order of 17 per cent. As well as taxing at a relatively low rate, the federal system is highly sensitive to reinvestment. If, for example, producers reinvest about half of the $1.05 increase in the price of petroleum that will occur on July 1, the federal share of the incremental revenues will decrease from 27 per cent to 3 per cent. What this means, in very simple terms, is that about 50 per cent of new exploration investments can be financed with money that would otherwise have gone to the federal government in the form of taxes.

Let there be no mistake about this, Mr. Speaker. I am getting a little tired of reading the comments of critics within the industry, and outside, who claim that the federal government is taking a major share of the increase in price. Quite clearly, as I have already indicated this afternoon, the federal government will back off to a very small percentage if the additional price increase is reinvested in exploration. Indeed, if 57 cents of that dollar is reinvested in exploration in Canada, there will be no federal tax on that incremental increase.

Mr. Gillies: Three cents.

Mr. Gillespie: Nothing for the federal government at all. In other words, the federal government backs right off to provide this degree of incentive. Some critics of the energy strategy we have adopted have suggested that our emphasis on exploration amounts to "putting all our eggs in one basket". It has been suggested that we are relying on frontier resources that, in the event, may not be there. This simply is not true. As I have pointed out on many occasions, there are a number of energy options available to us. But in order to know what we should do, we have first to know what we can do. And it is this need to know that makes accelerated exploration activity critical over the next three to four years. As I indicated previously, the federal government—through the existing fiscal system and the modifications announced in the budget—is contributing indirectly, but substantially, to exploration activity. We are also making a major, direct contribution through Petro-Canada. Hon. members will recall, I am sure, that the exploration budget for Petro-Canada this year will be $100 million, which will place it out in the forefront of companies exploring on Canadian lands. It is perhaps number one. Yet we still hear from the Tories opposite that they are against Petro-Canada.

Mr. Gillies: What has it done for us yet? It has not done a thing. It is $700 million down the drain.

Mr. Gillespie: I would hope that the producing provinces, who currently receive over 40 per cent of the production profits accruing to the petroleum industry, will assess the degree to which their incentive programs are appropriate in the context of our national objective of energy self-reliance.

The budget also introduces a number of measures that are supportive of our efforts to encourage the substitution of domestic energy sources for imported oil and to facilitate the introduction of renewable energy technologies. The extension of the two-year write-off of new capital equipment to equipment that can be used to produce energy from industrial and municipal wastes is an important measure in this regard. Many European countries, such as Germany and Sweden, generate a substantial proportion of their electrical energy from waste material, such as wood wastes produced in the lumber industry, or waste steam produced in a manufacturing industry. In Germany, this production is as high as 28 per cent of the total electrical capacity of the country. Preliminary estimates suggest that we might ultimately be able to supply 20 per cent of our electrical energy requirements from these sources. Thus, the budget measures should encourage the industrial sector to use energy resources more efficiently and encourage a diversity of electricity supply which will enhance the security of our national electrical supplies. Similarly, the removal of federal sales tax from items such as heat pumps, solar furnaces and heating panels, and wind-powered generating equipment will increase the commercial practicability of these alternative energy sources.

The final item in the budget which I want to address is the revisions to the excise taxes on heavy automobiles. While there are some variations, studies indicate that on average there is a close correlation between automobile weight and fuel consumption. Therefore, the increased excise taxes will reinforce the mileage standards I announced in February and are to be phased in over the same period as the mileage targets. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I find myself puzzled by the reaction of the Canadian automobile industry to these tax increases. Some of the comments I have heard suggest that the taxes will not make any difference in consumer purchasing decisions. It is alleged that people will continue to demand heavy cars and will pay the higher price. At the same time, and sometimes from the same sources, it is suggested that the tax will lead to disruption in the automobile industry and to increased unemployment. Clearly, the industry's early reaction is a confusing one—it is not a well thought-out or consistent one.

I think it has been further confused by allegations that the government has arbitrarily forced the automobile companies to increase the weight of automobiles by 650 pounds for pollution and safety devices. On examining this, I find that roughly 50 additional pounds have been added for catalytic converters, and close to 600 pounds for safety reasons. I think it is fair to suggest to automobile manufacturers that if 600 pounds are needed for safety reasons, there has to be something wrong with the kind of cars offered to the Canadian public in the past. The second point is that I believe it is fully within the capacity of the automobile industry to reduce the weight of the modern automobile through the substitution of materials without in any way effecting its safety. I have every reason to believe that some quite substantial reductions can, and will, be made by them in the near future.

We believe that Canadians will respond to the excise tax by demanding lighter, more energy-efficient cars. We also believe that the automobile industry in Canada is imaginative and responsive enough that those demands can, and will, be satisfied. There will undoubtedly be a period of adjustment in the industry, and it is precisely to make that adjustment as easy as possible that the tax provisions are being phased in over a four-year period.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to reiterate the theme with which I began. Adjusting to the realities of our energy situation will take time, and the adjustments must be made in a manner and at a pace that safeguards our economic objectives over the shorter term.

• (1600)

It is imperative, in this process, that consumers and producers know what the energy objectives of the government are so that they can plan accordingly. The publication of "An Energy Strategy for Canada", supported by the recent announcements with regard to domestic pricing and land and lease regulations, and further reinforced by the measures announced in the budget, make the directions of our energy policy clear and, more than that, the commitment of the federal government to these targets and priorities.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), who usually gives a fairly constructive, straightforward speech; but today he was a great disappointment because he started off on a negative pitch and continued on a negative pitch all the way through. For some reason, he found it necessary to criticize the very excellent and constructive speech given by the hon. member for Sainte-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). He said it was a disappointment, and then went on to castigate the hon. member for not talking about energy.

Then the minister proceeded for the next 20 or 25 minutes to bore the House to death with a rehash of what we have already heard in the budget, and told us absolutely nothing new. He spoke in glowing terms of a paper he had produced a short while ago called, as he put it, "An Energy Strategy for Canada," which is a very imposing title for something which could have been far better entitled, "Much Ado about Nothing"—because that policy paper really was a bust. It told us nothing about energy conservation which we did not already know, and announced no new plans, or workable plans, on the part of the government for conserving energy.

Then the minister talked about the energy price increases of a short time ago and how these are going to induce much greater exploration for oil and gas. But, as pointed out to the minister a couple of weeks ago in a question at the beginning of the day, there is nothing in these price increases which have been granted to the oil companies which requires them to use this money for exploration. As I pointed out to the minister, these increases can be used in any one of three ways. They can be used to increase exploration, which is what is desired; but they can also be put into the company's reserves, or they can be paid out in additional dividends to shareholders. There is nothing to require the companies to do what the Canadian people and the government want them to do, and that is to increase their exploration activity. So we see the energy consumers of Canada subjected to a very real possibility that a great deal of the increase they are going to pay at the gas pump or in their bills for heating oil during the year is going to pay out fatter dividend cheques to shareholders in oil and gas companies.

There is nothing the government can do about it whatsoever, because there is no requirement of the oil companies that the money they get—the many millions of dollars they will get—in increased oil and gas prices should go into exploration. That is just another typical policy of this government which is badly thought-out and put through in a slipshod fashion.

I can just see the oil and gas company presidents gathering around the minister's office and telling the minister that he can count on them because they are his friends; that he can give them those prices and they will surely explore more. Then they will go out slapping their thighs and laughing themselves to death, saying that the minister is a poor old sucker and that he went for it again, the way John Turner did when he effected great increases by reductions in taxes about three years ago to increase productivity and industrial activity. The manufacturers and producers of this country told John Turner he could count on them and that they would increase productivity and plant and equipment, and they laughed all the way to the bank and did whatever they darned well pleased with the money the government gave to them by reducing their taxes.

The minister and the House know very well that that has not brought about anything like the results the then minister of finance assured the House those reductions would bring about. Unemployment was supposed to be lowered as a result of those gifts, but it has gone up steadily ever since, and those same producers and manufacturers, like the oil companies, are still laughing all the way to the bank. That is the kind of thing which is going on in this government, and unfortunately there is nothing we can do about it for the next two years. However, I can tell the government that in two years we are going to do a great deal about it, because we will move from this side of the aisle over to the other side and give this country the kind of government it deserves.

Mr. Gillespie: Tell us what you are for, George.

Mr. Hees: I want, now, to say a few words in a quiet and modest way about the government's anti-inflation program and to put forward some concrete suggestions on my own behalf as to what I think the government should do to improve greatly the situation. Now that the anti-inflation program is approaching the end of its first year of operation, people are naturally asking two questions: What results have been achieved; and how long will it be necessary to keep it in operation? In answer to the first question, the inflation figures speak for themselves. During 1975, the consumer price index rose by 10.5 per cent. During the most recent 12-month period, the index went up by 9 per cent. Such results should be described, I think, as slow progress.

Regarding the second question: How long must controls remain in force?—the answer is a great deal more difficult to find. I do not think anybody really likes controls, and most people would like to get rid of them as soon as possible. But to answer the question: When can they be abandoned?, we will first have to look at the two reasons it was necessary to apply controls in the first place. The first reason was that the rapid and accelerating yearly increase in the consumer price index, commonly referred to as the cost of living, had driven prices to such a level that the average Canadian simply could not make his or her earnings keep up with the bills he or she had to pay.

As I have said, the cost of living went up by more than 10 per cent in 1975. This was not much of a problem for those whose yearly incomes were kept abreast of the cost of living by means of management or union contracts which increased as the cost of living increased. But the great majority of Canadians do not have such contracts, and they were suffering badly. This majority demanded that the government do something to control the cost of living and bring it back to a yearly increase which they could keep up with; and so controls were announced on October 13.

To find out what is a reasonable yearly increase in the consumer price index, we should look back over the yearly records of this indicator during the past 70 years, since it first began being recorded. During those 70 years, the average yearly increase was just under 3 per cent a year. Such an increase we found we could live with, and having found that we were able to keep our average yearly increases in expenditures—our inflation—to that level, people generally believed that we must make every possible effort to reduce our present inflation rate to that level once again, and keep it there.

The second reason for applying controls was that rapidly accelerating inflation was making our products less and less competitive in both the Canadian and the export market, and production and employment were adversely affected. In this regard, we are particularly vulnerable to price levels in the United States, the country which is by far our most important trading partner and with whom we do 70 per cent of our export and import trade. Neither Americans nor Canadians are willing to pay more for a Canadian product if they can buy a similar American product at a lower price. For many months now, the rate of inflation in the United States has been considerably lower than ours, and that is one of the reasons their economic recovery has been moving forward at a steadily accelerating pace and ours has not. Today, their rate of inflation is 6 per cent a year, while ours is 9 per cent. Moreover, in April the American secretary of the treasury, Mr. Simon, said that he is confident the United States will reach an inflation rate of 2 per cent within two years, which is April, 1978. Our government is aiming at 4 per cent by the end of 1978.

I think it is obvious that if we are to compete successfully with American products in the Canadian and United States markets and in the world market as well, we must achieve a rate of inflation roughly equal to theirs. To do so, we must accelerate our efforts very considerably. To achieve this, certain improvements must be brought about in the government's approach to reducing inflation. First of all, the government must reduce the rate of increase of the money supply—the total of bank deposits and cash in circulation—to a range far below the more than 10 per cent yearly rate at which the Bank of Canada is increasing the money supply today. The United States government has reduced its yearly rate of increase of MI to a range of between 4.5 per cent and 7 per cent, and that is the basic reason why they have been able to deal with inflation so much more successfully than we have. I believe that the Canadian government must strive to reach a comparable range within the next 12 months, a pace far quicker than they are moving today.

Second, I believe that the government must keep the increase in government spending each year to the increase targets which it has set for itself and for all Canadians. As you know, that target for the present year is 13 per cent, made up of 8 per cent, the estimated inflation for the present year, plus 5 per cent, the estimated growth in real domestic product for the year, for a total of 13 per cent. The government's present increase of 16 per cent above last year must be reduced to this figure as soon as possible. Finally, we must greatly increase our industrial productivity because of its very great effect on costs and selling prices.

Industrial productivity, expressed in terms of volume of production per man-hour, has been measured and recorded on a national basis in this country for the past 30 years. During that period, the average yearly increase has been 3.2 per cent, due to improved methods of production and new and improved plant and machinery. With yearly increases in productivity of around 3 per cent a year, we were able to keep our costs of production to a level where our selling prices were competitive with those of our principal industrial competitors in both the Canadian and export market, and unemployment and inflation remained at reasonable levels.

Then, four years ago, our yearly increase in industrial productivity began to decline. Whereas in 1971 we had shown an increase of 3 per cent over the previous year, in 1972 the increase over 1971 was only 2.6 per cent; in 1973, the increase over 1972 was only 1.5 per cent; in 1974, we showed an actual decrease of .5 per cent from 1973 and, in 1975, a decrease of 2.4 per cent from 1974.

These accelerating decreases in industrial productivity have caused costs and selling prices to rise sharply, contributing heavily to inflation. They have also brought about higher unemployment, because people in this country and abroad will not pay more for a Canadian product if they can buy a similar product made in some other country for less money, and Canadian production has suffered as a result of this falling demand.

What has contributed greatly to our difficulties in finding customers who will pay the prices we are asking is the fact that United States industrial productivity has been rising as rapidly as ours has been falling. The result has been that we have been losing sales to United States producers at a steadily accelerating rate. It is obvious that we must introduce measures to increase industrial productivity, so that we can bring inflation back to a yearly increase roughly comparable to that of the United States and thereby make our selling prices competitive with those of our principal competitor. To do so, we must offer incentives which will persuade producers they will be able to pay for the new plant, machinery and production systems they will have to buy in a reasonably short space of time and, in this way, make it as easy as possible for them to make the usually high expenditures involved in the kinds of purchases I outlined.

The kinds of incentives I have in mind would be the following: First, all capital expenditures would be written off in two years. Second, a plant would be rewarded in the form of a generous cash bonus at the end of the year, in proportion to its increase in productivity during the year, compared to the base year—the last full year before the plan goes into operation. This form of incentive has been very effective in increasing productivity in such countries as Japan and West Germany, where spectacular results have been achieved since the end of the Second World War. There is no reason why such an incentive would be less successful in this country today.

So I think that the answer to our original question, when can controls be ended, is that the people of Canada will not agree to their removal until inflation is lowered to a level where they have found in the past that it can be tolerated, at around 3 per cent a year. Also, I do not believe that we can relax our efforts until we bring inflation to a level where we can once again compete successfully with our principal economic competitor, the United States, for the Canadian, the United States and the world market. That level will also be no more than 1 per cent above the United States target of 2 per cent a year, or no more than 3 per cent. In other words the answer to the question, when can controls be ended, is not a matter of time but of performance and results. The task before the government and the Canadian people is a formidable one, but one which must be tackled without delay. Reluctance to tackle the task vigorously will be very serious for the welfare of this country.

Now let us take a look at which direction the economy should take after controls have been discontinued. Once the target of 3 per cent inflation has been reached, I think it is obvious that it must be kept within that range for the good of the economy and for the good of the Canadian people. If there is a significant move by those elements of society whose pressures caused inflation to rise rapidly during the past few years to start it on another upward spiral, then controls will, of course, have to be reimposed. If we are to avoid having to reimpose controls, it must be made crystal clear that that will be done if those elements of our economy which have it within their power to create excessive inflation are unwilling to control their actions for the general good of the country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe that if it is made very clear and definite that this country has no intention of going through another round of spiralling inflation, once the present inflation has been brought within reasonable bounds, we will have a very good chance of proceeding with a prosperous economy, free of the kinds of controls which were imposed last October.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the first budget presented by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) was characterized by the Financial Post writer, George Radwanski, who is certainly not a flaming radical, as a——continuation of a trend toward a nasty, gutless kind of conservatism—

Anyone who studies the budget will agree with Mr. Radwanski. The budget of this minister of finance shows the truth of the old adage—the more things change, the more they remain the same. Former ministers of finance, Mr. Benson and Mr. Turner, are gone. They are relatively silent. The former deputy minister of finance, Mr. Reisman, is gone but is still vocal. However, the effect of this budget will be the effect of budgets which they presented in recent years.

Those budgets produced hardships on the ordinary citizen of this country. This budget will do the same. They produced more unemployment. I predict that a year from now there will be an additional 100,000 on top of the present 760,000 unemployed at the present time. That is based on the best economic advice we have been able to get from economists who have been much more accurate in their predictions in recent years than economists of the Department of Finance.

The minister spoke glowingly and proudly about the way that inflation has slowed down in the past three or four months. I suggest that he dampen his enthusiasm. It is obvious to almost every business analyst and economist, other than the trained seals who work for the government, that the slowdown has been, and will be, very temporary. The slowdown in the rate of inflation was almost exclusively as a result of a reduction in food prices. Mrs. Plumptre of the late and unlamented Food Prices Review Board, now of the Anti-Inflation Board, agrees that food prices are going up.

There have been sharp increases in provincial and municipal taxes. They increased as a result of cutbacks forced on the provinces by the federal government. For the two largest provinces in particular, Ontario and Quebec, this has been a mean and regressive increase and has resulted in a doubling of hospital and medical insurance premiums. The increased cost to every family will be between $50 and $100 per year.

The federal government has agreed to increases in the price of oil and gas. Oil will increase $1.05 a barrel on July 1, and another 70 cents a barrel on January 1, 1977. That represents an increase of 5 cents a gallon in the wholesale price. Retailers will probably add on their increases. Therefore, every person who buys gas for his car or oil to heat his house will be affected. The price of natural gas has also been increased. For those families using natural gas, their costs will increase next winter between $40 and $50 for the heating season.

Last year, the increase in the cost of living was 10½ per cent. Although for the past three or four months it has been going up at a slower rate, it will go up more quickly beginning in July. From July to the end of the year there will be an increase of about 1 per cent per month. By the end of 1976, the increase in the cost of living will be 9 per cent as compared with the 10½ per cent increase in 1975. As if that were not bad enough, there will be a substantial increase in the rate of unemployment. In his budget speech, the minister stated that government estimates are that there will be an increase in the number of jobs in Canada of 250,000. However, the number of people who will be looking for work will increase by about 350,000.

Unemployment has been rising steadily. Last month, calculated on the seasonally adjusted basis, it was 7.4 per cent. That was the highest rate of unemployment in Canada since 1961. On the basis of any estimates one wants to make, it is obvious that this winter the unemployment rate, on a seasonally adjusted basis, will not be 7 per cent but 8 per cent. That is a tragedy for this country as a whole. However, it is sheer disaster for the slow growth areas.

Last month, the national rate of unemployment was 7.4 per cent. However, in Newfoundland there was 16.3 per cent unemployment. On the northeast coast of Labrador the unemployment rate was 19.8 per cent. In New Brunswick the rate was 13.2 per cent, and in the northeast part of that province, 26.3 per cent. Under those circumstances, is it any wonder that the members of this party object so strenuously to the proposal in the budget, and elaborated on yesterday by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), that the period which people must work before qualifying for unemployment insurance will be increased from 8 to 12 weeks?

When the Minister of Finance made his budget address some days ago there were cries of protest, not just from members of this party but from Liberal members from Newfoundland and Conservative members from New Brunswick and Newfoundland. Yesterday, our amendment objecting to the increased qualifying period was voted on. It was an amazing sight. All the protesters, led by the minister who introduced the unemployment insurance legislation in 1971, the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Mackasey), were absent from the House and did not have to vote against the amendment. That was true of Liberal and Conservative members from the slow-growth areas.

The minister and some members of the House may think that we are being partisan for protesting that infamous proposal of the government. Let us see what the provincial governments whose people will be most adversely affected have to say. I quote from the Toronto Star of Friday, May 28:

Finance Minister A. E. Stairs of New Brunswick said the extension of the period of eligibility and the changes in the length of benefit "clearly indicate a substantial shift in the burden of social assistance to the province from the federal government."

● (1630)

He said, also:

It is most unfortunate that this kind of program change should be made without extensive prior analysis of the impact on regions such as ours.

Then the Nova Scotia minister of labour, a Liberal, Mr. Walter Fitzgerald, said he was discouraged by the proposals. A recent provincial study estimated that 14,800 people would lose their benefits of more than $9 million, he said. In pockets where unemployment was highest, such as Sydney, the net loss of direct income was predicted to be $3.3 million. That is what the ministers from the provinces with the highest unemployment are saying. For the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to say, as he did yesterday, that there would not be much hardship, that most of the people concerned could extend their period of work from 8 weeks to 12 weeks, and thus qualify, is to cast a slur on the bulk of the people who are unemployed and drawing benefits. The minister is implying that people work for eight weeks and then quit voluntarily so that they can draw unemployment benefits. Except when the minister has to make excuses, as was the case yesterday, he knows better.

When we talk about a rate of 7.4 per cent unemployment nationally, we are excluding native people almost entirely because native people who live on reserves are not counted when compiling the national rate. The minister should know this as well as I do, because there are a large number of native people in his constituency. He knows it, the Minister of Finance knows it, and I know it—but it is very likely that people in general do not. As I say, we have knowingly, and in a calculated manner, excluded the native people. The fact is, as the minister is aware, that between 60 per cent and 80 per cent of the native people who live on reserves are unemployed for all or part of the year. They are not even counted by those who compile the unemployment figures.

The minister implied yesterday that the government still believes in full employment. Here is what he said, and members can find his words at page 14085 of yesterday's Hansard:

> Our goal is not necessarily a 5½ per cent or even a 5 per cent unemployment rate. Our goal is the lowest employment rate possible having regard to inflationary pressures and the economic situation.

What the minister did not say was that his goal is somewhere between a rate of 7 per cent and 8 per cent. Liberal cabinet ministers always pay lip service to the idea of full employment. When the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was introducing amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in 1971, he said:

> I imagine somebody is going to suggest that the government has determined 4 per cent to be an acceptable rate of unemployment in Canada. Well, it is not my criterion. Like everybody else, I believe the acceptable rate is the lowest possible rate.

He was saying that 4 per cent is too high. Now the Minister of Manpower and the Minister of Finance, are regarding a rate of more than 7 per cent as being acceptable to them. In the course of a CBC broadcast on January 9, 1972, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said:

> We have already entered into better times. I think the prodding will be less perhaps in the economic sphere; you won't be worried; you know you'll have 96 per cent of the work force employed . . . your concerns will be oriented more and more to the 96 per cent or 95 per cent of the population which is working and secure.

So, in 1972 the Prime Minister was accepting 4 per cent as being adequate. Now we are close to 7.5 per cent, with the rate likely to go up, and the government is not concerned at all. We are sometimes told by both Liberals and Conservatives that whether the rate of 7.4 per cent or 4 per cent, as it was a few years ago, the figures are misleading because there are lots of people who could find work at any time if they chose to do so.

Some members say that anyone who wants a job can get one. Mr. Speaker, the facts prove the contrary. At a time when there are more than 750,000 unemployed, the number of job vacancies is down substantially as compared with last year, especially in areas of high unemployment like Newfoundland. Job vacancies in the first quarter of 1975 amounted to 61,000 in all of Canada; in the first quarter of 1976 there were 48,100. In Newfoundland there were just 500 job vacancies, and in that province, as I have stated, 13 per cent of the work force is unemployed. So there is no way in which unemployed people in Newfoundland can get jobs at the present time. There were 15,400 job vacancies in Ontario, and I believe there were six times that number of unemployed in the province. So we face a situation of large-scale unemployment created by government policies. And who will bear the brunt? The unemployed and the people who work. The unemployed, because they will be cut off from benefit if they have not worked 12 weeks, and the employed who will have to pay higher premiums to make up for the deficit in the unemployment insurance fund.

We are seeing a two-step retreat from the financial commitment of the Liberal party in 1971 to create jobs for the unemployed. The 1971 act provided that the federal government would pay the cost of all extended benefits and the total cost of all benefits payable when unemployment rose above 8 per cent. According to the minister at that time, this provided an incentive for the government to keep unemployment down and thus restrict the size of the pay-out. In December, 1975, Bill C-69 amended the scheme so as to change the federal government's commitment from one based on the straight 4 per cent level to one based on an eight-year moving average. In effect, federal contributions kick in much later, as a result—in 1976 at 5.6 per cent, to be precise.

Amendments are now being proposed in the budget to reduce the financial obligation of the federal government still further by lowering the contributions payable when unemployment exceeds 4 per cent. We can understand why the Liberal minister of social services in Nova Scotia said at the opening of the meetings where the premiers rejected the welfare proposals of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde):

> If the federal government keeps escalating the price of oil and tightening unemployment insurance, we're going to have the whole province on social assistance.

● (1640)

This is the sort of thing that has happened with a government led by a "mod" Prime Minister, a modern guy who has the media all agog. He knows what the people are interested in and can anticipate their wants. He can move to meet their needs. What he has done in fact, as I have indicated, is not only to give us the highest unemployment we have had in 15 years, but he has tried to convince the people of Canada that they should accept this as normal and as the right way to do things.

Let me compare for a moment this "mod" Prime Minister, who is really "with it", as our young people say, with an old-fashioned, liberal political leader in the United States, a man who has been in politics for a long time, who is presently a senator and was once vice-president and a presidential candidate, failing to get elected by less than one per cent of the vote, Hubert Humphrey. We Canadians read American newspapers and magazines a great deal and we picture Hubert Humphrey as somehow old-fashioned, that he really is not "clued in" to the 1970s. I want to put on the record a few paragraphs from the Congressional Record printed in Washington for January 15, 1975. Senator Humphrey had introduced a bill, the equal opportunity and full employment act for 1975, and I would like hon. members to compare what Senator Humphrey proposed with the record of this "mod", up-to-date government which has permitted, indeed welcomed, 7.4 per cent unemployment. He said:

> In December, 6.5 million Americans, 7.1 per cent of of the labour force, were "officially" counted as unemployed. Of course, for members of minority groups conditions were much worse.
> In the last 12 months "official" unemployment among blacks rose 50 per cent, from 888,000 to 1.3 million people.

I pause there for a moment to suggest that if we compare our record for employing native people with the United States' record for employing black people, we Canadians would have to hang our heads in shame. Senator Humphrey went on to say this:

> In 1948, the "right to work" was clearly established in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations . . .
> Despite the official declarations and the generally well-intentioned policy pronouncements, we have failed dismally to provide "jobs for all". Large segments of our population, especially women, the young, the old, the poorly educated, and ethnic minorities, have had their "right to work" ignored and, in many cases, the fact of their unemployment swept under the rug and conveniently out of sight by "official" statistics.
> . . . it is time to fulfil this promise of "jobs for all," a promise that far too long has gone unmet. We must guarantee an equal opportunity to work at fair wages to every person in our nation who is able and willing to work.

He then went on to outline how he proposed that this be done. He called for the establishment of local reservoirs of public service and private employment projects developed by local planning councils in co-operation with community job boards. He called for the creation of a job guarantee office able to fund public and private work projects developed through the local reservoirs. Senator Humphrey was not talking about some band-aid, cosmetic measures, like a few LIP or OFY projects; he was talking about jobs for everybody, about unemployment of probably of 2.5 to 3 per cent. That is not too far removed from the 4 per cent unemployment level which over the years the Economic Council has calculated would be full employment in this country.

We have argued that dealing with unemployment is the number one priority in this country. We have argued that to meet the threat of unemployment what we need is a budgetary deficit that is substantially greater than that proposed by the minister, so as to give the economy the stimulation it needs to get people back to work. Our calculations indicate that a deficit in the order of $4.5 billion would be necessary in order to inject any significant stimulus into the economy this year. This would mean a tax cut, preferably for those in the lower income brackets, of about $1.2 billion.

In addition, we have argued that we should end the indexing of income tax and the assortment of middle-class tax gimmicks that the government has introduced in recent years. This would free another $1.5 billion that could be included in a redistributive tax cut. Such an amount, roughly $3 billion, would be enough to provide a sizeable tax cut, which we have calculated to be in the neighbourhood of $250 for each person who files a tax return that shows an income of $15,000 and under. It is our belief that these are people who essentially do not save money; they would spend this tax cut of $250 and the injection of this money would lead to the purchase of goods and services, which in turn would immediately bring about a sharp reduction in the number of people unemployed.

With 7.4 per cent unemployment, Mr. Speaker, the economy needs a stimulus in the order of the roughly $3 billion tax cut that I have mentioned. This is a doubly advantageous time to provide such a tax cut because the income redistributive effects of ending the middle-class tax gimmicks would provide more equity to the system at the same time as it was delivering increased income to the bottom end of the income scale, where it would tend to be spent rather than saved, as I have already said.

The only objection that we have heard to a tax cut at this time, an objection raised by the Minister of Finance, is that the stimulation of demand on the kind of scale I have suggested would rekindle inflation. We reject that opinion. We insist that that is not a valid argument, for the simple reason that all these statistics that have been released by Statistics Canada, the Department of Finance and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce show very clearly that the industrial sector of our economy at the present time is operating at only about 80 per cent of capacity.

Although some of this has caused a slump in exports, a great deal of this excess capacity could be geared to domestic markets. We believe such a stimulation of the domestic market would not be inflationary but would lead to an economic recovery. It would use up our unused capacity, put people back to work, and in the long run have a positive effect on the rate of inflation. If you make housing more available and reduce the high cost of purchasing homes, the shortage and the high cost factor would tend to disappear. It seems to us, again—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has now expired.

Mr. Orlikow: I will just be one minute.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One minute.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Mr. Paproski: One minute.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and hon. members. I simply want to say that I believe this budget tends to cool down the economy and restrict its growth, and will, therefore, increase unemployment when it should be doing exactly the opposite. The budget should be geared to put people back to work in order to meet those unfilled needs of the hundreds of thousands of people in this country who are still living in poverty.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Flynn), may I be permitted at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Agriculture—Request for report on study of effect of removal of freigh subsidy on wheat and flour for export: the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher)—The Queen—Date of statement on plans to celebrate Her Majesty's silver jubilee; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Energy—Dispute between Newfoundland and Quebec over Churchill Falls power—Action of minister.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stevens (p. 13901).

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I would especially like to thank you today for allowing me to join some of the elite of the political parties to present my first comments on the budget. I should also like to commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) for presenting a most realistic budget. In these inflationary times this is the kind of budget that is needed. It is the kind of budget that is going to be instrumental in combating the economic difficulties we are facing.

An hon. Member: You can do better that that, Joe.

Mr. Flynn: If you will listen, it becomes even more succulent. It is the kind of budget that is going to be instrumental in combating this kind of difficulty. It is a realistic budget that does not suggest quick or facile methods. Nor does it entail draconian methods. Certain government critics may condemn the Minister of Finance for proceeding far too cautiously. I would think they should be reassured to know that their country's economic future is being handled cautiously. This is not a time for magnificent extravaganzas; this is a time for restraint, for economic recovery and for reality.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that—you Don?

Mr. Flynn: If hon. members will pay close attention they will realize this is a wallner research report and, therefore, is very special. I do not claim to be an economist, but I certainly do know that Canada's material prosperity is at stake. As was to be expected, the May 25 budget is inextricably linked to the anti-inflation program. Of the 1,500 largest Canadian companies that fall under the direct control of the Anti-Inflation Board, 35 have head offices in Kitchener, Waterloo, Cambridge, Guelph and Stratford. More than 40 others have head offices elsewhere but are major employers in this area, including such a local giant as Uniroyal Limited.

There are also many companies with local branch offices, distribution centres, franchise outlets or stores in the area. Among them are all the major banks, most of the major retail store chains, car dealerships, mortgage and insurance companies and service industries, such as those involving computers, office copying machines, etc. Naturally, the business community of the Kitchener area watched with interest the proceedings of Tuesday last.

The Minister of Finance reported in his budget speech that the controls program has begun to take effect. When the anti-inflation measures were introduced last October, the consumer price index was at 10.6 per cent and rising. By December it had dropped to below 10 per cent, and it dropped to 9.1 per cent in Feburary, the best record in well over two years. There has been excellent public support for the anti-inflation program. A public opinion poll showed that fully 61 per cent were in favour, while only 22 per cent were opposed. The May, 1976, budget is another measure which increases the whole effectiveness of the anti-inflation program. It is meant to enhance the steps taken in other areas, especially in respect of reductions in government spending and cutbacks in the growth of the public service.

A Kitchener chamber of commerce publication describes my constituency as being noted for its sausages, Schneider's sausages, its spareribs, its pigtails, its sauerkraut and its good food in general. But, it is also known for its television sets, its fine furniture, its electronic components, its shirts, its sweaters, its shoes, the stability of its labour, the high productivity of its workers, its hospitality and its reputation as a desirable community. The budget just presented will support and encourage this good life in Kitchener, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, may I commend the hon. member who has just resumed his seat for the brevity which characterized his remarks. I have never pretended that I have been popular in all the years I have been here, but at least one claim I am able to make is that no Speaker has ever had to rise to tell me that the hon. member's time had expired. Perhaps that is because I have good eyesight and have seen the Speaker starting to rise, but I have always avoided that error.

Normally, it is a very ebullient pleasure for me to take part in the general debate on the throne speech and the budget debate, especially when on occasions such as this afternoon I see around me a crowded, hushed and expectant House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macquarrie: This year and in this session, sir, I have lost some of that high excitement which usually characterizes my learned and deliberated utterances. I find this is not one of the parliamentary sessions which brings a great deal of uplift to me. I note, in beginning, in a very mundane way, that we have now reached over 14,000 pages—not words, but pages of Hansard. If anybody thinks that is not too long for a group of parliamentarians to be together talking about the same sorts of things, I disagree with that person. It is a time, also, when there is certainly unease about the management of our national affairs. We have a cabinet divided; we have resignations; we have near-resignations; we have a government seeking to put into effect an aborted form of policy or proposal the opposition to which brought it into office.

● (1700)

We have a society which is seriously divided. A major segment thereof, namely, labour, is strongly and seriously committed against a major aspect of the government's program. We have scandals; we have near-scandals; we have suggestions; we have anxiety. I may say that never in my now, fairly long time in public life and my much longer period of study of Canadian political institutions have I seen anything more reprehensible than the behaviour of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) in the manner in which he tried publicly and in this place to thrust responsibility and blame upon a public servant. That, I thought, was a new low. We are becoming accustomed to in-fighting among ministers, to the absence of ministers and to the passing of blame from one minister to another; but I think most heinous and reprehensible is the attempt in public and in parliament to throw the arrow of responsibility and culpability on a senior public servant who has no chance to appear before us and state his case.

I also think, since this long session began, about what great changes have occurred. This does not mean I have a magnificent memory; however, I can remember when that most handsome man, that brilliant athlete, that gem in the French and English-speaking world, John Turner, was here. Where is he now? Where has he gone? In this long procession of history we began with Prince Charming. Then he was "Mr. Clean", "The man from Glad", "The architect of our economy". Where is he now? Why has he gone? Did the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) think that the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) was potentially a better minister of finance? Did he think he was a better architect of our nation's future in economic, monetary and fiscal terms?

I am quite capable of criticizing the Prime Minister, although I am not a partisan man. But I have never accused him of really believing that. That, I would not charge him with. So we are left with the greatest failure as House leader that any parliament has ever seen, and he is moving on in his great, lumbering gait to become the most disastrous minister of finance this country has ever seen.

In this budget debate it is not our task or my job to reflect upon the difficulties of the Prime Minister, although if I were totally relaxed I could enjoy some of these reflections. We must think about the state of the national economy. It is our job to analyse and assess the pertinent and pressing facts of our national economic life. What, sir, is happening to this country? What are the portents, and where is our present leadership leading us?

An hon. Member: Onwards and ever upwards.

Mr. Macquarrie: He says, "Onwards and ever upwards," but my dear friend did not go upwards as he should have. If I were a cabinet-maker, I would have put him up. I am old enough in this parliamentary stage to remember when budget night was a great experience; the galleries were packed and the House was packed. We came here; we waited and we listened for portents, for forecasts, for policies and for analyses which were going to be important. We waited expectantly for those changes which would alter the life of the nation and affect the lives of all the people in the nation. Canadians waited expectantly for something which would have a bearing upon their day-to-day economic existence.

But what of May 25? After the great speech had been delivered, what was the result? In our highly-computerized and technological society, could even the most sensitive computer measure the degree of uplift among any sector of Canadian society? The most common, and perhaps the most frequent, description of the minister's effort was that euphemistic expression "stand-patism". Indeed, I wondered then, and I wonder still, why it was thought necessary to present a budget at all. Many thousands of seasonally employed Canadians will suffer; but apart from this group, what benefits will flow to the Canadian population; what will be the strengthening effect upon the sagging Canadian economy?

The question is almost a rhetorical one. The impressive, serious and compelling economic indices are all negative—indeed, profoundly disturbing. Before I came to this House, I spent many years studying what was called the dismal science, the study of economics. It was dismal then, and it is dreary now! But one thing we were taught by our professors was that inflation and unemployment were cyclical developments, one following the other and that if the economy was well managed, you would not have either.

It is the great achievement of this government—which has been in power for 13 years—that it has broken that law. The government has stood that law on its head or on its posterior—whichever it is—and we have inflation and unemployment together: not only together but, additionally, seemingly forever! Both inflation and unemployment are together and in the average month we see from Statistics Canada the same distressing statistics no matter how devious may be the effort to alter the formula.

Expressions like, "seasonally adjusted" are now ancient. About five years ago, someone asked me what it meant, and I said that I was not sure. However, I did say that I thought it meant that it is not as bad as it could be. I think I am right in that. In this twentieth century, with the very best efforts and with the greatest deficits, we have 7.4 per cent of our work force out of work. No matter how one describes it, that is far too many unemployed Canadians.

Not only is that continuing this month, but it has been continuing month after month since we converted into the "just" society.

We have a great army of functionaries. We have all sorts of people on the Anti-Inflation Board. If the Prime Minister could not wrestle inflation to the ground, who is to say that the callous Jean-Luc Pepin, or the more callous Mrs. Plumptre are doing the job. Of course we will not bring inflation to the ground. Any housewife or house spouse in Canada knows that. While it might seem economically sound to talk about stand-pattism on budget night, and while we may watch all the postures and expostulations of ministers and their apologists, we know that when that is all over there is not a single hopeful or positive sign to which they may point. Of course, they may hope that somehow in the United States things may get better and that we may benefit from the economic recovery in that country. I imagine when that day comes we will not receive any telegraphed messages from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. The ministers of this government will be taking credit, and not admitting it is just a spin-off from the American development.

● (1710)

My colleagues have discussed many aspects earlier in their fine discussions and argumentations and I know that further examinations of our national situation will follow. I want to pay tribute to my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), who has made an excellent analysis of our economy. I have the mildest, most subtle suggestion for the minister—he will not be there for more than 24 months at the most—in his disagreement with complete secrecy in the budget. If he wants to go out of office with some degree of credibility, I suggest he listen to our spokesman and others who have thought about these things very carefully and have put the national interest ahead of party advantage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, as the first member from the Atlantic region who has spoken on this side, I want to focus my thoughts for a short while on the vital question of regional disparity. Coming from Atlantic Canada, I think that I have the right to draw upon my experience in this field.

In the construction of a federal state, it is the very ethos of such a developing organization that the advantages and disadvantages of the component regions be recognized and shared. If the Atlantic area has suffered because of national policies, it is surely quite clearly and rightly and properly the responsibility of the national authorities to make redress, to make adjustment and to make equalization for that situation. The basic question in the discussions in Charlettown in 1864—a city which I have the honour to represent in this parliament—concerned the great economic questions affecting the various regions. As John A. Macdonald said more than once, 90 per cent of all the agreements were made at the Charlottetown meeting in September, 1864.

Since this is general debate, Mr. Speaker, I might say that in the present mild flurry of discussion about our constitution I hear the Prime Minister talk about the patriation of our constitution. I should like to take the opportunity of saying to him that if it is necessary to use that non-word, at least he should recognize Canadian history and recall that the British North America Act, although entirely and technically an emanation of the British parliament, was in fact the product of Canadian discussions, of Canadian statemanship, and in every way was "made in Canada". So if we must use the Latin construction "patria", which is so dated, when we talk about patriotism—the word is not "patriation", but "repatriation"—we are bringing back to Canada that which was made in Canada by great and distinguished Canadian statesmen, the chief of whom was Sir John A. Macdonald.

To move from terminology to economics, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am profoundly disturbed about what is happening in the Atlantic region. I have often said in this House that just because we have grown accustomed to national policies working to our disadvantage there is no reason why we should be asked to like those policies. Overexposure does not in this case mean overaffection and the purpose of this government—especially in relation to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and most recently in the budget of May 25—brings little cheer to Atlantic Canada and the long-suffering people from that area where this nation began.

We still have month after month, year after year, the highest unemployment rate in the whole country. Our cost of living is still high; our wages are low! Month after month the grim statistics tell their tale. In those indices of prosperity which should be high, we are generally, universally and apparently eternally, low. In those areas where a low figure indicates economic well-being, we have these figures high. One has only to examine these statistics of unemployment. One has only to refer to the report on the cost of living, which gives the annual income of our people year after year after year, to check the veracity of the assertion I am making. Time after time I have tried to convince successive ministers of public works that it is a cruel injustice to pay people working for the government of Canada in the Atlantic region a lower per-hour rate than those doing the same work in the rest of Canada. The prevailing wage rate program is one of the greatest economic deterrents to maritime prosperity that I can think of.

I have said that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is of immense importance to the sea-girt provinces of the east. It is the department which has special responsibilities for programs designed to redress some of the grave imbalances in our national economy. That is a good thing, and it is an important department. It is of the essence that regional economies be strong. No nation can be really prosperous or economically strong if any of its constituent parts are suffering from chronic economic depression. That is why 100 years ago Sir John A. Macdonald, after serious discussions with Joseph Howe, admitted quickly that changes in the basic document, the British North America Act, must be made to bring about a degree of justice to Nova Scotia and the Atlantic region. All these foolish announcements about special status for certain provinces being wrong is not historically true; all our provinces have special problems. Those whose economy has been damaged by national policies have all the more right to a special regard from the national government. I believe all of us in this House from Atlantic Canada and all our people want DREE and the minister to be successful, to really accomplish something and to diminish the gulf of inequity which retards a healthy economy.

I congratulate the new minister. I have high regard for him and wish him well in all his endeavours. But I regret that we see indications of serious communication problems between his department and its provincial counterpart in Prince Edward Island. At least this is the view of the Hon. Gilbert Clements who appeared before the Standing Committee on Regional Development on May 23 and who had some sharp criticism of the federal department. He told the committee:

> But I have no hesitation in saying that the communications with DREE and the action that we get from DREE is very poor . . .
> The attempt to decentralize, as far as I am concerned personally as one minister, is not worth it. We have a bureaucratic bog that is very difficult to cut through, and I think this is where the whole problem is. You ask a simple question and it gets lost in the wheel. You just do not see it again. It is very difficult for my people in my department to be continually trying to get answers to very simple, basic questions while we have a lot of work to be done.

Later at the same meeting, Mr. Clements declared:

> I can just answer this way. We are not the only province that is having problems with DREE, as I indicated, by the four ministers. Their frustrations are equally as great as mine. So there is nothing special about the plans in the other Atlantic provinces so it would look as though the problem is the same.
> I do not object to dealing with all kinds of people in Moncton and Charlottetown at all, as long as the pipeline to whoever makes the answer is open. But when you get the pipeline clogged then you are in real trouble and, of course, if you are dealing direct with Ottawa and you get a plugged pipeline then you are no better off.

He went on to say:

> But it seemed that under the first part of the plan when I was not really involved with it, the line to Ottawa was more direct, the answers were direct, and progress was made. Now it is difficult to even sit down and have a meeting with people. I was just indicating to your chairman here, a top level person in our province requested a meeting with DREE a month and a half ago that has not taken place.

I suppose that it is not surprising that there should be problems between Mr. Clements and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in Prince Edward Island. The present government has been notable in the development of a climate of misunderstanding between the federal and provincial levels of jurisdiction. One recalls the recent and repeated pleas of Premier Regan on the energy problems of the province of Nova Scotia, and I recall the chastising lecture which was given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) which was recently replaced by a more reasonable attitude. The Premier of Prince Edward Island must feel eternally the odd man out, because his representations on transportation, national parks and other vital questions seem, if not unnoted, at least to be unheeded.

But much more serious than the lack of communication between the federal DREE minister and his provincial counterparts is the perpetual situation where it appears that no other minister in the federal cabinet communicates with the DREE minister. That department was set up, and rightly so, to look upon the inequalities between regions of Canada and to do all in the power of the national government to diminish the gulf between those economically disadvantaged regions and the national average. That is a laudable and proper role for the national government, and it is one which only the national government can perform.

Former Premier Smith of Nova Scotia was constitutionally right and proper when he had that inserted on the agenda for the dominion-provincial conference—if I may use that proper and correct word "dominion"—but if none of the colleagues of the minister pay the slightest attention to this concept, we are not going to get very far. What is the use of having the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion assert and try to carry out the notion that there are special needs in certain areas of this country requiring special action by the national government, if his colleagues, one after another, say that they must apply a uniform standard?

Did the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) listen to his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, with reference to the ferry situation? Our great problem is to transport the products of the sea and the soil, to other parts, as well as tourists, and our Minister of Transport allowed a 100 per cent increase in one ferry rate and a 60 per cent increase in another. He enunciates the brilliant theory: let the user pay the fare. I will not begin to tell how many people in the Atlantic provinces pay for the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Did the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) consult his colleague when he forced the people of Prince Edward Island to go to the beaches of the North Shore by entering the Prince Edward Island national park? In other words, until there is recognition by all the members of the cabinet that there are special factors affecting the disadvantaged regions, then the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will never be able to make a success of his very important portfolio, and I am wondering if there is even yet a glimmer of recognition by the present government of the great problems facing the Atlantic region.

The only innovative idea I saw in the statement of the Minister of Finance of May 25—and I commend him for this—was the suggestion that something should be done for those who are moving to alternate power sources. I congratulate him for that. I cannot see anything else. I have not seen, for one moment, in the mind of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources the slightest recognition of the energy situation affecting the maritime provinces. It is easy for him to give little lectures to the provinces about cutting down their highway speed and turning off their lights—but he can watch, and if he is at all interested he can study the situation with reference to the Fundy tides. We all believe, or we say we do, that we are heading toward a future in which energy resources will be very seriously drained. There are few energy sources which are renewable; but in Atlantic Canada today we have a magnificent source of energy which, as long as the earth, the sun and the moon endure, will be there. That is longer than most of us will be here.

The Fundy tidal study has been analysed and researched in depth; studies have been made of the studies. We know it can be done. We all know that the time will come when it must be done; but did we see the slightest scintilla of suggestion in the budget the other night about this magnificent source of energy? I fear that if the present administrators of our realm are in possession of the keys of the kingdom for 24 more months, nothing will be done and there will be a delay until we reach the stage where it has to be done—and the cost will be many times greater than it would be now. I believe it was the great French philosopher, Montesquieu, who said: "To govern is to foresee". Heaven help us! We have tried and tried to help the present government foresee the energy needs of the whole country and the energy opportunities in the Atlantic provinces.

I listened carefully to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) when he had the placatory job of picking up the broken pieces from the crumbling of the unemployment insurance measure. He told us what was going to happen and what was going to replace the curtailment of the benefit eligibility period; but he took fine care that he gave us no details. He had no program, and there is nothing I can tell the young people of Atlantic Canada, especially as to what will replace this change.

It is easy to talk about jobs and new creations. Are we going to have LIP ad lib? In some way, are we going to pick up the young people's program? What are we going to do? Some day this session will adjourn. Summer is coming. We might end this portion of it. I would like to know from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration what to tell the people down there and what is coming in place of this. I invite the minister or some of his cabinet colleagues to tell us, before this debate is over, so that we can tell our people what is coming from this disastrous budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there is a rumour around that the Liberal caucus opposes the tightening-up of unemployment insurance which is taking place in the current budget. I have no intention of representing the views of the Liberal caucus, but in view of the rumour I want to speak for myself and indicate that as a Liberal I very much welcome this part of the budget. In fact, I think we would have had a better unemployment insurance program if even more changes had taken place, and I want to suggest some to the government.

Anyone who criticizes the extent of payments which the government makes to the unemployed needs to be attacked for being a yahoo. After all, what can be wrong with giving payments to people who are out of work? When the program was first proposed I remember the tremendous pressure from the business community which expressed concern about the potential cost of the program and its possible effect on the work ethic. There was an answer. It was said that this kind of criticism was being made by people who were against unemployment insurance. Some people said, "What does the business community know about the work ethic?" Besides, the plan was to be an insurance type plan supported not by taxes but by employer-employee contributions.

During the 1972 election campaign I remember my opponent arguing that in its first year of operation the unemployment insurance program had exceeded its estimated cost of operation by $1 billion. I went through the entire election campaign without contradicting him. He was wrong. The excess was slightly over $600 million. I remember asking myself, after I was defeated, if the government would have introduced the program in the first place if it had known that it would cost in the first year $600 million more than was estimated.

Putting aside the enormous contributions made to the fund by employers and employees, the federal government's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund, or our tax contribution, rose in 1971 from $103 million to an estimated amount for the fiscal year ending in 1976 of $890 million. I understand that the estimated contribution for 1976-77 is $1.7 billion. And that does not include the contribution made by the employer and employee.

Mr. Stevens: So you agree that there was a mistake?

Mr. Kaplan: That represents quite an escalation.

Mr. Stevens: There was a mistake, was there not?

Mr. Kaplan: Unemployment insurance can be looked on as a great liberal advance. I agree with it. I think unemployment insurance is a program which Canadians are willing to accept; it represents a recognition of liberalism in society. It represents the recognition that while opportunities should be provided for the individual to make the most of himself, to fulfil his life, the grave risks of losing one's livelihood should be shared.

The unemployment insurance program has always been difficult to administer because of its many facets. We consider the job search, and the quality of that search. During the initial period the government encountered understandable difficulties in controlling and administering the new program. Yet with the benefit of hindsight I find it hard to be critical of the way the program was administered. So far as I can see, and I followed the program closely, there are now few difficulties connected with abuse of unemployment insurance. I think the program is well administered and adequately controlled. As I see it, the budget we are considering is not concerned about abuses so much as about initial design problems, if I may put it that way.

Mr. Stevens: And who is responsible for those problems?

Mr. Kaplan: We are concerned about some aspects of coverage which do not involve abuse but which involve the lawfully recognized conditions under which an individual is entitled to come forward and claim unemployment insurance.

Mr. Stevens: And who put those provisions in the plan?

Mr. Kaplan: And who will improve them?

Mr. Paproski: We will, when we take over in 1978.

Mr. Kaplan: Oh yes?

Mr. Paproski: Don't worry, Bob. We shall take over.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I notice a strange ambivalence on the part of hon. members opposite with regard to unemployment insurance.

This plan has always enjoyed, in large measure, the support of members on all sides of the House. It puts into practice the principle that we are our brother's keeper. It gives members of our society while unemployed, and seeking an opportunity to return to the work force, the support they deserve.

As I said in the beginning the business community voiced its concern. Now as of 1976 the difficulties connected with the program are widely recognized far beyond the business community and the present budget is designed to correct those very difficulties which are of concern to members of the community at large. No matter which neighbourhood of my constituency I visit, I hear people grumbling about individuals who are on unemployment insurance and who, in the opinion of neighbours, ought to be working or would be working if a genuine incentive existed to find a job. I occasionally hear parents say this sort of thing about young people.

Let me tell the House something that happened to me not long ago. Last Friday afternoon I received six students from my riding. They attend York University. One of them came up here to work in a government department; the job, starting this summer, is to be permanent. The other five were on unemployment insurance. Well, they had been students for the year and, as it turned out, had all worked last summer. Therefore having worked for eight, nine or 12 weeks last summer, they were qualified for and entitled to unemployment insurance if they could not find a job.

I told them that I had seen help wanted ads in shop windows in the shopping centre where my constituency office is located. There were signs saying, "Cashier Wanted," and "Help Wanted," and so on. I asked these young people if they knew about such opportunities, and had tried to take advantage of them. They said to me, "Well, no. This is how we looked for our jobs—we sent out nearly 100 letters to all sorts of businesses, asking for jobs." They said that none of these letters produced an offer of employment; they felt that, having spent nearly $10 on postage in conducting their job search, they were entitled to claim unemployment insurance. I can imagine how parents who work all their lives feel when confronted with a situation like that. But they tried for a job, continued to write letters, and to claim unemployment insurance.

Let me refer to some statistics which the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) brought to the fore when he spoke the other day. He said that in a majority of cases those who claimed unemployment insurance for the maximum period after eight to 11 weeks of work were able, when their qualifying period ran out, to find employment. A large percentage found work within six weeks. I think that many of them are like the students who came to my office from my part of the city of Toronto. They may not be aware of where to find work. Or, if they were given a greater incentive to find work, many would be able to do so, I am sure.

I think the changes in the plan will benefit regions like mine. The changes proposed by the government are changes in the right direction. They will increase employment, not increase the number of people on welfare. Not only will they lead to increased employment; they will lead to increased productivity in our economy. There are labour shortages in every sector.

I turn now to the problems we encounter in some depressed regions of the country. There the situation is quite different. I understand that there you cannot go into a shopping centre, as you can in Toronto, and find jobs advertised in store windows. It is hard to find work in those areas. The question we must ask ourselves—and the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) asked it but without looking at the answers—is this: is unemployment insurance the kind of constructive program which will produce employment in depressed areas of this country, or must we do something else? Instead of institutionalizing employment can we increase productivity in Canada? Shall we continue features which create a sense of entitlement to a pension? In other words, if we do not change the unemployment insurance program will we make Canadians, especially those in the depressed areas, into a nation of pensioners?

By themselves I think unemployment insurance payments are a false solution, a false source of prosperity and stability for the depressed regions of the country. There is a better way. If the hon. member for Hillsborough had listened to the minister, or read his speech, he would know that the government is making solid proposals for job creation, proposals which will bring development to our depressed regions, and programs which ought to be in place in depressed areas in order to create employment. I believe that most Canadians want to work. It is particularly frustrating for the unemployed in the depressed regions of this country because the jobs are not there.

You cannot have a program that is escalating in cost the way this program is and try at the same time to add something new and substantial to the job creation element. When government expenditures just cannot be permitted to grow at their recent historic rate, you have to cut back some programs in order to expand others. In my view nothing can be more rational than to cut back a program like unemployment insurance where the thrust of it is directed toward providing a kind of false alternative to employment, and to try to develop programs that create employment. I very much welcome that. I think you can be a Liberal and welcome that alternative. I very much approve of what the government has done.

Recently I wrote to the minister. I made a number of proposals for amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which are not anti-liberal, anti-the unemployed, anti-the depressed regions. They are designed to give the government the resources to really do something about the depressed regions and to create a base of employment in those regions.

I recommended lengthening the qualification period. This has been done. It has been lengthened to 12 weeks. When the minister appears before the committee it will be interesting to know how much resources would have been freed if that 12 weeks had been 16 or 20 weeks, as are the qualification periods in use in the other liberal societies of western Europe and the industrialized world.

Second, I suggested adjusting the benefit period, which has been done, so that a shorter benefit period will apply for a shorter labour force attachment period.

Third, I suggested that family income should be taken into consideration. This was not done in the budget. I hope it will still be considered. The individual who has no dependants, who is alone, would receive a smaller unemployment payment than the individual who is the sole earner and has a family to look after. For the individual who is a second earner in a family and whose income is not as essential, the payment could be lower.

One would like to see larger payments go to all individuals who are unemployed and who are genuinely searching for work, but we are talking about limited resources. If resources are limited, is it not better to give them to those who need them more, and use the savings to try to create employment, instead of just creating a government pension base for a local economy?

Fourth, I suggested that the government take a look at the situation of part-time and seasonal workers. I do not think the theory of the unemployment insurance system was that a part-time worker and a seasonal worker were to participate in benefits on the same basis as a person who found a full-time job, intended to be a full-time worker, lost that job and is looking for another full-time job. Special rules should apply for people in the work force on a special, temporary, part-time or seasonal basis.

Fifth, I drew the attention of the minister to a special type of unemployment, the layoff. A fair percentage of people who are unemployed and on unemployment insurance do not consider themselves to be unemployed. They consider themselves to be waiting for a recall from the employer who laid then off. Their situation is special. The employer who lays off a person because there is not enough work in the plant, or whatever it is, for the time being, has a responsibility to those employees he hopes to get back when business improves. His responsibility is greater than that of the employer who has had to lay off or fire people or close his business without the intention of recalling them. In a case like that, the laid-off employee should not be treated in the same way as the ordinary hardship case that led us to opt for a very generous unemployment insurance program in the first place.

Finally, I stated to the minister that there was a change which many were advocating that I do not support and do not want to see take place. Say a person earning $10,000, $11,000 or $14,000 a year loses his job. It is suggested that while such persons are looking for a similar job they ought to be forced by the administration to take any job that comes along.

As an example, a person may have worked as a manager in a business that has gone bankrupt. He wants to find another job as a manager. The case is put forward that this person ought to be prepared to take any job rather than go on unemployment insurance. I reject that argument. The unemployment insurance program ought to permit an individual who had a job that required high qualifications to have the opportunity to find a similar kind of job.

If a manager who has been laid off must accept a job as a waiter or something similar, it would be very difficult for him to make a proper job search for the kind of job he is capable of doing and which is more productive in terms of what it does for the economy as well as being more remunerative for him. That individual should not be forced to take any job just to get off unemployment insurance. He should be given a fair chance to find the kind of job he had before. I was very glad the minister did not go that far in making changes.

I look forward to seeing the bill introduced by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration implementing these two extremely progressive changes. They will free funds which ought to be clearly committed to areas of need and to create employment in areas where we have been providing as an alternative an unemployment insurance base. That is really a dead end or false alternative.

I congratulate the minister, and indicate to him that I very much support what he has done. I consider it to be the kind of liberal approach to improving this plan that has been needed for some time.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, this is a very dull, ho-hum type of budget. It has done very little, if anything, to excite the Canadian people or to help the economy of the country.

The government is relying on the anti-inflation regulations brought in last October in the hope that they will do something to control inflation in Canada. Even though it campaigned vigorously against any form of controls, last October it saw fit to bring in controls. However, that has not done very much to control inflation in Canada. It has not done anything to get people moving in the proper direction to control inflation in Canada.

The government brought in the budget because it was embarrassed about the length of time that had elapsed since the previous budget. Therefore it felt it should bring one in. It certainly was not very much of a budget.

● (1750)

We see that the main thrust of the budget is directed toward unemployment insurance. We don't really need budgets to debate unemployment insurance. It would have been easy for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) to have brought in the necessary proposals to present to parliament in an effort to do something about unemployment insurance. But because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) could find very little to put in the budget, or because he did not want to find very much, he concentrated on the unemployment insurance aspect. Thus we find ourselves today debating unemployment insurance and the absence of proper administration instead of the economic situation. What we are really discussing is the attempt to fix up the unemployment insurance arrangements which were brought in some years ago by the government, and which are not working.

From time to time the opposition has drawn attention in no uncertain terms to the fact that the unemployment insurance scheme is not working properly. We know the government is concerned about the high cost of the scheme and we realize, too, that there are many people in Canada who are concerned about this aspect. These include, in particular, men and women who keep paying into the fund—for them it is a form of taxation—but who never benefit from unemployment insurance and in fact never use it. They are asking whether it is truly an unemployment insurance program or whether it is really a welfare program in disguise.

We also have before us the latest report of the Economic Council of Canada concerning people and jobs. The main thrust of this report is getting people back to work. There is a lot to be said about the psychological aspect when it comes to getting people to work. The minister in his speech yesterday referred to "frictional and structural causes" as part of the reason for the large number of people in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits. Seasonal unemployment, he said, accounted for only a very small percentage of the total and other factors accounted for a much higher percentage. As far as I can determine, "frictional" implies a clash of will, temperament or opinion. This is one of the aspects dealt with in the report of the Economic Council.

What we are really talking about here is the work ethic. There is a clash of wills and opinions. I do not believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has done anything to help in the last few years by telling the people of Canada, "You really should be doing your own thing." In many instances, and I think this is notable about a lot of young people in Canada, doing their own thing does not mean working.

I like to look at what is happening in British Columbia today. I think one of the bright spots in the new provincial government there is the minister of labour who has come on very strong and told the people on welfare they should pick up a shovel. It did not go over too well to start with, but the result has been that the attitudes of people working today are considerably different. He designated areas where you could not get welfare. In other words, he told the people they had to go to areas where there was work. Whether it was there or not, they had to be there if they wanted to get welfare. It has made a considerable difference in my riding, especially in a lot of those places where we were having trouble with young people getting together in communes. I talked to the people last week about what is happening in those areas now and they said the communes have disappeared, they are just not there. I talked to business people, to processors and people in packing plants, and they say there is an entirely different feeling today on the part of young people about getting to work because they know they have to work, and they are working. The type of thing the Prime Minister has been saying about doing your own thing has done really nothing to foster the work ethic in Canada. May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was talking about unemployment insurance and the fact that the government has seen clear to announce amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in the budget. I was saying that the Economic Council of Canada report concerning people and jobs had reported that a lot of people were on unemployment insurance for frictional and structural reasons. After what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government have said, that you do your own thing in Canada and you really don't have to work, it is understandable that the Economic Council should find that there are frictional reasons for people being on unemployment insurance. "Frictional" really means, as far as I can determine, a clash of will, temperaments and opinions. I think if this government wants to convince people that they should work, it should not be speaking in this manner but rather should be telling them that it is a good thing to work, that there are many businesses in Canada that need workers. There are many workers who are willing to go to work but are not working under the shadow of the type of ethic that the Prime Minister advocates, that of do your own thing.

On November 5 we were debating unemployment insurance and I was lucky enough to speak that day. I was talking about the large amount of money that is being spent on unemployment insurance today, almost $4 billion, and about some of the reasons why there was such high unemployment. The member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) in speaking after me twisted, I think, quite a lot of what I said, and argued that I had said that the reason there was a high unemployment insurance cost in Canada was because of abuses. He said "I defy the hon. member to cost the abuses and to tell me what percentage of the deficit is a direct result thereof".

I was very pleased to read in the review of the Economic Council "People and Jobs" that 0.7 per cent of the unemployed are on unemployment insurance today because of the laxity of the program. There are 70,000 people estimated to be on unemployment insurance because of this, and if you cost it into the total cost of the unemployment insurance it would amount to some $350 million. I think that should be proof enough for the hon. member for New Westminster, if he wants to take the time to read that portion and understand really what were talking about at that time.

I do not think that what the government is trying to do in its budget is going to do very much about that portion of the people and the laxity of the program. I think much more will have to be done if it is going to service that area. It has attacked the length of time, requiring a longer length of time for people to qualify for unemployment insurance. I am not sure that is the correct way. The government says it will save $330 million in this manner. If a person is legitimately off work he is suffering, and this is not the area where the attack should take place.

I am certainly pleased to hear that the government is now getting around to wanting to put Manpower and unemployment insurance together again. This is a real necessity, and the emphasis must be placed on Manpower, getting these 70,000 people back in the work force and gainfully employed. Some people may ask where they are going to work. There are lots of jobs if you have people with the right attitude. Much of the work being done in Canada today is not being done on time, is taking longer than it should. This is because people in business will not stand for harassment, and will not allow those people with the wrong attitude to work for them. I think there is quite an area in this regard for people who want to work.

We also know that many mines, not just in the remote areas, but in areas such as my riding, do not have enough people working because people will not go there. Of course they will not go when somebody else tells them they should be doing their own thing, and when there is a tremendous unemployment insurance and welfare scheme on which they can fall back. All these jobs must be filled, and I think with the right attitude it would not be too hard to fill them.

The minister announced that he is going to have another $100 million for LIP this year. This is good, providing it is spent properly. I hope he has read the review of the Economic Council of Canada, "People and Jobs", in which it is said that the government should enlist provincial governments, local governments, municipalities, and business organizations in order to carry out these programs. Rather than having a program under which the government asks the people what they want, it should co-operate with these various levels of government and business because they know what is needed in the various areas. I entirely agree with this suggestion, and this is what we must do if we are to spend the money and get the job done properly.

We should also spend this money on programs that last a year and longer, rather than just on projects or programs that last a few months, with people going back on unemployment insurance at their conclusion. People in these local areas are aware of the local needs and they will accept the responsibility of seeing that the job is done well.

Nothing at all was said in the budget about agriculture. Probably most hon. members will not remember what was said in the throne speech, because that was delivered in November, 1974, going on two years ago. At one time we had two sessions a year; now we have two years a session. I suggest this is not good because the government tends to forget what it proposed at the beginning.

In that throne speech of November, 1974, the government stressed that there should be incentives for farmers, with stabilization of income and markets. We all know of the demonstration which took place here today. The government should go back and read what it said in 1974. Had it meant what it said then we would not be experiencing the type of demonstration we saw today.

Every farm commodity grown in Canada that I know of has a more distressed price today than in November, 1974, perhaps with the exception of grains, and I am given to understand they are becoming more distressed.

An hon. Member: That's not true.

Mr. Whittaker: Somebody suggests that is not true. I wish he would get up and tell me of an area where it is not true. I would be very glad to hear about it, but I do not think the hon. member can tell me.

The cattle producer is in an even more distressed position than the producers of fruits and vegetables. The fruit and vegetable canning industry is certainly in a distressed position today, particularly in British Columbia. I suggest the reason is that cheap imports are coming into Canada as a result of the cheap food policy of the government. Obviously the government did not mean what it said in the throne speech of November, 1974. It is carrying on with the same type of cheap food policy it had years ago.

If there is someone else in the world who can produce cheaper than in Canada the government suggests we should bring in their products virtually free of any encumbrance. The farmers in my area used to say, and I think this is also accurate today, that Canada is a saint in a world of sinners when it comes to the import-export trade. We put no encumbrances, or very few, on imported farm produce. Other countries in the world put total embargoes on our products when they see fit. They always seem able to find some kind of gimmick or means of putting an embargo on Canadian produce. Canada does not do this.

In this budget we find that the government intends to remove the tariff or reduce it in respect of pork. Every time a farm commodity reaches a position where our farmers are able to make a little bit of money the government reduces the tariff, allowing imports to come in, knocking the heck out of our farmers. The government has done this before and is doing it again. Pork is a product on which the producers are able to make a few dollars today. Now the government is taking the tariff off.

Let us just take the example of canned products being imported. There is a flood of cheap canned products coming into western Canada today. As a result the producers there still have last year's stocks on hand. The farmers want to produce, and the government suggests that production should be up in Canada. But the farmers cannot produce because there are no cans to be filled, and those that were filled last year are still sitting on the shelves. This is a result of the importation of cheap canned products. The farmers are wondering why they are not getting contracts from the producers. They are not getting them because the warehouses are filled with last year's products.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whittaker: If the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Pelletier) does not believe me, let me read him a letter I received from a cannery yesterday.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Read it; you can't even read.

Mr. Whittaker: This letter is from Mrs. D. L. Milne Cannery Ltd.

An hon. Member: Don't judge everybody by yourself, Joe.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) has the floor.

Mr. Whittaker: I do not like to be continually complaining about the government whip, but every time I get up to speak it seems he talks about me reading. I notice he is never here to see his own members reading their speeches, so he does not know when they get up and read.

● (2020)

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that, if the hon. member would like to know, I have never missed a day since the opening of the House last fall. I could bring the record I have to show how many days he has missed. I have the record which shows how many days he has and has not been in this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. That is not a point of order; it is a point of debate.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry we had that digression because it has shown that even though the hon. member makes a lot of noise he really has a thin skin.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest that we all settle down.

Mr. Whittaker: This letter is from Mrs. D. L. Milne Cannery Limited. It states:

> As the government has stock piles of various foods for Acts of God (i.e. powdered milk), could the idea be engendered to use pears, packed in No. 10 cans, 100 oz. of fruit and liquid sugar.
> The 1976 pear crop is going to be large and the canners pack will be small due to foreign dumping. I am suggesting that each canner be allotted a quota of this surplus product and the government show originality in having such a useful and nutritional product with long keeping quality, available for distribution (the rats cannot eat this).

This year the pear producers will be very hard pressed because they still have on hand their stocks of the canning crop from last year.

We hear about the tariff being removed from pork. This is taking place at a time when pork producers are making a little more money. We also note that the tariff is being removed from bananas. Bananas are in direct competition with the fruits and vegetables grown in Canada. Bananas are grown in a country where there is cheap labour. They flood the Canadian market, and now we note that those who ship them into Canada are to have an advantage. Many manufacturers in Canada are in exactly the same position. As soon as they establish a good business in which they can show a profit the government reduces the tariff, and consequently imports into Canada do much to inhibit their business. Therefore these manufacturers lose the incentive to increase their business. There are many such examples in Canada of businesses which are having difficulty in competing with imports. The government is doing absolutely nothing to help these businesses.

Then there is the matter of transportation. Transportation costs are much higher here than in the United States, and we have difficulty competing in this area. I do not see anything in the budget to relieve this situation. I do not see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) doing anything about this. It is very difficult for farmers and manufacturers in Canada to compete with the competition from outside Canada.

Although we have been told there is to be a cut in government spending we find that government spending is higher. Many people believe that a large part of the inflation in Canada is caused by government spending. In the Globe and Mail of March 11, 1976, there is a story about how the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) got the ministers of various departments to cut their budgets. He said he did it by gimmicks and tactics. He added that if the ministers did not subscribe to what he was asking, he would take the matter to cabinet. I think that is a good story. However, when we look at the situation we find that budgets have not been cut. We find that we are spending more in Canada. I think the minister should have gone to cabinet if he wants to cut the budgets of the various departments, because people are saying that the spending of the government is the cause of much of the inflation in Canada today.

The Employers' Council of British Columbia in its review of the budget said it is too bad that the government has not developed a more realistic level for the Canadian dollar, and new job creation through the encouragement of investment. The Canadian dollar is high in relation to what it really should be, especially if the government would cut back on its spending. A high Canadian dollar favours imports into Canada rather than exports from Canada. This is really an exporting nation. The government should be doing everything it can to make sure that we are able to export.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Whittaker: Thank you very much. I shall try to be as brief as I can. Our trade deficit is very high. We should be taking action to ensure that the Canadian dollar favours exports rather than imports into Canada. In the budget our deficit is reported to be $3.3 billion, but really when all the needs of the governments and its borrowings are tallied up one can see that it is really $4.5 billion. Because of this interest rates are high, and the dollar is at a high level. This dampens the export trade.

We hear much talk about energy. A high tax has been placed on large cars and air conditioners. This is very good. A manufacturer in my area who manufactures wood-burning stoves made a submission to the Minister of Finance that the excise tax be removed from wood-burning stoves. There is no excise tax on oil burners or gas burners of any kind, but there is a tax on wood-burning stoves. Wood in Canada is a renewable resource. I would have thought this tax would have been removed, especially since the minister wrote me a letter in which he said:

> In the event that the sales tax relief you seek can only be provided through an amendment to the Excise Tax Act regulations, please be assured that your representation will be reviewed when amendments to these regulations are next under consideration.

I was very disappointed that there was nothing to this effect in the budget. Mr. Speaker, I could go on and on but I am very grateful that I was granted extended time.

● (2030)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro).

Mr. Paproski: We have the heavies tonight.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): That, coming from another one, Mr. Speaker!

I am glad to have the opportunity to bring out a few facts in this debate in support of the budget presented by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). I think there are a few aspects of this budget, when seen in context of our wage and price control program and other elements of economic policy which show that these policies have worked very much to the benefit of organized and unorganized workers.

I think it is well to keep in mind that some people have alleged that the organized and unorganized worker has not been receiving—certainly in the last months—an adequate share of the gross national product. Statistics show that this is a fallacy; in fact labour's share under this government has not only been maintained in terms of its percentage share of the Gross National Product but also in terms of national income. Since the inception of the controls it has actually gone up in current dollars without the inflationary factor taken out, and incomes have gone up in real terms once the inflationary factor has been taken out. If this is true, then some of the statements that are being made throughout the country to the effect that it is the policy of the government, or it is the end result of a wage and price control system and of this budget, to cut down the organized workers' percentage share of the gross national product in relation to incomes, are fallacious.

All hon. members should be aware of the statistics that back up this argument. I do not believe it is in the interests of any hon. member, irrespective of his or her political persuasion, to perpetrate what are erroneous impressions and, although perhaps not intentionally, to deceive the Canadian public about the situation. Before I go into some of these statistics, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be wise to take into account some of the background factors that I am sure were in the mind of the Minister of Finance, and indeed in all our minds when we brought in this budget.

We recognized one central thing, that the crucial national need was to gear down the rate of inflation without impeding economic recovery. This was the way to ensure job security and, in the long run, to combat unemployment. In an uncontrolled inflationary situation there can be no assurance of job security or that any policies will work to cut down an unacceptably high rate of unemployment.

Let me enumerate some of these factors, Mr. Speaker. First, there is no doubt that what we faced as a government, and what all of us faced as parliamentarians, was the unease last October when this program was introduced. The trade union movement and the union leadership felt their position was untenable. The leadership was vulnerable because it had led the membership into long term agreements—some for two or three years. The membership were coming out of those agreements to find that they had fallen behind the rate of inflation. They had endeavoured to anticipate it when they entered into agreements but it turned out to be higher than anticipated, and so the leadership was exposed for having led membership into agreements through which they had fallen behind.

I think it would be a natural thing for the union leadership—and if I were a union leader I would have done the same thing—to predict for 1976 and 1977 the very worst rate of inflation, and then endeavour to build in protection against it in the collective agreements. Of course that can be a self-fulfilling prophecy. If you have to predict the worst and protect against it, inevitably the worst will occur.

The stability of the union leadership, to say nothing about the real earnings of the workers, was very fragile, and this had to be corrected. Our economic policies, including the budget and restraint program, were designed to restore the needed stability to workers and their leaders.

The second factor is also apparent,and I think the budget takes it into account as does the wage and price controls program, and that is the plight of the unorganized worker. Organized workers have their spokesmen, and some very effective ones at that, but unorganized workers are often on fixed incomes, or on incomes that do not keep up with the rate of inflation because they do not have spokesmen. They were some of the prime victims of a destructive inflationary process.

I think the third factor in the back of our minds when we not only brought in the restraint program but brought in a neutral budget in terms of the economic stabilizer, was that we recognized that the budget is just one element—it is complementary to the wage and price control scheme and reflects on the other elements that go into an anti-inflationary program. I do not have to repeat what the other elements are; the Minister of Finance has dealt with them. They include fiscal and monetary policies, governmental expenditure policies, and structural policies.

The fourth factor that formed part of the background when we decided upon our economic policies was the fact that we must protect the real earnings of the workers, both organized and unorganized. That is what I referred to in a preliminary way in my opening remarks. I think it would be well to note that when we brought in the restraint program, labour's share of the gross national product was at its peak. There has been some suggestion that this scheme was anti-labour in the sense that it was designed to cut down labour's share, or that it was brought in at the low point in the cycle and thus they were cut down while other elements were allowed to expand. That led to some of the mythology that this program was primarily visited upon the backs of the workers.

The facts from Statistics Canada with respect to the workers' share of the Gross National Product—this is a distribution of national income in the context of percentage of Gross National Product—show that in 1975 when we brought in the control program the workers' share in terms of incomes was 56 per cent of the Gross National Product. In 1974 it was 53.9 per cent. In 1973 it was 53.9 per cent. In 1972 it was 55.1 per cent—still lower than the 56 per cent in 1975 when we brought in the program. In 1970 it was 54.5 per cent. If you trace labour's share of the Gross National Product from 1962 to 1975 you will see that we brought in the program when labour's share was at its peak in terms of a percentage of the Gross National Product. This means that the program was not brought in at a low point, in terms of the statistics, of labour's share, but at the high point, and if that share is going up it stands to reason that somebody else is de-escalating.

● (2040)

Indeed, if one wants to look at the profit statistics during that year, 1975, when we brought in the program, profits were 11.5 per cent of the Gross National Product. In 1974 they were 13 per cent. What this points out is that the program was brought in when labour was receiving a high share and profits were declining.

If we start from there, I think it is useful to note just what happened since that time under the controls program.

I think it can be pointed out that instead of workers being cut back in terms of real earnings after taking the inflationary factor out, their share has been going up quite substantially. In other words, the inflationary process has no longer been eroding their purchasing power. Under the restraint program they are getting tangible gains in terms of real disposable income. However, before getting into that, I would like to indicate again the fact that labour was at its highest plateau when we brought in this program.

If one wants to look at a history of what has happened when we talk about labour's share of national income from 1975 to 1976, we brought this program in when labour's share of the national income was 73 per cent. In 1974 it was 71.6 per cent. In 1973 it was 71.7 per cent, so in the last three years it was at some of its highest levels. I might just point out that in 1960 it was hovering around 69 per cent. In 1964 it was 69 per cent. Back in 1946 it was 62 per cent. We brought in this program in 1975 when labour's share was 73 per cent.

An hon. Member: That's too high.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): That gives some indication of the fallacy of what some people would lead us to believe.

I think some other statistics are interesting. Again I am referring to measures of real earnings on a quarterly basis to indicate just how well the workers have done in terms of the effectiveness of some of the economic policies of the government. Let us look at 1975. In the first quarter workers' real earnings had gone up 2.5 per cent. In the second quarter they went up 3.8 per cent. In the third quarter they went up 2.5 per cent, and then in the quarter in which the program began in terms of real earnings the workers' share had gone up 3.2 per cent. This is average real earnings with the inflationary factor taken out.

I think I mentioned the first quarter of 1976. That is the quarter after the anti-inflationary program came into effect, and the workers' real earnings were up 3.6 per cent. Recent statistics I looked at as late as this afternoon indicated that in the month of March over the previous month, which was 3.6 per cent, the rise was 4.1 per cent in real terms after the inflation factor was taken out. Surely this spells out something, and if we take this in the context of the settlements which are now being arrived at since the program came in, the workers have never been in a better position, from an economic point of view, that they are at present under the economic policies of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The average settlements being approved by the Anti-Inflation Board are in the area of approximately 1 per cent against the arithmetic guidelines, and this is because of the historical relationship factors and the special consideration factors which were taken into account, certainly during the early months of the program, and still are. So let us say we are running roughly around 13 per cent, with a majority of the collective agreements being entered into by the parties falling below that. However, in percentage terms, let us say 13 per cent. Yet the inflationary rate this last April as compared with the previous April is now down to 8.9 per cent.

If the inflationary rate is down to 8.9 per cent, and the workers and salary and wage earners of this country are currently receiving roughly 13 per cent, is it any wonder that in terms of real disposable income after the inflation factor is taken out they now have a purchasing power 4.1 per cent higher than they had before? That is one of the most marked increases at any time since 1971 on a quarterly basis.

When some of my friends—and they are my friends—in the labour movement argue that the budget, in terms of it being a stabilizer with its primary aim to cut down the inflationary process, and that the controls program are somehow designed to limit labour's share or cut it back, statistics at the time we brought in the program and the statistics currently coming out would indicate exactly the contrary.

Mr. Peters: They don't believe that.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I believe that this is the real basis. I have the statistics. My hon. friend says they do not believe this. These are statistics the CLC uses, and I am using them to inform my colleagues in the House. Labour has its economists, too. If they wish to argue with them, I would welcome that. I would welcome a detailed examination of this on their part because I think they would then have the intellectual honesty to perpetuate no longer what is fundamentally a falsehood in terms of what this program is doing for real incomes for the organized and unorganized workers of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I think that this is the basis upon which some of us on this side of the House would claim that a majority of the workers of this country are prepared to go along with this program. They saw what happened to the purchasing power of their dollar under the inflationary process prior to the introduction of wage and price controls, and they saw what would happen in the inflationary process if our budgetary measures—not as introduced by my colleague, the Minister of Finance—fueled the flame of inflation. That would cut down drastically their purchasing power in real terms, which for many of them had been their very unhappy experience in the first few years of the 1970's. Now the workers are receiving one of the most marked increases in real earnings since the program was brought in.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I think this is one of the bases upon which we can legitimately count for a majority of workers getting behind this program, or at least going along with it. This is not to suggest for one minute that if the organized labour leadership in this country, which is highly regarded, for some reasons wishes to ignore the statistics and tries to arouse its members into some type of general strike for a day as a political weapon, the organized workers are going to humiliate their leaders by leaving them exposed and not backing them to a certain degree. I think there is a sufficient feeling of solidarity in the labour movement so that perhaps for a day this could happen, or partially happen. I do not think even they would expect 100 per cent adherence. The labour movement of this country is not more monolithic than any other organization; and in view of statistics showing real gains for the workers of this country I believe they will have some difficulty.

● (2050)

I also believe that it would not be in the interests of the labour movement, its leadership, membership, or in the interest of the country to embark on that process of confrontation which would alienate various elements of the Canadian community from the labour movement, that movement which has contributed so much to the economic well-being of this country.

Mr. Peters: Yes, but you are only controlling labour's wages. Who else is being controlled?

An hon. Member: You can make your speech later on.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): In conclusion, if the Canadian labour movement meet with us around the middle of June, and I have indicated they are willing to do this, we can assure them that it is not the government's policy to decrease or cut back on labour's share either of the Gross National Product or national income. If they can be so convinced on the basis of the statistics I have put before the House, and we can show them that under this program, in real terms, workers' wages and salaries have gone up, perhaps they can be convinced that it is indeed the government's policy to protect in real terms the wages of all workers in this country.

If we could so lay a solid basis for co-operation we could set up the sort of mechanisms to which my colleague, the Minister of Finance, referred in the budget—structural mechanisms for consultation. This idea was the highlight of the Quebec manifesto of the CLC. It suggested how labour could participate with the government in the economic and social policy formation which will evolve during the post-control period. It seems to me that that was a most significant position for the Canadian labour movement to adopt. Mr. Speaker, they want to be involved; they want to be consulted; they want assurance that the government will respond, and that there will be an ongoing basis for such consultation. This may mean that in future we shall see less of the element of confrontation, less of the adversary approach in relations between labour and the government of the day.

Considering this program's record of protecting the organized and unorganized workers, I think it can lay the solid base for ensuring that in future labour's share of our income in real terms does not decrease but continues to increase, and that labour will get its share of the rewards of productivity as this country prospers.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, when I listened to the budget speech I tried to ascertain the real purpose of the budget. Did the minister try to plot a course for this country to follow? Was he trying to plot a course for the Liberal party? What was the purpose of the budget? As I sat here, listening to the minister make his speech on budget night, I could not help thinking that he was talking to himself. He read a long speech very quickly, mainly to himself. The minister was a changed man, not the man we used to know. When he was Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, he stuck out his chin, gave the facts, and told Canadians what he thought was good for them and the country. On budget night he was a changed man, talking only to himself, as if conscious that in his first budget address he had little to say to the country, and still less to give it. All this was clear to me on budget night, and is evident if one studies the budget.

A budget has a purpose, Mr. Speaker. It should provide direction to those things the government thinks important. And what does the government think is important? To what does it wish to direct the people's attention?

As I look at the world and consider Canada's role in the world, two things strike me. First, the world is greatly concerned about energy supplies and energy costs. As well, the world is greatly concerned about food supplies. We must ask are we capable of providing food for the underdeveloped people of the world? In addition Canada and the United States are greatly concerned about balance of payments difficulties. The budget address dealt not at all with the question of food supplies, dealt not at all with our agricultural industry and our capability of providing food for ourselves and other peoples of the world not as fortunate as we are, and dealt inadequately with the question of energy. We were told about the 100 per cent write-off provision designed to encourage companies to explore for minerals, oil, and gas. Really, that is a small measure for dealing with the over-all energy picture.

Most Canadians ask themselves this question: will lack of reasonably priced energy supplies limit our growth potential in the years ahead? The minister did not deal with that. He spoke of the high cost of energy, but did not go beyond that. He did not put forward solutions to our problem. He may have hinted at the existence of the problem but did not say how it should be solved. Most Canadians who are prepared to look down the road wonder if the high cost of energy will in future prevent our enjoying our present high standard of living. The minister did not deal with that question, and did not answer it. As I say, he hinted at the existence of the problem, suggested we are concerned about the rate at which we consume energy, suggested somewhat simplified solutions, but did not deal in detail with the problem.

He suggested that our productivity is slightly lower than that of the United States, that we were capable of catching up, that the American economy was doing very well and would bail us out. To met it was a shallow budget. Many newspapers have described it as a dead, a dull budget. The May 29 edition of the Financial Post said that this is an inadequate budget:

> ... especially since the federal government is expecting a huge 26 per cent increase in its personal income tax take during the current fiscal year? After all, there is nothing in the budget which would give unemployment a whisker of a chance of coming down.

Mr. Trudel: What is the hon. member quoting?

Mr. Horner: I quoted an article in the Financial Post, to enlighten hon. members opposite and the hon. member who just interrupted, and to substantiate what I said about the budget. I feel that it will do absolutely nothing to decrease unemployment in Canada, already running at the rate of 7.4 per cent.

● (2100)

In his column, which appears in many papers, Douglas Fisher castigated the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) for his budget. He said that Ottawa awaits with rising hope the American recovery becoming a boom. He further stated that the minister did not attempt to deal with the economic problems in Canada. I agree.

The minister suggested lengthening the qualifying period before a worker can collect unemployment insurance from eight to 12 weeks. The government has the habit of doing one thing, causing a great deal of concern, then patching it up by undoing what it should not have done in the first place. That is certainly true in this instance.

As one writer stated, one will go off Ottawa's pogey and on to the local dole. That may well be the case in many of the high unemployment areas. The minister certainly did not attempt to deal with the fiscal disparity that exists within various regions of Canada.

In the past year the government has added to a high cost economy. One need only look at the legislation dealt with in this House during this lengthy session which has lasted almost two years. Nearly every piece of legislation has contributed to growth in the civil service.

When looking at the figures I was astonished to see that the staff in the Post Office has grown by 15,000 in the past few years. I used to think that part of the problem creating the unrest in that department was the fact that automation would cost a lot of workers their jobs. That certainly has not been the case. Automation must have been completely stopped in the Post Office. It certainly has not contributed to any greater efficiency; many Canadians will attest to that. We do not have a situation where the government has been hiring less people.

The minister suggested the concept of again bringing together unemployment insurance and the employment department. There is an article in the Globe and Mail about this. The government separated these two departments a few years ago. Now that it is bringing them together again, we are expected to hail it as the great saviour. The Unemployment Insurance Commission will be grouped with the employment department. The word "unemployment" will be dropped completely. However, the government is only uniting what it divided.

What happened after the division? There was a tremendous growth in the civil service. In one department there were 10,000 civil servants, and 11,000 in the other. By again bringing them together there will be a duplication of services. According to an article in the Globe and Mail and reprinted in the Calgary Albertan, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) said that there will be a duplication of much of the work. Can we expect a reduction in the number of civil servants as a result of grouping these departments? One official says that we can only look for a no-growth situation.

If we analyse the problem of inflation we see that the cause is excessive government spending. At the time of the last budget the government budgeted for a $1.5 billion deficit. It had a $5 billion deficit. It is now budgeting for a $4.5 billion deficit, saying that is less than we had in the last year. However, this is greatly above what it budgeted in its last budget. If its current prediction is as far out, we are apt to have a $10 billion deficit. How do I reach that quick conclusion? For one thing there is no mention in the budget of the social changes which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) talked about with his provincial counterparts this past week. There is no mention of that $375 million expenditure.

There are many omissions with regard to expenditures that the government fully intends to make within the next year. The budget is only a guide for government expenditures. The Minister of Finance deliberately omitted many known expenditures that the government will incur during the next year. The social program under the Minister of National Health and Welfare is just one example that comes to mind. Expenditures in the field of transportation are another. There are many more that will crop up and, therefore, the budgetary deficit suggested will be completely erroneous.

The minister stated that we must attempt to become energy self-sufficient. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) spoke of that this afternoon. The budget dealt with three matters with regard to energy. It eased the clamp on dividends, allowing dividends to be paid as high as 8 per cent. At the same time it limited profits to 85 per cent of the base period. Therefore there will not be many companies able to pay dividends of more than 8 per cent. The limit on dividends should not have been set in the first place. This is an old habit of government ministers—creating a problem, solving it, and then expecting the Canadian public to hail them as great saviours. All they do is save themselves from their past actions.

The minister stated Canadians can look forward to a period in the future when interest rates will come down. He alluded to this several places in the budget. However, he did not state how or why they could come down other than to say that the American economy was picking up and we can take heart from that.

In the budget address the minister also stated that if you use your spare money to drill your own gas or oil well, or dig your own mine, you can write off 100 per cent of the exploration costs. That is supposed to be a bonus or gift to the oil companies and those provinces that have energy resources. It might also be a boon to those provinces which have potential in the mining industry. The minister mentioned exploration costs, but not development costs. Speaking for the oil and gas industry, that action is about 25 years too late. Had it been done 25 years ago many Canadians would have gotten into the oil industry to a much greater degree.

Another feature in the budget worthy of comment is the clause allowing Petro-Canada to pick up 25 per cent of the land in northern Canada in an attempt to Canadianize the oil industry. Why did the government not make that concession available to all Canadian oil companies, not only to the national oil company but to groups of Canadians willing to form a company and take part in exploration and development? To my mind the big question in the minds of Canadians who are concerned about this subject is: how extensive are the reserves in the north? The minister made reference to the need for more accurate reporting. The government is to demand more accurate information from the oil companies. The suggestion, I suppose, is that exaggerated claims have been made with respect to reserves or that there are reserves which have been found but not reported.

I listened to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources this afternoon and noted that he failed to deal in any way with the issue of the Mackenzie gas pipeline. Does the government want this pipeline? Two years ago the present Minister of Finance said it did—that it wanted the pipeline but was anxious to go about it in the right way. Now the dilemma is compounded by the necessity of considering a number of alternatives. There is the Polar gas route; the Arctic gas consortium wants to build a pipeline and we find a consortium which proposes to build through the Yukon and then branch into oil lines already existing in Alberta. I see that Foothills Gas is applying for a licence also. But nowhere in the budget did the government attempt to provide any degree of security for these operations, or any certainty as to the manner in which it proposed to go about settling native land claims in the region so that work might proceed and much needed resources might be brought on stream perhaps by the year 1982.

It is all well and good to talk about the energy crisis with which Canada might well be confronted in the years to come, but it is evident that the government is prepared to do very little about it other than attempt to bring greater Canadian content into the oil industry. I wish to deal with that aspect, too.

If we are faced in this country with a severe balance of payments problem and if we, in effect, import money from abroad to maintain our growth rate and the value of our dollar, we are virtually selling off a little bit of Canada each year. That is exactly what happened last year. The balance of payments went against us by some $5 billion. Foreign capital was enticed into Canada by high interest rates and it bought a little more of Canada in the process.

The government has got to set its house in order. It must reduce its expenditures. In his budget speech the minister sought to reassure us that he would try to keep federal expenditure in line with the growth in the Gross National Product. As far as I am concerned his assurances are not good enough. I saw little in the budget to convince me he was deeply concerned about the energy question. He told the House that in order to take the economy in hand he would give the Anti-Inflation Board more power by allowing the use of a different accounting system based on actual profits, something which would make it much easier for the Board to control the economy. To my mind, when I look at the economies of the six major countries in the OECD and compare what is happening there with what is happening in Canada, it becomes evident that we did not need an Anti-Inflation Board in any case.

The problem was caused mainly by the government's inept handling of the economy, and in particular by its too rapid acceleration of the money supply. It attempted to blame the unions and union demands for higher wages, but prior to last October the biggest culprits in the area of wage settlements were the public service unions, not the private sector. The public servants gained from the government larger settlements before October, 1975, than did the private sector. They were ahead by several percentage points. The government across the way created this problem and then brought in the Anti-inflation Board in an attempt to solve it. We, in turn, are supposed to hail them as some kind of saviour. Well, there is an interesting quotation in the current issue of Business Week dealing with inflation prospects:

> After a period of high inflation the inevitable result is an abortive effort to impose price controls and an eventual collapse into a managed economy.

I suggest this is what we are getting into now. We are passing through a period of control following the government's careless handling of the economy. We are passing through that stage and moving into a wholly managed economy. How much better off shall we be as Canadians? I suggest we shall all be worse off because the government consistently fails to recognize the basic needs of our society.

It is all very well for the Minister of Energy to say, as he did this afternoon, that he is putting forward an energy strategy, and outlining the use of energy in Canada and in the Western world over the past number of years. In the 70 years before the war the demand for energy in all forms grew at a rate of 3.2 per cent a year. Since the war our energy demand has grown at the rate of about 5 per cent. The minister of energy says we have to get this down to 2 per cent. How does he suggest we do so?

The Minister of Finance in his budget thought we should all get wind chargers and rely on the wind. Well, Mr. Speaker, prairie farmers know all about wind chargers. Many a prairie farmer has climbed them often and found great difficulty in storing energy in the batteries provided. Whether the government sponsors the building of huge wind chargers or not, I question whether any significant saving of energy would be realized; I suppose the minister was putting forward that idea with half a smile on his face. Storage of solar energy presents a similar problem.

The minister did not indicate how many millions of dollars the government was prepared to put into research in the area of wind energy or solar energy. He did say, though, that a tax of $100 would be placed on air conditioners because air conditioners in automobiles used up more gas. He thought the tax would discourage the use of such air conditioners. Mr. Speaker, it will not discourage the use of one air conditioner in one automobile. It is nothing but an added tax on those who feel that they need, or can afford, an air conditioner.

The same applies to the tax on heavier automobiles. It will not discourage to any noticeable extent the use of heavier automobiles, particularly in the part of the country from which I come. Before the minister gets that statement wrong, let me make it abundantly clear that on many of our rural roads in Canada heavier automobiles are sought by many people, since with a higher clearance they stand up to the bumps and rough gravel much better than some of the smaller cars. The minister is really placing a tax on the people who want to drive heavier automobiles. This is a tax that will reap his department an additional $35 million; it is really an added tax. This tax will fall mostly upon the members of the agricultural industry, who use rural roads and I suppose feel they need a heavier car.

Getting back to the subject of energy, at no place in his budget is there any encouragement for the use of coal to a greater extent. The minister of energy this afternoon also made no mention of this. Nova Scotia, for example, derives all its electricity from oil-driven generators. I do not blame Nova Scotia for this because at one time oil was a pretty cheap commodity; in fact it was so for about 40 years. Did the minister outline in his budget some of the dangers of this state of affairs continuing? Did he mention how much coal Canada has? Did he allow for a bonus if the maritimes switched to coal-driven generators? No, Mr. Speaker, the budget makes no mention of that.

It is interesting to note how much coal was used in days gone by. Up until 1940 70 per cent of the world's energy was generated by the use of coal. Today the world uses twice as much energy derived from oil and gas. I think in the long term the situation must be reversed; more and more must we make greater use of coal.

How does Canada stack up against the rest of the world in economic matters? I see Your Honour is about ready to rise, so let me conclude my remarks briefly by saying that four of the six major countries that are members of the OECD are doing better than Canada, namely, the United States, Germany, Japan, and France. All of this is being accomplished without any use being made of an anti-inflation board or the kind of rigid controls that the government has imposed upon Canadians as a result of its own carelessness in the last two years.

[Translation]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, during the budget debate last spring, my remarks dealt almost exclusively with the textile problems in Canada and on looking them over, I find great progress has been made since then.

I had then suggested three methods likely, it seemed to me, to improve the textile situation. Firstly, that the Textile and Clothing Board's recommendations, following an investigation in a textile sector where it is proven beyond any doubt that the Canadian textile industry has been injured, should be accepted as such by the Canadian government. Secondly, that the Textile and Clothing Board become a permanent board. Thirdly, that we decide once and for all the share of the Canadian market for the Canadian textile producers.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that if we were to realize those three means of action I had detailed, there could be a tripartite meeting with government, management and labour to examine in depth the issue of the textile and clothing industry in Canada, with a view to developing a common objective and in the shortest possible time a real national textile policy in Canada.

Perhaps it is not necessarily because of this speech that, twelve months later, it was considered important to proceed with that suggestion. Nevertheless more than a month ago the Canadian government decided, to establish a committee to examine the textile situation in Canada and submit recommendations before the end of this month to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce prior to the development of a Canadian textile policy.

I want to congratulate the minister for having taken that initiative and having, somehow answered the wishes expressed repeateadly by the textile workers, that is, specifically, that the government should adopt a truly Canadian policy in that area to spare the textile workers the continuous uncertainties that have existed for so many years.

The problems brought up in last year's discussions are exactly the same this year. And the solutions proposed at that time still seem to be applicable, as far as I can see. Since the textile policy was announced in 1970, we have been under the impression that the recommendations of the then minister were not implemented and that no real progress has been made.

How is it, Mr. Speaker, that every now and then we have to come back to Parliament to remind people that all is not well in that area, that the Textile and Clothing Board has produced still another report, adding to the scores of reports already published and that, in the final analysis, most of these studies and recommendations, whether they are implemented or not, have done little to remedy the situation in this industry?

When I am told that steps are being taken to cope with some of the difficulties, when in fact every year the number of jobs is decreasing and competition is stiff from abroad, and not only from under-developed countries but from the United States, I wonder whether those people who handle textiles in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce really and truly want to help that industry progress.

I appreciate the announcement made by the minister a few weeks ago, specifically, that a special committee was being set up to look into the situation in the Canadian textile industry. A quick survey of the last six years reveal that good intentions were very ably expressed on several occasions but that, actually, the industry perhaps does not even fare as well as it did a few years ago. We are justified to reserve our judgment on the final brief which should be tabled within thirty days or so. It certainly is the responsibility of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) to determine what kind of textile policy we should have in Canada, and this must be done in cooperation with Canadian manufacturers, textile workers, importers, exporters and the government.

● (2130)

Without the participation of all these people, it is very possible that the new Canadian textile policy will not reflect the real situation of that manufacturing sector. In the last year, in several parts of Canada and particularly of Quebec, many unions have studied the domestic situation very seriously. I have had the opportunity many times to meet textile workers during seminars and study sessions in the constituency I have the honour to represent in this House. Each time, I met workers who are aware of the problem caused very often by imports on the domestic market.

Very recently, the Centrale des syndicats démocratiques produced an in-depth study on the textile industry in Canada, which affects more than 200,000 workers, more than half of them being in Quebec. The area of the Eastern Townships is dominated to a very large extent by the textile industry and the economic health of this area still depends on the vitality of the textile industry. Now, it is very easy to have a fairly precise idea of the economy in the Eastern Townships when we see that the textile industry has been affected for several years by a very ill-defined policy in relation with the importation of foreign textiles on the domestic market.

On several occasions, over the years, I had the privilege of meeting the textile workers and each time, they told me about the enormous difficulties they have in this industry, and they have always tried to make us aware of the problems they face, not only myself but all those who have a responsibility to act at any level, whether at the public level, at the level of civil servants or at the level of legislators.

The excellent paper recently prepared by the CSD on the difficulties in the Canadian textile industry, in which they make a final attempt, was brought to the attention of legislators and the general public. A large effort was made, Mr. Speaker, to make the government concerned about the real causes of the difficulties and problems facing the textile industry in Quebec, mostly in the Eastern Townships.

The government would do better considering in a positive way the findings of the paper made public a few weeks ago already by the Centrale des syndicats démocratiques which deals rather thoroughly with all aspects of the problem we are faced with in this extremely important domestic industry. Several short term solutions are proposed in this paper, but long term alternatives are also taken into consideration. It is interesting to note that the suggestions made last year in the House reappear in one form or another in the recommendations which followed certain studies made across the country, especially in Quebec, on the way to improve the conditions of workers in the Canadian textile industry.

Obviously we must find a long term global strategy for this industry, I mean a development strategy which would enable the Canadian textile industry to become really competition-oriented. This industry has never been given the opportunity to become competitive and stand up to foreign goods.

As I have said previously, the Eastern Townships are dominated by the textile industry. In fact over 20 per cent of all industrial jobs in Quebec depend directly or indirectly upon it. In the Eastern Townships, this ratio is even higher in some cases and reach over 50 per cent. We should be concerned about the future of these areas where this sector employs such a large proportion of workers if we consider that the textile industry in general has not during the last few years grown according to the expectations of the early 70's.

One must add, in the same breath, that in 1970 the textile industry was given a certain direction which was a few years later sort of put aside by an importation policy obviously contrary to the bills passed by Parliament. Some time ago, we tried to change the textile industry into a consistent and dynamic industry so that it could eventually compete, but when one realizes the present conditions of this industry, and the lack of encouragement from government policies, one feels that it would be catastrophic at this time to allow exchange liberalization in this industry.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

If we do not protect the textile industry against foreign competition, we might well find, within a few years, an industry almost dead or so weak that it would not be able to outlive any effect of competition. For now, we must absolutely forget about exchange liberalization because this industry itself has no defence. On equal terms, it would be fair if the textile industry could compete on the international level, but as it is in an unfavourable position to begin with, it is cruel and unfair not to give the appropriate tools to an industry which we want prosperous and dynamic.

Some officials are reported to have been entrusted a few months ago by a cabinet committee with a complete review of the Canadian textile policy. Over a month ago, a Senate committee was conducting a study on the textile situation in Canada. More recently, about a month ago, a committee was set up to look into the whole Canadian textile industry and to report before June 30. The terms of reference of the special advisory committee appointed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, whose report is to be submitted by June 30, was instructed to look into the present conditions, the outlook and the trade position of the textile and clothing industry, to review the policy with regard to competitive imports, and also to consider the opportunity, under the present legislation and instruments, of implementing a policy with regards to paragraphs 3 and 4 of the 19th GATT agreement, and to report its conclusions and recommendations to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce by June 30, 1976.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that all the reports of those committees, commissions and task forces which will be submitted very shortly, will not remain a dead letter. We should not once again give glimmers of hope to textile workers and union members. People do not always live on glimmers of hope, and for so many years, that is what has been happening in this area. It is also time that someone answered some stupid comments made recently by two Canadian high officials who admitted in rather clear terms that the textile industry should eventually disappear or be considerably reduced in Canada.

Mr. Raynauld, president of the Economic Council of Canada and Mr. Joe Morris, president of the largest labour congress in Canada made those comments without really knowing the problem. The day when we no longer have a textile industry in this country, we will no longer have a viable industry in Canada. We will then have to pay a lot more for our clothing than we do at present.

The Canadian textile industry has a tremendous potential if it is allowed to develop as it can. Salaries have increased and even though they do not compare with those paid in other sectors, they are nevertheless interesting. There is also another matter I would like to raise briefly, and it has to do with the labelling and the enormous frauds that the Department of Trade, Industry and Commerce apparently fails to see. In certain cases, it was pointed out that "Made in Taiwan" labels and "Made in Korea" labels were exhanged and simply replaced with "Made in Canada" labels. Goods not made in this country were labelled as such and displayed in Canadian stores; that is what is known as outright fraud.

The department of Manpower is involved in the textile industry and so is the Department of National Revenue, through customs and excise, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Labour and many others. But when you get down to the bottom of it, you really wonder whether one of those departments can, through its own policy, allow the textile industry to make progress. As has been pointed out in last year's intervention, the problem may be easier than it is believed. What the textile industry and the workers in that sector are asking for is the assurance of an increasing part of the market to eventually reach 75 or 80 per cent of the Canadian market.

Now, Canadian manufacturers have 46 per cent of our market. The government, through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, indicates that close to 75 per cent of the market is controlled by Canadian manufacturers. Which of the two are we to believe? We do not even know, statistically speaking, whether those 46 per cent of the Canadian market the textile workers say they hold or the 75 per cent the government says belongs to the Canadian manufacturers are true figures. It is startling to note a difference of 30 per cent between the figures quoted by one and those quoted by the other.

We must therefore after all be happy that a detailed study is now being conducted on the future prospects of the textile industry and that if it truly has a future, the government will review its business policy and its global policy in this area, provided of course it really wants this sector, which is so important for Quebec and all of Canada, to survive. It is essential that the government stop allowing the countries who are much better placed to do so to compete against domestic industries.

A little over a year ago, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) told textile union members who had come to Ottawa that the government had no intention of letting the textile industry die out. However, when we see that imports have increased, that the Canadian share of the market is not even 50 per cent, if we believe this figure, we must ask ourselves if all the necessary action is being taken to allow this industry to live or to survive.

In the textile area, there has been a higher productivity rate than in any other industrial sector since 1953. And in 20 years, this sector has had lower prices than any other sector. In my humble opinion, there are certainly solutions to the problems that I have just described. There are answers to all the complaints that have been made these last few years, but to this day, the answers have not been satisfying for the simple reason that the government does not follow up on what it says.

A great part of our imports now come from the United States. Yet we are well aware that the Americans can compete very strongly on the Canadian market. We must give our manufacturers the means to defend themselves. If we want true competition, let us give Canadian producers a useful instrument to allow them to compete efficiently and equally, and I am convinced that the Canadian producers will fare well.

At the present time, one of the great problems of the textile industry is the lack of information and discussion among the various levels. We are told that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has some 25 employees dealing day after day with the textile industry. Those 25 employees must make sure that the 200,000 workers in that sector earn a decent living. I sincerely believe that if those 25 individuals really want to look conscientiously and dynamically after that sector, they will have done much for the textile industry.

From now on, we will have to check whether the persons dealing with the textile industry, at any level whatever, especially at the federal level, make the necessary suggestions to the pertinent department for the development of that sector. On several occasions in recent years the government has indicated its intention of helping Canadian industry. Is it necessary to point out that the textile industry is 90 per cent Canadian. The fine intentions and kind words stated during those last years must now be translated into action.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) stated that one of the best ways to increase industrial productivity is to encourage the development of high technology and innovative new processes. He then went on to say that this is a high risk business and a difficult one into which to attract venture capital. However, the result of this statement by the minister was only a promise to have his officials study this matter on a priority basis, whatever and whenever that might be.

In comparison to this lukewarm decision to make a study into something which he says is important, may I read into the record the official position of the Progressive Conservative party:

> The Progressive Conservative Party believes expenditures on research and development are capital expenditures—investments in the future. We believe that, like all investments, if wisely made they will yield tremendous dividends. Our party has faith in Canada and the skills of Canadians and would make large-scale productive investments in science and technology.

We have a commitment and a belief. Let us compare it to the statement in a press release from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce on May 10, 1976, to the effect that after providing more than $220 million in research and development funds to do something for Canadian companies during the last nine years, the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act will end this year.

The budget also referred to some deductions for small business. The minister indicated that these measures would significantly benefit all small- and medium-sized corporations. I should like to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to members of this House that these promises of measures which will be of some small assistance to small business do not go to the core of the problem and of course will do nothing to help research and development which is so desperately needed if we are to expand the industrial base in this country. Canada needs a good research and development policy. Canada needs an industrial strategy unless we are to settle for a role as a second or third class industrial and scientific community.

On June 9, 1975, a member on the government side, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook), stated that a national science policy for Canada of grand design has been seriously considered for many years by all interested parties, especially since science and technology began to dominate our lives after World War II as the spearhead for all society and our whole way of life. He said there has also been criticism in Canada of such a policy, mainly in that we have not been able to formulate one and therefore we have tended to fall behind other nations in scientific, political economic clout.

In September of 1975 the part-time minister, or as was explained earlier this session in a debate on science, the minister who spends four hours per week on science and technology, announced the publication of a report entitled "The Availability of Risk Capital for Technological Innovation and Invention in Canada". This report indicated what he says is a severe shortage in Canada of high risk investment which should be available to support technological ventures because we do not have the incentives for people to invest in high risk investments.

What do we have? We have some foreign controlled groups, mostly American, coming in and buying out our technology and our companies. There are not the incentives for Canadians to do this. A few years ago the government indicated that it would slow down the process, and of course it introduced FIRA. What has happened is that under the Foreign Investment Review Act about 85 per cent of all applications by foreign-controlled consortiums to buy Canadian companies have been approved by the government. So really the government has not done very much. There has been a lot of talk and much hot air but not much of substance has been provided. In the area in which it has proudly proclaimed it spent $220 million in research and development funds since 1967 to some 3,000 Canadian companies, it has now decided to wipe that out.

● (2150)

The Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act made its debut in 1967 to provide for the payment of outright cash grants, based on expenditures in Canada for scientific research and development by a taxable corporation in its fiscal year. The Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act also provided grants to universities, colleges, research institutions, and non-profit Canadian corporations. Those grants were exempt from income tax in order to emphasize that they were an additional incentive offered to Canadian industry and were designed to supplement the normal deductions of all research and development expenditures allowed under the Income Tax Act. Now, as part of these draconian cuts in government spending that we have heard so much about, IRDIA has been dropped. In order to try to gain some measure of restraint today, the government has cut out possible growth in the future arising from a scientific and technologically superior industrial base.

The IRDIA program was the only government assistance program that I am aware of that gave support to new business, except perhaps in the special DREE areas, and it is one of the very few programs that gave capital equipment assistance at any time. This was particularly helpful to small businesses as a new venture incentive where capital was necessary because of the technology involved.

The response to the program over the years has been warm. Many Canadian companies have applied for grants. The response to the repeal of this act was overwhelming.

[Mr. Dick.]

The Chairman of the Science Council of Canada has countered that technology based industries in Canada must be accorded a National priority. The Chairman of the Department of Geology at the University of Toronto has stated that, just as earth sciences became most exciting, funds for Canadian research were cut. The Chairman of the Science Policy Committee of the Canadian Association of Physicists has stated that Canadian physics is in a depression. The Chairman of the Department of Medical Genetics at the University of Toronto has said:

> The government's policy in this respect could produce serious repercussions by undermining the quality of the universities, restricting opportunities for young people and limiting our ability to meet the challenges of our technological society and that Canada is indeed on the way to becoming a second or even a third-rate scientific community.

The Chairman of the Department of Medical Genetics at the University of Toronto was perhaps speaking in the area in which he has most knowledge, but he stated something that applied to all young people in Canada when he said that this action of the government will have "serious repercussions by undermining the quality of universities". But most important, Mr. Speaker, is the following phrase, "restricting opportunities for young people". We cannot employ the young people in our country today. There are people with Ph.Ds who cannot get jobs; there are engineers who cannot find employment; there are people with B.As who cannot work in any of fields for which they have been trained, and this is because we are expanding our industrial base rather than our scientific and research base.

Not so very long ago the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy under the chairmanship of Senator Maurice Lamontagne made an exhaustive study of Canada's research and development efforts with respect to this country's economic needs, and issued a three volume report entitled "A Science Policy for Canada". The third volume recommended that Canada should steadily increase its support of research and development and achieve by 1980 a figure of 2.5 per cent of our gross national product. A corresponding increase should have been made for support of basic research.

A recent Statistics Canada survey of "leading performers" showed that the in-house research and development expenditures as a percentage of the gross national product have declined in terms of current dollars to about .37 per cent in 1973 from .44 per cent in 1967. Mr. Speaker, .37 per cent is a long way from the 2.5 per cent which was predicted as needed if we were going to be a first class technology based industrial nation.

For some reason we have not been able to formulate a national science policy. The government has not put forth a science policy, and we have tended to fall behind all other nations in scientific-political-economic clout. We live in a more and more technical society and must make judgments on areas such as food supply, pollution, population control, energy resources, and nuclear disarmament. The decisions made by Canada are limited by our appreciation of what science can and cannot achieve.

With regard to industrial technology we have a minister who is urging Canadian businessmen to go outside Canada to form joint ventures with the Third World and export back to Canada something which is just taking jobs away from Canadians, as has happened under Bill C-179 in the twenty-ninth parliament. I know of a certain factory in my constituency of Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton which went out of business because of it. Some 400 people were formerly employed there.

What we should be doing is staying in our own country, developing what we have. We are not doing much to encourage development of manufactured products in this country. If we are to maintain a strong industrial base then we can assist others, but if we weaken our home base surely we are going to be in grave danger.

The OECD has indicated that of the 12 countries spending various percentages of their Gross National Product on research and development, Canada stands tenth, behind the United States, France, United Kingdom, Sweden, Germany, The Netherlands, Belgium, Japan, and Norway. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may call it ten o'clock and continue at the next calling of this debate.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON STUDY OF EFFECT OF REMOVAL OF FREIGHT SUBSIDY ON WHEAT AND FLOUR FOR EXPORT

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the fifth, sixth, or perhaps even the seventh time that on the late show of this parliament I have raised the question of the proposal under Bill C-87 to do away with the subsidies on the transportation of flour and ground cereals through Atlantic and eastern Canadian ports under the Railway Act.

One of the advantages of being so persistent—along with other members who have done the same thing—is that it seems on the late show we have tended to find out where the issues really are. After talking and arguing with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson), and all of the hon. gentlemen I brought into the picture on the late show, I gather it really boils down to the fact that the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce are very much in my corner, and the President of the Treasury Board is willing to pat me on the head and say he is in my corner because it is a substantial issue, but he knows that he has to carry out the financial mandate of the government. The Minister of Transport is squarely against me.

On the other hand the Minister of Transport has made this much of a concession, that since the debate started—not before the debate started—we have had smuggled into this issue the question of the unit train concept, that is, that there would be a train which would leave some Saskatchewan or Manitoba grain point every so often and make its way to Halifax, or to Saint John, for that matter, and there unload its cargo for delivery overseas. So this much at least we have got of the Minister of Transport.

Now, mind you, we have no guarantee that this is going to happen, and it is because we have no guarantee that I continue to put my skeptical six foot four inch self up in the House of Commons from time to time to try to argue this issue. I think it is important to the port of Halifax, but also the port of Saint John, to the port of Montreal, to any number of communities in Ontario where there are flour mills, and to the wheat producers of western Canada.

Lest somebody should ever dare to tell me that I am arguing a very special interest to the port of Halifax, this has been discussed in an article which is part of a series of articles written by Ian Thompson, who is the transportation reporter for the Halifax Chronicle-Herald and for the Mail-Star, and who I think has done a pretty fair job of trying to analyse the situation. These articles can be found in those two newspapers for the week of approximately May 20 to May 26. In any event, quoting from the last part:

> In 1975 the St. Lawrence Seaway handled about 450 million bushels of wheat from Canadian and American fields, more than 20 times that which went through the Port of Halifax.
> Even if Halifax were operated to capacity and the additional business was taken from the Seaway, river ports would still be left with over 400 million bushels, more than six times that of a busy Halifax.

So I hope by putting that fact as succinctly as I could on record it is evident that I am not trying to argue that Halifax should have any enormous advantage over Montreal or any other place like that. I am not, but I am arguing, I will continue to argue, and perhaps I will be arguing into August because that is how strongly I feel about clause 15 of Bill C-87. Halifax at least should be permitted its legal place in the Canadian sun. It need not be permitted a great, great place, but at least nothing which is less than other places enjoy.

I asked the Minister of Agriculture my question the other day, and it is his minion who will be replying tonight. The question I asked was: what about the studies which are being carried out in the Department of Agriculture? Obviously the Minister of Agriculture looked at me with a friendly eye. As a matter of fact, both of them were friendly the other day when he answered my question. I do not know what kind of response I will receive tonight from the person who reports for him, but the fact is that there have been studies carried out there, and very properly.

There should have been studies carried out within the Department of Agriculture on the effect of the proposed cutting out of that particular subsidy under section 272 of the Railway Act. The minister is obviously in my corner, but he also obviously is not here tonight. However, I am just hoping that he and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will start to exert a greater amount of influence within the cabinet on this matter. We face Bill C-87. I put it this way—I do not mind at all having unit trains to Halifax. I can understand that; it will be a noble experiment. But let the train be in situ, as it were, in operation, before something which means so much to the waterfront of a great Canadian port is cut out.

[Translation]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on looking over the official report. I found that this matter has been discussed at least six times during the adjournment debate since April. Answers to this question have been given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on March 22, 1976, by the Minister of Transport himself on April 5, 1976, by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on April 13, by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board on April 29, 1976 and by myself on March 29 and 30. Therefore, there are very few new developments of which I can inform the House at this stage.

As regards the question that the hon. member put to the Minister of Agriculture on May 27, I can inform the House that studies are presently being carried out within the department. These studies are pursued in co-operation with the Canadian Grains Commission, the Canadian Wheat Board and other federal departments.

The Canadian Grains Commission has assured the minister on several occasions that the storage requirements in Atlantic ports will be fully safeguarded. The Canadian Wheat Board believes that Canadian grain exports will not be affected by the removal of this subsidy. Discussions have also taken place in the House about the use of unit trains for the movement of grain from the Prairies to the Atlantic ports.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that this matter is still under review and that our department, the Department of Agriculture, is giving it close attention, and that discussions are under way in order to ensure that such action will have no adverse effect. The minister has already made these undertakings to the Canadian National Millers' Association.

THE QUEEN—DATE OF STATEMENT ON PLANS TO CELEBRATE HER MAJESTY'S SILVER JUBILEE

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to draw the attention of the House to the fact that 1977 will mark the Silver Jubilee of our Queen's reign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schumacher: What an occasion for celebration, the celebration of Thanksgiving for the 25 years of Her Majesty's service and dedication to her peoples, service given in love, without any reward save that of knowing that she has accomplished thoroughly and well that which, as the young princess, she promised to do on her twenty-first birthday: that all her life, long or short, would be dedicated to our service. Has ever a vow been more conscientiously or faithfully maintained?

The Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) told the House that a committee is working on plans to celebrate this event in Canada and that he may be in a position to make a statement to the House some time this month as to plans for celebrating this great event. Seeing that the plans for the celebrations in the United Kingdom were announced last December, it is evident that Her Majesty's Canadian ministers are already well behind the times.

I venture to make some suggestions to the committee on behalf of the average Canadian who loves his sovereign lady and who, perhaps more important, has a profound respect for the role played by the institution of the Crown—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schumacher: —that democratic system we cherish, embodied in the constitutional monarchy. That average Canadian, Mr. Speaker, would like to see celebrations both of substantial importance and of symbolic significance.

To deal with the first, I suggest that the government take upon itself, maybe with the helpful advice of loyal societies such as the IODE, the Monarchist League, the United Empire Loyalist Association, and the Royal Canadian Legion, the task of disseminating widely across Canada information about the role played by the Crown in our lives. By the end of 1977 every child should have gained a new perspective on our system of government, and doubtless many of their elders will have learned a few things too.

This widespread distribution of information should naturally be complimented by a host of symbolic events up and down the breadth of this dominion—national services of Thanksgiving in churches and synagogues across the country; a national bonfire coast to coast on the evening of the accession; fireworks displays on Victoria Day; dedication or re-dedication of federal parks, buildings and other sites in honour of our Queen; the enshrining by statute of "God Save the Queen" as the Royal Anthem and "O Canada" as the National Anthem; the issuance of a special stamp and coin series and the appropriate replacement of the present abstract design which appears in lieu of Her Majesty's portrait on pre-stamped envelopes; a symbolic meeting of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada—after all, we are the only commonwealth country to have its own privy council—and, finally, a full royal tour. Let us not confine our Queen to Ottawa, but remember that as Queen of all Canada she should be allowed to visit, however briefly, all parts of her realm, for it is all sections of this dominion which desire to do her homage.

When Her Majesty comes to Ottawa, I trust that her government will see to it that an opportunity is given for the Queen of Canada to perform in public the important constitutional duties of our sovereign; to open or to prorogue a parliament, and to give Royal Assent to bills. In this way our constitutional abstraction is made a living reality.

Mr. Paproski: How about making Stanley a Privy Councillor?

Mr. Schumacher: That would be all right.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Which Stanley?

Mr. Paproski: Stanley Knowles.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schumacher: In all of this, Mr. Speaker, it must be evident that the government has to give the lead, if not itself actually organize these events to which I have referred. 1977 offers Canada a real chance to show to ourselves and to our commonwealth colleagues that we take second place to no one in the affection and in the pride we bear our beloved Queen. Long may she reign!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on the subject matter raised by the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher), that of Her Royal Majesty's silver jubilee and how Canada intends to celebrate our sovereign's anniversary, I can assure this House that the question is presently under active study by officials of the Secretary of State's Department. It will be appreciated that, in such matters as royal visits, a great deal of consultation is necessary. I am also informed that a number of recommendations will be presented to cabinet during the course of this summer.

ENERGY—DISPUTE BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND QUEBEC OVER CHURCHILL FALLS POWER—ACTION OF MINISTER

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, on March 31 I questioned the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) about the dispute between the provinces of Newfoundland and Quebec with regard to the request by Newfoundland to recall some 800 megawatts of electric power from the Churchill Falls power station, a portion of the 5,225 total production which was negotiated for sale to Quebec by the previous government of Newfoundland.

The power is urgently required to develop the Lower Churchill-Gull Island site, particularly for the construction of transmission lines in the tunnel, in order to transmit same for the needs of the province in its future development, the creation of jobs and, indeed, to help Canada in its vital energy requirements.

Under a 65 year contract signed with Hydro Quebec in 1969, Newfoundland is entitled to recall 300 megawatts, but the province needs 800 megawatts. It is obvious that the federal government recognizes the justification of the lower Churchill development as it offered to provide some $343 million, out of a total $1 billion, in loans to the province.

I feel that in the interest of Canada, in the words of the premier of Newfoundland, it is particularly galling that Quebec is making enormous profits from the power sold to them at a ridiculous cost. More galling to me is their refusal to act as good partners in Confederation or to contribute toward solving the national problem, particularly when this could be done without hardship to the Quebec economy. It is total blackmail when the responsible Quebec minister states that a condition for acceding to Newfoundland's request would be the sale to Quebec of land comprising the watersheds of the five rivers which rise in Labrador and which flow through Quebec into the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Under the agreement of 1969 the province of Quebec pays 3.5 mills per kilowatt hour and sell it for prices which range from 24 mills to 42 mills. While I realize that from an economic point of view Quebec cannot be blamed for taking advantage of a good thing, and that one cannot blame the previous administration in Newfoundland which might be criticized for entering into a bad deal, particularly when we recall that in 1969 predictions made by experts indicated that Canada had an abundance of energy available for use into the distant future, what I am concerned about, Mr. Speaker, is that the minister seemed to be reluctant to enter into these negotiations or to make any effort to impress on the Quebec government the need for a change in its attitude toward Premier Moore's request made in the national interest.

I emphasize that the premier has been more than co-operative. In the message he sent to the premier of Quebec he said, first, that he hoped an equitable and amicable arrangement could be concluded and that he was ready to undertake negotiations with respect to right of access to Churchill Falls power with a fairer apportionment of the benefits to both provinces. In the second place, he expressed willingness to agree to the joint development of the rivers which are common to Newfoundland and Quebec as part of the fuller use of Labrador hydro resources.

Needless to say, while the government of Newfoundland has expressed every willingness to co-operate, it is adamant in taking the position that, if the dog in the manger attitude of the Quebec government persists, there are other courses of action which can be taken. Under clause 2 (E) of the agreement giving the lessee the right to transmit throughout the province and to export such power, there is a provision that, upon the request of the Newfoundland government, its consumers of electricity shall be given priority where it is feasible and economic to do so. Unless agreement is reached the government of Newfoundland has no alternative but to institute steps to seek clarification of its legal rights, and once right of access is established the province could conceivably take the entire output of Churchill Falls.

My purpose in speaking tonight is to impress on the minister and upon the government that they should address themselves to this issue immediately rather than continue the passive interest which they have shown up to now. I say this because of the need, as a priority, to develop alternative sources of power which are available through the Lower Churchill Gull Island project so as to relieve the pressures of the energy shortage for the benefit of our nation. I ask the minister to recognize the contribution which Newfoundland could make to this end, a contribution which is being hindered by one of the Canadian partners in Confederation.

I can only hope the minister or the parliamentary secretary will express, on behalf of the government, a willingness to direct meaningful attention to this problem in the interest of Canada and of national unity.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the concern the hon. member has expressed about the difficulty Newfoundland has experienced in securing additional power supplies for Labrador and for Newfoundland itself. It is one which is shared by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) and by the federal government as a whole. That is why a little over a year ago we offered to pay, I believe, all of the financing costs of the hydro interconnection between the proposed Gull Island hydro installation and Newfoundland. So there is concern that adequate power will be available.

● (2220)

The dispute that has developed between Newfoundland and the province of Quebec is a matter for the two provinces, both of which have constitutional responsibilities in this area. I think the minister indicated, when he responded to the hon. member earlier this week, that he was willing to play any meaningful role that he could in resolving this dispute, and I understand that he will be attending the Atlantic premiers' meeting this week end. At the same time I think we must recognize that if he is invited by the two provinces concerned to mediate or negotiate a settlement of the dispute, his position will be much stronger than if he tries to impose in the circumstances. I cannot offer the hon. member any further information on the situation other than that the minister stands willing to give his assistance when and if he is asked to provide it.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

COMMEMORATION OF THIRTY-SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF D-DAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 concerning a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

On Sunday, June 6, 1976, Canadian veterans of World War II will remember the D-Day invasion of Normandy by allied forces. Unfortunately, thousands of our Canadian youth lie in graves in France because of this holocaust and it is our duty that parliament pay respect for those who fell. I therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton):

That this House gives recognition and pays tribute to war veterans who took part and to the families of those who fell on June 6, 1944 on this, the 32nd anniversary of D-Day.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House before such a motion can be introduced. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion, is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PROPOSAL TO USE SURPLUS MILK IN THE PRODUCTION OF CHEDDAR CHEESE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the extreme anger expressed by the Quebec milk producers on Parliament Hill yesterday and being fully aware of the normally tranquil attitude of the Canadian farmer who is used to adversity generated by government, bad weather and uncertain markets, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House instruct the cabinet to enable the Canadian Dairy Commission to direct our industrial milk surplus into the production of cheddar cheese by revitalizing and operating all the idle cheese factories to compete with Kraft and other companies who now have a detrimental monopoly that curtails the utilization of surplus summer milk and forces excessively high retail prices for Canadian cheddar cheese upon the Canadian consumer.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED RELEASE OF SKIM MILK POWDER FOR USE AS ANIMAL FEED IN THE WEST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Having regard to the huge supply of skim milk powder in storage in Eastern Canada, estimated at well in excess of 200 million pounds, and the fact that export sales remain at prices below 10 cents per pound as animal feed while domestic prices are being held in the 40-50 cent range, and given the fact that domestic markets are available in the West for feed grade skimmed milk powder at reasonable prices for use as milk replacer, calf starter and poultry rations, but that insufficient stocks exist there to meet the demand, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Minister of Agriculture instruct the Canadian Dairy Commission to release sufficient quantities of skim milk powder at reasonable prices to the animal feed industry to fulfil present and future demands, so as to improve the viability of this important industry and at the same time reduce feed costs to these animal producers.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST THAT PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD EXPLAIN ALLEGED INACCURACIES IN ESTIMATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion on an urgent matter. As the budgetary papers tabled on May 25 make it clear that the estimates for the fiscal year ending March, 1977 and representations made by the President of the Treasury Board are inaccurate and inconsistent with figures now produced by the Minister of Finance, and as the President of the Treasury Board has acquiesced in the tabling of supplementary estimates with respect to Loto Canada and nothing else, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That an immediate reference be made to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs at which time the President of Treasury Board be asked to explain his own gross incompetency including an explanation of the inaccuracies and inconsistencies—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 the motion cannot be put without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST GOVERNMENT ADOPT DAIRY POLICY MORE ADVANTAGEOUS TO PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an urgent and important matter.

Considering the prime importance of the agricultural industry for any self-respecting country, considering that one never knows when a serious shortfall may happen and that the European Common Market is likely to face a disastrous crop year because of the droughts now affecting the member states, and considering that faced with this situation and those factors the government cannot bring about the destruction of the dairy industry, the major Quebec agricultural industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle):

That all hon. members in this House, particularly those representing Quebec constituencies, demand that the Minister of Agriculture reconsider his position and give the milk producers the revenues they require.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON POSSIBILITY OF CHARGES AS RESULT OF INQUIRY INTO DEFRAUDING OF COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a subject which I brought out two weeks ago in the House in regard to extensive defrauding of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the one arrest to date by the RCMP of Gordon Gunn of Ottawa in this regard. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

[Mr. Stevens.]

That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Solicitor General be required to advise the House if additional investigations are now completed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the RCMP, and specifically when charges will be laid by the RCMP against further persons involved, including certain members of the head office staff of the Unemployment Insurance Commission of Canada, 222 Nepean Street, Ottawa, and at least one person at the local Ottawa office of the Unemployment Insurance Commission—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I have indicated many times in the past, I think I have to be extremely careful in those matters. A motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 should be sufficient to describe the urgency of the matter and not get into substantive debate. If the hon. member would put his motion forthwith.

Mr. Cossitt: May I conclude with these words, Mr. Speaker:

—and finally if immediate charges are not pending—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. Catharines.

CONGRATULATIONS TO ST. CATHARINES ON ONE-HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF INCORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Parent (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of the one hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of the city of St. Catharines, a proud Canadian community situated in the prosperous heartland of the Niagara peninsula, I rise to move, seconded by the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail)—

An hon. Member: He is not even here.

Mr. Parent: —under the provisions of Standing Order 43:

That this House extend to the citizens of St. Catharines its congratulations in recognition of one hundred years of achievement in education, culture, recreation, commerce and industry.

Further, I would like to invite all the honourable members of the House to visit—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion cannot be put before the House without its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Accordingly, it is moved by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent), seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme):

That this House extend to the citizens of St. Catharines its congratulations in recognition of one hundred years of achievement in education, culture, recreation, commerce and industry.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE OF CABINET DECISION ON PAYMENT OF INTEREST

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday the Minister of National Defence said that the interest charges of $100 million were considered at the cabinet meeting of November 27 but he would have to check the records to see if there was a decision. Can he now confirm the information that he gave the House yesterday?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The matter is very clear if the hon. member will follow what I have said to the House on previous occasions and to committees, all of which I am pleased to confirm once again. There are in my estimates $1,061 million for long-range patrol aircraft, and at least $107 million of this is for interest. Obviously this would not have been in the estimates if it had not been approved by Treasury Board, and Treasury Board would not approve $107 million in interest if it had not been approved by Cabinet.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON MINISTER DID NOT KNOW ON DECEMBER 2 OF INTEREST PAYMENT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): I should like to thank the minister for the openness of that statement. I direct my supplementary to the Minister of Supply and Services. The Minister of National Defence has just confirmed that the $100 million interest charge was discussed in Cabinet on November 27. Can the minister explain how he knew nothing about it on December 27. Can the minister explain how he knew nothing about it on December 2 when he sent the telex?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the Treasury Board authorized the payment of interest after December 2.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not really answer my question. Perhaps I will have better luck with my next one. The Minister of National Defence has confirmed that it was discussed on November 27 at Cabinet. I would expect he would have known by December 2, particularly as this information was reinforced by a memo of December 1 from his deputy, expressly noting that there could be $100 million in interest charges. Can the minister explain the contradiction between his ignorance of this fact and the fact that both the Minister of National Defence brought it up in Cabinet and the deputy minister told him about it in a memo the following day, or the day before December 2?

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the authorization for payment of the interest was decided by Treasury Board after December 2. The memorandum dated December 1, prepared by my officials, pertaining to the LRPA project, referred to possible cash flow problems with regard to the most cost-effective production schedule. The memorandum indicated that to respect the most efficient schedule DND could possibly resort to commercial financing. No reference was made to financial negotiations held between Lockheed and DND. A copy of this memorandum was sent to the official of DND responsible for the LRPA program. Later that day this same DND official, as well as my own officials, met with me for a briefing session in preparation for a meeting to be held with Lockheed representatives the following day. In both instances, during the briefing session of December 1 and during the December 2 meeting with Lockheed representatives, Mr. Kotchian and his associates, the Department of National Defence, which in this case had exclusive responsibility to provide financing, made no reference to financial negotiations held between Lockheed and itself. Furthermore, DND gave no indication whatsoever that it could not meet its financial obligations. At that point in time I had no apparent reason to mistrust the DND's judgment.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF VERBAL AGREEMENT AND NEED FOR INTEREST MONEY

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Yesterday the Prime Minister, when speaking of the verbal agreement, said: "Perhaps we acted imprudently but we did so in good faith based on this verbal agreement". Is the Minister of Supply and Services asking us, therefore, to believe that several other Cabinet colleagues knew of the verbal agreement and the needed interest money, but he did not? Can he produce any other minister who shared his ignorance of these two crucial pieces of information?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): I cannot speak on behalf of my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, and this is obvious.

An hon. Member: You spoke on behalf ot the Minister of National Defence.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER ATTENDED CABINET AND TREASURY BOARD MEETINGS AT WHICH MATTER DISCUSSED

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Supply and Services was a member of Treasury Board in December and has placed part of the blame on Treasury Board. Presumably, he would be on the sending and receiving end of Treasury Board advice in this matter. Did the Minister of Supply and Services attend any or all of; (a) the Cabinet meeting on November 27, (b) the Treasury Board meeting on December 1 and, (c) the Cabinet meeting on December 2?

● (1120)

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is misinformed. There was no cabinet meeting of which I know on December 2 at which this item was discussed. With regard to the reference to the Treasury Board, of course I was there. In respect of the meeting of cabinet, I was there for part of the cabinet meeting and I stated that the authorization of payments of interest was made by Treasury Board after December 2 and I was in attendance at that meeting.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I have one final supplementary for the same minister. On March 29 this year I asked the minister if he was aware of the financial difficulty of the Department of National Defence. They were having difficulty in finding money. The minister gave me a one word answer, no. This was March 29. He must have had that internal document on December 1, so can he please explain the contradiction?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There are a whole raft of contradictions.

Mr. Goyer: The hon. member can stand up and make any accusation. I can take any type of accusation. I am telling the truth, and that is all.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are an incompetent minister. You do not have the Prime Minister to protect you today.

FINANCE

REASON FOR CHANGES IN UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REGULATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the contented Minister of Finance concerning certain budgetary proposals he made a year ago. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration in committee described as a red herring those who wanted to change the UIC Act away from providing for claimants who have spent eight weeks in the labour force by saying that this would particularly affect the people in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. Specifically the minister said:

> The incidence of disentitlement or disqualification, as an effect of failure to meet one's obligation under the act, is lower amongst the group with a minor attachment to the work force—

I should like to ask the minister if that was the government's view last year and, since my information is that the evidence has not changed one whit, why has the government changed its policy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, in his statement the other day, pointed out that the careful analysis which the government has had from the Unemployment Insurance Commission about the profile of this particular group in the work force is one which has just been available to the government in recent months and which of course has been reinforced by the careful analysis the government and the country has received from the Economic Council with regard to jobs and the work force and the best way to deal with one of the priority problems in Canada.

[Mr. Goyer.]

REASON FOR BELIEVING NO INCREASE IN WELFARE COSTS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES AS RESULT OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CHANGES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, both the evidence the minister has and the views of the Economic Council are in accord with our view and that of critics of the government's change rather than the government's apologies for its announcement. I should like to ask this as a supplementary: since the Minister of Manpower and Immigration also said last year that the particular nature of the labour market in Atlantic Canada made it essential to maintain the Act as it was and said most specifically:

> . . . I think we get at the root of upgrading their opportunity rather than trying to cut them off because they are a cost or an embarrassment. They would be on welfare anyway . . .

It was his view that welfare costs were bound to increase for the Atlantic provinces if the Act were changed in this direction. I should like to ask the minister what evidence he has for believing today that welfare costs will not substantially increase in Atlantic Canada as a result of this change.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration dealt with this view fully in a statement he made in the House earlier in the week. He pointed out as I have just pointed out to the hon. gentleman—and I am not sure that any answers will persuade the hon. gentleman away from the political position he is taking—that indeed those in the work force in this particular group who would go on to the welfare rolls would be something less than 10 per cent. That estimate was based, as I said a moment ago and as the minister said the other day, on the analysis and profile that has been determined. We think it is an accurate one. I think the Minister of Manpower and Immigration reinforced the other day the concern that he expressed a year ago, as quoted by the hon. gentleman, that a far better means of policy making would be to find ways in which either by training or by other continued connections with the work force this group could be kept in the work force rather than having to go on unemployment insurance.

Mr. Broadbent: That might be encouraging if the minister did not acknowledge on television that the government has no such programs to implement and will not have them ready until the beginning of 1977.

Some hon. Members: False.

REQUEST FOR VIEWS OF PROVINCIAL PREMIERS ON CHANGES IN UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REGULATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): If the minister says this is false, he can get up and repeat that in his answer. Since his colleague had acknowledged that over 300,000 people will be affected by the change and was taking solace in the fact only 100,000 at any one time would be affected, as he said, would the minister now produce some statements to the House from the premiers of the Atlantic provinces, each and every one of whom is strongly opposed to these changes?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman is repeating the statement that the minister has given no indication of the programs coming into force. He made a speech on this question in the budget debate earlier this week. The leader of the NDP after making that kind of statement—

Mr. Broadbent: Nor will there be any programs before 1977.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —cannot continue to say that the government proposes to do nothing about it.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister made that statement on television.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is a false statement that the leader of the NDP keeps repeating, which does not make it true by reason of the fact that he repeats it all the time. The fact is that the purpose of transferring the funds is to get at the priority group, the chronically unemployed in the Atlantic provinces, and indeed elsewhere in Canada, so they can continue to have a connection with the work force or can continue to have the opportunity. This is the priority of the government. I regret it is not the priority of the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Champlain.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST OF CONFIRMATION OF MEETING BETWEEN CABINET AND REPRESENTATIVES OF FARMERS' UNION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture—apparently he is still cleaning up after the milk bath he got yesterday and since he missed the boat when he tried to solve the problem of the producers of manufacturing milk—I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he can confirm this morning that a meeting will be held on Tuesday next, according to the announcement made yesterday at the entrance of the Parliament Building, between the executive of the Quebec APU and the federal cabinet. Could the Acting Prime Minister confirm the holding of that meeting?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding they will be meeting with certain ministers of the government.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR NOT HAVING VERBAL COMMITMENT ON FINANCING CONFIRMED IN WRITING

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Supply and Services. The minister said in the House on May 28 that acting on the verbal agreement with Lockheed was a big mistake, but the Prime Minister indicated yesterday in his remarks that they did so on good faith based on this verbal agreement. Since the Prime Minister knew that the government took its formal action of sending the December 2 telegram to Lockheed based on the verbal agreement, will the minister say why the Department of Supply and Services permitted this December 2 telegram to be sent without making certain that the verbal commitment was confirmed in writing? Surely this is the sole purpose of the Department of Supply and Services.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I hate to repeat myself but I already have stated many times in the House that I was not aware to this oral agreement.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF COMPANY'S CREDIT POSITION

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. If the minister is so certain that Lockheed did make such a verbal commitment, about which he found out later, will he say whether he or his department were aware of Lockheed's credit agreement which prevented that company from borrowing more than $50 million, a fact which should have been well known to him or at least to his officials?

● (1130)

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): I think the hon. member should refer to the fact that I did not know about any oral agreement with Lockheed.

Mr. Bawden: How about their credit agreement?

Mr. Goyer: Of course, if I did know, it was because I did not expect that Lockheed was going to be asked to finance the program. This is very clear.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON COMPANY COMMITTED ONLY TO BEST ENDEAVOUR TO ARRANGE FINANCING

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): If the minister does admit that he finally learned there was a verbal agreement with Lockheed to cover the interim financing, will the minister say why in the final formal letter of commitment of March 31, which he tabled in this House, Lockheed is committed only to a best endeavour to arrange financing? Was the department or was the government at that point letting Lockheed off its verbal commitment? Was the government letting Lockheed off the hook at that point in time?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): The hon. member should change his prepared questions according to the answers he receives. The questions start with the premise that I knew about this oral agreement before December 1. I did not.

Mr. Bawden: When did you find out?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of National Defence. Due to the apparent confusion, contradiction and evasion in this whole matter, which lead to a very genuine doubt on both sides of the House relating to the matter, I wonder if the minister would agree that a reference of this matter to the Defence Committee along with the authority to that committee to call, not only the ministers concerned, but also the key civil servants in this matter is now very definitely a requirement?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must know that this subject has been examined exhaustively by the standing committee with officials present.

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF LOCKHEED CONTRACT TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the government House leader. Because the civil servants who have been castigated in this matter have never yet had the public opportunity of defending themselves and the members of this House have never had an honest opportunity to get to the bottom of the matter—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: —I wonder if the government House leader would agree that a reference of this whole matter to the Public Accounts Committee is now a very definite requirement.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker. As I said the other day, if the public servant in question has a grievance, there are ways that can be dealt with.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—TYPE OF ASSURANCES FROM NATIONAL DEFENCE ON FINANCING BEFORE TELEX SENT

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services. Is it the position of the minister that the Department of National Defence on December 2 rejected the idea that there was a financing problem, and if so, would he tell the House what kind of assurance that department gave him which led him to send that telex?

[Mr. Goyer.]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I already answered that question previously today.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—BASIS OF MINISTER'S SATISFACTION NO FINANCING PROBLEM

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the reluctance or refusal to answer my specific question I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Was the minister advised of the aide-mémoire of December 1, and if so, would he tell the House how he satisfied himself that there would be no financing problem? Does the minister have documentation to provide, or did he simply rely on wishful thinking?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the discussions at that stage were between officials of both departments. There was very close interdepartmental co-operation at that time, and I have indicated to the House on earlier occasions that my officials were involved with the officials of the Department of Supply and Services in the forming of the telegram which went on December 2.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A hell of a result.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—SUGGESTED INFORMAL BRIEFING OF MEMBERS ON DETAILS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. In the light of his remarks a moment ago with respect to a formal reference to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence would he give consideration to an informal briefing of the members of that committee and the members of the Public Accounts Committee so that we might understand a little clearer the exact implications of the subject matter which is under discussion now?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to appear before the standing committee at any time, as I have on a number of occasions, and I will go through the subject matter once again for any members who may wish me to do so.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF LOCKHEED CONTRACT TO COMMITTEE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder then if I might direct the question first posed by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham to the Acting Prime Minister. In the light of the reply of the Minister of National Defence just now would he either informally or otherwise cause the subject matter of this controversy to be referred, in the first instance, to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be desirable to do that at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: It seems to me that there are two questions involved. There is the question of cross-examination of the ministers, and this is being carried out in the question period. It could be carried on on any opposition day that the opposition may wish to take for that purpose.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: As far as public servants are concerned, it seems to me that this is a case where the ordinary procedures which are provided by laws approved by this parliament should prevail.

Mr. Horner: Somebody has to protect the civil service.

AIR CANADA

SUGGESTION MINISTER FORCE COMPANY TO REVISE LANGUAGE POLICY

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Considering that the Board of Directors of Air Canada met on Wednesday, June 2, to review the language policy of the corporation so as to pattern it along the lines of the Official Languages Act, and considering that 500 Air Canada mechanics voiced their intention of joining the corporation's pilots so that the guidelines and conditions of employment they are subject to take into account the requirements of the Official Languages Act, can the Minister of Transport inform the House whether he and Air Canada representatives had the opportunity to re-examine the corporation's regulations with respect to the Official Languages Act and the language policy he announced in Montreal on December 15, last, and whether he intends, as minister responsible for Air Canada, to urge the corporation to review the working language policy under which the corporation's mechanics operate?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this morning at nine o'clock the president of Air Canada issued a statement which reviewed the corporation's position and its endeavours to introduce the spirit of the official federal bilingual policy into Air Canada. He set out in some detail some of the difficulties and problems but also some of the steps which already have been taken and ones which will be taken. He certainly confirmed the view of the corporation that its obligation and objective is to incorporate the spirit of bilingualism, as known by this House, into its operations.

COMPANY POLICY WITH REGARD TO PILOTS USING PUBLIC ADDRESS SYSTEMS ON AIRCRAFT TO COMMENT ON BILINGUALISM

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Transport tell the House whether the management of Air Canada has any policy with respect to captains while on duty commenting about this problem which is now before parliament?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there have been several incidents in recent days of Air Canada captains or others using the address systems of airplanes for matters other than those necessary to the flights. Air Canada management has indicated to them that that is strictly contrary to policy and that their use of the public address systems on the planes is to be limited to matters necessary for flights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POSITION ON UNITED NATIONS RESOLUTION ON PROFITS FROM LAND SALES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. My question is in connection with the Habitat Conference. Would the Acting Prime Minister explain to the House the government's position in rejecting the admirable proposal put before the conference by the U.N. Secretariat that profits from land sales be returned to the community, particularly when this surplus value arises from public improvements rather than private effort, and will he also explain to what extent the rejection of the U.N.'s position arises from the control of the Canadian delegation by a former land developer and a present land developer?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I may deal with that particular question, the instructions given to the Canadian delegation at the present time are that it should not accept in an unqualified way the proposal made by the Secretariat of the Habitat Conference. As the discussion continues at the conference the Canadian delegation will be able to make its position more clear and it does not represent an outright rejection of the principle that has been proposed by the Habitat secretariat.

POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF LAND SPECULATION TAX

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what could be any more of an outright rejection than the statement made at Habitat by the Canadian delegation that this is a matter of private profit and we are not going to interfere with the system. It seems to me they are taking a pretty conclusive position and it is quite contrary to the position taken by many other countries. I should like to ask the minister if the government is prepared to bring in a full capital gains tax, if not a speculation tax, in order to control profits from land speculation particularly in view of the government's own anti-inflation program in which they say they are trying to control costs, particularly land speculation costs which are one of the most blatant examples of what is wrong with the anti-inflation program.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is obviously a budgetary matter.

ALLEGED OBJECTION OF FRANCE TO CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING IN PUERTO RICO

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. As it has been announced that Canada has been invited by the United States to a seven country economic summit meeting which will be held later this month in Puerto Rico and which is a follow-up meeting to the one held last November in Rambouillet, France, would the minister indicate the basis of France's objection to our participating in the Puerto Rico meeting and to whom were the objections made?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his own inimitable way has been following this issue and perhaps he might like to respond. It is not a budgetary matter.

Mr. Fairweather: You two are better than the other two, I can tell you that.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been no communications between the government of Canada and the government of France with respect to the position the latter may have taken concerning Canadian attendance at the economic summit in Puerto Rico. The invitation to Canada was extended to the Prime Minister by the President of the United States and we believe our presence is justified because of the natural significance of Canada as a member of the industrialized community.

REASON CANADA NOT INVITED TO ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING AT RAMBOUILLET FRANCE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, this time to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Now that we have received an invitation to the meeting in Puerto Rico which the minister indicates we are justified in receiving—and I agree—would he indicate why we were not invited to the Rambouillet meeting last November, bearing in mind that it appears rather inconsistent that we should now be invited to the follow-up meeting after having been snubbed at the original meeting in France?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my conclusion is that the international community has recognized that Canada has a rightful place at a meeting of this kind. I regard this present invitation as an acceptance by all members of the international community that Canada should be invited. It is certainly a step forward from the situation that existed at Rambouillet.

AIR TRANSPORT

KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF MR. KEENAN'S POSITION ON BILINGUALISM BEFORE APPOINTMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of certain statements in some newspapers concerning the appointment of Mr. Keenan to the effect that as the union's adviser, he had distinguished himself with his most virulent campaigns against bilingualism while serving the air pilots' union, would the Minister of Transport advise whether, before appointing Mr. Keenan, he had conducted an inquiry or was aware of his actions, and if so, why did he appoint him?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was aware of the fact that on several occasions Mr. Keenan had acted as counsel for CALPA, the pilots' association. I was also satisfied that he was qualified in terms of his knowledge of air matters, and legal matters associated with them, and that he was a very reasonable person who could approach this issue in a completely unbiased fashion, so there would be no impact upon his work from this previous association with CALPA.

[Translation]

REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF FRENCH-SPEAKING MEMBER TO KEENAN COMMISSION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

In view of the circumstances, it seems that the association of French-speaking pilots has serious doubts as to the impartiality of this commissioner. Would the minister, to give this inquiry all due credibility, review his decision and appoint also a French-speaking associate commissioner so as to meet the objective he has set for himself?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all persuaded that there has been any argument which would lead to that as an appropriate conclusion. The suggestion has been made, and on occasion it has been put in terms of a desire, to appoint a Francophone to the commission. I think it should be understood that Mr. Keenan is in fact fluently bilingual—and I mean completely and fluently bilingual. Indeed, I think if one were to do a blood test he is more Francophone than Anglophone in blood, if you are going to follow it that way. I hope the hon. member is not such a chauvinist as to suggest that it makes a difference if it is the father of his father who was Anglophone and only the mother of his mother and the mothers of his mother and father who were Francophone.

SOCIAL SECURITY

INCOME SUPPLEMENT PROGRAM—DATE OF INTRODUCTION—POSSIBILITY OF PROCEEDING UNILATERALLY

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The minister told a press conference following a two day meeting of federal-provincial health ministers that the federal government is determined to introduce an income supplement program and is prepared to do it unilaterally. A number of provinces have admitted that they cannot support the cost of such a program by 1978. Would the minister advise the House if the federal government is firmly committed to the introduction of such a program before 1978?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Darling: A supplementary question. Will the minister further advise the House if he has received full cabinet support for a unilateral introduction of an income support scheme? If this is the case, can he indicate with any precision when such a program will be in place?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I shall be quite pleased to send the hon. member a copy of the communiqué of the conference, a transcript of my press conference and photocopies of the press report on the subject—and my picture, too, if he wishes. He will find that nowhere did I say that I or cabinet had decided to proceed unilaterally. I quite clearly indicated that the government was committed to the support of the working poor in this country, that this was an area in the field of social security which had not been covered up to now; and that there was a real need to look after the working poor better. Our social security system should have a program with incentives to work, a factor which it does not have at the present time.

I then said that the preferred option of the government was to proceed on a cost-shared basis developed jointly with the provinces. Seven provinces out of ten endorsed the proposal in principle, two did not pronounce themselves; one, the province of Ontario, objected to the plan. As far as the government is concerned, we prefer to proceed on a joint shared basis on this one. If the provinces eventually come to the conclusion that they cannot or will not proceed on a cost-shared basis, I stated that we would have to seriously consider proceeding unilaterally but I did not say that we would.

ALLEGATION TREASURY BOARD MAKING REPRESENTATIONS TO ANTI-INFLATION BOARD WITHOUT INFORMING PROFESSIONAL INSTITUTE

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. It concerns the Professional Institute of the Public Service and the agriculture group arbitral award which came down on April 13. The President of the Treasury Board made representations with respect to that particular award and on May 20, the Anti-Inflation Board gave the Treasury Board its decision without communicating in any way with the institute. Can the minister advise why the Treasury Board is apparently making separate and secret representations to the Anti-Inflation Board without ensuring that the institute has an equal opportunity to be heard?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that particular incident. However, I will seek information and report to the hon. member.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It is the second incident.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we at Treasury Board have to negotiate with the unions, but at the same time the Parliament of Canada has voted a legislation which determines the levels of salaries that must be paid to all employees—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): They should be informed.

Mr. Chrétien: —and if the board contacts one of the parties, I may have no knowledge of that because I am only one of the two parties. The board therefore must face its responsibilities.

ALLEGATION OF DOUBLE COUNTING IN COMPUTING TOTAL COMPENSATION OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board is probably aware that Treasury Board has been computing total compensation by double counting of holiday time and other matters. This is a serious area of dispute between the institute and Treasury Board. Can the minister now say to this House that he will ensure that this error in computing is brought to the attention of the Anti-Inflation Board so that board is not confirming or making decisions with incorrect facts as to the computation of total compensation?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, when I was in Toronto not long ago, I met with the leaders of the unions. We discussed that fact. We were making the calculation based on the requirement of the Anti-Inflation Board. We had some discussion with the AIB on that and I understand they have changed their ruling. This is why we have been able in some cases in the past week to make a better offer. Previously, it was not our way calculating but the way the AIB was forcing us to calculate the increase.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—REQUEST FOR MORE EQUITABLE DISTRIBUTION OF PRODUCERS' QUOTAS

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

Further to an increase of $86 million under the dairy policy of 1976-77, the amount allocated to this sector just passed from $535 million to $621 million, and considering that about 48 per cent of the industrial milk producers come from the province of Quebec, does the minister have some authority in this field? If so, is he ready to take action to insure a fairer distribution of the quotas, to suppress the monthly quota and to encourage a stronger representation of the industrial milk producers on the Canadian Dairy Commission and the management committee?

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when the minister appeared before the agriculture committee he said he was prepared to meet the producers to discuss this matter.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY WILL TAKE OVER BRITISH COLUMBIA RAILWAY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. As a result of the chronic difficulties experienced by the B.C. Railway with management, labour and financing, have there been discussions with the province of British Columbia or between the CNR and the province of British Columbia in order to work out an arrangement by which CNR could assume ownership of that railway?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know of no such discussions. The subject matter did come up on one occasion when I happened to be with the premier of British Columbia, but not in a serious way. I do not know if the matter has been followed up.

Mr. Oberle: As the railway only operates about 50 per cent of the time because of the difficulties I have mentioned, is there any way by which the Department of Transport or CNR can intervene in order to save some of the key industries in that part of the country such as the wood fibre industry and the energy industry which are dependent on this railway to bring their products to market?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, at the present time it is a matter within the jurisdiction and control of the government of British Columbia. I indicated there have been no discussions that I know of pursuing an alternative arrangement. I should say to the hon. member that if British Columbia shows any real interest in such alternative arrangements, I am perfectly willing to discuss it.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA

ACCIDENT TO TRUCK CARRYING URANIUM 235 AND STRONTIUM 89—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSURE SAFETY

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. At 5:30 a.m. on June 2 on Highway 17, an AECL truck carrying a 6,700 pound cannister of solid uranium 235 overturned in a single car accident, following which the driver was charged. Is there any review being made with regard to the condition of drivers before they get into their trucks so that we can avoid this hazardous transportation of radioactive fuel?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to make a judgment on the condition of the driver. I am in the position of being able to say that the driver, Mr. Gallagher, escaped without serious injury. The shipping flask containing the radioactive material remained secured to the truck bed and was not damaged. An instrument check confirmed that there was no leakage of radiation. The container was transferred to another truck for onward transport to AECL's South March plant. This unfortunate incident was quickly remedied and the radioactive material which was going forward for processing into medical supplies continued on its way very quickly.

Mr. Dick: Also on board that truck was a further package carrying strontium 89, a radioactive material, which was in a glass vial and packed in a styrofoam and plywood box. Can the minister advise whether that is sufficient safeguard? I might say that the second package was added to the truck at the last moment.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that there was no danger to public safety in the transporting of these materials.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CONCENTRATION OF DANGEROUS CHEMICALS IN GREAT LAKES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ELIMINATE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, I will put my question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the fact that over $280 million has been spent by the Great Lakes Water Quality Program with little or no progress, as outlined in the latest report by the International Joint Commission, and because of the high density presence of dangerous chemicals such as PCB and others which continue to increase in large quantities and at least one of which is known to cause cancer, can the parliamentary secretary explain to this House how and why these dangerous chemical concentrates were allowed to reach this present unacceptable level and, more important, what immediate steps the government intends to take to eliminate these and future dangers which potentially could affect over 30 million North Americans living around the Great Lakes?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has noted the report. He should note that as far as the presence of PCB's in the Great Lakes is concerned, four times the amount that comes into the Great Lakes from waste water systems in Canada comes from the air. That is a very important point. We as a government can make restrictions on non-electrical uses of PCB's and, in the future, a no-use of PCB's even for electrical uses. That is fine, Mr. Speaker, but when you look at the total amount of PCB's in the Great Lakes, the amount that falls from the air is of great importance. It take two to tango and the United States, as the report shows, is the greatest polluter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary for his speech, even though it did not relate to my question. In view of the seriousness of this matter, I will direct my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of these potential dangers that now exist in the Great Lakes, and because of the sluggish progress being made by the International Joint Commission, can the Acting Prime Minister advise this House whether the government would consider or is considering the introduction and implementation of far stiffer penalties to industries and municipalities which continue to dump new types as well as old types of pollutants into our rivers and lakes?

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker, we are considering it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED CONDEMNATION OF CANADA'S NUCLEAR POLICY AT HABITAT CONFERENCE—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the statements made by the Co-chairman of the Symposium on Development, Maurice Strong of Petro-Can, and Barbara Ward in which both condemn Canada's nuclear policy. In view of these statements by these eminent persons, and in view of the growing feeling at the Habitat Conference in condemnation of Canada's nuclear policy, would the minister advise us whether any active task force is presently reviewing that policy and whether the House can expect recommendations in the near future concerning a change in that policy having regard to the world-wide condemnation it has evoked.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I differ from the hon. member's assumption that the Habitat forum singled out Canada for particular reference. What I understood was that the forum called for a moratorium on the transfer of nuclear technology. I believe the forum ought to set itself more achievable objectives than objectives which at the present time are unattainable internationally.

POSSIBILITY OF CANADA REQUESTING MORATORIUM ON NUCLEAR SALES AT SUPPLIERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): I understand at the present that Canada is meeting in London with other members of the nuclear suppliers group. Are any specific proposals being made by the Canadian representatives at that meeting for a moratorium applicable not only to ourselves but to other suppliers until there is better agreement on this subject?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. I have already stated that in my view such a goal is unachievable.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege having to do with a statement made earlier in the House by the Minister of Finance. I can well understand the minister trying to weasel out of the implications of his own budget with particular reference to the harm it will do to the unemployed in Canada, but I cannot accept his imputation that I uttered a falsehood in the House of Commons. I said earlier in the question period—and I repeat—that the government has not indicated that it has programs ready to create new jobs with specific application to the changes made in the Unemployment Insurance Act. This meant, now—this year.

Further, I said that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, speaking on television the other night, stated that such programs would not be forthcoming until next year. If I remember more precisely, he referred to January, 1977. I call upon the minister to reconsider his comment—the imputation that what I said was a falsehood. He should be defensive about his budget, but he should not accuse people on this side of the House in a way which questions their honesty, when in fact I was repeating statements made by his own colleague.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, both inside the House and outside it, has stated at some length that he will be presenting programs additional to those already proposed for the purpose of dealing with direct employment measures and further retraining, together with other measures of that kind, as set out in his speech. I suggest to the hon. member that he read the speech as a start. When the hon. member says that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has not put that position forward in the House, I say that is a false statement.

Mr. Broadbent: I said for this year.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The next question is whether the leader of the NDP is deliberately misleading the House and attempting deliberately to mislead the country by what he is saying, or whether he is saying it because he does not know any better. We do have a parliamentary custom in this country, according to which I have to assume he is not deliberately trying to mislead the House. Because of that custom, I must assume he is saying it because he does not know any better. In any case, it does not matter what his motives are: I accept that he is just uninformed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Rather than a pure question of privilege, this seems to be something of a disagreement between two members and perhaps the matter can be pursued in some other way.

Mr. Fairweather: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I cannot think of any other avenue through which to raise the matter of the extraordinarily excellent police services which were provided yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: I believe most people would be impressed by the coolness and the efficiency of the protective staff, the RCMP and the Ottawa police.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: This in no way judges or prejudges the merits of the case the demonstrators were putting before the government.

Mr. Speaker: With respect to the point of order just raised by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, may I say that were it not for the fact that I bear ultimate responsibility for that force and, indeed, for all those who serve in the House of Commons on a regular basis in connection with our security, I would have made a similar comment. However, I thought that if I made it from the chair it might appear to be a little self-serving.

However, I may say I was impressed by the quality of the performance yesterday, in very trying circumstances, by the Sergeant-at-Arms who is responsible for the security in this building and, indeed, by the RCMP special force which he called into play, a force which seemed to me to act with dignity and tact in most difficult circumstances. They deserve to be congratulated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to something which occurred during the question period today. I refer to the difficulty which seems to be apparent, and the mud in the sense of the lack of clarity in the government's position with respect to the knowledge of the Minister of Supply and Services in this whole matter. I do so, and I hope the President of the Privy Council will accept it in this way because what is happening here is that the government's refusal to answer the request of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham and the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East is affecting the operations of the House of Commons. Moreover, what has occurred during the last few days has affected the very important relationship which ought to exist between the government and the public service. I rise on this point of order because the President of the Privy Council was himself a public servant and ought to be aware of the situation. Therefore, I hope he will consider what I propose to deal with by way of a point of order.

The facts of the case thus far—at least those which are ascertainable—are that on December 1, 1975, the Minister of Supply and Services received an aide-mémoire from his deputy minister which dealt with a number of things, but particularly with financing.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The aide-mémoire said that the cash flow requirement—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am, of course, presuming that the hon. member intends to proceed to the point of order as quickly as possible, and I should like to have the opportunity of hearing him do so.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The aide-mémoire said that the cash flow requirements for the most cost-effective production schedule exceeded the amounts that DND could provide in the early years of the contract. That is a quotation from a memorandum to the minister, from the deputy minister, on December 1, 1975.

Some hon. Members: Prove it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yet when he answered on March 29, 1976—

An hon. Member: Do you have any gum-shoes?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre put a question to the minister as follows:

> In an effort to clear up the confusion surrounding this contract once and for all, I should like to ask the minister whether he was aware that the Department of National Defence had only $30 million available to start production of the LRPA, and was he aware that Lockheed had made a verbal agreement with DND to provide the interim financing itself?

The minister's answer on that occasion was "No." My point of order is this. Either through inadvertence or otherwise—and I would like to adopt the words of the Minister of Finance a few moments ago and say it was inadvertence—it may be that the minister does not know there has been this contradiction in the record or does not understand what the facts may be—there is a contradiction on the record. I think it important to the operation of the House that that question be cleared up.

The Minister of National Defence, in answer to a question put to him by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, indicated his willingness to appear before the appropriate standing committee of the House of Commons. I presumed that that willingness of the minister extended not just to himself but to the public servants involved. In order to clear this matter up completely, I hope the Minister of Supply and Services would express the same kind of willingness to appear before that committee with his officials to answer questions. One of those officials would be Mr. Stopforth, whose reputation as a public servant has been impugned and who, despite the statements by the President of the Privy Council, has really not had an opportunity to defend himself. It is not enough to say that he has remedies under access to the courts. If I may just make one further small point, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: It is a very interesting argument, but I am in fact having great difficulty in seeing where the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is establishing anything to do with what is a potential or an actual point of order. It is a very interesting point of debate, a matter that may require further urging and questioning, and I do want to let the hon. member have the opportunity to develop what might be a fundamental point of order. However, unless some aspect of it has not been developed so far, I would urge upon him that he has a point for debate, a point for discussion, rather than a point of order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to satisfy Your Honour on that score; and if I cannot, then I cannot. However, the issue is important, and it becomes doubly important because information has been given to me that the deputy minister of supply and services has asked Mr. Stopforth to resign. Mr. Stopforth has refused to resign. On the basis of the question that I raised a few days ago in connection with cabinet responsibility and the importance of a cabinet minister not being allowed to impugn the reputation of a public servant, I contend this is a matter of order in this House of Commons—surely here, if nowhere else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I believe that this matter—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In fairness, the hon. member will surely realize that he is dealing with a matter of substance. It may be a matter of great substance, but nevertheless it is a matter of substance, not a matter of procedure. We have to be careful, if we are to adhere to the procedures of the House, to see that an argument on a point of order is confined to the procedures of the House. The hon. member is arguing a question of substance, not a matter of procedure; it is a matter that does not directly relate to the orders of the day, to the business of the House, to business that is to follow today. As I say, it may be a matter for a substantive motion if the hon. member feels strongly about it, but I am not able to ask other hon. members to debate the merits of the hon. member's case. In my view, it would only be prolonging a matter that has been dealt with in questions today. I would respectfully suggest that the hon. member is not raising a point of order, and that the matter should be left there.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would say at the outset, most respectfully to the Chair, that I would not want it in any way to be interpreted that I am questioning the ruling of the Chair; this I am not doing. I wish to rise to seek clarification from the Chair as to why it was out of order for me, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 earlier this day, by way of a motion, if the House had permitted me to introduce the motion, to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Solicitor General, who is responsible for the RCMP, when charges would be laid against certain members of the head office staff of the Unemployment Insurance Commission of Canada for taking part in a gigantic fraud of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, which to date has uncovered the fact that in the Ottawa office alone over $100,000 of taxpayers' money has been embezzled.

I felt that I was bringing out a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, one that involves taxpayers' money. Obviously, the matter is of a very serious nature, and in view of the fact that it is reported to extend to a number of other officers across the country and to have very serious implications over and beyond, such as what the money which has been obtained in this defrauding process has been used for, I felt it was of urgent and pressing necessity. I really rise to ask clarification as to why the raising of such a matter is not considered in order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not disagree with anything the hon. member said in his point of order. He did, in fact, raise a subject that does not in any way disqualify itself from being treated under Standing Order 43. But what the hon. member did, as other hon. members have done recently, was to go on to add to his brief statement of the urgency of the matter, a matter of controversial information, a matter involving discussion, disagreement and debate. I have indicated that when an hon. member goes beyond the limits of explaining the urgency of the matter and goes into matters of debate and disagreement, then he ought not to proceed. I asked the hon. member to desist from that, but the hon. member then went on to put further matters of controversial information and it was at that point that I felt he should be stopped.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I would draw Your Honour's attention to remarks directed in the House yesterday in the course of debate by the hon. member for St. Boniface. I have—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member says he is referring to proceedings which took place yesterday and he proposes to develop a question of privilege based on them. To my knowledge, I have had no notification from him, as required under the Standing Order, so I cannot accept a question of privilege at this time unless it arises out of today's proceedings.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Then I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, this is a question of privilege that affects the rights and privileges of all members of the House. It has only now come to my attention, and at the first opportunity I want to bring it to Your Honour's attention. It has to do with certain admissions made by the hon. member for St. Boniface respecting his activities in the House. I should like to have the opportunity of giving Your Honour the basis for my question of privilege which, as I say, only came to my attention a few moments ago as a result of certain answers.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You were not even here.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I feel somewhat helpless. The Standing Order and the practice of the House clearly require that, if a question of privilege is to be raised with respect to the previous day's proceedings, some notification must be given to the Chair. If it relates to a matter that came about today and no notice is therefore possible, then that is a different matter. But the hon. member is raising a question relating to a previous proceeding. If the hon. member sought to raise it today by way of a question of privilege, then the Chair would have to have been notified. The fact that the matter has just come to his attention at this moment, if I accept it, could always be used by a member to circumvent the provision of notice to the Chair of a question of privilege. I am not particularly happy about it, but in the circumstances I feel helpless to assist the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FISHERIES—EXTENSION OF CANADIAN JURISDICTION TO 200 MILES OFFSHORE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I stated in the House on May 18 that information concerning the position which Canada will take at the forthcoming ICNAF meeting would be conveyed to the House. Our position at the ICNAF meeting cannot be discussed separately from our position on extended Canadian fisheries' jurisdiction to 200 miles. I wish to make a statement on both these issues and to announce today the government's decision to extend the fisheries jurisdiction of Canada out to 200 miles from the coast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Implementation of this decision under existing Canadian legislation will come later this year, and in any event will be in place by January 1, 1977. The state of our fishery resource and the situation of our fishermen, of our fishing industry, and of our coastal communities, make this action imperative. There will be no fishery resource left to protect if action is not taken now, because the fish stocks will be so depleted as to disappear as a resource of commercial significance. Not only the fish, but our Canadian fishermen too are an "endangered species", as I have heard them describe themselves.

● (1220)

The protection of Canadian interests is of concern to us as a result of the extension of U.S. fisheries jurisdiction in March, 1977. Mexico, our other neighbour on the North American continent, has left compelled to act and has recently adopted legislation to bring about an extension of jurisdiction to 200 miles.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

The government last year instructed Canadian officials to conduct bilateral negotiations with major fishing states operating off the Canadian coast regarding the terms and conditions that Canada will apply when permitting foreign fisheries in respect of any resources surplus to Canadian harvesting capacity within Canada's 200-mile zone. Agreements have been signed with Norway, Poland and the U.S.S.R., as well as ad referendum agreements with Spain and Portugal, in addition to the agreement with France entered into in 1972. These various agreements, when they are all in place, will cover major foreign fisheries off Canada's Pacific coast and more than 88 per cent of the foreign catch in that part of the ICNAF convention area to be incorporated within Canada's 200-mile zone. They will provide for a smooth transition to the new régime of extended Canadian fisheries jurisdiction.

There will be a continuing need, following extensions of fisheries jurisdiction by coastal states, for multilateral fisheries co-operation. New multilateral arrangements will be needed to bring the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries—ICNAF—and other fisheries conventions into line with the new jurisdictional realities. The instructions to the Canadian delegation to the ICNAF meeting in June have been formulated on the basis of Canada's decision to extend its fisheries jurisdiction by January 1, 1977. The delegation has been instructed to make clearly known to other delegations Canada's intention regarding extension of jurisdiction and possible future multilateral arrangements for the northwest Atlantic.

We will also give notice to other nations fishing off our coast that conservation and management measures for 1977 will be established by Canada to provide for effective protection and rebuilding of the stocks and must ensure, within such conservation limits, that the needs of Canadian fishermen are satisfied. At the same time, we are prepared to commit ourselves, as we already have in the bilateral agreements, to allow other nations to fish in Canada's 200-mile zone for stocks surplus to Canada's harvesting capacity, and to carry out appropriate consultations with such countries in the development of regulations within the zone. We are prepared to co-operate with other nations in this way, but in return we expect their co-operation in achieving our objectives.

I wish to emphasize that the government will in no way abandon its deep commitment to reaching multilateral solutions to problems of the Law of the Sea in general, and fisheries in particular. We will continue to work within the UN conference on the Law of the Sea to reach agreement not only on fisheries but also on the other vital and difficult issues facing the conference, issues such as the establishment of an international authority for the management of the resources of the deep seabed and ocean floor which constitute the "common heritage of mankind"; the preservation and protection of the marine environment, including the Arctic; and the breadth of the territorial sea and the other related question of passage through straits used for international navigation. These issues must find an early multilateral solution.

We knew from the outset that the spring session of the Law of the Sea conference in New York could not achieve final agreement on a new convention. At least one more session will be necessary for this purpose, and the conference will convene again in New York from August 2 to September 17. We hope it will succeed, but must anticipate that even then there would still be formalities to be concluded. I said at the United Nations General Assembly last fall, then at the Law of the Sea conference in New York, and most recently in the House of Commons, that 1976 must be the year of decision for the conference. I wish to make clear here and now that 1976 is also the year of decision for Canada's extension of fisheries jurisdiction out to 200 miles.

The decision I am announcing today to extend Canada's fisheries jurisdiction does not constitute unilateral action that either leaves no room for negotiation or ignores the interests of other countries directly concerned. It is action for which we have carefully prepared the way through both bilateral and regional negotiations within ICNAF and within the multilateral framework of the Law of the Sea conference. It is action based on a growing consensus among nations, a consensus which is increasingly finding its way into state practice and is reflected in the provisions of the single negotiating text that emerged from last year's session of the Law of the Sea conference in Geneva and has been confirmed in this year's revised text. It is action that is based on Canada's obligation as a good steward or custodian to protect and preserve a perishable resource which is increasingly threatened with depletion while growing in importance as a source of food for the world at large. It is action that will ensure the fishery resources off the Canadian coast can be managed wisely for the benefit of Canadians and, indeed, of the entire world.

In conclusion, Canada is better prepared than perhaps any other country for extension of fisheries jurisdiction. Since the amendment of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zone Act in 1970, we already have the necessary enabling legislation for establishment of the 200-mile limit and, after giving statutory notice, need only promulgate an order in council. That order in council will be promulgated at an appropriate time this year so as to have the 200-mile limit in place for January 1, 1977. We have also completed the necessary technical preparation. We have already concluded much of the necessary negotiation with the major distant-water fishing states concerned. Above all, we have the expertise and determination to carry through and implement our extended jurisdiction in an effective way, without rancour, without confrontation and without prejudicing the hope we share with the world that a multilateral solution to fisheries problems can ultimately be found, even while states take the national measures of protection that are so urgently needed.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the minister and would like to congratulate him for finally making this most welcome announcement concerning Canada's extention of its limit to 200 miles. The Progressive Conservative party has long advocated a 200-mile limit, and it is good to see the government finally following suit. I should like at this time, also, to thank the minister for the courtesy he has extended the official opposition by making a copy of his statement available prior to its presentation in the House, a practice that I would suggest might well be followed by other ministers of the Crown in making important national statements.

The minister has rightfully pointed out that "the state of our fishing resource and the situation of our fishermen, of our fishing industry, and of our coastal communities make this action imperative". There will be no fishery resource left to protect if action is not taken now, because the fish stocks will be so depleted as to disappear as a resource of commercial significance. There is nothing I could do to condemn more adequately the inaction of the government in this important matter to date than by referring to a similar statement by a previous Liberal minister, as follows:

> Now we are engaged in an even bigger enterprise; one which will have the support of at least two-thirds of the membership of the UN; one which will almost certainly carry the day at the next Law of the Sea conference; one which will bring practically all of our offshore fish stocks under Canadian control.

This was a statement by Jack Davis on May 23, over three full years ago. Naturally, our party and the Canadian people wonder what caused this delay, for because of this delay the Canadian fishermen, the Canadian fishing industry and the Canadian economy as a whole have suffered heavily. Now, the fishermen—certainly those in Atlantic Canada—are adopting a "wait and see" attitude. "We will believe it when we see it", seems to be their view, and this is understandable. In 1972, for example, total fish landings in Canada were 2,258 million pounds; in 1973, they were 2,190 million pounds, in 1974, 1,839 million pounds; and in 1975, 1,578 million pounds—or a full 30 per cent decrease from 1972 figures. For particular species such as redfish, the situation is even worse. The redfish fishery is near a state of collapse, producing a situation pitting Canadian against Canadian, because certain areas of the Gulf have been closed to certain Nova Scotia and Newfoundland fishing vessels. As a result, we have had to go begging to the Russians for part of their redfish quota. This would not have happened if we had declared a 200-mile limit earlier.

● (1230)

The minister also has said that the bilateral agreements will provide for a smooth transition to the new régime of extended Canadian fisheries jurisdiction. But do they really? I have pointed out previously in this House that the wording of the recent Canada-U.S.S.R. fishing agreement is not clear as to what extent Russia would recognize or even obey a Canadian directive, especially if it was directed to fish for less quota. The Minister of State for Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) recently signed an agreement in Moscow which gave to the Russians an increased quota in caplin in exchange for some of the redfish quota which they presently have. But I would remind the House that the redfish quota given up by the Russians was not on the Soviet shelf but was on our own shelf. I would also remind the House of a fact which seems to be ingored by the present government, namely, that there is some order in the food chain and that the caplin quotas should have been reduced rather than increased because caplin is the food stock for all our groundfish species. If our groundfish stocks are to be rebuilt, we must make those original food stocks available in the food chain.

This raises another matter. The Department of Fisheries officials, ICNAF officials and the Fisheries Council of Canada—in fact, almost everyone but the Minister of State for Fisheries—have asserted that Canadian fishing research is less than adequate. We do not know the breeding patterns of most fish species, nor how much fish there is within the 200-mile limit, nor how much fish should be caught. Presently, we rely to a great extent on the fisheries research of other nations. The Fisheries Council of Canada has decried this fact. The fishing industry on the east coast has offered to take scientists, free of charge, out on their boats to conduct research and, on the west coast, the Pacific Trawlers Association has offered additional funding to the department for its research program. Both offers were refused. What sort of attitude is this?

By his actions, the minister has allocated quotas and allowable fish catches without knowing the quantity of the stocks available. I say that one of the most important steps now required is an increase in fisheries research. We must formulate discussions with the industry on our long-range fisheries goals and plans for management of all marine stocks off our coasts. We need an increase in personnel, equipment and facilities in order to do this work, and wherever possible this work could, and should, be done from Canadian commercial fishing ships. Only in this way can we be assured that the stocks will be rebuilt. Unless this happens, the 200-mile limit declaration, which should offer a challenge, only becomes an illusion. The announcement is welcome, but it is only a beginning—just one small step. There is much more to be done before the Canadian fishery can recover and regain its former good health.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, we too, in the New Democratic Party welcome the announcement today. It is better late than not at all. I should like to say that in spite of the myriad problems facing our fishermen on both coasts, the announcement of a 200-mile limit—which has long been advocated by the fishermen of the west coast—will go some distance toward assisting us in the protection of our stocks. However, I cannot unreservedly be congratulatory with respect to the 200-mile zone from the point of view of the Pacific coast. First of all, we have some very serious problems on the Panhandle in negotiating catches with the United States. We have some very serious problems in terms of interception of salmon on the coast. These problems need more active attention by this government. They must be resolved, and until they are the 200-mile declaration can be quite empty and useless.

The position Canada has taken at the Law of the Sea conference for a long time has been a 200-mile zone or the continental margin. On the east coast, only a Liberal fishing policy, it seems to me, could have put the "Greenpeace" organization in the same camp as the Fishermen's Union of Newfoundland. Amazingly enough, they are now both together in opposition to the kind of Liberal fishing policy this country has seen. In view of their great differences over sealing, it would be only a Liberal policy which would bring those two together. Amazingly, it has done so.

On the east coast, the Hamilton Bank, the George's Bank and the Grand Bank portions of those major fishing areas are outside the 200-mile zone. Canada's position at the Law of the Sea conference was not 200 miles; it was 200 miles or the margin, whichever is the farthest. I think it is amazing that the minister today can introduce this statement without giving a single explanation of why the declaration did not include the margin on the east coast. Surely he has a duty to this House to explain the discrepancy between the position taken by Alan Beesley and the fine Canadian delegation at the Law of the Sea conference and the position this government is now taking which is inconsistent with that position.

I hope the minister will spend a good deal of time in the question period trying to satisfy the House about this most serious discrepancy. I suspect it might have something to do with the treaty recently negotiated with the Soviet Union concerning the area outside the 200-mile zone. But, surely if the purpose of the declaration is to improve our negotiating stance at the ICNAF conference—and I suspect that is one of the reasons, and I suspect, by the way, that it could have been done two years ago and would have resulted in better fishing limits being established at that conference, but better late than never—now that the minister has made the declaration, how do we go to that conference with the margin open? Surely our hand would have been strengthened in June if we had gone for the margin and then negotiated from strength.

Again, it is a halfway position. We should have gone for the margin. We should have gone to the conference with strength, and then we could have reduced our fishing catches on the east coast. The date is significant. The date for implementation is January, 1977. The United States legislation will be effective in March, 1977.

It was assumed at the Law of the Sea conference that Canada would simply follow the United States, that its declaration would be effective shortly before the United States declaration, and that we would act under the umbrella in terms of the United States military strength to prevent a confrontation on the coast. But Mexico, for example, and Canada have different positions on the coast. The 200-mile zone meets the situation in respect of Mexico and the United States, but it does not meet the needs of Canada. I am amazed that the minister today would come forward with a declaration which is inconsistent with the right position which is the position Canada had taken at the Law of the Sea conference. Nevertheless, this is better late than never. We welcome the declaration. It is long overdue. This is a typical Liberal compromise on an important matter. I hope the minister will give immediate and serious reconsideration to the 200-mile zone and extend it to the edge of the margin on our east coast, where it belongs.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank the minister for having advised us ahead of time of the statement he intended to make at this time on our work on the 200-mile territorial limit.

As the other speakers from other parties of the opposition said so clearly and eloquently before me, in fact the minister made today a statement of intent on the general policy the government will adopt with regard to the protection of our coastline to a 200-mile limit. Mr. Speaker, in the final analysis, that is what it is. The minister recognizes it in his statement, and I quote:

There will be no fishery resource left if action is not taken now.

We are at least three years late in taking positive steps to protect our fisheries and encourage their development. In fact, nothing was done to preserve them either by the present Minister of State for Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) or by his predecessors. The minister said in his statement, he admits it implicitly, and I quote again:

Not only the fish but our Canadian fishermen too are an "endangered species", as I have heard them describe themselves.

The minister thus recognizes, Mr. Speaker, that this measure is not only late in coming but that it stands a chance of missing completely its objective, namely to stimulate the fishing industry in Canada and protect employment in fields related to that fundamental industry in the field of natural resources.

The minister is caught in some sort of diplomatic straightjacket, on the one hand in bilateral relations, the agreements signed with Norway, Poland, U.S.S.R., Portugal, Spain, and the United States—that is still to come—and on the other hand, in multilateral co-operation. On studying closely the statement of the minister and those of his predecessors on that technical and important topic, we note, Mr. Speaker, that the multilateral agreements, to come, and the co-operation will not be achieved tomorrow. In this regard, the minister says, once again:

New multilateral agreements will be needed to bring . . . into line . . .

That is not done, Mr. Speaker, and the minister did not specify either in his statement whether or not he intends to take any action to achieve those multilateral agreements. All things considered, the minister recognizes now after three years that the government is late in taking any measures. He also recognizes that many fish species and especially the employment associated with the industry are both endangered, as he says.

The Minister also said that an order in council will be issued in 1977 which will establish the Canadian policy. But let us not be mistaken; it will be once again an order in council dealing within our own country limits and it will not necessarily make a success out of the policy announced by the government on preservation and bilateral or multilateral agreements.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, this is an excellent general statement of policy we are well accustomed to hear. It is well written but it does not, in the end, create a single job in the fishing industry nor insure any kind of investment for the preservation of fish species that are the main natural resource of this country. Further, we have no guarantee, no indication even, that the multilateral agreements to come will get a chance to succeed.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, the minister emphasizes the importance of protecting these natural resources and I believe that every member and the whole world agree on that, but when the time comes to implement such an agreement, we will see whether our diplomats headed by the minister will be efficient enough to put it into action and see to it that our industry and our jobs will be protected.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that in this field as in many others, for instance the textile industry, the shoe industry, I fear the government will take action when jobs will no longer be there. The government now allows into the country large quantities of foreign products, it does not do a thing about it, but just before election time, it will try to do something under the pretext that it wants to protect jobs that no longer exist.

The minister tells us now he will protect the industry that is nearly extinct. I think that what we need now is something more than pious assurances, but action to preserve these industries. Tomorrow may be too late.

[English]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a series of questions that I should like to ask the minister, following his welcome declaration. I missed the first few sentences of it, but it was my understanding that it was the jurisdiction of the Department of Fisheries that was being extended. While I am aware that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) has to be somewhere else today, I would have preferred to have had him here so we could question him on specific things. The first question I should like to ask the minister is, what steps has he taken to assure the future of our anadromous species? Has he some guarantees that the species that are spawned in our waters off the west or east coast and which go out to sea beyond 200 miles will be under the control of Canada in the fishing stages of their life?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, obviously the case of the anadromous species is an important concern and has been an important objective of the Canadian delegation at the Law of the Sea conference which attempted, successfully, to ensure that the state of origin would have the principal responsibility for this resource. The Canadian objectives have been substantially reflected in the negotiating text and in the revised text. We believe that that is a major achievement on the part of the Canadian delegation, and obviously its acceptance must await the conclusion of the Law of the Sea conference.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): My second question in the series has to do with those other elements which were in negotiation and what guarantees we are going to have, because they have an effect on fisheries. I am referring to the environmental element, the surface and subsurface navigation elements of an extension to 200 miles and the subsoil resources element of this proposition. It has been mentioned, but the extension of the edge of the margin is a very important one, too, and it was not included in the statement. So, is any provision going to be made with regard to jurisdiction over the environmental, surface and subsurface elements and the subsoil resources element?

Mr. MacEachen: As the hon. member realizes, under the international law, Canada already enjoys sovereign rights over the resources of the continental shelf. This includes mineral resources as well as the sedentary fish species on the shelf. The revised negotiating text at the recent Law of the Sea conference merely reaffirms the existing law on this particular point. Questions of the marine environment, scientific research—all important questions—are matters of further negotiation at the Law of the Sea conference.

The hon. member spoke about subsoil. I presume that the subsoil is included under mineral resources, but I will take further advice on that question. The hon. member referred to the question of the continental margin. It is true that the Canadian delegation at the Law of the Sea conference had pursued the objective of securing for Canada authority for the management of the fisheries resource to the edge of the continental margin; that still remains an objective of the Canadian delegation and will be pursued at the subsequent meetings of the Law of the Sea conference.

● (1250)

However, I should remind hon. members, and particularly the spokesman for the NDP, that that particular aspect of the fisheries situation must be kept in perspective. According to the statistics I received from the Department of Fisheries, less than 5 per cent of the ICNAF catch is taken between the 200 miles and the edge of the continental margin. That must place the situation in perspective—and obviously the Icelanders recognized the particular importance of the 200-mile economic zone in their recent negotiations with the United Kingdom.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in commending the minister, I remind him of the opposition day recently when we suggested that we should go one step at a time and extend the 200-mile fishery zone. I am glad he listened to our advice.

The minister indicated in his speech the instructions to the Canadian delegation to the ICNAF meeting, but he did not say anything about the details of the instructions. I wonder if Canada will agree at the ICNAF meeting this month to the various quotas which will be decided upon. Will Canada be locked in to those quotas, which will be for a period of a year? How can the minister reconcile extending the 200-mile limit—and which will take precedence? The second question is, what coincidental planning is taking place by the Department of Fisheries, by the Ministry of Transport and by the Department of National Defence, and what co-ordination of efforts is now taking place in order to patrol and provide surveillance over the 200-mile zone?

I have one further question—and I am asking these all at once—with regard to the tentative agreements we might have and the common problems that we might have with United States and France, particularly when article 9 of our agreement states that no provision of the present agreement shall be interpreted as prejudicing the views and future claims of either party concerning internal waters. What negotiations are going on with regard to the equidistant line which presently exists? How do we reconcile this? And, can they not extend the 200-mile limit south of St. Pierre and Miquelon? I hope the minister can remember those three or four questions and answer them.

Mr. MacEachen: In the first place, the timing of the announcement today is related to some extent to the ICNAF meeting which is to take place next week in Montreal. At that meeting, the Canadian government will tell its partners that regulations which come into effect for 1977 must be in conformity with extended Canadian jurisdiction. It seemed to us that we ought to make that clear to our ICNAF partners and that we ought to make clear to the House today that that was our position.

I appreciate the commendation of the hon. member for the action we have taken. Obviously, we have all been wanting to take this action, but in my judgment we have taken the action at just about the right time, not only because of the ICNAF meetings but because of the completed successful bilateral negotiations with the distant fishing states which will allow us to make what I consider to be a smooth transition to Canadian jurisdiction.

I realize that important fishery discussions with the United States are to take place in the future. It will be a major concern of mine that we reach satisfactory conclusions with the United States with respect to the boundary questions which exist with that country. I already communicated to Dr. Kissinger this morning the decision taken by the government of Canada and the necessity of taking a very serious attitude toward these bilateral negotiations between Canada and the United States. We have not yet completed our negotiations with France, but we do believe that it would be unrealistic, in view of the land base involved, for Canada to permit a 200-mile zone on the seaward side.

Mr. Marshall: The minister did not answer with regard to the surveillance.

Mr. Speaker: In the light of the hour, I wonder if hon. members would agree, in attempting to get some regional equality into this, that perhaps this matter might be concluded by allowing a clarification of the point just raised by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), as I see the minister wants to clarify that. We could then permit a question by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Legatt), which might enable us to conclude this in such a way as to extend the sitting a few moments to clear up routine proceedings. If there are more questions, I do not want to restrict the minister. This is a very important subject, but if that is agreeable to the hon. members, we might try it.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Marshall: The minister did not answer my question about surveillance and patrol capabilities when we do extend.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): St. Pierre and Miquelon.

An hon. Member: That is the important part.

Mr. MacEachen: It is important, and it seems to me that the question of enforcement will be much easier because of the consent we have achieved through our bilateral agreements with the distant fishing states to our extended Canadian jurisdiction. It will not be a repetition of what happened off the Iceland coast where the British contested the Icelandic declaration. In our case, 88 per cent of the fish caught in the ICNAF area is covered by bilateral agreements in which the distant fishing states acknowledge, either explicitly or implicitly, extended Canadian jurisdiction.

Apart from that, which is the main question, of course, is the fact that we do have within the government a task force which has been working for some time on the preparations for surveillance. Surveillance is already being carried out off the Atlantic coast, and we are making preparations to ensure that appropriate surveillance will take place. However, the acquiescence of distant fishing states in our jurisdiction is much more important than any other factor in this situation.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): What about St. Pierre and Miquelon?

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I might say that I am in agreement with what the minister said about his success in the bilateral negotiations. I do not think we should be overly-critical of the minister at all times.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: To that extent, his approach was very worth-while. However, my question is on the very important matter of surveillance of the new zone of both coasts. Has the minister a task force, or has there been any special study carried out by DND or people in his department concerning the capacity of Canada to enforce that zone? We have heard a few generalities, but I would like the minister to be a little more specific, because I have not seen anything in the DND budget nor in the minister's budget which indicates that we are now prepared with the fast-pursuit craft or additional aerial surveillance which is necessary to enforce the zone. I wonder if the minister would direct his attention more specifically to what form of study there is, and what form of recommendations we are receiving in terms of now enforcing this extended zone.

Mr. MacEachen: I can tell the hon. member that there has been established within the government an inter-departmental task force to make preparations for the surveillance and enforcement of this particular zone. I am satisfied that it will be possible to provide resources to make surveillance and enforcement possible. That is what is taking place within the government, but any preparations we would undertake, no matter how extensive and grandiose, would be largely futile unless we had the acquiescence of the fleets which normally fish in what will be Canadian waters, to our jurisdiction. The cause of the cod war between Iceland the United Kingdom was simply that the United Kingdom did not acquiesce to any extension of Iceland's jurisdiction, so let us keep our eye on the main game, which is the acquiescence that we believe will exist in our case.

Mr. Leggatt: We have acquiescence on the margin; there is no question about that. We have not extended it to the margin. There is clear acquiescence on our part in not moving out to the margin. The government mentioned that less than 5 per cent of the ICNAF catch is margin: how much of that is breeding stock that feeds on resources of the banks off the east coast? How much have we abandoned there, in terms of supporting the fishing reserves of the fishermen on the east coast?

Mr. MacEachen: The percentage that they give is as I have learned it. It is not to be discounted, because it will be our objective at the Law of the Sea conference to extend our jurisdiction to the edge of the margin. In assessing the significance of our action today, we ought to bear in mind the relative percentage of fish taken within the 200-mile economic zone, and then the range between the 200-mile economic zone and the continental margin, which I understand to be less than 5 per cent in the terms that I have described. These are not sedentary fish that we are talking about. I cannot tell the hon. member exactly how the breeding proceeds in that particular place.

QUESTIONS OF THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 5,149, 5,447 and 5,509.

[Text]

EXPENDITURES ON CN TOWER, TORONTO

Question No. 5,149—Mr. Stevens:

1. What have been the total expenditures, of whatever kind or nature, on the CN Tower in Toronto up to March 31, 1976?

2. As of that date, what is the estimated total cost?

3. What are the total estimated gross revenues and net revenues for the project, and from whom is it anticipated the revenues will be received?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. $50 million.

2. $57 million.

3. Revenues are obtained from T.V. and radio stations, from concessionaires (food, merchandise and attractions), and from charges paid by the general public for access to the observation areas. The net return on the investment is projected at 10-12 per cent based on estimated gross revenues of $9.5 million in 1977.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO REGISTERED HOME OWNERSHIP SAVINGS PLANS

Question No. 5,447—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

1. For the taxation year 1974, how many taxpayers deducted from their personal income, contributions to the Registered Home-savings Plan and what amounts did they deduct as a whole?

2. For Canada and each province, how many taxpayers claimed such tax deductions and what amounts did they deduct as a whole, according to the income bracket (a) less than $5,000 (b) from $5,000 to $9,999 (c) from $10,000 to $14,999 (d) from $15,000 to $19,999 (e) from $20,000 to $24,999 (f) from $25,000 to $49,999 (g) over $50,000 and according to the age group (i) under 20 years of age (ii) from 20 to 30 (iii) from 31 to 40 (iv) from 41 to 50 (v) from 51 to 60 (vi) 60 and over?

3. How many taxpayers claimed such deductions and what amounts did they deduct as a whole, according to the kind of financial institutions they were doing business with (charter banks, life insurance, trust or mortgage companies)?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): 1 and 2. At this time, only limited information is available with regard to contributions to Registered Home Ownership Savings Plans claimed as deductions from income for the 1974 taxation year. The tables, extracted from Preliminary Taxation Statistics for 1974, show the total amount of contributions by province and by income class for all Canada. More complete information on the number and amount for each province by age and by income class will not be available until the release of Taxation Statistics (1976 edition) this summer.

3. The Department does not collect statistics on financial institutions in which these Home Ownership Plans are administered.

AGRICULTURE—SPECIAL ASSISTANCE TO PRODUCERS ENTERING THE DAIRY INDUSTRY

Question No. 5,509—Mr. Beatty:

What special assistance, if any, is the Minister of Agriculture prepared to make available to producers who recently entered the dairy industry and whose ability to continue in business is most jeopardized by the government's dairy policy?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The Canadian Milk Supply Management Committee on which the provincial producers and government agencies are represented, is finalizing the provincial regulations regarding market sharing quotas. Under the Terms of the Supply Management Plan the provinces decide on the allocation of market sharing quotas to producers who recently entered the dairy business.

Mr. Blais: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

AGRICULTURE

CUTBACK IN INDUSTRIAL MILK PRODUCTION

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, that in view of the extremely serious financial difficulties facing the Canadian dairy industry resulting from the 15 per cent cutback in industrial milk production as announced by the Canadian Dairy Commission, a cutback which is resulting in disastrous loss of farm income and the dumping of high quality milk, this House should give immediate attention to implementing and financing a school milk program so that the surplus milk will be fully utilized in Canada to ensure that all children get some of this surplus nutrition and necessary food product.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 26, the hon. member has given the Chair notice of this intended motion and the Chair has therefore had an opportunity to give the matter some consideration. There are a number of factors involved in any such application to set up an emergency debate, as it were, or to set or accelerate hours for the purpose of considering the matter. Some of those considerations are quite well known.

I do not propose to allow the motion, for two reasons. First, it is clear that the matter, while it is a severe problem and one, obviously, of great interest in view of the number of questions that have taken place in the House, culminating—not necessarily culminating, but at least reaching some kind of a climax in respect of yesterday's demonstration—but because the matter has been raised so many times in the House it is obviously of continuing concern as opposed to some crisis which I think ought more properly be seen to be the subject matter of motions under this Standing Order. That is not to say that matters of continuing concern are ruled out, but I must consider, having reference to Hansard of March 19 this year, some three months ago, that the matter was debated upon a motion of the Social Credit party on an opposition day, all through the day. I do not take that as an indication of anything except that the matter has been before the House in some form or other for some three months.

The second consideration in the language of subparagraph 5 of the Standing Order is that we have to bear in mind the nature of the subject matter. Here again, because it is a matter of continuing concern, I think the decision within subparagraph 5 of the rule is effective; that is, that the very nature of the matter might affect other opportunities that would exist to discuss it. In this particular case, not only have several opportunities been taken in the past during question period and other areas and, I am sure, in respect of the minister's estimates before standing committees, but it seems to me to be a subject which might be given some attention in the three budget days which remain, when the subject will be relevant for discussion, and in the five opposition days that remain in the short period before us in the trimester that finalizes at the end of June—whether the House recesses at that time or not.

Bearing in mind the continuing nature of the problem, and because it is of a nature to be before us in the next few days, I have decided that although it is a matter of importance and concern to a great many Canadians, it ought not to be set aside for special consideration under Standing Order 26.

Order, please. Orders of the day.

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Blais: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

REFERENCE OF REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps in my haste I overlooked a motion that stands in the name of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp). The President of the Privy Council, seconded by Mr. Drury, moves:

That the annual report of the Canadian Wheat Board for the crop year ended July 31, 1975, tabled April 8, 1976, be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Does the House would give its agreement to consider the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day having been called, and it now being after one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1.10 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AND SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING CERTAIN PAYMENTS THEREUNDER

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the President of Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-81, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act with respect to the escalation of certain payments thereunder, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Sharp (for the President of Treasury Board) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Monday, May 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, when beginning these remarks last Monday evening I was suggesting that there was growing concern in the country as to whether this chamber was capable of representing the views of Canadians in general. I am concerned that not all members will take the opportunity to debate this subject fully, particularly in view of the fact that the government House leader seems to think that 70 members having already participated is a rather extensive number.

I wish to speak for a few moments about the obligations of those of us who oppose the abolition of the death penalty. I believe that a member of the House of Commons has a greater duty to his constituents and the country than merely to get up at the appropriate time to cast a vote in this chamber, important as that may be. A member of the House of Commons has many obligations. He not only has an obligation to speak for his constituents, but for Canadians in general. In this particular case, a large number of members who oppose abolition of the death penalty are remaining silent. They are not participating in this debate. I urge hon. members to reconsider their position and speak in this debate before the second reading stage is concluded.

I am told that a number of people who want the abolition of capital punishment are not going to participate. They feel that if there is an early vote, the chances of success are greater. They believe that the longer it goes on, the less chance there is of the measure failing, as I believe it should. Those of us who oppose the abolition of capital punishment not only have a duty to our constituents but to many other Canadians whose voices will not be heard through their member of this House. Over the years there have been a number of petitions, including a very large petition for a referendum on this subject. I have always felt that if there is one subject that is deserving of a referendum, it is that dealing with the retention or the abolition of capital punishment.

Most members on all sides of this House agree that it is a matter of conscience as to whether this should pertain. It is obvious that one member cannot reflect the conscience of everybody in his constituency. The government, of course, has been very stubborn with regard to allowing a referendum. They know that if this question is put to the people directly, the government's views will be soundly defeated. There is no question about that. Those of us who believe as the majority of Canadians believe, namely, that capital punishment should be retained, have an obligation to spin out this debate until the next election. That election could be something of a referendum on the subject we are considering. Indeed, that is the only reason we are discussing this issue.

The government has been completely dishonest in its approach. We have had a five-year period of abolition, commencing in 1967. In 1973 the government wanted the period extended by a further five years. At that time, the Solicitor General said it was only a second five-year period and that in the long run the government wanted a third before the question was finally decided. Of course, the second five-year period would ordinarily expire around the time of the next election. The reason the government is bringing this measure before the House now is that we are midway between elections: they want to get the question disposed of so that it will not be an issue in the next election.

To my mind, that is a dishonest approach because when the government brought forward Bill C-2 they said it would be the law for a certain period of time. Now they are asking us to change it again. We just cannot believe what the government says. The people are being denied the right to express themselves directly. Those of us who believe they ought to have that right should use every tactic and manoeuvre available to us to frustrate the will of the government on this matter, since the government does not have the people behind them. I hope everyone who favours the retention of capital punishment will exercise his right to speak and delay this measure so that it can become an issue at the time of the next election. If retentionists fail to do this, they are not being true to their professed stand; they are abusing their retentionist vote and regarding it as merely vote-gathering; they do not really believe retention is the proper thing. Even though I would agree with the way they vote, I cannot respect an hon. member who would do such a thing. At least the abolitionists are acting in the spirit of their conviction, but until I see all these retentionists speaking I question the spirit of their intentions; they may be simply bowing to the public will, and I do not think that is a good attitude for a member of this House to take.

As I say, the government has been dishonest in its approach to the whole subject. This is demonstrated by its failure to obey the law as parliament was asked to enact it. I understand that when Bill C-2 was brought in, an undertaking was given to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) that the government would obey the law. But they have broken their undertaking, as they have broken so many others.

I was opposed in the last election by a candidate who said the Liberal government had abolished capital punishment. That seemed to be the understanding of Liberal candidates, and that has certainly been the de facto situation because there has not been an execution in this country since 1962. The last major change in this area, before these experiments began in 1967, was in 1961 when the government of the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) made a significant change in the law, bringing in the distinction between capital and non-capital murder. There is no question that this was a great advance in the field of penology. But it has not had an opportunity to work, because only a year after the change in the law was made, the last execution took place and we have had de facto abolition ever since.

As far as the idea of a free vote is concerned, to my mind that is so much window-dressing. I am somewhat amazed to find the government suggesting an extension of hours to deal with this matter and only this matter. They want to extend the hours for the debate on capital punishment and get rid of it.

Mr. Sharp: That is not what I would propose.

Mr. Schumacher: The government would give everyone the opportunity to speak on the bill, it is true, but we would have to get it finished, by hell or high water, by the end of June. That is not my idea of a free vote following full and free discussion.

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. member a question? If we had an extension of hours covering government business, including Bill C-84 but not restricted to it, would he support that proposal?

Mr. Schumacher: I could probably support it, but I certainly would not be speaking for this party.

An hon. Member: Who does speak for that party?

Mr. Schumacher: On this question, there should be nobody speaking for this party.

Mr. Paproski: It is a free vote.

Mr. Schumacher: I, for one, would agree to the extension of hours for other government business, but I know there are some members of this caucus who would object to such an arrangement because Bill C-87 is of more concern to them than it is to me, for example. I think there are some members on the government side who are quite concerned about that bill, too. But as far as the bill before us is concerned, I do not believe the government should be playing hanky-panky with the rules. Last week I heard news about a parliamentary group going to Paris for ten days. Is it just coincidental that seven out of ten of those people are retentionists? I may be oversuspicious, but this seems to have a bad odour—

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. member a further question? I have been considering the issues to which he is referring, and I am quite prepared to ask for an extension of hours for all government business. I am also prepared to accommodate the votes of those particular members. I should like to ask him whether, if this is done, he would agree.

Mr. Schumacher: I am happy to hear the minister make those guarantees. As far as I am concerned, if I have an opportunity to end my remarks and say what I want to say, that is fine. But I cannot bind other members of the caucus who are concerned about this rush to end discussion of this legislation before the last day of June. I cannot see the need for it, because I think it is a breach of faith on the part of the government to introduce the measure at this point, let alone to want it completed in all stages before the end of June. Obviously, every vote is going to count. I do not agree with those who say it will be a free vote as far as the other side is concerned, because the cabinet, in any case, will be united. Last week the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) wondered whether the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) would fall into line. Everyone knows the vote is likely to be close and that such decisions are likely to affect the final outcome. I notice that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in no way questioned what was said last Friday. So there we have lost another retentionist to the lure of advancement in public life.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drury: We are not allowed to question motives in this chamber.

● (1420)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) on a point of order.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The hon. member mentioned that there was a group leaving Canada to go to France and that most of them are retentionists. That is not true, Mr. Speaker. I am the one who arranged for this group to go on these visits to other countries. I am a retentionist myself, and I certainly would not send any retentionists over there if I could help it. May I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the members of this group are evenly paired. An equal number on each side is going on these trips, and anyone who says otherwise is incorrect or is making a prejudgment. There is an equal number on each side, so that the one balances the other.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, I think the hon. member for St. Boniface has raised a point for debate which could have been raised at some other time. The time taken will not be deducted from the time of the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher).

Mr. Schumacher: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. All I can say is that it is still seven out of 10. It appears to me that the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), the very excellent chief government whip, must be very happy in his duties.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): There is no doubt about that.

Mr. Schumacher: I am sure he would like to continue in them for a great length of time.

If this government really wanted to have a free vote on this subject, it could have adopted the procedure used in 1966 when the private members' route was used. If this government gave its blessing to a private members' motion or bill on this subject I am sure it would have got appropriate consideration in the House and we would not have had to worry about its being talked out or anything like that. The last time this procedure was used, I think six members of the administration voted for retention, including the Hon. John Turner. If the government were really sincere about having a truly free vote on this question, then this is the method that they would have adopted. Until they adopt such a procedure, Mr. Speaker, I question how free this vote is going to be. I think there is plenty of evidence to show that it is not.

As far as this whole so-called peace and security package is concerned—the government is afraid to call it a law and order package—the other element of dishonesty is the blatant bribe to members to pass the legislation in return for some very harsh and severe terms of imprisonment. The government is proposing a term of imprisonment of 25 years without any possibility of parole. If that were going to be the case, even the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) would feel compelled to vote against it. He does not really believe that the government is serious about this, though he certainly does not like what is being offered in this regard. It is clearly an out-and-out bribe to enable members to salve their consciences and support the government in this matter, in return for a very harsh, cruel, inhumane term of imprisonment.

Such a term of imprisonment is no bribe to me, because I do not think the government is honest anyway. It just is not honest, Mr. Speaker. What the government is offering now, it will start chipping away at later. We have had evidence of what the government wants to do in this area. We have heard the government's ideas about temporary absences, sending people off on trips, having people to go to Spain to get married, and so on. That is the government's idea of rehabilitation. Because of terrific public opposition to this sort of thing, the government is now changing its colour, like a chameleon. I suggest that if the House is foolish enough to fall for the government's proposal in this measure, within a year or two it will start chipping away at the term of imprisonment and we will end up with absolutely nothing.

If a convicted murderer does receive a 25 year mandatory sentence, we are told that after 15 years a panel of three judges could perhaps change the sentence so as to allow for parole. I think statistics now show that the average capital murderer is released from jail after 13.2 years. If, under the new law, he is paroled after 15 years, all we have added is 1.8 years, which to me is not that significant. There has been this great foofaraw about a 25-year maximum term. I do not think it is true about the 15 years, because if it were the government would lose support. Nevertheless, it is a poor show for the government to resort to this type of bribery in addition to all the other chicanery it has engaged in on this subject.

As far as my own constituency is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I have conducted a couple of polls and it is quite clear where my constituents stand, which I suppose makes my job easy since in no way would I be in opposition to the vast bulk of my constituents. In 1971, 76 per cent were in favour of capital punishment, 20 per cent said no, and 4 per cent were undecided. In 1973, 79.4 per cent favoured capital punishment, 18.4 per cent said no, and 2.2 per cent were undecided. In the latter poll I also asked whether, if life really was life, they would have a different view; 41.7 per cent said they would; 54.2 per cent said that they still wanted capital punishment even if life was life.

Mr. Drury: Explain.

Mr. Schumacher: Even if life meant life it was not satisfactory to 54.2 per cent of my constituents; they still felt capital punishment should be retained. Much of this has to do with the situation in our penitentiaries. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has also said that in order to protect society we shall have to improve the situation in our penitentiaries; that there will be great reforms. We have been having great reforms in our penitentiaries for 15 years or more, Mr. Speaker, starting when Alan MacLeod began the new wave of penal reform. I do not know what kind of reform we are achieving in view of the sort of situation that has arisen in the B.C. penitentiary. I should like to read a couple of paragraphs by Doug Collins which appeared in the Toronto Star for April 30 last and had to do with that institution. He said this:

> The B.C. penitentiary, that grim, ancient, shabby and hopeless pile in New Westminster, has to be the laughingstock of the country. Hostage-taking now seems to be taking place every week, prisoners demand flights to everywhere and sometimes get them (in exchange for a guard who in return doesn't get his throat cut) and there is a general atmosphere of what-will-happen-next?
> What will happen next, if those close to the scene know anything, is that the place will explode. Concessions to the violent lead to more concessions, guards hate prisoners, prisoners hate guards, and everyone—guards, prisoners and public alike—hates Ottawa, which is supposed to control this mess.

It is obvious that the government cannot deal with this situation. Instead of discussing this bill we should be getting down to the root of the problem in our penal system. If the government can show us there is no hope for our penal system, then maybe some of us would be obliged to change our minds; but surely at this time there is no argument for changing one's mind in respect of the retention of capital punishment.

● (1430)

In a little over a month the Olympic Games will be commencing in Montreal. We are spending some $30 million, $40 million or $50 million for security there, and we are being warned all the time that terrorists may be coming in from outside this country who will take disruptive action at the games. Our immigration procedures are being tightened, along with the United States regulations to protect against this. All sorts of things are being done. I wonder what the attitude among terrorists in the world would be if two or three weeks before the opening of the Olympics, Canada abolished the death sentence. Surely that would give some support to the idea that we are not really as serious about this subject as we ought to be. If for no other reason than that one alone, we should be postponing the conclusion of this legislation. It should wait until the fall before coming to a decision.

[Mr. Schumacher.]

Let me return again to what I was saying about our penitentiary system. It is quite obvious, from some of Mr. Collins' comments, that the system is out of control in British Columbia and in some other places in the country. I might point out that the penitentiary located at my place of residence, Drumheller, Alberta, has been called the gem of the system. It certainly creates the least problems. I know there are problems there, but they have not got out of control as they have in other places in the country. We are very fortunate and I am very proud of the staff of that institution because they have worked things out very well. However, if we are to continue with the sloppy way in which the government is dealing with our penal system, I am afraid that even the situation at Drumheller will deteriorate.

I, for one, feel that in order to keep the situation in these institutions under control we must pay more attention to what has been said by the director of the B.C. penitentiary and others across this country. They feel they should be able to use the paddle to effect some sort of discipline and order in these institutions. It is intolerable when the inmates run the institutions. That is just not acceptable. Instead of following this advice, the government is continually chipping away at the effectiveness of punishment in this country, whether in the institutions or outside.

I do not like to be critical of my friends of the New Democratic Party, particularly when there is no one representing them in the House at this moment, but I find it rather unusual that such a democratic party can be so united in its opposition to the death penalty when such a large proportion of its grassroots supporters in the country favour retention.

Dr. Fattah, criminologist at the Simon Fraser University, who has been referred to by some as the high priest of abolition in this country, carried out a study on behalf of the Solicitor General regarding support for this measure in various party groups. Of course, the supporters of the Social Credit party in Canada are the strongest in favour of maintaining the death penalty, followed by the Conservative party and the Liberals. However, even in the NDP a substantial number of people want the death penalty retained. The latest figures in the study are for 1971, and they show that 43.75 per cent of NDP supporters want the death penalty retained. That is a significant number and I wonder how, among 16 here, there is not at least one who would speak on behalf of that element of that party. I find this very unusual, and I think it should be commented on by the grassroots of that party to its parliamentary membership.

Popular belief would have it that everyone in the NDP in this country is opposed to capital punishment. That is not true. In 1960, when it was the CCF party, 61.1 per cent felt that capital punishment should not be abolished—and that is only 16 years ago. These are national figures. Someone in the NDP should explain why their parliamentary group is so opposed to capital punishment, contrary to the belief of a great many of their grassroots members. That is not very democratic at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to know that the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) will explain that later today.

Many people have suggested we cannot have capital punishment because there is one law for the rich and one for the poor. I think the teeth of that argument were pulled long ago. We have a tremendous legal aid system in this country now, supported by millions of dollars. From my own experience in Alberta, there is never a shortage of funds to hire proper counsel to make sure that justice is done in this area—so that argument just does not apply.

In conclusion, let me suggest that the law after 1961 was never allowed to function. Some still argue this matter on the basis that people who kill as a result of passion will be hanged. That is not the law. The law as it was passed in 1961 is that capital punishment shall be reserved for those people who, on a planned and deliberate basis, or on a contract basis, go out and murder somebody, or kill somebody in the commission of a planned and deliberate criminal offence. That is not in any way, shape or form a crime of passion. So that argument is completely meaningless.

Capital punishment is a deterrent to those who might otherwise set out on a deliberate plan or course of action that would likely result in somebody's death. Human nature is such that individuals place great value on their lives and people are not going to do something that will likely threaten them. I agree that capital punishment does not have much deterrent effect in respect of those who may commit crimes of passion, but this is not the law and that is not what we are arguing. We are suggesting capital punishment for those who deliberately plan murder. Those people should not have the ghost of a chance of ever doing the same thing again.

I urge all hon. members to participate in this very important debate and use every means at their disposal to make sure the real feelings of the Canadian people are expressed, whether right or wrong. If the Canadian people are wrong, we will have the opportunity to correct them. In the meantime, there are a great many families and dependants of victims to whom we have a duty. We cannot confine our thoughts or considerations to those who have actually taken somebody else's life; we have a greater duty than that.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the numbers present this afternoon would indicate that Friday is not a vintage day among all parties for attendance in the House of Commons. I mention that, not by way of criticism but simply to point out the fact that I am informed discussions are now taking place concerning the enlargement of this House because of the increase of members that will follow the acceptance of the new redistribution measure. Indeed, Your Honour, the throne will be moved back some distance. I suggest there be no increase in the size.

● (1440)

One reason for the power of the parliament of Westminster in so far as the House of Commons is concerned is that the membership cannot always find seats, benches, on which to sit and the result is there is a feeling of urgency. Indeed, when I was prime minister I endeavoured to bring about a change. I had fairly good support, but one would require general support to remove the desks and substitute benches. However, the quality of debate in this House would multiply very greatly. Now that the House is to be increased in size, I suggest there be something done along the line of not increasing the size but of providing benches at the back for those members who are not present and therefore cannot occupy seats. When people visit the gallery and see the House of Commons virtually unoccupied, there is no greater criticism offered than that when they return home. When the discussions take place, I would like the opportunity to present my views before those who will be charged with the determination of this matter by way of recommendation to the House because I feel very strongly that an increase in the size of this House in the way of provision of extra desks can only extend still further relationship which is not in keeping with parliamentary procedure in that there is no close intimacy such as is assured in the House of Commons at Westminster.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning the remarks made about this House. The hon. member who just had the floor suggested that those members who are not present are remiss in their duties. That is not fair. The hon. member knows there are members attending committee meetings and there are members who are performing duties in other parts of the country away from this House. Because of the reduced capacity of the House to listen to the remarks of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), that hon. gentleman should not allow his ego to be offended to the point that he would make remarks of the kind he just made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): The Chair, probably like anyone else here, recognizes that the House never is filled to capacity to listen to anyone. It does not seem to be a strong point of privilege. Certainly the Chair has not taken the words of the right hon. member for Prince Albert as an indictment of our practices. It seems to me to be more in keeping with what all of us have come to recognize as the reality of a Friday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, of course there was no question of privilege, but the hon. gentleman has made his presence known. I feel sure that as a result of that interruption he will find himself, possibly, in a preferred position when the next promotions in the government take place. I have watched him with interest and I have come to the conclusion that he is one who endeavours at all times to interfere in the manner in which he has just now, without regard to any rule or regulation but simply for the purpose of making himself known among members who otherwise might not recognize him or his presence.

Mr. Speaker, I speak as one who throughout the years has been an abolitionist. I speak as one who has had experience in the courts. I need not go into that. I speak as one who knows that on occasion an innocent man has gone to the gallows. Indeed, in the last year or so in the United Kingdom there have been several examples that are extraordinarily appealing to the people as a whole concerning the danger of capital punishment under the circumstances which now exist. However, if this bill had been brought in, premature though it is, a year and a half before the present law will elapse, and there had been omitted therefrom that portion with which I intend to deal particularly, I would have been unchanged.

As an abolitionist through the years, I have stated that there is no inconsistency in the view I express, that so far as an offence against the state, such as treason, is concerned, everywhere in the world the penalty, with the exception of very few countries of not very great significance, is death. The other day, when I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I think on May 18, whether or not he would remove that portion of the bill in which treason will have an open season if this bill is passed, he then asked me whether or not I spoke for the opposition. That gave the position away—that there was anything in the nature of an unqualified free vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Either the question was amusing on his part or, on the other hand, it was a revelation of the fact that when the government as a whole is voting solidly one way, namely, for this bill, the question of a free vote becomes rather nebulous. Then, in addition to that, when speaking in British Columbia on the second last occasion on which he was there on vacation, he was asked what he would do if the bill were turned down. In the forenoon he said he would resign as Prime Minister. By noon that day I was communicated with by my press representative in British Columbia and I could not believe that the Prime Minister would have said that. But I would point out that if he said that and carried out the threat that if the bill was defeated on a free vote he would resign as Prime Minister, the incentive to vote in order to secure that desirable end would have been awfully difficult to ignore.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: However, that afternoon he said, "Oh, I was just musing". Musings of that kind with the life of individuals at stake on the part of anyone are not amusing. Then later on, when faced with the fact that overwhelmingly across Canada there is a demand for capital punishment for murder, he said, "Well, if public opinion is aroused, then I guess we will have to have a few hangings". That, to me, is not the kind of statement that is in keeping with the seriousness of the question that we face.

We find that not only was the legislation passed in 1973 to be repealed, but a further section has been included in the bill to abolish the death sentence for treason. I ask the government: what group of Canadians have asked that it be abolished for treason? Certainly, it has not been the organizations that ordinarily deal with civil liberties. Nowhere, at any time, has any organized or unorganized group in this country asked the government to abolish what is accepted everywhere in the world as the punishment for treason. Why is it included? When I suggested to the Prime Minister that he withdraw that, he became very petulant, peevish—not unusual today—and then he became annoyed with the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), very annoyed with him. Why? Why is the government, in 1976, bringing in legislation of this kind, when during the summer at any time, and particularly I emphasize during the present summer, from all parts of the world people will gather for the Olympics?

I will read to hon. members the law as it is now, so that there will be no mistake about it. This law has been on the statute books for years. The Canadian Civil Liberties Organization has not asked that the law regarding treason be repealed. Again I challenge the government to name one organization or anyone of responsibility across Canada who has asked for this. The sections in question should be placed on the record. Sections 46 and 47 at present read as follows:

> 46(1) Every one commits treason who, in Canada
> (a) kills or attempts to kill Her Majesty, or does her any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, maims or wounds her, or imprisons or restrains her;
>
> (b) levies war against Canada or does any act preparatory thereto;
>
> (c) assists an enemy at war with Canada, or any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities . . .
> (d) uses force or violence for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Canada or a province;
>
> (e) without lawful authority, communicates or makes available to an agent of a state other than Canada, military or scientific information or any sketch, plan, model, article, note or document of a military or scientific character that he knows or ought to know may be used by that state for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or defence of Canada . . .
>
> 47(1) Every one who commits treason is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable
> (a) To be sentenced to death if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph 46(1)(a), (b) or (c)—

That is the killing or the attempted killing of the Queen of Canada, to levy war against Canada or to assist an enemy at war with Canada. Why has this been changed at this time? Nobody has answered that. Again I repeat: there is something gratuitous about the government's action in this regard. Then so far as penalties are concerned, if all one does is to use force or violence for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Canada or a province, they may be sentenced to death or to imprisonment for life.

There is something behind this, and that is what we have not found out. What has activated the government of Canada to bring before the House legislation which will make Canada an open place for assassination and treason subject only to a jail sentence in a world in which terrorism marches and assassinations and kidnappings with assassination take place all over the world? Just at this time the government of Canada decides that it must be kind to terrorists, international murderers and those who raise rebellion.

I ask those who, together with me, believe that so far as murder is concerned as an offence against the individual—and of course an offence against the state—it should not be punished by the death sentence. I ask those who believe in the abolition of capital punishment, how can they, in their own conscience, vote for this bill which contains the particular clauses to which I have referred? The parliament of Great Britain has abolished the death penalty for murder. I have the bill here, which is entitled, "Abolition of the Death Penalty Act". In the observations made thereon, the following appears:

Sentence of death can still and only be awarded for high treason, piracy with violence—

And one or two other offences.

—when a person is convicted of treason, sentence of death must be pronounced.

Why at this time, with the law in effect that the government of Canada stated three years ago was the epitome of all legal perfection, is the government changing this law? I said it would not work, dividing murder according to the occupation of the victim. I voted for it because, as I pointed out, half a loaf is better than none. I said it would not work. It is still in effect and will be in effect until December of 1977. Why, then, this sudden rush, this haste on the part of the government, to force through parliament before this session ends something that carries with it the possibility that each of us can imagine?

As one who, as prime minister, had this responsibility, I know what it means to sign the death sentence. That is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the acting prime minister in his absence has to do by way of a recommendation to the Governor General of Canada. I know what it means. When I was prime minister if there were any reasonably extenuating circumstances, commutation took place, but when there was no such justification, the sentence was carried out. The last two who went to the gallows in this country went on an order or a direction signed by me. The law was enforced until the present government started playing around with the problem, and since then no one has been executed. Today there is almost a platoon of individuals in our institutions waiting, waiting and wondering what is going to happen.

● (1500)

Why the ungodly haste to bring in this legislation at this time? This House has been sitting now since September of 1974, the longest session in all history and the nearest approach to parliamentary eternity ever seen in our country. And here at the last moment this bill comes along, and we must pass it or continue to sit. Why?

I mentioned a moment ago that the Canadian Civil Liberties Association did not ask for this. Nowhere in its statement of conscience, signed by many of the most responsible of Canadians, is there any question of abolition for other than murder.

I have read these sections of the bill. When I first found out, I could not believe that the Government of Canada in this year—or any year, but this year particularly—would bring in this legislation. Happy days are here again for terrorists all over the world, for those who would destroy, and for those who would undermine the Government of Canada. Am I overstating it?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) said, I believe, that the expenditure for security at the Olympic Games would be $40 million or $50 million. Battalions of armed forces—and I am using "battalions" in an exaggerated form—RCMP, city of Montreal police and provincial police are mobilizing and training for the purpose of meeting any potential danger. Do hon. members think that the Government of Canada or the government of Quebec would countenance expenditures like this unless there was danger? I ask hon. members to ponder that when they vote on this matter because I will not vote for a bill which provides an open season for terrorist mob murderers or those who would achieve immortality by assassination.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not making a partisan speech today. I am making one from the heart, regardless of whether somebody may say I am guilty of inconsistency. Not at all, for I repeat, treason is treason. In a year when the Olympics take place, above all times, we are asked to say, "Come unto me all ye who would destroy; come, PLO and all the other alphabetical individuals of that kind, to Canada, and if you destroy, all you will be subject to is a comparatively short sentence".

I can just see Castro—because he has become somewhat of a highly regarded individual in some parts of our country by some people—sending some of his 12,000 up here. Could we stop them? We have no right whatsoever; they can come here. Today they are operating in Africa and in South America. Castro has threatened that they will operate elsewhere. This suggested amendment is the most unbelievable I have seen in this House in my time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are some in this country who are so fond of Castro that they go to see him face to face. He tried to see me in 1962, and I was busy, but there are others who found it necessary to endeavour to visit him by canoe. They did not get there. Greater love hath no man than he who would endanger his life in a canoe to get to Cuba.

Under this legislation a group of individuals in Canada who want to set up a Marxist state by force can do so, but subject to what? A comparatively short period of imprisonment! Surely in the heart of hearts of all, and in particular of those who are abolitionists, there must be some concern about this.

I do not want to be repetitious, but when I asked the Prime Minister to remove this he asked me whether I was speaking for the Conservative opposition. In that he revealed the transparent deception of a so-called free vote in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is my first and main point. I will be back. I have to be away because I did not expect that parliament would be sitting for so long. Nobody else did either. The reason parliament today in large measure is in contempt across Canada is the fact that it is being used as a plaything. We sit, we talk for an hour and ask questions—as does the hon. member who interrupted me earlier, but our questions are more intelligent than his—and then what happens? The House sits and goes on. Unless every one of us begins to realize the feeling of the Canadian people, I fear for the future of a free parliament, for everywhere in the world history shows that democratic countries go under when citizens begin to lose faith in their democratic leaders.

I can understand the attitude of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). He is widely criticized. He carries the mark of Cain on him, but he is doing what the government requires that he do within the powers which are granted to him. He is frank about it. He has withdrawn his suggestion that if this bill passes, he is out—with one change; he has said he will be out of the cabinet to start with. Now he has said, "I should like another portfolio".

Sir, no vote will be more important than this one. I am not going to draw a frightening picture of July, 1976, at the Olympics but I am telling you that unless a fraud is being perpetrated on the Canadian people by the government in contending that we have to spend, among the two or three levels of government, approximately $1 million on security—if that is so, then by passing this bill we are placing ourselves in the position of accessories before the fact. This is dangerous. To take such a course at any time would be dangerous but to do it now—Mr. Speaker, I do not want to express how much I fear the consequences.

Some suggestions have been made that we will pass the bill and put it into committee. I know there are some worshippers of committee in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. Mr. Speaker, I have been here longer than most and I believe that many wish that had not taken place, but I have formed opinions. Committees are fine when they are dealing with matters that are non-partisan, are simple inquiries. Is there any member of this House who would say that if he were on the committee, regardless of what others would do, he would insist on the removal of this portion that has no place in it whatsoever?

Some people ask what will happen if the bill is defeated. Well, until December, 1977, the law will still be in effect. The government brought it in and said it was the nearest thing to Utopia in criminal procedure; it was going to bring about a new heaven and a new earth. Now that a lineup of individuals is awaiting execution, the government insists that this be passed. What will be the result, Mr. Speaker? If it is passed, we simply pass back to the government its responsibilities under the law. I am not here to say there should be no commutations—nothing of the kind. The matter of commutation naturally rests with the exercise of the Queen's mercy. No government should permit itself to be forced into a position to execute anyone simply by the force of public opinion.

All we will do if we defeat the bill because of the insertion of this reprehensible clause is give the government back the responsibility that it assumed in 1973 of deciding whether an individual shall live or die. Send it to the committee? We may just as well stand on our heads and expect to be effective in the House of Commons as to bring about the removal of that clause through a committee.

Other people ask where we go from here. That is not for us to say, Mr. Speaker. No one in this House of Commons, to my knowledge, has ever discussed the abolition of capital punishment for treason. We should defeat the bill, set up a committee and hear evidence in that place. It is as simple as can be.

Sir, I was going to say much more. I shall not do so. I am an abolitionist by conscience and by experience. One time Churchill was taking a stand which was believed to be inconsistent, and he was charged with it. He said, "I have no defence against the charge except when events change, principles sometimes have to change".

Bring in the bill without that clause and I will vote for it. Bring it in in its present form and make Canada the Mecca—if I may use that expression in this oil world—for all the thugs, terrorists, PLOs and Castros. As for me, my conscience will be clear when I vote against it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, the arguments for and against the abolition of capital punishment have been debated in this Chamber and in many other legislative bodies in many countries throughout the world. In spite of the millions of words that have been spoken, we still have murders committed in countries with capital punishment and in countries where the death penalty has been abolished. And, Mr. Speaker, the commission of murder will continue regardless of the outcome of this debate. Man is not a rational being, he is only capable of reason. And man is not a perfect being either, so his imperfections and weaknesses will continue. The point is, how best do we control man's imperfections in the interests of law and order, safety and security for the great majority who live within the law?

I am an abolitionist because my conscience tells me that violence begets violence and that the state should not lower itself to the level of its most wretched citizens. This of course is a very personal and subjective argument. I make no claim that my conscience is any more pure or moral than the consciences of those in this House who support capital punishment. Indeed I will make no attempt to persuade hon. members to accept my point of view. We must all stand and be counted as individuals when the vote is recorded.

What I will attempt to do is to explain why I am an abolitionist, in full knowledge of the fact that a majority of my constituents want capital punishment at this time—I emphasize that last phrase—at this time. I am also aware that should the voters of Brant at the next election choose to appraise my work on this single issue, I may not return to the House of Commons. This is the chance that I and other abolitionists must take in the free spirit of parliamentary democracy.

I mentioned that my support for abolition of the death penalty was based on my conscience. This certainly is not the only reason, because if I thought that the evidence with respect to capital punishment clearly showed that this kind of cruel and unusual punishment was in fact a deterrent to the commission of murder, or other crimes of violence, I would on this issue accept those facts and vote for retention.

I would now like to look at the evidence we have all studied over the last three and a half years which, I suggest to hon. members, most Canadians outside this Chamber have not studied thoroughly.

● (1520)

First I should like to state, as other have thus far, that concentrating on the issue of capital punishment will do little to protect Canadians from increases in the over-all crime that is occurring in this country. People who have written letters with regard to capital punishment have not only expressed their fear and concern about murder. They have also made it known that they are equally appalled about robberies, attempted murders, assaults, sexual offences, as well as other crimes.

We note, for example, that 1974 assaults accounted for 75 per cent of all violent crimes. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) stated in his opening remarks in this debate that unless we are prepared to exact the death penalty for those who indulge in assaults, then those who argue that capital punishment is the only effective deterrent available will be leaving aside as much as 80 per cent of all other violent crimes. Keeping this in mind there can be no doubt that the re-institution of capital punishment would be totally inadequate as a means of dealing with the total crime scene in this country.

I am reminded of a statistical report on crime prepared by the city police force of Brantford, Ontario, in my constituency, Crime in that city rose 25.8 per cent in 1975 over 1974. Obviously, citizens there are concerned and rightly so, and so am I. If one looks at the types of crimes committed, it becomes evident that either retaining or abolishing capital punishment would have absolutely no effect on this since none of these would be punishable by death.

Break-ins, fraud, theft, and assault accounted for most of the increased crime in the city of Brantford. By and large these are the types of crimes citizens are concerned with, and I reiterate that concentrating on the issue of capital punishment will not provide us with a means of dealing with over 75 per cent of our crimes.

This having been said, I would like to return to the specific question of whether capital punishment acts as a deterrent. I believe that in order to analyse fully the deterrent or non-deterrent aspects of capital punishment we must not only look at the statistics of murder but also the nature of the acts committed and of the people who committed them.

Paul Reid has studied this subject extensively and, in a paper entitled "Murder in Canada", he states that most murders are committed at home by people who have been drinking. Furthermore, the weapon most used in the 545 murders committed in Canada last year was a gun, most often a rifle or a shotgun. Fewer than 11 per cent of the deaths occurred during the commission of another criminal act such as rape, robbery or arson, while 36.3 per cent involved domestic relationships.

This study, as others before it did, suggests that, generally speaking, murder is not the deliberate act of the hardened criminal but rather an impulsive, irrational, unthinking deed either by an average citizen momentarily impassioned, or by the mentally unbalanced. If we accept this analysis it becomes clear that the vast majority of murders usually involve passion and little thought is given to the possible punishment.

Numerous other studies have been done which suggest that capital punishment is not a deterrent. In the United States, U.S. criminologist Thorsten Sellin found that there were no real differences in homicide rates between states that had and had not capital punishment. Sellin also noted that there was no upsurge of murder in states which had abolished capital punishment, nor was there any real decline in states where it was restored.

Professor Sellin's conclusions were found in earlier years by the British Royal Commission studying capital punishment. The commission found, and I quote:

—there is no clear evidence in any of the figures we have examined that the abolition of capital punishment had led to an increase in the homicide rate or that its re-introduction had led to a fall.

It is interesting to note that not long ago in the British House of Commons, which represents 48 million to 50 million people in the United Kingdom, where there has been a lot of terrorism and brutal murders in northern Ireland, bombings in London, Liverpool, Manchester and other places, in their wisdom they overwhelmingly rejected the re-instatement of capital punishment.

Going back even further in time we find that in nineteenth century England—I know this example has been worn threadbare, but it is still relevant—pickpockets were hanged in public yet the best time for a pickpocket to carry out his trade was during a public hanging.

This relates to another issue which bothers me to a considerable degree. If we brought back capital punishment for first degree murder—

Mr. Dinsdale: We have it now.

Mr. Blackburn: —after 15 or 20 people have been hanged, juries may become extremely reluctant to bring in a verdict of first degree murder when in fact the murder was first degree. They will bring in a verdict of second degree murder simply because they are by nature abolitionists. As happened during the fifties, society will get tired of the responsibility of having to declare that someone should forfeit his life. Retentionists should keep in mind that within five years' time this could conceivably happen. People will get very upset, and jurors will let a man off for first degree and convict for second degree. Instead of spending 25 years in jail that person would be out much sooner as a result of a lesser conviction.

In Canada the most noted study on this subject, compiled by Ezzat A. Fattah of Simon Fraser University, again suggests, and I quote:

—that the cause of homicide and murder cannot be found in any single factor but in a total situation in which a special law or particular punishment can have little or no effect.

The professor also pointed out that:

—other offences of violence for which there has not been a change in punishment should show no increase or at least a lower increase than that in criminal homicide.

In other words, to those who argue that the suspension of a particular type of punishment leads to an increase in a category of crime, I would simply ask, for instance, why the rate of assaults in a city like Brantford has increased dramatically? Obviously the sentencing in 1975 was no different than in 1974.

I have become convinced that capital punishment is not the solution to lessening murder rates. An examination of the evidence that I have presented today, as well as of evidence provided by other members and specialists outside this Chamber, indicates that capital punishment does not effectively lower the murder rate.

In dealing with this matter we must also necessarily deal with the irreversibility of the death penalty. While it may rarely occur, there is that possibility of error in our judicial system. Professor Charles Black in his book "Capital Punishment: The Inevitability of Caprice and Mistake" concludes that, aside from the moral implications, capital punishment should not be instituted because of the vulnerability of the criminal justice system to caprice and mistake. Hon. members cannot ignore this on the basis of the odds involved. Even if one innocent person is hanged, it is the mistake of those in this House. A brief review of the empirical or factual evidence leads me to believe that you cannot support capital punishment on deterrent grounds.

I have noticed that in some of the speeches given by hon. members capital punishment has been supported and refuted on the basis of moral arguments. While I don't intend to indulge in a moral or philosophical approach to this topic I would like to deal briefly with the religious authorities which some have used to support the retention of the death penalty. I do this because much of my mail on the subject cites the Scriptures in favour of capital punishment.

It has been pointed out, not only by the Solicitor General but by other members as well, that narrow scripture citations can be used to support almost any point of view. In this regard I would simply like to quote what my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The-Islands (Mr. Douglas), had to say about using the Scripture on this subject:

> The Bible has been quoted in times past to support slavery, child-labour, polygamy, and burning of witches. Furthermore the Mosaic law provided at one time the death penalty for over 30 crimes, including adultery, homosexuality and witchcraft.

Obviously use of Scriptures out of context should not be emphasized in this debate. Let us not play God.

The main concern, indeed, our main task during this debate, is to determine whether capital punishment—its retention—will resolve our problems with crime, not only violent murder but all crime. I mentioned at the outset of my remarks that most people who have written to me on the subject of capital punishment fear for their own as well as their children's safety. What they read in the papers daily and what they see on their television nightly is frightening them. Yet much of this may be overplayed.

There has been some evidence presented in the House to suggest that the media has heightened the public's perception of its own safety. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) as well as my colleague from New Westminster have cited an article in the April edition of Psychology Today which indicated that one of the effects of violence on television is to create a perception in people's minds whereby they believe the violence they see on TV is like the real world around them. It is worth while quoting from the conclusions drawn from the article. The article states:

> We have found that violence on prime time network TV cultivates exaggerated assumptions about the threat of danger in the real world. This may lead to increasing demands for protection and to increasing pressure for the use of force by the established authority.

The same conclusions have been reached by Hans Mohr, a criminologist, who in 1969 became the first non-lawyer appointed as a full-time faculty member of the Osgoode Law School. For two years Mr. Mohr was also a member of the Law Reform Commission. In a recent interview with Quest magazine Mr. Mohr said that the incidence of crime isn't quite as high as some would have us believe. The situation, he says, is exaggerated by society in general and by the media in particular. He says:

> Communication is so good today that we seem to hear about everything. If we live in Vancouver we hear about a murder in Toronto. If we're in Charlottetown we know about a killing in Victoria. The important thing is that this is all we hear.

What he refers to here is that we rarely hear about the nature of the crime committed, something I mentioned earlier. For instance we may get a story on the late night news that a murder has been committed, but what we don't learn is that it was a husband who shot his wife while they were both drunk. Mr. Mohr concludes, "We don't find out that this is not the sort of murder that is very likely to threaten our own lives".

I do not mean to infer that crime in our society is no less a serious problem that it was five or ten years ago. As in my own riding, crimes of all kinds are on the increase. Yet we have to realize that this debate, focusing narrowly as it does on a form of punishment for approximately 10 per cent of our crime, will do little to deal with the other 90 per cent of criminal offences.

I believe that the sizeable majority of those in this country who favour capital punishment simply want to be assured of their safety. I share this concern for safety. We must ensure that parole boards do not grant temporary paroles or temporary leaves to prisoners if their release would pose a threat to society at large. We must also ensure that those who are in prison remain there—in other words, that our prison system is secure. Bail reform must be structured in such a manner that bail is not granted to those whose release may be dangerous to society.

More important, the whole Criminal Code needs to be reviewed to ensure that punishment serves a purpose. In one of the Law Reform Commission Reports it was found that four out of seven offenders in crimes involving property went to jail for a first offence. Most of us here must surely find that intolerable. The Commission concluded that society would be better served by a system of 'diversion', i.e. a method whereby offenders and victims are given the opportunity to find their own solutions instead of having the state impose a sentence in each and every case. This type of system could be used in cases where there is a good chance that the offender will not commit another crime. As criminologist Hans Mohr stated:

> What we need most... is a change in the public attitude toward punishment, away from the idea of harsh sentences, with no real purpose. When someone commits a crime you have to look at two things: What caused the crime? How do you punish it—and what will the punishment accomplish?

Finally we must direct most of our energy to finding the root causes of crime within our society. It has been said before, but needs to be reaffirmed, that hanging is a simplistic response which may satisfy our understandable desire for vengeance and safety but does nothing to solve the problem of violence and crime.

I would like to end my brief remarks in this debate by quoting Hans Mohr once more. This last quotation summarizes my feelings towards capital punishment. He said:

I would not be against it if it did any good, if it prevented murder. But there is absolutely no indication that it does. And I cannot see the sense in trying to prevent the killing of people by killing other people.

I mentioned earlier that juries were reluctant to convict anyone of first degree murder because they are either abolitionists or are simply tired of seeing society or the government take a life for a life. I want to end on one or two more notes. I refer to capital punishment as cruel and unusual punishment, a phrase which comes, I believe, from one of the amendments to the U.S. Constitution. I believe it to be so. I also believe that 25 years in jail is an equally cruel and unusual punishment. There is absolutely no incentive toward rehabilitation regardless of that 15-year time span in which a convicted murderer may petition three Superior Court judges and then, hopefully, go to the Parole Board and perhaps in the next few years be released. Twenty-five years behind penitentiary bars, in this country at least, is probably a punishment worse than death.

What I would like to suggest, and I know it is not novel, is that the hardened criminal, the criminal who refuses to try to rehabilitate himself and be receptive to rehabilitation programs within the penitentiary system, should be forced to work at meaningful jobs in extreme protective custody. I would suggest that such prisoners be paid and that part of their money be banked, the money to go to supporting their families, if they have them, and toward defraying the cost of their own support instead of forcing the taxpayers to pay the whole load.

Speaking now of the hardened criminal, the hit man, the contract killer, if there is one thing that these people are absolutely terrified of it is an honest, hard day's work, because they have never lived that way in their lives; they have lived by crime. It is doubtful that this will ever get to committee, but I would suggest that some day this provision be incorporated into the 25 year or 20 year life sentence. The government is proposing 25 years now, but it may be 30 years at some point in time or it may be reduced to 20 years. Simply to lock these people up and keep them in prison like animals is inhumane. So I reiterate and re-emphasize that, as an abolitionist, I suggest the government consider getting these people out of the penitentiary for at least eight or 10 hours a day and putting them to meaningful work, which would be the toughest punishment for them but would not be inhumane.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the last speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Would the hon. member for Brant permit a question?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I listened with considerable attention to the hon. member's speech. On general principles I agree with his comments about the incredibly long term of imprisonment, the question of whether it is humane and whether or not it is going to create problems within the institutions which are almost beyond solution. But under this particular bill—I do not think the hon. member touched on this—when people are convicted of second degree murder, which is that type of murder that is not planned or premeditated and does not come within the special cases involving policemen, prison guards and so on but is related to crimes of passion, murders committed on the spur of the moment, usually committed by someone who has never committed a crime before and probably never will again, there is a mandatory ten year sentence.

I should like to use a dramatic example to illustrate my point.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Ask your question.

Mr. Fraser: I will come to my question in a moment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest that the hon. member put his question; he is getting into debate.

Mr. Fraser: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I must remark that when there is a debate on an issue like this and questions are permitted, which is rare enough in this House, I think all hon. members should accord an hon. member the chance to put his position.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. Would the hon. member put his question?

Mr. Fraser: My question to the hon. member is this—he did not touch on this point—is he prepared to support an initiative on the part of other members to amend that particular clause so that discretion is given to judges or parole boards not to lock second degree murderers into a mandatory 10 year sentence which, if I can use the hon. member's word, I too think is inhumane?

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that question because I addressed myself almost totally to capital punishment and hanging. I definitely agree with the hon. member that a crime of passion that results in murder usually happens only once; it is very seldom repeated. It is an on the spot thing, something that happens off the top of your head as a result of passion, alcohol consumption, a mixture of alcohol and drugs, or an uncontrollable urge. I also agree that it would be equally cruel and inhumane punishment to cause a person to spend at least 10 years in jail before parole. The hon. member who asked the question is a lawyer and I am not, but if I am not mistaken this is one classification of prisoner in our federal penitentiaries who in the past and down to the present has been the most receptive to rehabilitation. There is no reason in the world why they should be forced to remain behind bars for 10 years if they are receptive to rehabilitation, and most of them are.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, to me this debate on capital punishment is very important. It is also troubling, for a reason I would like to explain.

We have now before us some very specific legislation reflecting the intentions either of cabinet as a whole or of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and his advisers. This bill was not prepared and written under the influence of members but rather some expert types who prepared it according to their knowledge and opinions. This means we have to decide on a very specific bill that does not necessarily reflect the views of members on the crime situation in Canada and the treatment of criminals.

I would like to put on record that by conscience I cannot favour capital punishment. But as a member of Parliament, I have received a mandate from my constituency. I hope therefore I reflect the opinion of one part of this country. I will therefore endeavour to see beyond my own conscience and my own views, to evaluate in the fairest and most objective way I can the crime situation in Canada, in the light of which I will make a judgement on the specific legislation introduced by the Solicitor General.

Under this bill, we would abolish capital punishment once and for all, and replace it by 25 years' imprisonment for some kinds of murders. The bill explains the various kind of murders. They call this peace and security, this bill respecting the control of firearms and capital punishment. Mr. Speaker, as the member for Lotbinière, I cannot support the bill. I am forced by my conscience to vote with those who want to retain capital punishment, for the reasons I shall explain.

There are five factors around which this debate should be centered. First of all, everyone in the House will recognize that there is a serious increase in the crime rate in Canada. This is not restricted to one province or one area, but is generalized. We can look at the hearings of Quebec's Commission of Inquiry into Organized Crime and see how criminal organized forces in a premeditated, organized and even super-organized manner, direct operations which are not only illegal, but also murderous for their own profit. It is a kind of parallel government or power. It controls the automobile market, prostitution, thieving, and so on. This is the first fact that everyone will admit.

The second fact is the one which concerns me most, is spite of the fine statements of principle of the Solicitor General who, to this date, has been satisfied with making statements. Action is still not for today, it seems. Juvenile delinquency in Canada is still seriously increasing and directly related with the crime rate. What about probation, assistance and support programs for young people who have committeed only one offence, which is not necessarily criminal? What are we doing to help these young people rehabilitate themselves? Very often they commit offences of this type because of an unbalanced or unsteady family context or because of money, education or schooling However, this minister who is asking us to abolish the death penalty has done absolutely nothing concrete to prevent crime among young people and to help them.

Fourth everyone will once again admit that the penitentiary system in Canada is completely inadequate. People go in and come out constantly, and we are no longer surprised in Canada that someone can go to prison, be released, go back in and come back out again. This happens constantly. A criminal is arrested and has a trial which costs a lot of money. The criminal is set up comfortably in prison, in spite of what some of my colleagues will say, and the first thing we know is that he has been released. When he does not get out by himself, it is with the help of the Solicitor General through the National Parole Board. And the criminal regains his freedom.

[Mr. Fortin.]

In this respect, Mr. Speaker, the National Parole Board is mainly responsible for the great concern of the public as regards the crime rate. The minister tells us: believe me, if you want us to abolish the death penalty, I promise you that we will not grant paroles in such or such a case and that we shall be very strict. This is what he says, but in the same breath, he says that if we do not approve his bill, he will resign. This is blackmail and it distorts the debate; there can no longer be a free vote under these conditions. Those who want the Solicitor General to resign will certainly vote against the bill and those who want him to stay will vote for it. Mr. Speaker, I think we should consider these factors during the debate on the death penalty. To abolish the death penalty, we would need not only the assurance but also the promise, within the framework of a very specific program that we would make assessments to control the crime rate in Canada. What methods shall we use? What shall we do? It's very nice, Mr. Speaker, to watch on Quebec TV criminals appearing before the inquiry commission, it is very entertaining. But what does it change to organized crime? What safeguards do we give to the public?

Mr. Speaker, this is a first point on which the Solicitor General shall decide once and for all. What does he intend to do to control organized crime in Canada? We do not have any answer on that subject. The minister is a staunch abolitionist but he proposes absolutely nothing to control and contain the increase in crime. It is absolutely essential and with an example I will illustrate this attitude that I cannot understand, this lack of action on the part of the government.

A criminal commits an armed robbery in a jewelry. The police is called. Policemen are paid for this as it is their function, their work to defend and protect the life and the property of the public. In Canada, policemen are armed. So they arrive on the scene of the robbery and there, Mr. Speaker, they risk their life instead of the owner if he is not there to prevent the robbery. The thieves went there not empty handed but with arms in a premeditated manner. So they chose a course of action. They developed a strategy. So they go to carry out their robbery and they are armed in case society should try to prevent them from doing so because, according to them, they have the right to take someone else's property. There are lots of laws in Canada against theft, but in the mind of those hardened criminals it is not a theft. I do not refer to the one who commits a crime of jealousy or non-premeditated offences, I refer to the organized criminal who commits a robbery. It is premeditated. He intends to take someone else's property.

I believe that in Canada we still recognize the right to private property. Society pays policemen to prevent that kind of incidents. What does happen? If policemen arrive on the scene of the crime, obviously shots will be fired. Why? Because someone wanted to earn his living honourably through his work and someone else decided not to work and not to live honourably by robbing the property of the one who works honestly all day long. This is a theft.

Such a theft is usually made by someone who refuses to proceed in the normal way to get an income and wants to take advantage of the income of another who has worked and took some pains to earn one. Then, Mr. Speaker, the policeman risks his life to protect and prevent such an action. The thief who is caught or taken by surprise takes flight, trying to save his skin. For the policeman, it is self-defence since he is on duty. This is why he wears a uniform, he is armed and trained.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, two things might happen after such a hypothetical incident. The policemen finally catch the criminal or the thief who is tried and with supporting evidence is finally jailed. Then the Solicitor General intervenes after merely a few years. The statistics are there to show that the same thief is caught back and discharged again. Such a thing happens.

When gun shots have been exchanged, Mr. Speaker, and a police agent has been injured, and I know at least two who are completely paralysed, who will be incapacitated for life, and a third who is all crippled following an act committed while on duty, it is therefore a premeditated murder. Some might say, it is an accident, that it derives from the theft. That is the argument put forward by my predecessor from the NDP—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, and private bills.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been ongoing and fruitful negotiations, as befitting the prospects of a nice week end, relating to private members' business. It has been agreed by all parties that we will deal with the report stage and third reading of Bill S-33. This bill will be dealt with by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. McIsaac), and it is my understanding that it will proceed through the report stage and third reading. We will then deal with Bill C-242, which is being reported to the House, standing in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson). I understand there will be a short speech by a member of the opposition on that bill, and then we will proceed in the normal course to Bill C-245, again standing in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore. There is agreement as well that all other private members' motions and bills would be stood at the request of the government in order for us to proceed in this way.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order I just want to make sure I heard the parliamentary secretary correctly. Did I hear him say that first we would be dealing with the Bill S-33, and then Bill C-242 in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson)?

Mr. Blais: Right.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, so far as the public bill, S-33, is concerned, there is no problem. As the House leader suggests I am prepared to say we will consent to the two stages today. I have nothing to do with any negotiations in respect of private members' bills. I just wish to make that clear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my understanding that Bill C-242 will come up automatically.

Mr. Blais: Yes, it will, but there have been negotiations.

Mr. Paproski: No, there have not. With whom have there been negotiations?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, we will let things fall as they may.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Do I understand that we have unanimous consent to proceed in this fashion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

UNITED GRAIN GROWERS LIMITED

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion) moved that Bill S-33, respecting United Grains Growers Limited, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. McIsaac moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PRIVATE MEMBER'S PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

NON-SMOKERS RELIEF ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE RELIEF TO TRAVELLING NON-SMOKERS

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved that Bill C-242, respecting relief to non-smokers in transit, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs be concurred in.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there are two Bakers involved in this bill. Where is the other Baker? Is there another member?

Mr. Blais: The one who seconded the motion has just stepped outside, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not want any misunderstanding. I said earlier this is a private member's bill and I do not want to become involved because in terms of private members' hour I think it would be improper for me to do so under these circumstances.

Smoking Ban

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, there are two Bakers in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I am sorry, but there is no debate at the report stage. The motion now is for third reading.

Mr. Yewchuk: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to point out that I am not clear concerning why the Chair decided there would not be any speeches at the report state. There indeed were about five amendments made in the committee. I was present at the committee meeting when they were made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Standing Order 75(14) states:

When a bill has been reported from a standing or special committee, and no amendment has been proposed thereto at the report stage, and in the case of a bill reported from a Committee of the Whole, with or without amendment, a motion, "That the bill be now read a third time and passed", may be made in the same sitting.

Mr. Robinson moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) for his efforts on behalf of a large number of Canadians. There is no doubt that the hon. member who sponsors this bill is doing so on the basis of kindness and consideration for others. If you prefer, he would seem to be placing the well-being of others before one's self. I am sure non-smokers, particularly those who suffer from asthma, emphysema, or a similar ailment, are grateful to the hon. member for his efforts to enable them to travel in comfort. In some cases people are unable to travel because of the effect of smoke in a confined area.

I believe we should stop to consider how this bill, if it should pass, could be administered. Would a passenger, whether on a bus, a train or an airplane, who insisted on smoking be charged with an offence? Who would have the responsibility of charging him or her if the law had been broken? A passenger cannot be removed from a vehicle which is airborne. There would be fairly disastrous results. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to remove a smoker from a train or a bus midway between the place of boarding and the destination.

As a non-smoker I agree with the purpose of this legislation, and I appreciate the problems many travellers experience while en route in a smoke-polluted vehicle. The question is, can a human being's habits or behaviour be totally controlled through legislation? Surely our society has not reached a level where common courtesy has disappeared and ordinary manners have been overlooked or forgotten to the extent that laws have to be enacted to force one human being to treat another in a humane manner. I would certainly not want to believe that degree of selfishness has developed, or ever will.

I know one Canadian airline for a while placed all non-smokers toward one end of the aircraft, at the back, with smokers forward. There were too many non-smokers, so their positions had to be reversed to retain balance. This proves that the majority of the travelling public would probably welcome an arrangement whereby they could travel in a smoke-free vehicle. Would those who dislike smoke or who suffer from inhaling it be willing to have a member of their family or a friend seated elsewhere because he or she would be smoking? Would a family travelling together accept the rule, if it were in effect, that all smokers had to be seated in a separate area?

Think of the inconvenience, for example, if one parent smoked and the other did not. They would be compelled to sit in separate sections, only one of them being with the children. The father or mother would not be able to leave the smokers' area to join them because there would not be space for her or him, since the space paid for was for the entire journey.

In earlier years trains had a coach for smokers, and that did not seem to cause any problem. Passengers merely returned to the regular car until the next smoke. Theatres have designated areas for those who smoke, and many restaurants have recently set aside a room so non-smokers can enjoy their meals in comfort. One does not need to suffer from a respiratory illness to find smoke-filled air unpleasant, or even sickening, and the fact that smoke-polluted air can cause ill health, in itself should be sufficient reason for smokers to refrain from giving in to the habit while travelling, or being very sure that they are not adding, to too great an extent, to the discomfort of their fellow passengers.

With the railways and airlines in this country financially running in the red, so to speak, year after year, would they not be willing, even desirous, of formulating policies on their own to ensure the well-being, comfort and health of their customers? Perhaps a little encouragement in the right way, offering reasonable suggestions and pointing out that such a policy would be to their financial advantage, would result in positive and effective action being taken without creating force through legislation, which this bill would do.

I have been informed that at least one airline in Canada will make an attempt to take care of travellers to whom smoke is a health hazard. If the passenger cannot manage to contact officials prior to his flight time, he or she should be able to mention the fact when having his or her ticket processed. An additional simple step in the right direction would be for the stewardess who demonstrates the use of oxygen masks or serves meals, etc., to ask if anyone on the plane wishes to move to a smoke-free section, and if there is anyone who would be willing to transfer with a traveller who should be in his area because of smoking or not smoking.

If airline passengers knew the rules, and those rules were emphasized right on the ticket envelope and in ticket offices, as well as in newspaper advertisements, most adults would go along with the policy. I doubt that as many would willingly be removed under this proposed law when smoking in a restricted section of an aircraft, be charged with breaking a law, and eventually pay the penalty, whatever it may be. Would reasonable and ordinary procedures such as this not be acceptable without adding another restriction to the lives of Canadians? Adjustment takes time, but people can be persuaded more easily than they can be forced. Good public relations must never be overlooked when one human being is associated with another.

Unfortunately there will always be those who have no feeling for or consideration of others, and there is no doubt that is why the member for Toronto-Lakeshore introduced this bill. He did so because persons have experienced difficulty, healthwise or because of concern for their future health, and I too have received representations for assistance to have a sensible policy adopted.

As far as buses are concerned, most of them are air conditioned, and little would be gained by assigning a certain number of seats for smokers. The smoke would circulate, but would be removed at the same time.

With all respect to the hon. member who sponsored this thoughtful bill, I can only repeat my earlier question: can manners be legislated? While a habit such as smoking is not ill-mannered, the abuse of any privilege is inconsiderate, and I would say that falls into the category of politeness and courtesy. To sit in a train, a bus, or a plane and blow smoke on to a fellow traveller or into the air around that person or persons is just as impolite as letting a door close behind you without looking to see if someone is following and could be hit. A program of self-analysis, through various departments is needed to point out what living is all about, that this world is made up of people, not just of one selfish, self-centred, self-indulgent human being.

Can people not place themselves in the shoes of others, at least part of the time? Could one who is a heavy smoker stop long enough to think how he or she would like fumes blown into his or her face, on to his or her clothes, and through the air around his or her immediate area? Would a smoker, whose sense of smell I have been told is not sensitive, like to breathe garlic, cheap perfume, or some unpleasant odour, for an indefinite period without any means of escape or relief?

I was amazed to realize just recently that visitors to hospitals expect to smoke right in the sickrooms. Some were indignant because they were refused entrance to an area where oxygen was in use to save lives. If that is not an example of thoughtlessness and lack of consideration, it would be hard to find one. Legislation cannot change that type of person—education and advertising could on the part of the carriers.

The solution to the problem of habitual smokers would seem to me to be one of education—signs, as used in stores; warnings in appropriate areas about health hazards to smokers and to everyone; a sentence or two added to advertisements for trips; travel agencies could co-operate. I would even go so far as to suggest that the CBC—which cannot be interfered with by the cabinet or reached by anyone else in this Chamber who has criticism or suggestions—be instructed to remove the use of tobacco from its televised productions. Not being a TV viewer on a regular basis, I have been told that seldom, if ever, is there a show on CBC without a cigarette or pipe hanging from the mouths of the performers.

The Department of National Health and Welfare is attempting to curb the smoking habit, and that deserves the co-operation of every Canadian. Why not have this Crown corporation, which reaches practically all homes in this country, join that department in its efforts and even mention that smoking is a health hazard? Could the CBC not have programs without anyone smoking, or consuming alcohol for that matter? If a producer feels that he is harming viewers by omitting the use of tobacco, one of the performers could say a sentence or two about polluted air, good health and how precious it is. That would be a service to smokers and non-smokers, to children and to adults, to restaurants, hotels, airlines, trains, and buses.

I understand well that it is not easy for anyone in business to try to dictate to a customer, and I would not expect that type of service. A few well placed signs, however, and the comment that there is a separate area for those who desire to smoke would not be out of place when a person enters an establishment. That would be far better than to ask people to leave after they have become settled, causing embarrassment, and more than likely losing future business.

Again I say that legislation to control the manners and personal habits of people would be looked upon as another restriction. What would the punishment be if anyone refused to avoid or leave a prohibited area on a federally controlled vehicle on land, water, or in the air? Would a traveller who broke the regulations be refused accommodation in the future? Who would decide on the penalty? How could such legislation be administered on a just basis? In my opinion the general public is already faced with and hampered by too much legislation and government interference—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Towers: —without getting into the implementation of rules relating to their habits.

I agree that a problem does exist and that the health of everyone is affected by smoke, whether inhaled directly or with polluted air. I also believe that people, if approached in a sensible and reasonable way, will follow limits put into effect by the operators of public vehicles. They get along all right in theatres and stores where smoking is prohibited; they would go along with designated areas for their use while travelling.

I am sorry to have to disagree with the hon. member, but the passage of this legislation, in my view, is not in the best interest of Canadians. I do not think it would accomplish that which the hon. member would like it to do, and for that reason I do not think that the House of Commons should allow its passage at this time.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I thought I would make a few comments on this bill as well since it is connected with health in a general way. I do not think anybody will argue with the idea that non-smokers are entitled to clean air no matter where they may be, whether it be in transit or at work, at home or at play, or anywhere else.

Smoking Ban

We know from many years of experience with smoking that it is a hazardous habit creating all kinds of difficulties for many people. I suppose the most common difficulty we face is allergy. A very high percentage of Canadian people are allergic to cigarette smoke. Some of the problems it causes for them are stuffy noses, runny, itchy eyeballs, and of particular significance in transit in an aircraft is the swelling of the mucous membranes of the respiratory tract which result from the allergy which results in obstruction of the channel between the middle ear and the throat, known as the Eustachian tube. With the obstruction of this tube resulting from irritation by smoke one can experience severe middle ear pain during ascent or descent of an aircraft. For that reason alone, if for none of the many others, it is a good idea to ensure that people who have allergies to cigarette smoke are given access to transportation conveyances which are free of cigarette smoke in the interests of their own comfort.

We also know that cigarette smoke, and perhaps pipe and cigar smoke—although pipe and cigar smoke have not been incriminated as cigarette smoke has in these areas—contribute to a whole host of respiratory tract disease such as bronchitis, bronchiectasis, emphysema, and even cancer of the lung. Cancer of the lung is not necessarily the worst one because the others can lead to death as well in the long run. Most people who have studied this problem realize that cigarette smoking is a health hazard. Whether the smoke is inhaled by smoking or inhaled secondhand from someone else's exhalations, the results are the same.

However, I want to point out that over the past 30 years one particular habit has been going on; I am sure everyone has seen signs in trains, buses, airplanes and so on saying "Cigarette Smoking Only", as though cigarettes had some kind of a sweet and healthy quality about them as opposed to pipes or cigars. The fact is that in studies which have been carried out, pipe smoking and cigar smoking have been shown to be less hazardous to health than cigarette smoking. I do not want to go into the technical details of why and how, but many of the studies I have examined tend to point in that direction. Therefore it is rather strange that over the years the pipe smoker and the cigar smoker have been somewhat abused, with the cigarette smoker having his way pretty well everywhere he goes and causing a lot of trouble for the non smoking portion of the public.

What we have had for the past 30 years essentially is that pipe smokers or cigar smokers in transit have become non smokers. I think that is something we should look at very carefully. We should consider the fact that this segment of the smoking population, when in transit, does not smoke at all.

Mr. Mazankowski: Are you a cigar smoker?

Mr. Yewchuk: It is possible, therefore, to give up smoking while in transit because the cigar smoker and the pipe smoker have been doing it for many years. When a cigarette smoker in transit complains his head off because he must have a cigarette while in transit, I have no real sympathy for him because it seems to me that if a cigar smoker can give it up—and I do not think anybody will argue the fact that a cigar is much more pleasant smoking material than a cigarette—we should be thinking about the possibility—

Mr. Mazankowski: Will the hon. member permit a question? The hon. member expressed a great deal of concern about cigar smokers being deprived of the right to smoke while in transit. Is he suggesting that this bill is really doing the opposite to what he suggests? In other words, is he suggesting that we should be expanding the bill to allow cigar smokers to smoke rather than just to deprive cigarette smokers and pipe smokers?

Mr. Yewchuk: I will try to clarify this matter for my hon. friend to the best of my ability.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Answer him at your next caucus.

Mr. Yewchuk: Perhaps we will take up the discussion at the next caucus.

Mr. Paproski: This is a private member's bill.

Mr. Yewchuk: The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) raised a very important point, and I do not want to be in a position where I may be misinterpreted in so far as my intentions in this debate are concerned. I am simply pointing out that smoking is unnecessary.

An hon. Member: So is drinking.

Mr. Yewchuk: I will get to that in a minute, but we know from experience that certain types of smokers have been able to give up their habit while in transit, and I am trying to make the point that it is possible for all smokers to do the same. I hope that clarifies my position in that regard.

Some of the things we noted while this bill was before committee were representations made by the railways, the airlines, and the bus companies. They made the point very emphatically that they thought this kind of legislation was totally unnecessary, mainly because they have already been following the practice of designating smoking sections and non-smoking sections on a voluntary basis for quite some time. It leads one to wonder why the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) felt that it was suddenly necessary to pass laws to cover something which is already being done. The hon. member appeared before the committee a couple of times, but on neither of those occasions did he provide any satisfactory explanation for wanting this bill rammed through the House in a hurry to become law.

As Conservatives we believe we have faith in humanity. We believe that the ordinary citizen of this country or of any other country is a considerate and humanitarian person who is always courteous enough to consider the feelings of other people in his vicinity, and if a sign has been put up voluntarily by an airline, a bus company or a railway company, we take the position that because of this basic courtesy people tend to obey these signs regardless of whether there is a law.

On the other side of the coin, if there is someone who is so discourteous that he will not abide by a sign such as the one I have just described, then I cannot see how this law would make any difference at all. In committee we explored in some detail the idea of the application of this bill if it should become law, and the fact is that it is almost totally impossible to enforce. The proponent of this bill himself stated that he felt there would be many occasions when it would be impossible to enforce any law emanating from this bill.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) briefly touched on the application of this law, and I would like to go into a little more detail in that regard. It seems to me that the situation is that if a smoker is in the non-smoking section of an aircraft over Saskatchewan, smoking to his heart's content and refuses to put out his cigarette when one of the beautiful hostesses asks him to do so, there is nothing more she can really do. She cannot fight or wrestle with the fellow, or hit him on the head with a club. She might simply ask him for his name, and when the aircraft lands report that name to the first policeman she can get her hands on. Normally in Canada there are RCMP constables patrolling air terminals.

I suppose the idea is that a hostess would find a policeman, point out the culprit as he was getting off the aircraft and expect the policeman to lay a charge. That looks all right on the surface, but when we consider that the laws are applied by the provinces, we have a problem. If a man is smoking over Saskatchewan and gets off the aircraft in Ontario, he cannot be charged in Ontario. He has to be charged in Saskatchewan. The RCMP would have to wire back to their colleagues in Saskatchewan to lay charges and have him appear before a magistrate there in the hope that he would plead guilty and pay the fine, or try to explain things. It is my impression that he would not feel obligated to take the next flight to Saskatchewan to face charges—indeed he might never go back at all.

We will wind up with a lot of charges on the books that will never be carried through. That just takes care of the situation within our own borders, mind you, and the international situation becomes much more complicated. If a flight lands in Canada and the offence is committed in Canada we might eventually get to the bottom of it, and perhaps the individual would be fined. If the flight is going outside Canada, to the United States, for instance, it happens that RCMP constables just do not patrol air terminals there nor in Europe. If the lady gets off the aircraft she has absolutely no recourse, nobody to whom to complain. Perhaps if she happened to come back to Canada the next day and the culprit were on the same flight she could lay a charge when she arrives in Ontario and it would be relayed to Saskatchewan. It becomes very complicated, Mr. Speaker.

There is then the problem of aliens who commit an offence over Canadian territory and refuse to abide by our laws. Once they are out of the country no charges can be laid at all. If the traveller were going outside the country the hostess would probably just forget about telling the policeman. Even if a charge were laid the chances of it being heard before a magistrate in this country are almost non-existent. So, Mr. Speaker, the proposed bill is of doubtful validity.

If an Air Canada aircraft were flying over the United States, or the ocean, or Europe, and a smoker refused to put out his cigarette in the non-smoking section, theoretically that crime would be committed outside our jurisdiction. What would be the point then in the hostess complaining to the police in Canada? They have absolutely no control over anyone who committed the crime of smoking in a non-smoking area somewhere over Europe or the United States.

The witnesses heard before the committee, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Kaplan), and the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, were ill-informed and ill-prepared. They could not give us any statistics on the ratio of passengers flying on Canadian airlines over other countries in relation to the number who fly over our own air space. Without that information it is virtually impossible to determine to what extent this law should be applied. It seems to me if the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore were really serious about wanting the bill to pass, and if the parliamentary secretary who spoke on behalf of the government and said it wanted it to pass—if they had done their homework and presented all the facts we could have made a proper assessment of the bill and determined its validity.

My hon. friend from New Brunswick, who is in the habit of accusing me of taking cheap shots in committee and in the House—

Mr. Corbin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to emphasize that I was not addressing myself to the hon. member across the way who has the floor. The only problem is, he has pretty sharp ears. Now that I have the floor I must say that that was a cheap shot.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member for Madawaska is so sensitive to hearing the truth.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, on a further point of order I should like to inform the hon. member that the name of my riding is Madawaska-Victoria, and I am pretty proud of that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest that we stop taking cheap shots at each other and get back to the subject of the bill.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it quite clear that I think that the hon. member's riding is a great place. I was not casting any reflections at all on the riding of Madawaska-Victoria. I am sure he has good reason to be proud to represent that riding. If I represented it I should be proud as well. I was reflecting on the hon. member himself rather than on the riding.

Mr. Corbin: That is why I am such a good representative.

Mr. Yewchuk: I will not express any opinion on whether the hon. member is a good representative or not; we will let the people of his riding decide that.

The other thing that bothers me about the bill is the rather narrow approach to the question of smoking in public places. I am sure if the hon. member had given it some thought he would have realized that people spend very little of their living time travelling in aircraft or buses. Perhaps members of parliament spend more time than other people doing that, but it still does not amount to more than two or four or ten hours a week.

Mr. Pearsall: He does not know where B.C. is.

Mr. Yewchuk: The hon. member says he spends more than ten hours a week in an aircraft. It is a good place to hide, or work, or sleep.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a short question to the hon. member who just spoke. I gather that he believes in the principle of the bill. Does he support the bill itself?

Mr. Yewchuk: I think the principle of the bill is pretty good as far as it goes in that it proposes to provide a clean air space to people in transit. As far as supporting the bill itself is concerned, I think we are going to have to wait until the vote is called.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as has been mentioned by a number of others, this is a private member's bill—a bill respecting relief to non-smokers in transit. It is not a bill on which supporters of the government have been asked to vote in favour, but it has been made very clear that it is supported by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to the extent that hearings have been held.

I want to congratulate the member responsible for carriage of the bill, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson). During the committee hearings we learned that the bill was supported not only by the interest groups from whom one would have expected support, such as the non-smokers' associations that are forming all over the country, health associations, the group who represented the doctors, but the carriers themselves supported the bill. The bill is even being supported by the tobacco industry and others from whom one would have expected opposition.

● (1640)

Those hearings indicated conclusively that there was general support for the bill. Now, when the bill comes back in the House, the Conservative party seems to be determined to use the rules of procedure in this House to keep the bill from being voted on today.

Mr. Paproski: We support the bill.

Mr. Kaplan: We have 17 minutes left.

Mr. Paproski: You are filibustering.

Mr. Kaplan: I urge opposition members to use those 17 minutes constructively to see if the bill will carry and be sent to the Senate.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, it is always difficult to follow my colleagues, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) and the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk). Over the years, they have demonstrated that they have a great deal of insight. Their astute sense of analytical judgment is surpassed by few in this House.

Nevertheless, upon superficial reflection on this bill, one would think it would be rather straightforward. However, I believe it raises some deep philosophical questions. Being a political scientist by profession—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You wouldn't think so.

Mr. Whiteway: There is my good friend, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay). I remember in times past my good friend from Manitoba. I would have thought in this last private members' hour my friend from Manitoba would have been more interested in bringing forth a private members' bill on the Endangered Species Act in order that he may protect the endangered species of Liberals in western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): We are a species that will never die.

Mr. Whiteway: There he goes talking about species. We on this side of the House have been interested lately in the Freshwater Marketing Corporation. Speaking of species of fish, the hon. member for St. Boniface is not unlike that species known as a jellyfish, which is described as a jelly-like substance with no backbone.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member get back to the subject under discussion.

Mr. Whiteway: I am getting to that, Mr. Speaker. Had you given me the opportunity I am sure you would have seen the relationship of my previous remarks to the legislation.

I looked back in history to see what the various philosophers, and this is basically a philosophical question, had to say about this matter of liberty of smoking. I looked at Kiergagaard and the existentialists. I had to bypass him. I looked at Hegel with the cyclic history concept and his emphasis on the thesis and the antithesis and the synthesis, and I had to pass over him. I looked at John Locke, and the state of nature and the noble savage idea, and I thought that was not applicable.

I looked at Furebach and his concept on materialism, and I looked at Jefferson on democracy. I looked at Marx and his concept of relations of production, and that was not applicable. I looked at Eugene V. Debbs and Norman Thomas for the sake of my friends here on my left, and I thought perhaps they had no more to say than they had to say on the economic theory of the country.

I looked at the Bible to see whether the biblical Christian concept had anything to say about this whole idea of smoking. I looked at the Decalogue, the dispensationalists and the escatalogical ontologists and I felt they did not warrant this kind of consideration.

At last I did come across a man, John Stewart Mills, and his essay of 1859 "On Liberty". Although the flame of that essay was written 100 years ago, it burns as brightly today as the day it was lit. I want to bring to the attention of the House some quotes from that essay. I quote:

> That the only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilized community, against his will, is to prevent harm to others. His own good, either physical or moral, is not a sufficient warrant. He cannot rightfully be compelled to do or forebear because it will be better for him to do so, because it will make him happier, because in the opinion of others, to do so would be wise, or even right. These are good reasons for remonstrating with him, or reasoning with him, or persuading him, or entreating him but not for compelling him, or visiting him with any evil in case he do otherwise. To justify that, the conduct from which it is desired to deter him must be calculated to produce evil to someone else. The only part of the conduct of any one, for which he is amenable to society, is that which concerns others. In the part which merely concerns himself, his independence is, of right, absolute. Over himself, over his own body and mind, the individual is sovereign.

I believe that this bill, in terms of the liberty of one to smoke in public places or not, has some deep implications in so far as if it would become law it would become part of our constitution, and we know that some men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence and deem them like the Ark of the Covenant, too sacred to be touched. However, I know that laws and institutions must go hand and hand with the progress of the human mind.

This is the point that I want to make. The progress of the minds of Canadians is far ahead of the progress of the government and of the progress of the member opposite who is introducing this legislation. In substance, and in the spirit of this proposed legislation, I would not disagree. However, he is introducing legislation that in fact puts into place that which has already been done, accepted, and implemented by most Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: He who would do his country the most good must go quietly with the prejudice of the majority until he can lead them into reason. The reason of Canadians has already led them into the very kind of action that the hon. member is proposing in this legislation.

So that I would know something of which I am speaking today, in order that I can be distinguished from hon. members opposite, I did some investigation. Upon calling Canadian National Railways I found that for 20 years they have had smoking and non-smoking sections on their train cars. They are now engineering and are pioneers in a new concept known as mobile separaters. According to this new innovative technique by Canadian National Railways, they will have these separaters which will be moved according to the number of smoking and non-smoking passengers in any given car. You would not out of necessity have to sit in a smoking section simply because there was a permanent fixture there if in fact you were a non-smoker and they were in the majority in that particular train car. On the new turbo train they have set aside not one part of a car or one car, but two cars on every train as non-smoking cars.

I then thought that while perhaps that may be true of national companies, what about obscure or relatively obscure companies in other areas? Everyone in Manitoba knows that the public transit system in Toronto is run by the Toronto Transit Commission. But I am surprised that many people in Toronto have not heard of Grey Goose Bus lines. Anyway, I phoned Grey Goose and asked them about non-smoking sections in their buses. They informed me that they were years ahead of the hon. member opposite and that the Canadian Motor Coach Association has been, and is, enforcing regulations to this effect—that the first five seats on every bus are reserved for non-smokers.

● (1650)

Because we in this House are perhaps more inclined to fly than we are to drive, some facts about the arrangements made to accommodate non-smokers on aircraft would be of interest. I checked with Air Canada and found that on 747s two of the first four cabins are set aside for non-smokers. On DC-9s as well as on 727s, the first 13 rows are reserved for non-smokers. I could go on. The documentation is massive and exact.

An hon. Member: Parliament lives!

Mr. Whiteway: The facts I have outlined clearly indicate that the progress already made is well in advance of the intention set out in the hon. member's legislation.

I am not a lawyer. I have always made my living honestly.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): We can take a joke.

Mr. Whiteway: Speaking of jokes, there was a joke going round St. Boniface in years past. I understand he is now a member of the House of Commons. In the high schools of Manitoba they teach that to be good law, legislation must conform with three basic criteria. It must be reasonable, it must be enforceable, and it must be punishable. I suppose the bill before us does address itself to all three of these ingredients. However, some of my own friends draw attention to the pitfalls which exist with respect to enforceability. I would refer in particular to one provision concerning motor vehicles which travel from one province to another. According to a provision in Part I, clause 2(d), this might indeed apply to smoking in the non-smoking section of a limousine in use for transporting passengers to an airport, and I do not think that is a very practical application.

Above all, a law should be able to stand the test of whether or not it is acceptable by society. The very fact that the purpose of this legislation has already been accomplished de facto makes it unnecessary for a law to be enacted on the subject. There is one thing which can be said of Canadians: they are not under-governed. There is an old dictum of political scientists, perhaps more honoured in the breach than in the observance, that governments govern best which govern least.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: As a non-smoker and one who is in agreement with the spirit of the proposal, unless I should be accused of talking out this legislation with three minutes still left to go, I shall yield the floor to one of my hon. friends.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say at the outset that I am bitterly opposed to this bill for reasons which my hon. friends have stated. Whether an individual is a smoker or not has nothing to do with the argument, because the airline carriers and the people who run the bus lines and the railways have already conformed to the intent of this measure.

My hon. friends from Vegreville and Moose Jaw have drawn attention to the conclusion of the Law Reform Commission that we should do away with legislation which has no meaningful purpose. Yet here we have a bill which is without a meaningful purpose. I cannot understand why legislation should be introduced to force somebody to do something which is already being done on a voluntary basis.

I should like to make one comment about the hon. member opposite, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson). I find him to be a very admirable gentleman. I told him in committee that I was bitterly opposed to this legislation and he knows this is my stand. But I think it should also be said in this Chamber that he is a gentleman who has contributed a great deal to the welfare of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. So that we may hear the rest of the speech of the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) and perhaps reach a decision on this bill, I wonder whether the House would give unanimous consent to sit until 5.30?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Elzinga: It is interesting to note what individuals associated with transportation in this country said when they appeared before the committee with regard to this piece of legislation. Mr. Thompson of the Canadian Motor Coach Association gave evidence that the system which had been introduced in the motor coach industry had been adopted on a voluntary basis, and that whether or not the bill became law he believed that system would continue. Carriers, he told the committee, were obliged to do these things by public pressure whether they wanted to do them or not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hour set aside for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. This House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF ALLEGED SCHEME TO DEFRAUD THE COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the Unemployment Insurance Commission of Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration advise the House of details concerning employees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission of Canada making use of the commission's internal form numbers 1116 and 1171 to infiltrate the commission's payment system without opening actual claim files, and finally that the minister give the House an estimate of the amount of money defrauded by this method, details of steps taken, if any, to deal with this rip-off, and if no steps have been taken, an explanation as to why not.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN PROGRAM OF RECLASSIFICATION PENDING ADOPTION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service recommended that classification should become a matter of collective bargaining, some of us feel that the Treasury Board should slow down rather than speed up the process of reclassification until parliament has acted on this recommendation. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the Treasury Board to postpone its program of wide ranging reclassification of public servants until parliament has acted on the recommendation of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service to the effect that classification should be made a matter of collective bargaining.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO AID PULP AND PAPER COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion of pressing and urgent necessity.

Since one of the main conclusions drawn by the Baker Weeks brokers' firm indicate that the Canadian pulp and paper industry will register a decline this year over last year, and the impact those difficulties may cause in the future and which may go as far as forcing plants to close down for an indefinite period, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House immediately survey the present situation and the anticipated situation for this year in the pulp and paper industry so as to introduce necessary correcting measures to counteract the negative consequences of such a recession on the economy and the employment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion may not be put.

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF FINANCIAL OPERATIONS OF COMPANY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity regarding the financial fiasco in Air Canada which, during the first four months of this year, has experienced a net loss of $14,474,-783.29. In light of the fact that such a net loss can be attributed to the contracting out of financial work and such things as the writing off of a debt of $186,000 of Electronic Associates Canada Ltd. of Toronto, Ontario, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to launch an immediate investigation into the finances of Air Canada and, in particular, why debts such as the one of Electronics Associates of Canada are permitted to accumulate to such levels and then written off. Furthermore, that after the Minister of Transport has investigated the situation and reported to this House that action be taken to rectify the financial problems of Air Canada by stopping the contracting out of financial work and taking steps to recover the debts such as the $186,000 owed by Electronics Associates of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGATION CORPORATION NOT COMPLYING WITH PROVISIONS OF ACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise, too, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of Part III, Section 23, Subsection (2) of the Fish Marketing Act, and in view of the fact that the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation continues to violate the law, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That the Minister of State (Fisheries), in conjunction with the Solicitor General, undertake an immediate investigation into the non-compliance of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation with the act.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED CHANGE IN REGULATION DISQUALIFYING RECIPIENT OF BENEFITS FROM JURY DUTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that jury duty is a compulsory obligation of a citizen, and in view of the fact a person receiving unemployment insurance benefits is automatically disqualified when called for jury duty because he is unavailable for work, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

[Mr. McKenzie.]

That this House recommends that the Minister of Manpower change the regulations so that this discrimination under the Unemployment Insurance Act is ended.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can only be presented for debate with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER INFORMED MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES OF VERBAL AGREEMENT ON FINANCING

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence and concerns the long-range patrol aircraft. On June 3 at page 14108 of Hansard, the minister is reported to have said that his statements the previous day and those of his colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, indicated very clearly that they were working together on this project. Would the Minister of National Defence tell the House if at anytime between November 15 and December 15, 1975, when they were working together on the project, the Minister of National Defence informed his colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, that Lockheed had given verbal assurances that it could provide the bridge financing?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my reference to my colleague and I working together indicates that our departments were in close collaboration, as well as the project office which is responsible to both, having personnel of both departments, and that there was a close interchange of information in the project office.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE MINISTER INFORMED PRIME MINISTER OF VERBAL AGREEMENT WITH COMPANY ON FINANCING

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I take it from that answer that the minister did not inform the Minister of Supply and Services. Would the Minister of National Defence inform the House just when he informed the Prime Minister of the verbal agreement between DND and Lockheed of the interim financing?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check the records to find out the exact date. The need for financing, as I have said many times, was known during November and was the subject of discussion in the Cabinet, the Cabinet committee and the Treasury Board. It was, as I have also said, about the middle of December that I was first advised by my deputy minister that Lockheed was not able to fulfil its commitment, or to do what it had agreed to do in financing. I am not certain at what point the Prime Minister would have become aware of this fact but I would think very shortly after I was.

Mr. Speaker: A final supplementary by the hon. member for Victoria.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRY WHETHER PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD AWARE OF VERBAL AGREEMENT WITH COMPANY ON FINANCING ON DECEMBER 2

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the supplementary is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Would the President of the Treasury Board tell the House if on December 2 when the Treasury Board met and discussed the Lockheed deal was he aware of the verbal agreement reached between DND and Lockheed and was he aware of the requirement by DND for $100 million to pay interest?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, when the cabinet considered this matter last November, we knew there was a financing problem of about $100 million but we did not intend to change the National Defence Department's estimates and we knew that discussions were being held about this problem between the National Defence Department and Lockheed.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRY IF MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS AWARE OF VERBAL AGREEMENT WITH COMPANY ON FINANCING ON DECEMBER 2

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Public Works. Could the Minister of Public Works, as a member of the Treasury Board, tell the House if on December 2 when the Treasury Board met and discussed the Lockheed deal he was aware of the verbal agreement reached between DND and Lockheed and was he aware of the requirement by DND for $100 million to pay interest.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think really that kind of a question having to do with the operation of a committee of Cabinet should be directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRY IF MINISTER OF VETERANS AFFAIRS WAS AWARE OF VERBAL AGREEMENT ON FINANCING ON DECEMBER 2

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): We thought you were on the Treasury Board. I will direct my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. He also is a member of Treasury Board. Could he tell the House if on December 2 when the Treasury Board met and discussed the Lockheed deal was he aware of the verbal agreement reached between DND and Lockheed and was he aware of the requirement by DND for $100 million to pay interest.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A final supplementary by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, apparently the Minister of Veterans Affairs was not tuned in. On December 2 you were a member of the Treasury Board and that is why I am directing my question to you.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Questions can be directed to the minister in a general capacity. I am not sure if the Minister of Veterans Affairs, from the information I have before me, is now a member of the Treasury Board which is important and relevant. It has been clear from many precedents in the past that questions ought to be directed to ministers only in their present capacity. Questions can be directed to ministers, as members of the Treasury Board, but I want to make it perfectly clear that they should be directed to present members of the Treasury Board.

Mr. McKenzie: The Minister of Veterans Affairs was on the Treasury Board at that time and I want to know about his involvement in the discussion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has hit precisely on the point. That was on December 2. Questions related to that time ought not to be directed to any member of the Treasury Board unless he is on the same board at the present time.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRY IF PRESIDENT OF PRIVY COUNCIL AWARE OF VERBAL AGREEMENT ON FINANCING ON DECEMBER 2

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the President of the Privy Council. I will repeat my question so that it is perfectly clear. Could the President of the Privy Council, as a member of the Privy Council tell the House if on December 2 when the Treasury Board met and discussed the Lockheed deal, was he aware of the verbal agreement reached between DND and Lockheed and was he aware of the requirement by DND for $100 million to pay interest.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is misinformed. I am not a member of the Treasury Board.

An hon. Member: Who is?

MANPOWER

PROPOSED JOB CREATION PROGRAM—AMOUNT OF EXPENDITURE AND DATE WHEN PROGRAM OPERATIONAL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the government will need a lot more luck to get out of the mess it is in on that issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I should like to pose a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In the House on June 3 he said with reference to his new year-round job creation program to deal with the fact of having some 760,000 Canadians out of work that he would have a program to submit to Parliament in the fall. I would like to ask him how much the government plans to spend on that program and, secondly, when the government intends it to become operational.

● (1420)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The amount of money that will be allocated to it has not been decided, so that decision would be premature. The time frame of the whole approach is associated with legislation in the fall which might or might not be required for the job creation program to which I referred. It will certainly be required for the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which are associated with it. I would expect that to be presented in the fall session and it will be up to the House to decide when it receives parliamentary assent and royal assent. Did that answer cover the question of the hon. member or was there another part to the question?

Mr. Broadbent: The other part is an elaboration of the first, and perhaps the minister could be a little more helpful since he also said in the budget debate that it takes "$200 million to drive less than one fourth of a percentage point" off the unemployment levels. Is he prepared to say to the House that the kinds of funds that the government intends to allocate for the program will be sufficient at least to bring down the level of unemployment, say, early in 1977, well below the 7 per cent level?

Mr. Andras: I think that is a variation of the same question. It would be premature for me to indicate the funds available. I also said in my comments in the House the other day that already $100 million have been allocated to the local initiatives program or to similar types of programs starting this fall. That will probably be in place before the other measures to which I referred are implemented.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, in connection with the $100 million that the minister referred to, may I remind him that the government cut off almost the $100 million for such programs from its budget just before Christmas as part of their new restraint program, so it can hardly be seen to be a new sum of money. They just recycled the program to bring back the $100 million which they cancelled before.

My final supplementary question is as follows: In his budget comments the minister said that the government would not set a target for unemployment levels for 1981 even at the 5.5 per cent level. Since he said in the same speech that the unemployment level considered acceptable to the government depended in part on the rate of inflation, does this not amount to saying that part of the program against inflation will be waged on the backs of the unemployed in Canada?

Mr. Andras: No, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR DECISION ON EXTENSION OF PROJECTS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My supplementary question is for the same minister. In view of the fact that some LIP projects remain from last year and will not be completed by the June 26 deadline, even though the minister stated in the House that a decision will be made on them, would he assure the House, in order to overcome the unemployment that cancellation of them will cause, that a decision will be reached so that these projects can be extended to create employment?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The only likelihood is that we will look at those projects which, for well considered and examined reasons, have not been completed in the time frame originally set for them and projects which require no further additional funds above those already allocated. I want to look at each project individually and make my decision on its merits.

Mr. Marshall: Would the minister give the House an assurance that if no more money is needed these legitimate projects will be extended and that he will make his decision before June 26?

Mr. Andras: The only assurance I can give is that I will examine each one on its merits and make a decision on that basis.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NEED FOR BETTER DEFINITION OF PASSENGER SERVICE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

A few days ago, during the hearing of a court in the province of Quebec, a Department of Transport official said that the Canadian National, and more particularly its passenger service, should generate profits. As it is important to clarify the purpose of the rail passenger service, can the minister tell the House if his department considers that service as a private service or as a profit-making company?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, our basic intention with the railway passenger service is that it be run as effectively as possible and where it is reasonable, having regard to all those factors, that that service be maintained. It is our objective to do that in a more effective way than in the past by maintaining good equipment and effective marketing, and thereby to offer the service in a sensible way, but not to do it in areas where there is clearly too great a cost and where there are other available alternatives.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

As the minister answered that the service should be improved, but not in the areas where it would be too expensive per passenger, does he intend to make a statement to the House on this matter and, if so, when?

[English]

Mr. Lang: I made a statement to this effect on January 29 in this House, following which hearings were started before the Canadian Transport Commission to identify the specific areas in which the service is essential and desirable, as well as other areas in which it is simply too costly to maintain. This will be followed up with specific action on the part of the railways, either to improve the service or in certain cases to discontinue it.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—POSSIBILITY OF EXCHANGING PRESENT CANADIAN SUPPLIES FOR FUTURE SUPPLIES FROM ALASKA

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Can the minister tell us whether discussions are going on between Canada and the United States about the feasibility of swapping natural gas, which is now produced in Canada, for future supplies of natural gas which may come from American sources in Alaska?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there are any formal discussions of this kind going on. It has been an idea which has been in the wind for a very long time, and probably hon. members on both sides have been talking about it. As far as I know, there are no negotiations going on.

Mr. Gillies: Can the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether—or perhaps this is too premature; I am not sure—these discussions are about exchanges in terms of value rather than quantities?

Mr. Sharp: As I indicated, any talks which would be going on would be of an extremely informal character, and I doubt whether they have become as specific as that.

SOCIAL SECURITY

ALLEGED PROVISION OF UNITED STATES COMPANY WITH LIST OF THOSE IN RECEIPT OF OLD AGE PENSIONS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I tried to obtain information from his department, but understandably at the present time civil servants are not anxious to give any information.

Therefore, I come to the source and ask the minister whether his department had anything to do with providing a United States company with a list of elderly adults in small towns and small cities across the country who are in receipt of old age pensions or allowances, the American company using these names for the purpose of having mailing lists available to casualty companies, bank and trust companies, memorial parks, hearing aid leaders, drug discount plans and so on? Will the minister get in touch with his department and ascertain whether this confidential information has been made available by any officials in his department, and if not, has he looked into the question of how an American company could have a list of approximately 400,000 elderly citizens receiving pensions, which number is being increased each month by approximately 25,000 names?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the right hon. member for drawing this question to my attention. To use his language, I will check at the source in my department to see whether there is any foundation to the allegation or the reference the right hon. member has made. I can tell him that it is illegal under the act for any such information to be made available to other than provincial governments with which we have an agreement, and that provincial governments are bound by this same rule of secrecy. So any such information which might have been provided would have been provided against the law.

Second, the right hon. member referred to 400,000 elderly citizens. I remind him that the list of senior citizens receiving OAS exceeds 1,800,000. It would be very unlikely that this particular information would be provided by my department or any provincial government that has any such list for its own program. I will inquire but I cannot imagine that this is accurate.

● (1430)

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question. While the minister cannot imagine, Mr. Speaker, that is not what I asked. I wanted him to find out, and I asked a reasonable question for which I could not get an answer from his department. Everybody is running for cover.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I said I would inquire so what more can the hon. member ask for.

TRANSPORT

SALE OF 48 EXPO TRAIN CARS—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ACQUIRE

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Transport relates to the sale by the city of Montreal, subject to approval by city council tomorrow night, of the 48 Expo train cars at 15 per cent of replacement cost. Considering that these cars are in good condition and usable for a public transit proposal involving Chateauguay and South Shore areas and that Montreal has assured me it will be prepared until tomorrow evening to sell these to either provincial or federal governments, can the minister give us some assurance that he will give full collaboration to the province of Quebec in any initiative it may take to acquire these cars which are needed for public transit purposes now?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Laprairie has pressed the various people who should be involved and concerned with commuter facilities in this area. I have said before that it is essentially a provincial and municipal responsibility at the beginning to deal with a commuter service. These trains seem to be suited for it. It seems to me that the federal program of assistance with regard to commuter equipment would be available for this kind of equipment to be put in place for this service. I would be very happy indeed to collaborate on any proposition put before us.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION AGAINST IMPORTS FROM AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and relates to imports of carcass beef from New Zealand and Australia. In view of clear indications that New Zealand has gone back on her unofficial agreement not to export beef to Canada at more than a six cents per pound spread, which is well below the equivalent exports to the United States, and further, in view of current indications that both Australia and New Zealand are now selling or dumping their beef into Canada at prices 25 cents per pound below equivalent exports to the United States and well below the current equivalent price of Canadian beef, will the minister once again review his December 31, 1975 statement that positive steps would be taken to prevent such specific actions and would he indicate what action may be expected?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the figures that I have and the figures that the hon. member has are different. Either my figures are too conservative or his are too liberal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: There is no difference.

Mr. Whelan: I agree with him about Australia and New Zealand—especially Australia—because we met with their people last week and discussed this very nitty-gritty issue with them. As far as I am concerned, they are treating the United States differently than they are Canada. According to a verbal agreement, they said they are charging much less in Canada, selling beef in Canada at distress prices and selling it in the United States at higher prices. They know what will happen to them if they lower the price in the United States—the United States government will bar them from selling meat in that country. Because Canada is a much freer trading country than the United States they know they can get away with more here.

BEEF—SUGGESTED VOLUNTARY AGREEMENT ON IMPORTS WITH AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): A supplementary question and I want to assure the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that my figures are as current as this morning. Perhaps the minister would consult with his colleague [Mr. Watson.] the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and consider again the introduction of a Canadian meat import law that would permit voluntary agreement on imports with Australia and New Zealand that are definitely not firm quotas.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that is what I wanted the hon. gentleman to say. Now that I have the concurrence of the Official Opposition, I will forge ahead with that kind of law.

MANPOWER

PROPOSED JOB CREATION PROGRAM—REASON FOR FAILURE TO GIVE OUTLINE OF DETAILS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In the course of his remarks last week, the minister indicated that the change in the unemployment insurance law would go into effect perhaps by the end of the year. He also indicated he would not be in a position to indicate an employment program until some time this fall. I am sure the minister would agree that, apart from the question of the money involved, it would take some time to put such a program in place and make it effective. Having announced a change in the unemployment insurance situation and having indicated approximately when it will take place, is there any reason why the minister cannot now inform the House of the general nature of the program designed to implement employment for at least some of those affected? Can he give the House any possible reason why he should put one half of the program in force to change unemployment insurance when he is unable to give the House any assurance of the nature of the other part of the program or that it will be in place in time to meet the need?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, I must express surprise at that comment coming from the hon. member who has been an advocate for some time on behalf of the program as it related to unemployment insurance, with no suggestion that I have heard on the other half, that is the provision of direct job creation.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister has not listened to me on this subject. Some of his colleagues have not listened to me on other topics and have only taken the part of what I said that they chose to take.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Having announced his intention to introduce an employment program, out of concern I ask the minister why he cannot announce that program with respect to employment in general terms now and what right he has to ask members of the House and the people affected to wait until next fall? Can he honestly expect us to believe and the people affected to believe that his failure to announce the program is for no other reason than he has not the slightest idea what he is going to do?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Halifax is being a bit unkind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andras: I did outline the general approach to the employment program in my comments in the budget debate the other day. I said that it would be developed into a year round, multi-facted program with emphasis and direction to areas of chronic high unemployment with special emphasis on those people who are likely to be unemployed for long periods of time. If the hon. member would review my statement he would see there is a fair amount of general detail there. Many complexities of design still have to be worked out, as I also indicated quite candidly.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN RECLASSIFICATION PROGRAM PENDING ADOPTION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. The subject is the same as that of the motion I sought to move under Standing Order 43 so the minister has had at least that much warning. In view of the fact that the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service—and that title takes nearly half of the time of my question—recommended that classification be made subject to collective bargaining and in view of the complaints from public servants that the Treasury Board is now engaged in a speeded up process of reclassification, may I ask if the government will consider slowing down this process until parliament has made a decision on the recommendation to which I referred?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member any firm assurance that we are going to stop any classification until the legislation is passed. I think that the operations of the government must go on as required. However, I hope that my officials will consider the recommendation of the committee, and that instead of accelerating the rhythm they will have to act fully within the established standards. I would be surprised if this were the case.

● (1440)

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the President of the Privy Council. Can the President of the Privy Council say whether the government has taken note of this recommendation and whether a proposal to implement it will be in the legislation to be introduced this fall?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman will recall, I made a statement about the government's intentions with respect to legislation. We are establishing a special task force to prepare some proposals for consideration. These proposals and the work of the task force I hope will involve consultation with the various employee organizations so that this and other points will be given serious consideration.

REFUSAL OF LES GENS DE L'AIR TO WORK WITH COMMISSIONER KEENAN—RESIGNATION OF COMMISSIONER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that Les Gens de L'air refuse to acknowledge and work with the appointed commissioner, what action is the government prepared to take in this regard?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we hoped to encourage them to work with the commissioner. I must report to the House today that, in view of the controversy which came to surround the appointment of Mr. Keenan as commissioner, I received, just before entering the House, his resignation as a commissioner of this inquiry. Of course, I received it with profound regret and will present to the House his letter of resignation and my reply thereto at the earliest moment.

CALGARY—DATE OF COMPLETION OF NEW FACILITIES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I raise with the Minister of Transport the question I raised with him last week. I am concerned about over-crowded conditions at Calgary airport terminal, conditions which are unsanitary for users of the airport, and which affect the working conditions of employees. What is the situation now? When will the new depot, which the government has been promising since 1968, be completed?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, vast expenditures are being made on the fine new airport terminal at Calgary, which is being put in place rapidly. There was a slight delay before construction began in the redefining of the nature of the terminal, to meet recurrent clearance and other needs. Construction is now going forward satisfactorily.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. There is no time limit on construction. The government has spent millions of dollars on the existing depot. It has erected one leanto after another, but has not built sanitary toilet facilities.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: If hon. members would like to see what those washrooms are like, I will invite them. Can the minister give me any time limit as to when this depot will be finished?

Mr. Lang: After listening to the hon. member's question, hon. members may be surprised to learn that a very large sum of money, about $127 million—I forget the exact figure—is in process of being spent on the Calgary terminal buildings and facilities.

Mr. Woolliams: You have been spending it since 1968.

Mr. Lang: If the hon. member for Calgary North would go to the other side of the tarmac at the airport, he would see that facilities are rising with great rapidity. The airport will become one of the most elegant in this country.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON STATUS OF INQUIRY INTO BILINGUAL AIR-TO-GROUND COMMUNICATIONS IN VIEW OF RESIGNATION OF MR. KEENAN

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Halton and has to do with the minister's answer about Mr. Keenan's resignation. What is the status of the investigation Mr. Keenan was conducting? Will another person be appointed, or can we expect a dual appointment, as mentioned in the newspapers? Would the minister bring us up to date on the status of the investigation.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, hon. members are up to date. I was handed the letter of resignation just as I came into the House, which means that hon. members are very much up to date. I will want to consider some of the problems this raises. I emphasize again that I had indicated in the past my personal confidence in Mr. Keenan's ability to conduct a fair and proper inquiry. He would have worked with the tests which would be conducted with the simulator, and would have worked closely with people in industry and government who were involved with those tests. We intend to continue with those tests, and to have the co-operation of the pilots and air traffic controllers. I can go no further at this point.

NEGOTIATION OF CONTRACT WITH PROFESSIONAL GROUP—ALLEGED ABSENCE OF CONSULTATION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Speaker, the collective agreement of the group of economists, sociologists and statisticians will expire on June 27. So as to anticipate that, the negotiating agent for that group submitted in good faith a proposal for a new contract to the Treasury Board on April 29, that is two months before the expiry date. But the day before that submission, the group had received from the Treasury Board a letter indicating that it had been unilaterally decided to abolish the classification structures of that group. My question to the minister is this:

Is the President of the Treasury Board aware of that development which came about without any prior consultation? Does he approve of it, considering the adverse effect such a decision by his department had on the morale?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I shall investigate. I am not aware of the incident mentioned by the hon. member. I knew their collective agreement was expiring. As to the classification, I will investigate and inform the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POSITION ON INTERVENTION OF SYRIA IN LEBANESE CIVIL WAR

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question addressed to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs arises from reports concerning the clash of Syrian forces with Lebanese forces within Lebanon. What position has Canada taken on this Syrian intervention in Lebanon which—although Syrian peacekeeping intentions may be praiseworthy—does not seem to have been authorized by any international authority?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member be kind enough to clarify his question. I did not understand if he spoke of a Syrian intervention or of our peacekeeping mission. I did not understand him exactly.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to clarify my question. What position has Canada taken on the Syrian intervention inside the borders of Lebanon? I gather that Syrian forces have crossed over into Lebanon, clashes are taking place and the situation is tense. I know of the great interest of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in that part of the world. What position has Canada taken on this unauthorized intervention?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, Canada is a sad witness, as many other countries are, to foreign interventions in that part of the world where cultural and other traditions are very close to ours, in Lebanon particularly. For the time being, Canada can do absolutely nothing because this would be another foreign intervention, which would therefore be unacceptable.

[English]

Mr. Johnston: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask if the Canadian government is still receiving an unimpeded flow of reports from our representatives in that country?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, as far as I know our embassy in Beirut has been closed for a very long time unfortunately and our personnel sent to Athens and other close and relatively secure places. There is nothing we can do from within Lebanon.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR REPEAL OF DEPORTATION AGAINST ISABELLE ROMIRO

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Is the minister aware of the decision of the Immigration Appeal Board ordering the deportation of Mrs. Isabelle Romiro, the wife of Luis Valdez, and of her four children? If so, does the minister intend to use the powers granted to him by the law to prolong the stay of this woman and her four children?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question to be a form of representation, and familiarize myself with the case with which I am not fully familiar at the moment.

AGRICULTURE

SKIM MILK POWDER—PROPOSAL TO MAKE SURPLUS AVAILABLE TO CONSUMERS AT LOWER PRICES

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Since the latest Statistics Canada figures show the quantity of skim milk powder in storage has actually increased substantially from April 1 to May 1 of this year, will the government now begin programs to make this surplus available to Canadian consumers, especially lower income consumers, at prices which, while higher than the give-away levels at which the government has been offering skim milk powder outside Canada, could still be lower than the present domestic price? Would this not be a major way to help both producers and consumers? I ask this question because recent events seem to indicate some degree of dissatisfaction with the present program, not only on the part of consumers but on the part of producers as well.

● (1450)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): There is no doubt there is dissatisfaction with the program—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: It is mainly because the producers have done what we asked them to do—actually, they have overdone it and produced more than there is an ample market for. There is nothing we do for other parts of society that we shall not do for this one. We are doing everything possible to distribute the product in as fair a manner as possible and in a manner which would not disrupt normal markets. I would remind hon. members that we are still supplying a subsidy to domestic consumers at 34 cents a pound, making skim milk powder cheaper than in any other nation in the world.

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATES—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTING CHANGE IN RATE ON RAPESEED PRODUCTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport in his capacity as minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the united opposition of rapeseed producers and processors on the prairies to the new freight rates on rapeseed products and the attempt to remove rapeseed from the benefit of the Crow rate, will the minister wait for the Hall and Snavely Report or does he still intend to impose new rates before the end of this month?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member would have the honesty to state what I presume he knows, namely, that there is no proposal to remove rapeseed from the Crow. The specific issue over which rapeseed producers are unhappy is the question of the rate at which rapeseed oil may move. Until 1971 or so it moved at a rate which was set by the railways according to total costs or their ordinary rate-setting pattern. The rate was frozen for a while since that time because of the appeal concerning that rate-setting process. In the last couple of weeks the Governor in Council directed the Transport Commission to allow no rate higher than a compensatory rate on rapeseed oil. That is the lowest rate which is allowed under the law. This is an approach to rate-setting on oil which the provincial ministers in the West understood was the best we could do. It leaves a discrepancy between rapeseed as a grain and rapeseed as an oil.

This has been a longstanding source of disagreement and the situation will require legislation to correct. There is, however, no likelihood of an early movement of these rates, even at that, because the difficulty of determining the compensatory level is so great that the Snavely Report could quite possibly be issued first. However, the problem caused by the discrepancy between the rates under the Crow on rapeseed and rapeseed oil still remains. This is what the crushers really face, and anyone who wants to be honest about it would recognize that fact and say so.

REPRESENTATIONS FROM ALBERTA TO REMOVE DOMESTIC FEED GRAIN SHIPMENTS FROM CROWSNEST PASS RATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My supplementary relates to a telegram sent to the minister by the minister of transport of Alberta asking him, in effect, to take the domestic shipment of feed grains off the Crow rate. What response has the hon. gentleman given to this telegram and can he assure us that he will not be taking the action requested?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Well, Mr. Speaker, I presume the hon. member would like me to give serious consideration to a request from any responsible provincial government. I consider the comment which has come from the Alberta government to be a responsible approach to the issue of the discrepancy in rates between meat and grain, rapeseed and rapeseed oil. I will certainly give this matter serious consideration and I would wish to discuss the question with the minister concerned before replying to him finally.

BROADCASTING

ALLEGATION RADIO LICENCE APPLICATION FORM PRINTED IN JAPAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. I have in my hand a copy of an application form for radio licensing from the Department of Communications which I obtained directly from the minister's department. Unbelievable as it may seem, I find it stated here that it was printed in Japan. Can the minister explain the disgraceful fact that a department of the government would by-pass Canadians, not only the Queen's Printer, but Canadian firms which I know are starving for this kind of business? Could she tell us not only how but why such a deplorable decision was made?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): It seems to me most unlikely that an application form would be printed in Japan, but I will look into the allegation.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS WITH PREMIERS OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES CONCERNING CHANGES IN ACT

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration; it concerns the Unemployment Insurance Act. Did the minister have any discussions with the premiers of the maritime provinces concerning the proposed changes in the Act before they were announced last month by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I have taken part in a series of bilateral consultations with provincial ministers and I am sure they include ministers from the Atlantic provinces. The hon. member asked specifically whether the premiers were involved. I do not recall meeting with the premiers themselves but the ministers were aware there were many options we were considering, including the one adopted on budget night.

SKIM MILK POWDER—PROPOSAL TO RELEASE SURPLUS FOR USE AS ANIMAL FEED

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture, supplemental to that asked by the hon. member for Windsor West. In view of the fact that insufficient quantities of feed grade skim milk powder are available in Western Canada at reasonable prices for use in the manufacture of milk replacer, poultry meal and calf starter, and since officials of his department, and, indeed, the minister himself undertook to have the Canadian Dairy Commission, consult with the feed industry as to the advisability of releasing sufficient quantities of skim milk powder to the domestic feed industry, may I ask the minister whether these consultations have been concluded and whether any positive steps will be taken in this regard?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the price the Canadian Feed Manufacturers Association offered for skim milk powder was 6 cents a pound. I met with the head of the Feed Manufacturers Association when he was here the other day and he said they would probably be prepared to offer more because of the tremendous increase in the price of soybean meal at the present time. I would remind the hon. member, and the hon. member for Windsor West, that this skim milk powder belongs to the farmers of Canada. If they want to give it away, I suppose they have the right to do so. But I am here as Minister of Agriculture to make sure that they get the best income possible and try to dispose of the product in the best way we can. I might add that they do not have the tremendous stocks of which the hon. member spoke in the House on Friday, when I was not here. There is not that much skim milk powder in storage and they are doing a good job of getting rid of it.

Mr. Mazankowski: If the minister is suggesting he is trying to get farmers the best price possible, may I remind him he is doing a damned poor job. I simply asked him whether he could tell the House whether the consultations he and his officials recommended have been completed and, if so, can he bring the report to the House?

Mr. Whelan: Well, if I am doing a damned poor job, the salesmanship job can be offered the hon. member any time he wants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: We will give him the same commission as we are giving any agent selling skim milk powder around the world. If the hon. member wants to be more useful than he is by asking the stupid questions he is asking, maybe he should go round the world and sell some skimmed milk powder. What he is saying isn't true. Farmers cannot afford to produce skim milk powder for animal protein; they would go broke quicker than they are at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: And let him tell the Opposition critic on corporate and consumer affairs to have the guts to go and tell the Quebec farmers that I am paying them too much for their milk. Tell the member for Brome-Missisquoi to do that. He has said so in this House. Tell him to go and address the dairy farmers of Quebec and tell them that I paid the farmers too much.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I would remind the minister that my job would be to sell rather than to store. That is what the business of selling is all about.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which stems from a matter I have raised in the House on other occasions concerning information furnished to me from high level sources in the public services, sources which I consider to be beyond reproach, dealing specifically with alleged defrauding of the Unemployment Insurance Commission by certain persons. I would not have raised this matter in the first place had it not appeared obvious from the information given to me that a serious situation existed.

● (1500)

I might point out, before proceeding directly to the main substance of my question of privilege, that what I am going to say in the next half-minute will provide the necessary background. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration, on the first day that I raised the matter in the House, made certain remarks in this chamber, and also outside the House, which in effect corroborated what I said. In this regard, I think I am quoting him quite correctly when I say that he used two specific adjectives; he referred to the matter as being "extensive" and "serious". He also said that this was "more than an ordinary problem" and was one "involving thousands and thousands of dollars". At the time, I considered that the minister was making a proper and truthful statement in regard to the situation, and, of course, I still believe that that is exactly what he did, based on the information given to me up to that time and reinforced by further information given to me since that time by sources I have referred to previously.

To move directly to my question of privilege, may I refer to certain public statements made by Sergeant Gordon Butt of "A" Division, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, located in the city of Ottawa. To begin with, it would seem to me that the proper procedure that should have been followed in a matter of this kind is that any statement dealing with things said in this House by a member of this House on behalf of the government should have been made by the responsible minister concerned, namely, the Solicitor General of Canada, in the House, and not by a non-commissioned officer of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, on behalf of the government, outside the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the conduct of Sergeant Butt in attempting publicly and politically to refute statements made in this chamber by a member of this House is a gross interference in the political sphere where police officers have no business whatever, and therefore interferes directly with the privileges of a member of the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: And vice versa.

Mr. Cossitt: I believe there is absolutely no significance, at least at this time, in why Sergeant Butt made these statements, but it is of great significance that he did indeed make them. Whether he made them through ignorance of the facts, or whether he made these statements intentionally or unintentionally, or whether he said what he said because the Unemployment Insurance Commission has failed to co-operate and to furnish all available evidence to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in their investigation—all these factors are of minor significance alongside the fact that a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has for some reason taken it upon himself to act as spokesman outside the House and to make statements that should have been made, if they were to be made at all, in the House by the Solicitor General.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I have always held the RCMP, as a force, in the highest regard—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member is not going to conclude without telling the House what the statements are. I have to make some decision as to whether or not the statements he has referred to in some way offend the privileges of the House, and I have not yet heard those statements.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I would add that the statements made by Sergeant Butt were to the effect that what I said in this House had no substance.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Cossitt: If the members opposite know a lot about this, then perhaps they would tell the Canadian people. He also went further and stated that it was exaggeration. He indulged in the use of certain adjectives which obviously, if they were to be said, should have been said by the minister responsible in the House for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: If the honourable seals opposite would be quiet, I will conclude my statement. I can only say, as I said a moment ago, that I have every respect for the Mounted Police. I do not wish to raise this matter as one that would cast a reflection on the force as a whole, but it does give one cause to have some reflection on certain members who wear the scarlet tunic when they speak politically.

I could furnish the House and Your Honour with the press reports that quoted Sergeant Butt, but may I conclude with these words: the government has denied and has hedged on Sky Shops and the judges' affair—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In seeking to conclude with those words, the hon. member does not conclude with the motion that would seek any action on the part of the Chair. In any case, having gained the floor on a question of privilege, he must realize that in referring to certain remarks that have been made by an officer of the RCMP and whether they could constitute a question of privilege, he would have to provide the House with detailed accounts of what the remarks were. Not having done so leaves the Chair with no choice but to find that no prima facie question of privilege exists.

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the question of privilege. In view of your ruling, I am very reluctant to comment on what has just been said by the hon. member opposite under the guise of a question of privilege, but I do not believe that we continually can let him and other hon. members on the other side make these remarks without our being given the opportunity to respond to them. The Solicitor General is not here today, but I can say that Sergeant Gordon Butt was certainly not acting politically on behalf of the government, as the hon. member opposite said he was.

Mr. Cossitt: What was he doing, then?

Mr. Poulin: What the hon. member has done by making these allegations is to bring into disrepute the whole of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. He has been unable to substantiate what he said as fact at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Poulin: The hon. member also referred to the UIC investigation. May I say in a conversation that the Solicitor General's office had this morning with the RCMP it was made apparent that the UIC is giving its full co-operation in every way to the RCMP in their investigations. May I say that it is a low attack that has been made by the hon. member, and against a public servant who cannot defend himself.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago Your Honour ruled that the matter raised by the hon. member for Leeds was not a question of privilege.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That is right; it is too low.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am not, of course, questioning that ruling, but under the guise of a question of privilege or a point of order—certainly I would think it too was not a question of privilege—the hon. member for Ottawa Centre rose and imputed something to the hon. member for Leeds which, upon reflection, on reading the statement, I think he will find false. Quite frankly, I think he is overreacting.

All of us in this House have a high regard for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and it is extremely important that none of us, in the exercise of our duties as members of parliament as we see them, either overreacts with respect to any comment that is made respecting the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or forgets the fact that when a comment that is held to be legitimate is made by a particular member, it should be confined specifically within narrow terms. The reputation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is extremely important to all members of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The difficulty here is very clear. The hon. member for Leeds makes certain allegations against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and their conduct, and I have no way of finding this to be a prima facie question of privilege. However, it has been the practice of the House to allow comment on the opposite side. The value of that is seen in the fact that failure to do it only provokes other spurious questions of privilege which are responded to in turn, and in that way the matter can go on and on. The fact is that there is no question of privilege on either side of the House. Members are rushing to the defence of each other and to the defence of the RCMP, and that is quite understandable. But the fact is that no question of privilege exists, and the matter ought to die there.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a further question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Leeds rises on a further question of privilege.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I will only take 20 seconds just to reply to the hon. member opposite.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Cossitt: The hon. member said I was casting reflections on the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cossitt: I did not cast any reflection on the RCMP, and I have every right to ask that that statement be withdrawn.

● (1510)

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cossitt: Think of the Canadian people, for a change. I have every right to ask the question, and I did not make that statement.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Obviously, the difficulty must be plain to all hon. members, that when a question of privilege does not exist it only invites disaster and a disrespect for the rules for the House to suggest that hon. members on a non-question of privilege should be entitled to reply or to go on with the same debate. That is the difficulty always faced when the Chair makes a ruling that no question of privilege exists. I would ask the courtesy and respect of all hon. members in that this matter be discontinued forthwith.

AIR TRANSPORT

TABLING OF LETTERS FROM MR. KEENAN

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like, under Standing Order 41(2), to table, in both official languages, the letters from Mr. Keenan and the brief comment thereto.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR EXTENDED SITTINGS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That, notwithstanding any standing or special order, for the remainder of the session, no private members' business shall be taken up and on Tuesdays and Thursdays, the House shall sit from 11.00 a.m. to 1.00 p.m. to consider government bills, provided that, on those days, the normal daily routine of business shall be taken up at 2.00 p.m.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, when I saw the motion on the order paper today, I expected that someone from the government side would rise in his place to give the House some reason that the government, through its majority, should decide to interfere with the Standing Orders of the House. Frankly, I am appalled, sir, as I am sure all thinking members are appalled, at the silence of those on the government benches in respect of this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We are now coming close to the end—at some time, in any event—of the longest session in parliamentary history, 317 days as of today. That is the length of two sessions of parliament, under ordinary circumstances. For some reason or other the government has assumed there is some magic in the date of June 30, and some reason that the ordinary Standing Orders of this House ought to be interfered with in order to finish a legislative program. It may be otherwise, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot help but think that what the government is attempting to do now is, in a rather cute way, bring the session to an end in a hurry. From the government's point of view there is a darned good reason for wanting to bring the session to an end in a hurry. Just cast your mind back over the past 317 sitting days. This is the government which could not handle the dredging contracts, for example, which found its way into the courts.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): This is the government which at one stage of the game felt itself so much in the saddle that it could sink to the level of having its members call judges, over which a minister, who perhaps should not have resigned, was forced to resign, and the minister who should have resigned still sits in this House.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I thought perhaps time would be the great healer and nothing more would happen to indicate the inadequacies of the government. Then all of us were shocked by the revelations which occurred in respect of the Sky Shops affair. This is just another indication of the deterioration of this government which now asks us to extend the hours of debate so it can go home. This is the same government that could not even handle tendering practices at airports.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I can tell I am getting awfully close to the bone when I arouse the hon. member for St. Boniface, whose contributions to the debates in this House are recorded now as "Oh, oh". That is the record. Sitting with the hon. member for St. Boniface, in the seat normally occupied by the Minister of Supply and Services, is the Minister of National Defence. This is the closest they have been to being together for a long time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The one thing we can say about the Minister of National Defence, and I hope he is not tainted as a result of occupying that particular seat, is that, unlike the Minister of Supply and Services, he has at least not yet seen fit to cast off his ministerial responsibility on a public servant who cannot defend himself. That is the record of the Minister of Supply and Services.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not think there is one minister of this government who is not only ashamed of its record—which is pretty dismal for 317 days—but is also not ashamed of the Minister of Supply and Services for his reprehensible and scurrilous attack on a public servant, thereby attacking the hallmark and the foundation of our parliamentary democracy, namely, the responsibility of ministers. That is why ministers have their prerogatives of office, and that is why they take the oath, because they are ultimately responsible. That great tradition has been denied and trampled by that hon. minister who normally occupies the seat now occupied by the Minister of National Defence.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): This is the longest session in parliamentary history.

An hon. Member: And you are prolonging it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You just wait and see how long we prolong it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I want to make it clear right now to you, Mr. Speaker, and to members of this House, that June 30 holds no magic for the official opposition. There are some legislative items on the order paper and on the shopping list of priorities of the President of the Privy Council which are important to us and important to the people of Canada, if they are not important to the government. I intend to speak about this matter today, and there are others who intend to speak about it in terms of the business of this House. Not only are we here now, on the 317th day, with the government trying to quickly end the session, but we should cast our minds back to another record of this government. This is the government that has used closure more times in this particularly long session than it has ever been used before in a session of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What were the government's choices? First of all, it decided that Bill C-58, dealing with Time, Reader's Digest and the income tax amendments was so important that it had to get it through this House. The government decided it had to overcome opposition to this bill, forgetting that it was also overcoming the opposition of the country. When that bill left this House, it went to the Senate. Who has been speaking against the bill in the Senate? I suggest it is none other than the Liberal senators.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The Secretary of State now wears a beard in order that his blushing will not show. We now have Bill C-83 before the standing committee of this House. The government had well over a year to prepare Bill C-83, on peace and security—including gun control, parole, invasion of privacy by wiretapping, and all the other things—but the bill was in such terrible shape when it reached the committee that the government itself sought to introduce 43 amendments to it.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

● (1520)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I repeat, the bill was in such dismal shape when it got to committee that the government saw fit to introduce 43 amendments to it.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): We listened to the people.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If the hon. member for St. Boniface is right, that they are listening to the people, then the result will either be that there will be 43 more amendments or they will withdraw the bill.

Then there is the subject which goes to the heart of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I refer to Bill C-68, the medicare bill. Here is another bill in respect of which the government has used closure. This is an interesting commentary on how these so-called Liberals function when they find that everything they touch is turning to lead. This is a bill which will drastically affect the delivery of medical care to people in all parts of Canada, particularly those parts of Canada which are low income areas and which historically have fallen behind all other areas of Canada. Yet this government used closure in respect of that particular bill, and we find that bill on the government's list of priorities with regard to the closing of a session.

There is no magic in the date June 30. As if what I have said is not enough, all members of this House might consider the effect of another bill which is on the order paper, Bill C-87, a bill which will have a dramatic effect on the east coast of Canada, on the ports of Canada, on the shipping industry of Canada and on the elevator industry of Canada, not to mention family allowances and the government's retraining program, as well as the legislation in respect of industrial research and development incentives and western grain stabilization. All these matters are the subject of Bill C-87. What does the government expect? Does it expect, in this way, to get the government out of here so that it will not look so bad? This government would look bad wherever it might go. Does the government expect that members representing areas affected by this bill will trade off the problems affected by that bill for a holiday? I do not expect so.

So I say to the government members, particularly the member who interjected a few moments ago, that if they think they will be home on June 30, they should make plans for August because we will be here fighting this legislation, particularly Bill C-87. I put it to members of this House: is it any wonder that the Gallup poll recently released indicated that the government is still at the lowest state in the public mind, and that the people of Canada are looking for an alternative to this government? Is there any wonder about the government's reputation?

This is another form of closure. There are other members who will speak in this regard. If the government thinks that as a result of this motion it is luring our party into this trade-off approach, then it has another think coming, because this party is prepared to stay and fight for the principles we think are beneficial to all Canadians. More important, we believe the Canadian public is behind us. We believe the Canadian public looks at this government as a government in retreat, in disrepute. Certainly, in the eyes of the public and some members of this House it has failed to take the responsibility for its mandate. That is the position.

I am sure that on the motion before us now, the government supporters will not take advantage of the debate. I am sure what will happen is that the hundreds, thousands and millions of Canadians represented by the backbenchers of the Liberal party will be unrepresented in this House. The Liberal backbenchers will be expected to sit mute while the problems wash around them. They will be expected not to intervene in the debate, and once again it will be the duty of the official opposition to carry the debate.

Mr. Speaker, I would think that at the end of 317 days of parliamentary practice we would have devised a way in which public business could be considered in an orderly manner. We have not done so. We wonder sometimes why it always has been the practice of this government to push into the latter part of the session some of the most important legislation with which this parliament must deal. Bill C-87 is one of those bills, and we intend to see some justice done for those who will be affected by its terms. I concluded by saying, let not the member over there who interjected, or any other member, feel that there is any magic in the date June 30. We are here prepared to do the public's business, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when motions to extend the hours of the sittings of the House are made, it is our view, that each one must be looked at on its merits. There have been occasions when such motions were made which we felt were unfair and unjustified and we have taken a very definite stand in opposition. There are times when a motion to extend the hours has merit and we are prepared to give our support. Let me say at the outset, so that it will be quite clear, that we intend to support this motion.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton began his remarks in good oratorical style by saying that he was appalled by this motion: He acted as though he did not know why it was being put on the order paper. He expressed the view that many members of this House would not know why this motion is in front of us, especially in view of the fact that the President of the Privy Council chose not to speak to it when it was moved. As my friend, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton knows, we—together with the House leader of the Social Credit party and the government House leader—have discussed this matter over a period of three or four weeks. We have discussed this matter at House leaders' meetings and we have discussed it with our various caucuses. I do not know how anyone could be taken by surprise today.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am not surprised.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not know how anyone could be appalled. I suspect everyone in this House knows why the motion is in front of us. The reason is that parliament is engaged, understandably and justifiably, in a lengthy debate on a very controversial subject, namely, the subject of capital punishment. We have pleaded with the government, and I must say in all fairness that the President of the Privy Council has agreed readily, that there should be no closure motion used on the debate on Bill C-84.

● (1530)

We take the stand—and the President of the Privy Council agrees with it—that because of the emotional feeling about that legislation, no one who wishes to speak should be denied the right to speak. Therefore, since it has been accepted that there would be no closure, and since we want to make provision for all those who wish to speak to do so, the proposal that has been put down today is for an extension of hours to make it possible for most or even all of the speeches on the subject of capital punishment to be made within the month of June.

An hon. Member: You don't know what it is all about.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I happen to know what it is about.

Mr. Mazankowski: Why don't you say it, then?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish my hon. friends would say what they mean.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: We will.

An hon. Member: Don't worry; we'll say it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The fact of the matter is that the motion proposes that we add two hours on Tuesday mornings and two hours on Thursday mornings. It also provides that each of the private members' hours, where they occur—a maximum of four in a week—shall be taken for government business on the understanding that the extra time will be devoted to the second reading debate on Bill C-84. I submit that on balance that is not an unreasonable request. If the minister were threatening closure instead of this, he would find me and my colleagues opposing him very strongly, but since the proposal is simply to provide more time so that there can be all the debate that members want on Bill C-84, I think it should be supported.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton had a delightful time reciting some of the mistakes that the government has made in this two-year session. When I look at the motion, it seems to be wide open—we can discuss just about anything that has happened in this session under the motion. I, also, could spend some time on this. I could complain about the fact that there has been no increase in the basic amount of old age security. I could also complain about Bill C-62 which provided for spouses allowances but discriminates strongly against widows, spinsters, widowers and bachelors. I could complain about some things that were left out of the bill regarding compensation for prisoners of war. I could complain about some other things that have taken place in the past, and about some things that are still before us. But parliament has taken its decision on these matters and I think we are all reaching a state, because of this session having lasted nearly two years, where we believe that it would be a really good idea if we could get this session over with and start a fresh one, certainly no later than the fall.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Having said that, I want to make it clear that I do not intend to take time to complain about the mistakes that have been made, because I am concerned about where we go from here. I am concerned about some of the other things that the President of the Privy Council wants to have passed before the House recesses for the summer or before we prorogue, and the minister knows it. We, in this party, are totally opposed to Bill C-68 which is down to the third reading stage, and we are also opposed to quite a number of things in Bill C-87. To make it clear on the record, let me say that Bill C-68 has to do with medicare and Bill C-87 is a restraint package which wipes out the Company of Young Canadians.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Where does my friend stand on that? The bill also imposes a number of restraints which affect the poor people of this country, and also gives legal effect to something the government is already doing, namely, freezing family allowances at their last year's level. We do not think the government should proceed with Bill C-87 in this session.

In all fairness—I have to be careful, because we hold our House—leaders' meetings with a certain amount of confidentiality, but since this matter was discussed, we know the President of the Privy Council has given us these bills, and he announced in public a number of times the bills he wanted dealt with before the end of June or before we rise for the summer recess—he has admitted that we are making it difficult with respect to Bill C-87 and it may be a bill that might be negotiable. Perhaps he or someone on the government side could say so in the course of this debate. I feel very strongly about Bill C-87 and I think it should be held off. I think that Bill C-68 should be dropped altogether. I do not think it is necessary, and I think that with the federal-provincial ministers' conferences that are still taking place, both among first ministers and among finance ministers, it would be better if that bill were stood. But this produces a kind of mixed package. My friends to the right are saying that they are concerned about Bill C-87. Let us separate this and get things clear. Let us have the Tory caucus give some advice or instruction to their House leader, so that when it comes to meetings of House leaders we know what we are talking about. If they want not to go on with Bill C-87, let us find that out.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Nonsense.

Mr. Mazankowski: Follow the debates in the House, and you will find out.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You know our stand. Don't play that game.

Mr. Nowlan: Comedian!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am usually here. I know what is going on.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You have one foot on each side of the fence.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I know what is at the root of the opposition to the motion that is before us today. It is opposition to Bill C-84, to the capital punishment bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Nonsense.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Behind that is the notion that somehow, if the House is kept going long enough into the summer, that bill could be delayed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton heard some retorts from the government side, he said, I think, that he was getting close to the bone, or something. Well, I am obviously getting close to the bone of the Progressive Conservatives. The issue is before the House. I would say that the other subjects, such as Bill C-87, are still negotiable.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Is that right, Mitch?

Mr. Sharp: It has not been held up on our side.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On Bill C-87 you have.

Mr. Nowlan: He is in the dark ages. He thinks it is only Bill C-84.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is a great temptation to turn this debate into a House leaders' meeting. Perhaps hon. members should come back to debating the motion before the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I had exactly the same thought, Mr. Speaker. Why do we not hold our House leaders' meetings on this floor? I submit that Bill C-87 is negotiable. But I submit, also, that with a number of persons on death row with execution dates set for the month of July, it is a reasonable proposition for the House of Commons to make a decision on Bill C-84 at least some time in the month of June.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I say, again, that there is an agreement on the part of the President of the Privy Council not to apply closure to the second reading debate of Bill C-84. If we are not going to apply closure, we have two choices, and it is not for the government to decide; it is for parliament to decide. Do we get in all the speeches that hon. members want to make by debating the bill all of June and into July, or do we allow extra time in June and try to bring the debate to a conclusion so that parliament can make its decision?

I think the sensible thing to do would be to add extra time, and if hon. members still want to continue the debate, they can do so. One of their members down the line can move an amendment for a six months' hoist and let all those who have already taken part in the debate get in again. They can keep it going, if they want to; but let us find out whether there is any disposition to try to bring things to a conclusion before the summer months. I think the motion does this, and we are prepared to support it. We think it is a good idea, but we will continue to negotiate with the President of the Privy Council for dropping Bill C-87 so far as the period of time between now and the end of June is concerned, and the same applies to Bill C-68.

Although I have been a little hard on my Tory friends—

Mr. Mazankowski: Not hard, just wrong.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have not been wrong. I have been around here a while and I know how things operate. The Tories are to be forgiven for being confused. Some of them are more concerned about Bill C-84 than others, and some are genuinely concerned about Bill C-87. But the issue before us in this motion is a very clear and simple one. I have stated it two or three times, but I will state it again. It has been clearly decided and agreed that there will be no closure on the debate on capital punishment, and everyone who wants to speak shall have the right to do so. So the simple question is this: Do we achieve that right for everyone to speak by carrying it on into the middle of the summer, or do we add some extra hours in June with the hope of getting a decision on that piece of legislation in this month?

There have been House leaders' meetings; this question has been discussed and we know that the extra time will be used for that. The other day, when one hon. member was speaking at second reading of Bill C-84, he complained because there was a proposal to sit extra time which was to be devoted only to Bill C-84. The President of the Privy Council asked him across the floor of the House if he would accept the motion if reference to Bill C-84 was left out and it was open for all government bills. Of course, he did not really answer that question. No matter how you put it, our friends to the right want it both ways. The simple question is, when do we want the time for the extra debate on Bill C-84 which hon. members want?

Do we want it in the month of July, or do we want it on Tuesday and Thursday mornings and during private members' hours in the month of June? I think the public will not give us one speck of credit for sitting here all summer to debate something which has been going on for months. I think the public will respect us for having a little more common sense if we support this motion and if we try to make a reasonable amount of headway in the month of June.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, just a few words about the motion put forward today by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp). At first, I was very surprised at the conclusion drawn by the Progressive Conservative House leader that he found odd the motion on the extension of hours in today's order paper. Since we had consultations between House leaders and since during these sittings the President of the Privy Council said that if the discussions raised too many points with regard to Bill C-87 and Bill C-68, at this time, we members of the Social Credit Party of Canada do not intend to object to the extension of sitting hours. I think the government wants to be democratic. It wants to extend the hours to complete the consideration of Bill C-84 and also enable all members who would like to speak on that bill and other important one to do so.

If the House wants to adjourn on June 30, we agree. As far as I am concerned, I go once in a while to see my family. I would like to be home sometimes. I do not want to be like the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who stated that after 300 days the current session had been too long and who in the same breath added that it would have to continue. He should at least know what he wants. Considering that the case at issue has to do with Bill C-87 and Bill C-68, as so well stated by the previous speaker, and that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) suggested that the matter was negotiable, I think that we must hasten to vote for the extension of sitting hours to allow the backbenchers who wish to speak on Bill C-84 and other important bills to do so.

[English]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning I thought I might be launching into a long harangue, having had my dander raised by the House leader of the official opposition. But what we have learned from the replies of the House leaders of the Social Credit party and the New Democratic Party is that what is taking place here is, in effect, an open meeting of House leaders. There has been an exchange of views, and people are jockeying for position because we are coming to the end of a very long session. It has been the longest in memory.

An hon. Member: In history.

Mr. Blais: I think it has been the longest in the history of this House. We are dealing with a bill which, with the consent of all parties, has taken a considerable amount of time. As I understand it, we have spent a total of 30 hours debating Bill C-84, and there have been 78 speakers. Everyone was in agreement with that, and I think the contributions have been commendable. I think the whole country has benefited from it. I am not trying to prolong this discussion, but I think there has been a general view that we would like to see this motion, which is not a closure motion but simply a motion to have us work harder as we get close to the end of our session, passed so that that particular bill can be passed.

The motion does not say that this House will adjourn on June 30. There has been an indication by the government as to which legislation it gives priority, and the government has to accept its responsibility in passing a certain package of legislation as best it can within the time-frame and the restrictions of the House and the mood of the House. We do not want to create an antagonistic mood in this House. We want to create a mood which at the end of this long session will permit the passage of legislation which the government deems essential.

There has been an indication from the right that there are some bills which they would like to have some chance to negotiate with regard to their passage, or amendments to some of the provisions. That is fair game. But, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated, having spent a great deal of time on Bill C-84, we ought to allow some additional time so that the other pieces of legislation which the government feels are important and necessary can be given a sufficient amount of time on the floor of this House to be intelligently debated. I have no indication as to which ones are to be negotiated. Surely that is something which should be the subject of further negotiations between the House leaders.

The government House leader indicated that he is ready to negotiate certain aspects and certain bills. He is ready to meet again with the House leaders whenever the need is felt. Surely every member in this House is anxious, in view of the heat—especially of last week—to recognize that we have spent a great deal of time in Ottawa, that we have a number of fences to mend in our constituencies and that we have been away from them for an overly long period of time. I am one of those who is very close to his constituency, namely, 240 miles away—, which is not far—and I find that if I can manage three weekends a month in my constituency, that is the maximum. That is not enough if we are to serve our constituents in the proper way.

Those who come from afar are in a worse position than I am. I am looking at the hon. member for Vegreville. Surely, he recognizes that his constituents have not seen him as much as he would like. The same is true of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, and all hon. members on this side. It has been a long time. Sometimes our constituents do not recognize that we spend ten months of the year engaged in the legislative process in this House. We are tied to this House; all hon. members opposite recognize that. I agree that if we are going to shore-up our bargaining positions, there is a necessity to try to use such instruments as we have available to us. That is fair game. But I think that on the whole we should recognize that this House has been sitting long enough in this session.

We should also recognize that we ought to be coming up with a new legislative program in the early fall, on the government side, and a rejuvenated attitude on the opposition side, so that we can deal with the legislation that will be proposed in the government's new program in an intelligent manner, for the benefit of all Canadians.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak very briefly and quietly, because my throat will not permit me to do otherwise this afternoon, even if I were so inclined. I must say that there are aspects of Bill C-87 that I cannot accept. I would not consider that I would be discharging my responsibilities to the part of the country I come from if I did not make a very determined effort to prevent it going through in its present form. What I am concerned about in the passage of a resolution such as this is that with the extra hours the government might very well steamroller—I am not concerned about a vote coming on Bill C-84, because I want to see a vote taken on it—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: —but I am concerned about the government using the extra hours to streamroller and beat down an opposition trying to fight for what it considers to be the necessary point and necessary principle in regard, specifically, to Bill C-87.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader say these things are negotiable. If they are negotiable, let us have them negotiated. The government House leader will say now that Bill C-87 will not be pushed; that it will go into the fall, or something like that. As far as I am concerned, the more time people have to discuss Bill C-84, the better; but I would find it very difficult to put my colleagues in the position or to be associated with taking a position which would allow a government with a majority to steamroller something through which might have great tragic consequences to my part of the country.

I say to the government House leader, to the hon. member for Nipissing and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre: Do not ask me to vote for this and then negotiate. That is too late.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, could I ask a question of the hon. member for Halifax? If an arrangement were made that Bill C-87 would not be proceeded with, would he and his party support this motion?

Mr. Stanfield: No, Mr. Speaker, I would be hedging. I can no longer speak for the party. Certainly, I would be prepared to vote for this motion, and I have pretty good reason to believe it would go through very quickly this afternoon.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The President of the Privy Council knows the discussion we have had with respect to Bill C-87 and our attitude to it. He knows, as well, that negotiations have been carried on by the hon. member for Edmonton West, on behalf of our party with the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Transport who were interested in the matter. He knows now that those negotiations did not bear fruit.

Since the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre decided to open up the House Leaders' meetings, I shall open them further. The hon. member will recall that I spoke to the minister at the last meeting and suggested that he consult again with his colleagues in respect of Bill C-87 as there would be some great difficulty in our dealing with the bill while clause 15 remained in it. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may be interested in something else. I cannot answer as to that, but I am prepared to say that if the government House leader will consult his cabinet colleagues again—either the two I mentioned, or all of them—and deal with me or, better still, the hon. member for Edmonton West, with respect to our concerns, I think perhaps I could answer his question in the affirmative. That is an offer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before going on with the debate, there has been some suggestion which would at least give rise to the thought that further negotiations might take place before the vote on this motion comes about which would call for an adjournment of this debate, further negotiations, resumption of the debate and a vote on it. I do not know if there are others who wish to speak to the motion.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I should adjourn the debate. I am not sure what sort of problem that would create. In principle, however, I hope there can be a recess in the debate until nine o'clock tonight. I would be very happy to have some further discussion with my confreres, the other House leaders. As the hon. member said, we have had some discussion already, but it has never been clear. I think that in this way we might resolve the issue.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is it agreed that this debate be now adjourned until nine o'clock this evening?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FEES PAID TO GOWLING AND HENDERSON, OTTAWA, DURING PAST FOUR YEARS

Question No. 5,151—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What was the total fees paid by the government in the past four fiscal years to Gowling & Henderson, Barristers, 160 Elgin Street, Ottawa?

2. What is the breakdown, by department and agency, of how such fees were earned?

Mr. Francis Fox (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): In so far as the agents of the Minister of Justice are concerned: 1 and 2.

Department	1972/73	1973/74	1974/75	1975/76

HELICOPTER SERVICE BETWEEN DORVAL AND MIRABEL AIRPORTS

Question No. 5,308—Mr. Cossitt: (Corrected)

Has the government given any consideration to the establishment of passenger and baggage helicopter service between Dorval and Mirabel Airports to facilitate quicker and easier passage of passengers making connecting flights and, if not (a) for what reason (b) will the matter be given consideration?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Transport Canada has not given any consideration to the establishment of passenger and baggage helicopter service between Dorval and Mirabel Airports. (a) Reasons: (i) A bus services is already being provided by the Montreal Urban Transportation Committee, scheduled every half hour between 1330 and 2330 (peak period at Mirabel) and every hour between 0600 and 1300, for a total of 29 return trips per day. (ii) Current departmental policy leaves the provision of all such services open for competition; to this date there has been no application by private companies. (b) Future Considerations: Transport Canada has no intention of changing current policy with respect to the provision of such services. However consideration will be given to provision of services by other modes.

USE OF AIRCRAFT BY PRIME MINISTER

Question No. 5,341—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 5,126 that the cost of the aircraft for travel to and from Campobello Island was $586 per hour (a) what was the total amount of flying time involved and the total cost (b) what was the total amount of waiting time involved, if any, and the total cost (c) did the aircraft and crew remain with the Prime Minister during his stay and, if so, what was the total cost of their stay (d) did the aircraft fly back to Ottawa, returning to pick-up the Prime Minister later and, if so, what was the total cost of all flying time involved?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): (a) Five hours. Total Cost, $2,930.; (b) Not Applicable; (c) No; (d) Yes. For total cost see (a) above.

USE OF AIRCRAFT BY PRIME MINISTER

Question No. 5,343—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 5,123 that the cost of the aircraft for travel to and from French River was $586 per hour (a) what was the total amount of flying time involved and the total cost (b) what was the total amount of waiting time involved, if any, and the total cost (c) did the aircraft and crew remain with the Prime Minister during his stay and, if so, what was the total cost of their stay (d) did the aircraft fly back to Ottawa, returning to pick-up the Prime Minister later and, if so, what was the total cost of all flying time involved?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): (a) One hour and 20 minutes. Total Cost, $781.; (b) Not Applicable; (c) No; (d) Yes. For total cost see (a) above.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—AMOUNTS OF SURPLUS OR DEFICIT FROM 1969 TO 1975

Question No. 5,391—Mr. Crouse:

On a national accounts basis, what were the amounts of the surplus or deficit for the years ending March 31, 1969 to March 31, 1975 both inclusive?

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): On a National Accounts basis, the federal government surplus or deficit for each of the fiscal years from 1968-69 to 1974-75 is shown in the following table:

TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—NUMBER OF REVENUE PASSENGERS

Question No. 5,482—Mr. Stevens:

For the years 1973, 1974 and 1975, by quarter, what was the total number of revenue passengers (a) enplaned (b) deplaned at (i) Toronto International Airport, Terminal 1 (ii) Montreal International Airport (Dorval) (iii) Montreal International Airport (Mirabel)?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Table I (following) provides the requested quarterly total number of revenue passengers enplaned and deplaned at Toronto International Airport, Terminal 1. These data refer to scheduled passengers only. Annual 1975 figures are not yet available, therefore an estimate was made based on 11 months of data. Table II refers to the number of charter passengers enplaned and deplaned at Terminal 1 and Terminal 2. Charter passenger data are not available on an individual Terminal basis.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Friday, June 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I suppose one of the reasons we had discussion between three o'clock and four o'clock today on the motion to extend the hours is that the government, in its modesty, has deceived the people of Canada and the members of parliament through its handling of certain legislative processes introduced in Bill C-84. In 1973 the government introduced a bill which was to extend the death penalty for another five years in certain circumstances. Subsequently, at committee stage the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) tried to introduce an amendment which in effect was going to abolish capital punishment, but it was ruled out of order.

Now, some three years later, without waiting the five years they pledged, the government—without providing the right framework for this legislation—is back, with the same Solicitor General, trying in a neat piece of manipulation to get out of the commitment made at the time the legislation requiring extension for the first five years was introduced. By deceiving the Canadian people, deceiving themselves and going back on their word, the government has become bogged down with this legislation.

● (1600)

I now turn to the principles of Bill C-84. We are debating a bill which is to provide for the abolition of capital punishment. But it must be made clear that not all killings are murder. Most killings are homicides. Homicide usually involves violent death. Some call all homicides murder. With respect, they are wrong. For example, accidental deaths are not murder; suicides are not murder; manslaughters, usually involve a killing arising from an act of passion. You hear of people getting drunk, then getting into an argument, getting hold of a butcher's knife and stabbing someone. Such acts should not be called murder and in those circumstances the accused will probably be charged with manslaughter. This sort of thing is on the increase; probably that is why manslaughter statistics are high.

Then there is murder itself to be considered. I have been interested in this subject for some time and reluctantly must count myself among the ranks of the retentionists. Abolitionists contend that most murders are accidental. They argue that if a criminal armed with a rifle, machine-gun or other weapon enters a bank with no purpose save that of relieving the bank of the burden of keeping $1 million, or some large sum, and kills somebody who interferes with the smooth operation of the robbery, that killing should not be classed as murder but as accidental death.

The abolitionists claim that the death would not have happened if someone had not got in the way and interefered with the smooth operation of the crime. Retentionists say it is premeditated murder, because the person committing the crime went equipped with a firearm or weapon which he intended to use, and did use when the crime did not go as smoothly as the criminal wanted. In that case one is talking of murder resulting from a premeditated criminal act. I am not talking of the sort of premeditated murder involving a paid killer who is paid to kill Mr. X and hunts him down and kills him. The situation I have described, I believe, involves murder; it is not accidental murder as some abolitionists might claim because the criminal went prepared to kill.

Perhaps all this is a reflection on our society. Most of the letters which I receive have to do with capital punishment, abortion and gun control—three issues dealt with by the criminal law. I suppose they involve the moral law. Apparently our people are more concerned about these questions than about, for instance, the budget, economic development, unemployment insurance or those things which go to improve our quality of life. Those are important moral issues of great concern to the people of this country.

I propose to vote for the retention of capital punishment. I would vote for the retention of capital punishment in cases where death results from a premeditated criminal act. In the previous debate I said, on May 22, 1973, that the question of abolition or retention could come up again society had experienced a period of security. I said at that time, I would vote for the abolition of the death penalty. Mr. Speaker, I cannot do that at this time because we have not been given the five-year period of grace provided by the 1973 legislation. Further, society has not experienced a sense of security. I regret having to take this position.

I believe that the first duty of the government is to protect the state and the people of the state. I say that the people of Canada are entitled to feel secure. This government and preceding governments have failed in their efforts to make our people feel secure. Our people are entitled to the secure enjoyment of their standard of living. Legislation this House passes ought to make the people feel secure. Yet society does not feel secure; it feels insecure. Our statistics show an increase in the rate of violent crime. The result is that members of our society have opted for the return of capital punishment.

I do not believe that a member's vote on a bill should necessarily reflect the results of the most recent poll or the opinion of his constituents. I believe a member is elected to exercise judgment. In the present instance, I intend to vote in accordance with the wishes of the majority of my constituents. This time I am lucky. Next time I may not be so lucky and may vote in a manner against the wishes of my constituents.

Society's lack of sense of security prompts my voting for the retention of capital punishment. I think the concern of our citizens would be somewhat lessened if the government were to introduce legislation for which I asked in May, 1973. I asked for legislation to shore-up the inadequate bail system, which would give the people of this country a greater sense of security, for amendments which would revoke our ridiculous parole laws and for other legislation which would help the average citizen feel more secure. The government did not do that. Actually, it acted on part of our recommendations by bringing in the peace and security legislation, Bill C-83. Previously, I criticized the 25 per cent statutory remission provision always being in favour of the criminal. This provision is to be revoked under Bill C-83. In May, 1973, I asked the government to pass such legislation. If the government had listened and the legislation had come into effect, perhaps the attitude of our people would be different. Perhaps our people would feel secure.

One area in which the government has not legislated happens to be in the area of gun control. I know the government has put forward Bill C-83 dealing with gun control, and I have been trying to follow that as best I can, along with other committees in which I am involved. But if we feel guns are so important a cause for criminal acts, if we want to control them, let us get down to the nitty-gritty and try to control their possession by the criminal element, not just their use by law-abiding citizens. Under the present legislation, between section 86 and section 105 a person can be prosecuted for possession of a firearm. That provision is being reintroduced in the new bill, C-83, with a minimum sentence of one year. I would like to see it made mandatory that a person possessing a firearm be prosecuted for possession of that weapon prior to his prosecution for the substantive offence, be it armed robbery, kidnapping, rape, murder, or whatever.

If firearms are so important, let us get down to prosecuting for their possession. As it is today, if a person is picked up by the police for armed robbery and possession of a firearm, I know very well his lawyer will go to the Crown attorney's office and say, "We will plead to armed robbery if you drop the possession charge". The Crown attorney will say "Yes." He does not want to go through a four-day trial. It means a lot of expense. The courts are backlogged. I have been in the position of Crown attorney, and I know this to be true. It is called plea bargaining. What I want to do is take away the right to plea bargaining where armed weapons have been used. I think this would be a very good thing and maybe an effective deterrent.

I feel the people of this country are concerned about the fact that the royal prerogative of mercy has been used 100 per cent since 1962. I do not think 100 per cent of the people convicted of murder in this country were entitled to mercy. The juries did not recommend it in 100 per cent of those cases. The accused were sentenced to death in accordance with the law. But cabinets, acting as a final judicial tribunal, have invoked the royal prerogative of mercy 100 per cent of the time. I believe this has helped to create a disregard for the law in the eyes of the criminal and make the law something of a laughing-stock among both criminals and the law-abiding section of society who do not feel protected. Their sense of security and protection is undermined by the record of 100 per cent commutations.

I think it would be wrong to continue commuting on a 100 per cent basis if this bill fails to pass. The royal prerogative should be retained for truly important cases where mercy is recommended by the jury or the circumstances jump right out and almost plead for mercy. But in the case of people like the Santa Claus murderer who, after shooting a person, came back and machine-gunned the victim further to make sure he was dead, I do not really think there is any call for mercy—and the jury in that case did not recommend mercy. Yet the government of the day commuted that sentence.

Mr. Speaker, I believe capital punishment to be a deterrent. Some abolitionists have written to me and said, "Yes, we believe it is a deterrent, although we don't know how we can prove it statistically", because, of course, we get caught up in cases where it was not a deterrent; we get caught up in statistics which say that it is not. I think statistics can prove anything. Anyone can make statistics say whatever they like. But I believe the fear of excution is a deterrent.

Statistics are not necessarily correct. I would like to quote from evidence given under oath in the case of Her Majesty v. David Brault, David Dwyer and Donald Phillion which was heard about six years ago here in Ottawa—it became known as the Carp murders. These three men followed two separate cars and out on Highway 44, below Carp, without being provoked one bit, they flagged down the two cars. The occupants got out of their cars, like good Samaritans, and these three men shot them to death, pumped their bodies full of lead on Highway 44, about 23 miles from here.

Within a short period of time—as a matter of fact, I think it was about three days—the police had traced the three accused people to various communities. One of them, David Dwyer, was traced to Windsor. He was downstairs in a cellar when a certain constable, Constable Chippit, entered the house, went down the cellar stairs and rounded the corner, at which point Dwyer had a .22 rifle pointed at his head and could have pulled the trigger and killed the constable. I quote from page 252 of the preliminary hearing of the sworn testimony of the constable, evidence which was uncontested. I am excluding certain portions which have no bearing on what I am saying.

Q. What name did you know the accused by at that time?

A. David Dwyer.

Q. When you saw him, how was he dressed?

A. He had a brown jacket on, hair blond and he had what appeared to be a .22 rifle pointed at my head.

Q. How long was this weapon?

A. It was sawed off, cut down.

Q. Was there any struggle?

A. No struggle at all.

Q. Did Dwyer say anything at this point?

A. He just walked out very nonchalantly. After I said "Drop it", he said "All right" and walked out.

Q. Was there any conversation on the way to the station?

A. Yes, there was.

Q. What was the conversation?

A. You are talking about conversation in the car after we left the scene?

Q. Yes.

A. The conversation was, if I remember, we were talking of an armed robbery in the city of Windsor. I stated, "Well, this time don't worry about it," and he said, "No, this is a bad city to pull a robbery. I have had better luck other places."

Q. This was Dwyer; is that correct?

A. This is correct.

● (1620)

Then at page 254 of the evidence there is this question from the Crown attorney:

All right. Would you like to go back into the box. What was the accused's attitude during the time you were in his company?

A. He was very nonchalant, sir. He asked me for a cigarette, and then when we were leaving the scene, or the car was leaving the scene in the police car W.H.Q.

That is Windsor headquarters. The questioning continued:

Q. Did you get the cigarette?

A. I looked at him—

Meaning Dwyer.

—and said, "You guys are crazy; just had a gun to my head and now you want a cigarette." He said—

Again, meaning Dwyer.

—"I would not shoot you, I would hang for that."

I believe, therefore, that capital punishment is a deterrent. This police officer was alive to tell the tale because he was not shot. He was not shot because Dwyer did not want to hang, and he said so in sworn evidence. I do not care what people say about statistics, Mr. Speaker. I say that if you talk to individual people you will find capital punishment is a deterrent. I am not saying it is a deterrent in 100 per cent of the cases, but here is evidence that at least one person is alive because it was a deterrent.

I want to close by making two further points. I do not believe the government has been honest with the Canadian people because it has not carried out the law during the five-year period of abolition of capital punishment in the case of the murder of police officers and prison guards. They did not give the law a true trial. When the period was extended in 1973, again the government was not honest. In fact, before the bill was out of committee the Solicitor General tried to change it to an abolition bill entirely. The government does not invoke the law and, as a result, it has been laughed at ever since. The government's trickery and manipulation has continued.

In addition, the government has been using the Canadian taxpayers' money to try to force the opinion of cabinet, which is for abolition, on the people. For example, in question No. 5,348 I asked the Solicitor General about the monthly magazine Liaison, volume 2, No. 2 for March, 1976, which dealt with the peace and security legislation, a governmental piece of propaganda if ever there was one. In this magazine the government speaks of capital punishment and its "great" gun control bill, to which the Solicitor General has now introduced 43 amendments since, having listened to people, he has found out it is not so great.

The government has spent $8,252 of the taxpayers' money on trying to convince people that abolition was the right thing and to support the cabinet's case. Some 9,300 copies of this magazine were printed, and a copy was distributed to every member of parliament.

I thought it only fair, if the government wants to be fair and to take a reasoned look at this question, to allow the other side of the coin to be explained also at taxpayers' expense, so in the fifth part of my question I asked whether the government intended to publish the next issue containing views contrary to the government's own political views relating to peace and security, as set out in Bill C-83 and Bill C-84. The answer, Mr. Speaker, screams; it is "No". As I say, this is a departmental publication paid by the taxpayers. People who receive Liaison do so free of charge, and it puts only one side of the question, that of abolition, which is the view of the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice. The government does not want to discuss and will not provide space at taxpayers' expense for the other side of the question. I think this is cheap, rotten trickery on behalf of the Solicitor General and is completely in line with his own steadfast view on abolition and "I don't want to hear about anything else".

The government would not, of course, want to publish what has been published on other occasions, such as the view of University of Chicago economist Professor Ehrlich that from 1935 to 1969 each additional execution per year may have resulted in seven to eight fewer murders being committed. They do not print such figures because it is contrary to their view. Although this article has been challenged by a number of abolitionists and others who deal with statistics, and indeed has been found to be statistically complicated, it nevertheless happens to be a view. If the government wants to have reasonable discussion of the question it should give us a balanced view, especially when every member in this place knows that 78 per cent of the taxpayers happen to disagree with the government. Yet the government spends taxpayers' money against the taxpayers' wishes.

There is little more that I can say, Mr. Speaker. I have tried to outline the areas that concern me. People continually misrepresent murder. When they should be talking of homicide, they talk of murder. Any death that results from a premeditated criminal act should be classified as a case of murder; this should be so in all cases, not just in the case of prison guards and police officers. I have stated that the government have undermined the judicial system. They have not concentrated upon rehabilitation. Through the parole system and weak bail laws, they have over the years undercut the sense of security that people had. They have commuted 100 per cent of the death sentences that have been handed down—and this is wrong. I believe capital punishment is a deterrent, and I have quoted from a court record evidence that I believe bolsters that opinion. I think the Solicitor General has been absolutely wrong in spending the taxpayers' money to outline his and the cabinet's side of the issue without giving equal time and space to the other side.

I should like to repeat something that I said in 1973. I used to be an abolitionist until I became a Crown attorney and prosecuted criminals every day for almost three years. Having prosecuted and dealt with criminals in that atmosphere, and knowing them as the professionals that they consider themselves to be and their attitude to the law, I reluctantly changed my view. I will become an abolitionist again when the people of this country regain their sense of peace and security.

I believe that if the government implemented many of the protective measures in Bill C-83 and Bill C-84 for the good of society—though I should add there is an awful lot of junk in the bills as well—and allowed a period of, say, five or six years to go by so that society could regain its self-confidence and sense of security, then no matter what my constituents might say to me, presuming I was still a member at that time, I would vote for abolition. But I cannot vote for abolition now, Mr. Speaker, because the government has not put into place effectively the proper laws to bring about what every Canadian citizen is entitled to, namely, a sense of protection and security. If the government were to do that, then somewhere down the line I would support it. But I cannot support it now because it is premature, and for that reason I intend to vote for the retention of capital punishment.

● (1630)

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of taking part in this debate, and, I will probably not detain the House of Commons very long in making my remarks. I repeat what is, I am sure, well known to the House, that the point of view I will be expressing will be strictly a personal point of view. I am speaking in this debate for no member of parliament other than myself. We on this side of the House are going to have an absolutely free vote on the question of this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My views, sir, on the question of capital punishment are well known in the country. It would be improper for me, as leader of my party, to attempt to use my position of leadership to impose my views upon others of my colleagues who do not share them on a question involving a free vote. Were I to follow that course, I think it would undermine the principle of a free vote which, while it is resorted to only rarely in parliamentary practice in Canada and elsewhere, is a very important element of our parliamentary system, one that I would not want to jeopardize. I would hope that the determination not to use the office to influence the views of colleagues in a party will be observed as scrupulously by leaders of other parties in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There is one other matter to which I want to make some reference, which has to do with an obligation I consider to be a very heavy obligation on the government, to itself obey the law. I want to make it abundantly clear, as I have frequently outside this House, that if the law of the land is a law which supports capital punishment in a time when my party is in office and I am the prime minister, my government will support the law of the land. We will enforce capital punishment even though I, personally, may not agree with it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I believe there is a fundamental requirement in our country that has to do with the legitimacy of government; that governments themselves obey the law and be seen to obey the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I have to say, having read much of the debate which has occurred here, and having had a chance to listen to some of my colleagues on all sides of the House join in the debate, that I am pleased at the general tenor of debate here. I think it has generally been a moderate debate in which there has not been an attempt on either side to characterize people who might disagree as being either the enemy of civilization or the enemy of order. I think this indicates a maturity of approach in this chamber to this difficult question, which is commendable and encouraging.

My approach to the question of capital punishment, sir, is that we are not here dealing with a question of principle about the right of the state to take lives. Of course the state has that right. We are dealing, instead, with a much more pragmatic question as to the conditions under which the state is justified in taking life. It is my view that a society which respects human life, as ours does, must be extremely careful as to the occasions on which it takes human life.

There are times when I think the taking of human life can be justified by the state and a society such as ours. The easy example, of course, has to do with war. Had any one of us had the obligation placed upon us to determine whether Canada would have entered the conflict in the second great war, we would have agreed that Canada ought to do so even if it was known that the inevitable consequence of that act would have been the loss of human life. The point we draw from that is that the taking of human life, or the entering into actions which will involve the loss of human life, is something that can be justified only when that is the only means of achieving the necessary and important social goals. In the case of capital punishment, it can be justified, it seems to my view, only under those circumstances when we are sure it is the only way that will achieve the important social goal of stopping potential murderers from committing murder.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: In my examination of the evidence and, like other members of the House, I have made it my business to look at the evidence as it relates to the deterrent effect of capital punishment—it has been my judgment that capital punishment does not function as a deterrent in the case of those peculiar people who commit murder. There is certainly the argument which would suggest that most of us who consider ourselves normal would consider ourselves to be very much affected by the threat of capital punishment, and the threat would stop most of us from committing murder. The fact is that most of us would not commit murder in any event. What we have to do is determine whether the threat of capital punishment would stop those people who are likely to take human life, or likely to commit murder, from undertaking that act. I have seen no firm evidence to suggest that the threat of capital punishment is a deterrent. Certainly, I have not seen or heard conclusive evidence that I think would warrant the irreversible act of taking life by the state.

What has happened here, and the reason we are debating this issue again, and the reason it has become an issue which has commanded attention and aroused concern across the country, is that capital punishment has become a symbolic issue. We are not dealing simply here with the narrow question of deterrence. We are dealing here with a very real concern that grips many Canadians about order in our society, about their sense of security and their sense of safety. There is no question but that there is now in this country a widespread concern about insecurity. That is partly natural and flows in part from the fact that our society is growing larger, growing more complex and growing, I suppose, more dangerous. It is partly induced by the emphasis that has been referred to very eloquently by others in this House; that is, the emphasis in the media on violence and the emphasis on violence in other aspects of life. It is also in this particular case induced, I think, by a very real distrust of the present government and a distrust of the government's attitude in this matter of maintaining public security and order.

My colleague who spoke immediately before me made reference to the use—and I would regard it as an abuse—of the prerogative of mercy. In my judgment, this is a prerogative that must be maintained by any cabinet as there is always a chance that mistakes will be made which will require that prerogative to be exercised. But the prerogative should be exercised rarely, because that is how it was intended to be exercised. Instead of being exercised rarely, it has been the unfortunate practice of the present government to exercise it regularly. There have been consequences from that regular exercise of the prerogative.

One of the consequences has been that many Canadians who are concerned about this question, and many of those who reply to questionnaires and express their concern about capital punishment, simply do not believe this government is serious about enforcing a sense of security or enforcing a society of order. Adding to this general concern about the security of our society, there have also been very real and genuine concerns allowed to develop about the effectiveness of the penal system in Canada. These things have all combined; the natural forces of urbanization, the concern about failure relating to penal institutions, and the concern about the conduct or the seriousness of the government in respect of this matter, and have all contributed to a sense of insecurity in the country, to which capital punishment has unfortunately become symbolic. I think it would have been better if, before proposing a bill to abolish capital punishment, the government had addressed in a serious manner this question of public anxiety and public concern about safety and security.

I think it would have been better if, before a bill to abolish capital punishment had been brought in, there had been a demonstration not simply by proposals but by government action of the seriousness of the government in trying to achieve a more ordered and secure society. Instead of that, we have had brought in, in tandem with the bill to abolish capital punishment, a bill which deals in some degree with gun control and other matters.

I think what is important in this companion piece of legislation is the gun control aspect, which I regard as a very cynical attempt to allay public fears rather than address the source of the public concern. I repeat that it would have been far better if, as a prelude to this bill to abolish capital punishment, there had been some demonstrated determination by the government of Canada to address the very real concern that Canadians, wherever they live, feel now about the question of public security.

We must recognize that the desire for order is a very legitimate desire in our society. It is, in fact, fundamental to a functioning society. Personally, I am prepared to go some distance toward achieving and encouraging that sense of order, that sense of security. I am prepared, in fact, to move in that direction even at some cost to other important social goals such as rehabilitation and others which might be recommended to us such as our concern with regard to penal reform. I am prepared to go some distance in this direction toward achieving a sense of public security, but I make clear that I am not prepared, in the interest of securing a sense of public security, to go to the length of taking human lives in the name of public policy, or at least to do that without adequate cause.

I repeat what I said at the outset, that the only adequate cause, in my view, would be if it could be demonstrated that that was the way, and the only way, in which we could deter potential murderers from committing murder. I think also, as we consider this matter, we must bear in mind that security—and I am speaking here of a sense of security—might be better served by abolition. Personally, I have a very strong suspicion that juries, knowing that the consequence of their decision is death, would recommend softer penalties in respect of cases which come before them and would therefore perhaps introduce back into society more quickly people who might constitute a real danger to public safety.

I do not wish to deal with that element for too long, but I think it is a very real aspect of the question we must consider. I am speaking, sir, of a sense of security in Canadian society. There is a difference, I believe, between real security, something that will in fact protect people in their homes, and a sense of security in the sense that they will be protected when they are in danger. I believe it is absolutely essential that society demonstrate that for murder and other serious crimes there is a heavy penalty which society will not fail to exact. I think it must be demonstrated that apprehension is close to certain, that conviction naturally follows, and that punishment as described in the law is the inevitable end result. If we are to create some respect for law, some reality of it, we can have no more half-measures, half enforced by a government of Canada.

I think it is clear to others that any further reluctance to demonstrate that crime and punishment are unavoidable companions will be fatal to the evolution, which I and others in this house hope will occur, away from state executions. I should say here, as an observation only, that if we are unable to make that demonstration, this question of capital punishment will be before us again whatever happens in the vote on this particular bill. Indeed, if it comes before us again in those circumstances, in the sense that society remains concerned, the votes of many members of parliament may well change, as some have changed already, because no guarantees have been given to ease the fears of Canadians to whom capital punishment has become a symbol of protection.

I think there is an onus on the abolitionists, particularly those who occupy the treasury benches, to meet the sense and the reality of insecurity in Canada. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), for all his weak good will, has done little to accomplish that goal, in my judgment. As I said earlier these initiatives should have preceded this debate. Canadians have a right to some demonstration of alternatives that work before they are deprived of an instrument which many Canadians believe or, more likely, hope will work. That is what we would like to have seen.

We have a bill before us now recommending a step of which I approve. We all have the obligation to deal with that particular bill. All of us, I think, as we work in parliament and live with law, recognize that there are limits to the effectiveness of laws, and all of us agree that it is foolish to write laws which we cannot enforce. I think it is wrong to write or to keep laws which do not do things people think they will do. I think that is particularly regrettable, and something we should avoid when that kind of law involves the official taking of human lives. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, my personal vote, which I emphasize will be a personal one, exercised as an individual member of parliament, will be to remove capital punishment.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the leader of the opposition (Mr. Clark), before he has completed his remarks, would accept a question?

Mr. Clark: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Benjamin: I want to say that I appreciated the speech the leader of the opposition just made. However, because I know that he least of all people would not want to be thought to be on both sides of any question, I should like to ask him this question: If he were prime minister and the law was for capital punishment, would he like to reconsider his earlier remarks and say whether or not he would bring in legislation to remove capital punishment from the statutes?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that too early in my career I would not have to resort to answering hypothetical questions. I have made it quite clear that as prime minister I would enforce capital punishment if that were the law of the land. I should also like to make it quite clear that important as this question is, I think the country faces other more urgent priorities which will be higher on the agenda of the government we form.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek).

Mr. Benjamin: On a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I would suggest to the hon. member that if he would like to make a speech, I would add his name to the list, but right now the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley has been recognized.

● (1650)

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, being a retentionist, it is difficult for me to follow our leader. I want to point out that I certainly appreciate his statement made so emphatically on this matter, which is to come to a free vote, as an individual member rather than as a leader. What is more important is that we must all appreciate the fact that our leader stated that regardless of the outcome of this vote, when he becomes the prime minister—which he will two years from now—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: —unlike the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whose time is running out—he will follow the wishes of the people and enforce the laws passed by this parliament, one way or the other. I see I only have a few minutes left, Mr. Speaker, but let me begin by saying that naturally we are all aware of the fact that a certain number of members have spoken on this bill on capital punishment, but there are great many more who still wish to speak. A sort of line score is being kept in this regard, and I suppose some pundits are also keeping score of the abolitionists and the retentionists.

We can deduce from these records that the government is in trouble on the issue of capital punishment, but of course that is understandable. The government seems to be in trouble all the time, and from one day to another it is simply a question of what the government is in trouble about on a given day of the week. This should not bother the government too much, because it only works and plans on a day to day basis or, at most, a week to week basis.

In any case, while the press has kept a pretty good score card on the members who have spoken, I believe they have missed the real point in this whole exercise. What is more important, particularly in this case dealing with such an emotional issue, is that the people of Canada have spoken more strongly than ever before. People are flooding their members' offices daily with demands for a return to the death penalty for the crime of murder. They are not only flooding the offices of Conservative members, or even uncommitted members, but they are calling and writing to all members of every party and applying persuasion. We have also seen a great number of polls on this subject, both on a regional and national basis, polls that were taken by retentionists, by abolitionists and by the uncommitted. Each and every one of these polls, whether they were taken in a riding or nationally, indicates emphatically that a great majority of Canadians—I believe it is over 80 per cent—demand the return to capital punishment, in opposition to the bill before us today.

The imperative question that one must ask oneself is whether or not an elected representative should vote on these important issues relating to law and order in accordance with the wishes of his constituents, or according to his conscience. It is understandable that in fiscal and monetary areas, where a member of parliament has available to him statistics and all other pertinent information relating to the issues at hand, he would be in a better position to judge the subject matter and therefore he could make a calculated decision based on the information available to him. However, if the issue is an emotional one—and certainly there is no more emotional issue than the one on capital punishment—then it is my strong belief that an elected representative should, and indeed must, vote in accordance with the wishes of his constituents. I, personally, cannot understand the attitude that certain members on both sides of the House are taking when they know that more than 80 per cent of their constituents favour capital punishment and yet they still insist on playing the role of the Almighty by voting against the wishes of the same people who gave them the power to vote in the first place.

On an issue of this type, an issue that is probably more emotional than any other, the government cannot afford to ignore the will of the people. No government has the right to ignore the voice of the people, especially when that voice is raised to the level that we hear on the issue of capital punishment. If this government chooses to ignore this call for action to combat the rise of violent crime in Canada today, I believe it will do so at its peril.

Judging from the tone of the vast majority of speeches in the House so far on this bill, the government seems to have boxed itself in with no visible avenues of escape. They have outsmarted themselves in the past ten years by abusing the cabinet's right to commute the death sentence, and they have chosen to ignore the law passed by the majority of members in the House, a law which prescribes the death penalty for convicted murderers of police officers and prison guards. This government, and particularly the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), has introduced its own law. They govern self-righteously by the rule of the conscience instead of the rules laid down by this parliament. Imagine all of us governing our lives by the rule of our conscience even when our own rules run counter to the law!

[Mr. Jelinek.]

Many times, when I have waited for a red light to turn to green, my rule of conscience would tell me to go through the red light, but because the law of the land forbids me to do so, I wait for the light to turn to green before I go forward. This is not what the cabinet has been doing for the last five years. We see the government breaking its own laws in other areas as well, not only capital punishment. It is breaking its own laws in respect of legal strikes and in respect of immigration. However, I shall not dwell on these subjects today.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The first is motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). Shall that motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall motion No. 15, in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan), stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall motion No. 19, in the name of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson), stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall motion No. 20, in the name of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall motion No. 4, in the name of the former member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter) stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall motion No. 10, in the name of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall motion No. 48, in the name of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine), stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe there has been agreement to deal with item No. 25, a motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): If that is agreed, we will resume debate on the motion of the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston).

SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION OF SHORTAGE OF LIDS AND JARS USED IN HOME CANNING

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should investigate the severe shortage of lids and jars used in home canning of fruits and vegetables and should instigate measures to ensure that a sufficient supply will be available to the Canadian market next year.

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the whims and rules of this House never cease to amaze me, for due to the length of this session the roulette-wheel of private members' bills has given the House the opportunity to debate once again the matter of canning lids. I see some hon. members smiling at the mention of canning lids, but I recognize that at least the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) is not smiling.

It seems rather strange that something so small should be a matter of national attention. It is a national issue, and this House is indebted to the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay for putting forward his motion, thus allowing hon. members to discuss the difficulty of obtaining home canning lids and what this has meant to thousands of concerned people across the country who seek the thriftiness and good health of home-processed foods. The motion which the hon. member has placed before us is that an investigation be carried out into the access in this country to home canning lids.

● (1700)

It is a rather interesting thing that of all the various calls we hear from the opposition for investigations into this and that, this particular one has been investigated very thoroughly and it has been very well documented. The intervening year has been one in which we have been able to discern exactly what the situation is with regard to the purchase of can lids, where the access is and what the problem is with that accessibility. The shortage of jar lids for use in home canning in Canada occurred as a result of a shortage of tin plate used in the manufacture of these lids, and this was compounded by an unprecedented consumer demand. This was instigated by fear, almost hysteria, that there was not going to be a sufficient supply available. However, a great effort was made. The shortage existed throughout North America, and consumers in western Canada, particularly in British Columbia, had difficulty in obtaining proper supplies.

Home Canning

Special difficulty was encountered in obtaining wider-mouth Mason lids. This is the size which traditionally is used by consumers in British Columbia. Although consumer demand for lids has been difficult to predict precisely, this year's demand, for instance, is a very heavy one, and the continuing trend toward an increase in home canning requires that there be sufficient lids available to people in this country.

A close watch has been kept on the American situation since part of the Canadian supply of lids is manufactured in the U.S., and the office of consumer affairs in Washington, D.C., reports that the U.S. situation is similar to that in Canada. Both Anchor Cap and Closure and Bernadin, the two Canadian manufacturers of the product, have produced to absolutely maximum capacity due, in part, to efforts made on their behalf by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce of this government. Furthermore, the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs took a very personal interest in this problem and made it possible for the two companies in Canada to receive incentive and encouragement to increase their production so that they could meet consumer demand. As a result of these contacts, the Canadian manufacturers installed additional machinery and personnel and were able, by working double and triple shifts on their production lines, finally to meet the public demand. Previous statements from these firms indicated that they would be able to meet consumer demand in western Canada as well as their traditional eastern markets. However, distribution was uneven and there were pockets of over supply in some parts of Canada, and in other areas shortages resulted.

In May of 1975, however, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs began to receive conflicting information as to the availability of these supplies to distributors, retailers and consumers. In this connection, the department once again met with the two Canadian manufacturers a year ago to verify information which had been previously received on this situation. Both manufacturers produced to capacity, and these firms provided figures which indicated a substantial production increase over the previous year. In fact, the total supply for 1974 for Bernadin of Canada, for instance, was 17,087 cases which went to B.C. and in 1975 50,000 cases of Bernadin went to British Columbia. Anchor Cap and Closure, of Toronto, produced only 908 cases in 1974, and in 1975 there were 18,500 cases.

Mr. Paproski: Nothing in Alberta.

Mrs. Campagnolo: The hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) is very much interested in—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mrs. Campagnolo: I know how great the interest of people in Alberta is in being thrifty and eating well, and I find the objections of the hon. member well taken. The people in Alberta can look forward to a major supply this year.

Mr. Paproski: Hear, hear! It is about time.

Home Canning

Mrs. Campagnolo: In May of 1975, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs found that there was an uneven distribution, and the department worked to see that this was made much more equitable across the country. However, even as the production was increased and made adequate to fill all the distributors' orders—one may assume that local distributors have a good indication of required supplies, in view of their close contacts with wholesalers and retailers in the local areas—the distributors' orders were based on sales requests from retailers.

Furthermore, in the case of Anchor Cap and Closure, the firm's first priority has been in filling orders from the glass-jar companies who market their jars complete with fittings, that is, the jar with the top in a total kit. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs then again contacted the two major Canadian producers of glass preserving jars, Dominion Glass in Montreal and Consumer Glass in Toronto, and was told that Dominion Glass produced approximately 50 per cent more glass jars in 1975 than it did the previous year. It purchased lids from both Anchor and Bernadin, and the availability of these lids has been a limiting factor in the production increase for jars. Consumer Glass obtains lids from Anchor and took steps to catch up on its production schedule, which was delayed as a result of a 13-week strike in its plant at Lavington, B.C., in 1975.

An additional factor which has contributed to a shortage is brand loyalty, particularly in B.C. where consumers have traditionally used Kerr Products, and to a lesser degree, Ball wide-mouth fittings. Consumers are aware that lids made by different manufacturers are interchangeable, but generally remain, if at all possible, with their favourite brand name. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs once again advertised to make sure that people were aware of the fact that they could use other types of jar fittings for their favourite types of jars, and advised that by following the instructions on the box they could be assured of excellent results because canning procedures vary sometimes with different brands.

The two American manufacturers of jars and jar fittings, Kerr Glass Manufacturing Corporation and Ball Corporation, have traditionally been major suppliers for the B.C. market. Representation was therefore made to these companies in June of 1975 for updated information as to supplies for British Columbia. The figures from Kerr Glass indicated a 27.5 per cent increase in supplies over 1974 with heavier shipments of lids in the wide-mouth size. It is estimated that Kerr had traditionally supplied approximately 70 per cent of the B.C. market prior to 1974. Figures provided by the Ball Corporation indicated that there was approximately a 34 per cent increase in supplies to B.C. in that year. Production and distribution of fittings by all manufacturers continued throughout last year's canning season. Supplies were shipped to various regions of Canada, and as they came off the production line many of them headed for British Columbia. This ensured to the maximum extent possible a continuity of supply which built up to a peak at the height of the canning season.

Jar lids and jar finishes—mouths—are manufactured in four sizes: 63 millimetres; 70 millimetres, which is standard; 78 millimetres and 86 millimetres, which is the wide-mouth size and which is generally favoured by canners across Canada. The figures show that more lids were shipped to British Columbia than to any other part of Canada in that year. As I told hon. members, there are two domestic suppliers in Canada, Bernadin of Toronto and Anchor Cap and Closure Limited, also of that city. From the United States there are supplies from Kerr Glass Manufacturing Company, of Oklahoma, and the Ball Corporation of Indiana. There are two companies in Taiwan which in the past have supplied our market as well, until last year when a major supermarket had to recall one of the Taiwan brands due to imperfections in its manufacture which might possibly have led to botulism if used. However, the other brand is perfectly suitable for use and it continues on the North American market at this time.

The problem is one of distribution rather than supply, and I should like once again to commend the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay for bringing this to our attention. I know that in my own area canning is not a forgotten art. It has not given way to the freezer. Naturally, coming from northern British Columbia I know that the product which is canned most often is the seafood of the west coast—salmon. In Canada there are many difficulties in canning salmon. Proper fittings on jars are imperative so that there will not be any possibility of botulism resulting. I think we can safely say that this has been investigated to a large degree and that the facts and figures are before us and are irrefutable. In my area I was perplexed to see in a small store in Iskut, on the Stewart-Cassiar highway, a huge supply of current, wide-mouth Mason jar lids. The store manager said there must have been some kind of mistake because the lids had arrived almost unbidden. He had only wanted one or two cases, but had received many more. Fortunately it was possible to arrange for them to go where they could be better utilized.

While those around me are laughing at the possibility of being involved nationally with canning lids, I would remind them that it is not amusing when people in Canada strive to make good use of the fruit and vegetables they grow. Where the hon. member makes his home, he has access to all sorts of fruit and vegetables and this is the kind of thing our society is going to have to spend more time on. If the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is going to be able to get prices high enough for farmers, we are going to have to do some of the work ourselves.

I suggest the canning industry is not going to be able to keep up unless they have a full supply of lids. The manufacturers of jar lids are to be commended for rising to the occasion and making certain that people have access to the products they want. Our Canadian ingenuity is such that we should be able to manufacture Canadian products and not have to look for them abroad in sufficient quantity to supply our own people.

I appreciate this motion very much and look forward to seeing no hazard in this year's canning season as we approach it. I think we begin somewhat earlier on the northwest coast of British Columbia. We are almost into the canning season now, and I have not had one letter of complaint from any constituent saying that not enough lids are available. I believe I can safely say there are sufficient lids to meet the demand at this time. We look forward to a canning season that will have sufficient supply, and I thank the hon. member opposite for bringing this particular problem to our attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to express my thanks to the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) for bringing this matter before the House in the form of the motion that stands in his name. We will remember that this matter was raised on many occasions in the past year, but in spite of all the assurances we had to the contrary there are still shortages, and shortages are anticipated for the coming canning season.

The problem of severe shortages of wide-mouth Mason jar lids seems to be a continuing one, at least as far as western Canada is concerned. Every winter and spring for the past few years we have had members rising in the House asking the government to take measures to ensure an adequate supply of these materials for home canning purposes. Unfortunately, the result is usually the same. Members voice their concern about shortages and warn the government about the critical situation. The government responds by assuring the House that everything is under control, that manufacturers are stepping up production and there will be no shortages. Then summer comes, the canning season begins, and lids are nowhere to be found.

It is expected that we will face the same situation this year. On January 30 my colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay, asked the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs what steps the government was taking to monitor supplies for this summer in order to reassure consumers in British Columbia who wanted to can their own produce. In true form, the minister stated the same thing that we have been hearing for the last several years. As reported at page 10480 of Hansard, he said:

> Mr. Speaker, the latest information I received from the officials of my department was that two Canadian manufacturers have increased their production of canning jar lids. On the other hand, I am informed that two American companies which supply more particularly the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia have also stepped up production. Moreover, one importer in British Columbia has already found on the foreign market canning jar lids which he intends to import to meet the demand during the current year.

The same assurance has been given to us today by the parliamentary secretary. Once again we have the record of the assurances of the government that there is not going to be any problem and there will be a supply for this coming season. The facts are that summer is here and there is once again a shortage of wide-mouth Mason jar lids, so that answers the minister's promises. I cannot help but wonder about the competence of the investigation allegedly carried out by the minister's officials in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

I have already received some representation from my constituency about shortages, and we are only starting to get into the canning season in British Columbia. What will be the situation in two months' time? I have contacted a number of outlets in the major population centres of my constituency, and this is what I find, Mr. Speaker: three of the stores surveyed did not have any Mason jar lids and claimed they could not get them; three other stores claimed they had a limited supply or lids at the present time, but only one of the three claimed that they were sure of future supplies.

This last store manager stated that he was unable to obtain the No. 3 size lids—the "gem" size that replaces glass lids for Mason jars. Another large store in my home town had the largest supply when I took the survey. The manager had 75 cases on hand, but he stated he had an unofficial limit of one case per month when ordering. The manager of a store in a small city in my constituency stated he had none in stock, and although he orders them every week, he rarely gets them. Sometimes he is able to get one case a month, but the supply is uncertain, to say the least.

I could give a list of other stores contacted, but in the majority of cases it was the same store. I compiled a list, and under the heading "Available stock" the note against the list of stores reads: none; good; none; very poor; fair supply; good; and none. Under the heading "Future possibility" are the notations: same problem as last year; poor prospect; good; poor; same as last year, poor; okay; looks all right; poor. That indicates the number of contacts I was able to make in my constituency.

The parliamentary secretary mentioned the problem of imported lids. One of those she referred to was apparently recalled according to a store in my constituency. I might say they were somewhat different. One shipment of lids came from Japan, but the other one came from Taiwan. At any rate, he was reluctant to purchase those lids because some had been found defective in that they would not seal properly. Some were sold. After tests had been run on them, it was decided to recall them. I got in touch with the manager of one of the stores, who said that it was not worth the risk to order these Metro lids, even though he could obtain as many as he wanted. That will show hon. members the difficulties with which we have been confronted in making inquiries about these lids.

On January 30, my colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay, also asked the minister about the inferior quality of some lids on the market at that time. Since the minister, in his reply to my colleague's first question, referred to the importation of lids, I wonder if the recently appointed Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Mackasey) has been able to acquaint himself with these matters; because, surely, defective Mason jar lids on the Canadian market give rise not only to the problem of food preservation but, as well, to the more important hazard of food poisoning which can occur when the seal breaks and bacteria spoils food.

Perhaps I might intimate the results of a survey recently conducted by my colleague from Okanagan-Kootenay in the north Okanagan. For example, in the city of Vernon a large supermarket reported that it had no lids at all in stock; they were on order, but there was no guarantee of shipment. A large supermarket in Salmon Arm reported that it had some Taiwan lids in stock, that a shortage of lids is expected, that no Canadian lids were available and that a standing order has been placed for them. In Armstrong, a few were available but the people there were not sure of future supplies. In Endersby, no shortage is expected. In Revelstoke, a shortage is expected and orders are filled slowly. So it goes, Mr. Speaker.

The parliamentary secretary stated that there appears to be an adequate supply in British Columbia. I suggest, with respect, that surveys taken in my constituency and in the constituency of Okanagan-Kootenay indicate the contrary.

The canning season is about to begin. Before it actually opens, I ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson), who I believe has some interest in this matter as well to make every effort to ensure that there is a sufficiency of these lids for canners in British Columbia particularly and for those in other areas as well. I am sure hon. members appreciate that because many people wish to do their own canning, prefer home-canned goods, and because of inflationary pressures, a great many additional people are taking up home canning, thereby making ends meet and stretching incomes. That is why we are making our request. The parliamentary secretary suggested that the government is fully conversant with the situation and that supplies are adequate. I say, with respect, that supplies are not adequate and that every effort must be made to ensure there is an adequate distribution of lids. Above all, adequate supplies should be available for meeting the needs of the new canning season.

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I enter the debate this afternoon somewhat reluctantly.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The hon. member is far too modest.

Mr. Pearsall: I have had considerable dealings with the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) and have worked with him on many committees. I respect his position, regret I cannot go all the way with him, but say that I am prepared to support most of the things he said.

Mr. Friesen: That sounds like a true Liberal.

Mr. Pearsall: In response to the suggestion that the government should investigate the shortage of lids and jars used in home canning, the government has investigated these alleged shortages and will continue to do so. Today I wish to clarify one point raised by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay: there is no shortage of canning jars. Let me make that clear.

Mr. Benjamin: Do you want to bet?

Mr. Pearsall: There is a shortage of lids. Perhaps the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) has run out of glass. Seriously, I say to that hon. member, and to the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), there is a shortage of lids, a shortage about which I shall talk. The past three years have witnessed a tremendous growth of consumer interest in home food preservation due to the rising costs of food products on retail shelves and the changing lifestyle of many Canadians who recognize the importance of our becoming a conserving society.

Mr. Speaker, this increase in home canning has resulted in unprecedented consumer demand throughout North America for canning jar lids. Since 1974, consumers in Canada, particularly in British Columbia, have encountered difficulties in obtaining adequate supplies to meet their demands. The hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) dealt with this matter when she spoke. Most members, particularly those from British Columbia, know of the special difficulties in obtaining wide-mouth lids of the kind generally used by most consumers in British Columbia. Compounding the problem has been hoarding and unnecessary panic buying of lids by consumers in anticipation of future need. This has been happening for about the last two years. I am sure most hon. members can tell this House of people who entered a store to buy wide-mouth lids and bought the entire stock of lids. This sort of thing has created tremendous difficulties. The shortage was created in part by panic buying.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) spoke of lids imported from Taiwan. I want to put on record some facts about those particular closure discs, as they are known, with the hope that these facts will become known to people across Canada. When we encountered shortages one year or so ago, some importers imported these discs from Taiwan. It became apparent after some discs were tested that when used in the conventional home canning process they failed to seal correctly. One particular disc imported from Taiwan, known as the Rosewood disc, was suspected of being faulty. This brand was distributed only by Safeway Limited in British Columbia. Sales of Rosewood discs had been stopped by Safeway themselves. The company is recalling these products from the market. I ask my colleagues from British Columbia, and others who are concerned, to please make sure that these discs are returned to Safeway. They are faulty and should not be used under any condition. Accordingly, arrangements have been made to obtain samples of all closure discs offered for sale in Canada. Testing is being performed in co-operation with the agriculture Canada-food advisory services.

It is recognized that faulty closure discs, particularly when used by home canners to preserve non-acidic vegetables such as carrots, beets and beans, present a real possibility of botulism poisoning. I wanted to bring that point up, Mr. Speaker, because I am sure all hon. members would wish to be aware of the canning products we turn out in British Columbia. The whole province grows a variety of fruits and vegetables, and home canning is one thing we all do.

Until this year, as has been mentioned previously, we have run into the problem of the tremendous growth of consumer interest in home food preservation. The special difficulty we have experienced, as I mentioned earlier, is in connection with the wide-mouth jar lids. Until this year there were only four companies supplying the Canadian market. They have been mentioned previously. There was the Anchor Cap and Closure company, Bernardin of Canada, and two American companies, Kerr Glass and Ball Corporation, both of which have been major suppliers, particularly to the British Columbia market. Figures provided by these four firms to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have shown significant annual production increases. But even the vastly increased supply in 1975 did not meet the consumer demand which continued to rise to unpredictable levels.

Since the federal government became aware of this problem a number of measures have been instigated with a view to alleviating and ultimately eliminating the shortage. I sympathize with the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) in his concern. I want to go on to mention another thing which I think should be known. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has maintained liaison with its counterpart in the United States, the Office of Consumer Affairs in Washington, since a portion of the Canadian lid supply is manufactured in the U.S.A. and the shortage of lids in the United States has followed a similar pattern to that of Canada. The U.S. government reports that the supply for its country in 1976 will be more than four billion replacement lids; I repeat, more than four billion replacement lids.

I do not wish to place a lot of detail on the record, but I do feel that one or two facts should be brought to the attention of all hon. members here this afternoon. The availability of canning lids in 1976 will depend greatly on the continued output which I have just mentioned, and this is something which is fairly dependable. It will depend also upon the activities of the consumer public, something which we cannot forecast with a high degree of certainty. However, the federal government will continue to be actively involved as a watchdog over supplies of lids available to Canadian families who wish to protect themselves from the adverse effects of rising food prices by engaging in home canning.

I will take my seat at this point as I know there are other members who wish to contribute to this important discussion on home canning made possible this afternoon by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay Boundary (Mr. Johnston).

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to take part in this debate. I notice that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lee) is not here and had graciously passed on his notes to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mrs. Campagnolo). And I suppose they came originally from the deputy minister or one of his aides. That very effectively put the lid on the usual—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Another of those wide mouths.

Mr. Friesen: It put the lid on the usual gust or cacophanous images and twisted metaphors which come from that parliamentary secretary. But I must admit she is a good reader. She reads bureaucratic language very well. She doesn't even need stage direction. I appreciate all the statistics she left with us and the running account of the work of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. But the situation is reminiscent of another, a few years ago, when there was an extreme shortage of jeans in the country. It was almost impossible to buy certain brands of jeans. Until the companies presumably felt justified in raising the price of jeans high enough to allow them to make a handsome profit, the shortage continued. This makes one suspect that the shortages experienced in supplies of isolated commodities are contrived rather than real.

The hon. lady's speech was long on statistics but very short on answers. She did say there had been a shortage of tin plate—this is supposed to excuse the companies for failure to produce these jar lids. But she never explained the reason for that shortage. Could it be that there was a better profit to be made by the steel companies or the suppliers? Or could it be that a better profit could be made by manufacturing products other than jar lids? This was something the hon. lady did not explain. Maybe the deputy minister did not write that out for her.

Mr. Anderson: So you want us to interfere with the economy now?

Mr. Friesen: There are members on that side who would love to have a planned economy and, if this an example of it, Heaven forbid we should ever have an economy which is totally planned.

The parliamentary secretary told us that one of the companies was supplying lids but felt obliged to supply them first to the companies making jars so that all the jars would come complete with lids. That seems reasonable. But is the responsibility of the lid companies to the jar companies first, or is it to the consumers? There are thousands of Canadian consumers who have a good supply of jars but who are looking for lids. Yet that lid company felt its first obligation was to the other companies, those making jars. And it seems to me that the Department of Consumer Affairs is not arranging its priorities correctly.

Mr. Anderson: So you would advocate more government interference?

Mr. Friesen: Well, hon. members have heard that wonderful explosion coming from the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) about government interference. I could give some wonderful examples of that, if he wants a catalogue.

Mr. Anderson: First you say we should do it, and then you say we should not. Make up your mind.

Mr. Friesen: That sounds like a Liberal. Looks like an old Edsel. You don't know which way it's going.

It seems to me that if there is no shortage, as the parliamentary secretary assures us is the situation, that the retailers know something the minister does not know about. I go to the local store and I see signs in the window—written on cardboard—"There is no shortage here of wide-mouthed Mason jar lids, now." Mr. Speaker, if there is no shortage, the consumer doesn't know about it, because the retailer has to advertise the fact.

I go out to Bells Corners and I see a 5-acre plot, subdivided into plots just a few square yards, and rented out to local home-owners. Then I go over to the area in which I live, I drive through Richmond and I see a 10-acre plot beside the freeway whose owner is doing the same thing—renting out small garden plots to home-owners. Practically every one of those plots has been rented out. It is evident that home-owners are trying to beat inflation, while at the same time enjoying home-grown products which they probably prefer.

Home Canning

Consumers are trying to save by raising their own garden products and doing their own canning in readiness for the winter months. At the same time the government, which has manufactured inflation, is failing to protect the consumer from another angle. I hear the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) saying that you cannot have it both ways, but there is one thing that we would like to have, and that is an opportunity for the consumer to save a few bucks.

● (1740)

It gives me no assurance to hear the parliamentary secretary read out a statement from the bureaucracy saying that everything will be hunky-dory because they have gone hat in hand to all these companies and said, "Please give us a polite explanation of why there is a shortage". Any explanation that these companies gave to the minister was said to be a good one and we are now supposed to be encouraged. That is not enough. We can anticipate another shortage this year. As hon. members from British Columbia have already indicated, British Columbia suffers more than any other province from this particular shortage. There is going to be a shortage again this summer despite the assurances of the hon. member for Skeena.

I want to pay tribute to the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) for giving us this opportunity to debate the issue and to bring it to the conscience of the government. If it did not know before it certainly knows now that once more this problem is an impending one for consumers this summer.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to say only a few words on the motion of the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston). I am very happy that he has moved it. It is three years since I ran into complaints from my constituents, including my own wife, about the unavailability of materials for home canning, and the problem has become more severe in the last two years with the rising cost of living. People are trying to can the products of their own gardens, or they go to a farmers' market on a Saturday and take home a car trunk load of vegetables and fruit to can.

I myself have noticed, on going both to the co-operative supermarket and to three private enterprise supermarkets in my city, that on a given Saturday you can get one part of what you require for home canning but not the other two parts. I am speaking here of the old-fashioned pint, quart, two quart sealers. I do not know whether the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) has ever done any home canning but I am sure her mother has. These old-fashioned sealers require three components—a rubber ring, a glass top, and a metal screw top. You could get the rubber ring one week but not the glass top. Or you get the glass top but not the metal screw top and rubber ring. This sort of thing has gone on for the past three years.

I particularly welcome the hon. member's motion because I think that some inquiries should be made not only as to the supply and distribution of these particular items but also as to who manufactures and owns them. I do not want to sound paranoid about this, but I have the feeling that the canners of fruits and vegetables are not particularly happy about housewives and families canning their own fruit and vegetables. They would rather housewives bought the canned goods which they produce. But judging from the way the price of these canned goods has risen in the last two years, more and more families will want to put their own fruit and vegetables in their own glass jars.

I listened to the hon. member for Skeena recite statistics, which I hope were not written out for her by the deputy minister of her department but were obtained by herself. As one hon. member said earlier, she read them well; but if she had composed them all by herself she would not have had to read them. If I heard her properly, she said something about increased production of 17,000 cases of one kind of tops and 18,000 of another kind. I think that those figures are reasonably close, but that would make 35,000 cases in all. That would satisfy perhaps 35,000 families, but there are hundreds of thousands of families in this country who want to can their own fruits and vegetables.

This stuff that the hon. member for Skeena read off is just not good enough. There is not an adequate supply either of the modern glass jar tops, to which I am sure the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay is referring, or sufficient supply in some parts of the country of the old-fashioned half pint, pint, quart and two quart sealers. Although you can get one part, you cannot get the other two. Supply varies from one store to the next and from one city to the next. If a housewife wants to spend a day or two canning products from her own garden, it means she may have to go to a dozen stores in order to find the three components that are required.

The hon. member for Skeena can read off all those figures that were sent over to her all she likes, but the fact of the matter is that hundreds of thousands of families over the last three years have been unable to buy components for home canning. Whether or not this motion passes, I hope that the hon. member for Skeena will get the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Mackasey) and the combines investigation branch to determine who owns the canning industry and the manufacturing plant that produces these components that are required for home canning. They ought to determine what happens among the food chains in terms of carrying supplies of these rubber rings, glass tops, and metal screw tops. Let them find out how much they are into this and how much they are not. I am sure that hundreds of thousands of housewives all over the country would be happy to hear more than this House has been told this afternoon.

For years, Mr. Speaker, people have been making efforts to provide for themselves out of their own gardens and their neighbour's gardens. Our great-grandmothers, grandmothers, and mothers canned, and now our wives are doing their own canning. But the necessary supplies are not available. I hope the hon. member for Skeena tries to make some last gasp efforts to save what she, her colleagues, and my friends to my right claim is this great, foolproof system known as free enterprise, a system that relies upon competition and so on for the good of Canadian consumers. This is just not happening, Mr. Speaker.

This may not be a great national issue but it does affect hundreds of thousands of families for many weeks of the year. Yet all we can get from the hon. member for Skeena are some statistics. I am quite certain they are accurate, but all that these statistics mean is that the production of components required for home canning is about one tenth, to put it modestly, of the amount that is required.

I hope that the House will approve this motion and that the government will look at this matter more closely than it has in the past. I also hope it will inquire as to the possibility of additional production in this country instead of relying on the excuses that the hon. member for Skeena gave regarding U.S. manufacturers. That is not good enough either. As I say, I hope the motion will pass and that the government will take a much more serious look at this question than has been the case so far.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to congratulate the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) on his motion. I know that for a considerable amount of time he has pursued this question of the shortage of rings in Canada. The explanation that I received when I first came to Ottawa in the latter part of 1974 was that there was a shortage of material for the lids.

The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) questioned where this shortage arose. Nevertheless I accept the fact that a shortage did occur, as a shortage has occurred of many items during the same period. I am somewhat surprised that the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock should criticize the government for not taking an active role in controlling this industry. This to me seems to be applying a double standard. Many times in the House and over the media I hear it said that the government interferes too much in the business community, yet if something goes wrong in the business community it is said that we are wrong because we have not passed certain regulations, or carried out inspections or, in other words looked into the distribution of products to the Canadian consumer.

I was very happy to be informed by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce that there are three new outfits in Canada that will be in the business of producing rings. Rockwell International has apparently established an operation in Ontario and will be producing a stainless steel ring. This ring will apparently be reuseable, which I think is an excellent idea because all of us know that rings up to this time have had to be replaced after one use. If we had one that was reuseable perhaps this would be one method of solving the problem, since they will not have to be thrown away and can be used on a year to year basis.

I understand also that Kraft Foods is going to get into the production of lids, and this should also help the situation. There is apparently a company in British Columbia called CFB Trading which will be importing lids from New Zealand. If this takes place this year, this again should give us a better situation in respect of lids, because these will be in addition to the lids produced here in Canada and in the United States.

It would appear that several things have happened in the last few years. One is that many people have rediscovered the joy of working with the soil. I suppose people have decided, because of city life with its concrete, steel, etc., that they want to work with the soil. This is in addition to the fact that they can save money. They take pleasure in being out in the open air, and so forth.

This is not something unique in Canada, but is something that has occurred in the United States and perhaps in other parts of the world. As a result there has been an unprecedented demand for these lids. The same occurrence in demand all of a sudden has taken place in the United States within the last few years, and some of the lids that were produced in the United States were diverted in 1974-75 to that U.S. market.

It seems to me that in the type of society we live in, surely if there is a demand for lids, or other goods, this creates an unprecedented opportunity for Canadian companies to manufacture those lids or goods. Quite honestly I feel that rather than trying to become involved in discovering the causes of what has gone wrong, new companies should come in and manufacture the lids. When a shortage is noticed and these companies such as Kerr Glass, Bernadine, Anchor and Ball cannot supply the demand, this gives an opportunity for new entrepreneurs to enter the market and provide a product that will be used by the Canadian consumer.

It is my understanding that the problem of understimating demand, coupled with the problem of distribution which occurred in 1974-75, has caused distortions. However, in 1976 there will be approximately one million cases produced in Canada and in the United States which will come into the Canadian market, as opposed to approximately 530,000 cases in 1975. If that is in fact the case we will be doubling production and doubling the number of lids available. I am sure that, like the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), my wife will also give me a much easier time, because I can assure the House that in 1974-75 my wife had me shopping in Ottawa for rings to be sent to British Columbia because they were unavailable there.

I hope that with the new manufacturers entering the market, and with the importation of rings or lids, this will reduce the number of people in Canada who will be without this product. I hope that in this day and age a problem in respect of a simple thing like a jar lid can be solved by Canadian industry without government intercession. I believe this can be the case. Certainly the people in the Departments of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Industry, Trade and Commerce will be monitoring the situation, but I do not believe they should enter into this.

I trust that the comments regarding the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) will be taken in jest. We all have research facilities on both sides of the House. We ourselves use those facilities and I would suggest other hon. members also use their own facilities. I think it was a rather narrow and petty tirade against the hon. member because she did quote statistics. She did have the facts at hand, and surely debate to be meaningful in this House must include statistics, facts, and figures.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of those western members of parliament, mainly from British Columbia. I think a few remarks from someone in the east representing a constituency in the small province of Ontario, where presumably there could be some views, would be in order.

I listened with great interest to the last speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson), who referred in his remarks to the Rockwell International firm in Ontario. It is a coincidence that on June 3 I received a telephone call from the manager of the Rockwell International plant situated in the great riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka in the town of Bracebridge. Mr. Gerry Morrows of that plant phoned to see if any offices of a member of parliament could be used to assist that firm in getting into the manufacture of a component part for these sealers. He stated they were starting production and tooling up for these components. He said they had to get into production immediately. He informed me they have orders at the present time from A & P, and Dominion Stores of Toronto for these parts, and that Home Hardware was also interested.

Mr. Morrows told me that the component they intended to make would be of stainless steel, grade 302. They will be 6/1,000ths thick, so they will be relatively thin. In order to produce these components they must get this steel. They have orders for seven million parts. They have contacted Atlas Steel in Welland, which is not able to supply the requirement. As a result the company will have to go the United States and purchase from a firm in Pittsburgh.

What the company is hoping is that the Department of Finance will be able to provide some relief by a remission of the duty on this particular steel, allowing it in so that these parts can be manufactured in Canada rather than imported from the States. We heard statistics earlier about the number brought in from the United States last year. I am wondering whether those members on the government side who have some influence with the Department of Finance will use their good offices to see that this necessary steel is brought into Canada duty-free, or at least that there is a remission of the duty once it is allowed in. I understand they are going to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock, the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, before the evening break I had hardly begun my speech on capital punishment. However, I did point out that the cabinet, and certainly members of parliament who are abolitionists, do not seem to want to listen to the public opinion of the large majority of the Canadian population. I also raised the question of whether a member of parliament should vote in accordance with his conscience or that of his constituents. It is my very strong opinion that on an emotional issue such as capital punishment, as opposed to, let us say a fiscal or monetary issue, where pertinent information and data are at the fingertips of the member of parliament rather than at the fingertips of his constituents, the member should and must vote in accordance with the wishes of his constituents.

Then I pointed out what every other retentionist before me would have pointed out, which is that the government has not abided by the law of the land, specifically the law as it relates to capital punishment or other issues such as illegal strikes, immigration, and so on. For a number of years we saw what can happen when people in any society decide to live according to their own laws, as the government seems to be doing, scorning the laws laid down by their peers to ensure peace and order in our society. Some of these people were called hippies, and yippies and other assorted titles. The plain fact is that they are misfits, unable to cope with reality, and unwilling to conform to even the minimum standards of normal social behaviour. They will probably never realize that they have in fact proven the point that we have tried to make.

Laws and standards are necessary, and in fact vital to the survival of any society, and all peoples' actions and conduct must not only serve their own individual purposes but must also serve the collective needs of their society. Those people who follow the advice of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and concentrate on doing their own thing become a drag on society, leeches who take all they can get and give as little as they can.

The advantage that is being taken of the unemployment insurance commission fund is just one example. We can be thankful, Mr. Speaker, that the number of people who think and act in this way is still relatively small, and that the majority of Canadian people want to provide for themselves, and also to contribute to their society. The problem is, however, that the federal cabinet has chosen to do its own thing over the years with respect to capital punishment, and we have seen what the result has been.

People are writing and asking what is wrong with the cabinet in Ottawa. They write not only to cabinet ministers but to members on either side of the House. They ask why the cabinet continually commutes all death sentences imposed by our courts according to the law of the land, even where there are no recommendations for mercy. People write and demand the resignations of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to make room for ministers who will live up to the laws of the land.

The public begs and pleads but the Prime Minister, and therefore his cabinet, simply do not listen nor care. What kind of security and protection does the public have when the Prime Minister and his fawning sycophants, who dare call themselves the cabinet, simply continue to ignore the public at large? What kind of security and protection do we have when this self-imposed dictator, along with his band of followers, continues to break the laws of the land? There is no protection in a law that the federal government ignores, Mr. Speaker. There is no protection in a law that the Solicitor General vows publicly that he will not obey, and there is no protection in a law that even the murderers know will never be applied as long as the present Minister of Justice and Solicitor General retain their cabinet posts.

The Solicitor General knew that the House had approved the law calling for the death penalty, on conviction for the murder of a policeman or prison guard, when he accepted his cabinet post, and so he accepted that high office with false credentials. He knew at the outset that he would not obey the laws that he swore to uphold as a condition of his office.

It is unthinkable and unacceptable to me and to others, Mr. Speaker, that a member of this House would accept a cabinet post, swear an oath to uphold the laws of our country, and then say out the other side of his mouth that he would resign if his cabinet colleagues forced him to carry out the laws of Canada respecting the application of the death penalty for capital murder.

His cabinet colleagues should have told the minister at that time that if he wanted the power and the prestige and the financial advantage of cabinet rank, then he should be prepared to accept the responsibilities that go with the rank, and follow the laws as set forth by parliament. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, on July 2, 1975, I rose in this House and moved a motion under Standing Order 43 in which I called upon the Solicitor General to resign from the cabinet and make way for a minister who would respect the laws as laid down by this parliament, and follow them accordingly. Of course there were the usual Liberal dissenters who do not attach any real importance to discussions on topics of interest to our people. I was not able to have the House adjourn to debate the question, but the question is under debate at this moment.

Member after member has asked for the minister's resignation, and it looks as though the only way we will get rid of him is for the Prime Minister to listen to the voices of the people and fire him. But we already know that the Prime Minister does not listen to any voice, and therefore such a proposition immediately becomes a hopeless one. But the weight of public opinion continues to be against the position being maintained by the government with respect to capital punishment. There cannot be the slightest doubt on that score.

This brings to mind another motion I moved in this House last year. Taking into account the intense feeling of the people of Canada, as evidenced by the tone of majority comment on this subject, this would be an appropriate time to repeat the words in my motion of June 9, 1975. I rose and moved, "That this Parliament instruct the Prime Minister to initiate a national referendum with regard to capital punishment." I pointed out that the government was obviously incapable of coping with the emotional issue of capital punishment, and I suggested that the government was in fact asking the Canadian people to accept the present alarming rate of increase in violent crime as a way of life.

If we, as the elected representatives of all of the people, cannot come up with a reasonable solution in accordance with the wishes of the great majority of Canadians then there is no other way that this issue can be settled to the satisfaction of the people, and in the interests of peace and security, except by allowing the people of Canada to vote on the issue in a national referendum.

If the government cannot allow itself to be bound by the will of parliament, and if it cannot bring itself to the point of tabling legislation that it will abide by, then it should dissolve parliament, call a national general election, and place capital punishment on the ballot. We simply cannot continue year after year in a legislative vacuum where capital punishment is concerned. It cannot be kicked around year after year on an ad hoc basis as though it were a football, while violent crime continues to rise.

Many of my colleagues in this House have quoted statistics to support their cases, Mr. Speaker, both for and against capital punishment, and for myself I choose to believe that the statistics on violent crime in Canada since the cabinet effectively abolished the death penalty by commutation speak for themselves and point out the need for severe remedies. There are presently a number of murderers awaiting the death penalty.

One of these cases has been carried over from 1972, two from 1973, and two from 1974. Four have been carried over from 1975, and yet another involves a conviction on February 10 of this year. Eight of these people were convicted of murdering police officers, and two were convicted of murdering police officials. I am not even talking about the scores of murderers who have committed brutal crimes that did not fall into the category of murder of policemen and prison guards. According to the law as it stands today, these people were convicted of capital murder, and capital murder calls for the death penalty. I have no doubt that, even if this bill fails to pass and we have to fall back on the existing law, none of the people presently awaiting execution will in fact be executed. In fact in time they will be allowed to roam our streets at random only to commit crimes again and again, as has happened in the past.

I need only to mention Charles Manson as one example who will be released shortly, after having committed a multiple number of horrendous crimes, and in fact is threatening to continue to do likewise upon his release. But we do not have to single out Charles Manson alone—we have our own variety of Charles Mansons in Canada.

I have mentioned in my previous speeches on this subject that many people complain that capital punishment is cruel and inhumane punishment. Even if I accept that as valid, Mr. Speaker, I have to counter with the charge that it is far more cruel and inhumane for a person to roam the streets preying on innocent and helpless citizens. It is far more cruel to seek out a man or woman, or a small child, and murder that person for a few dollars, for sexual desires, or simply for kicks. What is more cruel than to lure a small girl, not even in her teens, away from home or school, molest her sexually, and then murder her horribly and viciously? When I hear someone who really should know better pleading for the life of such a murderer, I wonder what our society is coming to.

If the manner of carrying out executions stands in the way of getting a consensus on retaining capital punishment, and if there are people who are abolitionists because they feel that hanging is cruel and inhumane, then let us examine the question of the means of carrying out the death penalty. If it is the means and not the death penalty itself that deters some members from voting for capital punishment, then let us by all means find a method that is more humane, more acceptable to the abolitionists. I do not hold that hanging is the only method of execution that could or should be considered by this House when debating capital punishment. For example, in a recent opinion poll put out by the Metropolitan Toronto Police Association there were thousands of replies to their questionnaire which suggested the electric chair, the gas chamber, medical drugging, and many other methods of execution, so that is not an excuse for those who do not vote on this matter because of hanging as the means of execution in this country.

My mind is open on the question of method, but it is closed on the question of capital punishment itself. I cannot vote in good conscience to save the life of a person who deliberately, calculatedly, carries out a murder, and then throws himself or herself on the mercy of the courts, and on the mercy of the society that that person scorns. They scorn our laws, they scorn our way of life, and they scorn our efforts to maintain order, peace and security for our people. Then when they are caught and convicted of committing a brutal and vicious crime, they expect more consideration and compassion than that accorded to their victims.

The sad truth of the matter is that the criminal gets far more consideration than do the victims of crime, and I cannot accept this as a natural and normal response from those in an official capacity in our political and judicial systems. Here in the House of Commons we hear all kinds of arguments in support of saving the lives of convicted murderers; we hear that long prison sentences are inhumane; and we hear that our primary responsibility to convicted felons is to rehabilitate them. I reject those arguments, Mr. Speaker. I reject them most emphatically on the basis that once an individual has lowered himself to the level of being able to commit a premeditated murder there is absolutely no way that he should be permitted to make his way back into society—a society which he rejected by committing the worst of all crimes—a society which he obviously did not respect or like—a society of which he would take advantage once given a second chance, as has been statistically proven over and over again.

There is no question that capital crimes are being committed in our society, premeditated murder, and treason against our country. Those crimes should carry the death penalty upon conviction. Where it can be demonstrated that a murder has been committed, but not planned, then a long prison sentence should be the penalty, and this penalty too should be carried out to the full extent called for in the law.

[Mr. Jelinek.]

We have been too soft on criminals as we have been in other aspects of our society, Mr. Speaker, and therefore we are beginning to pay the price. Someone said that the chickens hatched by the cabinet in its abuse of the privilege of clemency have come home to roost. I believe very strongly that that is so. The Canadian people place the blame for the present high rate of violent crime squarely at the feet of the cabinet. In their wisdom the Canadian people have placed the blame for the decline in respect for law and order on the government, and the government can no longer shift the onus on to the courts or on the parole board. But I believe there will be a sufficient number of Liberal backbenchers who will have the guts to act according to their own conviction when the vote takes place.

Hardly anyone today can accept the government's alternative of a long prison sentence in place of the death penalty for capital murder. We have watched the government turn convicted felons, dangerous offenders, loose on society after ridiculously short-terms in prison. As I said earlier, a large number of those have then committed new crimes, up to and including murder. We do not trust the government to keep dangerous offenders in prison. If the government has commuted all death penalties imposed by the courts since the present law was passed, thereby breaking the very law it itself set, and if the government persists in releasing criminals into society on day passes and week end leaves only to commit further crimes, then how can we have any faith in its new proposals?

I must conclude my remarks by saying to the government that it has provided the best possible evidence, by its own actions and by its own attitude towards violent crime in Canada, that there can be no acceptable alternative to the death penalty. The death penalty must be reinstated, and it must be applied without fail unless there are extenuating circumstances such as a recommendation for clemency by a judge or jury. The government has made the best possible case for capital punishment by refusing to honour the mandate given it by parliament, and by ignoring the rights of law-abiding Canadians to protection of life and property.

The cracks are showing up daily in Liberal ranks over this issue, and the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice must surely know by now that their policies, or non policies, with respect to crime and criminals are not finding any more favour among Liberals than among other parties. It is time for both ministers to stand aside and make room for ministers who will obey and honour the oaths of their office when it comes to this issue of capital punishment.

It is time for action in dealing with violent crime in Canada in a direct, serious, and realistic manner, rather than by means of this phony method. This is the phony method by which the government first brought in a decoy bill. I refer, of course, to Bill C-83, the first part of the so-called peace and security package, which was meant to justify this bill and the abolition of capital punishment. However, I do not think it is working the way it was meant to work. The smokescreen set up by the two ministers responsible, for the sole purpose of reducing or even eliminating any opposition to their egotistical goals, has suddenly, to their surprise, been penetrated by members of all parties. Certainly my own personal wish is for this smokescreen to collapse totally and for this parliament to regain some of the dignity and prestige it has been losing in past years by voting in accordance with the wishes of the majority of Canadians.

In any case, as I was saying earlier in my remarks, it is time for action in dealing with violent crime in Canada, and it is also time for the Prime Minister to appoint people to those two ministries who will do more than just stand around wringing their hands over the fate of the poor, misunderstood murderers. If these actions are not dealt with, and if the government, starting with the Prime Minister himself, does not begin, first, to follow the laws of the land as set out by parliament, and second, to abide by the wishes of the great majority of Canadians when it comes to an emotional issue such as this, then there certainly should be no other alternative but, as I said earlier, to dissolve parliament, call a general election, and place capital punishment on the ballot for the good and well-being of all Canadians.

The Canadian people want action, and they want it now, and I can only say to hon. members on either side of the House who will vote for the abolition of capital punishment that they should live with their consciences over the the death of each innocent man, woman and child who has been brutally murdered by individuals who need not have respect for the law because all they have to do is follow the example of the cabinet.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in this debate will be brief. While I agree that there is nothing of greater importance to discuss and decide than the matter of life and death, nevertheless I feel too much of the time, attention, effort and energy of this House and of Canadians generally are being devoted to the question of abolition or retention of capital punishment, and not nearly enough to the causes and eradication of crime.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: In 1973 I voted for Bill C-2 with reluctance, stating that I would much prefer to have seen legislation introduced at that time which would abolish capital punishment totally. This time I shall vote for Bill C-84 with reservations, not because I have in any way changed my views as to the necessity for total abolition, but because I am gravely concerned about those clauses of the bill which call for the establishment of mandatory minimum sentences. To my mind, that aspect of the bill makes it a very retrogressive piece of legislation.

Surely everyone in this House and every responsible member of society is deeply concerned about protecting society from the crime of murder. The protection of the public takes precedence over every other concern. The question is, then, how best can we ensure that protection? What are the means to enforce it? Is capital punishment a protective measure? While statistics have been cited to show that it is a deterrent, as often as not those same statistics are used to show that capital punishment has no deterrent value.

Many organizations and studies have been quoted on this matter. Let me add one more. It is from the Canadian Association of Elizabeth Fry Societies, and that association states:

> The most frequently used argument in favour of capital punishment is that it serves as a deterrent. Many studies, including recent ones at the University of Montreal and the University of Toronto, have shown that this is not so. While the murder rate in Canada has risen in the past five years, during the temporary suspension of capital punishment, the rate of other crimes of violence has increased even more quickly in this same period. The incidence of murders in many countries around the world indicates that the number of murders is related to economic conditions and the temper of the times, but has no relationship to whether or not the death penalty is used.
> Another common argument in favour of capital punishment is that it serves to protect society. We point out that such protection is not necessarily complete, because even if the death penalty is retained the courts might often accept the plea of manslaughter to avoid a capital sentence. On the other hand, if adequate safeguards are built into the parole system, it should be possible to protect society without having to resort to capital punishment.

I believe that capital punishment is ineffective as a deterrent, and I also believe that Bill C-84 in its present form is largely ineffective as a measure for the better protection of society.

Let me elaborate. First of all, I believe the arbitrary nature of some of the distinctions between first and second degree murder is counter productive to the intent of the legislation to protect members of society. A planned or deliberate murder would be considered first degree murder under this legislation and would carry a penalty of a mandatory minimum sentence of 25 years. Thus an individual convicted under this charge, involved in a single act against one individual, would be imprisoned for 25 years. Yet scientific evidence in recent years—in particular, two specific findings of criminal research—shows, first, that convicted murderers have low recidivism rates, and second, the longer the imprisonment, the slimmer the chances of rehabilitation.

However, let us consider the case of an unstable individual who, in a rage or acting on an impulse, murders several people, an occurrence which has been too sadly familiar in recent years in this country. This individual would be considered subject to the charge of second degree murder, and the terms of this bill would make that person a less dangerous threat to society. In reality the risk to society is often higher in the case of impulsive, irrational behaviour, yet the arbitrary nature of this legislation creates more stringent restrictions against those who plan one act.

Another questionable point of arbitrary classification in this legislation is the charge of first degree murder in cases where murder is committed during an attempted rape, indecent assault, kidnapping, forcible confinement, or hijacking. I do not for one single moment underestimate or underrate the heinous nature of these crimes and the abhorrence of murder under these circumstances, but by what criterion is a life taken during an attempted robbery less valuable than one taken during an indecent assault?

In terms of the protection of society this distinction is just not valid. According to a publication from the minister's own office, 66 per cent of murders committed during the commission of other criminal acts between 1961 and 1974 were murders associated with property and monetary crimes. Yet these murders, under this new legislation, would be deemed less threatening to society and have less stringest measures against them than the 23 per cent of murders committed during sex crimes.

● (2030)

One other point that gives me serious misgivings as to the potential of this bill to protect society is the application of first degree murder to those who murder prison guards and policemen. I have discussed this aspect of the bill at length with persons employed in the penitentiary service in my own constituency. While we may not agree on certain aspects of the bill, there are many in that employ who question the imposition of a 25 year sentence and its resulting effects. It is vital—it is important that we support in every way possible the work being done by our security officers throughout Canada. It goes without saying that I am committed to that principle. I have some grave doubts that the arbitrary nature of the mandatory sentence proposed by this bill will achieve this aim. In fact there is good reason to believe it may hinder it.

Let me quote from an article by Dr. E. A. Fattah, Chairman of the Criminology Department at the Simon Fraser University. He said:

> Those familiar with the situation of inmates in penal institutions know well that the real incentive for obeying stringent institution rules lies not in the fear of punishment, but in the prospect of earning time off for good behaviour and the hope of getting parole. Take away these prospects and you have taken away any incentive for change or good conduct. A minimum of 25 years creates a distinct category of men without hope, and a man without hope is capable of doing anything and everything to draw attention to his cause and to his condition.

It is that last thought, a man without hope, that I have heard echoed by many employees in the penitentiary service.

I would say to the minister, who first declared his opposition to the 25 year sentence in January, 1973, that it is discouraging to see him now abandon this principle. How much better it would be if he and his colleagues showed more interest, indeed urgency, in addressing themselves to the root problem, the social conditions that breed crime.

Three years ago members in this House went through the same lengthy and emotional debate. Three years have passed and the government has done little to eradicate the fertile breeding ground of crime in a society plagued with high inflation, high unemployment, economic and regional disparity.

I very much fear the extent of the unrest and discontent in this country because these problems of high inflation and high unemployment are growing worse, and because of them violent crime is on the increase. Where in any of the proposals or background notes for this legislation is there a commitment by the government to undertake to gain insight into the causes and process of violent crime in our society, and to attempt seriously to counteract this process?

I shall vote for this bill because I sincerely believe that capital punishment is not the answer to prevent or deter murder, and while I am committed to support any measure that increases the protection of innocent citizens from violence at the hands of others I seriously question that the principle of minimum mandatory sentences will help achieve this objective; rather, these proposals could have the opposite effect.

[Miss MacDonald.]

I would strongly urge the minister to reconsider this aspect of Bill C-84, and to introduce amendments at committee stage that would remove the arbitrary and universal application of mandatory minimum sentences so that each case can be considered on its own for the sentence it merits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, as many hon. members have said in this debate, this bill has been before the House on four or five occasions since 1961. I am not going to go into detail on each of those debates, however. What I want to say is that I have read most of the speeches made on this subject in the House of Commons to date, and I should like to compliment some of the members who have spoken for abolition, and some in the Liberal party who have been brave enough to speak out for retention of capital punishment.

We in this country are deeply concerned with the prevention and control of violent crime. I think that concern has brought out a desire on the part of many members on the government side to speak up even though they may well risk promotion or favour within the government in their chosen field of interest. I think it takes a great deal of courage and a great deal of determination on their part to represent the people they chose to represent. When they went before the people in 1974 and 1972, they said they would represent, they would serve. I want to emphasize those two phrases, Mr. Speaker—"they will represent and they will serve". Some have spoken out and have proved they have a determination to represent and a determination to serve.

I am particularly regretful that this speaking out by government members on the side of retention ended on Thursday last week. No government members on Friday, and hardly any today, have spoken on behalf of the government for retention or abolition. That suggests to me—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That is not so!

Mr. Horner: I understand that is not so and I accept the correction of the government Whip.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. That is not true at all. In fact we were told by the loyal opposition that they had numerous speakers, well beyond what we have. We are trying to give them a break so that we can get their speakers to go through. Our speakers will come up just the same. We are giving a break to the opposition, and we do not want the record to show that we have no speakers. I am a retentionist myself. I am not afraid to speak out, and I am sure many others on this side will do likewise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Railton: I am saving time or I would speak.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member is in a particular position to lend a great deal of wisdom to this subject, Mr. Speaker. Rather than save time, if he had told his constituents in 1972 and 1974 that he would not speak out in the House of Commons because he believes time is more important and he is not needed to represent them, and that Trudeau and the cabinet represent him on government issues and he need not speak out at all, they would not have sent him to Ottawa. He is a member in a position to lend some wisdom to this debate.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) on a point of order. I would suggest we all get back to the subject of debate.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, I think we will have to correct some misstatements. It is too bad. I have spoken on this subject twice before, but I have not spoken this time because I thought we were trying to save time. Nobody has brought forward any new ideas on this subject. I hope the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) will, but even if he does not I think it is regrettable that we have so much misstatement and talking around the subject. I hope he will give us some new ideas.

● (2040)

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member. The last thing I wanted him to do was rise, bare his soul, and tell the House he had no new ideas to offer. But he interrupted me. I shall forever let it be known that he has no new ideas to offer this House, and his constituents can judge him accordingly. So long as he represents his constituency I will not mention his name again in the House. I know he has nothing new to offer.

I have been interrupted several times. I do not mind interruptions.

Mr. Railton: Good going, Jack!

Mr. Horner: But it is difficult to maintain one's continuity of thought. As I was saying before the interruption, we are concerned about preventing the incidence of violent crime in this country and we must exercise our responsibilities to the full, to eliminate the difficulty confronting Canada.

This has been an interesting debate, and I have read most of the speeches. There have been worth-while contributions on the side of abolition and on the side of retention. To me, it is glaringly obvious that all members of the socialist party believe in abolition, that most Progressive Conservatives believe in retention—

An hon. Member: What about your leader?

Mr. Horner: I said most—and that most members of the Liberal party believe in retaining power and in doing what is necessary to retain power. Therefore we must approach this question philosophically. Why do socialists, the NDP group included, believe in abolition?

An hon. Member: Ask Joe Clark.

An hon. Member: Ask Trudeau.

Mr. Horner: It is apparent that socialists support evermore controls over the individual.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, if any hon. members interrupting me have something new to suggest, perhaps they can speak after I have finished. I am trying to put forward new thoughts which may invigorate the minds of some hon. members for the first time since their election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Let's hear them.

Mr. Horner: The socialists believe in more state control over the individual. That may be oversimplifying the position but that, I believe, is a broad statement which socialists find acceptable. They think private enterprise cannot do the job, that the state knows best, that the state should control the people, and that it should therefore have absolute control. In exercising absolute control it must restrict the individual in every nook and cranny of activity. But this restraint of the individual makes the individual rebellious.

Far be it from me to suggest that the spirit of rebelliousness is more prevalent today than it was ten or 20 years ago; the fact remains that the spirit of rebelliousness is ever more evident. Therefore it is not surprising to note that crime rates are higher than they were ten years or 20 years ago. As I said, the more controls the state imposes on the individual, the more rebellious will the individual become. He rebels against the state. The rebellious action might take the form of crime committed against our wives or loved ones.

The fundamental question we must answer is: how are we to curb this rebelliousness? Are we, as legislators, doing everything we can to give the individual freedom to do what he wants to do in society, freedom to better his community and country; or are we imposing so many restrictions on the individual that he tends to rebel? If we are to cure the ever-increasing incidence of violent crime, we, as legislators, must answer that question. Of course the socialists think the state knows best. Their position is almost religious: the state knows best, does everything best, and we should all be controlled by the state. This experiment has been tried in Russia, with not too much success. I doubt if it will succeed in the end, just as I doubt if it will succeed in any other relatively affluent country. It succeeded in mainland China for a number of years, a country suffering from great poverty and distress. There the state managed the economy more efficiently than the individual could have managed it; but I do not expect that experiment to last for many years in the future. I think in the years ahead the present system of authority in mainland China will decay.

Putting it simply, when the state imposes its external discipline on the individual, the individual tends to rebel. As legislators we must encourage the individual to exercise self-discipline, self-restraint, for his own betterment and that of his community. In the long run state imposed discipline on the individual creates rebellion, upheaval, and an increase in violent crime. Therefore I am not surprised at what has happened in this country. The government is imposing ever more external pressure on the individual and fostering the spirit of rebellion.

Let us examine certain statistics relating to Canada. In 1954, when our population was some 15 million, there were 125 murders in this country. By 1964 our population had risen to over 19 million, and there were 218 murders. In 1974, when ever more restrictions had been placed on the individual, we experienced 545 murders. That represents an increase in the murder rate of well over 100 per cent between 1964 and 1974. Why did the murder rate increase so dramatically? Part of the reason is that the government took more and more decisions unto itself and left fewer to the individual.

I think many members misunderstand the history of this bill. In 1967 we embarked on a trial period during which capital punishment was to be abolished, except in cases involving the killing of a prison guard or policeman. I did not vote in support of that bill because I felt my wife, granddaughter and loved ones were entitled to as much protection as was being afforded to policemen and to prison guards. I felt that the trial period was not good for Canada. Since 1967 the government has fully demonstrated that it does not intend to carry out the will of parliament, the will enshrined in the 1967 legislation.

That provision was reinstated in 1972, and again the same thing held true. Since 1972 the government has deliberately demonstrated to the people of Canada that it has no intention of carrying out the will of parliament. What does this mean for Canadians? Many abolitionists have argued that capital punishment has no deterrent effect and that the retentionists have never proved the contrary. Mr. Speaker, we have never been given the chance to prove that it has a deterrent effect because the government has deliberately gone out of its way to commute all death sentences.

I know there are cabinet ministers who will argue that they have a right to commute death sentences and that, this being the case, they did not deliberately disobey the law. My interpretation of the record leads me to an opposite conclusion. In my view the very fact that they are bringing forward this bill at the present time before the trial period is ended proves my case. Why are they bringing it forward now? It is because their conscience is bothering them. They cannot continue to disobey the legislation which was passed in 1972 by commuting all the death sentences which come before them.

If ministers could stand in their places and say they never deliberately disobeyed the will of parliament, but had logically studied every case individually before reaching a decision to commute, that would be one thing. But they do not. Perhaps my judgment is caustic. Perhaps I ought not to accuse them of deliberately taking the action they did. Well, let them rise and say now that they will continue to commute all the sentences which come before them for review or, on the other hand, that they will not. But ministers will not make such a statement. They want to abolish capital punishment.

What we are contemplating now is not a free vote of the House of Commons but the imposition of the will of the cabinet on backbenchers on the government side. It is an attempt to hoodwink members of the opposition into believing this is a free vote. I know the whip is looking at me with an angry eye.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am not.

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Horner: They may well be hoodwinking even him.

An hon. Member: That would be easy!

Mr. Horner: I maintain that the conscience, even of this cabinet, is becoming uneasy. Ministers feel they cannot commute all the death sentences which come before them and they want "off the hook". I say to members on all sides: do not let the government off the hook. This is a government which undertook to govern for the good of the people and by the consent of the people. There can be no question as to the wish of the Canadian people. They are opting from 70 to 80 per cent across Canada for the retention of capital punishment in cases of heinous crimes.

I should like to turn to one other aspect of the subject, one which is often debated in the House, the subject of rehabilitation. A former colleague of mine in this Chamber, now the ombudsman for the Province of Ontario, often spoke on this topic and his speeches were always very moving; they commanded a good deal of attention. He was a believer in rehabilitation. He would say, "Never give up hope for your fellow man; always hold out some hope of rehabilitation for him." I found that point of view hard to argue against whenever I discussed the matter with him. Now look at the bill before us.

Where do we find any hope for the rehabilitation of persons who commit a violent crime, the crime which is called capital murder? I see no hope for them. A man is sentenced to 25 years and it is true that possibly, following judicial inquiry, he can be released after serving 15. I see no hope for a man who commits a murder, now called non-capital murder, and who is sentenced to ten years because he loses his temper, or because in a fit of rage or passion he kills a loved one, or someone near to him.

Where are the true abolitionists in this House who can support this legislation, a bill which would destroy all hope of rehabilitation? I doubt very much whether my former colleague, the present ombudsman for Ontario, would support this measure.

An hon. Member: Yes, he would.

Mr. Horner: In that case, he would not really believe it. It is possible to support this legislation if you do not really believe it will be carried out. But if you really believe the letter of the law will be obeyed, then how can you support this legislation if you are an abolitionist? It leaves no room for rehabilitation.

One government member who has spoken in this debate says he intends to move an amendment to the legislation in committee. He admitted in his speech that the bill destroys all hope for certain persons. He maintains that in all cases where hope is destroyed and a second murder is committed, capital punishment should be enforced. Speaking to him privately he tells me that many hon. members support such a stand. This goes to prove that many of us accept that any hope for rehabilitation is destroyed if the letter of the law is applied. Mr. Speaker, we cannot buy this piece of poorly-drafted legislation which is put forward in an attempt to force parliament to get the cabinet off the hook. I do not want to get any government off the hook when it does not have the courage to obey the law of the land and the will of the people.

This is the fifth debate on this subject in which I have taken part in the House of Commons, and to my mind it is the worst. It is true that some of the best speeches might have been made in it, but the subject matter is the worst. The government is not asking parliament to return to the use of capital punishment. It is asking for its abolition even in the case of the murder of policemen and prison guards.

An hon. Member: And treason.

Mr. Horner: "And treason", as correctly stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie). Policemen and prison guards have asked that this legislation be voted down. Who knows best? Let hon. members answer to their constituents. This is an important piece of legislation about which I wish there were more new thought on the part of the backbenchers of the Liberal party who rise to speak and represent their constituents.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Horner: I have not finished, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock, pursuant to order made earlier this day it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings now before the House so that we may resume debate on the motion moved earlier this day, upon which debate was adjourned.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR EXTENDED SITTINGS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp:

That, notwithstanding any Standing or Special Order, for the remainder of the session, no private members' business shall be taken up, and on Tuesdays and Thursdays the House shall sit from 11.00 a.m. to 1.00 p.m. to consider government bills, provided that, on those days, the normal daily routine of business shall be taken up at 2.00 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Is the President of the Privy Council rising on a point of order?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. You may recall that you very wisely made the suggestion that the House leaders might assemble again to consider the situation that had arisen during the exchange of pleasantries earlier this day. I should like to inform the House, through you, that we have had some further discussions.

The government is now in a position to agree not to insist on proceeding with Bill C-87, regarding expenditure restraints—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I had not quite finished the sentence, Mr. Speaker. The government is now in a position to agree not to insist on proceeding with Bill C-87, regarding expenditure restraints, before the summer adjournment. If it is not approved in the fall before prorogation it will, however, be brought back in the next session for passage before the end of the year.

Bill C-83 causes greater difficulty, however, since we do not have a clear indication of when it may be reported from committee. If it is reported comparatively early and if there are signs that its passage will not be much delayed, there is a chance that we shall endeavour to make further progress on it before the break. I say this because the committee is hard at work. In any case, if it is not passed before then it will have the very highest priority in the autumn, whether in a brief continuation of this session or at a reinstated stage in the next one.

We will not adjourn until Bill C-84, regarding capital punishment, is disposed of—either way—at all stages.

I must also inform the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that we must also seek third reading of Bill C-68, regarding medicare, for this bill emanates from the budget of almost one year ago, has been debated at great length, and is now at third reading stage. In addition, Bill S-35, respecting proprietary and patent medicines, and Bill S-88, amending the Canadian Wheat Board Act, are needed before we adjourn. I understand as well that there may be a mutual desire to complete Bill S-32, regarding certain tax conventions. I say this because I have had representations from other countries, and from Canadian businessmen who would like to have that bill approved so that they can proceed with some transactions that are now underway. When royal assent has been given to these items, even if it is before June 30, we should be in a position to begin the summer break.

Many members have expressed concern about the timing of a division on second reading of Bill C-84. The House, of course, has made a special order providing for a negotiated timing of that division within one week of the conclusion of the debate. We had a discussion among the House leaders in an effort to see if we could pinpoint a time when a division might take place, since it is desirable that as much notice as possible should be given to members, regardless of their views on this bill, so they can be here when the division takes place. We looked at the schedule, and most especially the schedule of budget debate and supply days, and we came to the conclusion—I hope I am expressing the views of all my colleagues—that it would not be unrealistic for members to plan on the division occurring on the morning of June 22. We could not make that an order; it is simply—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is second reading?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, that is the division on second reading. That seems to be the most likely date, given all the considerations and all the time constraints. This is the basis upon which we met and, I hope, agreed, Mr. Speaker, and it is my understanding that on this basis we can now proceed to take a vote on the motion that is before the House.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, just a brief reply to the government House leader. He has correctly put forth the understanding that we reached at the meeting today, except for S-32, which he is not pressing in any event and which I undertake to look into from our point of view. That being the case, we are quite prepared now to allow the motion standing in his name to proceed without further debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has pointed out, the government House leader has given a correct summary of the understanding that we had at our meeting in his office at 6.15 this evening. I should like to say that once again it has been proven that discussion does have value and that compromise here and there sometimes brings results.

It had been our hope that the government would agree not to proceed before the adjournment with either Bill C-87 or Bill C-68. For a while the government House leader seemed to hope that he might have to postpone only part of Bill C-87, the restraint package, but in the end he agreed to postpone the whole of Bill C-87. But as he has already said, he could not meet me with respect to Bill C-68, which relates to medicare. Well, Mr. Speaker, in the process of give and take, we concurred in the agreement, though I point out to him that when Bill C-68 is called for third reading we shall debate the bill in the hope that we may yet be able to persuade the government that it is a bad piece of legislation to proceed with at this time.

With that understanding I concur with what was said by the two previous speakers, and we are now prepared for the motion respecting extra hours to be passed without further debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the comments of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) and the two previous speakers prove that when we have discussions with the leaders of all parties in the House, an agreement is reached without resorting to closure and without warming our ears too much, as we say in Quebec. I think it is quite fair to co-operate with the government and adjourn at a reasonable date for the summer holidays. We agree with the comments of the President of the Privy Council.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question on the motion put earlier this day by the President of the Privy Council?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Sharp) agreed to.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, before the interruption at nine o'clock I was speaking at length about the philosophical side of the question before the House, and the neglect of members on the government side to represent and serve their constituents as they said they would in the 1972 and 1974 election campaigns, and that should encompass most of the backbenchers on that side of the House.

Let me now deal with a matter that may be difficult to prove, and that is the deterrent effect of capital punishment. Many members, including the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), have said they do not believe there is any deterrent value in the retention of capital punishment. I would be the first to admit there is no deterrent value in retention of capital punishment in respect of those crimes committed in a fit of passion or in the heat of an argument. There can be a deterrent value where a crime is deliberately planned by a person against another person or persons. It is really that simple.

The minister said the deterrent value had never been proven. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) made a speech in which he recalled a number of murder cases where there was some question about the actual justness of sentencing individuals to the death penalty. He mentioned the Coffin case, the Raymond Cook case, and a number of others. Many of the people who have mentioned those cases and have put forward that argument did not take into consideration the changes in the legislation in September 1961. Those changes in essence established non-capital and capital murder.

Before the non-capital and capital murder trial period we are now embarked upon, murder was defined as being premeditated, proven beyond a shadow of a doubt. Murder was a premeditated and deliberate taking of somebody's life. The government came along in 1967 and changed the essence of capital murder to being that of killing a policeman or a prison guard. Murder then did not have to be premeditated, preconceived, or deliberate. As the law now exists, a frightened 17-year old youth with a heavy flashlight in his hand who hits a policeman over the head and kills him accidentally would be committing murder. Perhaps the cabinet would commute the sentence in such a case, and I would agree with that commutation.

The path we are embarking upon through this legislation is one that will lay down the penalty for murder, namely, ten years for non-capital and 25 years for capital murder. I assume that will be under the 1961 definition and not murder in respect of policemen and prison guards. That being the case, the 17-year old who hits the policeman with a heavy flashlight, killing him, could serve 25 years unless the government commuted his sentence. This means that the 17-year old youth, stronger than he might think, who hit the policeman could serve 25 years without commutation following a judicial inquiry or something of that sort. To my way of thinking that is not justifiable legislation.

The 1962 legislation, which set up two degrees of capital murder, was never given a fair trial in this country because the government changed hands and the next Prime Minister commuted every sentence. It was conceived in the minds of those people who might commit murder that their sentence would be commuted and they would not have to forfeit their lives. For that reason it was impossible to prove or disprove the value of capital punishment as a deterrent. It has been impossible in the last 15 years to determine the deterrent effect of capital punishment because this government and the government before it demonstrated to the country at large that there was no intention to carry out the death penalty.

Before 1961 we had a different situation altogether because we did not have two degrees of murder. There was a sentence for murder, and whenever the courts recommended a plea for leniency the cabinet commuted the sentence. In some cases when the courts did not pass on a recommendation the cabinet commuted the sentence anyway. I am thinking particularly of the case referred to by the hon. member for New Westminster of Steven Truscott, a boy of 14 years of age. Under the law passed in 1961 he would never have been subject to capital punishment.

Many cases prior to 1961 would not have been subject to the death penalty under the law as it stood from September 1961 on, and there would have been no necessity for commutation. These were cases that involved deliberate murder. Each one of these cases since 1961 was subject to commutation, therefore any attempt to prove the deterrent value of capital punishment has been impossible in Canada.

It is the knowledge of the risk one is taking that really is the measure of deterrence. If one believes he will never be caught he might go out and rob a store. Perhaps one will go out and commit a murder if he knows he will never be caught. It is the degree of risk of being convicted and punished that deters one from committing the offence. One can use many examples to show this, some of them regarding the penal system within this country of ours. Let us take the speed limit in a specific area as an example. We do not have to use even the breathalyzer case.

If there is a 30-mile an hour speed zone and one knows he will never be caught, he will more than likely travel through that zone at 40 miles an hour. If he knows there is a speed trap around the next corner or in the next block he will travel through that speed zone at 30 miles an hour. It is not the speed zone that stops him from going faster than 30 miles an hour, it is the risk of being caught that holds him to 30 miles an hour.

The government has demonstrated to Canadian society that it is not prepared to use capital punishment.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: If a new thought has struck you, then rise in your place and make a speech. I will listen to you, as I am sure other members in the House will. We will welcome your speech as I am sure your constituents would welcome it.

It has been impossible to prove the deterrent value of capital punishment in this country since the change in the law because the government of Mr. Pearson and this government have commuted every sentence. This government has used the trial period as a hoax on parliament. Do hon. members realize what happened to them in 1967? The Liberal government conned them as it conned parliament in 1972. Hon. members who vote on this legislation, no matter on which side of the House they sit, will be allowing themselves to be conned again because the government does not intend to carry out the measure it is asking us to pass. By that I mean the government does not intend to make sure that any convicted murderer stays in jail for 25 years. I know, and everyone in this country knows, that members of the cabinet are not that inhumane. They will let them out before their 25-year sentence has been served. I would hope they would let non-capital murderers out before ten years. They do not believe in their own legislation.

If the legislation should be defeated we will go back into a trial period. If we go back into a trial period the government can commute every sentence from now until the next election. I expect it. All those who would be subject to it will expect it, and the electors will make a new decision in 1978. They may make a new decision in any event in the constituency of the hon. member opposite who is interjecting, because they already know he has nothing new to offer. They will make a new decision in respect of many seats in this House of Commons if the government continues to commute every sentence between now and 1978. But if the legislation is accepted, the government does not intend to follow it, and if the legislation is defeated the government will continue not to obey the wishes of the Canadian people.

I shall conclude by saying to all members of this House of Commons that they have been conned twice. If they allow themselves to be conned a third time I can only say that the people of Canada should take a look at those who represent them in this House and see how they are conned and how little they really are prepared to serve the will of the Canadian people. In all the speeches made in this debate no one has disagreed in respect of the will of the people. Everyone has said that 70 per cent or 80 per cent of the people of Canada believe in the retention of capital punishment. Can we be conned into disobeying the will of the people in a democracy? That is the fundamental question. If we are, will the people take it laying down? Mr. Speaker, I hope not.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I must say in participating in the debate on Bill C-84 that I think my remarks will be a little more brief than they sometimes are. It has been stated publicly, although it is open to some interpretation, that this is to be a free vote. Certainly on this side of the House there is a very real intent to have a free vote.

All of us on all sides who have participated in this debate in terms of the discussion so far have been subjected to what we euphemistically call our own conscience. In such a situation it is rather difficult to try to persuade one's colleagues to switch their conscience and substitute it for your own. On that premise this is a much different debate from what we usually have in this Chamber. There are political cross-currents to it obviously because the government is committed to a peace and order package, Bill C-83 and Bill C-84. Obviously the government would like to get this bill out of the way, and as far away as possible from an election. In that type of scenario there are political cross-currents, but considering the merits and demerits of the question I do not really think one can put a political stripe on Bill C-84.

In our own ranks there are honest differences of opinion, as I am sure there are on the other side. This is not really a happy debate. It cannot be when we are discussing capital punishment. While I was the opposition spokesman in respect of the office of the Solicitor General I must say although I have a great deal of respect for the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) I was somewhat irritated by a speech that hon. gentleman made before the Bar Association in Montreal, I believe last summer. He became very emotional about this issue and said that capital punishment is not a happy occasion. I quite agree with him. Capital punishment is not a happy time. It is not a happy, festive event. But the events which lead to capital punishment are not happy festive occasions either.

One of the difficulties I had as opposition spokesman in respect of the office of the Solicitor General was in relation to the emotional effect this issue had on the Solicitor General who seemed to wear bifocals or blinkers against the realities of the world. We all would like to have a world in which we did not have to talk about capital punishment. This is neither a happy time nor a happy debate. However, this is a fundamental debate which goes back before the time of Jesus Christ.

There was the code of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, although I do not look at it in terms of retribution or revenge. In 1700 BC the philosophers spoke of the sanctity of the individual versus the protection of the state. When we shake it all down, that is what we are talking about today, the sanctity of the individual balanced against the necessity of laws to protect society.

I have been on the political gallows three times since I have been a member of parliament. Three times I have been confronted with this question. I must say, however, that I do not have the conviction of my colleagues on either side of the House who are either firm retentionists or firm abolitionists because my voting record on this question has switched. I was an abolitionist when I first voted, and the next time I was a retentionist in respect of policemen and prison guards because I voted for that qualifying amendment. This can be interpreted either way. The retentionists say it is qualified retention and the abolitionist say it is qualified abolition, because capital punishment is still in the code.

On the last occasion I voted for an amendment moved by one of my colleagues to the effect that the discrimination be removed in respect of policemen and prison guards. I voted in effect for full retention on the basis that one life is just as good as any other life because the people working in prisons and/or on the streets policing our neighbourhoods know that that is part of the risk involved in their job. I have said that I do not have the conviction of my colleagues because I have swung back and forth. Perhaps that is not the right way to put it. I have voted on both sides of the issue.

In a sense this parliament is removed from the people. It is not in touch with the people. Here in this peace and order package we have two bills, Bill C-83 and Bill C-84, which to me demonstrate almost more graphically than any words used by anyone in this Chamber how this Chamber is getting away from the people at the grass roots from coast to coast, be they in the city or in the countryside of this grand land of ours.

If we take Bill C-84 first, we might consider the pollsters and the polls which indicate that anywhere from 70 per cent to 80 per cent of the people favour some form of capital punishment. So, what are we doing here? Two years after we debated this issue we are back at it again for several days. In effect we are saying to the people of Canada that they may think they know what they want but we, the representatives, really know what they want and we are coming back to this issue of capital punishment and perhaps will resolve it for all time, not by popular request or because of great public agitation across the country to start it again. If there is anything, it is almost the reverse.

The fact if that the present law has not been fully implemented. I think there has been disenchantment on the part of the public across the land because the people have very real doubts, to put it mildly, as to whether the law is really being followed or whether it is being broken by almost automatic commutation.

• (2130)

You have the fundamental question: life, liberty, and protection of society, a matter which we have debated several times in the House and most of us debated at least two years ago. There was no great public outcry that capital punishment should be abolished. In fact anywhere from 75 per cent to 80 per cent of the population, according to the polls, say there should be some form of capital punishment. Yet this parliament debates a bill which flies right in the face of that solid public opinion.

Let us consider Bill C-83, the other half of this peace and order package. If you put the question to the public in a poll and ask them. "Are you in favour of gun control?" The public, not knowing fully what you mean, will say, most likely, "yea, of course there should be some type of gun control", not appreciating the fact that gun control in a definite form is in existence now. That is the problem with polls; you can phrase the question in such a way as to get the answer you want. The same question to the public at large on capital punishment may bring forth the same response, so that anywhere from 60 per cent to 80 per cent of the population to whom the blanket question "are you in favour of gun control" is put, will say, "yes". If you tell them that gun control exists, that might change some of the answers.

It is just as fundamentally clear that the three million Canadians who have an interest in guns of one type or another, in pistol shooting or in hobby gun collecting, are very much against Bill C-83. Already we have the situation of the government moving 44 amendments in committee to try to improve a bill that has so many defects in it. But any logical person, regardless of what he felt about gun control, would not know that this bill would not do the job and would be a fundamental intrusion into the private lives of Canadians. So in these two areas covered by Bill C-84 and Bill C-83 we fly completely against solid public opinion.

While you can have some fun phrasing questions about gun control, it is as clear as the day is hot outside this Chamber that three million Canadians—a pretty sizeable lobby—have real reservations about Bill C-83, and apparently so does the government because it brought in 44 amendments. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) says that another 44 amendments will be coming in to try to make a bill that is riddled with holes like Swiss cheese into a sensible bill.

These two illustrations show why the Canadian public is wondering what its representatives are doing with public time. I know members of parliament have to vote according to their conscience. One could go back to Edmund Burke who was a member of parliament in England and who gave that fine speech in Bristol, but nevertheless, he was defeated in the next election. That is how many people Mr. Burke led many years ago. Regardless of that, I do not stand here tonight and say that the parliament of Canada is not dealing with this question in the best interests of Canada. Obviously we have to make hard laws from time to time and one does not necessarily have to go to polls because, and I said earlier, the questions can affect the answers in a poll.

Having debated this matter several times, and acknowledging the fact that this bill is flying against the weight of Canadian opinion on this fundamental question of capital punishment, I really think that parliamentarians in this House of Commons are treading on dangerous waters in effect by confronting a solid body of public opinion. Having voted on both sides of this question and having practised law many years ago I say that when you change the law there is some onus on those proposing the new laws to say why they are going to change it and to justify the change.

We all know that the matter of deterrents is no proof even though the Solicitor General, when he opened the debate, cited statistics which showed that the rate of crime has increased since the law has been changed. Yet he did say that there has not been enough time to fully assess the effects because the last change took place only two years ago. As the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) said, the present law has had no deterrent effect because there has been automatic commutation, so there has not been an honest, full, true trial run on this delicate subject. That is one of the dilemmas confronting hon. members. We are debating something almost in a vacuum. We have had the law but it has not really been applied.

When I am asked to vote for Bill C-84 I look to the Solicitor General to give me some reasons why I should vote to change the law and put in its place something better. He says himself it cannot be proved by statistics but he tells us to take it on faith because we are now humane people, and therefore we should not apply this medieval form of punishment. I feel instinctively that there is something about this argument of deterrents that is completely false, and yet I have full respect for the fervour of abolitionists. I wish I had the convictions of my colleagues who believe firmly in either one side or the other, because unfortunately I appreciate arguments on both sides and in fact I voted both ways on this question.

With regard to deterrents, if you admit that you cannot prove the case on the basis of statistics—and I certainly shoot down the surveys that we have received from the Solicitor General's office which imply that capital punishment has no deterrent value—how do you prove it? Will you go to death row and ask old Joe—

An hon. Member: Did you say Joe?

Mr. Nowlan: If you ask him, "Had you known you were going to swing, would you have done the dirty deed?" that is one of the most fundamental conflicts of interest because dirty old Joe, or great old Joe, who is going to take that final walk—

An hon. Member: Joe who?

Mr. Paproski: Joe Guay.

Mr. Nowlan: This is an allegorical joke. We could just as well say, Peter, Paul or Pierre. Anyway, Peter, Paul or Pierre sitting in death row cannot answer the question objectively because there is a fundamental conflict of interest in what they tell you, if you are a fervent sociologist trying to figure out what they would have done had they known they would take the final walk. That is one side of the argument. The other side, which is more valid, is how many people are roaming the streets who have not done the heinous crime and have never gone to jail. If they had bumped off Pierre, Paul or Peter, they might have had to face the final step. You cannot shake it down on statistics, but my instinct and common sense tell me not to accept some of the inferences in the surveys of the Solicitor General that there is no deterrent value in capital punishment. Just hearing the horrible things we are told in the House, the descriptions we have had about the different types of penalties and the very volume of words used in the House on the subject, are some indication that if you weighed the balance of probabilities you would not prove it by statistics but there may be in someone's mind some deterrent value in this whole operation.

The argument concerning deterrents does not convince me to vote for the bill. It cannot be proved, my instinct says there may be some deterrent there, and if there is a tittle of a chance of deterrence, then I ask, why opt for a change?

● (2140)

There is another reason I cannot vote for Bill C-84 at this time, even if I were a firm abolitionist, but regardless of that believing somewhat in retention, I think it is an absolute cop out to have imprisonment for capital crime of 25 or 35 years, depending on the type of crime, with no hope in effect of rehabilitation. That clause about imprisonment without any parole for a 25 or 35 year period, depending on the type of crime, is a slow death, crueller or worse than hanging. I say that is a cop out, and even if I were a firm abolitionist I would have to look at this bill with a most critical eye and face the problem head on: with all the powers of commutation a man should not be sentenced for one crime of passion or for an accidental killing in a bank robbery to a type of imprisonment which will give him no hope at all.

That clause, along with the clause mentioned by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), is not acceptable, although I do agree in part with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau): If you believe fundamentally in abolition, in theory it really should not matter. With respect, this is one of the problems with our Prime Minister; he is a pretty interesting theoretician, but in terms of practical politics and practical realities he creates difficulties for himself.

In theory he is right; if you believe in abolition, what difference whether the crime is treason or murdering your wife, a policeman or a prison guard? The Prime Minister is theoretically right, but at this particular time in Canada with the problems we have, or might inherit from across the seas in view of some of the events which are going to take place, to do more than they have done in Britain and eliminate capital punishment for treason, acts against the Queen and that type of crime, which is fundamentally against the state, I think is just naive.

Since the proponents of the bill cannot show me what good the change is going to do in terms of law and order and/or protection of the state, since the deterrent effect cannot be proven by statistics one way or the other to further the bill—and I say instinctively there is some deterrence—and if there is a tittle of deterrence, hon. members should think about how they vote on this bill.

Then there are two clauses in this bill which were not in other bills: first, definite periods of imprisonment which will cut out the heart of man in terms of the hope of any rehabilitation, which I think is insidious; and second, we are going to eliminate capital punishment for all forms of capital crime at this time. I say that the theoreticians and philosophers may be in great company with the muses of the ages, going back to Hammurabi of the 1700's, but they are not being very realistic.

I do not know how much time I have left. I was going to speak very briefly because I know the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) wants to speak. However, I want to say where I stand fundamentally on this thing, and what bothers me about this bill.

Unfortunately the public has made capital punishment rather symbolic, and there is in that strong poll for capital punishment a symbolism that if you have capital punishment and if there is capital punishment for a capital prime, then ipso facto all problems of law and disturbances in our cities and on our streets are going to vanish. We know that will not happen whether this bill passes or not. The symbolism is not going to be carried through into reality. We will still have difficulties in the administration of justice and on our streets at night and during the day, but I do believe that there are many times when members of parliament have to vote on a bill when the weight of the evidence is not strong one way or the other and the public believes, rightly or wrongly, that there is a very real symbolic effect. I just do not know why members of parliament should fly in the face of that symbolism.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

I know this bill will not correct all the problems, but conversely, if there is a large body of the Canadian public—as there is—which either believes in the principle of capital punishment or has the principle of capital punishment associated with the symbolism of having less permissiveness and fewer problems on the streets at night—in effect, I suppose, the cliché of more law and order—and if it honestly believes that and that is part of the psyche, then why should members of parliament vote to cut that symbolism away from the psyche? If that makes law abiders more comfortable and is not doing them any harm, I just wonder why this bill is so necessary.

There are many other things I would like to say about this, but it has all been said. There was a little discussion earlier between the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) and others about new ideas. I do not really think there are many new ideas on such a fundamental issue which has been with us and will be with us in one form or another regardless of this bill.

In terms of the administration of justice, in the old days there is no doubt about the chance of an error. That is the fundamental thing which bothers me. There is a chance of an error, that capital punishment might be exacted and that it might be found that there was a mistake. We obviously cannot resurrect the mistake; that certainly is something which bothers all hon. members. However, I think in the administration of justice in our society the pendulum has swung so far that it gives an accused person an exaggerated benefit of doubt, not only in the criminal court but in all courts of appeal. It has swung that way with regard to parole as well. I think the minister's own average is ten years; after a capital crime a criminal can be out on the streets in ten years. There is a chance for another capital crime, and I must say that is really what turned me around in this issue. I know of two cases of killers who killed once, got out on either parole or week end leave and killed again.

Mr. Blais: How many have there been, Pat?

Mr. Nowlan: There have been several.

Mr. Blais: There have been two.

Mr. Nowlan: Two I know of. I said two.

Mr. Blais: That's all.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) has asked a legitimate question. I can point out at least two situations I know about where there have been killings and chances to kill again because our administration of justice has swung so far in favour of the accused. In all sincerity I suggest to the hon. member for Nipissing that he cannot show me in the last two years or the last five years a mistake which has been carried out. We know that the last capital punishment was carried out in 1962. The hon. member cannot point to a fundamental mistake which has been made.

Each is entitled to his opinion, and my point is that the pendulum has swung so far in favour of the accused that he sometimes has had another chance to kill, and that weighs against the problem which bothers all Canadians about the chance of making a mistake. I think the administration of justice is very strong in this country, and I do not have blinkers on my eyes when I say that. I know about some of the things which go on in the law courts; there is no doubt that you do have to have money from time to time to get a top criminal lawyer. However, regardless of all that, the administration of justice has really bent over backwards, and I think that is something which must be redressed. It is because of the killings which have been committed by those who have killed before that I have come back to the position where philosophically I believe that the potential of the ultimate penalty should be there for the perpetrator of the ultimate crime, with of course all the powers of commutation and royal prerogative of mercy.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert is concerned about this bill. He has always been concerned about the question, but he is concerned about this bill because of the lack of a clause about treason. He was the last prime minister to sign a final order, in 1962. I think if this bill were defeated and we go back to what is on the statute books now and the trial period that will last for another two or three years with the qualified retention for prison guards and policemen, that any prime minister, on a single killing, is going to take a long time to sign the final order.

Proponents of this bill cannot show me anything more convincing than that things are going to be better—the humanists will say it is to make life better because you do not have an organized killing, but I do not see it that way. In terms of crime, justice, the fears and aspirations of Canadians from coast to coast, the proponents of the bill cannot adduce any positive evidence or even positive logic that things are going to be better.

That is where we come back to the individual conscience. I suggest that the 70 per cent or 80 per cent of Canadians who have an individual conscience want that conscience represented. I am prepared to stand here with my conscience as I have done before. My conscience tells me now, for the reasons that I have tried to give, that the proof is not there that things are going to be better. It cannot be proven statistically. But there is the symbolism for Canadians that with the death penalty things may tighten up and some of the licence and licentiousness and lawlessness may not be on the streets of the land.

Thus I come back to the potential of the ultimate penalty for the ultimate crime. I should end right there, Mr. Speaker, and I think I will because it is a very individual thing. I hope we can come to grips with this in view of the motion made earlier today to extend the hours, which the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) has urged in order to try to get several bills through. I compliment him for getting us on extended hours to meet this question. Let the thing come; let us get it over with and let us leave it alone for some years so that we do not have to go through this agony and purgatory and soul-searching again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth time I have spoken on the subject of capital punishment and I am a comparative newcomer to parliament, having arrived in 1972. Like the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) I hope it is the last time I have to speak on capital punishment.

It was interesting to hear the comments of the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) tonight when he asked how many people have committed murder a second time. In Winnipeg, the city that I represent, we have had people commit murders twice. Ten years ago a man took a young lady into a hotel room and murdered her. He was convicted, put away for a short period as they are these days, and came out after eight years. Then we went through the same thing again. He took another young girl to the very same hotel and murdered her. As well, I have read recent statements from California about 12 convicted murderers who were out on parole or because their short term had expired, and they murdered another 22 people. I hope we do not have to see a similar situation where we have a large number of murderers committing murder the second time before we get across to the Liberals that we should have the ultimate penalty.

The Globe and Mail of May 26 ran the following story:

> Donald Kelly, convicted of the 1969 murder of two North Bay residents, has quickened heart beats in Ontario again. Armed with what was thought to be a snub-nosed .38 calibre revolver, Kelly isolated himself in a cellblock in the North Bay jail on Monday night and held police at bay for nine tense hours. In the end, Kelly surrendered peacefully. His gun, fished from a toilet tank, was discovered to be only a toy pistol.

Just imagine if it had been a real gun. Kelly would have killed every guard in sight to get out of that jail. If you remember his escapade in North Bay last winter you will know it almost bankrupted the municipality paying for the police to track him down. All that was destroyed in the manhunt was a valuable dog. I should like to see the abolitionists go into the penitentiaries and guard this man Kelly, spend 15 years guarding him, or this man Lucas from Manitoba, the axe murderer. I have spoken to prison guards who look after Lucas and they say you cannot even turn your back on him for a second or you take your life in your hands. The abolitionists who want to protect these savages should go to the penitentiaries and guard them. In the case of Kelly it was a toy pistol.

The Globe and Mail argument continues:

> A toy pistol. We can hear the sighs of relief—a chuckle here and there—as Ontario's law-abiding citizens recover their cool. A toy: it wasn't very serious after all. The whole adventure no doubt will lend a certain lustre to the legend Kelly acquired last summer while spending 31 days eluding police in the bush land of Northern Ontario. And, after all, it was only a toy gun.
>
> Wrong. It was not only a toy gun; it was a gun, plain and simple.

If it had been a real gun Kelly would have killed. May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—ISRAEL—GOVERNMENT VIEW OF ACTION TO ESTABLISH COMMUNITIES IN OCCUPIED ARAB TERRITORY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, it is now some time since I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) about Canada's attitude to the Israeli plans for colonization or settlement of those lands taken by military action from sovereign Arab states. In the interval the importance and relevance of the question, and the intensity of the feeling resulting from reaction have grown significantly and perhaps frighteningly.

I do not know whether the Canadian government used its good offices with Tel Aviv as I suggested, to seek to dissuade them from such a clearly provocative course. In any case there can be no doubt that the events of recent months reveal that this action has added another explosive element to an already over-heated crisis area.

I have never in all my years of interest in Middle East affairs suggested that there is anything unilateral or exclusive when it comes to assessing blame or responsibility. Neither side is without sin. Unfortunately in this country there is too often a tendency to be very one-sided when it comes to assessing the credits and debits. Too often there is an almost conditioned reflex to assume that the Arab side must be the chief culprit or the only transgressor.

This partiality, this selectivity, is not suitable in a country which is seeking to be open-handed and objective in its dealings with the Middle East. I note the solicitude of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) at Habitat lest Canada be seen to support any declaration which might offend the Israeli delegation. I believe that such councils of moderation are and would be more effective if given out in a balanced and impartial way. I believe that friends of the Arab world should point out that extremism of language is often less helpful than a strongly stated argument based on reason, logic, and historic facts.

I can recall occasions when my counsels of moderation have not made me overly popular with my Arab friends. On the other hand it is unhelpful, or worse, to condone or be silent about Israeli actions which threaten peace or violate the basic human rights of others.

A Reuter article of May 22, 1972, a year after the date of my question, is captioned "Arabs break curfew, Israelis break legs." The article went on to say that three young Arabs had their legs broken by Israeli security forces in Ramallah in the occupied West Bank. Mayor Karin Kholof said the forces entered several houses and beat up about 30 people, including women. Doors that were not opened by the residents of the houses were broken down. This is the harvest of the seeds sown by Israel when it determined to set up communities of Israeli people in those lands it seized by conquest from other states. The plan is to spread Israeli citizens into the far reaches of the occupied territory. How could such an act be regarded with anything but hostility by the residents of those areas and the rulers of the sovereign Arab states which claim jurisdiction over the land which had been taken from them?

A few weeks ago I was in Quneitra in the Golan area of Syria and saw the rubble of that city, totally levelled by the Israeli forces. A very short distance away I saw something else: on the Syrian side of the Golan Heights the intensive cultivation of the slopes by Israeli authorities. I thought at the time how often the world was told that Israel was interested in the Golan Heights only because it wanted secure borders.

It is not surprising that Ambassador Scranton speaking for the United States in a recent security council debate deplored the colonization move by the Israeli government and warned of the dangers such a move might bring.

A most brilliant scholar and statesman, Abba Eban, who was foreign minister when I visited Israel, has warned that extending Israel's grip on occupied territories would reduce the government's options in future negotiations with the Arabs.

In a very thoughtful editorial designated "Time to Leave", the Ottawa Journal declared on May 29:

> Darkness descends again on the Middle East, and not only in Lebanon. In the Jordan River West Bank, occupied by Israel since the 1967 war, events are eroding what few hopes existed for an Arab-Israeli peace . . .
> Hence a grim impasse. After nine years of passivity under Israeli rule the West Bank Palestinians have come to life; expressing their resentment by ballots, demonstrations and strikes. The Israelis can certainly maintain their rule now by armed force. But for how long? They must weigh carefully the effect on American public opinion of gunfire to suppress West Bank aspirations to independence. Israel will lose friends as this sad situation continues to erupt.
> It will also inflame the Arab world, making hope of peace impossible. Then it will be only a matter of time until the Middle East explodes again. Soon, somehow, Israel should get out of the West Bank.

I noted the remarks of the parliamentary secretary in response to today's question by my colleague from Okanagan-Kootenay. I do not pretend to any exceptional or inside knowledge of the Lebanese situation. I believe that the hon. lady and I, and the vast majority of our colleagues, I am sure, share a profound sense of tragedy and depression about events in the beautiful country of Lebanon and the once bright and prosperous city of Beirut. A young constituent told me a few days ago that he could not understand Lebanon. He went on to say that he could not understand Ireland, either. I believe this to be a realistic reaction to a profoundly painful and distressing situation which seems to lead to a sad but a few hopeful reactions or portents.

I am not sure that the recent Syrian move is totally to be deplored. I do not like the prospect of any other nation exercising sovereignty over Lebanon, one of my favourite countries and one of the world's splendid democracies in its heyday. Certainly I do not appreciate any diminution of the rights or prospects of the Palestinians who are the chief victims of the whole Arab-Israeli confrontation and of the bad faith of the great powers of earlier generations. But events of the past few weeks make it far from impossible to accept the view that Syria has exercised a moderating influence in the area and that its failure to use its power and position may have prolonged a situation which could have led to conditions and situations more painful and tragic than those of today and the sad months preceding today.

[Translation]

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is always difficult to speak immediately after the hon.

member from Prince Edward Island. His speeches always reach climaxes that move me to the point I sometimes lose the thread of his remarks. In answer, I shall attempt to limit myself strictly to the issue of the territories occupied by Israel, which I am sure the hon. member will not resent. I shall not therefore deal in any way with the matter of Syria, Lebanon or every complex problem that may or should be connected with the Middle East problem.

[English]

The position of the Canadian government with respect to settlement of the occupied territories by Israel is inherent in our full support for United Nations Security Council Resolution 242 of November 22, 1967. This resolution calls inter alia for withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the 1967 War. Canada therefore does not condone any step which unilaterally attempts to alter the status of the occupied territories. Canada's full support for Resolution 242, including Israeli withdrawal from occupied territories, has been made clear to the Israeli authorities on numerous occasions, most notably during the visit of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) to Israel in January. At that time the Secretary of State for External Affairs discussed frankly with the Israeli authorities the question of the establishment by Israel of settlements in the occupied territories.

AIR CANADA—ALLEGED INTENTION TO MOVE FINANCE BRANCH FROM WINNIPEG—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on April 13 of this year I put a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) with regard to Air Canada's finance branch in Winnipeg. I said we had a great fear that the corporation is now plotting to phase out the finance branch there and move it into Quebec. The minister assured me at that time that Air Canada had no intention of phasing out the finance branch in Winnipeg. Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that they are gradually phasing it out, that this work is being distributed all across Canada. The employees are sitting there in the finance branch doing nothing, or very little. There is no reason at all for this phasing out of the finance branch.

Today, I raised the question of the huge debt Air Canada is facing this year. At the end of April the net loss amounted to $14,474,000.29. I also drew attention today, by way of a motion which was turned down by the Liberals, to the need for a complete investigation of the Air Canada finance branch.

I have suggested a number of times that the government despatch the Auditor General to Winnipeg to find out what is going on and to establish proper accounting procedures. This should be done immediately. I can give an example of one case where Air Canada wrote off a debt of $186,000. This involved a firm called Electronics Associates of Canada. This Toronto firm ran up a bill amounting to $186,000 and Air Canada wiped it off.

Mr. Paproski: Shame!

Mr. McKenzie: Hon. members can see that we need to send somebody in there to find out what is going on, not this ridiculous phasing out of the branch and the spreading of its work across Canada.

Last week the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) and myself raised the question of longstanding improper billing practices by Canadian travel agents. I pointed out that no controls are enforced any longer on the reporting of ticket sales by these agents, and as of October, 1975, Air Canada had in excess of $96,000 unreported travel agent ticket sales representing a minimum of $2,208,000 unpaid for transportation. The minister assured us he would be glad to see what stage the work had reached.

I should also like to ask the parliamentary secretary tonight whether the minister would make inquiries at the same time and request that Air Canada give a full report as to why the bankrupt firm of Electronic Associates Canada Limited of Toronto was allowed to run up a bill of $186,000 for air travel before they were cut off, why Air Canada allowed the bill to reach this amount, and why the whole account has been written off.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, this particular firm had in their hands 75 credit cards. I do not even know whether the 75 credit cards have all been picked up and taken away from these people. According to the latest information I have, this account could reach a debit of a quarter of a million dollars. This is why I am calling for the third time for the Auditor General to be dispatched to do an immediate audit in the Air Canada finance branch, instead of our listening to silly statements from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) saying that we should not be running a Crown corporation from the floor of the House of Commons. If Air Canada were being run properly we would not have to bring this subject up on the floor of the House of Commons.

To add insult to injury, Air Canada states that they are going to ask for a fare increase. I have already written to Mr. Benson, head of the CTC, and requested that he allow no fare increase. If there are any hearings held in regard to an Air Canada fare increase, I can assure the House that I shall be there fighting to stop any such increase.

Air Canada is also breaking IATA rules and regulations. They have issued bar vouchers for Tours Mount Royal, of Quebec, to the tune of $27,384. All that Air Canada collected from this travel agent was $9,445; they wrote off $17,938. Under IATA rules and regulations this is illegal. This is another matter the Auditor General should look at.

I have before me a letter from Harveys of Bristol (Overseas) Limited of London, England, complaining to Air Canada that they are persisting in paying the incorrect amount. In this particular case Air Canada has always overpaid the amount. They also give another list of accounts that are not even being paid. This has been going on for months and months. I mentioned in the House about a couple of months ago that Air Canada are going to have their fuel and gas cut off at their offices at the Heathrow airport if they do not get their accounting system straightened out.

This is what it is costing us to contract this work out from the Air Canada finance branch while its employees are sitting in the branch doing nothing. I have before me one account from Accountemps of Vancouver, B.C., dated May 5, for $7,873 for contracting work out. They are paying the employees of this company $6 an hour to do this kind of work while they are paying Air Canada employees between $2 and $4. I ask the minister to explain that to me.

I have another account submitted for contracting work out dated May 7 in the amount of $5,937. What is going on? Here is another one, May 18, from Accountemps in Vancouver for $8,382. This is for work contracted out while Air Canada's employees in Winnipeg are sitting in the office doing nothing.

I have another one dated May 7 for $5,268, Accountemps in Vancouver. Air Canada is also contracting work out in Montreal and Toronto. I have another one from Accountemps in Vancouver for $4,989. I only have part of this. I have another one dated May 28 for $5,547. Again Air Canada is contracting work out while its employees sit and do nothing. And they are going to ask for a fare increase, Mr. Speaker. Over my dead body will they get a fare increase. I have another one for $3,429 dated May 29, 1976.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has now expired.

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Air Canada has no intention, plan or proposal to move the airline's finance branch out of Winnipeg. On the contrary, it has emphatically insisted on a number of occasions that the finance branch would remain in Winnipeg. There is no question on the part of Air Canada management that this important financial section, which includes the accounting and related offices, would be moved from that city. Charges that Air Canada is considering moving this facility from Winnipeg are both inaccurate and unfounded.

The airline's current negotiations with members of the Canadian Airlines Employees Association regarding clerical workers in Winnipeg are proceeding and Air Canada remains hopeful of a settlement.

I can only repeat the assurance which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) gave to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) on April 13, 1976. At that time the minister stated clearly that Air Canada had no intention of phasing out the finance branch in Winnipeg. As far as the other part of the hon. member's question is concerned, I am sure the minister will be glad to look into it.

MANPOWER—LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR DECISION ON EXTENSION OF PROJECTS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I want to debate my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) in the House today, and one usually has to wait a couple of months, not with the idea of criticizing but merely in order to try to substantiate what I feel is a reasonable request that is, to establish a basic consideration for providing some form of flexibility in the determination of achieving the benefits of last year's Local Initiatives Program.

While I am sure the problem is national in scope, it arises in respect of some projects under last year's program which could not be completed within the required deadline of June 26. The reason is that several programs started late due to weather conditions.

In the particular case to which I refer there were three projects that had to start late, not only because of weather conditions but, more important, due to the fact that they were approved as a result of my district being provided additional funds after the original projects were approved, for which I happen to be very thankful to the minister.

There is no question of the need for additional funding, but only the need for an extension of the time to complete the projects, which is justifiable for the reasons I have mentioned that is, weather conditions, and the late start on the projects for the other justifiable reasons I also mentioned.

What is difficult for me to understand is the source of the reason for hesitation and why the minister could not give me an assurance today that the projects could be extended, particularly when he indicated his promise or his commitment not only to provide new job creation programs as a result of the predicted savings by extending the qualifying work period for unemployment insurance benefits from eight to 12 weeks, but also his commitment to augment the regular manpower budget by $40 million in institutional and industrial training, an extra $2 million for expanding the mobility budget, and an enrichment of job funding and placement services involving an additional 150 staff in Manpower centres.

Finally, there is the $100 million job creation program which, indeed, is a repeat of the $135 million LIP announced last year but which was cut back by $35 million under the restraint program. Taking this into consideration it is impossible for me to understand why the minister, without hesitation, cannot extend the projects under last year's LIP program, because the funds are already allocated, the personnel are on the job, and if the extension is not approved this would put employees back on the unemployment insurance rolls, without even mentioning the unnecessary workload that would ensue.

Further, the situation is hypocritical when the remaining funds would have to be returned to the Treasury Board, with no advantage to anyone, to say nothing of the loss of jobs and the additional costs that would be created.

I might say that I know where the dilemma lies that the minister is facing, and that is with the Treasury Board. I am sure the Treasury Board is demanding that Manpower live within the terms of reference laid down under the criteria of the Manpower LIP as advanced by the minister, and so I cannot blame the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I express concern about the lack of common sense on the part of Treasury Board which has no consideration for the facts of life as they exist, and takes such a ridiculous attitude towards realism.

● (2220)

I can only ask the minister to take a look at the problem more realistically and demand that Treasury Board show more humaneness and common sense in respect of the approval of extensions of time for these LIP projects which cannot be completed in the required time through no fault of the sponsors of the project; and at the same time fulfil the objectives of the LIP program to provide the opportunity for initiative and to provide jobs in the areas of high unemployment, the evident criteria for which are completely ignored by the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's remarks, may I repeat that the LIP is a job creation program aimed at reducing the number of unemployed during peak unemployment seasons. The seasonal nature of the program is clearly indicated in each contract agreed to by the sponsor of the project and the department, and the termination date is specified. Projects are planned on the basis of deadlines, and the workers must therefore accept the temporary nature of the jobs and look ahead to the completion of the project.

As the minister already stated in the House a number of times, extra funds will not be allocated to extension of the 1975-76 LIP. By the very nature of the program, any extension is impossible. I would also add there has been no extension over the last three years.

However, if certain projects are not completed before June 26, for reasons beyond the control of the sponsors, the circumstances and the reasons of the delay will be closely scrutinized. In cases where projects do not require extra funds, the situation will be reviewed and the decision taken according to the merits in each case.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until 11 a.m. tomorrow, pursuant to order made earlier this day.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.
