A Snappy Rehearsal

Last evening the performers in "Abie's Irish Rose" were put through their paces by Professor Hutton. He said he intended to be hypercritical said he intended to be hypercritical and he kept his word. Not a line or scene was permitted to pass until it was just so, and at the conclusion all were tired but happy in the knowledge that they had done the thing in style. The play is sheer comedy from start to finish, with several situations of quite dramatic intensity, and the various scenes were worked up cleverly by the performers. It is the kind of thing one will want to see more than once, the formers. It is the kind of thing one will want to see more than once, the manner of presentation and interpretation of the roles providing even more comedy than the lines themselves, which abound in wit. All who saw the play in New York are gathering groups of friends here to witness the local presentation, and it is a safe prediction that all who see it once will want to go again. t once will want to go again.
