The hon. member for Cape Breton South is anxious to rise in his place and take exception to my remarks. I would ask him to wait a minute. It was not my intention to take part in this debate, but I know that from the maritime point of view the fishing industry is an important one. At the present time we have a minister who is interested not in the one section of the country which he represents in this house, namely the extreme west coast, but in all sections of the country. He has shown his interest by coming to the extreme east, and he has made himself familiar with our needs. Because of these visits to the different parts of the country we shall have a better transportation system to help the extreme east and west to market their fish in a better condition in central Canada. We are anxious to ship larger quantities to central Canada than we are doing at the present time. We realize that industrial central Canada, with its large population, roughly speaking 64 per cent of the population of the country, is a real market for our fish and the few products that we have to sell. We must ship our fish in a better condition than we have in years gone by.

I am pleased that the minister has shown his interest in our problems. He has promised us that we shall have a more rapid transportation system to make available to the people of central Canada the fine type of fish that we catch along the Atlantic coast, particularly in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Archibald: Are there any qualifications or terms demanded by the Newfoundland association of fish exporters other than the $10,000 fee?

Mr. Mayhew: Nothing that I know of.

Mr. Archibald: Do the members of the board have to belong to the association? Are they all members of the association?

Mr. Mayhew: Is the hon. member talking of NAFEL or the fisheries board?

Mr. Archibald: Are the members of the fisheries board also members of the fish exporters association?

Mr. Mayhew: No, it is entirely different.

Mr. Hazen: Will the laws, and regulations made thereunder by the dominion government, which affect trawlers and drifters, apply to the trawlers and drifters owned by the citizens of Newfoundland when Newfoundland becomes a tenth province, or will these laws not be applicable until five years have passed?

Mr. Mayhew: If the hon. member will refer to page 8 of the statement of questions he will find the answer to his question. At the present time the Newfoundland trawlers are not allowed to fish within a twelve-mile radius of the shores along the maritime provinces, but they may fish within three miles of Newfoundland. The Newfoundland fishermen will be allowed to fish in the same way as Canadian trawlers. We shall have to change the regulations to bring that into effect. If the hon. member will read the top of the page dealing with trawling he will get the answer.

Mr. Hazen: I notice that in subsection 2 of section 22 the words used are: "For a period of five years from the date of union". That is a definite period. I presume it was put in at the request of the Newfoundland delegation. Was any consideration given to the fact that Newfoundland might apply prior to the end of five years, or within five years, for a change? In other words, were the words "from the date of union" the governing factor? Could these words not have been inserted, "unless the province of Newfoundland requests that they or any of them be terminated at an earlier date? Why is it so definite, a period of five years?

Mr. Mayhew: My understanding is that this can be changed at the request of the Newfoundland government. That is what they wanted.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask a question on subsection 4. Half way through the subsection we find the following words, " . . . may be revoked or altered by the body or person that made them." Am I to take it that that body or person may refer to NAFEL? Has NAFEL the authority to change the regulations that they have made? Our concern is that the fisheries board set up by the state apparently has not much power left; most of the power is in the hands of this $10,000 per person private club.

Mr. Mayhew: NAFEL itself has no authority to make regulations. The regulations will be made by the board. The board was set up by the commission form of government and is now under the direction of the federal government.

Mr. Knowles: Do I understand that the board, which will now become a creature of the federal government—

An hon. Member: Agency.

Mr. Knowles: All right, an agency—directs and controls the affairs of NAFEL?

Mr. Mayhew: That is right. We have what we call an eastern division and a western division, and now this will be the Newfoundland division. This board will be the agent for the Newfoundland division of the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. Knowles: We wish to be sure that the board controls NAFEL, and not NAFEL the board.

Mr. Mayhew: That is right.

Mr. Nicholson: The minister has indicated that this is a most important industry in Newfoundland. Did any discussions take place with the Newfoundland delegation regarding the future of the industry? I understand a large volume of fish was sold in the British market, and that at the present time Great Britain is finding difficulty in getting the dollars to pay for Canadian products. With Newfoundland becoming part of Canada there will be tariff barriers which will prevent the importation into Newfoundland of goods which previously came from Great Britain. Thereby a problem will be created which may make it difficult for Great Britain to accept and pay for the quantity of fish which formerly came from Newfoundland. Will the minister say whether there was any discussion of that problem, and whether any assurance is being given to the Newfoundland fishing industry that they might expect to sell as much fish under the new arrangement as they did under the earlier one?

Mr. Abbott: I did not hear everything the hon. member said, but I understood his remarks related to what arrangements could be made with respect to the sale of fish by Newfoundland in European countries either for sterling or for other European currencies.

Last year an arrangement was made by the British government whereby it took over from Newfoundland the currency proceeds of sales of fish in those areas—escudos in Portugal, or lira in Italy—and gave to Newfoundland blocked sterling for those other currencies. The Newfoundland government gave to the fishermen equivalent amounts in dollars to pay for the fish.

The blocked sterling thus acquired was held in a special account available, and available only, for the reduction and the servicing of the sterling debt of Newfoundland held in the United Kingdom. The Newfoundland government approached the United Kingdom at the time discussions of union with Canada were under way, and asked them if they would renew that arrangement for the coming season. The United Kingdom government has agreed to do so. In other words, the United Kingdom has agreed to take from Newfoundland the proceeds from sales of fish in those European markets, and give them blocked sterling for it, which will be placed in this account. Then, of course, the government of Newfoundland would have to provide dollars for the fishermen.

On the part of Canada, we as a country—Newfoundland being a part of this country, or soon to become a part—would be able to make the necessary dollars available to Newfoundland for those proceeds, because under the terms of union Canada has undertaken to assume the payment of sterling debt. We would therefore be in a position to use the proceeds of such sales for the servicing and reduction of that sterling debt.

Mr. Matthews (Kootenay East): I should like to ask a question regarding the latter part of subsection (5), where it says:

> And employees of the Newfoundland fisheries board shall become employees in that department in positions comparable to those of the employees in that department in other parts of Canada.

Does that mean that when these regulations come into effect there will be a general stepping up of salaries of those employees beyond what they are now receiving?

Mr. Mayhew: We will try so far as possible to have an equalization of salaries. In some cases it would be a stepping up, while in others it might be a stepping down.

Mr. Archibald: With respect to liquidation of the Newfoundland debt by accepting blocked sterling for fish exports, is there any chance of getting rid of some apples and canned salmon so as to help liquidate the debt of Newfoundland in that way?

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps we could answer that when we are considering Newfoundland's debt. It is expressed in terms of dollars. The Newfoundland sterling debt is expressed in terms of dollars at $62 million. It has varying maturities. Canada will have to service the debt until it is repaid, and in due course will have to provide for payment. In order to provide for payment Canada will have to acquire the necessary sterling; and it will acquire that sterling by giving to the United Kingdom treasury the equivalent amount in dollars. Presumably the dollars will be used as part of the general dollar reserve of the Bank of England or the United Kingdom treasury, and used for whatever purposes their laws provide. But I do not think Canada would be in a position to impose conditions upon the Bank of England or the treasury of the United Kingdom as to how such proceeds would be used.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, before the section is carried I should like to support what was said by the minister and also by my colleague, the senior member for Halifax, with respect to the industry generally.

The Nova Scotia and Newfoundland fishing industries are quite similar. I believe the union of these industries under one jurisdiction will be a source of strength and will result in far-reaching benefits for the industry as a whole both in Nova Scotia and in other parts of the maritime provinces, as well as in Newfoundland. As the Newfoundland industry stands, having been developed under a separate jurisdiction, it is unavoidable that at the present time there are certain arrangements and regulations concerning the industry which are different from those under the Canadian jurisdiction as applied to the industry in Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces.

I believe it indicates a desire of all parties to see that the two industries are united under one jurisdiction, with the least amount of damage to either, when it is pointed out that arrangements have been made to continue in force for a period of time certain of these special regulations under which the Newfoundland industry has developed, in order to provide an orderly and proper unification of the regulations which in future will apply to the industry as a whole.

The fact that these regulations have been continued in force does not in any way show that these particular regulations and arrangements are approved, that they will be continued in force permanently, or that any of them will be made to apply to the industry in those parts of the maritime provinces which already form a part of Canada. That the whole question received the greatest possible consideration is shown by the great detail set out in section 22, now under consideration, and more particularly by the very detailed discussion of the various questions involved, and information which has been given in the committee. The industry as a whole will benefit through the efforts of the Department of Fisheries to improve methods of packing and transporting fish products to market. As a result of benefiting to that extent the industry will be able to bring about considerable expansion.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South rather left the impression that trawlers were destroying the shore fishing industry. My colleague pointed out that there were two schools of thought on that matter. I think it is generally agreed that if there is to be any considerable expansion of the fishing industry in the maritime provinces and on the Atlantic coast a continuing and regular supply of suitable fish will have to be provided. The only basis upon which that expansion can be built is the proper use of trawlers. Far from destroying the shore fishing industry, the proper use of trawlers will contribute to its prosperity.

Mr. Hazen: I have had the opportunity of looking at this pamphlet containing the statements of questions raised by the Newfoundland delegation. On page eight it is stated that Newfoundland trawlers will be permitted to fish to the three-mile limit off the coast of Newfoundland. Will that be for the next five years or for a longer period?

Mr. Mayhew: When union is consummated Newfoundland will be a part of Canada, and normally the laws of Canada would apply. Throughout the rest of Canada trawlers must operate beyond the twelve-mile limit, but we are saying that as far as Newfoundland is concerned its fishermen may continue to fish up to the three-mile limit. Legislation will be brought in to make that legal.

Section agreed to.

On section 23—Debt.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I think it would be desirable that a statement should be made to the committee with regard to this section. It reads:

> Canada will assume and provide for the servicing and retirement of the stock issued or to be issued—

I refer particularly to those latter words.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think it is desirable that there should be some explanation of this clause for the information of hon. members and the public generally. The expression "issued or to be issued" refers to the replacing of certain securities by other securities. There is a provision for the replacing of securities issued under the loan act of 1933 without changing the amount at all.

On the basis of conversion at the rate of $4.04 to the pound, the amount outstanding under the loan act of 1933 is $71,911,467.24. There is a sinking fund amounting to $9,326,-650.26, which leaves a net outstanding debt of $62,584,816.98.

Mr. Probe: Is that dollars or pounds?

Mr. St. Laurent: It is dollars converted at the rate of $4.04 to the pound. According to the latest information available, the amount of the internal debt was $10,465,593, with a sinking fund of $879,368, leaving a net internal debt of about $9,500,000 as of December 31, 1947.

Mr. Brooks: Would the total debt be $72 million? I do not just understand the difference between internal debt and national debt.

Mr. St. Laurent: Securities were issued in sterling in the United Kingdom, the net amount of which at the present time is $62 million. Then securities were issued in Newfoundland in dollars, the net amount at the end of December, 1947, being approximately $9.5 million. An attempt was made to determine what portion of the total debt incurred in respect of the services would have been in respect of federal services had union taken place before the expenditure was made, and what proportion referred to services which would have been provincial services had union been in effect. According to the report of 1933 it was estimated that approximately $67.5 million of the debt at that time was the result of capital expenditures and current deficits in connection with the railway enterprise and war expenditures.

We reduced that $67.5 million in the proportion in which the total debt existing at that time had been reduced over the years and it was found that that brought the amount down to $54.8 million. The Newfoundland delegates represented, and after consideration it was found that their representations should be accepted, that there had been issued for war purposes during the last war a total of $6.5 million in war loans and savings certificates. That added to the $54.8 million made a total of $61.3 million.

That figure was found to correspond quite closely to the debt owing in the United Kingdom in sterling. It was agreed that in bringing about the union Canada would take over, as a debt incurred for what would have been federal purposes, an amount equivalent to the United Kingdom debt, and that the government of the province of Newfoundland would retain the debt of approximately $9,500,000 as a debt incurred for purposes which would have been provincial. There was this slight discrepancy. In making the mathematical computation we arrived at $61.3 million whereas the amount of the sterling debt was $62.5 million. It was pointed out to us, however, that in connection with the railways and the war, not only had there been capital expenditure of a federal nature, but that a portion of it had been incurred presumably for the erection of public buildings, and that the public buildings were going to be distributed according to the space in them occupied for what would be either federal or provincial services. It was found therefore that the fairest approximate calculation that could be made would show that the amount of the sterling debt was just about as close as we could get to the amount of indebtedness incurred for purposes which would have been federal purposes.

It was for that reason that the sterling debt was assumed, and that the provincial government was to be left with its dollar debt owing to residents of Canada or of Newfoundland.

Mr. Jackman: May I ask whether the sterling debt of Newfoundland is held by British nationals? If so can we offset some of the sterling balances, which we own in London, against the payment of this debt?

Mr. St. Laurent: The debt will have to be paid in sterling, and we will be entitled to pay it in any sterling that we have. Of course, we have not endeavoured to trace the securities, but presumably they are securities that were issued in England and issued in sterling. We assumed that they were probably held in the United Kingdom, but whether or not they are held there they are payable there, and they are payable in sterling, and we can use whatever sterling we have to redeem them.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I take it the Prime Minister means not only that they are payable in sterling but that they are payable only in sterling.

Mr. St. Laurent: Only in sterling.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): The Prime Minister referred to the wording where it says, "Stock issued or to be issued". As I understood him, that means that new stock can be issued, but only to replace existing stock. That gives rise to this question. Does that mean merely to replace stock that is lost, or does it mean that if under the sinking fund you pay off a certain amount you can then issue up to the old amount?

Mr. St. Laurent: No; it means it is only to replace securities originally issued. My understanding is that under the Loan Act, 1933, there were securities issued to replace former securities, and that there are some of those that have not yet been converted.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): So the net result is that it will be the original amount not subject to increase, and subject to decrease to the extent of the sinking fund?

Mr. St. Laurent: That is correct.

Mr. Fleming: My question has to do generally with the financial terms, and it applies to article 23 and several of the other articles which are to be found under the general heading, "financial terms". I should like to ask the Prime Minister to supply a little more information as to the net result as far as the annual charges that will be borne by Canada are concerned. The information which has been furnished to the house is not quite up to date. The document which has been circulated entitled "Report and documents relating to the negotiations for the union of Newfoundland with Canada" deals at page 70 with the question of probable revenues and probable expenditures accruing to Canada from Newfoundland. That information is based on 1947 figures, and also relates to the terms offered to Newfoundland in 1947. The figures at page 70 are a part of annex No. 4, which is annexed to the so-called "proposed arrangements for the entry of Newfoundland into confederation," which accompanied the letter of October 29, 1947, of the former Prime Minister of Canada to the governor of Newfoundland, to be found at page 57 of this same document.

As I gather it, the position under the terms offered in 1947 was roughly to this effect. Canada might anticipate drawing from Newfoundland into the federal treasury approximately $20 million per annum on the assumption of a continuation of the 1947 level of economic activities in Newfoundland. It was calculated also that probable expenditures on Newfoundland out of the federal treasury, embracing tax agreement payments, old age pensions, family allowances and other departmental expenditures, would total approximately $27 million. On page 71 it is pointed out that there are four items not included in the estimate of $27 million odd. They are: first, the transitional grants; secondly, the cost of servicing that part of the Newfoundland debt assumed by Canada; thirdly, any costs in respect of the Newfoundland railway or its auxiliary steamship services taken over by Canada; and, fourthly, any capital expenditure.

I pause at that point to make this comment. In trying to arrive at the net result, it would appear that on the basis of the 1947 offer the net result to the treasury would be a deficit of roughly $7 million as between federal revenue and probable expenditures, plus three and a half million dollars of transitional grants in each of the first three years of union, plus the other three of the four items referred to on page 71. But those are not the terms that are before the house today. The terms were revised in 1948, and the result has been to increase very substantially the amounts of the transitional grants that are offered by Canada to Newfoundland. It is proposed to increase the grants substantially during the first eight of the twelve years during which transitional grants are payable. By doing some arithmetic one finds that the total of transitional grants contemplated in the 1947 offer was $26,250,000, whereas the transitional grants that are contemplated by article 28 of the terms of union total $42,750,000. I assume that the amount of the transitional grants was increased in the interval between 1947 and 1948 for the purpose of making the terms of union more acceptable to the people of Newfoundland, and perhaps to meet some of the opposition that had been encountered there towards confederation.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to give to the house now up-to-date figures as to the probable net result to the federal treasury of union based on the figures on pages 70 and 71 as varied, first by the increase in the transitional grants, and, secondly, by any possible changes arising from the use of 1947 figures as basic. It may be the government is in a position to give us more recent figures than those used here.

Mr. St. Laurent: I should not like to attempt to go into the details of those calculations. Those estimates that were made are contained in this annex 4. They were rough estimates and it was found that, in many respects, more precise information could be supplied than had been available in 1947. It was found that, in order to leave the provincial government in a position to carry out its responsibilities and give to the people of Newfoundland services that would be progressing up to the scale of services provided in other provinces, without imposing taxes which it would not be practical to try to make effective at once, additions in the transitional grants were required. It is because of that feature that those increases in the transitional grants were provided.

I think the Minister of Finance and his officers did make calculations before recommending to the committee the reasonableness of the proposals, and I think he would be in a much better position than I to give my hon. friend such information as his officials were able to obtain.

Mr. Abbott: As the Prime Minister has suggested, perhaps I might follow that up, Mr. Chairman. When the first delegation was here discussing terms of union, certain figures were made available as to the probable revenues in Newfoundland. It was on the basis of those figures or estimates that the original financial proposals were made.

Following the holding of the plebiscite and the arrival of the new delegation a good deal of additional work had been done with respect to the probable revenues and expenditures in Newfoundland. The Newfoundland delegation had retained the services of a very capable accounting firm. A careful analysis had been made of the probable revenues in Newfoundland and an attempt was made to forecast a probable provincial budget. As the committee will appreciate, it was rather difficult to do that because of the difficulty of assessing the extent to which the federal services would accomplish what, in the past, had been done by the province, and just how much would be carried on by the province. That was, of course, on the expenditure side.

On the revenue side of a proposed provincial budget, it was necessary to take account of the fact that union would effect a rather revolutionary change in the tax sources of Newfoundland. Up to the time of union, the major sources of revenue were sources which either were exclusively within the purview of the federal government or would be shared by the federal and provincial governments. The major source of revenue in Newfoundland has always been the customs duty. This revenue would no longer be available to the new provincial government. Income taxes, corporation taxes, succession duties and the like are fields that are shared by the two governments. The difficulty in assessing what the revenues would really be was considerable.

It was, of course, realized by the Newfoundland delegation and by the Canadian delegation that it would be possible and necessary to develop new sources of revenue, in the light of those which are utilized in other Canadian provinces, but that inevitably it would take some time to develop those sources of revenue. For that reason, it was decided it would be necessary to increase the transitional grants which, as the committee will have appreciated upon looking at the terms of union, commence at the figure of $6·5 million for the first two years and diminish to nothing at the end of the twelfth year.

It was upon that basis that these additional transitional grants were arrived at, and that was the consideration which prompted the Canadian government to recommend these increased grants. The Canadian government felt they were fair and were necessary in order to enable the new provincial government to have a reasonably adequate budget to provide a scale of provincial services necessary in the new province.

Mr. Fleming: I appreciate the real difficulty in arriving at very precise estimates of the probable revenues and probable expenditures in a situation like this, which has some novel features about it. If the minister would be kind enough to clarify this matter, I should like to ask him whether my understanding of the situation is correct in so far as the net cost to the Canadian treasury is concerned. The anticipated total annual revenue from all sources after union, which will include the personal income taxes, corporate taxes, succession duties, customs duties, import taxes, as well as all the other forms of taxes which were enumerated on page 70, will be in the neighbourhood of $20 million.

Mr. St. Laurent: That was our estimate.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, I understand this was the estimate of the Canadian government. Against that, there are anticipated expenditures of approximately $27 million per annum. The tax agreement payment, which I presume is the subsidy payment which is provided for in article 26, is estimated at $6,820,000; old age pensions, between $2 million and $2,600,000; family allowances, $8,350,000; other departmental expenses, $9,400,000. This makes up the total I mentioned. There would appear up to that point to be an annual deficit of $7 million in round figures.

The increase in the transitional grants from $3,500,000 to $6,500,000 would bring the deficit up to $13,500,000, approximately, per annum, but that does not include three other figures: first, the costs of servicing that part of the Newfoundland debt assumed by Canada; secondly, any costs in respect of the Newfoundland railway or its auxiliary steamship services taken over by Canada; thirdly, any capital expenditures. Could the Minister of Finance give any estimate at all of those three latter factors, as to what they might be expected to amount to, and could he say a word as to the anticipated additional cost of defence, so that we will have as complete a picture as it is possible to draw at this stage of the net result for the treasury of Canada?

Mr. St. Laurent: Before the Minister of Finance gives his estimate, possibly I should give the estimate that was brought back to us in 1948 by the Newfoundland delegation. They disputed our estimate of the revenues as being too modest. Our estimate of what Canada would derive in 1949 was $20,185,000. Their estimate of what would be derived on the level of economy of 1949 was $26,922,000. They made that as their estimate of what Canada would derive from those various sources—personal income tax, corporation tax and so forth. They also disputed the $27,150,000 because that included the old age pensions payment at $2,600,000, and they said it would not exceed $2,400,000. So they came back this time telling us that our estimate of the revenue Canada would get, on the level of the economy of 1949, was too low, that it should amount to $26,922,000; and that our estimate of the expenditure on these items was a little bit too high and would be $26,970,000, practically balancing each other. Of course those figures are merely estimates. Before the Minister of Finance gave his own figures, I thought I should give to hon. members the representation that had been made by the delegation from Newfoundland.

Mr. Abbott: I forget for the moment what other things my hon. friend had in mind particularly.

Mr. Fleming: I went on to deal with the factors enumerated at the top of page 71 of the booklet. I asked if the minister could give any estimate at all as to factors 2, 3 and 4, which are as follows:

(2) Costs of servicing that part of the Newfoundland debt assumed by Canada;
(3) Any costs in respect of the Newfoundland railway or its auxiliary steamship services, taken over by Canada;
(4) Any capital expenditures.

I also asked whether the estimate of their expenditure, this figure aggregating $27 million in round figures, took any account of the increased burden of national defence. There is an item here entitled "other departmental expenditures", but it is an amount of only $9,400,000. Does that take any account of the increased burden of national defence which will now fall on the federal treasury with respect to the defence of Newfoundland?

Mr. Abbott: No. I have not any revised figure as to probable federal revenue from Newfoundland, and I would prefer not to hazard any further statement on that matter at this time. We are, however, in process of preparing estimates to be included in what would be the main estimate in order to provide services in Newfoundland. While those are not completed yet, they are fairly well advanced. Those expenditures, including expenditures for veterans' benefits and one thing and another, which are not included here, will be substantially higher than the figure of $27 million shown on page 70. Including all those special items, I think it will probably be something of the order of $50 million, including additional estimates for defence and the like.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to be clear with regard to that figure of $50 million. Is that in addition to the $27 million?

Mr. Abbott: No. What I am saying is this. Of course, before union is completed I shall be bringing down the main estimates for the fiscal year from April 1, 1949, to March 31, 1950. Therefore I have decided that, in the main estimates, we should not include Newfoundland items, but that they should be brought in as special supplementary estimates. I think it is an advantage to deal with the matter in that way, in that it will show to members of the house in detail the additional expenditure which it is contemplated will be necessary for Newfoundland. Those estimates will be brought in. My present intention would be to table those estimates on or about March 31, on the assumption that the legal formalities will have been complied with in order to make union effective about that date. Present indications are that the over-all amount of those estimates, including the other items to which I have referred—those relating to veterans and the like—will be something of the order of $50 million.

Mr. Fleming: For clarity's sake, may I ask this further question. That $50 million will include the $27 million, plus the transitional grant, plus the other three factors at the top of page 71?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Fleming: It is an inclusive figure?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Nicholson: Can the minister make any breakdown of this additional $23 million? I am referring especially to item 3:

> Any costs in respect of the Newfoundland railway or its auxiliary steamship services, taken over by Canada.

In the report of meetings between delegates from the national convention of Newfoundland and representatives of the government of Canada, part II, at pages 67 and those following, the section dealing with transportation makes some mention about present freight rates, express rates and passenger rates in Newfoundland. I understand that the freight rates there are about twice as high as the prevailing rates in the maritimes. I was surprised to find that it is so much more costly to travel by train in Newfoundland than it is to travel by air. The cost of travelling from St. John's to Gander is a good deal higher by train. I am told that the rates are about twice as high as the prevailing rates in Canada.

As to the condition of the property, at page 69 I read:

> Such evidence as is available would indicate that the Newfoundland railway system is badly run down and would require the expenditure of substantial amounts for rehabilitation. Estimates of the probable cost of such rehabilitation can only be guesses on the basis of data at present available. It would appear that the rails would need to be renewed on the whole of the railway within a period of ten years, and that at the same time ballast should be renewed, embankments and cuts widened, drainage restored or improved and that a majority of the bridges would need renewing. The cost of such rehabilitation over a ten-year period would be of the order of $10 million.
> The rolling stock of the system would also need rehabilitation. Much of the car equipment is of wooden construction and a number of the locomotives are not worth repairing. It may be hazarded that the cost of rehabilitating rolling stock over a ten-year period would be of the order of $7 million.

I read that the rates of pay, as far as can be judged from the sample given, are on the whole somewhat lower than those in Canada. Under the heading "Results of operation", it is reported that there was a deficit of about $525,000 in 1944-45 and $698,000 in 1945-46, after adjustment of a non-recurring item.

The point upon which I should like some information is this. Does it now become the problem of the Canadian National Railways to take over the Newfoundland railway? Is there an undertaking to bring the rates of pay up to Canadian levels and to bring passenger and freight rates down to Canadian levels? If so, what is the probable deficit which might be expected? What about the capital debt of the Newfoundland railway? Does it become a charge on the consolidated revenue of Canada, or is it added to the already heavy burden of the Canadian National Railways, which is about twice as high as the debt of its competitor, the Canadian Pacific Railway? Can the Minister of Finance answer some of those questions?

Mr. Abbott: The Newfoundland railway will be operated by the Canadian National Railways; that is to say, management will be provided by the Canadian National Railways, but they will operate it as agents of the Canadian government in the same way as the Canadian National Railways operate the Intercolonial railway. If there is a deficit, and I think it is fairly certain that there will be one, any deficit incurred will have to be voted by this house in the same way as deficits of the Canadian National Railways and just as we have in the estimates each year an item for statutory obligations in connection with the Intercolonial railway. At the moment I have not available any estimates of the possible or probable deficit of the Newfoundland railway. There is no doubt that it will require substantial capital expenditures, which will be classified as capital, and which presumably would increase the earning power of the railway by improving efficiency. But from an operating point of view the deficits, if any, will be a charge upon the taxpayers of Canada in the same way as are the deficits of the Canadian National Railways and of the Intercolonial railway. I have forgotten my hon. friend's other question.

Mr. Nicholson: Are the rates of pay prevailing in Canada to be made available to Newfoundland?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid that that is a question which is not within my province. The Minister of Transport is not here at the moment. That question comes within his jurisdiction.

Mr. MacNicol: The rates would have to be applied to Newfoundland.

Mr. Bentley: In taking over various public utilities such as railways and hotels in Newfoundland, under the terms just announced by the minister, will a careful audit be carried out, and will they be taken over at the actual replacement value or at their value regardless of how much actual over-capitalization there may be?

Mr. Abbott: No valuation is placed on them. We take them over as an asset of the government of Newfoundland. As the Prime Minister indicated a moment ago, we have assumed the payment of the sterling debt, a large portion of which was incurred in the building of the railway, among other things. We will own the railway as an asset of the Dominion of Canada. As I indicated, the offsetting liability is a portion of the debt. I might add, the arrangement provides that the railway will be left with adequate working capital, stores and so on, and that is part of the adjustments which are made on union.

Mr. Jackman: After what my leader has said in welcoming Newfoundland into confederation, I am sure that we shall be glad to accept the young lady without any dowry whatsoever. But this committee is entitled to know just what revenues we are likely to receive from taxation in Newfoundland and also what the expenditures will be. The information which the Minister of Finance has given has been anything but illuminating. I do hope that he has not entered into a financial transaction on the scanty basis of information which he has so far given to the committee.

The document which was given to hon. members was printed in 1949. It refers to a conference series published in 1948. One might expect that the information would be at least reasonably up to date, but either the minister or the Prime Minister has said, when dealing with the federal revenues which we can expect from Newfoundland, that the original figure of $20,185,000 had been upped by the Newfoundland delegation when they went back home and made a further investigation, and that they retained a very capable firm of accountants—I am sure they were very capable—who upped these revenues to an estimated $26,922,000. Do we accept that revision of the estimate of revenue which we shall get from Newfoundland?

Mr. St. Laurent: We neither accept it nor dispute it. We shall get such amounts as will be provided by the present rates of taxation applied to operations which actually take place. These are estimates. We accept them as estimates, but we do not guarantee that these estimates will prove to be accurate.

Mr. Jackman: I am not asking for a guarantee. Of course they must be estimates in the very nature of things, but one certainly does a little checking and double checking. The delegation met here with our own representatives for weeks, if not for months. Surely there must be a very good idea in the minds of members of the government as to what a reasonable estimate is. I am asking a specific question. Is the reasonable estimate in the eyes of our own advisers and our own responsible ministers $20 million or is it nearly $27 million, which was the final estimate of the Newfoundland delegation? That is a simple question. Surely the government holds at least a belief that it must be nearly one or the other. I know that when we apply our taxation laws to Newfoundland we get a certain figure. We do not know exactly what it is, but we must have made some estimate which we hoped would bear some accuracy, because it is simply amazing, when the budgets are brought down year after year and estimates are made running up to hundreds of millions of dollars, how accurate they sometimes are, although I admit that in the last few years the surpluses have been a little higher than the government could ever possibly have expected.

As members of this committee, we should inquire into what these probable expenditures are going to be. The minister, in his usual slapdash fashion, has said that the figure of $27 million applies to transitional grants which are now $6,500,000—

Mr. Abbott: Total payments. The main additional item, if my hon. friend will permit me, will be approximately $14,500,000 under the transitional grants, the tax agreement, and other payments to the province. Add $14,500,000 to $27 million and you get up to $41 million odd. Then there are veterans benefits of $4 million or $5 million, and one thing and another.

Mr. Jackman: It is this "one thing and another" to which I object. This committee is entitled to know what we are doing. As I said before, we are willing to go into this irrespective of any dollars and cents. The question of union with Newfoundland rises above that; nevertheless we owe a duty to our own people in Canada and we need the information. I would ask the minister not to give me a few figures on this and that and say, et cetera, et cetera, then arrive at $50 million. What I want to know is this. What is added to the probable expenditures of $27 million, which I think the minister said had to be revised upwards? I should like to know what the additional figures are. I want them itemized to make up the total of approximately $50 million which the minister gave us. We have the transitional grants, which are $6,500,000. Then we have the cost of servicing the Newfoundland debt, which I presume will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2,400,000. The minister can correct me if I am wrong. Surely he knows what the experience is in operating the Newfoundland railway even with the high freight rates and passenger rates which we heard about, and possibly a lower wage scale than we have in Canada. What has been the experience there in the last few years?—because in the nature of things it is not likely that there will be too radical a change in a short time. What is the deficit on the Newfoundland railway likely to be, if there is a deficit? It may be a profit, for all I know, but I want a figure on that. I want to know exactly what other items, including the cost of veterans allowances, will go to make up the figure of $50 million more or less which will be the cost to Canada of the first year of operation. I have not said a word about the revenues, which are estimated on the basis of 1947, I think, because that was applying the tax laws as they existed in Canada at that time, and we, representing the people of Canada, surely expect that the tax rates will be much less, therefore the tax revenues will be much less. However, I will not ask the minister to make any estimate in that regard just now. If he would throw some light on how the $50 million probable expenditures are made up I should be very grateful.

Mr. Abbott: That question is fair enough. I am afraid I cannot give the information at once. The reason I gave the round figure of $50 million was that I asked the officers of the various departments to segregate the expenditures in the different departments relating to Newfoundland. The other day I asked what the total of these estimates would be and I was informed that it was something of the order of $50 million or $55 million. I have not the details here. I will get them. This discussion will probably go on for some time. The full detail of course will be set out in the special supplementary estimate to which I referred a moment ago, but I cannot give my hon. friend a breakdown of that here now.

The major item is the extension to Newfoundland of rehabilitation grants and other veterans benefits, which run to quite substantial sums of money. That is a major item in the increase. It may well be that the gross figure which I have given also includes an estimate for deficit on the railways but I shall have to ask my hon. friend to allow that to stand and I shall try to give it to him either tomorrow afternoon or certainly before the discussion finishes.

Mr. Fleming: Going back to my now familiar problem about the net result, the minister has now said that the total probable expenditures for a full year would be $50 million to $55 million. The Prime Minister has indicated that the estimates of federal revenue in a year are, on the one hand, the Canadian estimate of $20 million, in round figures and, on the other hand, the Newfoundland estimate of, shall we say, $27 million, in round figures. This means that, with those figures, the net cost to the federal treasury through union would be a minimum of $23 million per annum, and might run up to as high as $35 million, based on the assumption of the continuance of the present scale of economic activity, and also on the continuance of the present scale of federal taxation. If, as we sincerely hope, there is a substantial reduction in rates of taxation this year, the anticipated revenue from Newfoundland would be reduced accordingly, and the net charge on the federal treasury would be increased accordingly.

Would the minister comment upon that? According to my arithmetic the figures of cost would be somewhere between $23 million and $35 million per annum.

Mr. Abbott: That is probably right. But, as the hon. member appreciates, those are estimates. If, in fact, the federal revenues from Newfoundland are of the order of $20 million, and if in fact the federal expenditures in Newfoundland, of one sort or another, are of the order of $50 million, obviously there would be some $30 million paid out more than is taken in, in direct revenue.

My hon. friend is right when he says that. But I am sure he appreciates that in the early stages of union it is perhaps not a fair test of the ultimate revenue-producing capacity of Newfoundland, nor is the amount received in revenue at the outset a fair test of the value of Newfoundland, or the contribution it may make to the Canadian federation. I do not think we can do that—and I am sure my hon. friend was not suggesting that we could. I am simply pointing out that we cannot judge this entirely in terms of either estimates or dollars and cents.

Mr. Fleming: I agree entirely with what the minister says. I would not wish anyone to think that I am basing my judgment as to the advantages of union either to Newfoundland or to Canada on these figures which have been brought out this afternoon upon inquiry. However, this is a matter of some importance, and inquiries have been made with a view to eliciting essential information. On the other side, if we were thinking in terms of a ledger balance in respect of the union, of course we would have to take account of the economic advantages accruing to both sides as a result of the increased facilities for trade, and other similar advantages. It is a separate and distinct problem.

Newfoundland

Mr. Probe: Referring to this deficit, which is estimated variously as running from $23 million to $35 million annually, as of this year, would the minister indicate what the position will be in five, ten or fifteen years. Some of these are non-recurring debts and expenditures as of this or next year. This figure, whatever it may be, of the present deficit, will be sharply or gradually reduced to what figure in what time?

Mr. Abbott: As I have often had occasion to say in the house, I claim no gift as a prophet; and anyone who could attempt to forecast what the revenues and expenditures of a province or of the dominion would be years ahead is a worker of miracles. It is absolutely impossible to make anything but a wild guess. But if one assumes that Newfoundland develops and occupies a full place in the Canadian economy, I think it is fair to assume that its revenues will expand; and my experience as Minister of Finance has been that expenditures will also expand.

Mr. Probe: Is it the minister's view that this temporary or this present apparent deficit will narrow considerably as soon as conditions stabilize?

Mr. Abbott: I should think that is bound to happen. Such matters as veterans affairs payments and transitional grants are both diminishing items. But I wish to take this occasion to say that I am never one who looks on the balance sheet of a Canadian province, the revenue from that province, or the federal disbursements in the province as a fair test of the contribution the province makes. We have "have" provinces in this country, and certain provinces which do not collect as much revenue. I am not one who accepts that as a criterion of the place that province occupies in confederation.

Mr. Probe: In section 23 it is stated that Canada will assume certain debts of the province of Newfoundland, and that the province itself will retain its surplus, as indicated in section 24. May I ask first of all in regard to section 23 whether there are in Newfoundland at the present time any arrears of debt for which Newfoundland is responsible, or for which she would be responsible if she were not entering confederation?

Mr. Abbott: No. The debt of Newfoundland has been fully serviced and all maturities have been met. The debt which Canada is assuming, as the Prime Minister explained, is its external debt, the debt which is payable in sterling. I am informed that all of that debt is now callable, if that is desired, at any time on three months' notice.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Probe: With respect to the guarantees for corporations or institutions within Newfoundland, are they also up to date or are there arrears of debts for which Newfoundland has some responsibility?

Mr. Abbott: So far as I am aware—and I am sure I am correctly informed—all obligations of Newfoundland have been fully met.

Mr. MacNicol: Mr. Chairman, I agree with some of the remarks made by the minister. I do not think we should split hairs, or be too much alarmed by a consideration of what Canada is going to get at the present time or in a certain number of years as a financial return from Newfoundland. The island has not had the opportunity it should have had. I have made an exhaustive survey of the facts, and I am convinced that it can do much better than it has done. I believe we have nothing to fear in that regard.

The railway has been mentioned. The first thing I would suggest to the minister and the government would be a plan for reservicing the railway for standard-gauge cars. It is a narrow-gauge line, and much more time is required to go from Port aux Basques to St. John's than should be required. The faster the trains could cover that distance, the more money would be made by the railway.

Therefore that is one of the first suggestions I would make, namely that it be made a standard-gauge line. Then I would suggest further equipment for the port of Port aux Basques so that larger ships, capable of carrying cars, could be unloaded quickly and reloaded rapidly at Port aux Basques. I can see myself at some time in the future boarding a train at Toronto, one properly equipped and having proper sleeping accommodation, and remaining on that train until I reached St. John's, Newfoundland. I do not see how the railway can be made to pay unless it is equipped so that people can travel on it in modern equipment.

It will take a few years to have that done; but the sooner it is done the sooner that railway will be able to produce a revenue. At the present time the passenger traffic on it is not as heavy as it should be. I have found the general service satisfactory, although the sleeping accommodation was a little cramped for me. However, a modern car would eliminate that difficulty. I found the meals quite satisfactory.

We will have an opportunity, not only to build up Canada but to build up this new province. I would not hedge at all in giving it opportunities to develop. It has vast resources of pulpwood. If the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe were here he could tell the committee much more effectively than I can just what results might be expected from that pulpwood. A condition exists there that does not exist in Canada or anywhere else that I know of, although it may in Norway, whereby the forests regrow in thirty years. I never saw such forest growth in my life as I saw in Newfoundland. This is brought about by the moisture content of the air and the ameliorating temperatures, the country being of course surrounded by water.

I hope the minister does not become distracted by thinking there is any possibility that we are not going to be able to carry out our obligations. Give the island a chance and it will pay its way. It has not had a chance up to the present. The same applies to the fisheries. The whole service should be made more rapid than it is today so that people may travel back and forth more quickly. They should be able to ship more rapidly the goods they sell and in that way develop their business. The more business they do, the more they will be able to buy from us.

I made a comparison of the costs to the consumer in Newfoundland. I found that people along the coast were generally opposed to confederation. One argument I used was that it would cost them much less to live if they were part of Canada because their present rates of duty are so high. I found that the cost of ordinary groceries, food and other articles was from fifty per cent to one hundred per cent more than in Canada. If these people are given an opportunity to buy at rates comparable to what we pay, they will buy much more. That will be better for the older provinces of Canada and it will help to reduce the deficits on the railroad by providing more freight.

I am for one not going to endorse the expectation that Newfoundland is going to embarrass Canada financially. I look at the bright side of things. I think union will be most helpful to Canada. We can work together. They should be given a chance to come up to our standards in every way.

Mr. Green: Has the government any plans in mind for the promoting of industry in Newfoundland? Section 24(2)(c) reads:

> (c) no part of the surplus shall be used to subsidize the production or sale of products of the province of Newfoundland in unfair competition with similar products of other provinces of Canada, but nothing in this paragraph shall preclude the province of Newfoundland from assisting industry by developmental loans on reasonable conditions or by ordinary provincial administrative services.

Apparently that contemplates that the provincial government of Newfoundland will assist in the development of industry, but I think it is of the utmost importance that the federal government should also promote the establishment of industries in Newfoundland. We have much the same kind of problem on the west coast. There is a greater need for assistance of this kind in the remote provinces than there is in the central provinces. Can the minister tell us whether the government has in mind assisting in the development of industries in Newfoundland.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend will appreciate that primarily this comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The minister was down in Newfoundland last week, and prior to that officers of his department, acting on the assumption that union was probable, were down in Newfoundland going over the industrial situation and making a survey of what could be done and in what way the federal government could assist, not only during the transitional period but in the development of such industries as might be suitable to Newfoundland.

The paragraph to which my hon. friend has referred was put in because, as may be seen from the section itself, Newfoundland is being permitted to retain its surplus, which amounts to some $26 million. That is a rather unusual provision when the dominion is taking over most of the debt, but it was felt that it was quite proper that that should be done and the surplus made available to the new provincial government for whatever purposes it saw fit to use it in the interests of the province. However, it was felt that it would not be appropriate that it should be used to subsidize the sale of Newfoundland products so that they might enter into unfair competition with those of the other provinces. That was a condition in the original proposals for union and it was continued in this arrangement.

Mr. Green: The minister has said that this matter of industry would come under the Department of Trade and Commerce, but I would point out to him that the industrial development bank comes under the Department of Finance. It seems to me that that bank could be of great help in Newfoundland and I should like to know whether any steps have been taken by the industrial bank authorities to see in what way they can help out in Newfoundland.

Mr. Abbott: I am glad my hon. friend raised that point. It may be premature, but it is the intention of the industrial development bank to have offices in Newfoundland, as they have in other provinces. Naturally the management of that bank will be not only willing but anxious to do what is done in other provinces of Canada in assisting in the development of industries.

Mr. Green: I hope they will adopt a different attitude from that adopted elsewhere. During recent months we have been receiving complaints in the west that the industrial development bank is getting very sticky about assisting industry. If they adopt a policy of that kind in Newfoundland there will not be a very bright outlook for the people there.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know on what my hon. friend is basing his statement that they are becoming sticky. The management of the bank has the responsibility of making loans which have good prospects of being repaid. I think the hon. member will find when we come to consider the industrial development bank that they have been making loans in his own province and that the bank has adopted a very fair policy there, as it has in most other provinces.

Mr. Green: If the minister will check up the statements made by some of the officials of that bank and of the Bank of Canada I think he will find they were to the effect that a policy has been deliberately adopted of not being so free with loans. It is not a matter of whether the loans will be repaid; it is simply a matter of holding down expansion. There has been considerable criticism over a policy of that type being adopted on the west coast and I suggest to the minister that he check the situation because I think it is as I have stated.

Mr. Abbott: I am sure my hon. friend does not want me to debate the operations of the industrial development bank. I have been following them pretty closely and there will be an opportunity later in the session to consider its operations.

Mr. Claxton: I should like to supplement the answer of my colleague to the question put by the hon. member for Vancouver South about the promotion of industry. I can say that, in anticipation of the possibility or probability that union would take place on March 31, officers of the Department of Trade and Commerce were sent to St. John's. There is also a committee of senior officials in Ottawa specially appointed to deal with problems of the continuation and development of industry in Newfoundland. Further, a special inquiry was made by a team of officials into the prospects and outlook of the seventy-five relatively small industries that exist in Newfoundland to see by what means they could be assisted and encouraged. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce were here he would, I think, be able to give one or two rather striking illustrations of the way in which we expect that union will assist the development of industry in Newfoundland.

Mr. Green: Does the Minister of National Defence know of any definite plan for assisting industry there?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. Some steps have already been taken to meet certain special needs of Newfoundland industry—for example, in the supply of raw materials.

The Deputy Chairman: We are dealing with section 24. When the hon. member for Vancouver South rose I was just about to ask the committee if they would carry section 23. I wonder if they would do that now?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): As I understand it, we still have to get certain information which has been asked for under section 23, and which the Minister of Finance is to give us tomorrow.

Mr. Abbott: Whether it comes under section 23 or section 24 is immaterial. Section 23 happens to relate to the assumption of the debt. I undertook to obtain for the hon. member for Rosedale, and I should be able to have it at the opening of the house tomorrow afternoon, a statement by main heads of the major items of expenditure. I could not give it to him broken down by individual departments, but I presume the committee want to know the main headings showing how the figure of $50 million which I have given is made up. I hope to be able to have that tomorrow afternoon. There are, of course, a great many non-recurring items in that figure. There are amounts which have to be paid in adjustment of accountable advances, taking over consumable stores, and that sort of thing, which are referred to in the document. I will have that statement available for the committee tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I would suggest that section 23 be left over. It seems to me it is always better to have a section still under review, and not be discussing it afterwards when it is supposed to have been passed. Then we seem to be at a disadvantage in asking questions.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to say to the hon. member that the only point I had in mind was to keep things in order. I wanted to keep the record straight. But if the committee decides to let section 23 stand, that is all right.

Mr. Abbott: For instance, I could give the information under section 26, which provides for the financial payments to Newfoundland. I think it is immaterial under which section I give it.

Mr. Jackman: The minister has been good enough to say he will give a breakdown of probable expenditures. Will he also give us a breakdown of the estimated federal revenue? We have been given two figures, $20 million and $27 million. I am sure that each of the items which go to make that up—and there are about nine or ten listed in the pamphlet—was the subject of considerable discussion between our delegation and the Newfoundland delegation. I believe we are entitled to know on what the estimate is based.

Mr. Abbott: I could give that at once. I have that here if my hon. friend wishes it, but I have to put the expenditure item over until tomorrow.

Mr. Jackman: If the minister would table it, I think it might be quite adequate.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I might do that at the same time tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Jackman: May I ask the minister whether or not there are any outstanding tax agreements between Newfoundland and any taxpayers in the former dominion. If there are any such agreements, is it to be the policy of Canada to honour them?

Mr. Abbott: On the question of the agreements to which my hon. friend refers, the colony or dominion of Newfoundland has entered into agreements, for income-tax concessions and customs concessions, with certain corporations in Newfoundland. In the terms of union there is a provision, section 27, subsection 4, which reads:

> The government of the province of Newfoundland shall not, by any agreement entered into pursuant to this term, be required to impose on any person or corporation taxation repugnant to the provisions of any contract entered into with such person or corporation before the date of the agreement and subsisting at the date of the agreement.

The "term" referred to in that clause is the term enabling them to have a tax agreement with the dominion. The tax concession agreements to which my hon. friend has referred are agreements which of course were entered into with the government of Newfoundland and not with the government of Canada. The policy to be followed with respect to those agreements will be a matter for this parliament to decide.

Mr. Jackman: The minister does not care to express an opinion on the policy which he thinks would be a fair one in the circumstances? After all, there are certain agreements in Newfoundland with high contracting parties, certain sovereign powers. I presume those agreements might be respected in the same way as taxation agreements. In other words, would the minister care to say whether the policy in the case of a high contracting party such as the United States will be different from the policy for an ordinary taxpayer?

Mr. Abbott: Of course, the agreements to which my hon. friend refers are contracts, and there is in the terms of union nothing that deprives the contracting parties, the beneficiaries of these tax concessions, of any legal right which they have. Newfoundland will of course become a province of Canada, and residents of Newfoundland will become subject to Canadian laws.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming: There is one point I should like to raise. Someone suggested that the information should be tabled. I suggest that it ought to be put right into Hansard.

Mr. Abbott: It is not lengthy, and I think my hon. friend's suggestion is a fair one. I will put on Hansard early tomorrow afternoon the heads of estimated expenditures and the heads of estimated revenues.

Sections 23 and 24 stand.

Progress reported.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. ABBOTT IN ANSWER TO QUESTION ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

Mr. Alan Cockeram (York South): Before the house adjourns, I rise to a question of privilege. I did not do so earlier for the reason that it was necessary for me to check the Hansard record to make sure of the words used by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I wish to refer to the statement made by the Minister of Finance earlier this afternoon in which he implied that, in putting the question I asked before the orders of the day, I did so as a representative of special interests. Referring to myself he said:

> I am aware of the special interest which he has in the matter.

I ask the Minister of Finance to withdraw that statement. I asked the question because the gold mining industry has a far-reaching influence on the general economy of Canada, and on the welfare of every Canadian citizen. My only interest is that of a Canadian, and I resent the imputation contained in the minister's words.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, of course I have nothing to withdraw.

Mr. Cockeram: You certainly have.

Mr. Abbott: I said what I know to be a fact. My hon. friend has a special interest in the subject on which he questioned me. I have reason to know that, because on numerous occasions he has spoken to me about it; he has made numerous speeches in the house on the subject, and I made a completely accurate statement of fact.

Mr. Cockeram: Mr. Speaker, I object to this whole proceeding, because I have never obtained an honest or frank statement from the minister on any question I have asked in this house. He always comes back with a flippant reply which does not mean a thing.

Mr. Abbott: If I were given to rising on questions of privilege I would ask my hon. friend to withdraw the statement that he has never received an honest statement from me, but knowing my hon. friend as well as I do I will not bother to ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, because of the particular manner of the reply that has been made by the minister, there can be no doubt whatever that the words implied a special interest on the part of the member, and he should withdraw that imputation.

Mr. Cockeram: I am not prepared to let it go at that. The manner in which the minister made that statement implied dishonesty or some such thing on my part, and I want him to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I believe both sides of the house have accepted the statement made by the hon. member, and the statement made by the minister. I do not believe the character either of the member or of the minister has been assailed. There is no doubt about the honesty of either, and I think both sides should be satisfied.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. St. Laurent: The business for tomorrow will be the same program as we have had today, with the exception that there are no questions or notices for the production of papers.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 10, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSING

FRASERVIEW VETERANS RENTAL PROJECT, VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): On Monday last the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply promised to have a further investigation made of the Fraserview building project in Vancouver, in order to see if there was not some way in which the several hundred people already living in the area could be protected against interference with their property by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In the intervening days I have received many heartrending letters from these people, and it would appear that the actions of the corporation have been unbelievably arbitrary and annoying. If the minister acts at once, it should be possible to have this sweeping expropriation plan altered. Can the minister make a further report today? I suggest that he himself take a plane to Vancouver and have this question settled.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): In reply to the question now asked by the hon. member, and to the supplementary question put by him last Monday, as reported at page 281 of Hansard, I would say that this subdivision is similar to that on Renfrew Heights. It seemed to lend itself well to development of this kind. Where so many veterans are involved, in such a large project it appeared desirable to develop it along lines other than those of the general grid type of development. The number of properties that are privately owned is relatively small.

Mr. Green: About three hundred.

Mr. Winters: The bulk of the land is tax-sale property now owned by the city of Vancouver. The general plan was developed jointly by the planning board of the city of Vancouver and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It was then revised in such a way as to result in the least possible disturbance to private property owners. It is, however, still under consideration. In order to minimize disturbance to present property owners, every attempt will be made to make whatever adjustments are indicated and still allow the general plan to proceed. To assist toward that end, an official of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is being sent to Vancouver this week end to go into the outstanding problems and to see what can be done to arrive at mutually satisfactory understandings.

Mr. MacInnis: As this project happens to be in the constituency I represent, I should like to add something to what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I received today a sheaf of protests, and I tried to get in touch with Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation for clarification. I understood that the parliamentary assistant would see us this afternoon, and I did not take the matter any further. I believe that Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation has failed to do a public relations job.

Mr. Winters: I might say that there is no parliamentary assistant in this department. I should be pleased to see the hon. members myself.

Mr. MacInnis: Sorry; I was thinking of the minister's former position.

CHORLEY PARK—CHRISTIE STREET HOSPITAL

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Has the minister been able to come to any determination about the use of Chorley Park and the old Christie Street hospital for housing and civilian hospital purposes?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member asked a question about this matter yesterday. That institution is one which is under the jurisdiction of the provincial government. It is a matter over which we have no control, and, as my hon. friend will appreciate, there is nothing we can do about it.

Mr. Church: That was with reference to the Toronto jail farm at Lansing, not the old Christie Street hospital or Chorley Park. I should like to hear from the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of National Defence about these matters, because the people are without homes and have no place to go. They have been turned out.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): In so far as the hon. member's question refers to the old Christie Street hospital, I can assure him that the matter is under study and will be dealt with as soon as possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has his attention been directed to the serious unemployment situation in the city of Vancouver, and is the government giving consideration to assisting the employable unemployed who have no unemployment insurance entitlement or who have exhausted their benefits?

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): My attention has been drawn to the condition referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver East. In reply to an inquiry which I made, the regional superintendent of the unemployment insurance commission at Vancouver sent me a telegram advising me that in his opinion the principal reason for the increase in the number of unemployed was the large influx of persons from other provinces, plus exceptional weather conditions which have retarded logging operations and building construction projects. A greater number were getting unemployment insurance benefits because of the expanded coverage and increase in the labour force of the province. But notwithstanding that, Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend will agree with me that British Columbia is a pleasant place in which to spend the winter.

Mr. Coldwell: Sometimes.

An hon. Member: Not lately.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Mitchell: I think that is indicated by the smiles of hon. members from British Columbia. But I would point out that some people have to stay in areas in which there is a cold climate, in order to take their part in the nation's production.

Mr. Campbell: Cold comfort.

Mr. Mitchell: I can understand that, coming as it does from the hon. member for Peterborough West.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I will take all kinds of comments, but the member for Peterborough West did not make that remark. I think the minister should direct his remark to the member on my left who made the interjection.

Mr. Mitchell: I regret having said what I did to my hon. friend. I thought it was the hon. member for Peterborough West who made the interjection. However, the observation still stands. I think I should say that when people move from one part of Canada to another they should remember that there are certain responsibilities which fall upon the individual rather than upon the state. If I decided to live in British Columbia—not that I particularly want to do that—before leaving Ontario I think I would make sure that I did not become a charge on the state when I arrived there.

Mr. MacInnis: A charge on the state?

Mr. Mitchell: I am saying a charge on the state.

Mr. Fraser: That is a question.

Mr. Mitchell: To emphasize what I have just said, may I give these figures. In January, 268 families moved from Saskatchewan to British Columbia, 260 from Alberta, 77 from Ontario, 64 from Manitoba, 12 from Nova Scotia and 5 from each of the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. These figures for one month give hon. members an indication of the number of people who move into that province during the winter months. I would also point out that the amount of money paid out in November, December and January by the unemployment insurance commission was $2,650,954.81, of which $1,462,296.61 was paid out in the city of Vancouver.

Last fall I made a radio broadcast, directed to Ontario and the prairie provinces, advising people not to go to British Columbia during the winter months. It was almost prophetic. I was not responsible for the weather there, which has been the reason for some of the present unemployment in that province. I must emphasize that people who go there in the winter months must do so on their own responsibility.

There is no federal provision for the payment of monetary assistance to unemployed employables who are not eligible for unemployment insurance benefits or who have lost their entitlement to such benefits because of having been out of work for a considerable time.

Mr. Green: May I ask a supplementary question? I take it from the last part of the minister's statement that the dominion accepts no responsibility whatever for the employable unemployed.

Mr. Mitchell: That is substantially correct at the moment, yes.

Mr. Pearkes: May I direct to the Minister of Mines and Resources a question which has some bearing on the statement just made by the Minister of Labour? Will the minister now consider returning the meteorological station to Victoria—because ever since the government moved it to Vancouver the weather in British Columbia has been growing steadily worse.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

DATES OF BIRTH OF ADOPTED CHILDREN—FORM LETTER 331A

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Beaudry (St. James): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware of the fact that the family allowances office in Quebec has been sending out family allowances form letter 331A to parents in the province, asking, among other things, a question about the dates of birth of adopted children? If so, did the minister himself authorize the issuance of the letter in its present form? If not, will he not order a revision of this form letter?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. gentleman was kind enough to give me notice of his question.

The form letter referred to was sent out in all cases where dates of birth, including those of adopted children, could not be verified from provincial vital statistics records. In such cases the experience has been that the child's birth had never been registered, and it is necessary for the family allowance officials to request the help of the parents themselves in furnishing information as to the date of birth. Adopted children are of course eligible for family allowances on the same basis as any other children. In order that the correct amount may be paid, and that duplicate payments for the same children under two different names may be avoided, it is necessary, of course, to establish the correct dates of birth. I may say that in all cases where parents had advised the family allowance officials on their original family allowances application form that the child had been adopted, this form letter was not sent out.

The purpose of the form letter was solely to verify the date of birth of the children in question. Since the hon. gentleman has brought the matter to my attention I am having the form letter looked at to make sure whether or not in the circumstances a revision is desirable.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

PRESS REPORT AS TO TRANSFER TO CANADIAN PACIFIC OF OPERATIONS FROM WINNIPEG WEST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is there any basis for the press report of a short while ago to the effect that the Trans-Canada Air Lines operation from Winnipeg west might be turned over to the Canadian Pacific Air Lines?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman sent no notice of his question, but notwithstanding that, I may tell him that I have had no notice or advice of the action which he has in mind, and neither, I am sure, has my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Knowles: It is not a matter as to which the government would get notice from T.C.A. It is a matter of government policy.

Mr. Chevrier: So far as government policy is concerned with reference to T.C.A., it has been announced, and if there is any change it will be made known.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): As minister responsible for T.C.A. I should like to say there is absolutely nothing in the suggestion.

Mr. Knowles: Good. That is the answer we want.

GOLD

SALES FROM SOUTH AFRICA AT PREMIUM OF $6.50 PER FINE OUNCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harry R. Jackman (Rosedale): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the approval by the international monetary fund of the sale by South Africa of newly-mined alloy gold to be used only for industrial or professional work at a premium of $6.50 a fine ounce over the fund's price of $35 a pure ounce, will the government extend the same right to Canadian gold producers?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Again I am caught by surprise by one of these gold questions, but I am very glad to answer my hon. friend. I have no official information yet as to just what has taken place with respect to the gold sales in South Africa. I was informed this morning that the matter is under consideration by the international monetary fund, and when I have a report as to the decision which the fund has made, I shall be glad to communicate it to the house.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DISTRIBUTION OF MEDALS AND CAMPAIGN STARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Probe (Regina City): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, of which I sent him notice. Will the minister please inform the house what progress is being made with respect to the distribution of military decorations receivable by participants in world war II?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I did not get notice of the hon. member's question, but I did answer the question the other day.

WHEAT

REPORTED PURCHASE OF 120 MILLION BUSHELS IN CANADA BY ECA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In doing so I am not going to say a great deal, and I do not wish to be shouted down until I have said a word or two. Again in last evening's newspaper there was a dispatch from Washington which said definitely that Mr. Ralph A. Trigg, president of the Commodity Credit Corporation, stated in evidence before the senate committee on agriculture that they were buying from Canada 120 million bushels of wheat at $2 a bushel. Having regard to his answer given yesterday as to general procedure, at which time he told us what would happen normally, I ask the minister if he will have someone make an investigation and let us know exactly what the position is. Perhaps he would do that tomorrow or Monday or Tuesday.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, no investigation is necessary. A sale of the magnitude mentioned by my hon. friend would not escape the notice of the government. In the first place I will tell him we have not that quantity of wheat to sell, and we have not had for a great many months. Obviously if he is referring to a price of $2 a bushel, that is the price referred to for deliveries of wheat under the contract with the United Kingdom. That is the only wheat that is sold at $2 a bushel. The amount of the contract is 140 million bushels for the crop year 1948-49.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I will send the dispatch over to the minister now.

NEWFOUNDLAND

APPEAL TO PRIVY COUNCIL BY APPLICANTS FROM NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement that the right to appeal to the privy council has been granted to certain appellants in Newfoundland with regard to Newfoundland's part in the agreement for union with Canada, has the Prime Minister taken into consideration what effect, if any, that would have upon the discussions now taking place in the house?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have no information other than that gathered from the newspapers. However my understanding of the situation is that an action was instituted in the courts of justice of Newfoundland, and on motion it was dismissed as being frivolous and vexatious. An appeal was then taken to the appeal court of Newfoundland, and that appeal was dismissed, the appeal court confirming the opinion of the first judge that it was frivolous and vexatious. Now the newspapers report that leave has been granted to appeal to the privy council from the decision that the proceedings were frivolous and vexatious. Even if that appeal were heard, and even if it were allowed, it would not mean anything more than that the plaintiffs in the case would have the right to proceed on the merits of their suit; it being merely a pronouncement on a question of procedure. In view of the attitude taken by the government of Newfoundland as to the terms of this agreement, and the time limit for accomplishing the further proceedings required to bring it into effect, there should be no delay on our part in asking parliament to confirm the agreement.

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RADIO BROADCASTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on two occasions the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), in response to inquiries as to the setting up of a special committee on radio broadcasting, has left the impression that a committee would be called together if the desire to have that committee were made evident. I wish to leave no doubt that we are anxious to have a special committee proceed with an inquiry; therefore I wish the minister would deal with the matter on the understanding that there is a request that a special committee be appointed to deal with the subject as soon as possible.

NEWFOUNDLAND

APPROVAL OF TERMS OF UNION WITH CANADA

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 11, to approve the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last night, section 23 had been allowed to stand.

On section 23—Debt.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): When the committee rose yesterday afternoon I had promised the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) that I would get and give to the committee information respecting estimates of federal revenues and expenditures in Newfoundland. I am prepared to give those estimates now.

First, may I say that it is with some hesitation that I put these figures on the record, because, unless one understands the basis upon which they are prepared, they may be misinterpreted and misunderstood. It is extremely difficult, in fact almost impossible, to make an accurate calculation of revenues derived from a particular province. It is difficult enough, as I have reason to know, to make an accurate calculation of future revenues from the whole of the country. But to determine, for example, the matter of customs duties derived from a particular province is almost impossible. In that respect, at best it can only be an informed guess.

In the case of Newfoundland it was particularly difficult to make an accurate forecast, because substantial changes will occur in the economy of the province at the time of union. The whole course of trade may be altered to some extent through the elimination of tariff barriers between Canada and Newfoundland. In addition, the Newfoundland statistics are not as well developed as statistics here in Canada. However, when the delegates from the national convention were in Ottawa in 1947, we did endeavour to make a rough estimate of the probable additions to Canadian revenue as a result of the union. Those are the figures which appear in the white paper of October 29, 1947. At that time our knowledge of the Newfoundland economy was somewhat less complete than it is today, and some of the estimates were based on faulty assumptions.

The most important reason for making alterations in the figures, however, is not the improvement in the sources of information, but the continued rise in the national income of Newfoundland, which was not foreseen in 1947. As hon. members will recall, our own budget estimate of revenues for that year was on the low side, and for exactly the same reason. As was indicated the other day, when the Newfoundland delegation were in Ottawa last summer they submitted revised estimates of what they considered would be the additions to our Canadian revenue. Officers of my department have gone over those estimates, and they are inclined to think that they are probably much closer to the truth than the estimates prepared the year before. This is partly due to the fact that the Newfoundlanders themselves have a closer acquaintance with local conditions and also that revenues were higher in 1947 than we had estimated and have risen still higher. I should like to place on Hansard a statement giving the comparative figures for the two years. The statement follows:

Heads of Revenue	Original Canadian estimate as in white paper October 29, 1947	Newfoundland estimate
Personal income tax	$3,200,000	$6,183,000
Corporation income tax including withholding tax	7,500,000	7,500,000
Succession duties	320,000	100,000
Customs and import duties	2,000,000	3,415,000
Liquor taxes	400,000	602,000
Tobacco taxes	500,000	2,857,000
General sales tax	4,000,000	4,000,000
Miscellaneous excise duties, etc.	1,500,000	1,500,000
Post office	750,000	750,000
Bullion, coin, etc.	15,000	15,000
	$20,185,000	$26,922,000

If any of the revised figures for revenue were to be criticized I would be inclined to think that the personal income tax figure is on the high side. But as I have said, these can at best be but guesses and subject to errors which might well run into several million dollars. Moreover, they are based on present rates of taxes and are therefore valid just as long as the present rates are in effect. That is another reason why I hesitate to put them forward as indicating permanent sources of revenue over the long pull.

Then with regard to expenditures, first of all I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the figures to which some hon. members have referred and which were given to the delegation from the national convention were based on estimates of the cost of extending federal services to Newfoundland in a typical year rather than in a particular year. If hon. members will examine the table in the white paper that follows they will see that that point is brought out very clearly. Therefore, none of the temporary or unusual expenditures that might be expected at the time of union could be included.

That is one reason why the figures are quite different from the 1947 estimates. Let me put it another way. The 1949-50 estimates were made when most of the costs could be foreseen and provided for, whereas the 1947 estimates were merely an indication of how much federal expenditures might be increased in some typical future year.

The table follows:

Heads of expenditure	Original estimate for a typical year	Estimate for fiscal year 1949-50
1. Tax agreement payment (including statutory subsidies)	$6,820,000	$7,800,000
2. Old age pensions	2,000,000 to 2,600,000	2,700,000
3. Family allowance payments	8,350,000	8,400,000
4. Departmental expenditures	9,400,000	22,000,000 (including capital and non-recurring items)
	$26,570,000 to 27,150,000	$40,900,000
	Additional
Transitional grant	$3,500,000	$6,500,000
Cost of servicing debt	2,800,000	2,800,000
		$50,200,000
Chief reasons for increase:
Increased veterans benefits		$1,500,000
Health grants		1,000,000
Increased tax agreements payments		1,000,000
Public works (purchase of buildings harbour installations, maintenance, new construction, etc.)		7,500,000
Unemployment assistance		2,000,000
Transitional grants		3,000,000

As hon. members of the committee are well aware, costs as well as revenue have risen since 1947, and for much the same reason. For example, the tax agreement payments are expected to be at least $1 million higher than the 1947 estimate. A third reason why costs are higher—I am referring here to expenditures which are a cost to the dominion treasury—is the fact that the terms of union extend to Newfoundland certain additional benefits which were not in the original proposals, such as re-establishment credits to veterans. It is also provided that Canada will take over certain services which it was originally contemplated would remain with the new province. In that regard I am thinking particularly of certain fisheries services. Then the Canadian government has introduced a system of health grants in which Newfoundland would undoubtedly participate on a major scale.

On looking over the estimates which have been submitted to me this year by the various departments I find that they are not altogether comparable with the estimates prepared in 1947. In one case, that of the Department of Transport, figures have been put in on a gross basis with no account being taken of offsetting revenues in connection with air services and so on. In the figures for 1949-50 I have made some offsets.

I want to stress again that the figures I have given are only estimates and that detailed consideration by the treasury board has not yet been completed. Also the departmental estimates as such have not been finalized, if I may use that word. The total of expenditures under these headings, if my addition is right, is approximately $50,200,000.

No firm estimate has yet been made of possible railway deficit, but I might say that it was originally estimated that the deficit on the operations of the Newfoundland railway would run to something over $1,500,000.

I cannot stress too strongly that these are only the best estimates that I can give at the moment and we must not be held to them as being firm figures. As I said before, detailed estimates have not yet been finally considered and approved.

Mr. Church: I should like to ask the minister a question with reference to the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador railway and the many natural resources to be found in that part of the country. My question relates particularly to section 23, section 24 and section 27, subsection 4. First with regard to section 23. There was some discussion in the British house regarding this matter shortly after the decision of the privy council in connection with Labrador had been handed down. At that time Newfoundland did not have a government of its own; it simply had a governor and a trusteeship.

Was any survey made under section 23 by the government of Canada in connection with the Loan Act of 1933 and the sinking fund established under that act? Certain parties in the parliament across the waters, who were opposed to the union of Newfoundland and Labrador, contended that the fund was not in a liquid state, and Canada assumes a debt accordingly. That is in so far as borrowing is concerned in connection with the sinking fund, for payment of the debt when due. I was wondering if any actuarial report had been received, because I cannot find it in Hansard.

The last question I have to ask is with regard to an agreement which was made by the government of Canada in a bill passed in 1947, involving the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador railway. By that legislation natural resources, power sites, pipe lines, ocean services, hotel services, public lands, wharves, railways, and so on, were given away. I was on the committee at the time. With respect to this private company, has the government of Canada any agreement with Newfoundland about what is to be done regarding the financial set-up of these Labrador properties, their use and purchase? The minister referred to section 27. Subsection 4 of that section reads:

> The government of the province of Newfoundland shall not by any agreement entered into pursuant to this term be required to impose on any person or corporation taxation repugnant to the provisions of any contract entered into with such person or corporation before the date of the agreement and subsisting at the date of the agreement.

As I see it, union with Newfoundland would mean that any agreement made by a Canadian corporation with the government of Canada would not be affected. I was glad to see, when the committee studied that particular bill in 1947, that they made the provision that it would be subject to the companies getting approval of their charter powers, and to consent of Newfoundland, the dominion of Newfoundland or the province of Newfoundland. Is that not so? I should like to find out from the minister if that is not so.

Mr. St. Laurent: I listened as attentively as I could to the hon. member's questions, and they are quite involved. I should like to be as accurate as possible in giving an answer, and I think it will be necessary for me to see and consider the context of his questions in order that I may supplement what I am prepared to say at this moment. I think the hon. member is under a false impression if he feels that any agreement was made in 1947 between the applicants for a railway charter and the government of Canada. There was no such agreement. In conformity with the requirements of the constitution, and the requirements of the Railway Act, persons wanting to construct a railway connecting any part of Canada with another country, or which would be interprovincial, have to get a charter from this parliament. The charter they obtain from parliament does not give them rights in any property. It merely gives them the capacity to exercise the powers of a railway company in accordance with the Railway Act. In 1947, when these applicants were given a railway charter, it was expressly provided that, although they would have the capacity to operate a railway outside Canada, we were not giving them the right to operate one. We were just creating them as a corporation which would have the capacity to operate a railway in Newfoundland territory if it secured permission from Newfoundland to do so. We could not give them any rights in Newfoundland territory, but we could give them the capacity of a corporate body which might receive from the government of Newfoundland the right and privilege of operating a railway there.

With respect to the hon. member's reference to subsection 4 of section 27, I think it might be better to deal with that when we come to section 27. It is something that is not designed to apply to that railway at all, but to enable the government of the province of Newfoundland to respect any agreements it may have made with any company, and to provide that it will not be required in making a tax agreement to impose taxes upon corporations with whom it may have an agreement not to do so. The hon. member will remember that, in the tax agreements with them, the Canadian provinces were required to impose a five per cent tax on the income of corporations derived from business transacted within their limits. The Newfoundland delegation said, "We have certain agreements whereby we have commuted the taxes of commercial corporations." They said that they did not want to enter into an agreement that would require them to commit a breach of any previous agreement. Subsection 4 of section 27 was put in for that purpose, but it was not contemplated in any way that it would apply to running rights that may have been granted by the government of Newfoundland, over territory of Newfoundland, to this railway company that was incorporated by parliament in 1947.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to say something further about this same subject, namely, the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador railway, but it does seem to me that the Prime Minister is right, that it hardly comes in here. Perhaps we can discuss it under section 37, which has to do with natural resources, or at least on some section more appropriate than this one.

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps it could be brought in incidentally under subsection 4 of section 27, which refers to agreements made by the government of Newfoundland. My view is that this subsection was not specifically designated to affect the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador company, but it may be there were contracts that are still in existence, and to which the language of subsection 4 could apply.

Mr. Knowles: I should be glad to leave it until we reach that section.

Mr. Nicholson: I should like to have the ear of the Minister of Transport for a few minutes. He was not present yesterday when I raised the problem of transportation in Newfoundland. I drew attention to part II of the report of meetings between the two delegations, which mentions that in connection with the railway it will cost approximately a million dollars a year for the next ten years to place the railway in condition, and $7 million for rolling stock. There is a note to the effect that the deficit for 1944-45 amounted to $525,000, and for 1945-46 it amounted to $698,000.

Mr. St. Laurent: Would the hon. member permit me to say that I think he should probably wait until we are dealing with paragraph (a) of section 31 which refers in terms to the Newfoundland railway, the taking over of that railway, and the carrying on of its operations by the Canadian government.

Mr. Nicholson: The financial aspects are really what I wanted to discuss. The Minister of Finance gave a very low estimate. The Minister of Finance gave an early estimate, I would think, in the light of past performance, and the Minister of Transport was not here yesterday when I mentioned that freight rates in Newfoundland are about twice as high as in the maritimes. In this report I find that the present rate on whale oil from St. John's to Moncton is $1.25, while the projected rate under the Maritime Freight Rates Act is 60 cents. The rates on whale guano are $1.25 and 60 cents; on lingon berries, $1.65 and 90 cents; on cod fillets, $1.40 and 75 cents. The same thing applies to commodities moving to St. John's. The rate on fresh meat from Moncton is $1.24, and the new rate will be 73 cents. The rate on condensed milk is $1.58, and the new rate will be $1. I also understand that present wages in Newfoundland are a good deal lower than in Canada, and that they are to be brought up to Canadian rates. I wonder if the Minister of Transport will indicate how the estimate of one and a half million dollars was reached.

Mr. Abbott: I said that was an early estimate, and we must not be held too closely to it. That estimate was made in 1947. As yet we have made no estimate beyond that which I gave today.

Mr. Nicholson: I think the minister revised his figures yesterday. I believe some member of the government should bring us up to date and give us some idea of the situation. Before many weeks I imagine the Minister of Finance will have to bring supplementary estimates before the house, and I should think at this stage he would be able to give us some idea.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I can answer in a general way the questions the hon. gentleman has in mind. I believe he is raising three points now, though I did not see the questions he asked yesterday, and I am sorry I was not here at the time. In reference to the present financial position of the Newfoundland railway, the information we have at the moment is that it operates on a fiscal year basis, and that for the year 1948 there is a deficit of something in the neighbourhood of $2,200,000; and that if the Canadian National Railways were to take it over under the terms of section 31, because of the increased cost of materials, the increased wages and other incidentals in connection with the Newfoundland railway, the deficit would be in the neighbourhood of $3 million, perhaps $2,800,000 odd.

Then the hon. gentleman asked about the matter of wages. Unquestionably the wages of the employees of the Newfoundland railway will be brought up to the level of those of the Canadian National Railways.

He also asked some questions in reference to rates. I am unable to go into the detailed rate structure, which would be a matter of some length and would require a great deal of technical knowledge. I can tell him, however, that it is the intention to apply to the new province of Newfoundland the same basic rate structure which now applies to the maritime region. In other words, the basic rate structure which exists today in the three maritime provinces would be made applicable to the province of Newfoundland. That would mean, I should think, a considerable decrease in those rates. What it may be in the way of percentage it is difficult to say, because there are hundreds and even thousands of rates. The Canadian National Railways, were they to take over the Newfoundland railway, would file with the board of transport commissioners the basic rate structure for the island, and thereafter anyone who felt discriminated against could make an application to the board in accordance with the terms of the Railway Act and have his case adjudicated upon. I am informed upon fairly good authority that rates will be substantially lower than they are in Newfoundland at the present time.

I think I have covered the main points raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. Nicholson: I wonder if the $3 million deficit mentioned by the minister included the proposed expenditure of $1 million a year for ten years on improving the road. I believe the expenditure of $10 million over a ten-year period is mentioned in order to put the line in better shape.

Mr. Chevrier: No; this is an operating deficit only.

Mr. Nicholson: On the basis of the lower rates or on the basis of the prevailing rates?

Mr. Chevrier: I would think it would be on the basis of the rates that will be made applicable after union. When my hon. friend refers to the expenditure over a period of some years, there is provision for capital expenditure in 1949 by the Canadian National Railways of $925,000 for equipment already ordered by the Newfoundland railway, and $500,000 for additions and betterments.

Mr. Nicholson: Two other items were not mentioned by the Minister of Finance in his estimate of expenditures. The first was unemployment benefits. On page 63 of the report and documents I notice this provision:

> Residents of Newfoundland in insurable employment who lose their employment within six months prior to the date of union and are still unemployed at that date, or who lose their employment within a six months' period after that date, will be entitled for a period of six months from the date of union or six months from the date of unemployment, whichever is the later, to assistance on the same scale and under the same conditions as unemployment insurance benefits. The rates of payment will be based on the individual's wage record for the three months preceding his loss of employment. The cost of this assistance will be borne directly out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose and not out of the unemployment insurance fund.

Mr. Abbott: If the hon. gentleman had listened to my statement, in the figures I gave a little earlier this afternoon I mentioned a figure of $2 million for unemployment assistance.

Mr. Nicholson: A further question was asked by the hon. member for Eglinton as to the estimated cost of national defence. I notice according to the press that while in Washington the Prime Minister plans to discuss the taking over of the United States bases in Newfoundland. At a meeting I heard the Minister of Finance address in Wolfville, I remember he said that the cost of defence is going up, and that every time we take three hundred men into the service we have an additional expenditure of around $1 million a year. I wonder if the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister would indicate the estimated expenditures for defence.

Mr. Abbott: I cannot give any separate item for defence. The additional expenditures for defence in Newfoundland are included under the heading of departmental expenditures of $22 million which I gave a moment ago.

Mr. Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I should like to have some information about a loan made to Newfoundland in 1931 or 1932 and guaranteed by the government of Canada. If my memory is correct, in 1931 or 1932, under the administration of Mr. Bennett, the government of Newfoundland arranged a loan of $625,000 from four banks, the Bank of Montreal, the Royal Bank of Canada, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and the Bank of Nova Scotia, which loan was guaranteed by Canada. Is that loan still outstanding, or what has happened to it?

Mr. Abbott: I shall have to verify this, but I do not think it is still in existence; I believe it has been paid off. If such a loan were in existence, of course it would be a dollar loan and would be taken over by the province of Newfoundland; but I think I am correct in saying it has been paid off. Yes; it is no longer in existence.

Mr. Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Then in a letter addressed to the governor of Newfoundland by Mr. Mackenzie King, then Prime Minister, on October 29, I read this:

> I feel I must emphasize that as far as the financial aspects of the proposed arrangements for union are concerned, the government of Canada believes that the arrangements go as far as the government can go under the circumstances. The government could not readily contemplate any change in these arrangements which would impose larger financial burdens on Canada.

Would the Minister of Finance be kind enough to tell me what is the difference between the offer made prior to October 29 and the burden we are assuming at the present time.

Mr. Abbott: To answer my hon. friend briefly, the difference is the increase in the transitional grant by approximately $3,500,000 in the first year and on a descending scale. There is a total over-all increase of $16,500,000 spread over twelve years and disappearing at the end of the twelfth year.

Mr. Raymond (Beauharnois - Laprairie): That is the only difference?

Mr. Abbott: Yes; that is the only difference.

Mr. Low: A fairly substantial aggregate of United States dollars must each year be spent in Newfoundland. The payrolls at the United States bases themselves would be fairly large, I would think. To whom is the United States dollar exchange now going? Is it going to the Newfoundland commission of government or to the government of Great Britain?

Mr. Abbott: It is now and always has been available to Canada. As my hon. friend is probably aware, the banking systems of Newfoundland and Canada are interlocked. The commercial banks in Newfoundland are Canadian banks. Our foreign exchange control board is operative in Newfoundland. Canada has provided Newfoundland with its requirements of United States dollars out of the common pool.

Mr. Stephenson: Has the government made any rough estimate of the total cost to Canada of taking over all the public service works and property and establishing the necessary governmental offices in Newfoundland?

Mr. Abbott: A little earlier this afternoon I gave to the hon. member for Rosedale the best estimate we can make of the dominion governmental expenditures in Newfoundland. With the reservation which I made, we have set this for the initial period at some $50 million. The regular departmental expenditures for post offices, customs, administration of family allowances, trade and commerce and other governmental activities are included in those figures. I am unable to give my hon. friend any detailed information now; but as I indicated yesterday, detailed supplementary estimates, setting out what is expected will be required for the provision of dominion government services in Newfoundland, will be tabled probably on or about March 31.

Mr. MacNicol: I want to make an observation arising out of the remarks made by the Minister of Transport. I do not do so by way of criticism, because I feel that the Newfoundland railway must be accepted as it is. Acting through the minister's department, which will be directing the railway company that operates the road for Canada, our duty will be to make an accurate survey, as speedily as possible, of what must be done on the road from St. John's to Port aux Basques to put it into better shape for operating speedier and better trains. For a year or two we would not be able to say much about the railway. I would hope the minister would ask the Canadian National Railways, when they become the authority for operating the road, to follow up that problem in a businesslike way, and make a thorough survey of all that is required to give the railway a chance to exist and to make some returns. It cannot do so today because it is in a run-down condition.

Mr. Chevrier: I can tell my hon. friend that a preliminary survey has been made by two of the outstanding engineers of the Canadian National Railways who went down there and made a report. I have that report. It gives a general idea of the present position. It was from that report that I was able to give some of the information to the hon. member for Mackenzie. I agree, however, that a more complete report might be required after the railway is taken over. The report I have was one that was obtained for the purpose of ascertaining what the position of the railway was, the condition of the equipment, the stations, the line, and so on. My hon. friend knows that it is a smaller-gauge railway than the Canadian National railways. But he can rest assured that a more exhaustive report will be obtained of necessity.

Section agreed to.

Mr. Bentley: May I have your permission, Mr. Chairman, to revert to section 17 for a moment? It would save my making observations on the third reading of the bill if I were permitted to do so now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Bentley: I mentioned this matter before when we were on the section, and I pointed out that I was not satisfied with certain parts of it. Since then I have studied the replies the Prime Minister gave at that time. The Prime Minister pointed out that it was the wish of the Newfoundland delegates that the educational system of the new province be left in the hands of the denominational churches. As I pointed out at that time, this system is quite different from that in the other provinces. It was emphasized also by the Prime Minister—and I notice in the bulletin put out by the Department of External Affairs that it is their interpretation of it—that it cannot be changed by any future legislature unless the denominations themselves request it. That being so, it seems to me that Canada is being a party to an agreement which might become abhorrent to some future legislative body of that province, which body will be unable to deal with it. I do not want it to be taken that I have any disrespect for the clergy or the churches. I do not want anyone to think that I am protesting against any one church. I do not have any disrespect for them. On the contrary, I have a great deal of respect for a great many of them. I am heartily in support of everything that has been said about freedom of worship for the people, and all that. But I also want to point out that there have been times in the history of the world when narrow and bigoted churchmen have attempted, successfully for long periods of time, interference with educational processes, particularly where their ideas came into conflict with new scientific discoveries or pronouncements.

A report written by an investigator from Britain indicates that 60 per cent of the people engaged in some industries are unable to sign the payroll. This is not a flattering record for the people in charge of education to look back on. The statutory protection which under this agreement the denominations have against anything that might be displeasing to any future legislation is extremely powerful. It is practically impossible to change it unless by recourse to the courts. What I want to point out is this. As nearly as I can find out from the answers to the questions that I and others have asked, the legislature will have practically no control over education. What department or division of some department is to have control over education there? Who is to have the authority to lay down a curriculum for the schools? If some such body has that authority, is it to have the right to enforce the curriculum in all the schools? Will there be compulsory attendance at the schools, as we have in the other provinces, of children of certain ages to be taught under that curriculum? If these things are not to be done, it is possible that much latent talent in Newfoundland will not be developed to the point where the people concerned may make their full contribution to Canadian life.

Again I come back to the position I took before. It does not seem to me that Canada should be a party to an agreement which will sew things up in statute law for all time. I do not oppose the entry of Newfoundland into the confederation, because I believe it is a necessary thing; but I do believe that our government, the future government of Newfoundland, and the British government, all of whom are concerned or should be concerned, should be consulted with a view to changing this section so that the children of Newfoundland will have the same educational opportunities that are available in the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. St. Laurent: So that there may be no misunderstanding abroad I think I should correct the misapprehension under which the hon. member seems to be labouring. If he will read section 17 he will find that there are none of the dangers that he seemed to be deploring. The control over education is left completely in the hands of the legislature of Newfoundland, the legislature which exists at the present time and the legislatures which may come into being in the future. The only restriction on their power to legislate is that their legislation shall not discriminate against the denominational schools. At the present time the curricula for the schools in Newfoundland are prescribed by their department of education. I do not know whether that is its exact name, but they have a department of the commission of government, and before that they had a department of government responsible to the legislature, which has the administration of the schools. The system in Newfoundland differs from that existing in the older Canadian provinces, inasmuch as there is very little municipal organization. The schools are directly administered by the central government. The restriction provided here is not that that government, or the legislature to which it will be responsible, could not set up other schools. Under this provision it would have the right to set up any other kinds of schools that it saw fit to set up. The only provision is that if that happens the grants made for education will be distributed in such a way as not to discriminate against the denominational schools.

Mr. Bentley: If other schools were set up by the legislature, would the denominational schools have to follow the same curriculum as that laid down for those other schools?

Mr. St. Laurent: I think that would depend upon the laws and regulations made by the department of education. At the present time the department of government which has control of the schools prescribes the curricula for all schools. I see nothing in this section which would prevent that from being done, unless they attempted to prescribe a curriculum that would exclude religious instruction. If they did that, they would probably be doing something prejudicial to the denominational schools as they exist at the present time; because if they are denominational schools I would imagine, though I have not examined the curricula, that there would be some provision for religious instruction.

Mr. Bentley: The Prime Minister says that the legislature should not do anything that would prevent religious education from being given in any school. Suppose in a community in which there was a particular religious denomination a school was in operation, and within that community a child or a few children of some other denomination would have to attend that school because it was the only one in the community; must they be subjected to religious education that might be abhorrent to their fathers and mothers, and eventually to themselves?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not know what happens at the present time. We were informed that no trouble whatsoever is being experienced at the present time. I do not know whether under the regulations all the children attending the school are compelled to take all the courses or lessons which are given in that school. The information we have is that they have never had any trouble in that regard, and that they merely wished to continue to have the right to have denominational schools and to get their fair share of any moneys that were distributed for the maintenance of schools; but the legislature should have the right to set up other schools if it was felt by the members of the legislature that it was desirable to do so.

The hon. member referred to compulsory attendance. There is nothing in this section which to my mind can be considered as prejudicing the rights of any religious denomination to see that all children must attend school. It may very well be that in Newfoundland such a provision would be difficult to apply. I understand that outside of St. John's and Corner Brook, where there is concentrated a substantial proportion of the population, the population is distributed in more than 1,300 small hamlets. They have schools, as many as the government felt it could afford. They are schools established under this government system whereby the cost is provided by the central government.

Mr. Bentley: I thank the Prime Minister for his reply. I still think that the situation should be carefully watched and reviewed again. I believe the Prime Minister has been honest, honourable and sincere in his reply. I still do not think the system is as good a system as the Canadian provinces have.

Mr. St. Laurent: That will be a matter for the people of Newfoundland to settle themselves according to their views.

Mr. Bentley: But to this extent we are becoming a party to the agreement.

Mr. St. Laurent: The only thing to which we are becoming a party is the writing into the constitution of a guarantee that the rights of denominational schools not to be discriminated against will be preserved.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 24 carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): No. I should like to ask a question on paragraph (a) of subsection 2 of section 24. As I understand it, the basis of this paragraph is that one-third of the surplus is set aside and is to be used to supplement income over the eight-year period.

Mr. Abbott: That was put in at the request of the Newfoundland delegation. According to last estimates, the surplus expressed in terms of Canadian dollars, will be $26,243,035.06. That is being retained by the province of Newfoundland. In view of the difficulty of accurately estimating provincial revenues and provincial finances generally, the Newfoundland delegation felt it would be wise to insert in the terms of union a provision that one-third of the surplus should be kept during the period available for possible deficits in current operations. The remaining two-thirds is available for capital expenditure or development, or whatever may be desired. The representatives of Newfoundland themselves suggested that that condition should be inserted in the terms of union.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Am I right in assuming that a calculation was made, and that figures were available showing at what rate it would likely be used up?

Mr. Abbott: No; the figure would not indicate the rate at which it would be used up. It was contemplated that certainly in the early years there would be deficits, and it was believed that this sum at any rate should be held available for that purpose.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not wish to be persistent. Perhaps I might change my question somewhat. Were there or were there not figures, produced perhaps by the Newfoundland people themselves, which would have suggested that that amount would be in fact used up before the termination of the eight-year period?

Mr. Abbott: The figures submitted by the Newfoundland delegation during the course of the discussions did indicate that probably there would be deficits in the early years. I would not be prepared to say however that this one-third would be exhausted at a particular time; and I do not think the estimates submitted by the Newfoundland delegation would necessarily indicate that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Again, if in fact—and this was my understanding—figures were produced showing that this would be used up in anticipated deficits before the end of the eight-year period, what would happen then?

Mr. Abbott: After all, two-thirds of the surplus is available for any purpose, including the taking care of deficits. It does not have to be used for capital expansion, or any other purpose. But it was felt by the Newfoundlanders themselves that, perhaps as a safeguard against a too rapid expenditure of this $26 million surplus, at least one-third of it should be set aside for the purposes I have indicated.

Mr. Hazen: I suppose the public services referred to are those which would come within the jurisdiction of the provinces, under section 92 of the British North America Act. It would not include wharves or lighthouses?

Mr. Abbott: No; my hon. friend is correct in his assumption. What is contemplated here is a possible deficit in the early stages in provincial budgets, from the provision of services falling within the constitutional responsibility of the new province. It would not relate to services which have to be taken care of out of federal votes.

Mr. Jackman: I do not quite understand this provision. I presume, in the first instance, it is placed in the agreement at the request of the delegation from Newfoundland. No doubt there are different points of view in Newfoundland, and also different points of view in the delegation itself. Newfoundland finds itself in possession of $26 million; and there is a fear on the part of some that whatever group formed the first government in the province might be tempted to spend the money all at one time.

What do these various provisions mean by way of restriction upon that possibility, if I am correct in my assumption? Does it mean that one-third of the money will be available to the first provincial government in Newfoundland, at the rate of one-eighth per year, or can they draw it all in one year for expenditures on current account, to facilitate the maintenance and improvement of Newfoundland public services? Then, paragraph (b) states that they may draw two-thirds for either capital or current expenditures. I do not understand exactly what paragraph (a) means. Is there a restriction that they can draw only one-eighth of one-third of this surplus each year, or what is the meaning? How does the restriction work out?

Mr. Abbott: There is no limitation such as the hon. member has suggested. The only limitation, and the only effect of subsection (2) (a), is that the one-third of the surplus to which I have referred can be used only during the eight-year period for the purpose of meeting possible current deficits. It could all be used in the first year, if that were desired by the provincial government. There is no requirement that it be spread over that period.

As my hon. friend will realize, this was not a section in which Canada was primarily interested. We had no objection to it, of course; but we had no special interest in it.

Mr. Jackman: The only restriction is that one-third of the money must not be used on capital account during the first eight years.

Mr. Abbott: I think that is a correct statement of the fact.

Section agreed to.

Sections 25 and 26 agreed to.

On section 27—Tax agreement.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I again earnestly seek to impress upon the Prime Minister the desirability of giving consideration to the effect of the last part of section 27 (2). As he pointed out, the limitation on the review of a tax agreement would relate to the exercise by Newfoundland of the option to have its tax payments cover a period of eight years.

To simplify the explanation given by the Prime Minister, it would seem to me that what he suggested was that, if Newfoundland was to have the advantage of this longer period of subsidy payments, it should not be open to them to have a reconsideration. I believe that argument might conceivably have some validity, if the payments over the eight-year period were on a higher level than in the shorter period. But the fact is that the subsidy payments are at the same level for either period.

That being so, it does not seem to me that Newfoundland gains anything more or gets anything less by extending the period. It seems to me Newfoundland should be in precisely the same position as any other province, at the time these tax agreements would ordinarily terminate, to have their position reviewed along with the others. I would think that, although at the present time they might take the eight-year option, the inclusion of such a limitation might well cause difficulties at the end of three years.

I would remind hon. members that in spite of the repeated suggestions outside, and the suggestion made not so often in the house since I have been here, that it was only the province of Ontario, with a certain amount of support from the province of Quebec, that objected to the tax proposals, the fact is that the premier of Nova Scotia, at the time the Nova Scotia legislature was finally called upon to accept these terms, made it perfectly clear that the government of that province would not renew the present tax agreement. He made it perfectly clear that there must be a review of taxation, or there would be no continuance; and that he was doing it only as a temporary measure. I believe the premier of Alberta has been equally clear in the matter, stating that the present arrangement is not satisfactory from their point of view. To use the exact words of the premier of Nova Scotia: The government has not seen the last of my bonnets and me.

That being so, I think it is only inviting unnecessary dispute and discussion at the end of the three-year period the agreements will have to run for those provinces which have signed them if, in the terms given to a tenth province, there is a limitation which would apply to their acceptance of a longer period. I would point out to hon. members that it is unlikely such an option would have been included, unless there had been a suggestion that it was desired. Obviously there must have been something to suggest this different arrangement with Newfoundland, and there would seem to be some likelihood that this option will be exercised. If it is exercised and if we are to take the word of Premier Macdonald and Premier Manning of Alberta, to say nothing of the fact that at the time there was such a discussion the other provinces would be considered, then I think it is most important that the province of Newfoundland should be free at that time to discuss without restraint or restriction the revision of their relationship with the dominion government in regard to the adjustment of taxes.

Mr. St. Laurent: The leader of the opposition suggests that Newfoundland should be in the same position as the other provinces. They can be in that position if they so wish. It was represented to us that three years was not a very long period and that the transitional requirements would not have been covered. It was thought that for greater security they might want to be sure that for at least eight years they could have the terms of the tax agreement. We told them that, if they wished to have that, they would have the option of taking it; but if they took the security, if they made a bargain for eight years, it would be a firm bargain. We did not think that we should give them the right to have it extended for a period of eight years and also give them the benefit of having it revised if we were making any other kind of agreement with any of the other provinces.

We said: If you want a firm deal for a period of eight years we will not ask you to take an option, but after you have a government with a legislature to which it is responsible and that government and that legislature wish to have a deal made in a firm fashion for eight years, we will not object. If, however, you make a deal for eight years, you should realize that you will not be entitled to a review. They said: Does that mean that there will not be any possibility of making a revision? We told them: There will not be any right to require a revision to be made, but if it is felt at that time that one is in order it can be made, provided the government of the day takes the responsibility of recommending the modification to parliament.

The leader of the opposition knows that, under the present tax agreement with the seven provinces, if something is granted to one as a right it is acquired by the other six. That is the thing against which we provided by this option. We said: If you want to make a firm agreement it will be the kind of agreement that will not automatically give you what any other province may get under a new bargain. It may very well be that if my hon. friends are over here or if we are still here, another arrangement might be made with the provinces which would also extend to Newfoundland, and the government of the day would take the responsibility of recommending to parliament the consequential appropriation. It seems to us that if the new government of Newfoundland, responsible to its legislature, wanted to make a firm contract for a period, it should be a firm contract.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. St. Laurent: May I supplement the information that I gave about schools. I have been informed that, under the legislation as it exists in Newfoundland, compulsory attendance is required by children of school age, but if a child is not of the same denomination as the school he does not have to remain in the school while religious instruction is being given.

Mr. Knowles: What are you carrying, the whole section or just the subsection?

The Deputy Chairman: Section 27, tax agreement.

Mr. Abbott: We have completed the purely financial sections and I had hoped that it might be possible to conclude those and pass on to some others in order that I might attend a meeting of treasury board which I arranged for this afternoon. I think there is another section under which the railroad could be discussed. If that meets the convenience of the committee, it would be an accommodation to myself.

Mr. Knowles: That is quite satisfactory to me provided you do a good job at treasury board, particularly on behalf of the superannuated civil servants. I would be glad to ask what I want to ask under section 31 or section 37.

Mrs. Strum: If the existing schools cannot accommodate the pupils and new schools are required on the island, what provision will there be for needed educational facilities?

Mr. St. Laurent: Nothing in this provision would hamper in any way the legislature of Newfoundland in establishing as many new schools as the condition of the province would require.

Mr. Castleden: Subsection 1 of section 27 reads:

> The government of Canada will forthwith after the date of union take an offer to the government of the province of Newfoundland to enter into a tax agreement for the rental to the government of Canada of the income, corporation income, and corporation tax fields, and the succession duties tax field.

Subsection 4 reads:

> The government of the province of Newfoundland shall not by any agreement entered into pursuant to this term be required to impose on any person or corporation taxation repugnant to the provisions of any contract entered into with such person or corporation before the date of the agreement and subsisting at the date of the agreement.

Does that mean that, if the federal government wished to enter into an agreement with the province with regard to income or corporation taxes, they would be prevented from doing so if no corporation or income tax were imposed at the present time?

Mr. Abbott: I answered that question yesterday in indicating that when Newfoundland becomes a province of Canada its residents will be subject to Canadian law, including the taxation law.

Mr. Castleden: That seems contrary to the provisions of subsection 4.

Mr. Abbott: The Prime Minister explained a little earlier this afternoon, when perhaps the hon. member was not present, that that was inserted in order to provide that the new provincial government of Newfoundland would not be obliged to breach any contracts which might have been entered into by the colonial or dominion government with respect to the matters referred to in that section. My hon. friend will recall that, under the agreements with the seven provinces in connection with income and corporation taxes, those provinces are required to impose a five per cent corporation tax on corporations within the provinces. In view of this section, that provision would not be applicable to Newfoundland.

Mr. Coldwell: That would not preclude Newfoundland from doing anything of its own volition?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Coldwell: This simply provides that the dominion government will not require Newfoundland to do something. There are certain contracts that were made in Newfoundland some years ago under which great concessions were given to certain corporations that pay hardly any taxes at all. This would not prevent Newfoundland dealing with that situation?

Mr. Abbott: No, not at all. I think I said yesterday that the effect of this agreement would be to preserve the legal rights between contracting parties. The dominion government is not requiring the government of Newfoundland to do anything which would be a breach of a statute or of an agreement entered into with that government.

Mr. Coldwell: But Newfoundland itself?

Mr. Abbott: Newfoundland is perfectly free to do as it pleases.

Mr. Coldwell: If the courts hold it cannot do it, that is a different matter. As far as we are concerned, we are not forcing them to do anything, but they can of their own volition try to do what seems best to them?

Mr. Abbott: Right.

Mr. Castleden: Canada reserves the right to carry on corporation taxes after the agreement?

Mr. Abbott: Right.

Mr. Drew: Is it not correct that under the agreements that have now been signed with seven of the provinces they are required to impose certain taxation as a part of the terms?

Mr. Abbott: Correct, yes.

Mr. Drew: As I understand it, a provision to that effect was incorporated to avoid any possibility of a constitutional dispute as to whether the tax was being imposed within the provincial or the federal field. The provinces actually collect it, but it does not affect the total that is received by the dominion government before the subsidy payments are returned to the provinces. As I read this section it would mean that, although the dominion government undertakes to pay subsidies in accordance with the same terms that have been signed by certain provinces, the provincial government in this case might not be in a position to carry out the same undertaking other provinces are called upon to give in regard to the imposition of certain taxes.

Mr. Abbott: That is possible. Of course, as my hon. friend appreciates, that provision was inserted in the agreements with the seven provinces in order to assure that as far as possible corporation taxpayers in non-agreeing provinces would not be prejudiced. That was the sole purpose of including that provision in the agreements with the seven provinces. The agreements contain a provision that the dominion may at any time require those provinces to repeal the five per cent corporation tax. My hon. friend is quite right in saying that the net effect is that the provinces do not retain any more money. In fact, the dominion government gets the 35 per cent rate as a result of the combined effect of the federal tax and the provincial tax.

Mr. Drew: Does the minister know what the actual effect of this is?

Mr. Abbott: The actual effect of this provision?

Mr. Drew: Of subsection 4.

Mr. Abbott: The actual effect of subsection 4 would be—

Mr. Drew: I am talking about the practical effect.

Mr. Abbott: The practical effect is that the dominion government imposes at present rates a 30 per cent tax on corporations, but in the case of Newfoundland, if the province so requested, we would not impose upon them an obligation to collect a corporation tax, let us say of five per cent, as in the case of the seven other provinces, which would involve a breach of covenants that predecessor governments may have entered into with corporations or others in that field. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has pointed out, no restriction is placed upon what the new Newfoundland government does in this connection. But, to put it rather colloquially, we would not impose, as a condition of getting a tax agreement with the dominion, that they must breach a contract which they may have entered into prior to union.

Mr. Drew: When I spoke of the practical effect, I meant, does the minister know whether there are cases where this will have a definite result? After all, the type of companies that would be affected must be fairly well known.

Mr. Abbott: Yes. Although we have not examined them in great detail we know that there are outstanding agreements, some of them confirmed by statute, whereby income tax exemptions are granted to certain corporations in consideration of a fixed annual payment. We know that there are agreements, some of them confirmed by statute, which give customs duty exemptions. The effects of this clause is that if the government of the new province of Newfoundland came to the dominion government and said, "We wish to have a tax agreement along the lines indicated in this section, but because of arrangements which we have entered into with certain corporations we do not wish to be obliged to impose the five per cent corporation tax on them", they would not be obliged to do so. To that extent the dominion government might lose the five per cent in respect of the corporations with which Newfoundland has entered into contracts.

Mr. Coldwell: Suppose at some time we required the seven provinces, or any one of them, to discontinue the five per cent tax, and we increased our own tax from 30 to 35 per cent; then the tax would apply to Newfoundland as well as to the other provinces?

Mr. Abbott: Quite so.

Mr. Coldwell: It would be uniform throughout?

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: In no way would it vary that?

Mr. Abbott: No way whatever. I want to make it perfectly clear that the dominion government under the arrangement retains complete freedom with respect to its fiscal policies as they will apply to any resident of Newfoundland who becomes a Canadian citizen.

Mr. Probe: Without exception?

Mr. Abbott: I make that statement without any qualification whatever.

Mr. Knowles: Is it likely that the agreement with Newfoundland, in the same way as the agreements that have been made with the other provinces, may include a requirement to impose a five per cent corporation tax on corporations in the province that do not have such a contract?

Mr. Abbott: I prefer not to answer a hypothetical question of that kind at this time. As my hon. friend appreciates, it involves a question of fiscal policy. I hope I have made the legal position clear. I think it is a fair and proper stand for the dominion government to take. When I say that we retain complete freedom to determine our federal taxation policy with respect to residents of Newfoundland, as with every other province, I think that should be assurance to the committee that parliament will be perfectly free to decide these questions in whatever way it thinks proper.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister know whether the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador Railway Company has that kind of contract with Newfoundland?

Mr. Abbott: Certainly the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador Railway Company has no such contract with respect to income tax. It may have some special arrangement with respect to customs duties. Incidentally, that will become much less valuable after union because substantial importations, which were subject to customs duties, were made from Canada, and after union they will be free of duty.

Mr. Knowles: That would be true of the customs provisions, but respecting corporation taxes, in the case of a company operating into the Ungava iron-ore field, the amount involved might be quite substantial.

Mr. Abbott: There is, I repeat, absolutely no limitation on the government under the terms of agreement with respect to the rate of corporation tax which it charges anywhere in the Dominion of Canada, including Newfoundland, if it becomes a province.

Mr. Knowles: It is very hard to discuss this matter without getting into the questions I have in mind about the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador Railway Company, but I will try at this time to stick to the taxation aspect of it. This parliament, over our vote, passed chapter 80 of the statutes of 1947 incorporating the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador Railway, and enabling it to go up into the north country to the border of Labrador. If, on the basis of the rights and privileges this parliament gave to it, that railway company has in turn secured a special contract with Newfoundland which becomes of particular value when Newfoundland becomes a province of Canada, under subsection 4 it does seem to me it is a matter of importance.

Mr. Abbott: The dominion government is not bound by the terms of any contracts entered into between the government of Newfoundland and the railway company to which my hon. friend has referred, although it may have secured its charter from this house.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think I might add that the Newfoundland delegation gave us a list of all companies that had any such privileges. The railway company referred to by the hon. member is not in that list. There are in the list the Labrador Mining Company and the Labrador Railway Company, but only with respect to exemption from duties on articles imported for the construction of their physical plants.

Mr. Knowles: Can we be supplied with those lists? Can they be placed on Hansard tomorrow?

Mr. St. Laurent: The list of the companies that were mentioned to us as having obtained certain concessions in the past?

Mr. Knowles: Right.

Mr. St. Laurent: I will have a list made.

Mr. Coldwell: And what those concessions were, because the point I have in my mind is that Newfoundland is a country which will require some assistance from Canada. That is obvious from this agreement. It is also obvious from the agreement that its recovery may be somewhat prolonged. If a very large number of corporations are relieved of a portion of the corporation income tax, which is not to be levied by Newfoundland, of course that is a matter of concern to this parliament, and I think we should know what we are doing in this regard. If my information is correct, some corporations have made agreements with previous Newfoundland governments under which they pay practically no taxes whatever. That brings up two points: first, the aid they will have to get from this parliament, and second the position it places them vis-à-vis our own similar corporations, if there are any in Canada. That is the point.

Mr. Abbott: I repeat that we are perfectly free to collect from the corporations to which my hon. friend refers exactly the same amount of taxes we collect from any other corporations; and if Newfoundland makes a tax agreement it will receive exactly the same amount. As my hon. friend himself indicated, if we saw fit we could ask the seven provinces to repeal this five per cent tax, and I may say there would be some advantages in doing that. It was put on solely and for no other reason than to prevent taxpayers in other provinces being prejudiced as a result of the arrangements made with seven provinces in which there would be no provincial corporation tax; and in the two presently non-concurring provinces we allow a deduction from corporation taxes of up to five per cent. It is beyond the bounds of possibility that in a rearrangement of the position it might be desirable to have uniformity, but that is a matter which would have to be considered in due course. This provision cannot prejudice in any way either the province of Newfoundland or the Dominion of Canada unless this parliament should see fit to do so.

Section agreed to.

Sections 28 to 30 inclusive agreed to.

On section 31—Public services, works and property.

Mr. Knowles: It was suggested that I might ask my questions in reference to the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador Railway Company under section 31, since it mentions the Newfoundland railway and other undertakings similar thereto. I should like to ask what is the effect, both legal and practical, of the adoption of these terms of union on the provisions of chapter 80 of the statutes of 1947. That was the act which incorporated the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador Railway Company. That act gave the company pretty wide powers, rights and privileges. It can build a railway right up to the border of Labrador and, if it secured permission from Newfoundland, could go on into Labrador. In addition to the right to build a railway it was given certain other associated rights, such as the right to develop electric and other kinds of power; the right to set up a telegraph and telephone system, to operate steamships, wharves, docks, hotels, parks, motorcars, pipe lines for the transportation of oil, gas and so on. All told, the powers given that company in 1947 are quite extensive. In addition, when one realizes that the purpose of this railway is to tap an area extremely rich in a great natural resource, namely iron, it becomes readily apparent that the interests connected with this railway are given quite an entree into the development and exploitation of that wealth.

In the act we passed in 1947 there was this concluding section:

> 20. The works and undertakings of the company are hereby declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

That would seem to make the whole operation of that company, at least as far as Canada stood then, a federal matter. It seems to me that, when Newfoundland becomes a part of Canada, that section overrides any necessity on the part of the company to secure permission from Newfoundland to extend its operations into Labrador; and it would seem that the rights and privileges given this company in 1947 in the Canada of that day will now apply to Newfoundland as well. I should like an opinion from the government as to the effect the terms of union will have upon the provisions of chapter 80 of the statutes of 1947.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I should or could give an opinion as to what effect the terms of union might have on the exercise by this company of the powers it obtained by its charter. It would seem to me that they would have no effect. This company was incorporated as a railway company, and by virtue of that incorporation acquired the rights and privileges expressed in the charter, and also the right to exercise the powers granted to a railway company by the Railway Act within the territory that was then Canada. It may be that the company, if it wished to be governed by the provisions of the Railway Act for the whole of its operation, that is to say the portion in the former territory of Canada and the portion which might extend into Newfoundland, would have to get an amendment to its charter. There the law speaks all the time; but the powers under the Railway Act which were exercisable were powers only over lands in Canada; and whether the addition to the territory of Canada would extend the operation of the Railway Act to the new territory is a question about which there might be some serious argument.

I do not think it would make any change. There was no intent in parliament at that time to give them rights outside Canadian territory. They were merely given the capacity to acquire rights outside Canadian territory, and I should imagine they would have to acquire those rights as provided in the express terms of the charter.

Mr. Knowles: Since this does seem to be a matter of opinion I shall not prolong the discussion, except to say that as I read the act we passed in 1947 we gave that company rights in Canada. After the adoption of these terms of union Newfoundland is part of Canada. If I were counsel for the company I would claim that those rights thereby extended to Newfoundland, which would mean that the objectionable features of the bill we passed in 1947 would become that much more objectionable now.

Mr. St. Laurent: Or that much more desirable now, according to the point of view of the person considering it. The majority in this house considered that it was not objectionable but desirable; and if this measure extends it, then to those members who considered it desirable it would be that much more desirable, though to the hon. member who considered it objectionable it would have the opposite effect.

Mr. Knowles: Then I think the Prime Minister has answered my question, and this bill does extend the rights and privileges of this company into Newfoundland.

Mr. Claxton: No; I think the point is this. Under the terms of the charter of the company, as provided in chapter 80 of the statutes of 1947, the company was given the capacity of a railway company. Then it was given the right to operate a railway line in that part of the territory which then formed part of Canada. But this was subject to its obtaining the authority to operate the railway over that part of the territory which was in Newfoundland. That authority was obtained from the Newfoundland government, I am informed, so that the company now is fully clothed with the authority to carry on its operations. The province of Newfoundland will succeed the dominion of Newfoundland; so that, unless there is some development that one could not foresee, it looks as if the situation is as it was, as regards the operations of the company. It has no additional rights, but it has the rights it was given by a combination of Newfoundland and Canada.

Mr. Knowles: It worked out nicely for the company.

Mr. Timmins: When the matter was before the railway committee, as I remember, the group who were asking for the incorporation of the company stated that the company already had an agreement with Newfoundland with respect to the development of that part of the iron deposits which was in Labrador. Would it be appropriate at this time for the Prime Minister to tell us something about that agreement, whether it is binding upon Canada and what its effect will be in respect of the union we are putting through?

Mr. St. Laurent: I would imagine that this union would have no effect upon it whatsoever; because under the terms of this agreement the province of Labrador retains all its natural resources. The agreement, whether it was made by the commission of government or by the responsible government of Newfoundland before the commission of government, would continue to be binding upon the government of the province of Newfoundland. But the natural resources remain vested in the government of the province.

Mr. MacNicol: As I remember it, what we did in passing that bill in 1947 was to give the railway power to run a railway to the border of Labrador and Quebec, and we were informed that they had authority to run the railway on north from the border of Labrador and Quebec to develop the mines in the western part of Labrador. I do not understand the questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not believe that power applied to the whole of Newfoundland or to anything else than what the bill called for. As the province of Quebec has given the company the authority they require to operate in that part of Canada which is in the province of Quebec, that is their business. If Newfoundland gave them authority in connection with a few miles into Labrador not over fifty or sixty, I do not see where we are in much jeopardy in respect of this particular clause.

Mr. Nicholson: Section 31 states:

> At the date of union, or as soon thereafter as practicable, Canada will take over the following services and will as from the date of union relieve the province of Newfoundland of the public costs incurred in respect of each service taken over, namely . . .

As I mentioned previously, the newspapers indicate that while the Prime Minister is in Washington he is to have some discussions there with regard to the bases upon which the Americans have ninety-nine year leases. Would either the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence care to make some statement with regard to discussions which have taken place between Canada and Great Britain, or between Canada and the delegation, on the question of taking over these bases? The Americans have made large expenditures. If the newspaper reports are correct, that there is a disposition to take over those bases from the Americans, it will be necessary for either Canada or some other country to spend large sums of money in Newfoundland to maintain the present standard of living there as a result of these American expenditures. I think it would be helpful if the committee had some information with regard to the discussions which have taken place on this question.

Mr. St. Laurent: There have been no discussions whatsoever with the delegation about this matter, because it was felt that it was one over which neither the Newfoundland delegation nor the Canadian delegation could make any decision. Real rights had been created by the granting of ninety-nine year leases on certain sections of land. If and when Newfoundland becomes a part of Canada, those leases will still be valid leases affecting the lands described in them. They contain provisions which go beyond the provisions to which the Canadian government has agreed with respect to anything done by the United States government in the territory of Canada, and we hope that it will be possible to get the government of the United States to agree that it will not exercise those rights in a manner that would offend against our rights of sovereignty in Newfoundland. But that is something that will have to be brought about by negotiation and agreement with the government of the United States. The situation is the same as if the hon. member, having a farm, leased a building lot on it for ninety-nine years and then sold his farm. The acquirer would have to take the farm and respect the agreement the hon. member had made with regard to the building lot. But he could go to the man who had the lease on the building lot and try to make a new deal with him. That is what we intend to try to do with the government of the United States. But if they are not disposed to make any change in the arrangement, we shall be obliged to respect the rights that exist there, just as we shall be obliged to respect as a fact the existing situation in the territory of Newfoundland.

We have had preliminary negotiations with the state department, but we have not been in a position to do anything final in that regard because Newfoundland is still territory over which we have no control. Nothing definite can be determined unless and until we acquire control over the territory of Newfoundland.

Mr. Coldwell: Paragraph (g) of section 31 refers to protection and encouragement of fisheries and operation of bait services. How do these bait services differ from what we have in the maritime provinces? As far as I can remember, there are no federal bait services for the maritime fishermen. I may be wrong in that respect, but I do not think I am. What are those bait services that are referred to? Are they convenient services which the fishermen find valuable both economically and socially? Is this service the Newfoundland fisherman enjoys the kind of service that might be extended to the fishermen of the maritime coasts where, I believe, the provision of bait is, at some seasons of the year, extremely difficult? I have an idea that in Newfoundland there is being done something different from what is being done by the federal Department of Fisheries in the maritimes or in British Columbia. I should like to know just what this paragraph means.

Mr. St. Laurent: If the hon. member will read the statement that was made by the Minister of Fisheries yesterday, I think he will find the answer to that question.

Mr. Coldwell: I did not find the answer. That is why I asked the question.

Newfoundland

Mr. St. Laurent: As I understand it, there is in Newfoundland a system for the conservation of bait under cold storage conditions, which is more effective than anything we have in the maritime provinces. The question arose, and I think it is covered in the statement of the questions answered.

Mr. Coldwell: I heard the minister yesterday but I did not quite get the explanation I am now seeking.

Mr. St. Laurent: In the statement of questions raised by the Newfoundland delegation, one of the questions was whether or not in taking over the bait service it would be used exclusively for the Newfoundland fishermen, or would be made available to the fishermen of the maritimes. The answer to that question is given on page 9 of the questions raised by the Newfoundland delegation and reads as follows:

> The Canadian government will seek legislation or take such other steps as may be necessary to provide that the Newfoundland bait service will be taken over and operated without fundamental change by the Department of Fisheries. If, after the date of the union, changes are made for the benefit of Canada as a whole, the question of payment will be discussed between federal and provincial authorities.

This was going to be a federal service. If it was a federal service which had been provided out of moneys of Newfoundland, and if it was going to become a federal service for the benefit of the whole of Canada they should get some compensation for what they had invested in it. It was not possible to reach any final conclusion in that regard, but they were told that it would be the policy of this government to ask parliament to provide by legislation or otherwise, if under existing legislation it could be done, to continue to operate the bait service without any fundamental change, and that if in operating it we found that it could be of use to other Canadians then the question of a fair compensation to Newfoundland would be discussed.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, that is the interpretation I wanted to get. It is not intended that this would be charged back to the province or provinces if it is extended to the various provinces. It is the other way around.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is the other way around. If we use for the benefit of the other provinces something that they operate, then the question will arise as to whether we should not make some compensation to them because of the benefit that the other provinces will get.

Mr. Coldwell: That is the point I wanted to clear up.

Mr. Claxton: May I supplement that from the remarks which the Minister of Fisheries made yesterday and which appear on page 399 of Hansard. The minister said:

> There is in Newfoundland a bait-freezing service which I think is a better one than we have in Canada. We shall have to do something to improve ours so that it will be equal to Newfoundland's.

That is the point the hon. member had in mind.

Mr. Coldwell: That is the point.

Mr. MacNicol: May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you call each paragraph of section 31. I wanted to ask a few questions under some of these paragraphs.

Section 31 (a) agreed to.

On section 31 (b) and (c).

Mr. MacNicol: How does paragraph (b) of section 31 connect with paragraph (c) of section 33? If we pass paragraph (b) of section 31 as it is, will we then not have to do something with paragraph (c) of section 33?

Mr. St. Laurent: Section 33, paragraph (c) reads:

> The following public works and property of Newfoundland shall become the property of Canada when the service concerned is taken over by Canada, . . .

If the Newfoundland hotel is not taken over by Canada it will never become the property of Canada.

Mr. Knight: In section 31, paragraph (b), the Newfoundland hotel is the only item in which the arrangement is not definite. Will the minister explain the limitation of time?

Mr. St. Laurent: We do not propose to make any payment whatsoever for it. The government of Newfoundland will say whether they want to charge us with the burden of operating it or whether they think it is worth something and prefer to get it.

Mr. Knowles: Where is it?

Mr. St. Laurent: In St. John's. The information we had from the Canadian National Railways was that they would prefer not to have it, so that we were not willing to make any payment for it. But if the people of Newfoundland felt that they wanted us to have the responsibility of operating it as a railway hotel we would not refuse to accept it.

Mr. MacNicol: Paragraph (c) of section 31 refers to postal and publicly-owned telecommunication services. Are these services —the telephone, telegraphs and postal services—in the one building everywhere throughout the island?

Mr. St. Laurent: Not everywhere, but in a general way they are operated as one service. They are not entirely separate. Publicly-owned telecommunication services was the expression used to cover publicly-owned telegraphs and publicly-owned telephones; and at some points there are even, I understand, radio communications which are also publicly-owned.

Mr. Coldwell: Is this similar to the British system under which the post office operates the telegraphs?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. MacNicol: In places such as Corner Brook, which is a substantial community, or Grand Falls, or Curling and other substantial communities, would the telephone and telegraph offices be in the same building? It is good sense to me if they are, because it cuts down extra rent. In the towns where there are railways, are the railway offices in the same building?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not in a position to supply accurate information on that. I have not had the good fortune the hon. member has had of visiting these places on the island, but I understand that all these communication systems were operated by the government, and wherever it was possible to have one public servant take care of the various aspects of the communications system that was the practice. There may be other places where one official would be charged with a special portion of the responsibility and another with the other portion, but they were operated as one public utility.

Mr. Coldwell: The point I had in mind is this. This is under the British system. In Britain the telegraphs and telephones are all operated by the post office. When we take over the post office and we take over the postal telegraphs and telephones, which differs from what is done in other parts of Canada, is it the intention of the government to recommend that we continue to operate them as one service? It seems to me that that is the proper way to operate these communications. I have never been able to see why it is that in our country we have the telephones operated in one province by a provincial company and in other provinces by the Bell Telephone Company, and the telegraphs operated by railway companies and so on. It would be much more economical to have the whole thing under one heading. It has worked out very well where it has been done, as it has been done in most countries. What is the intention of the government in this regard?

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I can help the hon. member, if I may. As the hon. gentleman says, the position in Newfoundland with reference to telecommunications is entirely different from that in Canada. The radio service is divided into two parts, the first part having to do with telephone and wireless and the other part having to do with ship-to-shore installations. That latter part will be taken over by the Department of Transport and operated as such. The former part, the part to which my hon. friend addresses his question, will be taken over by the government. So far it has not been determined whether the Canadian National Telegraphs will operate it but I presume it will. If it does, the Canadian National will move in and operate telephones, telegraphs and radio having to do with telecommunications.

Mr. Coldwell: It will take over both telephones and telegraphs? Is that the idea?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is the intention that the Canadian National Telegraphs will operate the whole telecommunications services as they now exist on the island.

Mr. Pearkes: It is not the intention of the government to operate government telephones in the same way as they are operating government telephones in several parts of British Columbia at the present time?

Mr. Chevrier: There is a distinction in certain parts of eastern Canada and western Canada with respect to telephones. I do not know what my hon. friend has in mind. In certain parts of Canada the government has entered into contracts with associations or companies to operate telephone services. That is not the intention thus far in Newfoundland. But it will not be possible to reach a conclusion until the officers of the Canadian National have made a complete investigation. On the basis of the information we have before us, the intention is as I related a moment ago.

Mr. Pearkes: Does not the government operate certain telephone lines on the west coast of Vancouver island, for instance? Is it not the intention to operate in the same way in Newfoundland?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Coldwell: Is that not placing a further burden upon the Canadian National Railways? As the hon. member has said, on the west coast of Vancouver island there is a government telephone line, because the distances are so great and the usage so infrequent that the cost of operation is high. It is a public service rendered by the parliament of Canada to a sparsely scattered population. That would be the condition in Newfoundland.

It seems to me that if the telephone and telegraph lines are placed under the Canadian National Railways in certain areas of the country, we would be inflicting a further burden upon the railways. Surely when we took over the railways we inflicted burden enough upon them, to a point where they have found it difficult to make a decent showing.

Mr. Chevrier: From surveys which the Canadian National Railways have made through their subsidiary, the Canadian National Telegraphs, it would appear that it would be much less costly to the government if those three services were operated through one agency, rather than to divide the service as between the government on the one hand and the Canadian National Telegraphs on the other.

Mr. Coldwell: You would have to pay some subsidy to the Canadian National Railways. When we have before us the story of deficits of the Canadian National Railways we always hear arguments; and I do not think we should knowingly and willingly do something to increase that deficit, or to raise arguments of the description we heard before the war.

Mr. Knowles: The Canadian Pacific is not asking for this privilege.

Mr. MacNicol: I have one question to ask with respect to paragraph (d), "civil aviation, including Gander airport". Gander is a most excellent airport. Daily—indeed several times each day—people meet at that point from all parts of the world. It is rapidly becoming one of the great airports of the world. I should like to ask about the position with respect to Goose Bay in Labrador.

Mr. St. Laurent: Goose Bay in Labrador is already a Canadian airport.

Mr. Fraser: Torbay is also a Canadian airport.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: What about the United States base at Argentia?

Mr. St. Laurent: Argentia is one of the three bases covered by the leases entered into between the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States, and which we must respect as made unless and until we can get some variation in those leases through negotiation with the government of the United States.

Mr. Fraser: I was wondering if in the event of fog our aircraft would be allowed to use the airport at Argentia, or take off from that point?

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. St. Laurent: Only in cases of emergency. They are not allowed to make regular use of that field; but under the agreement there would be permission for emergency landing or take-off purposes.

Mr. Fraser: Would they be able to refuel, too? When I was over there we had difficulty getting enough fuel for our aircraft.

Mr. St. Laurent: It would be only on occasions when emergency landings would be necessary that the use would be permissible.

Mr. Jackman: Arising out of the question asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, may I ask if the railway in Newfoundland will be acquired by the Canadian National, or will it be merely operated by the Canadian National as an agent for the Canadian government? In that event it would be in the same position as the Hudson Bay Railway and would not be included in the accounts of the Canadian National.

Mr. Chevrier: The railway will become the property of the government of Canada, and will be operated by the Canadian National as agent for the government, in the same way as applies to the Intercolonial.

Mr. Jackman: In other words any deficit or profits arising from the operation of the Newfoundland railway will not enter directly or indirectly into the accounts of the Canadian National.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a matter of accounting.

Mr. Jackman: No, it is a matter of operation.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know what proposal the Canadian National will bring forward. However, the Intercolonial is now an integral part of the Canadian National, whereas the Hudson Bay Railway is not. A separate item is put in the estimates to cover the Hudson Bay Railway.

Mr. Jackman: The government has not yet made up its mind.

Mr. Chevrier: I would presume from what I have said already the position would be that the Newfoundland railway would be integrated with the Canadian National system.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I have only one suggestion to make, and that is that the government should do nothing which could possibly give us a telephone system such as they have in England.

Section 31 (b) and (c) agreed to.

On section 31 (d).

Mr. Timmins: Having regard to the international feature of Gander airport, may I ask if it is on a self-sustaining basis, or whether we are letting ourselves in for any amount of expense in that connection?

Mr. Chevrier: Without going into detail, the best information I have is that Gander is a tremendous project, and that it is not self-supporting. If offers great advantages, from an international standpoint. When we take it over perhaps we may have to operate it at a loss; but what the figures will be, I am not in a position to say at the present time.

Section 31 (d) agreed to.

Mr. MacNicol: Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I read in a newspaper an item advising that the only shoe factory in Newfoundland is going to close its doors—or has closed, I have forgotten which. In any event the article pointed out that sixty employees would be thrown out of employment. I would suggest to the minister who has the required authority that he should try to keep that shoe factory in operation. I fully realize that with the duties removed they will find it difficult to compete with the big shoe factories of Quebec and Ontario. I believe however that something should be done to protect those employees who own their own homes and who have families.

I am not sure what procedure would be taken. However, in time other business will develop which undoubtedly would take care of those who may be laid off. In the present instance however criticism is appearing in the press because of the laying off of these people, and I would draw the attention of the government particularly to this shoe business in Newfoundland. If necessary some effort should be made to give them orders for boots and shoes for the troops in order that they may continue in operation until the necessary adjustment takes place.

Mr. Howe: I am familiar with the situation, as I looked into it when I was in Newfoundland last week. There are two shoe factories there. Three or four weeks ago one of them announced that they were going to close, but I am told that it is a matter of history that this factory closes every winter about this time. The other shoe factory has announced that it is going to specialize in a certain grade of footwear and expects to expand its operations.

I met both gentlemen. I congratulated the one upon his outlook and said that was the kind of industry Canada wanted to help. The other man came to see me and wanted to know if I had any proposal to make. I said I had none and that I had no use for a man who closed his plant before anything had happened. We can help those who want to help themselves. If others wish to close up and take their profits, that is all right. In this case the plant was fully depreciated and I hope someone else will decide to pick up that business and go ahead with it.

Mr. MacNicol: That was not what I had in mind. What I had in mind was what I have read. The article said there was one plant; the minister says there are two. I do not know what plant the article referred to. This apparently comes under the right hon. gentleman and I would urge whoever has to do with this to keep the present plant in operation.

Mr. Howe: We are going to do that.

Mr. MacNicol: If a plant is closed, that is another matter. This plant should be kept in operation until adjustments take place all along the line. Perhaps they will get more orders in Canada; we do not know.

Mr. Coldwell: I understand that 75 per cent of the revenue in Newfoundland was obtained from customs duties; two and a half per cent from liquor; seven and a half per cent from income taxes; a total of 85 per cent from these three sources. I think it would be well to put on Hansard just what is really involved in the loss of this revenue. I suppose some liquor taxes will be retained, but I presume most of them were in the form of excise duties and therefore would be of national interest to them. It should be indicated whether the island will have to raise revenue from other sources or whether financial returns are being made for their entry into confederation. When people are trying to follow a debate right through in Hansard, that sort of thing should be on the record rather than hidden away among some documents. The Minister of Finance is not in his seat and it may be that this cannot be done at the moment, but I think it should be given possibly in the form of a table at some later date.

Mr. St. Laurent: I shall draw my hon. friend's observations to the attention of the Minister of Finance, who has been specially concerned with that aspect of the negotiations, and see if a short table cannot be prepared to be put on Hansard.

Section 31 (e) agreed to.

On section 31 (f)—Defence.

Mr. Hazen: Why is defence included in here when it is covered in section 91 of the British North America Act?

Mr. Claxton: I ask my hon. friend to note the opening words of section 33 which are as follows:

> The following public works and property of Newfoundland shall become the property of Canada.

The purpose of this section is to transfer property and we felt that it should be provided for expressly.

Mr. Hazen: I notice that there is nothing in connection with the printing of money as provided for by section 91 of the British North America Act.

Mr. St. Laurent: No property connected with the exercise of that power had to be transferred.

Section 31 (f) agreed to.

Section 31 (g) agreed to.

On section (h)—Geological, topographical, geodetic, and hydrographic surveys.

Mr. Coldwell: Something should be done in connection with soil surveys which might be carried out in co-operation with the new government of Newfoundland. I know that in the west soil surveys have been of great value. While Newfoundland in large part may not have much soil, as I said the other day, the reports indicate the possibility of some agricultural development in western Newfoundland which might provide supplies of milk, vegetables and other products which are now imported. I would think that wherever possible soil surveys should be made. You cannot tell just by looking at soil what it will produce; the necessary surveys must be made.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think that is covered by the statement of questions and answers.

Mr. Coldwell: Is that inferred?

Mr. St. Laurent: Not in the express terms used by the hon. member, but it was stated that it would be the policy of the government to put at the disposal of the government of the island its technical advisers for the purpose of making such economic surveys or investigations as might be required.

Mr. Coldwell: I wanted to mention that particularly.

Section 31 (h) agreed to.

Section 31 (i), (j), (k) and (l) agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 32.

Mr. Dickey: This is a general clause dealing with transportation. One of the basic considerations in bringing about union was the economic development of Newfoundland for the benefit of the people of Newfoundland as well as for the general benefit of Canada. This development can take place only when proper facilities are provided and it can be carried on only to the extent which those facilities will permit.

Trade between Newfoundland and Canada, particularly in the winter months, has depended particularly upon the transportation system of the maritime provinces. During the winter a heavy volume of freight passes through Halifax and North Sydney destined for Newfoundland, and the passenger traffic between Canada and Newfoundland passes almost exclusively through maritime ports.

Section 32 contains certain guarantees with respect to the operation and maintenance of transportation services within Newfoundland, and I should like to draw the attention of the committee and the government to the fact that the operation of this transportation system will depend upon the efficiency of the transportation system in the maritime provinces. The hoped-for increase in trade between Canada and Newfoundland will throw an additional burden upon a transportation system which is long overdue for improvement. In this regard I should like to quote briefly from the report of the Nova Scotia royal commission on development and rehabilitation of 1944, known as the Dawson report. I may say to the committee that I do not do so to frighten the people of Newfoundland. I think most of them have personal knowledge of the conditions which are described. Speaking of the railway line between Truro and Sydney, the report reads:

> This section of the Canadian National is incredibly bad and will discourage the most hardened traveller, to say nothing of the tourist, who is supposed to travel for pleasure. The roadbed is rough; the delays are frequent and prolonged; the rolling stock is shabby and run down; the meals are poor. The Sydney-Halifax train does 289 miles in the stirring time of twelve and a half to fourteen and three-quarter hours, including stoppages, or from nineteen and a half to twenty-three miles an hour. In spring and winter trains commonly run from one to six hours late. Cape Bretoners may read about their good fortune in being born in an age of luxurious and rapid transportation, but so far as their own experience goes, these tales are purely legendary and bear no relation to everyday life.

With special reference to the handling of freight traffic, a matter which will be of extreme importance in the future, the report goes on to say:

> The handling of freight is carried out on the same plane of efficiency. The curves are sharp and the grades are heavy, and the train must be broken up and ferried across the strait of Canso, with the inevitable result that freight charges are very high. The largest trainload a single locomotive can haul out of Sydney to Mulgrave is eighteen loaded cars, across the ferry eighteen cars loaded or light, from Mulgrave to Stellarton twenty cars loaded, from Stellarton to Truro twenty-five loaded cars, and the same number from Truro to Moncton. This compares with sixty-five to 100 loaded cars from Moncton west on the transcontinental, depending on the type of locomotive. Freight trains crossing the strait in either direction lose between five and twelve hours, an average of a full working day. On the basis of 1943 traffic the delay here for freight crossings alone represents a loss in unnecessary wages of $202,000 a year.

If we are to hope for any reasonable expansion and development of trade between Canada and the new province of Newfoundland something must be done to improve the conditions described in the quotations from the Dawson report which I have just read. The fact is that the line between Truro and Sydney, including the crossing of the strait of Canso, has a capacity which is fully taken up at present by the business using that line of railway and the crossing of the strait. What the railway will do with any further traffic is more or less of a mystery. The Minister of Transport knows how the members from Nova Scotia have urged him to consider improving the system, and particularly improving the crossing over the strait of Canso. The entry of Newfoundland into Canada, with the additional burden which will be placed upon the transportation system, although a burden we hope for and which is one of our objects, is only another reason added on top of the very valid arguments and reasons which have existed for years for properly considering improvement of the crossing of the strait of Canso.

In section 32 there is also mentioned a proposal to complete the motor road in Newfoundland which in a few years' time should make possible reasonable highway travel in the new province. The provision of a proper crossing for the strait of Canso is important from that point of view as well. No one will feel that the prospective traffic will be properly served unless a suitable crossing is provided. The province of Nova Scotia has co-operated with the dominion government in what we understand was a thorough engineering survey of the crossing of the strait of Canso, the report on which we are anxiously awaiting from the minister. I think that indicates that the province of Nova Scotia is prepared to do its share in providing for a part of the expense of a highway crossing of the strait. I hope the dominion government is prepared to do its part with respect to the provision of a reasonable and proper crossing from a railway point of view. I want to emphasize to the committee that the entry of Newfoundland is only one further but very important consideration which must be kept in mind.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of quoting the Dawson report, the Disney report, or the report of the reconstruction committee. That is merely a historical survey, and you have heard it so often in the house that I would be ashamed to repeat it. The report in which we are now interested is that of the engineering commission which has been dealing with the matter for some considerable time. I concur in everything the junior member for Halifax has just said, but there is one point I should like to stress. I hope that before this section carries the Minister of Transport will be able to stand up in his place and tell us that he is ready to table the report of the engineering commission tomorrow or the next day.

Mr. Chevrier: Nemo dat quod non habet.

Mr. Gillis: Bringing Newfoundland into confederation is merely an additional argument for the improvement of transportation facilities on the railway line east of Moncton. Transportation difficulties in that region are referred to in the press from day to day. I noticed that the old ferry that crosses the strait is tied up because there is ice there, and they have to shift her to new moorings, and all that kind of thing. I have seen that in the press every day for the last week. The point I should like to drive home to the government is that practically everyone who has ever discussed the improvement of transportation facilities in eastern Canada is agreed that it should be done. There is no difference of opinion. The reconstruction committee said it should be done; in the Dawson report—and these are all government agencies—it was stressed very strongly. The Disney report, the report of a railway engineer, said it could be done, that it was within reason as far as cost is concerned, and that there was no engineering problem. No one has disagreed with the necessity for it.

Bringing Newfoundland within confederation is going to mean a tremendous increase in traffic on that end of the line. My information is that seventy-five per cent of the imports of Newfoundland previous to this agreement came from the United States by water. When Newfoundland finally hooks up with us and these agreements are ratified I believe those imports which were being brought in from the United States will come from Canada, which means they will have to be shipped down from Ontario and Quebec, dragged over that old, twisted, crooked one-track line, held up at the strait of Canso and then transferred to that inadequate ferry service now operating between North Sydney and Newfoundland. I think there must be an improvement right along the line. If we are to properly service that tenth province I think the government should get a report from the engineering commission as soon as possible and begin the necessary improvements down there. Unless that is done, because of the inadequacy of the transportation facilities, Newfoundland will have to continue to bring in her imports by water from the United States. We have long delays at that end of the line now, with our ordinary traffic; and if Newfoundland is to get all her imports from us it will make the position that much worse.

The question I want to ask the Prime Minister is this. When seven members are elected and six gentlemen are appointed to the other place from Newfoundland, will the pass on the railways in Canada also be good on the boat from Newfoundland to North Sydney, where they hit the Canadian National railways? If it is not, it should be. I am informed that in many ridings where a boat has to be used the pass on the railway is not good on the boat; and I think that is something which should be given consideration.

I hope the Minister of Transport now is able to tell us when he expects that engineering report on the improvement of transportation facilities in and around the strait of Canso might be available, because it is tied in very definitely with section 32.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry I was not here when the junior member for Halifax began his remarks, but from what he said afterward I gathered he was interested in the transportation facilities in that area, and I think mainland of Cape Breton and Newfoundland but also in the whole area extending from the strait of Canso to North Sydney. The hon. member for Cape Breton South also interjected some remarks to which perhaps I should reply.

I had not expected, and I am sure the committee did not interpret, section 32 of the terms of union with Newfoundland to be a section upon which something should be said about Canso. However, I am quite prepared at this time to tell my hon. friends, particularly the junior member for Halifax, who dealt with it at the beginning of his remarks, that it is rather difficult to deal with a matter which is still in the hands of a board of engineers. I am sure the hon. member for Cape Breton South is most anxious to draw me out. I would not think the junior member for Halifax would want to do that; but much as I would like to be drawn out I can only repeat what I said before, which is that the board of engineers is still studying the project. There are four methods of transportation across the straits: the tunnel, the bridge, the causeway and improved facilities. In the last conversation I had with the board of engineers they indicated to me that they could come to no conclusion as to which of these methods of transportation would be most suitable and most practicable having regard to all the circumstances, but that before they could carefully consider the question of a bridge they would have to get authorization to put a test pier down in the strait in order to get certain data. The conversations I had with the board indicated that a report would be forthcoming along those lines. That report has not yet been forthcoming, and when it is I can assure the committee it will be dealt with as rapidly as possible.

Another point raised by the junior member for Halifax was in connection with the transportation facilities not only to and from the I can deal with this rather quickly. The preliminary survey made by the officers of the Canadian National Railways indicated that after union there would be a considerable increase in transportation to and from Newfoundland. The report indicated an increase of thirty per cent for coastal steamships, a thirty per cent increase in rail traffic, and a twenty-five per cent increase in traffic across Cabot strait; and, as has been brought out already, I think it will be necessary to improve the facilities at North Sydney. That is being given careful consideration at the moment, and when the matter has been brought to a definite position it will be possible for me to take it up with my colleagues. Beyond that I am afraid I can say no more at this time.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock, I believe they were dealing with section 32. Shall the section carry?

Section agreed to.

Sections 33 to 36 inclusive agreed to.

On section 37—Natural resources.

Mr. MacNicol: I should like to know if the water powers on the Humber, the Gander and the Exploits rivers have been allocated to any company producing power; and if so, do they belong to the province or to private interests?

Mr. St. Laurent: All the natural resources of the territory included in the island, and that part of the Labrador coast which forms part of Newfoundland, remain with the provincial government.

Mr. MacNicol: Is the Prime Minister able to tell us whether any arrangements have been made in reference to the development of Grand Falls on the Hamilton river in Labrador? It is about 100 or 150 miles east of where the iron is being developed. At the time the bill was passing through the house, some reference was made to that power. Was that power given away to the iron people? That is something I should like to know. It is a big power resource.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sorry to say that I have no information about that. It was an asset that was not being affected in any way by the arrangement entered into between Newfoundland and Canada, and we did not go into that question. It is, however, one of great interest and it may be that others have information about it. But as it was to remain under the exclusive control of the provincial authorities, in our discussions no inquiry was made as to what the position was.

Mr. MacNicol: They have control of it?

Mr. St. Laurent: They have control of it themselves.

Mr. Low: If the government of Newfoundland are to be expected to render their people the services they require, it seems to me that the resources will play an important part. If the provincial government finds, however, that it has control of only a small portion of the resources, then their chances of rendering to the people a high type of social services, and so on, will be much less than would otherwise be the case. In so many provinces, it was found after confederation that a large percentage of the resources had been alienated from the crown. I do not know what the situation is in Newfoundland, but it seems to me that the people of the rest of Canada should know just what it is. Can the Prime Minister give us some idea as to what portion of the resources has already been alienated from the crown so that they would not be under the effective control of the new provincial government? Perhaps, if it is possible for him to do so, he would supply the house with a list of the concessions that have been granted, together with the names of the holders of timber areas, land grants, or any other part of the natural resources of Newfoundland, and give us some idea of the extent of these particular concessions. I think this information should be on the record.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sorry, but I have not that information here. I know that a large area of timber lands was made available to the company now known, I believe, as the Bowater's Paper Company. It belonged at one time to the International Paper Company, I believe. I think they have obtained a concession of large timbered areas, from which they expect to be able to get their pulpwood supplies for a long period. With respect to the other resources, especially those in the Labrador coast territory, my impression is that the water powers are still under the control of the provincial government and will remain under their control. There have been a few mineral leases in that area, but my understanding is that the greater portion of those resources are still for the people of Newfoundland in the same fortunate position that most of the resources of Alberta are in for the people of that province.

Mr. Low: After the resources had been turned back to us in 1931 we found of course that about 52½ per cent of a good many of these resources had been alienated from the crown. That was true of oil. That is why today the people of Alberta cannot recover, for their own services, the royalties from those parts that were alienated. I appreciate the statement the Prime Minister has made, but I just wondered if it would not be possible to obtain a list of the concession holders in order to have it on the record. I say that for this reason. Some day the people of Newfoundland may come back and ask for a revision of the financial arrangement, at any rate. The people of Canada ought to know under what conditions they are operating. If the rest of Canada has on Hansard a record of the list of concessions and the extent of them, then the people will have at least some basis on which to form a judgment as to whether or not the Newfoundland agreement should be revised.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sorry, but I have not that information.

Mr. Gillis: Can the Prime Minister give us any indication as to how the Labrador iron ore deposits are situated at the present time? Has the Newfoundland government granted the exploration rights in that area to a United States exploration company?

Mr. Howe: I understand that the rights have been granted to a company that is owned in Canada, with a minority interest in the United States. It is the same company that is exploring for minerals on the Canadian side which has rights in Newfoundland. It is the Labrador Exploration Company.

Mr. Gillis: I heard the accusation made from the other side of the house that the only reason Canada was now interested in bringing Newfoundland into confederation was that we were after the Labrador deposits. That answer given by the Prime Minister explodes that particular argument because Canada, through that exploration company, with a tie-in in the United States, now has the leases and the right to exploit those resources for the next ten years. I wanted that answer for the purpose of exploding that particular argument.

Section agreed to.

On section 38—Veterans.

Mr. Brooks: I assume that the minister will explain this section. Certain parts are not clear, and certain questions might be answered. Reference is made to hospitalization. The committee would like to know, for instance, what hospitals there are in Newfoundland at the present time for the accommodation of veterans; the number of pensioners in the island; and the probable number of those who might be eligible for the war veterans allowance. The section says that the Veterans' Land Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, and the Veterans Insurance Act will be extended to Newfoundland veterans who served in the second world war. As to the Veterans' Land Act, of course, I do not think there is any time limit within which veterans need to make application, but I am not sure about that. Under the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act application in Canada must be made within five years. If we use the same act, I think it will have to be amended in some way so that the veterans in Newfoundland can make application within the necessary time. Section 38 says:

> A re-establishment credit will be made available to Newfoundland veterans who served in the second world war . . .

That does not present much of a problem because under our act any veteran can apply for his re-establishment credit within ten years from the date of his discharge from the army. Since there are a number of years to run, the veterans of Newfoundland will have an opportunity to make application for this credit. I come next to the War Service Grants Act. I believe there is a time limit in which application must be made for the benefits under that act. Perhaps the minister will tell us what amendments will be necessary there. The committee might be interested in knowing what benefits were given to the Newfoundland veterans under the different veterans acts in that island.

Paragraph (e) of section 38 says:

> Canada will assume, as from the date of union, the cost of vocational and educational training of Newfoundland veterans of the second world war on the same basis as if they had served in His Majesty's Canadian forces.

Canadian veterans made application for their educational and vocational grants within a certain period after they were discharged from the army. I believe the act states definitely that the applications must be made within fifteen months after the veteran is discharged. This of course is 1949 and the time in which the Newfoundland veteran could apply has expired. If the Newfoundland veteran is to be given the same advantages, an amendment will have to be made to the act. I have no doubt that there are in Newfoundland many young veterans who have not taken advantage of any educational or vocational possibilities in their own country. Possibly there were none. There may be young men there who wish to go to university or wish to take vocational training. Is it the intention to give these men a full four or five years' educational or vocational training, as our veterans are receiving? I do not think there are any other matters on which I require explanation.

The Veterans Insurance Act will allow a veteran to apply for insurance at any time. There is no limit in that act. What arrangements are to be made to allow the Newfoundland veterans to apply for these different benefits?—because a time limit was placed in the different acts in Canada.

Mr. Gregg: If I miss answering any questions which my hon. friend asked, perhaps he will remind me of them. When the delegation was here last fall and met with myself and officers of my department, on a number of occasions they had with them, though not as part of the delegation, two representatives of the veterans organizations in Newfoundland. These men were brought to the meetings with the Department of Veterans Affairs. All matters were thoroughly and fully discussed. I think I can say that the main part of section 38 covers in a general way all the situations raised by my hon. friend. The section reads:

> Canada will make available to Newfoundland veterans the following benefits, on the same basis as they are from time to time available to Canadian veterans, as if the Newfoundland veterans had served in His Majesty's Canadian forces, namely...

For the purpose of clarity the various items are detailed in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), and (f). With regard to hospitalization, paragraph (vi) in the statement of questions raised by the Newfoundland delegation states:

> The responsibility for hospitalization of veterans rests with the Canadian government. If it becomes apparent that a need for extra beds for veterans exists in Newfoundland, these will be provided through extension of existing facilities or new hospitals. The final decision in this respect will depend upon on-the-spot investigation.

We have received a good deal of information on existing facilities. We have not a clear-cut report on it yet. Therefore the key point is an on-the-spot investigation which will be carried out just as soon as this agreement is completed; but the principle involved is set out in the paragraph that I have read.

With regard to pensions, as hon. members know, in the first world war Newfoundland had in the main its own force or forces. There were some men who served in the Canadian forces and in allied forces. In the second world war, in the main, those who served from Newfoundland were enlisted in British units, mostly artillery, in the R.C.A.F. and in the Royal Navy. Of the veterans of world war I, those now living in Newfoundland and those who served on behalf of Newfoundland and who may now be living in other parts of the world, 1,103 are in receipt of pensions. That includes dependents. Of world war II, in the same category there is a total of 642 in receipt of pension at the present time. I might add that in world war II the pensions are paid by the British ministry of pensions. In both cases, however, it is the intention to bring these pensions up to the Canadian scale. It also appears that there may be others who may not be eligible under their present arrangements but who may qualify under our pension scheme. It is not yet possible to estimate how many that will be.

Mr. Brooks: Will any back pension be paid, or will the Canadian pension be paid as of the date of union?

Mr. Gregg: As of the date of union.

Mr. Brooks: The difference between the British pension and the Canadian pension will not be paid back?

Mr. Gregg: That is right. In the past Newfoundland has not had anything comparable to our war veterans allowances, and it has not been possible to make anything like an accurate estimate of how many applications there will be. It is presumed it might be about the same ratio as the maritime provinces, but that is only an estimate.

The next point is the Veterans Land Act. Those with whom we discussed the matter felt that under that act there would not be many applications for full-time farming. My hon. friend is right in saying that no cut-off date has yet been set under that act. It was expected that there would be some applications for small holdings, but that the main interest would be in commercial fishing. These applications will be received and considered, and it was undertaken that, in commercial fishing, those who had been assisted by the Newfoundland government to a lesser amount than that for which our act provides might be brought up to the full terms under our act.

Mr. Brooks: Were any representations made to have the three acres of land, as I believe the provision stands in the present act, reduced to one acre? I ask this question because we know that in the little fishing villages of Newfoundland land is scarce. In order for these veterans to come under the Veterans Land Act it would seem to me it would be necessary to reduce the amount, as was done with respect to the Yukon last year?

Mr. Gregg: No. During the discussion that point was not raised either by the delegation or any of those who were advising them.

Mr. Brooks: I do not think the minister answered my question. In the present act there is a limit on the time in which students may make application. I presume it is the intention of the government to amend the act by changing the time limit to permit Newfoundlanders to come in. How much time are they to be given at college? Is a man to start his college course now, and have the five or six years necessary; or will he just finish out the college course which possibly some of the veterans have already undertaken at their own expense?

Mr. Gregg: As indicated in section 38, those benefits in existence on April 1, and from there on, will apply. So that with regard to all veterans under rehabilitation, including university and vocational training, veterans of world war II in Newfoundland would, after April 1, be in exactly the same position as veterans in Canada.

So far as vocational training is concerned, that is pretty well completed in Canada, with the exception of those veterans who may have been in hospital continuously. To take one example, there are veterans who have been in hospital continuously since the end of the war, but who have now finished treatment and are able to get out on their own. In such cases there is authority to approve entry into a vocational training school, or to approve university training. That of course will hold true in Newfoundland. So that, in vocational training, it was not expected there would be many who would qualify.

With respect to university training, Newfoundland has had a scheme of its own somewhat similar to ours. It is the intention that those who are in under that scheme as of April 1 might be picked up and carried on by the Canadian government under exactly the same terms as our own student veterans.

Mr. Church: I am wondering if these provisions in paragraphs (a) (b) (c) (d) (e) (f) include the men of the merchant marine who advanced the supplies of food in the battle of the Atlantic. For example, I am thinking of the admiral of parliament hill, Admiral Duff —now in another place. He was born in Newfoundland. Those men of the merchant marine who were out night and day in the battle of the Atlantic were brave men, and they should be included. I believe some survey should be made to see how many there are.

There was a time when some of my friends to my left spoke about the other place being moved to Hull. I think it was Disraeli who coined the phrase Hull, Hell and Halifax. I would like to know how many of these members of the merchant marine are affected.

Mr. Gregg: I am sorry I have not the figures showing how many there are. I can answer the hon. member in this way, however, that after April 1 the merchant marine of Newfoundland will receive exactly the same benefits as the merchant marine in Canada at that time, and will receive the benefit of any changes which may be made with regard to them in the future.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member for Royal asked the minister a moment ago if any representations had been made for the lowering of the land requirements under the small holdings section of the Veterans' Land Act. Let me remind him that the house passed a bill, as recommended by the last committee on veterans affairs, in which the land requirement was fixed at one acre. After that was done the provision was rescinded, and the land requirement was stepped up to three acres, a procedure which turned out a lot of veterans in Canada. I thought the hon. member might have forgotten, and I am reminding him, as well as the minister.

This section is giving to the veterans of Newfoundland exactly what our veterans are getting. There is something however I should like to bring to the minister's attention, and that is the provision whereby the Canadian government will bring up to Canadian standards the rates received by veterans who were taken care of under United Kingdom or allied-countries veterans legislation. That is all to the good, so far as Newfoundland is concerned.

However, it also poses a problem which has been before us for many years, with respect to imperial veterans who have been resident in Canada for twenty-five or thirty years. We are now going to extend to Newfoundland veterans all the benefits Canadian veterans have fought for and have received over the years—and I am all for it. It will benefit those who are becoming Canadian citizens on March 31 of this year. But we have in Canada a large number of imperial veterans who came here after the first war. They have been residents of this country; they have been producers and they have been taxpayers. But we have never seen fit to extend to them the rights of Canadian citizenship, so far as veterans legislation is concerned. I suggest the house should give serious consideration to that condition, because it was one of the chief problems before the veterans affairs committee.

Now that we have become generous enough to extend those privileges to people who just now are about to become citizens of this country, I think the house should give serious consideration to extending the same privilege to residents of this country who were imperial veterans and who, as I stated earlier, during all those years have been taxpayers and producers. Many of them served in the second war with the Canadian army, either in the veterans guard or in other units.

By accepting pensioners who served in the imperial service and whose pensions were paid by the British government, we are now setting a precedent which should be extended to those imperial veterans who for the last twenty years have been fighting for those things now being written into this agreement.

Mr. Pearkes: Tribute has already been paid to the glorious record of the men of Newfoundland in two world wars. However, I wish to call attention particularly to the application of the war veterans allowance to the men of Newfoundland. What I shall say will tie in with the remarks just made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. The provision of the War Veterans Allowance Act, in so far as men who served with what is commonly called the imperial forces are concerned, applies in two respects.

In the first instance it applies to those men who were domiciled in Canada some time prior to the outbreak of world war I but who before the outbreak of that war moved from Canada and went to live elsewhere, perhaps in the old country, perhaps in the United States, perhaps in Newfoundland, and then joined the imperial forces. They had left Canada perhaps twelve months before, but they served with the imperial forces and then came back. Those men were Canadians.

Many men from Newfoundland served with the unit which eventually became known as the Royal Newfoundland regiment, but there were also many others who served with the Royal Navy, the Royal Air Force and the Imperial Army. I presume that if they had left Newfoundland to serve in the Royal Navy they would be in the same position as men who had left Canada to serve in the Royal Navy; they would be eligible for war veterans allowance.

Now what happens to the Newfoundlander who left Canada under the conditions prescribed last night by the hon. member for Cape Breton South? The hon. member pointed out that many Newfoundlanders come to Canada at certain seasons of the year to find temporary employment. Is the Newfoundlander who was living in Canada six or twelve months—the actual time does not make any difference—and who went from Canada to join the imperial forces, entitled to a war veterans allowance?

Mr. Mutch: He is now.

Mr. Pearkes: What is the position of a Canadian who may have been living in Newfoundland for twelve months but who up to now has not been entitled to a war veterans allowance? Is he going to be entitled to a war veterans allowance now that Newfoundland has been brought into confederation? Surely it must be a reciprocal agreement.

What about the Newfoundlander who instead of going to Nova Scotia went to the United States, worked there for a year and then left the United States to join the Royal Navy? He could not join a Royal Newfoundland navy, because there was no such thing. Are you going to draw a distinction? Are you going to say that the Newfoundlander or the Canadian who left Newfoundland or Canada to go to live in the United States or the United Kingdom twelve months before the outbreak of the war is not to be entitled to a war veterans allowance until perhaps some time when we see fit to ask the United Kingdom if they would like to join confederation?

I think we are going to ridiculous extremes. It is time for us to say that any man who was domiciled in Canada and who served in any force of His Majesty should be entitled to the benefits of the War Veterans Allowance Act, whether or not he had lived in Canada or in Newfoundland for the six or twelve months immediately before the outbreak of the war. This applies particularly to those Newfoundlanders who had left Newfoundland for a period of time, as has been pointed out already, in order to take temporary employment somewhere else, who served with the imperial forces, and who came back to live in Newfoundland or in Canada.

Here is a grand opportunity for the government to bring in an amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act, which has been long overdue, to provide that any man who was domiciled in Canada and who served in the forces of His Majesty shall be entitled to war veterans allowance. That is one class.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South has referred to the man who served with the imperial forces. Many men of the Royal Navy, the Royal Air Force or other imperial units, who served side by side with Newfoundlanders or Canadians and heard of the advantages of Newfoundland or Canada, decided to move to Newfoundland or Canada after the war. For the past twenty years or more those men have been residing either in Newfoundland or Canada. I have pleaded the case of these imperial veterans many times in this house and I hope the opportunity will now be taken to include them in the benefits which accrue under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

There is another comment I should like to make with regard to the application of the War Veterans Allowance Act to the men of Newfoundland. I am told that to a large extent the veterans in Newfoundland own their own homes. A veteran, be it in Canada or in Newfoundland, is entitled to own property valued up to $4,000 and still be eligible for a war veterans allowance. But if for any reason that man should sell his property and put the $4,000 into an annuity or government bonds, he is immediately deprived of that benefit. Quite frequently because of changed circumstances, perhaps the death of a wife or something like that, a man may decide to sell his home and place the money in bonds for the time being in the hope that at some future time he will be able to purchase a new home. That man finds himself cut off from the war veterans allowance. The officials who administer the War Veterans Allowance Act are governed by the regulations and they must tell that man that he cannot draw a war veterans allowance until his liquid assets have been reduced to $1,000.

That man must live on his meagre capital derived from the sale of his house until it has been reduced to $1,000. When he reaches that point he loses all possible hope of ever being able to purchase a home of his own. The recipient of a war veterans allowance is permitted to have casual earnings or independent income up to $125 per year, but if the man who sells his home puts the $4,000 into bonds the interest would be less than that.

This is another amendment which is urgently needed in view of the fact that many veterans in Newfoundland own their own homes. Having disposed of their home it may be that they want to put the money into some form of government bond. They will be told: "You cannot draw the war veterans allowance now; you have got to wait until you have used your capital, until your liquid assets are reduced to $1,000". I ask the minister to give the most serious consideration to those three points. The first point is to make the benefits of the war veterans allowance available to every man who has been domiciled at any time in Canada or in Newfoundland, who has served in any of His Majesty's forces and has returned either to Newfoundland or to Canada. Secondly, I would ask him to take the opportunity now of including all our comrades who served in the imperial forces, and who have lived in Canada or Newfoundland for a period of twenty years or more. The third point I wish him to give consideration to is the heartbreaking regulation which forces a recipient of the war veterans allowance to live on his capital until it has been reduced to $1,000.

Mr. Gregg: I am sure the hon. members for Nanaimo and Cape Breton South will not expect me to cover fully points 2 and 3. Point 2 was made by both of them. They are larger questions, and I shall be glad to discuss them at some later date. I should like to say with regard to point 2, however, that there are a number of old veterans in Canada who cannot be quite properly defined as imperials, and who served in either the commonwealth forces or the allied forces. The third point made by the hon. member for Nanaimo was not made by those who discussed very thoroughly how the war veterans allowance would be reflected amongst the older veterans of Newfoundland, but I assure him we will keep that in mind as we enter upon the administrative stage after the first of April.

On the first point made by the hon. member for Nanaimo, as we stand now in Canada, a man domiciled in Canada before he enlisted in the first world war is eligible to apply for veterans allowance regardless of whether he served in the commonwealth forces or in the allied forces. Therefore, when this agreement is signed, those Newfoundland veterans of world war I who served on behalf of Canada, as it will be then, wherever it may have been, and who had pre-war domicile in Canada, as it will be then, will be eligible to apply for war veterans allowance.

Mr. Pearkes: I am very pleased to hear the minister say that those men who were domiciled in Canada, and who served in the imperial forces, will now be eligible for war veterans allowance. I know they have been allowed to apply for war veterans allowance, but they have not in all cases received it. I have referred individual cases to the minister and to his department, and the answer has always been that these men were not domiciled immediately before their enlistment. I can tell the names of men who were living in Canada prior to the outbreak of world war I, had been living here for a number of years, and for some reason had left Canada and gone to the United Kingdom. Sometimes it was for educational purposes, and in some cases to adjust private matters. In other cases they had gone to the United States. Because they had left Canada for a period of twelve months prior to the outbreak of war, although they had been domiciled in Canada for four, five or more years, they have been refused the war veterans allowance. If a man was domiciled in Canada immediately before he enlisted in the imperial forces I know he is eligible for the allowance, but those who were not domiciled here immediately prior to the outbreak of war have had their applications refused. I am pleased to note, however, that the minister has now said that they will be eligible.

Mr. Gregg: I should like to comment briefly. There has been no change. The present act, and the interpretation of it, makes eligible those men who were domiciled in Canada immediately before the outbreak of war.

Mr. Pearkes: Immediately, yes.

Mr. Gregg: That has been the interpretation, and until any change is made that will apply to those in Newfoundland.

Mr. Mutch: There is one question with respect to immediate domicile. The war veterans allowance board has consistently ruled that those people are eligible who, having been domiciled in Canada, left Canada for purposes of education. I think I can quite safely challenge anyone to find an authentic case of a man being declared ineligible if he left Canada for educational purposes, even if he was in the middle of two years at Oxford, or something of that sort. If he came originally from England, and his parents came with him and established domicile here, the board has consistently held that his domicile was here. In such a case he would be treated as though he had enlisted from an immediate domicile even though he joined the forces while he was at Oxford, let us say. If I understood the hon. member for Nanaimo a few moments ago when he was talking about this matter, he kept repeating the fact that Canadians, who left Canada and went to the United States or some other place, and who subsequently joined the British navy or some other force, have not been eligible in the past under the War Veterans Allowance Act. If that is what he did say, then the hon. gentleman will realize, of course, that he is in error, because there is no question of domicile for a Canadian. It follows that when a Newfoundlander becomes a Canadian, as he will do, the question of domicile does not exist. The question of domicile exists for those who came as immigrants to this country, who were here for a time and then returned home, joined the allied forces, and subsequently returned. As to the interpretation of the question whether or not they are domiciled, the period is not fixed except by practice. The whole entitlement hinges on the question of domicile, and the interpretation is in the hands of the board itself. It will be the same situation when we extend these benefits to our new Canadian cousins in the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs not confusing domicile with residence? It is very obvious that is what he is doing, because it is being interpreted that a man must have been living in Canada immediately prior. As far as domicile is concerned, it does not matter where he is living.

If he has gone away somewhere he retains his Canadian domicile until he acquires a new one. The hon. member's interpretation is that he must have been living here, which is not at all what the act and the regulations say. He has not changed his domicile in the circumstances related by the hon. member for Nanaimo, and yet that man, retaining his Canadian domicile, is today, and has been, refused by the department.

Mr. Mutch: Very rarely.

Mr. Ferguson: If a United States citizen enlisted in the Canadian navy, fought for this country, and after the war made his residence in Canada, would he be entitled to it?

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, may I ask you to again take up with the Speaker the matter of amplifiers for this chamber, since certain hon. members find it difficult to hear even me. Either their hearing is defective or amplifiers are absolutely necessary.

Mr. Gregg: The answer is, no, he would not be.

Mr. Ferguson: A soldier or a sailor of United States birth who had served this country for four years in the first war, and who comes here and takes up residence, would not have his service to this country recognized and would not be helped if he were in need? I think it is a shame.

Mr. Gregg: Not unless he was domiciled in Canada immediately before the war.

Mr. Harkness: I understand from what the minister has said that, say, an Englishman, who served in His Majesty's forces during the first great war and went to Newfoundland in 1921, where he has been living ever since, would not be eligible for the war veterans allowance, and so on, as the minister interprets this matter. Is that correct?

Mr. Gregg: That is correct.

Mr. Harkness: If that is the case I suggest that the wording of paragraph (a) is incorrect. I feel quite sure that such men in Newfoundland by this time would look upon themselves as Newfoundlanders; and since this paragraph states that these benefits are to be extended to Newfoundland veterans who served in either the first or the second war, or both, they are being definitely misled. They will consider themselves Newfoundlanders, as I think any man who has lived in this country since 1920 or 1921 would consider himself a Canadian; and they will be expecting to receive these benefits. If they are not going to get them I would suggest that the wording of this paragraph be changed, to make it quite clear that such men are being excluded.

Mr. Gregg: As I said in the beginning, the main paragraph of section 38 governs, and it refers to such benefits as may from time to time be available to Canadian veterans. The person in the instance quoted by my hon. friend would not be eligible if he were in Canada; and I can assure the hon. gentleman that the terms of the War Veterans Allowance Act, and in particular the Pension Act, have been very carefully studied during the past months by the veterans of Newfoundland.

Mr. Pearkes: The parliamentary assistant made reference to the fact that if they were not Canadians they would not be eligible for the war veterans allowance. I do not know what he is talking about, because it does not matter whether a man was born in Canada or whether he emigrated to this country four or five years prior to the outbreak of the first world war. To my knowledge there is nothing in the act which draws any distinction between a person born in Canada and a person who acquired Canadian citizenship through residence here.

Mr. Mutch: My hon. friend and I are in exactly the same predicament. He professes not to have understood what I meant, and I rose because I could not understand what he meant. By accident, perhaps—because I am quite certain the hon. gentleman knows the difference—in his remarks a few moments ago he referred to the Canadian who had gone to the United States or somewhere else, and in what he said he implied that this Canadian would have lost his domicile. I simply said that had never been the situation, that the only applicant for the war veterans allowance who is concerned with the question of domicile is one coming from outside Canada who had established his domicile in Canada previous to enlistment. I do not think my hon. friend meant to confuse the Canadian, either in Canada now or the new Canadians as they will be after March 31, with one who had to establish domicile. If a man is in fact a Canadian the question of domicile would not arise, even though he had been gone from Canada for twenty years before he enlisted in an allied service, if he had maintained his Canadian domicile. That is an entirely different matter.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sorry to be so persistent about this, but a Canadian who left Canada for a period of twelve months and then, either from the United States or the United Kingdom, joined the imperial forces, is not entitled to the war veterans allowance.

Newfoundland

Mr. MacNicol: I want to ask two questions on this section. First, what will be the position of the South African war veteran in Newfoundland after confederation? Will it be the same as that of the South African veteran in Canada? Second, what about the widows of deceased non-pensioned soldiers? Will their position be the same in Newfoundland as in Canada?

Mr. Gregg: The situation in regard to the war veterans allowance and pensions as they affect South African veterans will be exactly the same in Newfoundland as in the rest of Canada.

Section agreed to.

On section 39—Public servants.

Mr. Church: According to this section the employees of the government of Newfoundland in the services taken over by Canada under this agreement will be offered employment in these or similar Canadian services, and they are to have all pension rights, and so on, to which otherwise they would be entitled. If these officials are to be appointed in the same ratio to population as the six persons who are to be called to another place, sometimes known as the place of the saints' everlasting rest, I am afraid they will reach four deep from here to Lansdowne park, judging by the way we have been increasing officials.

Section agreed to.

On section 40—Welfare and other public services.

Mr. Knowles: This is an omnibus section, which covers a number of matters, and to begin with I should like to ask one or two questions in reference to old age pensions. I am sorry the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not in his seat, but I see his parliamentary assistant is here. One situation obtains in connection with old age pensions which is somewhat analogous to the problem that has just been discussed with respect to the war veterans allowance. I refer to the residence qualifications. If I understand the terms aright, once Newfoundland becomes part of Canada it will mean—and I would say rightly so—that a person who has lived in Newfoundland for the required qualifying period, which is twenty years as defined in the regulations, will qualify for the old age pension. This means that before long we are going to have this situation. We will have people who have lived in Newfoundland for a period of eighteen years, during which time Newfoundland was not part of Canada, qualifying after two years' residence in Canada for the old age pension. On the other hand we have people who have lived in the United Kingdom for ten or fifteen or eighteen years of the qualifying period coming to Canada for the last two or three years before reaching the age of seventy, and they will not qualify.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Why not?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni asks why not. That is the way the law reads, the law brought in by the government my hon. friend usually supports. If by his question my hon. friend is deploring this fact, I quite agree with him. I want to make clear what I said a moment ago, that I feel it is perfectly right that this provision should apply in the case of people in Newfoundland. But it does seem to me to highlight, as did the veterans problem, the need for a reciprocal arrangement in matters of social security and old age pensions in particular. I wonder if consideration has been given or will be given, as a result of this situation, to a reciprocal arrangement at least between this country and the United Kingdom, and I think we should go further and have such arrangements between Canada and all the other countries of the commonwealth.

Mr. Reid: As the hon. member will readily understand, I am not in a position to say whether or not the matter has been given consideration. All I can do is to assure him that the matter laid before the committee a moment ago will be brought to the attention of the minister.

Mr. MacInnis: I am not sure whether or not there is an old age pension scheme in effect in Newfoundland at the present time; or if there is, I do not know what the amount of the pension is. If there is not, the people of Newfoundland cannot, I assume, take advantage of the dominion government's contribution to old age pensions until an old age pensions act is passed by the provincial government that will take office. Will this government wait until that time or will it pay its share of the contribution to old age pensioners who qualify in Newfoundland after March 31, 1949, pending the time the legislature puts an old age pensions act into effect? That would mean, of course, that under present conditions persons in Newfoundland over the age of seventy, and qualifying for the old age pension, would receive a pension of $22.50 a month. Has that phase of the question been discussed?

I have in mind that it will take a considerable time for the provincial government to be elected and to get its affairs in order. In the meantime there are old people who perhaps ought to be assisted with the amount that the federal government is giving toward old age pensions.

Mr. St. Laurent: That matter was carefully considered for a considerable period of time, but it was not found possible to devise any way in which the old age pension could be paid before there was in existence in Newfoundland a provincial government responsible to a legislature. The act requires the making by a provincial government of a contract with the federal government, in order to recoup three-quarters of what it pays out for old age pensions, under its provincial law, up to a maximum of $30 a month. Suggestions were made that, if the legislature elected in Newfoundland passed a law of that kind, it might be made retroactive. It was desired to give the people of Newfoundland treatment as good as that which was given to Canadians of the other provinces. As the hon. member knows, in my province it was a matter of several years, after the dominion old age pension legislation was passed, before the provincial government passed its statute and took advantage of it; and there were no retroactive payments to the old people of my province at that time. It was felt that it would not do to be treating the people of Newfoundland in a manner different from that in which Canadians of the other provinces had been treated. The delegation from Newfoundland, therefore, finally but most reluctantly came to the conclusion that the best thing to do would be to proceed as expeditiously as possible to elect their legislature, enact their old age pension legislation, and make their contract which would become effective as soon as it was made.

Mr. MacInnis: I appreciate all the difficulties that the Prime Minister has pointed out. With the best intentions in the world, perhaps it would prove impossible to devise a scheme that could accomplish what I mentioned. But I do not believe that at the present moment Newfoundland is in the same position as were the other provinces before they took advantage of the Old Age Pensions Act. The act was there for them to take advantage of it; and if they did not do so, that was the fault of the provinces. But here we have coming into confederation a new province that did not have that opportunity. I had hoped there might be some way by which the dominion could make the payments, pending the time that a provincial act was passed.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask a further question in connection with the point emphasized by the hon. member for Vancouver East. It seems to me that it highlights the need for old age pensions being put on a federal basis. We are all annoyed and disturbed by the fact that there must be this long delay before old age pensions become effective in Newfoundland. My question is this. If the dominion-provincial conference of 1945 had succeeded, and the plan to pay $30 a month to every Canadian over the age of seventy, without a means test, had been put into effect, would that $30 a month go to the people of Newfoundland as at April 1?

Mr. St. Laurent: In the hypothesis just mentioned by the hon. member, it would. Just as soon as a resident of Newfoundland became a Canadian citizen, with the required period of residence in Newfoundland, he would have been entitled to the old age pension under that scheme. But that is not the scheme that exists at the present time. Under the present scheme, any province can pay old age pensions under a provincial law, and recover three-quarters of what it pays up to a maximum of $30 a month. The hon. member says that it highlights the desirability of having the matter on a federal basis. There are people who will agree with the hon. member, but there are a great many who will not.

Mr. Knowles: That was the government's proposal to the provinces in 1945.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes. That was the proposal at the time, because there was to be a pension payable to everyone without a means test.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: But this is a pension which is payable to those who require it, according to the standards set by the legislation. The pensions are administered by the provincial governments and it is they who determine whether or not an individual comes within the category determined by the means test. The responsibility of the federal government under the federal legislation is to reimburse to the province three-quarters of the amount it has in fact paid out, up to a maximum of $30 a month for each pensioner.

Mr. MacNicol: A considerable number of Newfoundlanders live in Toronto, many of them in Davenport riding. Many of them are quite old. For some time two Newfoundlanders came to me to see whether I could assist them to get old age pensions. One was eighty-four years old. He has since died. The other was seventy-eight, and he too has died. I know quite a number of others. The one who was eighty-four years old had lived in Toronto for nineteen years. The other had lived in Toronto for eighteen years. They were both away over the age limit. Of course the Ontario government could do nothing for them. I am wondering what would have been the position of these men had they lived until the time that Newfoundland had joined Canada.

Mr. St. Laurent: My understanding of the legislation is that as soon as they became Canadians they would not have to wait until the government of Newfoundland had passed a pension act. They would have twenty years of Canadian residence and could receive from the government of the province where they were then residing the pension provided by the laws of that province.

Mr. Drew: In view of the fact that there have been put on the record some statements which were doubtless a matter of interest not only to hon. members but also to people in Newfoundland who are interested in this subject, I think it would be well if I clarified one point in regard to the proposals in respect of old age pensions which were put forward by the dominion government in 1945 and in an amended form in the spring of 1946. I might say on behalf of the province which I then represented that I had put forward proposals in regard to old age pensions without a means test. But I would remind hon. members that the proposals put forward by the dominion government in regard to old age pensions were part of a combined set of proposals which were described by the then Prime Minister as an integrated whole, and that it was necessary so to regard them. These were to be paid—not only old age pensions but other provisions—with the understanding that special taxes were to be imposed to take care of these payments. Two of the special taxes which were included in the proposals of the dominion government should not be forgotten. One was a special income tax estimated at 5 per cent of all incomes without exemption over and above any other taxes now paid. The other was a poll tax estimated at that time in the case of Ontario at $12 a head on every man, woman and child of sixteen and over, whether employed or not.

I would ask hon. members to recall these two special taxes as part of the dominion proposals when they are informed that there were certain suggestions as to certain benefits to be received.

Mr. Knowles: It does not fall on me to defend the dominion proposals to the provinces back in 1945. I just wish to make this comment on behalf of the government, if I may, but I am really speaking on behalf of the people of Canada who suffered a great loss because that conference broke up in 1945. I just wish to say on behalf of the government that the $30 a month old age pension to all Canadians of seventy and over without a means test was not the only one of the things offered as against any additional taxes that were to be collected to pay for them.

As I have already intimated in what I said, I asked my question a moment ago for two reasons. Perhaps one of them has already been met but the other one has not. The one thing I was anxious to draw attention to was what Canadians in nine provinces have lost and what Canadians in the ten provinces will lose because of the impossibility of the dominion and all the provinces getting together. The other hope that I had in raising the matter was that the Prime Minister would indicate, as his predecessor did a number of times, and as the Minister of National Health and Welfare did all during the debate on old age pensions two years ago, that that basic idea of a minimum pension of $30 a month at age seventy to all Canadians without a means test was still part of the government's aim and policy. The Minister of National Health and Welfare told us so a good many times when he referred to these proposals, and he said that still constituted the basic plan. I am disappointed tonight that the Prime Minister did not take the opportunity to say that so far as the government which he heads is concerned that is still the aim.

Everyone in this house, and everyone in the country knows where the C.C.F. stands—knows of our interest, our concern and our definite pledge to the people of Canada. It is that there will be security for our old people in the form of old age pensions payable to all at a respectable age without the means test. But tonight I am asking—and I hope now that I am affording him the opportunity to give it to us in terms a little more clear-cut he will do so—that the Prime Minister state the position of his party on this important question.

Mr. St. Laurent: The position of this party on this question has always been well known to the country. It has involved a pension of $30 a month without a means test but on a contributory basis. In order to have a contributory basis it is necessary that there be an understanding with all the provinces to enable the raising of the contribution by a compulsory contribution in the form of taxes earmarked for that special purpose. That requires an understanding with all the provinces, because, under the taxing powers that the federal government has under section 91 of the British North America Act, it cannot impose taxes for these social services as such.

Mr. Graydon: I have been interested in the discussion which has taken place with respect to the time when old age pensions will be available to the senior citizens of Newfoundland. These older people are in the evening of life, and the government of Canada ought to realize, as no doubt it has, that delay in the payment of old age pensions is a serious matter. The time element is now more important than ever to these people. It could easily happen, and this has been the experience of nearly everybody who has had anything to do with this work, that they might go for months before the machinery is set up and all of the qualifications met.

From March 31 to when the first cheque is issued may be quite a long time, particularly in the minds of many older citizens in the new province. Has the Prime Minister given any consideration to this? If the provincial legislature of Newfoundland were to enact at the earliest opportunity a piece of legislation which would have the effect of bringing in old age pensions, and were to make it retroactive to March 31, is there anything to hinder this government from recognizing that retroactive provision and making these payments in bulk when the first payment is made?

Mr. St. Laurent: There is, in the present act. The present act merely provides for operation in the future, and it would require special legislation to implement my hon. friend's suggestion. The matter was given very careful consideration by the delegation when it was here. There were members of the delegation who were most anxious to find some way by which old age pensions could become payable at the earliest possible moment. They even gave consideration to the possibility of the commission of government enacting, while still in office, a system of old age pensions, and providing for the payment of the old age pensions in the budget that it will make for provincial purposes. But we were informed that, after giving the matter serious consideration, the members of the commission of government felt it was something that it would not be proper for them to do. It was something of very great consequence, and it was felt that the responsibility for doing it should be taken by a legislature elected by the people of Newfoundland.

I may say quite frankly they were told that, if there could be found any way that would make it possible to have that done, without creating the obvious situation that the people of Newfoundland were being treated better than Canadians had been treated in that regard, we would be happy to give it very sympathetic consideration. But they came to the conclusion that their commission of government would not take the responsibility of introducing a system of old age pensions in their dying hours, and that they would have to leave that responsibility to a legislature elected by the people of Newfoundland.

Mr. Drew: Of course, I think it would be appropriate to explain at that point that this is one of the reasons why some objections are being raised in Newfoundland to the procedure being followed. If there had been a legislature, then it would have been possible for that legislature to set up the social service organizations which could have handled payments of this kind, which called for certain provisions of supervision under the dominion act covering this and similar payments. Through the fact that no legislative authority exists, it is at the present time impossible to set up that supervisory organization. And I think perhaps it is well that we do realize that this is one of the reasons why in Newfoundland there is some objection to the procedure. While that is not a responsibility of ours within this House of Commons, it does explain one of the grounds of criticism of the procedure which has been followed.

Mr. St. Laurent: But I think the delay would have been even longer had there been resort to the establishment of responsible government. To make this thing work conveniently, it has to come into effect on April 1, or thereabouts, of the year. A delay of two or three months might have meant a delay of a year in bringing union with Newfoundland into workable operation.

The members of the delegation were quite disappointed they were not able to find some way whereby they could bring that into operation immediately. It would have been, I understand, within the legal power of the commission of government to do it, because they do enact statutes; but they felt it was a matter they were not prepared to undertake. At least that was what we were told at the time. Even if now there were enacted legislation providing for a Newfoundland system of pensions within the terms of our legislation, it might possibly be given effect to. But, as we were told, the commission of government would not contemplate assuming that responsibility.

Mr. Graydon: It seems to me that these two governments—or one government, and the representatives of the province about to come in—could surely have worked out some arrangement. Surely this obstacle which, as it has been explained by the Prime Minister, does not seem formidable, is not so great that the red tape could not have been cut in this instance. Surely the two governments could have got together to give the old age pensioners of Newfoundland their pensions on March 31. Many times, in this chamber and in others, red tape much more involved than this has been cut without any difficulty, to give relief where it was needed. I do not know why in respect of old age pensioners we should find the obstacle so great that two legislative bodies, both supposed to have great powers, could not have managed somehow to give the old age pensioners of Newfoundland their payments on March 31.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to say one further word. While I have not the legal training of those who have preceded me in the discussion, I think the main obstacle to the payment of the dominion's share of old age pensions as of April 1 is largely a matter of will. I have seen lawyers get around situations of that kind simply by adding the words, "Notwithstanding anything in this act". Once lawyers get at it with a will, there is always a way.

However, there may be some difficulty. I do not see that it would be unfair to any other province in Canada if, for the period from April 1 until the Newfoundland legislature reached a point where it could pass old age pensions legislation, we paid the dominion's share.

I was somewhat concerned with the remarks of the Prime Minister which, if I understood them correctly, indicated that the government had shifted its position from that laid down in the green book proposals of August 1945. The federal government at that time made the proposal to the governments of the provinces that it was prepared to assume pensions for all persons over seventy years of age without a means test at $30 a month, and for those between 65 and 69 on a fifty-fifty basis with the provinces at $30 a month, with a means test. Does that offer still stand, so far as the federal government is concerned, or is there some new offer now based upon contributory old age pensions? If that is so, there will have to be a tremendous amount of work done before a contributory basis can be worked out. Indeed, if we are going to work out a contributory basis for old age pensions we will have to go much further than that and work out a contributory basis for an integrated over-all scheme of social security. Has the government given up the idea of old age pensions as set out in the green book of 1945?

Mr. St. Laurent: The government has not given up the idea of the proposal made in the green book of 1945. But there never was any proposal in the green book of 1945 for the payment of old age pensions to all, without means test and without contributions. That does not mean that no one would get a pension until he had contributed enough to provide the capital out of which it would be paid. Because it was shown that, if contributions were established, the amount of contributions being received would suffice to take care of the amount of pensions being currently paid. And, provided the scheme went on forever, no one would be prejudiced. Those who would receive old age pensions at the age of seventy without having made any contribution at all, or having made only one or two contributions, would get something more as the net benefit than those who would have contributed from the age of sixty to the age of seventy, for example, to be entitled to their old age pension. The calculations show that the contributions being received yearly would take care of the expenditures being made yearly.

Mr. Knowles: Will there be any delay in the payment of family allowances in Newfoundland?

Mr. St. Laurent: Every effort has been made for the pre-registration of all children in Newfoundland, and family allowances will be paid to those who have been registered at the time union becomes effective. If there are any who do not receive them immediately union becomes effective it will be because their children were not registered in the pre-union period.

The hon. member will realize that at this time we have no right to require anyone to register. We are making the facilities for registration available, but as Newfoundland is not a part of Canada we cannot make any regulations applicable to Newfoundland. We merely make the facilities available and say: If you wish to register, these are the forms to use, and if you are registered when union comes into effect you will immediately receive the family allowances; if you are not registered you will receive them after you do register and from the effective date of union. They cannot be paid until the registration has been received and duly checked.

Mr. Knowles: It is possible that those who registered in advance may receive their family allowance cheques in April?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Those who are late in registering may not get their cheques until May, but I understand they will be retroactive to April 1?

Mr. St. Laurent: They will be retroactive if the registration shows that there was entitlement as of April 1.

Mr. Knowles: It is too bad that we could not find the will to do the same for the old age pensioners.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is too bad, but family allowances are administered by the federal government and old age pensions are not. The province of Newfoundland will have to set up its machinery, As soon as that is done it can enter into a contract and will be entitled to reimbursement of three-quarters of its expenditure from the date of the contract.

Mr. Claxton: With regard to the incidence of certain health insurance taxation, the leader of the opposition made an assertion which I think I should answer. He suggested that it was part of the federal government's plan, as proposed at the 1945 conference, that there should be a poll tax of $12 to meet the cost of health insurance. The government's plan with regard to health insurance was explained fully in the green book proposals and was amplified right through the conference.

There was never any suggestion of a poll tax of $12 or $10 or any other figure. What was indicated as one of the conditions for the introduction of health insurance was that there should be a registration fee, but the way in which the provinces met their share of the cost of health insurance was left to the provinces to be worked out. There was never at any stage of the proceedings, either in public or in private, any suggestion of a poll tax of $10 or $12.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I find it difficult to understand the extraordinarily faulty memory of the minister who has just spoken. If he will examine the Hansard record of the proceedings which took place in May—

Mr. Claxton: I have just done so.

Mr. Drew: —1946, he will find that it was discussed then as it was on other occasions. I am pleased to have the opportunity to make clear exactly the kind of misunderstanding that has been created about the nature of the proposals that were put forward by the dominion government. Certainly it was called a registration fee, but the fact that the dominion government happened to call it a registration fee did not make it any less a poll tax. That registration fee was to be paid by every man, woman and child for the purpose of meeting these payments. As the minister who has just spoken will remember, I checked him up on the same inaccuracies at the conference and—

Mr. Claxton: I replied in the same sense that I have tonight.

Mr. Drew: —it was pointed out that he was just as inaccurate then as he has been now.

Mr. Claxton: The record does not bear that out for a second.

Mr. Drew: I think hon. members should know that there were amusing as well as other aspects to this discussion and there was one particularly amusing aspect. One of the things that I noticed while I was premier of Ontario was the number of statements in regard to the dominion-provincial conference and similar matters with which the provinces were concerned that appeared in the press under words such as "A well informed government source says". Then the statement would go on with no name attached.

The conference was sitting here in Ottawa, and on the previous day, speaking on behalf of Ontario, I had pointed out that while we were discussing this it would be well if we examined exactly what the whole picture was. I pointed out that this registration fee was a poll tax; call it any other name, it was a poll tax. I pointed out also that the minister who has just spoken, and who was then Minister of National Health and Welfare had written to the minister of health in Alberta explaining that this special income tax over and above all other income taxes would be five per cent.

We got the $12 poll tax in the case of Ontario from the meetings of the dominion-provincial economic committee which had been studying the figures and which had found the original dominion figures to be hopelessly inaccurate. That committee had brought forward the exact figures to which the dominion as well as the provincial officials agreed, and those were the figures we had before us.

Then the minister who has just spoken, following the practice to which I have just referred, gave a statement to the press. That statement was not intended to refer to his own name. It was intended to be like all other statements that went out—I am not quoting the exact words—to the effect that a high government source had said that there was absolutely nothing in the suggestion of a poll tax or special income tax.

Unfortunately the reporter of the Toronto Daily Star, who had very close access to the minister in question, did not realize that that reservation should have been imposed and he gave the minister full publicity. The report in the Toronto Daily Star said that Mr. Claxton had said that there was nothing in this. As the record will show, I pointed out to Mr. Claxton—I am using the name that appears in the record—exactly what the facts were. There was an ensuing discussion and the facts were just as I have stated.

The five per cent was based upon his letter to the minister of health in Alberta, and the $12 poll tax in the case of Ontario was the result of an accurate computation, and the officials of the dominion government and the Ontario government both agreed to that computation as being the correct figure. The $12 poll tax was to be paid and, in addition, a five per cent special income tax over and above all other payments.

All I am saying is that, when we are told about the proposals that were made, we should remember that along with them went these contributions; and when you say, "let us have these payments", let us also be quite sure that the people of Canada want to make them, because they are part and parcel of the same proposal. Since this matter has come up, and the difficulties of dealing with it at a conference have been mentioned, may I repeat that there is absolutely no place where the responsibility lies for the conference not meeting again except at the doorstep of the dominion government which has refused to call it.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, there is one statement of the hon. leader of the opposition with which I can agree, and I think only one. That is that these things have to be paid for. That is the fact. They have to be paid for out of taxes—

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Claxton: —or out of levies on the Canadian people in one way or another. With that one point of agreement, I leave the hon. gentleman to his remarks. I remember the incident.

Mr. Drew: That was the occasion when I referred to it as a babbling brook of inaccuracy.

Mr. Claxton: I remember the occasion. I remember the hon. leader of the opposition had made a fine speech at the beginning. He referred to well-informed government sources as having been the source of this story. There were no well-informed government sources from which his story was produced.

Mr. Drew: That was quite right.

Mr. Claxton: Because everyone who knew anything about the subject knew what the government's proposals were. They were contained in the green book, and we had been working over that with the provinces from the beginning of August 1945 until the first week of May 1946. All through that period I do not think there were many people concerned with this business who did not know what the proposals were. Then the present leader of the opposition made the statement about the $10 or $12 poll tax at the beginning of one of our meetings in the final week. I rose and denied it, and referred to the record. The record stands, and I deny the statement again. I also deny everything except the concluding remark that he made to which I have just referred, that social security payments of this kind must be met by somebody. It was understood right from the beginning that if we were to have health insurance it must be on a dominion-provincial basis, achieved through co-operation of the provinces, and met by contributions in part by the provinces, in part through the provinces by the individuals, and in part by the federal treasury. The amounts of those contributions were indicated in the green book proposals, and there was never at any moment any suggestion of a poll tax. That is an invention or appellation given by the leader of the opposition then and now. There was also every indication that, in the interest of the people concerned, and because of the way in which health insurance has worked all over the world, the people should contribute. Who in this house disagrees with the idea that the people should contribute to health insurance? Who in this house?

Mr. Ashby: I do.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member for Edmonton East. That is one. Who else? The leader of the opposition has made a great parade of this business, but the fact is that his party in their social security proposals advanced the same idea as the Liberal party did in their social security proposals, and as the government did in their green book, but they did it about a year and half later.

Mr. Knowles: You started in 1919.

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. MacNicol: Thirty years ago.

Mr. Claxton: And the fact is we all know, except perhaps some hon. members from the far left corner of the house, that social security payments, whether they be for old age pensions or for health insurance, must be met by the people themselves. We are cheating the people unless we declare that, and unless we are willing to face the responsibilities of that kind of thing. With regard to the contretemps between the hon. leader of the opposition and myself, I think that if he locates the right page in the green book, for which he is now looking, and if he reads the whole passage, he will find that the point I have made tonight was made then, that it is completely in accord with the record, and that any other account is completely out of accord with it.

With regard to Newfoundland, which we are supposed to be discussing tonight, and which I regard as a matter of supreme importance to the people of Canada and of Newfoundland, it is obvious from the remarks of the Prime Minister that if we introduced any plan by which old age pensions might be arrived at before there was a provincial government to make an arrangement, it would be quite different from the old age pensions plan that was put on the statute books of Canada in 1927, and which has since been worked out by agreement with the provinces. It would require something quite different. Were we to make that different kind of arrangement, I believe there would be more people complaining about it than there are complaining about failure tonight, because we hope that after all Newfoundland will be the tenth province.

There are nine provinces which have made provision for old age pensions, and the plan is that the provinces shall administer them. The plan is that the provinces shall make agreements with the dominion. When there was no province it would surely have been quite wrong for us to have made an agreement with a commission of government, or any other agency which would have provided for those payments. Our hope is, however, that a province will be set up. That is why we are meeting here, and why we are discussing this matter. Our hope is that just as soon as that province is set up they will make an old age pension agreement along the lines of the agreements made by the nine other provinces of Canada. As we discussed this with the representatives of Newfoundland it seemed to us to be evident to them, as well as to us, that this was the only fair and right way to do it in accord with the will of parliament as expressed in 1927.

I feel that the union of Canada with Newfoundland is a matter of supreme importance. I believe everyone in this house does; but I must say that as this discussion has proceeded it has become clear that, while every group in this house is keenly in favour of that union, somehow they would like to see it worked out to their own advantage, and they are making one suggestion or another. Our feeling is that the agreement made with the representatives of Newfoundland can be supported on the basis of what is good for Canada and what their needs are in Newfoundland, and that it is an agreement which would commend itself as containing fair and equitable terms as the basis of union.

Mr. Drew: Since the incoming province of Newfoundland undoubtedly will be interested in the whole relationship of the provinces to the dominion government, and since it is very likely that they will join with the other provinces in the hope that they may have opportunities of meeting the dominion government in general conferences, I think it might be well to place on record now what was actually said at the conference on the occasion to which I referred, so the people of Newfoundland as well as others may know the way in which statements emanate from this government from time to time. This very subject of the poll tax was discussed over and over again. It was discussed in the meetings of the economic committee and in the meetings of the co-ordinating committee, and I brought up the matter on April 30, 1946. Just for the purpose of letting the people of Newfoundland know that they should find out who make these statements, and that it would be well to make sure they are in fact official government statements, I should like to read this into the record. I rose on the morning of April 30, 1946, and said:

Mr. Chairman, before we proceed I think the correct practice would be for me to rise to a question of privilege on a matter that does affect this conference. I find that in this morning's press, as well as in the press of late yesterday afternoon, direct issue is taken with a statement that I made to the conference yesterday—

You see, it was mentioned the day before, as well as on a great many other occasions.

—and I would add that that direct issue is taken in a statement made outside this conference. That statement is carried generally in the press throughout Canada. It starts on the front page of the Ottawa Citizen of this morning and I would like to read briefly from it because it has a very direct bearing on the public understanding of what is taking place at this conference. I quote from today's Ottawa Citizen:

"A source close to federal social security plans said the dominion has always planned to impose a tax to cover some of the cost of health insurance, pensions to the aged and other welfare measures, but so far it has not been possible to work out a definite tax rate.

The source was commenting on a statement by Premier George Drew of Ontario to the dominion-provincial conference. Mr. Drew said the dominion had suggested to the provinces a plan under which health measures and old age pensions would be financed by an additional tax of from three to five per cent on all incomes and a poll tax of perhaps $10 to be paid by all persons sixteen years and over."

I might interpolate here that in the later figures it was worked out at $12.

"No poll tax was ever proposed by the federal authorities, said the source, and no definite rate of taxation was set because the rate would depend on how much of the social security program was brought into force."

If the "source" alone were the person to whom I feel called upon to pay attention, even this would be very objectionable because it is the very sort of thing that led me to move the motion in the co-ordinating committee last Thursday that we should go into open conference. As you will recall, I said at that time that amongst the reasons why I thought we should go into open conference was to prevent this very sort of thing.

But the "source" is not left in doubt because here is the Toronto Daily Star of last night, with this headline: "Plan No Poll Tax—Claxton."—

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Drew:

—and the Toronto Daily Star does not merely describe him as the source but mentions him by name.

Now whether the source be Mr. Claxton or any other bubbling spring of misinformation—

They have that wrong, because I said "babbling brook of misinformation."

Mr. Claxton: There is a good deal of misinformation about it.

Mr. Drew:

—I for one tell this conference that it will move very much closer to success if those who are attending it—

He was attending it.

—make their comments at the conference table and do not attempt to convey the impression outside that statements made here were incorrect.

The report goes on to give the discussion that took place. No remark I have made tonight in any way varies what took place at that time. The minister's memory is short, and perhaps that can be forgiven because of course he has been in another department since then, where health is not the main concern. He seems to forget that at the time we were discussing this the dominion government had put forward very substantial amendments and that when we met in April the then Prime Minister of Canada put forward a whole series of new proposals which he said must be regarded as an integrated whole.

I am not now arguing the merit of one tax or another. I do say, however, that when the suggestion is made that the dominion government made proposals for contributions of one kind or another the public should bear in mind that the way they were proposing to take care of it was by an income tax over and above the existing heavy income taxes, on an even level on all people, without exemption, and by what the present Minister of National Defence chooses to call a registration fee but what any child knows is in fact a poll tax.

Mr. Ashby: Riding along here in the caboose it is almost impossible to accurately follow anything being said at the other end of the chamber, except the words uttered by the leader of the Progressive Conservative party. I do not know whether I correctly understood the minister when he spoke a short time ago, but I thought he asked whether anyone in this house believed social services could be rendered to the people by other than contributory means. If that was what he asked, let me say that I certainly know of other methods. If people are asked to contribute part of their earnings toward any social services whatever, it means they will have to go without something. In the case of workingmen it means they will have to go without a good roast of beef and eat bologna, for example. Let me give you an instance, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Irvine: Of "baloney"?

Mr. Ashby: I will give you an example of pure, unadulterated "baloney". In Industry, the official organ of the Canadian manufacturers association, I find a statement made by a university-trained man, who was chairman of an educational committee, in an address to an association or society. These are his words:

The only place the government can get the money—

—to render social services—

—is by taxing the people.

I would like hon. members to keep those words in mind. I am going to make another statement so similar to that one that I am merely going to alter the words: The only place the Imperial Oil Company can obtain gasoline is by draining it out of the gas tanks of automobiles. I do not know how many of the hon. members of this house will believe the statement that I have just made. I will guarantee, however, that if that statement is repeated often enough beginning with little children, we can get university presidents, presidents of great manufacturing companies, many preachers and teachers to believe it, and then finally the people themselves. It is not true that the only source of money is from the pockets of the people, and it never has been true. Yet people actually believe that statement to be true. It is a general assumption, even right here in this house, that the only source of money is from the people. I have mentioned before that people do not make money. People may earn it, but they do not make it. If the Imperial Oil Company want gasoline, they go to the source for it. They are drilling now half a mile from our farm in the hope of striking the source of gasoline. If we want money for any purpose, it matters not what that purpose may be, it is our duty to go to the source for money, not to impoverish the people.

The Chairman: May I remind the hon. members at this time that discussion in committee should be directly relevant to the clause under discussion. If hon. members will refer to standing order 58 (2), they will find it:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. Green: May I suggest to the Prime Minister that there seems to be one way in which the Canadian parliament could deal properly with this question of old age pensions to be paid in Newfoundland. Why could not an amendment be made to the Old Age Pensions Act under this Bill No. 12, which we have been handed today, to the effect that if the new legislature of Newfoundland passes an old age pensions act at its first session, and provides that payment shall be retroactive to March 31 of this year, then Canada will pay three-quarters of that pension disbursement from the same date. I would point out to the Prime Minister that in Bill No. 12 there are amendments of a type similar to many of the Canadian statutes. I do not see why we could not make an amendment of that type to the Old Age Pensions Act. As a matter of fact, Bill No. 12 already contains one amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act.

The Prime Minister has said that both the Canadian delegates and the delegates from Newfoundland were anxious to do anything that could be done in order that the applicants for old age pensions in Newfoundland could be paid from March 31. That being the intent, and I think it is the will of every member of this house tonight, I suggest that such an amendment should be placed in the new Bill No. 12.

The Minister of Finance compares the situation in Newfoundland with that in the other provinces. But there really is no comparison at all. When the Old Age Pensions Act was passed by the dominion, each of the provincial governments was in existence. It was well known what the legislation was to be, and those governments had the choice of either accepting the legislation or not acting under it. Here the trouble is that Newfoundland has not a government. That is the only reason why the people there cannot get this pension as from March 31. I suggest therefore that the situations are not at all parallel. I would ask the Prime Minister why it is not possible to bring in an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act under this Bill No. 12, providing that, when the pension is authorized in Newfoundland, Canada will pay three-quarters of it as from March 31, 1949.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is not impossible. It has been considered that it would not be fair to the Canadians of the other provinces, but there is nothing impossible about it. It could be done if it were considered to be the fair thing to do. But the matter was examined, and it was felt that it would not be fair to the other Canadians to make special provisions granting to the new Canadians who would come in from Newfoundland a privilege that had not been granted to anybody else.

Mr. Green: The Prime Minister has taken the stand this session, I believe, and in other sessions, that the members who come here from the various provinces of Canada speak for the people of those provinces, and that it is not necessary to have an expression of opinion from the various provincial governments. Here is an instance where that belief which he holds could be put to practical advantage. There are here tonight members from every province of Canada, and not one of them has risen to object to making these old age pensions retroactive or to providing that Canada pay her share from March 31. There is not one member here who has objected to that, and I venture to say that every single member in the house right now would be favourable to action of that kind being taken. Surely on this point we can speak for the people of Canada.

Mr. Grant: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Green: I would hate to be obliged to speak for the hon. member. Surely we can say that our people, the people of the nine provinces of Canada, will be quite agreeable to having the old people of Newfoundland get their pensions as from March 31.

Mr. Bertrand (Prescott): Provided the province pays its share.

Mr. Claxton: If the hon. member's suggestion were to be carried out, would we not be in this position, that any applicant who applied to the old age pension administration of a province for an old age pension would then feel that he or she had not been justly treated if the application was not received and the payment was not granted right back to the date on which the person attained the age of seventy? Are we not in that position, not only with regard to our contractual arrangements with the provinces but with regard to the individuals in every part of Canada? Having had something to do with this administration for some time, I really think that is the position. A person qualifies for old age pension not merely by reason of attaining the age of seventy, but by reason of having attained the age of seventy, of having qualified under the provisions existing, of having made an application, of having the province make an inspection and then making an award which subsequently results in the federal government making its contribution of 75 per cent.

I suggest to the hon. member that any other arrangements would be breaking faith with the other provinces, because, as you know, some of them took a number of years to come into the arrangement. It would be very difficult, once that were done, to provide for the administration under the existing arrangements with the provinces which administer the plans.

Since two hon. members have intervened I must reply to the leader of the opposition. I do not want to start reading the record again but I wish to ask him once and for all where, in all the record of dominion-provincial proceedings, from beginning to end in this green book, or in any other record, he can find any support whatever for his assertion that there would be a poll tax of $10 or $12.

Mr. Drew: This is exactly a sample of the problem that the provinces faced when they were trying to deal with some of the ministers of the government at the time the conference still met before it was stopped by the dominion government. The minister knows perfectly well that there was a co-ordinating committee, that there was an economic committee, that they prepared accurate computations and that these computations were a matter of record; and he had this record in front of him when this was under discussion. These records were prepared and they showed that at that time the figure in the case of Ontario would be $12 for every man, woman and child in the province. The way in which it would work out was this. An estimate was made of the amount which it would be necessary for each province to raise under the plans put forward by the dominion government. Then in relation to that amount the economic experts worked out how much it would be necessary to raise in each province by this so-called registration fee, but which I described then, as on all earlier occasions that we discussed it, as a poll tax. For that was and is the correct expression.

This goes back to a letter written by the minister to Dr. Somerville, the deputy minister of the department of health in Edmonton. In his letter to Dr. Somerville the minister said:—

Mr. Drew: I am reading from page 433 of the record of the proceedings of the conference.

> The proposals of the federal government provide for compulsory registration and a registration fee but deliberately left open the question of the appropriate amount of the fee.

Mr. Claxton: That is right. That is what I said.

Mr. Drew: Certainly. They deliberately left open the appropriate amount of the fee. It was a poll tax and is a poll tax. The financial experts worked it out. In the case of Ontario that figure was $12. That figure was before the minister and all those attending the conference.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I must be allowed just one word in reply. The leader of the opposition has referred to the economic committee. It happens that I was chairman of that committee.

Mr. Drew: Exactly.

Mr. Claxton: I can assure him, and I think that the hundreds of officials who took part in the very constructive work of that committee will bear me out, that there was no suggestion of a poll tax, there was no suggestion of a $10 fee or a $12 fee from beginning to end. What the leader of the opposition is talking about is the possible contribution that would be made by the provincial governments toward health insurance. How much of that would be paid out of the provincial treasury and how much would be paid by the individual was never decided because we never got far enough along to do that owing to the failure of the conference.

Mr. Graydon: You adjourned it.

Mr. Claxton: We adjourned it, yes, because it had been broken down by actions taken by the representatives of the other provinces. That is the fact. In the economic committee no figure was agreed on; no figure was worked out; but it was generally understood from the dominion proposals that 60 per cent would be paid by the federal government and 40 per cent would be met out of provincial sources. Some part of the amount to be met out of the provincial sources would be met by a registration fee—what part was never decided upon because we never got that far. To call an insurance plan, an ordinary person's contribution to meet a premium for health, a poll tax is a way of endeavouring to condemn the thing right from the start.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: The more you do of that the better. Mr. Chairman, now that I am in this chamber I do not intend to permit the continued misrepresentation of what took place at the conference. When the suggestion is made that this was not discussed, let me read from the record of the proceedings the statement that was made at the conference, with the minister who has just taken his seat sitting at the table; and the fact that this discussion took place in accordance with my statement was not questioned because it could not be questioned. He knows it now as he knew it then. This is what the record says. Fortunately there is a record, because if there were no record these misrepresentations could go on indefinitely. You have been told that this was not discussed earlier.

Mr. Grant: Read what it says about a poll tax.

Mr. Drew: I am quite prepared to wait.

Mr. Grant: Read what it says about a poll tax.

Mr. Claxton: I rise to a question of privilege. I never said that the question of a contribution was not discussed, because it was implicit and it was stated right from the start. The question of a poll tax was never discussed.

Mr. Grant: Read about the poll tax.

Mr. Drew: This is what I said in the presence of the minister on the occasion we are discussing.

But the fact is that $12 is the figure that was discussed—

Remember that this was at the April-May meeting. I continue:

But the fact is that $12 is the figure that was discussed at the January meeting and at the November meeting in the case of Ontario because it was pointed out then by the government of Ontario that the dominion's proposals would impose upon Ontario an added expense of $50 million outside of what the dominion was going to pay for these new health and social insurance proposals. If the poll tax was to take care of that—and that was suggested on page 32 of the dominion government's proposals as something to be incorporated in the agreement—in the case of Ontario the poll tax would have to be $12.

That was the statement then. It was not challenged, and it cannot be challenged now.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I must say that at page 435 of the proceedings it was challenged then and it is challenged now. What the leader of the opposition did was to divide the province's share of a contribution that would be needed to pay for health insurance, in the case of Ontario, by the population of Ontario and say that the individuals of Ontario had to pay it and it was a poll tax.

Mr. Drew: Certainly it was.

Mr. Claxton: Every other province figured that the provinces should make some contribution as well.

Mr. Drew: The same babbling brook of misinformation.

Mr. Knowles: Could we come down to date and discuss old age pensions and other matters in which the people of Newfoundland and the people of Canada are interested now. Following the discussion that has taken place, there is just one question I should like to ask. I have asked questions of the government and I have not been satisfied with the answers. I now want to ask one question of the leader of the opposition. Does he not think that the people of Canada would welcome the opportunity to pay contributions, even up to the figures he has suggested, if in return for them we could have old age pensions at seventy without a means test, health insurance and over-all social security?

Mr. Drew: I am very glad to answer that. If the hon. member who has just spoken had been present at the conference, as the minister was, he would have known that we recommended old age pensions at sixty-five, without a means test, and that our present recommendation is $40 a month.

Mr. Claxton: And a reduction of taxation at the same time.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, the leader of the opposition—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Reid: He is ducking that question.

Mr. Knowles: The leader of the opposition is no better than the ministers on the other side at answering questions. I did not ask what is in the Tory platform now, any more than I have taken time now to tell what is in the C.C.F. platform. I asked him this question: Does he not think that the people of Canada would welcome an opportunity to make contributions towards a proper over-all social security plan?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to deal with this on the political level put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: But the hon. member probably misunderstood what was said. I was referring to the proposal of the Ontario government put before the conference that met in 1945. That was when we put the proposal forward in regard to old age pensions. This is not something new.

Mr. Knowles: Apparently I cannot expect an answer from the leader of the opposition. He is not prepared to stand in this house and say that he knows the people of Canada would welcome an opportunity to make such contributions, apparently because he played his part in scuttling that kind of a program in 1945.

Mr. Drew: I will deal with this now, because I regret to say that this is the first time this particular hon. member has used the technique of the socialist party of making unfounded charges of that kind.

Mr. Knowles: What unfounded charges, may I ask?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of privilege, the leader of the opposition has referred to my making unfounded charges. What is the unfounded charge?

Mr. Drew: That I was unwilling to indicate what our position was, when we put forward the proposal. Now, control yourselves for a moment and you will hear the answer.

An hon. Member: Stop the mudslinging and answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: They are working together nicely.

An hon. Member: The same as Bloc Populaire.

Mr. Abbott: Give us your answer, after plenty of time to think it over.

Mr. Drew: Yes, and I have something to say to you.

The proposals put forward at the conference have been supplemented since then by various further suggestions which were under consideration at the conference. The proposal was for contributory old age pensions. I have indicated quite clearly that I believe that the people of this country are willing and anxious to contribute to satisfactory social security plans. And I am satisfied the people of this country do not want to pay a poll tax, because that form of tax has always been regarded as a very unsatisfactory form of tax in this country.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): On a point of order, I submit that this entire discussion is out of order. The opposition is not charged with the responsibility of government. Hon. members of the socialist party should address their questions through you, Mr. Chairman, as you are charged with the responsibility of control of the house. In like manner, all hon. members should address their questions through you.

The Chairman: I must thank the hon. member for Danforth for his remarks, and I would ask all hon. members to address the Chair in future.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, may I address my remarks to section 40 of the schedule. Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce would answer, as the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is not in his seat. This afternoon the large amount of $20 million was mentioned, including quite a number of services. Would the Minister of Trade and Commerce give some information regarding the discussion which took place in connection with housing?

I find that at page 108 of the report of June 25 to September 29, 1947, there is mention of the St. John's housing corporation, which was set up under the Newfoundland commission of government four or five years ago. This statement is made:

> As a result of historical conditions, St. John's is about 70 per cent substandard houses and the problem is beyond the means of the city to finance. Since the corporation began its work it has spent some three or four millions of Newfoundland money. The corporation has acquired 800 acres of land, has constructed a tunnel to the seashore for the purpose of disposal of sewage, laid sewers and water and sewer mains, set up its own factory for sewer pipe and block, and by the end of the present building season will have constructed 350 dwellings. It will be in a solvent position when these are all sold or let.

I understand now that Newfoundland will not be eligible for this type of financial assistance after confederation. I note on the next page, however, the following:

> The foregoing describes the situation which exists under present legislation.

There was some discussion of legislation which does exist in Canada in respect of housing. Then it states:

> This legislation is subject to adjustment from time to time to meet changing conditions and the government is always prepared to take into consideration any particular circumstances which might warrant adjustment in the legislation.

I wonder if the Minister of Trade and Commerce could report on the discussion which took place with the delegates from Newfoundland, and what machinery will now exist to make it possible to continue the practice in Newfoundland that was undertaken by the St. John's housing corporation?

Mr. Howe: It was understood that the facilities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would be available in Newfoundland, just as they are available in other parts of Canada. The building project in question differs from any plan we have in Canada in that the houses are built to be sold. The expenses in developing the land were considerably more than anticipated. The fund is not in good shape at the present time, and the work is being retarded. Mr. Mansur, president of the corporation, visited Newfoundland some three weeks ago and had a discussion with those responsible for the fund. I visited Newfoundland last week end, and I was told that the discussions were very satisfactory. As it was not my responsibility at the present time, I did not go into detail in the matter; but I know it will be the purpose of the corporation to see that houses are built in St. John's, just as it is the duty of the corporation to see that houses are built in other parts of Canada. What arrangements will be made I cannot say, but I feel sure that some plan will be worked out so that houses can be built in Newfoundland as they are in other parts of Canada.

Mr. Nicholson: Can the minister indicate what share of the $20 million which he mentioned this afternoon will be allocated to this item?

Mr. Abbott: The operations of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, so far as the construction of housing is concerned, are made possible by loans made to the corporation. I cannot say at the moment whether any amount has been specially earmarked for Newfoundland in their requests this year which are now under consideration.

Sections 41 to 45 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, when we were discussing the motion I suggested to the Prime Minister that consideration should be given to the possible effect of the provisions of section 46. In his reply the Prime Minister stated that the difficulty I suggested in regard to this clause was perhaps not quite consistent with the situation and gave, as evidence of the fact that there could be barriers against interprovincial trade, the restrictions that are placed upon the movement between provinces of liquor under certain conditions.

I repeat my suggestion in regard to this section in the very real belief that there is inherent in this section a dangerous constitutional difficulty. What I have to say has nothing whatever to do with the desirability or otherwise of permitting the manufacture and sale of margarine; it has to do with the constitutional question as to whether or not it is competent under the British North America Act for the dominion government to impose any restriction, by agreement or otherwise, on international trade. My reference to that difficulty relates to section 121 of the British North America Act which reads:

> All articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any one of the provinces shall, from and after the union, be admitted free into each of the other provinces.

That provision in the British North America Act was regarded as one of the important provisions which would bring to an end any restraint upon the movement between provinces of the ordinary products or goods which were traded in in different parts of the country.

The Prime Minister in referring to the restriction upon the movement of liquor is referring to the provision in the Canada Temperance Act, but I would point out that there is a very definite distinction between restraint on the movement of liquor between provinces and on the movement of ordinary commodities and products. That distinction was clearly drawn in a case having to do with the Natural Products Marketing Act of 1934 and the amending act of 1935. At page 420 of the Supreme Court Reports, 1936, in the judgment of the then Chief Justice of Canada a clear distinction is drawn between the restraint placed upon the movement of liquor between provinces and of other, ordinary, articles of trade.

The chief justice pointed out that the Canada Temperance Act imposed those restrictions in order that assistance might be given to the penal provisions of the provinces which had placed some prohibition on the use of alcoholic beverages within their own areas. The basis of that restraint is not the basis which could be used for the purpose of passing legislation to restrain other kinds of trade. I think the words of the judgment clearly indicate the difference and show that the suggestion put forward by the minister is not a correct parallel. I quote from the judgment at page 420 as follows:

> The application of the principle implicit in this passage must always be a delicate and difficult task. That is shown by reference to the history of the Canada Temperance Act. The prohibitory clauses of the legislation undoubtedly do affect civil rights directly but, in Russell v. The Queen (1), the board took the view that the real subject matter of the legislation was not property and civil rights, but matter connected with public order and having a close relation to the criminal law. It was likened to "laws which place restrictions on the sale or custody of poisonous drugs, or of dangerously explosive substances . . . on the ground that the free sale or use of them is dangerous to public safety, and making it a criminal offence . . . to violate these restrictions . . ." It was described as "legislation . . . relating to public order and safety," and belonging to the class of "Laws . . . for the promotion of public order, safety, or morals, and which subject those who contravene them to criminal procedure and punishment . . ."

In the words of the judgment in that case, a distinction is drawn between the subject matter of the restrictive provisions in the Canada Temperance Act and such a substance as margarine. While many people object most strongly to the manufacture and sale of margarine, I do not think anyone will suggest that it comes within such a definition as that put forward by the chief justice as being an explosive or dangerous article. It was because of those inherent qualities in alcoholic beverages that the dominion government felt it was entitled to place certain restrictions on their movement between provinces where the provinces had themselves prohibited the use of alcoholic beverages in their own areas. Because the penalties imposed were something in the nature of penal provisions, they came under the broad reference in the British North America Act to peace, order and good government and have been sustained by the privy council on that basis.

I shall not labour the point beyond suggesting again to the Prime Minister that these restrictions dealing with a commodity such as margarine do not bear any direct relationship to the subject of the judgment to which I have referred, and to the material considered in that judgment, and that it is not competent for the dominion government to place such a restriction upon the use of margarine under the broad provisions of peace, order, and good government. If that is so, then such a provision would contravene section 121 of the British North America Act, and difficulties might arise in connection with this provision. It might be suggested that in subsection 2 of section 46 of the agreement there is a loophole which might make this restriction unimportant in any event, but I should like to point out to the Prime Minister that the situation in which we now find ourselves is that this restriction has become effective. Section 46, subsection 2, of the agreement reads:

> Unless the parliament of Canada otherwise provides or unless the sale and manufacture in, and the interprovincial movement between, all provinces of Canada other than Newfoundland, of oleomargarine and margarine, is lawful under the laws of Canada, oleomargarine or margarine shall not be sent, shipped, brought, or carried from the province of Newfoundland into any other province of Canada.

Unless the Prime Minister contends that this restraint can be put in legislative form under the broad provision of peace, order and good government, then I would submit that the parliament of Canada cannot otherwise provide in view of the recent judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the stated case which was placed before them.

As to the second provision, that the restraint would operate unless "the sale and manufacture in, and the interprovincial movement between all provinces of Canada other than Newfoundland, of oleomargarine" is permitted, that alternative has already been swept aside by virtue of the fact that one province has already taken steps to prevent the use of margarine therein. I refer to the province of Prince Edward Island. Consequently, as to this reference to all provinces, that loophole is not open, and we come back to the point that this restriction is effective.

If the dominion government have the right to permit the manufacture of oleomargarine, they also have the right to deny the manufacture of it. That seems an obvious proposition. If they have the right either to permit or to deny the manufacture, and also the right to place a prohibition upon the movement of the product, out of a province, then they must be asserting a right on some other ground than that which was put before the Supreme Court of Canada at the time this argument was being heard. The Supreme Court of Canada has found in its judgment on the stated case that it is not competent for the parliament of Canada to place a restriction on the manufacture and sale of margarine. If that is so, then I do not know how the dominion government is exercising that authority now, by agreement or otherwise, because the agreement becomes part of an act of this legislative body, and ultimately, if approved, of the parliament of Canada. It seems to me that in this matter the government is on the horns of a dilemma. If they are going to assert the right to permit the manufacture and restrain the movement, then they are asserting a right to deal with this subject. If they have the right to deal with this subject, then it is no use saying to the provinces that they no longer have the right to deal with it. They should exercise that right if in fact they feel that the law which was in force should have been continued in force. If they now assert that they have the right to deal with this under the provision of peace, order and good government, then that right should have been asserted at the time this argument was being dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada.

I repeat that the question under consideration is not the desirability or otherwise of permitting the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. It is a question of whether or not any step is to be taken which challenges the provision, in section 121 of our constitution, that all articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any one of the provinces shall, from and after the union, be admitted free into each of the other provinces. In a particular case some variation or evasion of the constitution may seem desirable; but where any attempt is made to disregard the provisions of the constitution, then I think we should remember that, no matter how desirable it may seem to the government in a particular case, they are establishing a precedent for similar action in regard to any other commodity or product at some other time.

As I said in my earlier remarks, this is not a case where we can move to delete a passage; it is not a case where we can move to amend. It is an agreement which we must accept as a whole in view of the fact that it is to be approved by another government as a basis of union. I again urge the Prime Minister to consider the effect of this provision from a constitutional point of view, and, if he feels there is any reason for concern about the restraint imposed by this provision, to take up with the government of Newfoundland an appropriate amendment which would meet the approval of both governments.

Mr. St. Laurent: With some of the premises mentioned by the hon. leader of the opposition I am in full agreement, but of course I do not agree with the conclusion that he draws. First of all I should like to call the attention of hon. members to the language of section 121. This section was drawn up by a gentleman who knew the rules of English grammar. It does not say that all articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any one of the provinces shall, from and after the union, be admitted "freely" into each of the other provinces. It says they shall be admitted "free" into each of the other provinces. That section has already been under consideration by the courts, and the courts have held that it meant that these articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of any one of the provinces shall, from and after the union, be admitted free of customs duties into any other province.

The other premise cited by the hon. leader of the opposition is a paraphrase by the then chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada of language used in the decision in the case of Russell and the Queen. The hon. leader of the opposition probably remembers the late Lord Haldane, who perhaps argued more of the constitutional cases before the privy council than any other man of our generation, and who afterwards became Lord Chancellor and sat on a great many of the constitutional cases. He stated with reference to Russell and the Queen that it was a tacit convention among lawyers who appeared before the privy council that they did not refer to Russell and the Queen, although in one instance, having had to refer to it, he said that the only ground upon which the decision of the privy council in Russell and the Queen could be justified was on the assumption that must have been made by their lordships in the privy council at that time, that the evil of drunkenness was so prevalent in Canada when the legislation was passed that it could be regarded as war or pestilence.

No doubt there is a substantial difference between oleomargarine and the explosive qualities of intoxicants; but in the cases where the jurisdiction of the provinces to deal with the control of intoxicants was established, the jurisdiction was placed within the provinces to deal with everything that was local and private within their territory, everything that applied to the maintenance of peace, order and good government within their territory. I may say to the leader of the opposition that all possible arguments to support the jurisdiction of the federal parliament with respect to oleomargarine were urged and were dismissed by a majority of the judges of the supreme court; and the decision there was that it was an undue interference with property and civil rights, in a matter which was local and private within the province, for the federal parliament to attempt to prohibit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. So they did put it back in the same sphere, the same zone, that justified the actions of the provincial legislatures in dealing with the liquor problem; something which related to order and good government privately and locally within the confines of the province. The parliament of Canada, exercising—as was said by the chief justice—such jurisdiction as it may have in respect of the criminal law, imposed penalties against those who violated, by interprovincial operations, the prohibitions contained in provincial laws.

I think that without violating any other principle the same could be done if the provinces prohibited the manufacture and sale within their confines of oleomargarine, because since those decisions there has been the decision—I think it was in the pharmaceutical case, by the privy council—that criminal law did not involve any ethical or moral concept, and wherever the legislator, rightly or wrongly, felt that the public interest required a thing to be forbidden under penalties, he was the one to judge whether or not that was criminal. Some of us were surprised that the judgment went that far, but that was the ground upon which one of these constitutional cases was decided.

Here one might possibly have hesitated to make that kind of provision in anything but an agreement that was being subjected to both ratification by the parliament of Canada and confirmation by the parliament of the United Kingdom, and it will not come into force until it has received both ratification by this parliament and confirmation by the parliament of the United Kingdom. When it has received that, it will have force of law to the same extent and to as great solidity as the British North America Act itself, even though it might, as it does, in the procedure depart from what would otherwise be in the British North America Act. It will not come into operation until both this parliament and the parliament of the United Kingdom will have given it force of law; and even if it did imply that something was being done which could not normally be done under the British North America Act, that would not enlarge the British North America Act and would not serve as a precedent for doing it in any other manner than by going back again to the parliament of the United Kingdom. I am not conceding that it is beyond the purview of the British North America Act, but I am saying that, even if it was, by virtue of the confirmation of the terms by the parliament of the United Kingdom it would get the same legislative authority the British North America Act itself has. If the British North America Act does not allow a thing like this to be done normally, the fact that it was in the agreement with Newfoundland would not enlarge, for other cases, the terms of the British North America Act.

So I do not think we are in any way creating anything that is apt to be embarrassing in the future in any other respect than as an impediment to the trade in oleomargarine.

Section agreed to.

On section 47—Income taxes.

Mr. Jackman: I think we should call it eleven o'clock, because I hardly believe we can finish tonight. Is it the intention to try to finish the bill this evening?

Mr. St. Laurent: If it were convenient it would suit the requirements of another place, where they proceed more expeditiously than we do and where they are awaiting something from us in order to be able to continue their labours. If it could get through committee tonight it could be given third reading tomorrow and be available to the other place at the beginning of next week. However, I do not want to urge it too strongly. The clock is against me, and unless all hon. members felt that we should go on I would not like to ask that we do so.

Mr. Jackman: I should like to know the interpretation of clause (d), where it refers to earned income and investment income. In this paragraph is there any special treatment in regard to investment income?

Mr. Abbott: No. The purpose of this clause is to place the taxpayers of Newfoundland in exactly the same position the taxpayers of Canada were in when the pay-as-you-go plan was introduced in 1945, of course on the assumption that Newfoundland forgives its citizens the taxes for the first three months of this current year. Canada forgives them for the second three months, and the income tax commences July 1. There was no forgiveness, my hon. friend will recall, with respect to investment income of over $3,000.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. Jackman: It does not mean that investment income accruing in the first six months of the year will be taxed any more than earned income will be taxed?

Mr. Abbott: My understanding is that investment income over $3,000 will be taxed for nine months of the year.

Mr. Jackman: And earned income for six months?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Jackman: With the permission of the committee I should like to ask a simple question in regard to section 41.

Mr. Abbott: That is, if it is not more than $2,250, as the section indicates.

Mr. Jackman: If it is more than $2,250, investment income will be taxed on the basis of twelve months or nine months?

Mr. Abbott: Nine months.

Mr. Jackman: In regard to section 41—

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman asks permission to go back to section 41, and another hon. member near me wants to go back to another section.

Mr. Abbott: We are on section 47.

Mr. Knowles: But the hon. member for Rosedale is asking permission to go back to section 41, and another hon. member is asking permission to go back to section 45. We might go on if we could finish in two or three minutes, but if it is going to take fifteen minutes or more I think we should call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. Jackman: Section 41 deals with payments to people in Newfoundland who may be unemployed, under the same conditions as unemployment insurance benefits. The actual payments will not be a charge on the unemployment insurance funds, I take it, because I am interested in the attempt to have actuarial solvency in connection with those funds.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is quite correct. I explained this afternoon that we are including in the estimates a special item to take care of possible liability in that respect.

Mr. Jackman: When is it expected that the cost of servicing unemployment insurance will become an actual charge against the unemployment insurance fund directly, without any special recompense from the dominion?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I could not answer that question offhand.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent: The table is as follows:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Blackmore: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. St. Laurent: The business for tomorrow would be third reading of the bill which has just been dealt with in committee; after that, the resolution, which is on the order paper for today, for an address to His Majesty to place before the parliament of the United Kingdom a confirming statute; then the resolution dealing with the Agricultural Products Act, which is No. 4 on the order paper today; then continuation of the debate on the measure for the continuation of certain orders and regulations during the national emergency arising out of the war, which is No. 6 on today's order paper.

Mr. Knowles: In that order?

Mr. St. Laurent: Not necessarily in that order as to the last two items I have mentioned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSING

CHRISTIE STREET HOSPITAL—ACQUISITION BY CITY OF TORONTO

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yesterday the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) asked a question with reference to Christie Street hospital at Toronto. As has been known, arrangements have been under way for some time under which all veteran patients are being transferred from Christie Street hospital to Sunnybrook. This transfer is now rapidly being completed. As the transfer permits, the Christie Street hospital will be turned over to the city of Toronto.

[Later:]

Mr. J. H. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the Minister of Veterans Affairs has just retired from the chamber. I had intended asking a question, but in view of his absence I ask that my question be accepted as notice. It has reference to the matter the minister mentioned a moment ago, namely the disposition of an asset at present vested in the Dominion of Canada, Christie Street hospital.

I am asking that in due course the minister, in this House of Commons rather than through the press or through some other body, give a full report with regard to the sale of Christie Street hospital. Perhaps he might go so far as to state the price, what the hospital is to be used for, when the terms of the contract will be made known and the transfer of the property made to the corporation of the city of Toronto. I repeat that information of this kind should emanate from this chamber rather than from the press or some other source.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows the rule that he is not permitted to make a statement when asking a question, and that the question should be brief and to the point.

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall draw the hon. member's remarks to the attention of the minister. I am sure that within the next few days the minister will be able to give the information for which the hon. member has asked.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as this transaction was handled by War Assets Corporation, for which I am responsible, perhaps I may answer the question now. The circumstances are that some time ago Chorley Park was sold to the city of Toronto, and payment of $100,000 was made to the crown. As the documents were being completed, circumstances compelled the Department of National Defence to ask that that sale be cancelled for the time being. This morning I had a conference with the mayor of Toronto, and we agreed that Christie Street hospital would be substituted for Chorley Park in the former transaction. The effect is that we have sold Christie Street hospital to the city of Toronto for $100,000. The sale includes certain beds and utensils which are not required for federal purposes. It is my understanding that the building will be used in part for a hospital and in part for a home for aged persons. Delivery will be made as quickly as final transfer of patients can be made by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I thank the minister for the information.

REQUEST FOR COMPLETION OF PROJECT IN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. When will he be in position to answer the questions I asked about two weeks ago with regard to housing? They were not long, and only brief answers would be required. I think the minister has the information right in his office in Ottawa.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I will take the hon. member's question as notice.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

REPORT OF OPERATIONS FOR 1948—REMOVAL FROM CONTROL OF A NUMBER OF NEW ITEMS

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the report of the operations for the year 1948 under the Export and Import Permits Act. I wish to table also copies of order in council P.C. 570, dated February 8, 1949, consolidating all outstanding amendments to the list of items under export control, and at the same time removing from control a substantial number of new items. As a result, the number of articles for which export permit is required is reduced from 520 as of January 1, 1948, to 275.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the first reading of Bill No. 13 (from the Senate) respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

NEWFOUNDLAND—TERMS OF UNION WITH CANADA

On the order for motions: The Prime Minister—Motion for address to His Majesty the King respecting terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I wish to ask that this motion be allowed to stand until Monday. It had been intended to deal with it immediately after the third reading of the Newfoundland bill, but some hon. members who are not here today have expressed the hope that they might have an opportunity, at the last stage of the proceedings necessary in this house to complete the union of Newfoundland with Canada, to make some remarks on the subject, and the consideration of this motion for an address to His Majesty will give them that opportunity.

Motion stands.

THE PRIME MINISTER

REFERENCE TO DEPARTURE FOR WASHINGTON FOR CONFERENCE WITH PRESIDENT TRUMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Prime Minister is to leave this afternoon for an important conference in Washington with the President of the United States. Before he goes perhaps I might take the opportunity of wishing him well on his journey and in his deliberations, and ask him to convey to the President of the United States not only the good will and warm wishes of the government and its supporters in parliament, but also of parliament as a whole and of the Canadian people. I would ask him also to indicate to the President, as no doubt he will, that the most treasured desire and central objective of the Canadian people and the Canadian parliament is that the dogs of war shall be chained once and for all, and that it will never be necessary to have another world casualty list; in other words, that this country wants a just, permanent and lasting peace.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I think in this regard the hon. member for Peel speaks for everyone.

ISRAEL

INQUIRY AS TO SENDING OF TRADE MISSION FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has a trade mission been sent to the state of Israel? If not, what are the government's plans in this regard?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no trade mission has been sent from Canada to the state of Israel. The hon. member will recall that de facto recognition by Canada of the state of Israel took place only a few weeks ago, in December. I think I should say, however, that since we recognized de facto the state of Israel the government has had conversations in Ottawa with the representative of that state in Washington looking to ways and means of extending and developing our trade and commercial relations with that country. These conversations have been most encouraging.

BANK OF CANADA

REQUEST FOR ACCOMMODATION IN NEW CHARLOTTETOWN PUBLIC BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance with reference to the withdrawal of the Bank of Canada branch from Charlottetown. Will the minister consider the advisability of having proper accommodation arranged for the Bank of Canada branch when the new dominion building is being constructed in Charlottetown?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question. The situation in Charlottetown was this: The Bank of Canada was obliged to vacate the premises which it occupied, and was unable to find any other premises with suitable vault accommodation. Pending the obtaining of such premises the bank has made arrangements with the Eastern Trust Company of Charlottetown so that the people of that city and of Prince Edward Island as a whole will not be inconvenienced. I understand my colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), in the preparation of the plans for the new public building in Charlottetown, is taking into account the needs of the Bank of Canada at that point.

GOLD

SALES FROM SOUTH AFRICA AT PREMIUM OF $6.50 PER FINE OUNCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) asked whether in view of the approval by the international monetary fund of the sale by South Africa of newly-mined alloy gold to be used only for industrial or professional work at a premium of $6.50 a fine ounce over the fund's price of $35 a pure ounce, the government would extend the same right to Canadian gold producers. At that time I told him I had seen the press report but had no official information on the matter. I said I would make an inquiry. I have done so, and I find that the international monetary fund has not in fact approved any specific sale of gold at a premium by South Africa. Yesterday the international monetary fund issued a statement in that regard which, for the purpose of the record, I shall place on Hansard. That statement is as follows:

Following certain press reports about a gold sale at premium prices made by South Africa, the international monetary fund wishes to make it clear that it has not approved any specific gold sale at a premium price.

The fund was consulted four months ago by the South African government with regard to a proposed plan to sell semi-processed gold at premium prices for industrial, professional, or artistic purposes. The fund advised the South African government that it was "disturbed by the fear that the trade in semi-processed gold which is contemplated by the South African government would involve considerable sales of gold at premium prices for other than legitimate industrial, professional or artistic purposes. It felt that this would almost certainly be the consequence if the proposed transactions are to be on a scale sufficient to ensure an appreciable profit to . . . gold producers.

In these circumstances," the fund added, "the fund believes that South Africa should not engage in the proposed plan unless it is satisfied that it can take effective measures to ensure that gold sold under the plan will in fact be used for bona fide and customary industrial, professional or artistic purposes."

The South African government informed the fund over this past week end that it has agreed to sell a quantity of semi-processed gold at a premium price. However, in the light of the information submitted by South Africa, including the prices and quantities involved, the fund has found it necessary to get in touch with South Africa with a view particularly to determining whether the safeguards adopted are, in the fund's opinion, adequate to ensure that any gold sold will in fact be used for bona fide and customary industrial, professional and artistic purposes.

Mr. Harry R. Jackman (Rosedale): Following the answer given by the Minister of Finance, I should like to ask this question. If the Canadian gold industry observes the same restrictions as the South African industry in regard to newly-mined gold for industrial and professional purposes, will the Canadian industry be allowed to sell on the open market?

Mr. Abbott: I do not care to answer a hypothetical question. Gold has been sold by the Canadian Mint for industrial and commercial purposes, and permits have been given for the sale of semi-processed gold for those purposes. However, in each case the price has been related to $35 an ounce, which is the amount paid by the United States treasury.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION PROGRAM FOR 1949

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture, of which I have already given notice. Is it the intention of the government to give a lead to western farmers as to what grains should be grown for 1949? If so, will the minister make a statement to the house in that regard?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): As the hon. member has said, a copy of his question was sent to me this morning. The practice of the provincial and federal governments in the years preceding the war was that the provinces had the most to do with production. They gave more direction in that regard than did the federal department of agriculture. At the beginning of the war however it was thought advisable that considerable direction should be given by the Department of Agriculture in Ottawa. Therefore we held conferences annually, beginning in 1939, with the provincial authorities, farming organizations, the farm press and representatives of the federal Department of Agriculture, upon which occasions we discussed all questions relating to the necessity for greater production of one product as compared with another during the period of the war. That practice continued until two years ago, when we decided to hold conferences during the first week of December of each year and discuss the probable or possible program in connection with agricultural production for the succeeding year.

A conference was held on December 6, 7 and 8 last, at which the provinces and the farm organizations were fully represented. The agricultural press was represented, and for part of the time the daily press also. The question of the production of different farm products was fully discussed, and at the end of the meeting it was unanimously agreed that the direction that should go out from all sources should be to the effect that the acreage that had been utilized in the previous year for the purposes of producing different crops, or in connection with livestock, would be suitable for the coming year.

But there was one possible change. Where western farmers had seeded a considerable acreage in flaxseed in the years during the war and up to last year, it was considered, in view of our experience, that it might be well for them not to seed so much flax; and to the extent that they desisted from seeding flax it might be wise to put their acreage into coarse grains which would be required in greater and greater volume in the years ahead.

RADIO BROADCASTING

C.B.C. TORONTO STAFF—REFERENCE TO RETURN TABLED FEBRUARY 9

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a return which was tabled on February 9 in answer to a question I had asked about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation staff in Toronto. The answer is insufficient. I notice that the Minister of National Revenue is not here; therefore I shall bring up this matter on the motion to set up the special committee, or on some other occasion when the minister is here.

PASSPORTS

QUESTIONS AS TO RENEWALS BY ISSUE OF NEW PASSPORTS AFTER JANUARY 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister answer the question I asked on February 4 with regard to passports not being renewed after January 1 of this year?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am grateful to the hon. member for the patience and the courtesy he has shown in waiting for this information. I am afraid I have not even now all the information I desire to have in order to give him a full reply. But with regard to the point he raised the other day I can say this. After the Canadian Citizenship Act came into force on January 1, 1947, a new form of Canadian passport was issued. Subsequently it was found that certain inconveniences arose in renewing old passports which had been issued before January 1, 1947, because the national status of Canadians was not accurately described therein. Persons holding such passports are being asked, when they apply for renewals, to replace them with new passports. The new passports are issued without delay; they are valid for five years in the first instance, and may be renewed for a further period of five years.

The situation in regard to passports is now under review, particularly in relation to the practice being followed in other commonwealth countries where a similar problem has arisen. Full information is not yet available but I hope to be in position to make a further statement next week.

Mr. Fraser: When Newfoundland comes into the union, will residents of Newfoundland have to send their application forms to Ottawa?

Mr. Pearson: All I can say is that if and when Newfoundland comes into the union the citizens of that province will be issued passports in exactly the same way as they are issued to citizens of other parts of Canada.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will Peterborough have to have a special passport?

Mr. Fraser: Being the favoured county of Canada, it would be well if we did. I should like to direct another question to the minister. Has his department issued instructions to post offices, and other places where passport applications and renewals are issued, that passports cannot be renewed after January 1?

Mr. Pearson: I am not sure that that has been done, but it is one of the points I shall deal with in the answer which I hope to give to the hon. member at the earliest possible day.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF DISPLACED PERSONS—MEMBERS OF PROFESSIONAL GROUPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. Unfortunately I was able to send notice to him only at a late hour. Is consideration being given to liberalizing existing immigration regulations to permit the admission to Canada of displaced persons who belong to the professional groups?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): I received a copy of the question just before coming into the chamber. I think it is generally understood how difficult it is to act effectively, especially with regard to two of the classes which come within the category mentioned by the hon. member—dentists and doctors. Those professions largely control the naming of those who will be eligible to practise in Canada. A few such immigrants have been allowed to come to Canada as labourers, or, in other cases, as assistants to medical men. I may say, however, that the matter is being given serious consideration.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

AIRPORT SOUTH OF PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. C. Miller (Portage la Prairie): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Some transfer of authority is taking place affecting the airport south of Portage la Prairie. I should like the minister to indicate what the plans of the government are with regard to this matter; in particular whether the airport will be reopened for training purposes, or whether other expansion is contemplated.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I shall be glad to look into the matter and give my hon. friend an answer later.

SAM CARR

STATEMENT AS TO CHARGE TO BE PREFERRED UNDER THE CRIMINAL CODE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that Mr. Sam Carr is now in custody in Ottawa and will be brought before a magistrate in this city tomorrow. He will probably be remanded for one week. In anticipation of Mr. Carr's return we had retained Mr. John Cartwright, K.C., of Toronto to act as government counsel in this case. The charge with which we propose to proceed is that of conspiracy to commit forgery. This is under section 573 of the Criminal Code, and carries a maximum sentence of seven years. The alleged offence occurred in connection with the renewal of a Canadian passport issued to one Witczak and taken from him and used by an international spy posing under his name.

SOCIAL SECURITY

QUESTION AS TO PROVISION FOR INCAPACITATED PERSONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Health and Welfare. Has anything been done for the incapacitated people in Canada so as to give some relief and some social security to these unfortunate deserving people?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think the hon. gentleman would be the first to admit the general character of his question. I cannot of course say what is being done, other than by the government of Canada, for the people concerned. I may say that much is being done for those who are incapacitated for one reason or another. I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the provisions that are made in the national health plan to cover tubercular patients, and persons suffering from cancer, arthritis, poliomyelitis, mental disease, and so on. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate the very wide scope of the services covered by these grants.

NEWFOUNDLAND

APPROVAL OF TERMS OF UNION WITH CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 11, to approve the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Mr. John R. MacNicol (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I shall not delay for more than a few moments the passage of this important and historic bill. I am fairly familiar with that magnificent island which is to be our tenth province; yet I feel that I should speak very briefly. Newfoundland was represented at the Quebec conference of 1864, when the four provinces of Canada, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—decided to enter confederation. I often recall the words of Sir Ambrose Shea, who was one of the two Newfoundland representatives. So far as they were concerned they were satisfied with the proposals and would have joined the confederation, but did not have the authority to do so at that time. Ever since 1864, well-wishers of confederation, both in Newfoundland and in Canada, have looked forward to this day. I am sure we are all happy indeed at the prospect that lies before us. I will not repeat the exact words of Sir Ambrose Shea, but he said that, looking into the future, he could hardly describe the great vista that opened before him, in the realization of what confederation would mean to his province and to Canada.

Confederation has turned out to be something much greater than anything Sir Ambrose Shea could have visualized. At that time British Columbia was not a part of Canada, nor were the three western provinces. If Sir Ambrose could have foreseen the Canada of today, of which Newfoundland will be the tenth province, he would have seen that we have one river, the Mackenzie, with the largest basin, all in the same country, on the whole continent of North America. Some will say at once that I am forgetting the Mississippi, but the basin of the Mississippi is not all in the United States; part of it is in Alberta and part of it is in Saskatchewan. The Mackenzie river is wholly in Canada.

Canada also borders the largest lake in the world, although not all of it is in Canada. Eleven thousand square miles of the 31,000 square miles of Lake Superior are in Canada. We also have exceptionally high mountains. At the time of Sir Ambrose Shea, the St. Elias group of mountains between Yukon and Alaska, which rises to a great height, were not known to be in Canada. The highest mountain in that range is Mount Logan, with a height of 19,850 feet. Canada has inexhaustible resources. What would Sir Ambrose Shea have seen? He would have seen that the Canada of today is one of the largest national areas in the world. I believe we are exceeded only by Russia, including Siberia, but we are larger than European Russia. Together with Newfoundland's 152,000 square miles, we shall now have approximately 3,750,000 square miles. Including Newfoundland and Labrador, the population of Canada will be very close to thirteen and a half million people.

We have grown to be a very great state both in area and in population. Our cousins to the south have a larger population, but continental United States is more than 750,000 square miles smaller than Canada. Including Alaska it is perhaps 150,000 square miles less. I do not know whether it is there now because the building may have been blown down in the late war, but I often think of the inscription on the money exchange building in London near the famous monument to the great fire. The inscription is: "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof." When God made this part of the world he must have been thinking of the fulness of this country, because, interpreting fulness as material wealth, in many respects we surpass the whole world. For instance, there is nickel; in Canada we have approximately nine-tenths of all the nickel in the world.

Mr. St. Laurent: Asbestos.

Mr. MacNicol: Asbestos is to be found in the eastern townships of Quebec; we have approximately eighty to ninety per cent of all the asbestos in the world. Our country is rich in all minerals. It is only a few years ago that Canada produced over $200 million worth of gold, and at the same time the production of all minerals in Canada exceeded $500 million.

In coming into confederation, therefore, Newfoundland is joining one of the great countries of the world, and with the new province we shall make a greater country still. To me it is a solemn occasion when I think that from 1864 to 1949, a period of over eighty years, many efforts have been made to make confederation complete. When this bill passes the house, as it will, confederation will be complete. As the years roll on, those who come after us will refer to that great year when the confederation of Canada was completed as the fathers of confederation visualized it in 1864 and 1867. We in this house will be off the scene at that time, but we will be remembered for our humble parts in bringing to pass what the fathers of confederation sought to accomplish.

A short time ago I came across a few lines which seem to suit what is running through my mind at the moment. I will quote them:

> For the structure that we raise
> Time is with materials filled.
> Our todays and yesterdays
> Are the blocks with which we build.

The blocks with which this structure has been built are the men who carried on the negotiations for union from 1864 onward, the fathers of confederation of those days, representing Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, and those who carried on the present negotiations. Down the years all these men were labouring to build this fine structure which has finally come to pass. Now we and our brothers in Newfoundland may look forward to the certainty of rising to even greater heights.

Today we add another 1,500 miles to our Atlantic front. A moment ago when the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) was giving the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) some admonitions with respect to his trip to Washington, I thought of something else the Prime Minister might take up when he is in the United States. I hesitate to mention it, and I do not suppose he would have time to do it anyway, but on some future occasion he might consider negotiating with the United States in an endeavour to bring in the panhandle which cuts five hundred miles off our western coast. That is something for the future. If it should ever come to pass, what a majestic country we would have from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

As a humble Canadian, Mr. Speaker, I am proud and happy that the vision which these great men have had all down the years, and which our present leaders have worked so hard to fulfil, at last has become a reality.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS ACT

EXTENSION OF OPERATION FOR A PERIOD OF ONE YEAR

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Agricultural Products Act to extend the operation of the act for a period of one year.

Mr. Graydon: I take it the minister will want to introduce this resolution with a somewhat comprehensive statement, and I suggest that the appropriate time to do so would be before Mr. Speaker leaves the chair, having in mind that this procedure has been generally followed so far this session.

Mr. Gardiner: The bill it is intended to introduce if the resolution is adopted is short and simple, providing that the provisions of the act concerning the sale and export of agricultural products shall be extended to cover an additional year. The provision made last session was to the effect that this bill was to cover the period to March 31, 1949. The new bill will provide that the period be extended to March 31, 1950.

The reason a bill of this kind is required is the fact that the activities with which it deals were carried on during the war under the War Measures Act. When the War Measures Act came to an end provision was made for some of the matters that had been dealt with under that legislation to be continued under the special measures act. A special measures act was introduced to deal with many of the matters that had been carried on by order in council under the War Measures Act, but so far as the sale of agricultural products by contract was concerned, a special act dealt with those, and it is a bill to extend that act with which we are dealing at the moment.

At this stage it might be advisable to point out that the bill itself defines the agricultural products which are covered by it, by saying:

"Agricultural product" means any product of agriculture, except wheat, and includes "feeding stuff" within the meaning of The Feeding Stuffs Act of 1937.

I quote that in order to point out that the wheat contract does not come under this bill. That contract has been dealt with under the wheat board act. In addition I think I should point out that section 3 of the bill provides:

Subject to any regulations that may be made by the governor in council, the minister may

(a) sell or export agricultural products to the government of any country or any agency thereof pursuant to any agreement made by the government of Canada with the government of such country or with such agency and for these purposes may purchase agricultural products and make such arrangements for the purchase, sale or export of agricultural products as he considers necessary or desirable;

(b) on behalf of the government of any country or any agency thereof purchase or negotiate contracts for the purchase of agricultural products;

(c) by order require any person to give such information respecting his facilities for the storing or processing of agricultural products and at such times as the minister may designate in such order;

(d) enter into contracts for the storing or processing of agricultural products.

I read those two sections in order to call attention to two facts. The first is that this covers all agricultural products other than wheat. The second is that the products other than wheat are limited to those for which we have agreements. At the present time we have agreements with Great Britain for the sale of bacon, cheese and eggs. The agreement with respect to bacon is carried out under the meat board. The agreement for the sale of cheese is carried out under the dairy products board. The agreement for the sale of eggs is carried out under the special products board. These are the three boards that were in existence during the war. Each is still carrying out a contract with respect to one important item; therefore it is necessary to continue in existence the three boards we had during the war period, and it is necessary to deal with matters having to do with bacon, eggs and cheese in any discussions we may have concerning what is to be done in the year 1949-50.

Mr. Bentley: May I ask the minister if horse meat is considered an agricultural product now?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I presume horse meat is considered an agricultural product, but we have not an agreement with any government concerning it, so it does not come under this act as it is now operating.

Mr. Brooks: If I may ask a question, would apples or cheese—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not object to hon. members asking questions, but I suggest that the proper time to do so is when the house is in committee. As hon. members know, when the Speaker is in the chair an hon. member may speak only once.

Mr. Gardiner: I was just going to say that I do not think it would be helpful for me to attempt at this stage to go into any details either with respect to the contracts we had in 1948 or the contracts we expect to carry through in 1949. As soon as the motion is carried and we go into committee I shall be glad to attempt to answer any questions anyone may care to ask; and I leave it to hon. members to determine whether they wish to go into committee at once in order that a discussion of that kind may take place, or whether they would rather proceed with the discussion for the time being with the Speaker in the chair. At some suitable time I hope we will get into committee, when I hope to be able to give any information that may be desired.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): As the minister has said, this resolution to amend the Agricultural Products Act to extend the operation of the act for a period of one year is really a continuation of the War Measures Act for certain purposes.

Part of the preamble of that act, brought in in 1947, says:

—the government of Canada entered into agreements for the sale or export of food supplies to other governments or agencies thereof, which agreements still continue in force; and whereas certain orders and regulations were made by the governor in council under the authority of the War Measures Act and the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, for the purpose of enabling Canada to carry out the said agreements; and whereas the said orders and regulations will expire on the 31st day of March, 1947, and it is necessary by reason of the existing national emergency that parliament confer authority—

In another paragraph the act points out that,

"agricultural product" means any product of agriculture, except wheat, and includes "feeding stuff."

Another clause of the act reads:

—the minister may sell or export agricultural products to the government of any country—

The entire authority is vested in the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) under the act as passed in 1947.

As a companion to this act, there is an act known as the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, which was merely a transitional measure to provide for the maintenance of price levels and by which a revolving fund of $200 million was established. This amounts to less than 10 per cent of the amount this government has prevented the agricultural producers of Canada from receiving by means of controls, embargoes and government marketing programs. In other words, since 1942, this government has caused the farmers to lose over $2,000 million, which cannot be easily recovered. This figure is over three times the total expenditure of the three prairie provincial governments during those same years. It is a sizeable sum of money which the farmers have contributed by marketing their goods through government agencies.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture told the members of the house that, by taking less than the prevailing world price for bacon, wheat and dairy products, et cetera, the Canadian farmer would be assured of good overseas markets after the war. Mr. Speaker, today Britain is purchasing great quantities of bacon from Poland and Denmark, beef from the Argentine and wheat from Russia. The Canadian overseas market for apples, fruits and potatoes has been entirely lost. Beef on the hoof and certain other agricultural products in Canada have decreased in price during the past five months by over 20 per cent, yet the cost of living index has reached an all-time high and now stands at 159·6. I do not think the consumers can accuse the agricultural producer of responsibility for that situation.

With respect to the cost of living today, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking on December 11, 1947, as reported at page 215 of Hansard, said:

. . . we have continued our control on wheat by making a contract with Great Britain. . . . the price of feed grains to farmers in eastern Canada and in other parts of Canada has borne about the same relationship to wheat as the government would have been compelled to place upon oats and barley if they had followed the suggestion of the organized farmers . . .

On the same page, he said:

. . . the most effective control on feed grains is the fact that there is an established value for wheat.

The Minister of Agriculture, speaking on this Agricultural Products Act on December 19, 1947, said this at page 503 of Hansard:

There has always been the closest check made on the relationship between wheat and feed grains, and between feed grains and products fed from feed grains, when all these contracts were being negotiated.

At page 504 he said:

We have the No. 2 price, which is the price under which wheat is sold to countries outside Great Britain. The No. 2 price is one we are able to charge because of certain conditions, the first of which is that we have sold an average of 150 million bushels a year to Great Britain over a period of four years . . . That is the first factor which makes it possible for us to ask a price, rather than to go on the market and sell at a price which is offered.

The second reason is that we are able to say it has a higher intrinsic value;

Mr. Ross (Souris): Could the minister explain how the wheat committee of the cabinet arrived at this price for No. 2 wheat?

Mr. Gardiner: The committee arrived at the price of No. 2 wheat by taking the United States price; then adding to it something to cover the intrinsic value of the wheat as compared with United States wheat, and then adding to that an additional value because of the extra protein content. We thus arrived at a price at which the wheat could be sold, and that price is higher than the United States price.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): By United States price you mean the Chicago price?

Mr. Gardiner: The price which has been established from time to time in the United States.

At that time, Mr. Smith was referring to the Chicago grain exchange.

At page 509, the minister said, the British government——is prepared to give us in writing the undertaking which was given by word of mouth with regard to 1949, which will carry the food contracts in relation to these four commodities right through until close to the end of the wheat contract, with a position established where the amount which our farmers are receiving for wheat is similar to that which is being received in the other great exporting countries.

I believe the four commodities referred to, along with wheat, were bacon, beef, eggs and cheese. In fact, the minister spoke of those commodities this afternoon.

Mr. Gardiner: Not along with wheat, apart from wheat.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Apart from wheat; the point the minister was establishing was the fact that all these must bear some relationship to the basic price of wheat.

I have cited the authority of the special legislation for what the government had been doing under the War Measures Act. During 1946, the percentage of the total imports of Great Britain supplied by Canada for the various commodities is as follows: wheat flour 57 per cent; bacon, 38 per cent; carcass meat, which is chiefly beef, 7·6 per cent; eggs in the shell, 15 per cent; dried eggs, 15 per cent; cheese, 24·2 per cent and evaporated milk 10·5 per cent. It is recognized throughout this country that the government, year after year, neglected the United States market. They systematically refused to sell to those who wanted our foods and, at the same time, created a heavy deficit of United States dollars.

In 1946, during the discussions on the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement, this party stood alone in opposition to forcing the Canadian wheat producer to carry the entire financial burden. There were no ifs, so far as we were concerned. We predicted exactly what would happen, despite the protestations of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and of our socialist friends, the C.C.F.

If the terms of the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement had been carried out according to the adjustment clause, the price for the fourth year of the agreement would have been over $5 per bushel. However, it has now been arranged to ignore the terms of the contract and leave the final settlement until after the next Canadian general election. According to press reports Canada to date has received $640 million for offshore purchases under ECA. During the past twelve months, most of this money has come from Washington. Fifty per cent of the total of $322 million has been used to buy wheat, for the most part on British order.

I think that is proof of the serious situation facing the producers of this country. When wheat was selling on the world markets for $3.35 a bushel the United States farmer was receiving the full benefit, and the same thing applies to other agricultural products; while they bought their implements of production as cheap as, and in some cases cheaper than, the Canadian farmer. In this respect I wish to quote a letter which I have received—

Mr. Cruickshank: Have you anybody else to quote?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I have a lot more quoting to do. I want the hon. member to pay attention to what I am going to read now. I hold in my hand a registered letter from Morris, Manitoba. This is rather significant because a year ago the minister put on the record a letter which came from somewhere near that neighbourhood at a time when wheat was under discussion.

Mr. Gardiner: Mine was from Portage.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is very close, but this one is different from the minister's correspondence. It reads:

> After reading my Free Press tonight—

He is putting in a plug for the Free Press.

> —and your speech about the United Kingdom wheat agreement I cannot help but thank you personally. It is a pity that there are only so few like you that have enough guts when at Ottawa to fight for the right, and that is all that the western farmer wants. I am just a young farmer who started farming in 1946, same time as the United Kingdom wheat agreement commenced; had to pay a very high price for all my farm machinery and high interest, which I still pay on $1,200, and then let Jimmie Gardiner sell our wheat for half price, and even then not pay us cash. What does he think we are? I happen to be one that took a wheat certificate for 1,000 bushels to the bank to borrow some money on it, and all I got was a big grin from the bank manager, and he said, "they are no good, young man." I am a true Canadian, and been a good Liberal all my life, but God forbid to ever again vote for a party that will let Jimmie Gardiner sell you down the river.

The minister put a letter on the record a year ago which came from Portage. It was addressed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the writer said that he was going to trust in God and Gardiner and continue the production of hogs. The writer of the letter I have read apparently has not the same faith as the chap who wrote to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Gardiner: They will balance out all right.

Mr. Ross (Souris): An editorial appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of February 7, and the heading was: "Empty criticisms". It says:

> The Conservative party supported the wheat agreement when it was entered into in July, 1946. The Conservative party voted in parliament for the wheat agreement.

I have challenged the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to show me any record in Hansard of 1946 where that vote took place. I cannot find it myself. I say it is an absolute misstatement of fact. The editorial goes on, but this is further proof of what the Free Press does have to say on some occasions.

Mr. Gardiner: If it was a unanimous vote, there would be no record in Hansard.

Mr. Ross (Souris): There was no vote.

Mr. Gardiner: It was unanimous.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member did not oppose it.

Mr. Wright: The hon. member should have voted against it if he opposed it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): We have the new Minister of Justice and the Minister of Agriculture going quite a long way together in the last few months. I shall have some reference to make to that in the future.

Mr. Cruickshank: They will go a long way further together.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The first announcement of the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement was given by the then Minister of Trade and Commerce on July 25, 1946. The hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken) asked when we might discuss the policy, and the then Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) said:

> The estimates of my department will be before the house very soon, and we can then have full discussion.

These estimates were first introduced in the house on August 14, 1946, and my leader then, now the hon. member for Neepawa, and many others, spoke in opposition to that agreement as wholeheartedly as we could at that time. There never was any vote on the matter of the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement at all.

Mr. Garson: Why did you not call for a vote?

Mr. Ross (Souris): The Deputy Governor General in closing the 1946 session of parliament on August 31, 1946, said, among other things:

> An agreement has been made with the United Kingdom for the marketing of our wheat. The wheat agreement, with agreements for the marketing of other foodstuffs already in operation, will greatly assist the government in its policy of maintaining stable prices for agricultural products.

There was no vote whatever in 1946. Hon. members will recall that there was a by-election in Portage la Prairie in October, 1946. The Minister of Agriculture has referred to Portage. He took up his residence there for a considerable period of time. I do not believe he addressed a meeting in that constituency in which the wheat contract was not discussed. It was an issue there. In that campaign the government was supported on the wheat deal by C.C.F. speakers. We opposed that agreement throughout the by-election and hon. members know the result.

I should now like to refer to the price of international farm implements. In the letter I read reference was made to that. In 1945, just prior to the wheat agreement, these implements were selling for the following prices: the three plow tractor sold for $1,630.60; the combine for $3,150; the twelve foot swather for $394.60; the harrow plow for $401.75. In 1948, after the agreement the same three plow tractor sold for $2,179.75; the combine for $4,219.85; the twelve foot swather for $519 and the harrow plow for $488.

Of course today prices have gone considerably higher. I have comparisons as to the number of bushels of wheat the United States farmer has to produce to buy these same implements as compared with the Canadian farmer. To purchase in Canada a Farmall M tractor, international company tractor, required 1,225 bushels of wheat; in the United States, 710 bushels of wheat. To purchase a 3-furrow international tractor plow in Canada required 151 bushels of wheat; in the United States, 82 bushels. To purchase a 24-run international double disc seeder in Canada, required 270 bushels of wheat; in the United States, 146 bushels. To purchase a 10-foot international binder in Canada required 333 bushels of wheat; in the United States, 184 bushels. To purchase the same tractor in Canada would require slightly over the price of eleven finished 1,000-pound steers, while in the United States the same type of tractor would require the proceeds of only slightly over six such animals. It would require 46 select hogs weighing 210 pounds in Canada or 26 such hogs in the United States to purchase the same type of tractor. After all, what can be purchased with the goods that the farmer produces is what he is interested in.

Mr. Reid: Will the hon. member permit one question? Can he give us some of the prices of farm machinery across the line as compared with Canada? He is giving us the number of bushels of wheat to purchase the machine. My advice has always been that to compare machinery in one place with machinery in another you should have the prices, and my understanding is that the prices are cheaper in the United States than they are in Canada.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I have already made that statement in the remarks I have made. If the hon. member had been listening he would have heard me say that. I said that the farmers in the United States, while receiving all the benefits of high agricultural prices, were able to buy their farm implements cheaper than we could buy them in Canada.

With respect to federal taxes, direct and indirect taxes amounted per capita to $22.41 in 1913, and in 1939 the per capita had risen to $38.67. In 1947, the year just past, that per capita tax was $192.97. The tax has multiplied over five times since the beginning of the second world war, and it has greatly added to the cost of production and the cost of living in Canada, a fact which government officials have ignored in compiling the cost of living index and of production for this nation.

I should like to say to the government backbenchers who are now making vehement speeches asking for the reduction of taxation that they had an opportunity a year ago to vote against the tax measures of this government. That was at a time when they were showing the largest surpluses in the history of this nation. They apparently think, along with their government, that they can bleed the people of this nation for four years and then play Santa Claus in the fifth year just prior to an election.

A year ago we proposed a motion giving hon. members an opportunity to vote against that if they had wished.

The Canadian federation of agriculture, in their brief of December 14, 1948, showed that the urban consumers have made great gains over the past fifty years in their food purchasing power per hour of work. Hourly wage rates last September could buy 60 per cent more food than in 1913 or 68 per cent more than in 1920. The farmer does not begrudge the gains of urban groups, provided these gains are not made at the food producers' expense, and provided these gains are in line with increases in productivity.

Mr. Cruickshank: You are on the wrong page now.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) politely asked the minister if he could ask a question. There were cries of order from the government benches. The Speaker rose of his own volition; the question was never answered and the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) was asked to sit down. We on this side of the house expect the same courtesy and also the same ruling; and it about time these asinine interruptions from over there were stopped.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a point of order, I will leave it to any member of the house from any party to say who interrupts more, when my leader, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent), is speaking, than the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). Who interrupts more than the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith)?

Then, Mr. Speaker, on a further point of order, according to the rules of the house one is not allowed to read his speech; but the hon. member for Souris has read every word of what he has said this afternoon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must point out that hon. members who have the floor should not be interrupted, nor should questions be asked without permission.

Mr. Cruickshank: And they should not read their speeches, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Also in this instance I should add that the hon. member for Souris did provoke some of the interruptions by referring to certain backbenchers. I believe that is why the interruption was made.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am no backbencher; but when it becomes a matter of listening to the reading of a speech—

Mr. Ross (Souris): In the ten sessions I have been here it has become quite apparent—this session is different and I am not sure whether it is the fault of the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, or the government whip—that they certainly have lost control of the house. That has not engendered respect for parliament throughout this nation, when people read Hansard and note the performance in the last two weeks of this session.

Mr. Grant: You have been the worst offender yourself.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The loss on the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement—

Mr. Cruickshank: What are you reading from?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I suggest the house should now allow the hon. member for Souris to continue without interruptions.

Mr. Cruickshank: Make him stop reading.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I think the whip on the government side should be called into action occasionally. The loss on the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement to the wheat producers from August 1, 1946 to December 31, 1948 amounted to $392 million.

Mr. Gardiner: On a point of order, when I was introducing the measure I deliberately pointed out that it does not cover wheat at all. I did it for the purpose of avoiding what is now taking place. However, if other hon. members are to be permitted to discuss wheat on this measure, then in making my reply it will be necessary for me to discuss it too. There will be another opportunity during the session to discuss wheat; this is not at all the time to do it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): On the point of order the minister has just raised, I have quoted from many pages of his speech on this subject of agricultural products delivered a year ago, on December 19. If anyone cares to look up the record of that speech he will find some five pages wherein the Minister of Agriculture dealt continually with wheat and its relationship to other agricultural products of this country, and the wheat contract with Great Britain in particular.

Mr. Gardiner: I am just pointing out that that was done on previous occasions. If it is going to be repeated on this occasion, then I should hope no one will call me to order when I reply to what is being said. However, I do not think that is the way to keep order in debate. The hon. member has just made the statement that the Chair has lost control of the house. The only way to keep the Chair in control is to act according to the rules, and the rules provide that we cannot discuss wheat on this measure.

Mr. Fulton: On the point of order, the Minister of Agriculture should keep in mind that we are discussing a resolution, not a bill. That resolution states:

> That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Agricultural Products Act—and so on. That bill is not before us. It is all very well for him to say how it is to be amended. I should think, however, that until we have the bill before us we do not know exactly what it contains. Therefore we do not know whether it discusses wheat or other products. I submit that, despite what the minister has said, and his attempt to confine the discussion, the hon. member for Souris is perfectly in order in speaking as he has done on the resolution stage before the bill is introduced.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I believe I am in order. There was no interference and no question raised in a similar discussion respecting this act a year ago, when the Minister of Agriculture, on page after page, dealt with wheat. Now he raises the point of order. I am sure I am as much in order today as he was at that time.

Mr. Bentley: We have a right to Your Honour's ruling. The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has pointed out that there is nothing in the resolution to indicate whether wheat is included. The resolution does specifically mention agricultural products, and the act states specifically that it includes all agricultural products, except wheat.

Mr. Fulton: But it may be amended to include wheat.

Mr. Bentley: I am not taking any sides as to who is right or wrong. But, as the minister has said, if permission is given to others to discuss products not included in the act, then we should all know it, so that we can take whatever part we care to take in the debate. We would like a ruling on the point of order.

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

Mr. Graydon: May I speak to the point of order? I was out of the chamber at the time it was raised, but I believe I understand the purport of it. I should not think that a reasonable and sensible decision with respect to the question as to how far an hon. member may go in discussing wheat can be made until the bill is before us. However, I believe it has been the experience in the house throughout the years that those matters mentioned in the act can be debated, and other things omitted from the act may have the attention of the House of Commons as they are related to the matter under discussion.

I am in agreement with the views expressed by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley), while this is in the resolution stage. When the bill comes before parliament I believe we should have the widest range of discussion of the whole matter, including the marketing of agricultural products.

I am hoping, Mr. Speaker, that you will not attempt to confine the discussion and that you will allow the hon. member for Souris to continue; for after all this matter has a great bearing upon the economy of Canada, and is a major issue at the present time.

Mr. Cruickshank: He has only about ten pages to read.

Mr. Graydon: Thank you, Fraser Valley—but you are not making the speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must take some exception to the remarks of the hon. member for Souris, when he stated that the Speaker had lost control.

Mr. Jackman: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think it is proper for him to make that statement. At times there are interruptions which should not be made, and I think hon. members on both sides are responsible for those interruptions. Mr. Speaker—and in that I include myself—must try to prevent hon. members from making those uncalled-for interruptions. All I can say at this time is that I would ask the co-operation of all hon. members in maintaining order for the proper decorum of the house.

Mr. Cruickshank: Read the next four pages.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Then, referring to the point of order raised, may I point out that the resolution before the house states:

> That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Agricultural Products Act to extend the operation of the Act for a period of one year.

Although I have not the act before me, I understood the Minister of Agriculture to say that wheat was not included in it. However, I think I would be making too fine a decision if I said that the hon. member could not suggest at this time that wheat might be included, and that he could not discuss the possibility of the inclusion of wheat in the act. I do not intend to interrupt the hon. member for that purpose.

I would however point out to the hon. member for Souris that the objection has been raised that he is reading his speech. I do not know whether he is reading it, or whether he is following his notes.

Mr. Cruickshank: Very closely.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: But I would ask him, if he is reading his speech, to discontinue doing so, and to speak freely.

Mr. Cruickshank: That would tongue-tie him.

Mr. Gardiner: On the point of order, I am afraid Your Honour did not understand what I said. The question of wheat, which is now being discussed, is provided for in another act, namely the Canadian Wheat Board Act. Another minister has charge of that bill.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, do you permit discussion after you have ruled?

Mr. Gardiner: Another minister has charge of that bill and I am not in a position at this time or at any other time to have that matter discussed on this bill. This bill distinctly states that agricultural products mean any product of agriculture except wheat. You have ruled, Mr. Speaker, that there is nothing to prevent my hon. friend asking that wheat be included in the bill, but that is not what he is doing. He is trying to discuss what took place under another act and I submit that he is not in order.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your ruling and I intend to abide by it regardless of the minister's objections. During this discussion I have done nothing but make a comparison of other agricultural products, and the Minister of Agriculture himself did that a year ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: My ruling was that I could not object to the hon. member asking that wheat be included in the act, and giving his reasons therefor.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Many people in this country have said that the Minister of Agriculture, who has objected to my referring to wheat, made the greatest gamble ever made by any individual or government in the history of the world when he sold this country short some 600 million bushels of wheat, of which 440 million bushels had not even been seeded and for which no man or woman had any idea what the future price would be. On the basis of that contract he has attempted to tie in the value of all other agricultural products, coarse grains, beef, pork, dairy products and poultry products; they have all been tied in with the price of wheat. Anyone can read the remarks he made, as reported in Hansard on December 19. The tying of the value of those agricultural products to the artificial price of wheat which had been created by this government has cost the agricultural producers of this country considerably over $2,000 million, an amount which they have no way of recouping. Statistics will prove that. I am one of those who believe that the government should reimburse those producers who have made altogether too great a contribution, along with paying their own share of the taxes for the subsidization of consumers during the war years.

A few minutes ago the Minister of Justice had something to say and I should like to call him as a witness on my behalf. I have before me the report of a speech which he made on March 31, 1948, not quite a year ago, when he was discussing the wheat board act. I intended to quote it but as that seems objectionable to some of my hon. friends across the way I shall just state that he pointed out that the wheat board was created in the interests of the wheat producers of this country and was so used until 1943, when by order in council this government decided to use it for some other purpose. Ever since then they have been using it to keep down prices.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, I would much rather have my hon. friend quote my remarks than give his own interpretation.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I wish they could get together over there.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member was reading his speech, not quoting.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Page four of this published speech, which was pretty well distributed throughout the province of Manitoba, reads:

> The Canadian Wheat Board Act of 1935 set up the wheat board as the voluntary agency of the wheat producers, charged with the fiduciary responsibility to secure for farmers who shipped wheat to it the best price available consistent with the promotion of the sale and use of Canadian wheat in world markets; and until the change made by order in council in 1943 all the business of the board was conducted on this basis.
> During the war, on September 28, 1943, by order in council P.C. 7942 your government provided that the wheat board was to become a compulsory agency or monopoly where it had formerly been a voluntary agency; and that it was to become the agent of the Crown, instead of continuing as it had been the agent of the wheat producers. Later in 1947, the provisions of this order in council were incorporated into the provisions of the wheat board act where they now appear as section 4, ss. (2), reading as follows:

"4. (2) The board is for all purposes an agent of His Majesty in the right of Canada and its powers under this act may be exercised by it only as an agency of His Majesty in the said right."

And again:

The effect of these provisions in practice was that the wheat board was changed from being an agency of the wheat producers charged with responsibility for getting the best possible price, to an agency of the government, getting a price which would be fixed by the government, that is a political price, using that phrase in its best sense. Since 1943, when the wheat board was changed from being an agency of the wheat growers to being an agency of the government, the price paid to Canadian farmers for their wheat has been determined as a matter of government policy in the light of such consideration as the food agreements with Great Britain and the advantages of holding down the cost of living in Canada, and doubtless other equally worthwhile reasons.

Then I quote from page 13 as follows:

The holding down of the Canadian cost of living and the embargo upon the exports of farm products to the United States are examples of policies which are intelligible and perhaps wise. But they are also national policies, the cost of carrying out which should be paid, in our opinion, by the whole body of the Canadian people and not by the Canadian farmers only.

I hope he is able to bring that about now as a minister of the government. Farther down on the same page appears the following:

What other products of Canada, either primary or secondary, is the government going to fix the price of and leave the burden of carrying the difference between the government price and the market price upon the producers of those products? If this is a good policy for wheat and pork and beef and poultry products, and now oats and barley, why is it not a good policy for copper, newsprint, fish, tractors and farm implements?

It will be seen that the minister and I do not differ on everything all the time. I am pleased to call him as a witness and I hope he can exercise enough authority with his colleagues to see that these producers are reimbursed for the altogether unfair contribution they have made for so many years to the consumers of Great Britain and Canada. I am sure that is only a fair and reasonable request.

I pointed out at the beginning of my remarks that this was a continuation of the war emergency measures. It will give power to the Minister of Agriculture to arrange, through the cabinet, all these contracts and to do what he pleases with what our farmers produce in order to fill them. When the act was brought into being he told us that the representatives of many farm organizations were then in Ottawa asking for marketing legislation. That was not the type of legislation they were asking for, or, if they were, they have changed their minds.

Last year the farm federation of Canada presented to the government a brief asking for a natural products marketing act. As my time is just about up I shall not attempt to read the brief, although it is important. The Bennett government brought such an act into being but when the Liberal government took over they sent it to the courts where it was declared to be ultra vires.

The farmers of the country want enabling legislation so that they may have control of the marketing of their own products. They are asking for legislation similar to that passed in 1934 by the Bennett government, which legislation was then known as the Natural Products Marketing Act. The resolution follows:

Whereas the organized farmers of Canada, through the provincial and Canadian federations of agriculture, have on many occasions since the court decision that the 1934 marketing act was ultra vires, requested the dominion government to enact comprehensive marketing legislation that would enable farmers to market their products in an orderly manner;

And whereas the government has not seen fit to pass such legislation and has not as yet given any logical reason why this request of the farmers should not be granted;

And whereas eight of the nine provinces of Canada have shown by their actions in passing provincial legislation that, in their opinion, such legislation is necessary and in the public interest;

Therefore be it resolved:

1. That the Canadian federation of agriculture again puts on record its belief that dominion marketing legislation, to supplement the provincial acts, is urgently necessary if the farmers of Canada are to be placed in a position equal to that of other elements in the community.

2. That once more the Canadian federation of agriculture requests the dominion government to introduce at the next session of parliament comprehensive marketing legislation that will make it possible for groups of farmers to control the marketing of their own products rather than be at the mercy of speculative interests.

3. That failing assurances that such legislation will be introduced, the Canadian federation of agriculture demands to know the reasons why the government of Canada, by its lack of action in this important matter, is apparently of the opinion that the farmers of Canada should be kept permanently in an inferior position as compared with other elements of society, and that such reasons be published for the information of all Canadian farmers.

I think that is sufficient proof, Mr. Speaker, that farmers in general across Canada are not satisfied with this act. I know personally that they are very much dissatisfied with the state of confusion that has been created by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the government under this act. They are very fearful about their future. Their costs of production have risen consistently. I have given some instances with respect to the cost of farm implements. The cost of farm labour is higher today than at any time in history, although I am sure we want to see all workers well paid in this country. Then there is the cost of fuel oil, the twine they use, and everything else which enters into agricultural production. These things have not been taken into account at all at this time.

The bureau of statistics issues figures showing the income of the agricultural population, but that is gross income. In many cases it would be very significant to have the net income and compare it with the gross. I say the farmers of the country are very fearful about their future. They are not satisfied with what has been done in the past under this act, and under the orders in council of the government. They are entitled to a great deal better act at this time. Therefore I disapprove of this measure as it is drawn, and I think there should be other marketing legislation provided in the interests of producers.

Mr. Thomas Reid (New Westminster): At this time I desire to say a few words on the resolution. First of all I have something to say with regard to the speech to which we have just listened. I suppose it is not unnatural for men who are growing wheat to want more money. Everybody usually wants more.

Mr. Ross (Souris): All agricultural producers.

Mr. Reid: But I think the time has come when a decision will have to be made about many classes in this country. I sat in the House of Commons during the depression years, and I remember that wheat dropped to something like 40 cents. The cry in those days was that it was the responsibility of the government to do something about it. I have always felt that if citizens of the country are going to say on the one hand that they want to be free agents in the sale of their products on the markets of the world so that they may obtain the best price, if they are going to say in that situation that they do not want government interference, then the same philosophy should be followed throughout the lean years. You cannot say at one time that it is the responsibility of the government when prices are not good, and then when there is a better market come along and say to the government, "get out of it; it is ours now; we are free individuals." It is about time that some of us, who are buyers of wheat, told the farmers of the prairies what we are up against in British Columbia.

We have a splendid market for wheat in British Columbia. I should like to ask hon. members, including the hon. member who has just spoken, what kind of poultry and egg prices he thinks can be obtained when we are called upon to pay $3.75 per 100 pounds for No. 5 wheat. It is no wonder our people are beginning to look at the prairies and say, "well, those boys are surely getting away with a real harvest."

Mr. Ross (Souris): What about the poultry producers?

Mr. Reid: The cry of the wheat producers just now is not that they are not making ends meet, that they are not making money, but that they want more than they are getting at the present time.

An hon. Member: You had better interview the butter producers about their prices.

Mr. Reid: There are interruptions, and I will take them as they come. I do not complain about interruptions as long as they are intelligent. It does not bother me, but I think I can say that I interrupt less than any other member. It may be that some of our poultrymen should be told to go to the prairies and grow wheat, because I understand there are some 400 wheat farmers now living during the winter in Regina. They can close their farms after about three months' work a year, and live well in the city.

Mr. Nicholson: Nonsense.

Mr. Reid: They can close their homes and go to British Columbia, or go to Regina, and live the life of Riley, but poultrymen in our province have to pay $3.75 per 100 pounds for No. 5 wheat.

An hon. Member: You said per bushel a while ago.

Mr. Reid: If you would listen more intelligently you would know that I said $3.75 per 100 pounds. When the member for Souris (Mr. Ross) blames the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for fixing the price of wheat on the basis of other products in the contracts with Great Britain, I can certainly say to him that the price of wheat is not linked to the price of eggs. With the price of eggs which we obtain from Great Britain, and which is paid by the special products marketing board, the poultry farmers of the Fraser valley are simply going out of business.

I have one further word to say regarding the British market. At this time I am not going to raise animosities—

Mr. Nicholson: You have done so already.

Mr. Reid: You are making a good attempt right now, as I may have animosity against you if you do not keep quiet. There should be no reason for animosity between the people of this country and the people of Great Britain, because every member knows, and the Canadian people know, of the wonderful part the British people played in saving democracy, and that they at the time practically stood alone. Certain misgivings arise in the minds of many people, now that peace has been declared, when they see Britain sending metals and war planes to soviet Russia, and leaving the markets of Canada alone, or out of their purchases. They do not want any British Columbia canned fish, lumber or eggs. While the Minister of Agriculture has been criticized, I feel that inwardly hon. members will agree with me that he put up the best fight that anyone could with the British authorities.

The British are great traders, as we all know. I do not have to remind you of that, and they usually send people from the north of Scotland to do the trading. When they get around a conference table they drive a pretty hard bargain. While the contract with Great Britain is not all that it should be, and we in British Columbia are certainly displeased with the British egg contract, I think it is to the minister's credit that he brought back to this country as good a contract as he did. It is not my duty, however, to warn the British people or to warn our people, but I would not like to see the lack of trade agreements bring about differences between the people of Canada and the people of Great Britain. I think that while we owe a great debt of gratitude to the British people, the British nation also owes some recognition to the Canadian people for what Canada did during the war.

Owing to the fact that the people of Great Britain and Europe required food, we were naturally encouraged by the government, at the request of Great Britain, to increase our agricultural production. In British Columbia, because of sentiment, shall we say, because also of our desire to help the British people, and at the request of the government, we increased our poultry flocks. Throughout the Fraser valley, and all through the province, men went into the poultry business who had not been in it before. But now it appears the British are not prepared to buy as many of our eggs, nor our lumber or canned salmon.

I think we can take a great deal of credit for one thing, Mr. Speaker. Of all the eggs that reach the British market, none can compare in quality with our Canadian eggs. So much is that the case that I understand this year two great egg-exporting countries, Eire and Denmark, are sending experts to Canada to ascertain how this country produces such fine eggs. So it is hard to understand why the British people or the British government would not want more of this excellent product.

[Mr. Reid.]

I rose particularly to make a suggestion, and I ask the Minister of Agriculture to give it very serious consideration. Under this act, in order that the contracts for the various agricultural products may be fulfilled, we have been debarred from a free market. In British Columbia, at least at the present time, we could sell our eggs and poultry at much higher prices in the United States than the special products board will pay or even than Canadians are willing to pay for these products. If no better contract with Great Britain can be obtained, we are asking that we in British Columbia should be allowed to find that higher market, and that we should not be barred from that lucrative business across the boundary line. In all sincerity I ask the minister to give the people of British Columbia at least that consideration.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, the measure before the house merely extends for another year the operation of the Agricultural Products Act, though the discussion has covered a somewhat wider field. I want to state, first of all, that as far as we here are concerned we feel that this act is a poor substitute for a natural products marketing act on a national scale, but in view of the fact that it is necessary in order to carry out the contracts that have been or may be entered into, we are prepared to support the extension of this act.

I believe the real issue is whether or not this government or this parliament is going to take steps to provide a marketing act on a nation-wide basis, so that all commodities may be sold in such a way that the producers will receive the fullest possible benefit from their production. I agree with some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), in that it is the responsibility of the government to reimburse or compensate the farmers who have incurred losses in the past few years owing mainly to the fact that the government has failed to carry out its price stabilization policy. But I cannot agree with the argument, which is at least implied, that the farmers would like to see the open market return. The fact is that the Canadian federation of agriculture has asked this parliament, or at least the individual members, to pass a marketing act; and if I understood the hon. member correctly he indicated that he was in favour of a natural products marketing act. If we are in favour of an act to provide for the orderly marketing of farm products we cannot argue at the same time that we are for the open market, because we cannot be on both sides of the fence at once. I am sure it is within the memory of all hon. members that when the Canadian Wheat Board Act came up—which was an endorsation in an indirect way of the British wheat agreement—hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party to my right voted for it. One hon. gentleman here says he did not; there may have been one or two.

Mr. Ross (Souris): We have never voted on that agreement as such. It was never before this house in the form of an agreement.

Mr. Zaplitny: May I point out that what I said was that when the wheat board act came before this house the members of the Progressive Conservative party voted for it, with the exception of one or two who may have opposed it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I have supported the wheat board right from the start.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am not speaking of the wheat board; I am speaking of the wheat board act, which implied approval of the British wheat agreement, because it was only under the wheat board act that we could carry out that agreement at all. There is no use trying to wiggle out of that position; this house did support the wheat board act and at the same time, tacitly if not expressly, endorsed the British wheat agreement. But the basis on which that was done, as far as western agriculture was concerned, was that we were entering into an agreement with Britain for the purpose of having a guaranteed market at a guaranteed price over a period of time, and that in return we were willing to accept a price lower than the world market price at that time. We wanted stability; and it was the responsibility of the government to see that such stability was maintained.

That is where the difference of opinion arises today. As far as I am concerned it is not a question of whether we should be for or against orderly marketing. I am for it. It is a question of whether the government has carried out its end of the bargain. I contend that it has not, and to that extent I agree with the hon. member for Souris. But I do not agree with him if he implies that the Canadian farmers wish to get back to the open or speculative market; I cannot go along with him on that.

Since the statement has been made that no one to my right supported the British wheat agreement, let me quote what was said by the then leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken) on August 14, 1946:

> I rise at this time to criticize the government's wheat policy. But before doing so, let me say this, with respect to the United Kingdom wheat agreement. Any agreement such as this which tends to level out the inequalities, and the wide fluctuation of prices in the past, is a step in the right direction.

That pretty well makes this house unanimous in approving the principle behind the British wheat agreement, if not the details themselves. The then leader of the official opposition agreed that any contract which would tend to cut out fluctuations or inequalities in marketing was a step in the right direction, and I agree with him one hundred per cent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The question was raised a short time ago as to whether a discussion of wheat generally was in order at this time, and my ruling was that wheat could be discussed by any hon. member who thought it should be brought within the Agricultural Products Act. I think that a general discussion on wheat is not now in order, nor is a discussion of the wheat board act and other related acts. I made that ruling some time ago. I do not wish to limit discussion unduly, but I would ask hon. members to observe the ruling to the best of their ability. I made the ruling during the course of a speech by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). I do not think he proceeded with his argument until some question was asked him by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson).

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that as I proceed I shall have no difficulty in keeping within the terms of your ruling. The chief point at issue so far as we are concerned, as I mentioned at the outset, is whether the proposed bill to follow this resolution will go far enough to provide the type of marketing legislation the farmers of Canada desire. We contend it does not go far enough. We contend it is necessary to have a natural products marketing act on a nation-wide basis, with marketing boards in the various provinces. These boards would have producer representation on them and would be a means of carrying on a nation-wide system of interprovincial and export trade.

In 1945, the Canadian federation of agriculture presented a draft bill to all members of the house, a copy of which I have in my hand. This draft bill sets out in a general way the type of legislation the farmers are requesting. According to the wording of this draft bill, it would have as its purpose the improvement of the methods and practices of the marketing of natural products in interprovincial trade within Canada, and in export trade, to make provision for the regulation and control of the trade and commerce therein, and to make further provision in connection therewith. Then, the draft bill sets out the way in which the act would operate.

Recently, the president of the Canadian federation of agriculture made this statement.

as reported in the Rural Co-operator of Ontario:

> Are we again to see food products—real wealth—backing up, clogging markets and bringing distress to farm families while populations elsewhere suffer undernourishment or stark hunger simply because they have the wrong currency, and because the rules of the financial world won't let one currency be freely converted into another?
> We thought we had learned the lesson in two world wars that what is humanly and physically possible should also be financially possible.

The challenge to this parliament is to make it financially possible to carry out what has been made physically possible. The production is here. Under the old system of marketing, the farmers have often produced themselves right out of the market. In other words, they have produced so much that the cry of overproduction has gone up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what happened to two crown companies in Saskatchewan; they had to close down.

Mr. Zaplitny: I do not know what that has to do with this argument. Let us continue with this argument, instead of deploying in all directions.

Sir John Boyd Orr has proven his argument that there has never been enough food in this world to satisfy all the hungry people. There has always been starvation, famine and lack of proper nourishment in the nations of the world. Our health department shows that, in this country, which is supposed to be the bread basket of the world, there was before the war a highly disturbing proportion of undernourishment amongst our own population. That being so, no one can say the farmers produce too much. It is simply due to the fact that agricultural production has not been efficiently distributed to the markets of the world. It is also due to speculations in the market when the motive was to make a profit out of food production rather than to deliver food to the people who needed it.

The president of the Canadian federation of agriculture has challenged this parliament to get around the dollar difficulty. He does not say how that can be done, but it is not his function to do that. He is placing the problem before us.

On the 19th of March, 1948, a very interesting exchange took place between the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and the then minister of reconstruction who is presently the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I should say that a question was asked by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), and this is recorded on page 2418 of Hansard:

> I want to ask the minister one simple question. I am much impressed, as I hear him talk, as to the position of the milling and other industries. He says that the government will do this and the government will do that, and that as long as these people will do what they are told, they will be well off. Perhaps they will. Would I be wrong in calling this a highly socialistic measure?
> Mr. Howe: State marketing is socialism, yes, if you like. But it is hard to be different in a world that at the moment is following state marketing for reasons which I think are largely beyond their control. There are currency problems, credit problems and a number of factors, which are driving countries to state marketing at the present time.

Now, that happened last March. Events since then have proven, to a very great extent at least, that what the minister said at that time was quite correct. Regardless of the type of trade we may like to have, we are governed to a certain extent by the type of trade that is prevalent or in vogue in the rest of the world. If Great Britain and the other countries have dollar difficulties and cannot buy from us in dollar currency, it is up to us to find a way in which we can dispose of our marketable products without involving dollar difficulties.

One of the ways in which this might be accomplished was suggested by my leader in a recent speech in which he pointed out that we could make bulk trade agreements with Britain and other countries on the basis of blocked sterling which would not involve immediate payment. By whatever manner it is done, I think it is highly important that this parliament realize the importance of this problem so far as the agriculture of this country is concerned. We shall be faced again with this artificial surplus, food piling up while people are going hungry. It is going to be the old story of hunger amidst plenty.

There are those who argue we should get around it by going back to the open market system. These people may have some reasons for presenting that argument, but recent events seem to argue strongly against it. This morning I clipped an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal, headed:

> U.S. administration seeks to stabilize slump in farm prices.

The dateline is Washington, February 9:

> The Truman administration moved today to shore up farm prices ordering an investigation of the commodity market slump which it attributed in part to "speculative influences."

Would the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) or any other member of this house suggest that we follow the United States pattern of open market trading when it is breaking down right before our eyes and the government of the United States has to step in to save the producers? In western Canada we pride ourselves that, at least, the farmers many years ago foresaw this condition. The mere mention of the Winnipeg grain exchange to a farmer is a challenge to come out and roll up your sleeves, because they will not any longer fall for that open market story so assiduously proposed by certain interests which are spending millions of dollars to publicize the glories of the open market and to attack the wheat pools and the co-operatives of western Canada. I do not think they will fall for that propaganda. I would be very sorry if any hon. member coming from western Canada, and representing a rural constituency on the prairies, would lend himself to be the vehicle for the arguments of the Winnipeg grain exchange.

Let me quote some figures to supplement those quoted by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). He quoted figures to show how many bushels of wheat were required to buy certain farm implements in the United States as compared with Canada. Let me remind him that from 1931 to 1935 we did not have the Canadian wheat board. We had the wide open free enterprise speculative system of selling grain. Here are some of the figures that it is well worth while to keep in mind. In 1931 it took 715 bushels of wheat to buy an 8-foot binder.

Mr. Ross (Souris): How much in the United States?

Mr. Zaplitny: In 1932 it took 823 bushels of wheat to buy an 8-foot binder. The next year it took only 560 bushels, then 442, and so on. If the hon. member will compare those figures with the figures he gave to the house—

Mr. Ross (Souris): Compare them with other countries.

Mr. Zaplitny: I have not the figures for the same years in the United States, but we are now dealing with Canada. We must face the question in a reasonable way. It is not an ideological matter; it is a matter of being practical. The farmers have realized that they cannot trust the speculative market to handle their produce because it is not being handled for the purpose of giving farmers the greatest return for their labour nor to give the consumer the cheapest food possible. It is being handled for the purpose of extracting the greatest possible profit out of the labour of the farmer and out of the consumer of food.

Having come to that conclusion, the next logical step is to find another system by which their food products may be marketed. Various members have proposed various schemes, but in order that there may be no doubt about where we stand on the question I wish to place on record the six points adopted by our national convention last summer when it dealt with agricultural markets. They read as follows:

The C.C.F. therefore proposes:

1. A system of guaranteed or forward prices. Minimum prices will be established well ahead of the planting or breeding season to enable farmers to plan their production in advance without worrying about market fluctuations.

2. Enactment of a national marketing act, and the establishment, with producer and consumer representation, of marketing boards for all agricultural products, which enter into interprovincial or export trade.

3. Orderly world marketing based on long-term international agreements.

4. Assistance in the development of co-ops, commodity groups and other farm organizations for orderly marketing.

5. Elimination of speculation in the marketing of foods.

Adoption of the "ever normal granary" principle. The federal government will assume the major responsibility for financing the storage of sufficient feed and seed grains to ensure a continuous supply. It will also construct strategic storage facilities itself and will assist provincial and local governments as well as farmers to build supplementary facilities in all appropriate areas.

If these proposals were adopted—and I think this parliament could adopt them without doing any violence to its political views—they would be practical steps which would help the farmer to dispose of his products to the very best advantage to himself and to the ultimate consumer.

I wish to emphasize that the time has come when scientific methods can be introduced for the processing and the storage of foods which could not be stored some years ago. We have advanced in the field of refrigeration, cold storage and processing to the point where it is possible to carry a far larger proportion of our surplus than was possible some years ago, and we should take full advantage of that. Surely in a world such as we live in, when no one knows when the next famine will come, or where, when no one knows when peace may be violated, it would be only sensible and humane to provide large storage facilities for surplus foods which could be used in times when production fails. That, together with machinery set up on a nation-wide basis for the proper and orderly marketing of farm products, is what the farmers of Canada want.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to cover the whole field which has been covered by the speakers who have preceded me, but I feel it is my duty at this time, in dealing with wheat, again to place on record the stand of this group in connection with the British wheat agreement. At the time when the agreement was before the house we said that we would support it because we felt that we had a moral obligation to the people of Britain. At the same time we made it quite clear that this was a job for the people of Canada to perform, and under the wheat agreement, and things which have matured since, this whole load is being borne by the wheat growers of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. Gardiner: On a point of order, the Speaker has just ruled that it is out of order to discuss this question on this particular measure. When I tried to get the ruling at first I said that if this was going to be discussed I would reserve the right to answer the statements that were made.

Mr. Quelch: On the point of order, two speakers, one from the Progressive Conservative party and one from the C.C.F. party, have already spoken and both dealt fully with the question of wheat. Surely, in fairness to other hon. members, at least two members from each party should be allowed to continue the discussion in the way in which it has been conducted up to the present time.

Mr. Fair: Since we have a new Speaker in the chair at the moment—

Mr. Gardiner: It is on record that the Speaker has ruled that it could not be done. I want it to be understood that if we are to have another ruling—

Mr. Ross (Souris): It has been done by everybody.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): I was not in the house when the Speaker made the ruling, but I did hear him suggest that it would be in order, if an hon. member was speaking to the point that wheat should be included in this bill. I gathered from his remarks that it would not be in order to deal with wheat unless it was for the purpose of asking that it be included in the bill. If the hon. member is proposing that wheat be included in the bill, then I would not wish to stop him. On the other hand, if he is dealing specifically with wheat, I think he would be out of order.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Speaker, when I rose to speak a few moments ago I said clearly that I did not intend to cover the whole field covered by the previous speakers; but in order that our stand might not be misinterpreted I wanted to place on record once more our views in the matter. I think it is only fair that I be permitted to do so, since other parties have spoken, and we have heard two speakers from the other side of the house. I think you are being fair to me, Mr. Speaker, and I want to thank you for that.

I had stated that the losses under the British wheat agreement had been borne and are being borne and will continue to be borne by the wheat growers of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and that portion of the Peace river bloc in British Columbia coming under the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board Act. That is not generally known, and perhaps it is well to have it on the record at this time. I am going to state once again, as I have already said, that these losses which will finally be figured out by statisticians should not be borne by the wheat growers of the prairie provinces. That is a responsibility of the people of Canada. It is my hope that the loss will be made good as soon as the amount of it can be properly ascertained. It has been stated that people are looking for tough times in agriculture. It is only natural that those tough times should come again, even though there is no necessity in the world to have them brought about. If they do come again it will be through the machinations of evil men. Some of those evil men may be in the House of Commons and, through legislation passed, become responsible for conditions which may develop later.

Agriculture has always taken the rap. When war comes, the farmers are the last to have the prices of their products raised; but when war is over the farmers are the first to have their prices reduced. Reading from the publication The Budget, published by the Alberta wheat pool, we find this in a recent issue:

> The average prices received by farmers in the United States in mid-December, according to the United States department of agriculture, were eleven per cent lower than those prices received a year earlier. Some of the price declines which began last summer were:

	Percentage Decline in Price
Feed grains and hay	40
Food grains	26
Oil bearing crops	23
Truck crops	29
Cotton	13
Meat animals	4
Dairy products	9
Poultry, eggs	1

In the matter of egg and poultry production, my sympathies are with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), who spoke a little while ago. However, I should not want him to get the impression that the wheat growers of the prairie provinces are responsible for the high prices being paid in British Columbia. He must consider the people in between, chief of whom are the railway companies who carry the grain and receive the mountain differential rate for doing so. Those injustices should be removed —indeed those rates never should have been allowed in the first instance. It is time something was done, and we hope the hon. member for New Westminster will do his share in having that condition rectified. I am sure he will.

In order to give some support to the contention that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not entirely opposed to the arguments I have made on several occasions, as recently as Wednesday and Thursday of last week, upon which occasions I dealt with wheat—and for that reason I shall not deal with it today—let me quote from the afternoon edition of the Ottawa Journal of yesterday an item bearing the heading "War Sacrifices of Farmers Entitle them to Fair Prices." The article states:

> Canadian farmers were "entitled now" to prices which would justify their wartime sacrifices, agriculture minister Gardiner said last night. He was speaking to the annual meeting of the Ontario concentrated milk producers association at the Chateau Laurier. More than 150 delegates are attending the two-day session, the largest in several years.
> "Because there have been declines in the United States, people here are suggesting that food prices should drop to that level, forgetting that prices there rose during the war to a peak never experienced here."
> The whole idea in preventing high food prices in Canada during wartime was to allow a "levelling out" afterwards, Mr. Gardiner remarked.
> He was "inclined to agree" with the popular statement that consumers did not appreciate what farmers did during the war in keeping the cost of food down. Mr. Gardiner said he was "surprised that farmers had not been able to sell that idea fully."

Commenting on that, may I say that farmers and representatives of farmers in the House of Commons have been much too modest and too silent in making demands of the government for their farmer constituents. In what he said last night, the Minister of Agriculture has surely borne out that statement. The article continues:

> To reduce the cost of food would mean "bringing down returns to farmers."
> "People are inclined to forget that farmers, and dairy farmers in particular, were asked to hold their hand on prices during the war—at a time when they might have charged almost what they wanted."

Then the minister proceeded to deal with trade with Great Britain. I believe I am safe in saying, without fear of successful contradiction, that the evil doings of men in high places are responsible for the restricted trade we have with Great Britain and other countries. In that connection I believe the Bretton Woods agreement and the Geneva trade agreement are wholly responsible.

I said earlier in my speech that I was not going to cover the whole field of agriculture. My main purpose in rising was to say that we are going to support the resolution in the hope that in the future something better will be done for the farmers. Those of us who are alive to conditions which have existed in past years realize that because of the circumstances I have mentioned farmers have lost hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a brief word. I am not going to make a political speech, as have other speakers. I made my speech a little earlier in the day over the radio. The best speech I could make to my constituents over the radio would be to quote the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who committed himself publicly last night to the effect that no longer will he permit farmers to be sacrificed.

Let me offer my apologies to the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). I never questioned the quotation he has made; but I must say he has been one of the most proficient in the House of Commons—in a good-natured way—in interrupting the leader of the government, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent). The hon. member ought to be able to take it when occasionally it is handed back to him. I am surprised that this great supporter of Western Canadian farmers would shove down the hill one of the greatest exponents of agriculture this House of Commons has ever known, namely the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken), and, in doing so, do his best to prevent another great exponent of agriculture from Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) from arriving at the position he should have, rather than having the farmers of Canada led by Bay Street. That is all I have to say in that connection.

May I say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that I am in the difficult position of not agreeing entirely with any of the three speakers who have preceded me. The Liberal party until recently had held office for twenty-one years under one leader because it adopted the policy of compromise. Perhaps I have adopted that policy by accepting the best parts of the speeches of the three preceding me.

Having the privilege of representing the leading agricultural constituency in British Columbia—and I say that without fear of successful contradiction—I support the resolution offered by the minister. I am not satisfied with what was said by a previous speaker representing the C.C.F. party. We in British Columbia, and certainly in my constituency, want a natural products marketing act, and we are willing to support that. We do not believe, with the hon. member for Souris, that the farmers should continue to be sold down the road for the benefit of a few

St. James Street and Bay Street exploiters, and the Winnipeg grain exchange. So far as my constituency is concerned—

Mr. Ross (Souris): On a question of privilege, I have never yet said a word in the House of Commons on behalf of the Winnipeg grain exchange, and I am on record as moving a resolution to abolish it, if possible.

Mr. Cruickshank: I accept the apology of the hon. member for Souris. In my riding we are not in favour of the Winnipeg grain exchange, and we do believe in a natural products marketing act. Let me point out to the Minister of Agriculture that we in the Fraser valley of British Columbia are not satisfied. I do not agree entirely with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) in what he has said about the grain supplied to our poultrymen. It is not my view that the prairie farmers get all the benefit. Unfortunately it goes to the exploiters in between, including those who collect the freight rates.

I do agree with the hon. member however —and perhaps it is not a popular thing to say from a political standpoint—that Great Britain might remember just a little bit more the country which, with all due deference to what they did over there on our behalf during the war, came to their aid to the extent of three billions of dollars. And no class in the Dominion of Canada did more than the farmers of this country by way of sacrifice to see that that large sum was provided.

I am informed through the press—I do not believe all I see in the press unless it is complimentary to myself and then I am quite in accord with it—that the minister stated at Kelowna that he was in favour of and would introduce a dominion marketing act. I can assure him that if that report is correct he will have the one hundred per cent support of the member for Fraser Valley. I hope he will bring it down at this session so that the farmers in Canada will get their just rights.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on the resolution, but as several other hon. members have spoken I should like to say a few words. The general position of this group was placed before the house by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) and I am not going to take up time by repeating what he said. There are one or two aspects of the demand for national marketing legislation which particularly concern some of my constituents.

First of all I must say that I agree with much of what the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) had to say with reference to the position in which the poultry producers find themselves at this time. The same situation which he said was developing in the riding of New Westminster is developing in the riding of Kootenay West. Many people are going out of poultry production because under the terms of the special products board's contract they cannot produce eggs at a profit, especially during the last year with the increased price of grains.

That is a serious situation to a great number of these people who have invested several years of hard work and in some cases considerable money in building up poultry farms. I do not believe there is any other section of agriculture that is in such an unstable position. I sympathize with the poultry producers because I am under the impression that, owing to the smallness of their number and organization as compared with the grain growers and beef producers and so on, their voice is not listened to in Ottawa to quite the same extent. Before proceeding to say a word or two with regard to the fruit industry I wanted to point out to the minister the serious situation that is facing many of the poultry producers in British Columbia.

For five or ten minutes I am going to speak, not only as a member of this house but as a pioneer settler in the district from which I come, as one who has been connected with the fruit industry for over forty years and who has seen it develop—I am speaking of the apple industry now—from one that was able to ship only a few hundred boxes to one that had a total production of over 8 million boxes in 1947.

The demand for marketing legislation is not a demand by a few members of parliament who represent various parties. The hon. members who have spoken represent the points of view of the agricultural producers in their ridings. They are simply representing the urge and the wish, based on past experience, of the farm producers in their districts.

Experiments have been carried on in British Columbia for many years in developing marketing machinery and various forms of selling organizations. We fully expected that as soon as the war was over a natural products marketing act would come into being. There is a sense of disappointment throughout the fruit-growing industry that that has not happened, particularly at this session. The growers, and rightly so, were very expectant in that regard.

I should like to review the situation briefly, and in doing so I speak of the fruit industry because that is the industry of which I have the greater knowledge. What the growers are asking for is based on experience and knowledge. What they are asking the government to do is to pass legislation which will give them an opportunity to carry their efforts into a wider field. They will do the work and they will see that the act functions.

The pioneers in my district started to plant orchards about 1905. There were a few trees planted before that, but I think it is safe to say that the commercial planting of orchards in the interior of British Columbia commenced about 1905. By 1916 we were producing about 1,000,000 boxes. In 1947 we produced approximately 8,000,000 boxes of apples. By that year peaches were up to about 150,000 packages; prunes, 1,000,000 packages and pears over 600,000 packages. That was a short period of time in which to see an industry build up to that extent from zero.

I can remember the early days quite well. For several years we found excellent markets in the local lumbering and mining camps and in the small villages throughout the district. In about five or six years, possibly by 1911 or 1912, considerable shipments were made to the prairies. For a few years we found sufficient outlet for our surplus apples on the prairie markets, apples going east as far as Winnipeg.

By 1913 or 1914 it became obvious to the fruit growers of the interior of British Columbia and to the officials of various organizations representing them that some form of orderly marketing was necessary. As a result of that realization the first large organization in British Columbia was formed known as the Okanagan United Growers. While that was its name its membership included the whole Kootenay group. That organization functioned for a few years, but not very satisfactorily owing to somewhat inexperienced management and the increasing need for marketing legislation.

In 1923 a larger organization was formed. A prominent United States citizen of that date, whose name I think was Aaron Shapiro, came to Kelowna to lecture us on the benefits of a large united co-operative movement. At that time I thought it was simply a waste of time and money, but he had the evangelistic spirit and as a result the Associated Growers of British Columbia was formed. That organization functioned for a few years fairly satisfactorily, but it was realized that voluntary co-operation alone was not sufficient to satisfactorily market the fruit and vegetables produced in the area.

By 1926 there was a growing demand for provincial marketing legislation. Organization meetings were held throughout British Columbia and growers expressed themselves as being definitely in favour of provincial marketing legislation. In 1927 the first provincial marketing act in Canada was passed in British Columbia. That act operated to a limited extent for about two years when it was declared to be ultra vires.

Then we come to 1934, when the federal government passed the dominion Natural Products Marketing Act. After two years, I understand, that act was declared to be ultra vires. In 1935 a new British Columbia act was drafted and passed and found to be sound law by the privy council. Since that date we have had no difficulty so far as the British Columbia legislation is concerned.

Out of that act developed the tree fruits board of British Columbia, and out of that board has been established Tree Fruits Limited of British Columbia. The authority upon which Tree Fruits Limited is based is twofold. First it receives authority for its organization from the tree fruits board, and secondly by virtue of the three-way contracts signed between growers, shippers, and Tree Fruits Limited. At the present time Tree Fruits Limited is the sole marketing agency in British Columbia for the sale of tree fruits. All this time it was realized that we would have to go further afield to achieve success.

In the matter of provincial legislation and co-operative organizations great success has been achieved. There is no question that the history of marketing in the interior of British Columbia is a credit to any group of growers, and a credit to the executives and officers who have guided and controlled the organizations throughout the years. Every problem has been approached in a constructive way. At this time I want to stress particularly that in British Columbia we have been most fortunate in having a particularly efficient, capable, and fine type of officials administering the fruit organizations.

Then the growing demand for a dominion marketing act arose. In 1938 the Canadian federation of agriculture asked the federal government for the first time to give effect to a dominion marketing act, and it has been asking for that legislation ever since. I believe when the first proposals were made by the Canadian federation of agriculture there was not unanimity throughout all Canada as far as agricultural producers were concerned, but owing to the experience of recent years, the realization of the benefits that accrued under the War Measures Act, and other wartime legislation, and the possibilities of development in somewhat different form for peacetime purposes, there has now been recruited, in support of dominion marketing legislation, the greater body of the farmers in this country.

Mr. Gardiner: If I may be permitted to keep the record straight on the matter, the hon. member has said that the Canadian federation of agriculture have been asking for it ever since. In 1938 they came before the government asking for a marketing act, and they also did so in 1939. In 1939, however, we intimated to them that we intended to take control of the marketing of most farm products for the duration of the war under the measures with which we are dealing today in this act. From that time until the war ended, the Canadian federation of agriculture did not ask for a marketing act, but immediately the war was over they asked for it again.

Mr. Herridge: The minister is quite correct, but I think I was correct in so far as the desire and demand for an act was there. Like many other activities, however, it was suspended during the period of the war. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to stress, as I did on first rising, that this proposal is not a child of the members of the house. It is a grass-roots proposal that comes right from the farmers themselves. That has been very clearly demonstrated to me quite recently, as it has been many times before. Recently I attended a meeting of my own local of the Kootenay organization. There again a resolution was passed urging the adoption of a national marketing act. The British Columbia federation of agriculture held its convention in Kelowna on November 24 and 25, 1948. The delegates passed a resolution which I should like to read. It is as follows:

> Whereas the need for dominion marketing legislation is now more urgent than ever before as farmers face changing conditions with increasing production costs and declining demand for many of their products, and
> Whereas at a public meeting held at Kelowna, B.C., on May 17, 1948, the dominion Minister of Agriculture stated that the government was prepared to enact marketing legislation that would meet the demands of Canadian farmers;
> Therefore be it resolved that this 1948 convention of the B.C. federation of agriculture instructs the Canadian federation of agriculture to register an emphatic protest with the Canadian government against the unreasonable delay in introducing marketing legislation, which legislation is now recognized by all main political parties as being necessary and desirable.
> That, if unable to obtain from the government a definite promise that a satisfactory marketing act will be introduced at the earliest possible opportunity, the federation insist upon being given valid reasons for the ignoring of the wishes of the farmers of Canada by failure on the part of the government to furnish them with a legal basis upon which the marketing of their products could be stabilized.

That resolution was carried unanimously. Since that meeting I have had the opportunity, with the member for Yale (Mr. Jones), to attend the meeting of the Canadian horticultural society and I am sure he will endorse all I am saying here today. At that meeting we heard the disappointment expressed by the delegates attending it representing fruit interests from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I am not quite sure of the terms of their resolution, but they adopted one expressing their disappointment with regard to the failure of the government to pass a marketing act, and urging that all parties be asked to declare their stand on the matter before the expected federal election.

I think this demand has been a matter of slow evolution. It is not legislation that is being asked for as a result of hasty and unconsidered action. It is the culmination of a long period of evolution, experience and practice in the marketing of agricultural products in this country, co-operative experience, experience with provincial marketing legislation, experience with war measures, experience with commodity agreements, and so on. As I have said before, I believe the people have laid the foundation for such legislation as a result of their own efforts, their own work, and their own experience. I urge the minister and the government to give consideration to their plea, and by so doing forge the necessary link between provincial and international marketing.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I take part in this debate at the present time because I am anxious to place before the house the position of a great number of people who live in my constituency, and who are engaged in a particular form of agricultural pursuit, namely, that of the poultry industry. I do not think that it is exaggerating to say that there is no branch of agriculture which is facing greater uncertainties and greater difficulties at the present time than the poultry industry. It is because of the condition which has been produced that I wonder whether the result of the activities carried out under the Agricultural Products Act justifies the continuation of that act for another period of time. It was only a few years ago that representatives of the government toured Vancouver island urging various people to go into the poultry business, and urging poultrymen to increase their production. During the war the poultrymen co-operated in every possible way, and in the years succeeding the war every effort was made by them to increase production, and to produce eggs and other poultry products at a time when those products were most urgently required in the United Kingdom market, as suggested by representatives of the Department of Agriculture who traveled about the province.

As a result, egg production was increased from something like one million dozen before the war to as much as eighty-nine million dozen during the war. An endeavour was made also to meet the desire of the department that early chicks be produced. This could be done on Vancouver island, because of our climate, but to do so it was necessary to expand plant, to construct different types of poultry houses, and so on, all of which meant an increased outlay by the poultrymen. They constructed new buildings, invested in new types of equipment for breeding and hatching purposes, and also invested in new and better types of stock. After the war many veterans entered this business, investing their savings and gratuities.

About that time the cost of all materials began to rise; and even though it cannot be laid right at the door of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), this government must take some responsibility for those increasing costs; the cost of living, the cost of construction materials, equipment and labour required for the additional buildings and to look after the increased flocks. Very shortly after that the price of feed began to increase. When the subsidies on feed grain were removed the price jumped $10 a ton. Freight rates have also gone up, as we all know. All these factors have contributed to the increased cost of the feed the poultryman on Vancouver island must purchase. So I do not think it is reasonable to suggest that the prairie farmer has been in any way unfair. I have lived on the prairies too long not to have the greatest sympathy for those farmers. In any event, the cost of feed has gone up, and that is a reality we must face today. I believe now it costs as much on the Pacific coast to purchase feed grain as it costs to buy No. 1 milling grain landed in the United Kingdom.

Then came the greatest catastrophe of all. After all the encouragement given the industry to expand, the government failed to obtain the same type of contract they had previously negotiated with the United Kingdom; in other words the United Kingdom began to curtail its purchases of poultry and poultry products. In the years 1946 and 1947 thousands of tons of poultry products were purchased by the United Kingdom. Now those purchases are being discontinued. Only a few weeks ago the Canadian poultry council stated that the United Kingdom had taken the entire surplus of poultry production ever since 1941; then they added these words: "Now our contracts are obscured by monetary difficulties." They urge the government to seek new markets other than those of the United Kingdom, in order to take care of what they describe as the $40 million worth of eggs now being produced.

Actually in the last two years the United Kingdom has been increasing her imports of poultry products, not from Canada but from such countries as Eire and Denmark. According to government statistics her total imports have shown an increase of 38 per cent in the first six months of 1948 as compared with the first six months of 1947. On the other hand imports of eggs from Canada have decreased. If, as we believe, our eggs are superior to those of other countries, surely some way can be found by which we may supply those excellent eggs to the people of the United Kingdom, who quite obviously are anxious to obtain poultry products since their total imports have been increasing.

Not long ago, I believe, the Minister of Agriculture announced that Canada's contract for this year had been reduced by something like thirty million dozen eggs. At the present time the special products board, which markets our eggs, has discontinued buying fresh eggs for shipment to Great Britain and is concentrating upon buying eggs for drying purposes. When the minister was asked by the poultry council about these wider markets to make up for the reduced market in Great Britain, he suggested that we were overproducing eggs, which was rather a change from the attitude taken by his department ony a few years before, when poultrymen were asked to increase their production. In a newspaper report appearing in the Vancouver Daily Province, coming from New Westminster, I find this statement:

> Present indications are that B.C. egg production this spring will not be sufficient to permit this province to participate in the 1949 contracts, said Mr. Gardiner.

That is discouraging to the poultrymen of British Columbia. If these contracts have been made with Great Britain, are the poultrymen of British Columbia to be prohibited from participating in them?

Mr. Gardiner: Just to keep the record straight, I did not make that statement.

Mr. Pearkes: I am merely quoting from a report in the Daily Province, and if it has misquoted the minister I am sure it will regret having done so. Perhaps later the minister will be able to explain what was his exact statement in that regard. Then the newspaper report goes on to say:

> The regular domestic and nearby export trade would take all the production from B.C. and permit the establishment of egg prices above those of a year ago.

I do not believe the domestic market in British Columbia can possibly take care of the production of eggs in that province.

Then we find a rather different note being sounded in another report from the Vancouver Daily Province, in which the minister is supposed to have been told:

> He—

that is referring to the minister.

> —had been told repeatedly Canada's egg production was far too high in relation to the market this country can hope for in the next few years.
> "There is danger in the quantity of eggs being produced at present," he said.

That is a complete change from the encouragement which was given only a few years ago. Still, the producer in British Columbia has difficulty in selling his eggs to the continental United States. It is my understanding that export permits still have to be obtained for eggs to be exported to the United States. I believe those export permits are given according to the percentage of the quota supplied by any particular producer.

The minister is again reported as saying that he sees no immediate likelihood of any change being made in the price of food. Quite obviously there is some reason for the concern which the poultrymen of British Columbia now have over the future. I do not think I am exaggerating if I say I think it is a sad state of affairs that we cannot distribute our goods to satisfy the needs of the people of the world. The reason seems to be that we are beset with quotas, licences, prohibitions and embargoes which hinder the free distribution of goods. There is also the monetary difficulty which now hampers production and distribution of our raw materials. This could be removed. It seems to me the sooner the government realize they cannot legislate or regiment Canada into an era of prosperity, the better it will be.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask the date of the newspaper article in the Daily Province?

Mr. Pearkes: May I send it over to you? I find I have not the date on the article.

I should like to continue from the point I left off when interrupted by the minister. If the poultrymen of British Columbia are to be able to cover the overhead on their investment in trying to meet these requests of the department for increased production, then it is essential that production be maintained. I should like to put on the record what I think might be described as the average return which might be received from a first-class flock of hens. It will be a conservative estimate. Let us assume that a hen produces about $6.10 worth of eggs during the year. Feed in British Columbia for a hen that would produce eggs to that value would cost approximately $5.10, which would leave a margin of seventy cents to cover expenses and profit.

On motion of Mr. Pearkes the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May I say that I asked the Prime Minister if he would let us go on Friday evenings at six o'clock. I now change that request to ask if we could go tonight at six o'clock. We have made a great deal of progress this week and I wonder whether whoever is leading the house would consider adjourning now until Monday.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I was informed this afternoon that there was some objection to adjourning at six o'clock. We would need the unanimous consent of the house to do so, and the government is prepared to accede if there are no objections.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Well then, we will adjourn.

Mr. Graydon: What will be the business on Monday?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we will first take up the resolution under government notices of motion relating to Newfoundland. The second order of business will be Bill No. 12, an act to amend the statute law. When that is completed, we will take up the resolution we were discussing this afternoon, and when that is completed, the emergency resolution.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on the question of the order of business, was it not understood that when we finally completed everything in relation to Newfoundland we would return to the debate on the address?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps there was some misunderstanding. After consulting my colleagues, I was told that a motion was made for government notices of motion and government orders to precede other business until the 18th of February. It was for that reason I suggested this order.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister will remember that, when this was discussed with me, there was a definite assurance that we would return to the address as soon as the Newfoundland matter was disposed of. That was the understanding I gave to my friends and the understanding upon which we agreed to defer the debate on the address.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will be in his seat on Monday. I suggest that Monday be devoted to the business that has been announced and that at that time a decision be made as to the business to follow.

Mr. Coldwell: So long as an attempt is made to clear up the matter.

On motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) the house adjourned at six o'clock.

NEWFOUNDLAND

TERMS OF UNION WITH CANADA—ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That, whereas by a memorandum of agreement entered into on the eleventh day of December, 1948, between Canada and Newfoundland, the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada were agreed to, subject to approval by the parliament of Canada and the government of Newfoundland;

And whereas the terms of union provide that they shall come into force immediately before the expiration of the thirty-first day of March, 1949, if His Majesty has theretofore given his assent to an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland confirming the same;

And whereas the terms of union have been approved by the parliament of Canada;

A humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words:—

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom a measure containing the recitals and clauses hereinafter set forth to confirm and give effect to the terms of union agreed between Canada and Newfoundland;

An act to confirm and give effect to the terms of union agreed between Canada and Newfoundland.

Whereas by means of a referendum the people of Newfoundland have by a majority signified their wish to enter into confederation with Canada;

And whereas the agreement containing terms of union between Canada and Newfoundland set out in the schedule to this act has been duly approved by the parliament of Canada and by the government of Newfoundland;

And whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom to confirm and give effect to the said agreement and the Senate and House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, have submitted an address to His Majesty praying that His Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose;

1. The agreement containing terms of the union between Canada and Newfoundland set out in the schedule to this act is hereby confirmed and shall have the force of law notwithstanding anything in the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946.

2. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1949, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1949.

Schedule

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a great honour to have the privilege of presenting to this house the House of Commons' part of a joint address to be presented to His Majesty to confirm the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada. This is the final act in the proceedings required to be adopted by this house to bring about the union of those two countries. I am sure—and the applause which greeted me when I rose to present this resolution is confirmation of it—that all members of this house, and the people of Canada and of Newfoundland as well, appreciate the historic significance of this final act which we are now about to accomplish.

The terms of the resolution which you, sir, have read indicate that, agreement having been entered into, ratification by the parliament of Canada and the government of Newfoundland shall come into effect only if His Majesty gives royal assent to a bill of the parliament of the United Kingdom confirming it before March 31, 1949. I have already indicated to the house, and I shall summarize them briefly, the reasons for resorting to this form of procedure.

It is well known in this house and by the public that there were provisions in the British North America Act of 1867 looking to the union of Newfoundland with Canada and setting out the procedure which could conveniently have been followed at that time, and in fact for many years afterwards, to bring about that union—a procedure similar to that followed to bring about the entry into confederation of Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. This indication in the terms of the British North America Act was proof that those who had participated in the conferences which preceded it felt that the ultimate destiny of the people of Newfoundland was to come together with the people of the new dominion for which the British North America Act was to be the constitution.

When in 1946 and 1947 the proceedings were instituted which are now having their culmination at this time, the conditions were no longer such that the exact procedure provided for in the British North America Act could be followed. It would have required addresses from the houses of the Canadian parliament, addresses from the houses of the legislature of Newfoundland, and a proclamation by His Majesty on the advice of the United Kingdom privy council. There are two reasons why, after the lapse of eighty years, that procedure is no longer applicable.

First of all, the constitution of Newfoundland had been suspended in 1933, and there were no houses of the legislature of that colony. Second, on account of the developments which had been reflected in the terms of the Statute of Westminster, His Majesty no longer exercised the prerogative in respect to Canada on the advice of the United Kingdom privy council; he exercised it on the advice of his Canadian ministers.

The terms of section 146 of the British North America Act being no longer applicable, another procedure had to be resorted to. The precedent which had been set when the parliament of Canada decided to hand over the natural resources to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan seemed to be convenient, and was selected as the one to follow in this instance. This procedure requires action by the parliament at Westminster, and that action I think is appropriate, not merely because it conforms with the precedent of 1930, but also because I believe it is the proper way to dispose of matters of common concern to Canada, Newfoundland and the United Kingdom.

Since 1933, when the parliament of the United Kingdom adopted the Newfoundland act of that year, the government of the United Kingdom has been responsible for the administration of and legislation concerning Newfoundland. While under the Statute of Westminster this parliament has equal rights with the parliament of the United Kingdom to enact legislation having extraterritorial effect, it would not have been proper for this parliament, by legislation of its own, to attempt to bring within its jurisdiction territory now under the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of the United Kingdom.

There is a second reason why procedure not expressly provided for in the British North America Act was resorted to. If that procedure had been followed there might have been some question as to its legal effect. I am sure that the last thing anyone in Canada or Newfoundland would desire would be any possible doubt as to the legal effect of the terms of union as agreed to and confirmed.

Under the terms of the Statute of Westminster the action of the parliament of the United Kingdom cannot be effective in respect to Canada without joint addresses by our houses of parliament, because section 4 of the Statute of Westminster expressly provides:

> No act of parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this act shall extend or be deemed to extend to a dominion as part of the law of that dominion unless it is expressly declared in that act that that dominion has requested and consented to the enactment thereof.

Of course no parliament sitting at Westminster would make a declaration of that kind in the preamble of a statute unless it had factual justification. The purpose of these joint addresses is to give the parliament of the United Kingdom factual justification for asserting in the preamble to the act to confirm this union that it is done at the request and with the consent of Canada.

This address will go to His Majesty as an expression, through their representatives in parliament, of the will of the people of Canada that union is desired and should take place. The terms of the address are self-explanatory. The house has already sanctioned the principle that there should be such an address, because it has approved the terms of union, the fiftieth of which is that they shall come into effect only if royal assent is given by His Majesty, within the time specified, to an act passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom. Therefore the requirement of an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom has been approved by the house, and the terms of the Statute of Westminster make it necessary, to achieve that end, that there should be the address which is now before the house.

I think it is proper to say that the government, the members of the house, and indeed the Canadian people, are all gratified to find that the matter of the union of Newfoundland with Canada has been dealt with so thoroughly, on such a high level, and with the unanimity witnessed in our proceedings during the course of the last week. It must be a source of satisfaction to those who will soon be our new fellow citizens in this nation that it was the common view of all parties in this house, representing all sections of the Canadian people, that it would be desirable to have the people of Newfoundland become associated with us. Of course the Canadian people have never really thought of Newfoundland as another country, and the fact that they are to become associated with us is, for all older Canadians, a source of particular satisfaction. We have in French a saying which goes like this: Dis-moi qui tu hantes, et je te dirai qui tu es. I was accustomed to thinking that the English equivalent was: Birds of a feather flock together, but it is really more than that. If I might venture to translate the French saying it would go something like this: Tell me with whom you are associated, and that will tell me what you are. We of Canada are happy that those who know the people of Newfoundland will be judging us by their knowledge of the sturdy qualities of those splendid people. I hope that the people of Newfoundland will be equally satisfied to be judged by what their new Canadian fellow citizens have been able to achieve during the eighty years which have elapsed since the original confederation.

As I said on a previous occasion in this house, there were many reasons for the close association between the people of Newfoundland and those of our own country—common origin, common adherence to the true principles of democratic liberty, common respect for the dignity of the individual, common abhorrence of any totalitarian or autocratic form of government. These links, derived from our common origin, from common development of our respective social orders, were greatly strengthened by the close association between the young men and young women of our respective peoples during the two great wars, and particularly during the last war. Many of our sons and daughters served with the young men and young women of Newfoundland, some of them in Newfoundland itself, others on the high seas with units of the Royal Canadian Navy based in Newfoundland. If I may be permitted to mention something quite personal, I feel particularly close to the people of Newfoundland by reason of the fact that, during the many months of my son's service in convoy duty on the Atlantic, the units of the Royal Canadian Navy with which he was serving were based in Newfoundland. What was my own experience during those days was the experience of thousands of Canadians. It created a relationship which makes the prospect of common citizenship with those splendid people one that is very pleasant to envisage.

I shall not attempt to summarize the great history of the sturdy people of Newfoundland, wresting their sustenance from the sea, as most of our people, in the early days, had to wrest their sustenance from the forests and the fields. Although there was a difference in vocation, the difference seems only to have created a close relationship between our two peoples. There is a great poet, E. J. Pratt, whom we claim as Canadian but whom Newfoundlanders claim to be a poet of Newfoundland; hereafter, though being a Canadian poet, he will at the same time be a poet of Newfoundland. We are familiar, as they are in Newfoundland, with some of his verses. May I read a few lines of one of his poems. Speaking of Newfoundland the poet says:

Here the tides flow,
And here they ebb;
Not with that dull, unsinewed tread of waters
Held under bonds to move
Around unpeopled shores—
Moon-driven through a timeless circuit
Of invasion and retreat;
But with a lusty stroke of life.

The lusty stroke of life of the tides that ebb and flow around the island of Newfoundland is repeated in the hundreds of thousands of hearts that beat in the breasts of the people who inhabit that land. It is because we believe in that lusty stroke of life that we are so happy to have them join with us, and to have those who know them judge us by the people with whom we are to be associated. We know that we are receiving into our midst a people stalwart and sturdy, a people with that lusty stroke of life. We hope they feel that they are joining a young and vigorous nation; that by joining it and becoming a part of it they will further the progress of the nation, and that if they do so, they will be rendering a service not only to the Canadian people but also to the men and women of the whole civilized world, because in these times there cannot be too many nations of vigorous men and women truly imbued with the principles and ideals of free democracy. The strengthening of any of them is a service not only to themselves but also to all other lovers of democracy and freedom throughout the world.

Perhaps I might be permitted another personal comment. It is a matter of some satisfaction to me to see the people of that island, the ancestors of so many of whom came from another island in the north Atlantic with which my own ancestors had some connection, become Canadian citizens. I would not mention this if I did not feel that I was but one of thousands, indeed hundreds of thousands, in this country who have for those two islands in the north Atlantic a great admiration and affection.

In addition, I think it is something which all hon. members will feel I am entitled to regard as a reason for great personal satisfaction that on the very morrow of the day I assumed the responsibilities of the office of Prime Minister I was able to continue the work on which my predecessor had been engaged for so long, and to bring it to a successful conclusion. I am sure it will be a matter of satisfaction not only to the members of our party on this side of the house, but to most of the Canadian people, in view of what has been going on for the last decade and more, to be assured of continuity in the undertakings initiated by the government which has been in office over those years.

Therefore it is with understandable pride, sir, that I move that this address to His Majesty be approved by this house, and, together with that which I hope soon will be adopted in the other place, forwarded by you and the Speaker of the other place to His Majesty as the expression of our continued and continuing confidence in the value to free men and women of British institutions.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it was very properly pointed out that when the terms of the agreement between Newfoundland and Canada were before this house last week there was striking evidence of unanimity in the desire of those who sit here as representatives of the people of Canada that the dream of the fathers of confederation should be fulfilled by the inclusion of Newfoundland within the boundaries of Canada, as they envisaged it in 1864 and in the later discussions which led to confederation. I have made it clear, and in doing so have expressed the desire of those who are associated with me, that Newfoundland should become a part of Canada on terms satisfactory to them and to Canada, and that everything should be done to avoid misunderstanding or discontent which might disturb the new relationship thus established.

I give place to no one in this house in my desire to see the fulfilment of the dream of those who laid the foundation for a great and united nation covering the whole of the northern part of this continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Without elaborating, I have indicated already certain reasons why it seems to me personally that there is a strong sentimental appeal in the thought of Newfoundland becoming a part of Canada. In every way possible—and I feel sure in this I am expressing the sentiment of those associated with me—I would hope to further the union and the spirit of unity of the people of Newfoundland and of Canada as a whole.

Last week we were called upon to deal with a very short bill which had the effect of approving the terms of agreement between Newfoundland and Canada, as settled on the one hand by the representatives of the Canadian government and on the other hand by those appointed to come here from Newfoundland to discuss the terms. Throughout the discussion it was clear that it was the principle of union that was under consideration, and so far as the principle of union was concerned there seemed to be no dissenting voice. In discussing this subject I pointed out that while there had been a great deal of criticism of the course followed in Newfoundland in arriving at the terms of the agreement, it was not for us as representatives of the people of Canada to tell the people of our sister dominion what they should or should not do, or what they could or could not do in dealing with this subject. I pointed out that the relationship still is directly between Newfoundland and the government of the United Kingdom.

Today, however, we are dealing with the draft of a bill which is to be submitted for consideration to the parliament of the United Kingdom. Therefore the terms of that bill, the way in which it is drafted and the extent to which it conforms to our constitution are matters with which every hon. member of this house must be concerned in reaching a decision as to how he will vote on the resolution now before us.

As was appropriately said by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) following the introduction of this resolution, there is a background of common history which brings the people of Newfoundland and Canada extremely close together, not only in geographical association but in ties of blood and the intimate contacts which were the result of many joint efforts during the war. The Prime Minister said that amongst our common traditions was an abhorrence of arbitrary action. I feel that this is something we should bear in mind. It is essential that in bringing about the fulfilment of the great vision of union we should do all in our power to prevent anything from happening which will fan the flame of discontent, either in Newfoundland or in Canada. That such discontent does exist, we all know. It is extremely important, therefore, that we examine carefully the constitutional aspects of the resolution now before us.

We start with the proposition that this house has clearly indicated its desire that Newfoundland become a part of Canada. There has been full evidence of the warm sentiments of those who sit in this house, as representatives of the people of Canada, toward the people of Newfoundland, whom they are anxious to welcome as their blood brothers and sisters in this great venture of confederation. At a time, however, when democracy and all the processes of democracy are being tested as never before, it is essential that we observe strictly the principles of democracy, and that in our desire to achieve the result we have in view, we do not disregard the constitutional background of this whole federal structure. In bringing about the fufilment of this desirable result, we should not establish any principle which might weaken the constitutional structure upon which the strength of this nation must depend in the years ahead. We should not tamper lightly with our constitution, simply on the ground that the results are much worth while.

Particularly is this so in the light of the fact that our basic constitution, the British North America Act, does provide a means by which Newfoundland can be brought into the confederation without any variation from the original terms which were settled in 1867. When I addressed this house on February 7 last, I used these words—and I quote from Hansard of that day, page 294:

> It must, however, be remembered that in the house we are called upon only to deal with the steps which Canada will take to bring about confederation. Except for any action by the Canadian government which has not been disclosed and is, therefore, not known to the members of the house, the procedure so far as Newfoundland is concerned is one which affects the people of Newfoundland in their direct relationship with the government of the United Kingdom. We may well regret that appropriate steps were not taken to assure that there would be no cause for any widespread feeling of bitterness or dissatisfaction, but it is not for us to tell the people of our sister dominion what course they should follow in their own dealings or in their dealings with the government of the United Kingdom.

At the time I made that statement and indicated our support of the principles we were then considering, we did not have before us the terms of the resolution which we are now discussing.

This country became a single nation by agreement of those provinces and colonies which have since entered the Dominion of Canada. They joined to settle the terms and they decided on a procedure by which the various provinces should come into confederation. As has already been indicated by the Prime Minister, the provision was perfectly clear; it is found in section 146 of the British North America Act, under the heading "Admission of other colonies". I think it might be well to read the part of that provision which refers to the procedure:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable privy council, on addresses from the houses of parliament of Canada and from the houses of the respective legislatures of the colonies, or provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, to admit those colonies or provinces or any of them into the union,—

There is a further part of the section which I need not read to illustrate the point I wish to make.

If a fully constituted legislative body had been in existence in Newfoundland, nothing more would have been required at this time than the addresses from the parliament of Canada and the legislature of Newfoundland. Upon the presentation of that joint address, no act of the parliament of the United Kingdom would have been required, because the terms of union would have become effective under the procedure simply on the advice of the privy council.

In this case, a different procedure is being followed. The Prime Minister has indicated that he feels it is a more appropriate procedure in any event, and he has called attention to the principle embodied in section 4 of the Statute of Westminster, a principle which is recognized in the very wording of the resolution now before the house. At the beginning of the paragraph, at the foot of the page of the order paper which contains the form of the resolution, we read these words:

> And whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom . . .

This wording was followed for a particular reason. Section 4 of the Statute of Westminster reads as follows:

> No act of the parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this act shall extend or be deemed to extend to a dominion as part of the law of that dominion, unless it is expressly declared in that act that that dominion has requested, and consented to, the enactment thereof.

So far as Canada is concerned the provisions of section 4 of the Statute of Westminster have been complied with, as was pointed out by the Prime Minister, because it is stated that Canada has requested and consented to the enactment. But in section 1 of the Statute of Westminster we find a definition of the word "dominion" and the various parts of the commonwealth to which that term was to apply. Section 1 reads as follows:

> In this act the expression "dominion" means any of the following dominions, that is to say, the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland.

This section recognized the status of Newfoundland as a dominion, a status which was not changed by the temporary suspension of the legislative authority of Newfoundland by the act of the United Kingdom which appointed the commission of government. I doubt whether any member of this house would suggest that, if the commission of government were dissolved by a further act of the parliament of the United Kingdom, there would be any question that Newfoundland would be restored to the status of dominion which it held at the time the Statute of Westminster was enacted. If that be so, it would seem to me that Newfoundland also should have been in a position to indicate their request for and their consent to the procedure which was being adopted. But it is clear that they are not in a position to follow that course within the provisions of the Statute of Westminster. In the draft act contained in the resolution now before us we find these words:

> Whereas by means of a referendum the people of Newfoundland have by a majority signified their wish to enter into confederation with Canada . . .

Those words do not comply with section 4 of the Statute of Westminster; in fact it is impossible—

Mr. St. Laurent: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to call his attention to one of the last sections of the Statute of Westminster, which provides that sections 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 shall not apply to Newfoundland unless adopted by a statute of Newfoundland? My information is that there never was any such statute.

Mr. Drew: As the Prime Minister knows, there was no opportunity for Newfoundland to deal with this matter, because at that time she was in difficulties; she was dealing with the government of the United Kingdom with the thought of intervention in regard to her domestic affairs, and had been doing so for some time before the actual passing of the act which appointed the commission of government.

As to the authority of the government of Newfoundland, we have no way of knowing now what an elected body in Newfoundland would do in regard to this matter, because there is no such body to deal with it. The situation is one which can be dealt with in various ways. Let us not be too much concerned with the strict letter of the law; let us rather be careful to recognize the feeling that is being expressed today in Newfoundland, and realize that this feeling will continue over the years unless those who express it believe they have had an opportunity to deal with the matter in the appropriate way.

Without referring to any particular part of Canada, I should like to say this. It will be recalled that vigorous contentions with respect to union were put forward in the maritime provinces after 1867, and it is not difficult to find that those arguments are still remembered. In fact they can be recalled by many people in the maritimes because of the feeling which carried forward in respect to some details of the procedure by which the union was completed at that time. In all those provinces, however, there were in existence legislative bodies to deal with the matter, and those legislative bodies faced the usual democratic tests. In so doing they had the opportunity to place before the people the reasons why they felt it was advisable that the course be followed which was put before them.

A few days ago we had certain discussions here in regard to the British North America Act and amendments thereto. The Prime Minister contended, as I recall his point of view, that it was not necessary that the provinces be consulted about matters which did not affect them, but that in cases in which they were affected, they should be consulted.

Hon. members will recall that following the radio address made by the Prime Minister, in which he had indicated that we should strive to provide for amendment of our own constitution without going outside of Canada for that purpose, I asked him whether it was intended to proceed with that matter during the present session, and he indicated that such was not the intention of the government. I also asked the Prime Minister if the provinces would be consulted when it was decided to proceed with that matter, and he said that they would. He has recognized the desirability of consulting the provinces about matters which affect our constitution, and the concern of the provinces about the sanctity of that constitution. In this case we have before us an amendment to the British North America Act. The draft bill, which is part of the resolution, says in section 2:

This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1949, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1949.

This being so, we are called upon to adopt a resolution which has the effect of asking the government of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act by a majority decision of the parliament of Canada, without consulting the provinces. The question then arises whether the provinces have any interest in this subject.

The Prime Minister himself has made it clear that he believes the procedure being followed relates to the Statute of Westminster, and he referred to section 4 as explaining the procedure being followed by the parliament of Canada. As I have already indicated, the wording of the resolution conforms with the exact wording of section 4 of the Statute of Westminster.

The Prime Minister has pointed out that Newfoundland may not have carried forward all the formalities on their side, which in my opinion does not in any way affect what they might or might not do, if within the Statute of Westminster they had the legislative authority which defined their position as a dominion. And, in so far as we are concerned, I think we should remember that the provinces were conceded a very direct interest in the Statute of Westminster and were, in fact, consulted at that time.

Since this does raise what I believe to be a very important consideration, I would refer to the report of the Senate of Canada at the session of 1939, pursuant to a resolution of the Senate to the Hon. the Speaker by the parliamentary counsel relating to the enactment of the British North America Act, 1867, any lack of consonance between its terms and judicial construction of them, and cognate matters. In the printed report of those proceedings, at page 134, is a letter from the then premier of Ontario, the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, who, in writing to the Prime Minister of Canada, put forward his views, and submitted an extensive memorandum discussing this subject, which memorandum is printed in full detail after his letter.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is at page 134 of the appendices?

Mr. Drew: At page 134 of the appendices, yes. It is described as annex 4. The letter written by Mr. Ferguson is not a long one, although the memorandum is of some length. That letter, dated September 10, 1930, addressed to the then Prime Minister, which I believe I should read, states:

My dear Mr. Prime Minister:

You will recall that in some discussions we have had with reference to the report of the imperial conference, and, in particular, the recommendations made in the report of 1929, I have endeavoured to make clear to you the attitude of the province of Ontario.

The conference appears to have ignored the fact that the confederation of the provinces of Canada was brought about by the action of the provinces. Our constitution is really the crystallization into law by an imperial statute of an agreement made by the provinces after full consultation and discussion. The province of Ontario holds strongly to the view that this agreement should not be altered without the consent of the parties to it.

On behalf of this province I desire to protest most vigorously against any steps being taken by the dominion government, or the imperial conference, to deal with the provincial treaty until the matter has been submitted to the provinces and they have had ample time to give the subject proper consideration.

To pursue the course indicated by the report of 1929 will not only greatly disturb the present harmonious operation of our constitution, but I fear may seriously disrupt the whole structure of our confederation.

Ontario is genuinely alarmed about the situation, and I earnestly urge upon you, representing the dominion, and through you upon the imperial conference, that this whole matter be left in abeyance until it can be dealt with in a proper manner, and to the satisfaction of the parties to the original compact.

I am enclosing to you herewith a memorandum which embodies in a brief form the story of confederation, together with the views of a number of public men who were leaders in the movement; the interpretation of the courts upon the status of the province; and the recent trend of the dominion authorities upon the question.

With the story as a background, I am sure that a perusal of the reports of the last two conferences will convince you that the provinces have ample ground for serious alarm.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) G. H. Ferguson.

Then the memorandum follows. The provinces which joined to form confederation agreed with the method set out in section 146 of the British North America Act. Later, following these submissions, the provinces were consulted in regard to the provisions of the Statute of Westminster. That being so, it seems to me a principle was accepted which should not now be lightly disregarded; because the provinces have a very great interest in the manner in which the British North America Act can be amended.

This is not a question of a test between the parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces. But it is based upon the belief that our federal system provides the best constitutional structure for Canada; and that the strength of Canada can best be assured in the years ahead, and the preservation of our democratic freedom can best be assured, if the terms of that constitution cannot be varied in any important way, except by consultation with those provinces which are so greatly concerned as to the respect for the terms of the British North America Act, as to their assurance of various local rights and customs which mean a great deal, and also as to the form of procedure which has proved so successful.

It is no longer a question of dominion rights in the sense of preserving the special rights of any province. This country has grown to its great stature today because of a federal system under which those provincial governments, with an intimate knowledge of their local problems and their local resources, were able to deal with those local problems and resources in the best possible way, and were able to bring to their development the many resources which they possessed.

It has been suggested already in the discussion which has taken place that this observation might apply more particularly to those provinces in a more favourable position. I sometimes wonder if it is forgotten that there is not a single province in Canada which has not advanced greatly since confederation in its cultural development, in the use of its resources, in the amenities of its life, under the laws which were given to the provinces under their exclusive jurisdiction by the terms of the British North America Act.

There are differences in the extent of the resources of the different provinces of Canada; but it seems to me that the emphasis upon the tremendous resources of two or three provinces in Canada overlooks the great background, the great achievement and great development before our eyes in every province of Canada today.

Just look at what is happening in different parts of western Canada at this very hour, and we see how new developments may come in the most unexpected manner by the encouragement of the use of the various resources which they possess.

In any event it is within the competence of the combined governments of Canada to bring into a common pool the whole economic power of this country for the development of every part of Canada without lessening the legitimate authority of any of the provincial governments or without weakening their ability to carry out the many great responsibilities they now have.

The provinces of Canada must all be concerned about any procedure which would lay it down as a principle that our constitution can be amended without consulting them. The line of distinction between those things which are exclusively federal and those things which are exclusively provincial is extremely difficult to draw and there is always that uncertain borderland of legislative and administrative responsibility which cannot be exactly defined. Wherever there is any doubt, misunderstanding should be avoided by bringing into consultation the governments of the provinces and making sure that they concur in the amendment proposed and in the method of dealing with a problem which is not in keeping with the original terms of the British North America Act.

It would not hold up the effective consideration of this subject by the parliament of the United Kingdom if the governments of the provinces were to be consulted now. If any of those governments feel in turn that they are called upon to consult their legislative bodies in respect of any aspect of this problem, it may be worth noting that all the provincial legislatures are now in session or will be in session within a matter of a comparatively few days. For that reason it is an unusually fortunate time to carry out a procedure which is consistent with the spirit of confederation and the way in which this constitution of ours was originally drafted.

I think the provinces of Canada should recognize the fact that if the British North America Act can be amended in this case simply by a majority decision of the parliament of Canada, then the British North America Act can be amended in any other case in the same way. It will be said: We would not think of doing that if some concern of a strictly provincial character were before us. Where in the British North America Act do you find a distinction drawn between those two cases? This is the constitution, the constitution under which Canada has become a great nation, a nation of which every one of us has the right to be extremely proud.

Amend the constitution today simply by a majority decision of the parliament of Canada, and you establish a precedent which tomorrow will lead to the amendment of the constitution, in respect to any aspect of that constitution, by some house of the future which might feel that was a desirable result. The challenge to democracy throughout the world today is the challenge to prevent centralized power in the hands of any government. It is all very well for hon. members on the other side to have complete confidence, as some of them have.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I notice that they applaud the reservation I made.

Mr. Rowe: Only in the back benches.

Mr. Drew: It is all very well for some hon. members opposite to have confidence that under no circumstances would a principle of that kind be abused, and I am quite satisfied also that it may be a comforting thing to feel that the government at the time is so omniscient that it can interpret exactly the point at which no provincial government could feel concerned. But there are provincial governments which are concerned about this procedure and they have already indicated that concern.

For that very reason it is most unwise to establish a principle which if extended into the years ahead could mean that some other government, perhaps with belief in the all-powerful government state, would be able to use this precedent as justification for their centralization of authority without the checks and balances which have preserved our democratic system so well since 1867.

To consult the provinces now will not prevent a full examination of this subject within plenty of time. This is February 14 and there are still more than six weeks before March 31. There is no reason why this course should not be followed. There is every reason why it should be followed, because of the concern which has been expressed already in Canada as well as the concern which has been expressed in Newfoundland. This is a matter of great concern to Newfoundland because Newfoundland coming into confederation wants to be assured that the constitution which its people are called upon to adopt as the constitution of Canada will in fact be respected as the basic foundation of their rights, as it is so regarded by the provinces already within Canada.

No matter how desirable it may be to hasten any procedure, this is no time to take short-cuts which have the effect of lessening respect for the constitution itself. We must do nothing here which reduces our constitution to a mere scrap of paper, lessens its validity and decreases its sanctity beyond the support from time to time of the parliament of Canada of the day.

The procedure here is to amend the British North America Act, an amendment of great concern to the provinces of Canada and to Newfoundland. For that very reason, desirable though the object may be, this course should not be adopted. There is a way in which we can proceed with full recognition of the fact that this procedure departs from the provisions of section 146 of the British North America Act and seeks to carry those out in another way.

As I have already suggested, the proper procedure is to consult the provinces now. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), that the motion be amended by deleting the words:

and substituting therefor:

> "And whereas it is desirable that the government of Canada should consult with the governments of the several provinces in respect to the said matter;
> Now therefore be it resolved, that the government of Canada be required to consult at once the governments of the several provinces and that upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultations 'a humble address be presented to His Majesty in the following words':—"

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, parliament has before it a resolution addressed to His Majesty the King asking for confirmation of an agreement which was unanimously adopted by this house. Perhaps I should qualify the word "unanimously" because I believe one voice, that of an Independent member of this house, was raised last week, when the motion was finally put, to call "on division". Consequently the amendment, which has just been placed before the house by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), is an extraordinary one in view of the fact that last week all parties supported the agreement that was then before the house. It is, of course, a surprising move on the part of the official opposition. I suppose that none of us were quite prepared for a reversal of the opinion expressed by them last week in the House of Commons. That is precisely what it appears to me to be.

I do not propose to enter into a long discussion on the constitutional aspects of this particular matter. I want to say, however, that under the British North America Act, section 146, which was quoted by the leader of the opposition a few moments ago, the duty of parliament is expressly laid down. If we look at that section we find these words:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable privy council, on addresses from the houses of parliament of Canada—

Our duty is to present an address to His Majesty the King expressing our desire as to what we think should be done in regard to the proposal for union. It is the duty of the government of Newfoundland to see to it that any other provisions of the British North America Act are carried out in accordance with the terms thereof. Someone has truly said that at the moment Newfoundland has not a legislature; it has a government. The legislature was set aside with the consent of Newfoundland, and a commission of government set up in 1934. Incidentally, may I add that the Statute of Westminster had then been in effect for several years, and up to that time the legislature of Newfoundland had the opportunity to say whether or not it wished to come within the provisions of that statute. The powers of the legislature, however, were placed in the hands of the parliament of Great Britain. It is for Great Britain now, as trustee of that legislature, dominion, colony, or whatever you want to call it, to decide whether or not it is in the interests of Newfoundland. I say that, so far as we in Canada are concerned, whether or not we agree with the method that was adopted in Newfoundland to bring about the agreement, our duty is to see that, in supporting the address, we are doing what is in the best interests of Canada. Because I believe that is so, I think we should proceed with the voting of the address.

In 1934, as I have already said, the status of Newfoundland was changed at the request of Newfoundland herself, but was there ever more democratic procedure than that which was followed in relation to the entry of Newfoundland into confederation? As there was no legislature, it is quite conceivable that the parliament of Great Britain, of its own volition, might have exercised all the powers conferred on the legislature, but it did not do so. The commission exercised the powers of government in Newfoundland on behalf of the United Kingdom, and called together a convention representative of many interests in the island. The convention decided there would be a plebiscite, and a plebiscite was held. Responsible government was defeated on the first vote, and on the second vote the majority of the people, whether or not the majority was small or large, voted for confederation with Canada. Consequently the parliament of Great Britain is reinforced by the voice of the people of Newfoundland expressed in a plebiscite.

There is one other point I should like to mention. I did not intend to talk about this subject this afternoon, and I am surprised that it came up. The leader of the opposition should have introduced his amendment at an earlier stage, if it was a proper thing to do. He would have saved the time spent in discussing this matter last week. The leader of the opposition has seen fit, however, to introduce another reference to the British North America Act. He now contends that Canada cannot enter into an agreement of this kind, and by the same token I imagine of almost any other kind, without the consent of the provinces. I do not know whether the leader of the opposition means the consent of all the provinces, or the consent of the majority of the provinces, or whether he means that, if one or two provinces oppose any such agreement, it cannot become effective. He did not say. If there were disagreement among the provinces in regard to a matter of this sort, where would it then rest? I do not profess to be a constitutional lawyer. All I profess is to be able to understand the English language, and to be able to interpret what the English language means from the point of view of an ordinary individual who speaks and reads it.

Section 91 of the British North America Act, I think, makes it very clear. It is headed "Powers of Parliament", and I take it that this House of Commons together with the other place constitutes the parliament of Canada. It reads:

> 91. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated . . .

Then follows that list, and at the end of the list these words:

> And the matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private nature comprised in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

Then we get the matters assigned exclusively to the provinces; and among those matters I cannot find that they have any part in considering and approving an agreement of the description now before us. Consequently I say this is an extraordinary constitutional view the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has introduced this afternoon, and so foreign to what I understood he believed before he came to this house. As the leader of the opposition was reported in the Globe and Mail of September 8, 1937, I find he said this:

> We have strayed a long way from the path laid down by the fathers of confederation. The strong central government which the provinces sought to create is hamstrung by petty politics.
> All the constitutional difficulties which now prevent the adoption of effective and urgently necessary social legislation can be overcome without waiting for amendments to the British North America Act if there is any sincere attempt at co-operation.

I am going to quote the whole thing:

> The provinces created the dominion. The dominion did not create the provinces. If we are to have strong government, capable of meeting suddenly changing conditions, the provinces must take the first step.

That is, to meet the changing conditions.

They united to form the Dominion of Canada.

And I want to draw particular attention to this:

It was their intention that there should be one strong government capable of dealing promptly with all problems of a national character.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker: is not the matter now before us a problem national in character?

It was their own wish that the provincial governments should deal with problems of a purely local nature.

Is this problem before us today of a purely local nature? I think not.

Now we have reached a position as a result of endless constitutional appeals to the privy council, where no one really knows where the ultimate authority does rest in many fields of legislation.

Then these words:

We must decide whether we are one nation or nine —whether we are Canadians or not. The constitutional revolution in Alberta is only an advanced form of the disease of exaggerated provincial independence which has been spreading throughout Canada for years.

Well, if ever I heard in this house a suggestion which seemed to me to be in line with exaggerated claims of independence, provincial independence or provincial rights, it is the claim just made by the leader of the opposition. This is a matter which must be decided by this house; and I am positive that the people of Newfoundland, even those who disagree with the manner in which this agreement was placed before this parliament, will agree that in discussing and dealing with that agreement last week this house followed all the democratic and constitutional procedures, and that today we are doing precisely the same thing in discussing the resolution now before us.

I wanted to say that, because we have an extraordinary proposal in the amendment now before us, for which I can see no sanction in the constitution of our own country.

Surely the matter now before us, the entry into confederation of Newfoundland, brings into bold relief the necessity for the provinces and the dominion coming together as men of good will, regardless of party feeling or party affiliation, to see how we can modernize our constitution and bring it more into relation with the times in which we live. We have a constitution that was written by the fathers of confederation in 1867 and which from time to time has been interpreted by the privy council. That interpretation by the privy council usually has been to detract from the powers of this parliament and place more power in the hands of the provinces. In Professor A. R. M. Lower's "Colony to Nation", I read a very interesting account of why that came about, which I think perhaps is worth mentioning. Lord Watson began the kind of judgment which reduced the central power; and Lord Watson was a law student in the office of a gentleman named Judah P. Benjamin. This Judah P. Benjamin was a secretary of the confederate states, fighting for states' rights and to undermine union in the United States. He fled the country and went to England, where he established a law practice which soon became very large. He taught the constitutional views he held, which were those of the confederate states rather than of the fathers of confederation.

Again, speaking entirely from memory, I would mention some of Lord Elgin's letters. The one to which I am going to refer I read several years ago—I was going to say many years ago—and I have not read it very recently, but I think it is recorded in "The Makers of Canada." If you will read that letter you will find that Lord Elgin said he was very glad indeed the fathers of confederation did not follow the American system of federation, because that system placed all the residuary powers in the hands of the local and sovereign states. Our constitution did the reverse, and he thought we had a better constitution than that which had been written in the United States. That was Lord Elgin's considered opinion.

But surely the day has come when, instead of having this sort of constitutional discussion in this house and apparently not knowing where we stand in relation to some of these important matters, we should settle some of these constitutional differences by men and women of good will representing all the legislatures and the parliament of Canada agreeing, even before going into such a conference, that the minority and cultural rights that were written into our constitution will be preserved in any constitution we adopt. Apart from that, I think we should consider ways and means of bringing our constitution up to date.

In passing, may I say that throughout the country today there is a great deal of criticism of the constitution as it affects these two houses of parliament. The finger of scorn is pointed at the other place because, for thirteen years at least, no appointments have been made to that house to represent the sixty per cent of the voting population of this country who are represented on this side of the house. This brings the other place into disrepute. As my hon. friends know, we have always urged the abolition of the Senate. Perhaps I should qualify that by saying I know of the difficulties in abolishing the Senate, in its present form in any event, and the difficulties in reforming an institution which has far more power today than the British House of Lords, whose powers were shorn by the Parliament Act of 1911, and are about to be shorn still further in the interests of democratic procedure. We have an archaic institution which, as I say, brings this whole parliament, Commons and Senate, into disrepute.

I intended this afternoon to deal to some extent with other aspects of our constitution, but I am not going to do so. I will change what I intended to say and more or less let rest what I have already said. I feel that, at the moment, the challenge this amendment places before the house is indeed grave. It is a grave challenge to the rights of this parliament under the British North America Act. It is a grave challenge to the constitutional procedures that have hitherto been adopted in this country. If we agree that, in a matter of this description which does not touch the provinces except as component parts of this dominion, we are going to say that one province perchance may say no or the majority of the provinces perchance may say no, or two-thirds of the provinces perchance may say yes and one-third say no, then we are placing our constitutional procedure in this country in a state of chaos. For who then shall make the decision? I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to take any part in bringing about chaos in this country at a time when chaos is dangerous for freedom and democracy in many parts of the world.

I want to see our procedures properly carried out. I want to see this democratic institution operate in a democratic manner. I want to preserve it. In 1936, I remember, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition sang a different song from the one he now sings. He then said that we in this country were in grave danger, and he pointed out that there was a growing fascism in the province of Quebec. Having read that, I presumed the growing fascism in Quebec at that time was the election of Mr. Duplessis as premier of that province, with the padlock law and the kind of labour code about which we have been hearing recently. So then, Mr. Speaker, so far as I personally am concerned—I have not been able to consult my friends but I rather expect I speak for them in this regard—I shall oppose the amendment and support the resolution for the address to His Majesty.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we have now reached the final stage, so far as this house is concerned, in the process of bringing into confederation the new province of Newfoundland. At this time, I do not intend to launch upon any extended expression of ecstasy over the high qualities of the people of Newfoundland or of their country, because I have already placed on the record how this group regards the people of that country. We are very happy that Newfoundland has expressed, in the only way it had at its disposal, a desire to join with us in confederation. We want to bring them in on terms that are satisfactory and that will leave no room for unhappiness at any time in the future.

I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that, as I listened to the arguments presented by the leader of the opposition this afternoon, I was much moved because I found that those arguments were exactly the arguments that this group has been using in this house ever since we came here. If you look back through Hansard, you will find at least twenty-five different speeches, if not more, given by members of this group expressing views almost identical with those stated by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition this afternoon. Now, whatever the past sins of the leader of the opposition may be, I must say that in respect to his concern over the constitution and the rights and privileges of the provinces of this great dominion, he is now back on the right track. I will challenge anyone to look back over any statements we have made, on the hustings, in this house or anywhere else, that will give the lie to what I have just now been saying about our position.

I regarded as completely specious the arguments made by the leader of the C.C.F. party this afternoon concerning the case put by the leader of the opposition. In this house, at this time, we are not concerned over what Newfoundland does, but the provinces of Canada are certainly concerned about the kind of bedfellows they have. I do not say that in any derogatory sense. Surely the provinces who occupy the bed should have something to say about any other bedfellows who wish to come in. The provinces of Canada already occupy the Canadian bed. We contend that those Canadian provinces, since they will be very vitally affected by anything that is done about sharing the bed, should be consulted.

I do not think this position is any grave challenge to our constitution at all, as was contended by the leader of the C.C.F. If we have been following a certain procedure over the years and that procedure has been wrong, then certainly there is no justification for continuing to follow it merely because we followed it in the past. So far as I can see, the argument presented by the leader of the C.C.F. is the typical argument that a centralizer would advance. We are not centralizers. We have always been and shall always remain, jealous of the rights and authorities of the provinces of this great dominion. If there never has been laid down a procedure by which constitutional amendments can take place, a procedure which will preserve the rights of the provinces, then I say it is high time it was done. Perhaps this amendment provides the starting point from which such a procedure can be built.

I am not afraid to say what I would do as to the number of provinces that should consent to the bringing in of another province. If the reference mentioned in this amendemnt is placed before the provinces, I think it is reasonable to say to them that if two-thirds of the provinces express their desire to support this resolution, then the wishes of those two-thirds will be made the rule for Canada. I think that is the arrangement that is adhered to in the United States. But my opinion may not be the opinion of the provinces. Let them say. We are waiving even in this resolution one further safeguard to the constitution, and that is reference to the people themselves. That is a further safeguard that is used in the United States. I do not think it is at all unreasonable to consult with the provinces and to ask them for their support in laying down a procedure for future constitutional amendments. If two-thirds of them, or any other fraction agreed to by the provinces themselves, indicate their support of this resolution, on the terms that have been set out in the bill, I think the decision should be binding upon the whole of Canada. The precedent would then be established for governing future constitutional amendments.

I do not think there is anything further I should say at this time, except this one thing. When the leader of the C.C.F. says that it is time that we reviewed our constitution and laid down some procedure for bringing it more into line with the times in which we live, I should like to say that I have never been able to see why in the world anyone should be in a hurry when he is on the wrong road. Let us be sure that we are on the right road before we move, especially in regard to a matter that affects the rights and privileges of provinces that certainly have been given a good measure of autonomy under the British North America Act. I intend to support the amendment.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the debate last week was remarkable for three things. One of them was the unanimity with which the members of this parliament, representing all the people of Canada, expressed their views on this subject, and the good will and the good spirit with which the debate was conducted. The second thing for which the debate was remarkable was the fact that the complex matters contained in the terms of union were thoroughly discussed, questions were raised and answered, and in the end there was still unanimity on both the substance and the form of the terms. This, I think, reflected great credit on the soundness of the position taken by the government of Canada and also on the way in which the negotiations had been conducted. The third remarkable feature was this. I believe I speak not only for hon. members on this side of the house but also for some others—

Mr. Cockeram: The C.C.F.

Mr. Claxton: —when I say that the events of the week were remarkable for the way in which one man led the debate on this subject and achieved a performance unsurpassed in this house during my eight years in parliament. I refer to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent). He showed himself to be a great parliamentarian and a great constitutional lawyer. He showed himself to have a grasp of this subject unequalled, I believe, in any part of Canada. He showed a frankness and a fairness that must have won the admiration of my hon. friends opposite, as it won ours. In the former Prime Minister, the member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the present Prime Minister who succeeded him, we have two men whose names, in the minds and hearts of the people of Canada, should be added to those who will be recognized throughout the years as indeed the fathers of confederation.

It is a matter of some regret that the unanimity with which our deliberations were conducted last week seems to have been broken by the course followed today by the leader of the opposition. At the outset, may I say that I regard it, as did the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), as a challenge to the very concept of confederation itself, to the place of Canada as a nation, and to the rights of this parliament to deal with matters that affect all the people of Canada.

On the concept of confederation, I will not weary hon. members with numerous quotations. But I will give just those which I believe state, more authoritatively than any that can be found anywhere else, what the fathers of confederation intended when they adopted the Quebec resolutions which led to the act of confederation itself. I refer to the confederation debates, at page 27.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of what date?

Mr. Claxton: The year 1865. I am quoting from the confederation debates, page 27, where Sir John A. Macdonald, then attorney general, had this to say:

> . . . if we wish to form—using the expression which was sneered at the other evening—a great nationality, commanding the respect of the world, able to hold our own against all opponents, and to defend those institutions we prize: if we wish to have one system of government, and to establish a commercial union, with unrestricted free trade, between people of the five provinces, belonging as they do, to the same nation, obeying the same Sovereign, owning the same allegiance, and being, for the most part, of the same blood and lineage: if we wish to be able to afford to each other the means of mutual defence and support against aggression and attack—this can only be obtained by a union of some kind between the scattered and weak boundaries composing the British North American provinces.

Then he went on to describe the main provisions, terms and intent of that union, and he said this:

> Ever since the union was formed—

He was referring to the union in the United States.

> —the difficulty of what is called "state rights" has existed, and this had much to do in bringing on the present unhappy war in the United States.
> They commenced, in fact, at the wrong end. They declared by their constitution that each state was a sovereignty in itself, and that all the powers incident to a sovereignty belonged to each state, except those powers which, by the constitution, were conferred upon the general government and congress. Here we have adopted a different system. We have strengthened the general government. We have given the general legislature all the great subjects of legislation. We have conferred on them, not only specifically and in detail, all the powers which are incident to sovereignty, but we have expressly declared that all subjects of general interest not distinctly and exclusively conferred upon the local governments and local legislatures, shall be conferred upon the general government and the legislature. We have thus avoided that great source of weakness which has been the cause of the disruption of the United States. We have avoided all conflict of jurisdiction and authority, and if this constitution is carried out, as it will be in full detail in the imperial act to be passed if the colonies adopt the scheme, we will have in fact, as I said before, all the advantages of a legislative union under one administration, with, at the same time, the guarantees for local institutions and for local laws, which are insisted upon by so many in the provinces now . . .

And then finally at page 40:

> But any honourable member on examining the lists of different subjects which are to be assigned to the general and local legislatures respectively, will see that all the great questions which affect the general interests of the confederacy as a whole, are confided to the federal parliament, while the local interests and local laws of each section are preserved intact, and entrusted to the care of the local bodies.

I submit that there is the best and most authoritative contemporary view of what the constitution of Canada was intended to mean; and that is a view which I submit should appeal to, and must be maintained by, all who want to observe the constitution.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said that under our constitution Canada has grown strong, and that the constitution must be maintained. I agree that under the constitution Canada has grown strong, and that the constitution must be upheld. That is our view; we have no other view. But I would like him to say exactly how Canada has grown strong under the constitution so far as the accession of the provinces is concerned, the matter with which we are dealing today. I would like him to say this: Did Canada grow strong when Manitoba was joined into confederation in 1870? Yes. And were the provinces consulted? No; they were not consulted.

I would ask him whether Canada grew strong and was strengthened when British Columbia joined confederation by order in council in 1871—and there are hon. members in the house from every part of Canada, not only from British Columbia, who know how British Columbia has grown from a colony of less than 15,000 white people. Were the provinces consulted at that time? No; they were not consulted. And I can remember, too, how Prince Edward Island entered confederation in 1873, that island province which has since been one of the greatest jewels in the crown of confederation. And the premier of that province, the province in which, through the Charlottetown conference of 1864, confederation was started, is in this House of Commons today, listening to this historic debate. I ask again: Were the provinces consulted over the entry of Prince Edward Island? Again the answer is no.

Then I ask: Did Canada become strong when the great western provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were formed in 1905? It was done by act of the imperial parliament, and by the provisions of the British North America Act, just as was the inclusion of Manitoba. It was done by a provision amending the British North America Act, in exactly the same way that is being followed on this occasion.

Were the provinces consulted? The answer is again no. The only five precedents we have are in accord with procedure we are following today. This is no thin edge that is going to break the Canadian constitution. This is extending the hand of friendship and of good neighbourliness to our sister island to the east. This is bringing about the objective which all of us have had in our hearts and in our minds for so long. This is not a work of destruction; this is not a challenge to the Canadian constitution. This is an exercise of the rights of this parliament, within its constitutional rights.

If this parliament, having the opportunity to extend to Newfoundland reasonable and fair terms of union, said, "No, we will not do it; we must refer the matter to the provinces",

I suggest that we would then be denying our right. We would not be exercising the function of the parliament of a nation such as Canada, and we ourselves would be destroying the constitution.

In this connection I should like to draw the attention of the house to some of the consequences which might follow if the amendment of the leader of the opposition were adopted. What he has suggested is that this matter should be referred to the provinces. He said, if I recall correctly, that it would not hold up the consideration of this legislation by the United Kingdom parliament if the governments of the provinces were to be consulted now. If it would not hold it up, then I suggest that consultation would not be the serious step which any consultation of provinces must be—not only a matter of form—so that they might have the opportunity of voicing their views.

Where would we be if we made that reference today? What would happen if, for example, there were any authority whatever for the views expressed by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) that a two-thirds vote of the provinces should govern in the matter? That is an interesting suggestion; but there is no constitutional basis for it, I submit. And what would happen if two-thirds of the provinces, let us say seven provinces, which expressed their opinion in favour of Newfoundland entering confederation, included all the provinces except, let us say, Ontario and Quebec? There is no authority anywhere, and no precedent, for the exercise of a vote; yet if consultation means anything it must give the provinces an opportunity not only to exercise their views, but also to make their will felt in some way or another.

Such a reference to the provinces is not in accordance with precedent; it is not required by the constitution; it is not in accord with the interests and desires of the people of Canada who are represented here. Further, we must not forget that while all of us in the House of Commons respect the constitution, and regard it as containing the wisdom of the fathers of confederation, consecrated by the years and applied in practice—while that is to be respected to the full, it must not be taken that you can find from something not within the constitution anything which hamstrings the acts of this parliament as representing the nation.

The limitations on this parliament are contained in the constitution; they are written there. But outside the scope of the constitution this parliament has full sovereign power of nationhood, which it can exercise in accordance with the will of the people of Canada as they are represented in parliament. This parliament represents all the people of Canada within the sphere of matters conferred on it by the British North America Act.

The speech of the leader of the opposition faces us with this situation. We have had a debate lasting a week on the terms under which Newfoundland will enter confederation. That debate seemed to carry with it the agreement of hon. members opposite in every corner of the house. We discussed the terms, fifty of them, paragraph by paragraph, through five consecutive days. The debate achieved a high level and, subject to possibly one qualification, to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has referred, it seemed that the terms of union received unanimous consent of this house.

Mr. Gagnon: I said "on division".

Mr. Claxton: There was only one dissenting voice, that of the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon). If there were any others, I did and do not hear them. We debated this matter for a week; we discussed all the details and the point now raised by the leader of the opposition was not raised at all. Anyone listening to the debate throughout the week would have taken the view that the leader of the opposition and the Conservative opposition, as well as all hon. members opposite, except one, were in favour of this as a great forward step in the long history of confederation. Now that this point is raised I hope that it can be disposed of so that we may get on with the work of completing the story of confederation and making Canada one great nation "from sea to sea and from the river unto the end of the earth".

This is a step that has been worked for since 1864 and before that. It has been worked for by a long line of statesmen, our forefathers. They have worked hand in hand with our brothers in Newfoundland. Now at last in consequence of the free vote of the Newfoundland people terms of union have been negotiated which appear to appeal to this house as being fair and generous. They have been adopted by this house and are now up for consideration in the other place. Were we wasting our time last week when we adopted the terms of union? I suggest that this move comes rather suddenly and I think it will cause us to follow with the closest possible interest any further explanation.

With the delegation from Newfoundland we have worked out terms which we regard and which they regard as being fair and just for the entry of Newfoundland into confederation. It has been suggested—I was glad indeed to see that the leader of the opposition did not follow the suggestion—that we were wrong in negotiating the terms before responsible government had been restored in Newfoundland. In that connection I should like to say a word or two, because it is a point on which there has been some controversy. I should like also to express to hon. members opposite appreciation of the fair attitude they have taken.

The fact is that by the Statute of Westminster Newfoundland was given the status of a dominion and had conferred upon it the various provisions, provided the necessary steps were taken to bring her under those terms. In point of fact sections 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the Statute of Westminster were never applied to the colony of Newfoundland.

Mr. Drew: I know the minister wishes to be correct, and I would point out that section 1 is the section which states that Newfoundland is a dominion. Section 10 relates to certain things that flow from that. Section 1 was not one of the sections included in section 10, which described it as a dominion.

Mr. Claxton: That is quite right; it was described as a dominion. I do not challenge that; I do not say anything to the contrary. But I do say that the provisions of sections 2 to 6, inclusive, of the Statute of Westminster were never made applicable to the colony of Newfoundland because the Statute of Westminster was never adopted by the legislature of Newfoundland.

The leader of the opposition suggests that there was not time within which to do it, but I would point out that the Statute of Westminster came into effect on December 11, 1931, and the government of Newfoundland was not changed until the commencement of 1934. In the interval there was ample time for Newfoundland to have adopted the Statute of Westminster, had she wanted to do so.

Mr. Drew: During which time the commission of inquiry was sitting.

Mr. Claxton: The facts are just as I have stated them. In consequence the Statute of Westminster had absolutely no effect on the constitutional position of Newfoundland. I am informed that that was recognized at the time of the abdication of Edward VIII when reference was not made to Newfoundland for legislation when it was made in the case of the other self-governing dominions.

I would point out that sections 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the Statute of Westminster are made applicable to a dominion only if that dominion has adopted the provisions of section 10, and that was never done by Newfoundland although she had two years within which to do it. Consequently I do not believe that there is anything to be said for the argument advanced by my hon. friend.

[Mr. Claxton.]

The position of Newfoundland was altered in 1934 when the powers of its two houses were vested in a commission. From that time on, the powers of the legislature have been exercised by the commission. I point out that the opportunity for the return of responsible government to Newfoundland was promised by the government of the United Kingdom at such time as the affairs of Newfoundland might be in order, and subject to the will of its people. Following that an election was held for the appointment of forty-five representatives to the commission which was set up to discuss the position of Newfoundland. After discussion they decided to have a referendum on two subjects, whether they would have responsible government or a continuation of the commission form. Some seventeen out of the forty-five representatives voted also for the inclusion of a reference to the people of the subject of confederation. Consequently a referendum on the three questions was ordered by the British government, and it was expressly provided at the time that, if a majority of those voting did not vote in favour of any one of the three alternatives, there would be a second vote. A first vote was held, and there was not a majority for any one of the three. Then there was a second vote, and a majority of those voting voted in favour of entering confederation with Canada.

That was done by the action of the British government. The decision was made by the will of the people of Newfoundland. The British government needs no defence, but I submit that quite obviously they extended to the people of Newfoundland the possibility of having responsible government as well as the other two propositions. In other words, by allowing the people of Newfoundland to make their own choice the British government completely discharged its obligation to the people of Newfoundland.

As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said, however, that is not so much our concern, although if we had felt there was anything unfair about the way in which it was done, we would not have followed through with it. What we wanted to do was to respect the decision of the people of Newfoundland, and to enter into confederation with them on terms which appeared to be just and generous to both sides.

Following the decision of the majority of the people voting in the referendum, a delegation came to Ottawa under the chairmanship of a very distinguished citizen of Newfoundland, Mr. Walsh, now Sir Albert Walsh. He had been vice-chairman of the commission of government. He had not indicated where he stood. The delegation included six others appointed by the Newfoundland government. It is quite fair to say, without any breach of confidence, that some of the delegation were in favour of joining Canada and some were not. They represented their country in all fairness. They fought hard for what they considered to be just and reasonable terms, and then all but one of them signed the agreement which we are now seeking to implement.

I should like to pay my tribute to all seven of those gentlemen for their fairness, and the tenacity with which they represented the views of their people. I believe they would also agree with us that the terms are just and reasonable. Otherwise they would not have signed. It is those terms which are now being put forward by the parliament of Canada to the parliament at Westminster for the needed ratification.

I should like to quote from the remarks of one of the Newfoundland delegation, a lawyer, one of those gold medallists of Dalhousie university to whom reference was made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) last week. He represents many important clients in Newfoundland. I refer to the speech of Mr. John B. McEvoy, K.C., on this subject, made at the Ottawa Canadian Club last week. As he had been chairman of the convention, his remarks have particular significance, and I believe great importance, in this connection. In his speech he said:

> In view of allegations repeatedly made to the contrary, I want to make it perfectly clear that neither Canada nor any Canadian participated directly, or indirectly, in the recent decision of the people of Newfoundland to seek union with Canada. On July 13, 1943, the then Prime Minister, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, O.M., stated on the floor of the House of Commons that any idea of bringing Newfoundland into confederation must initiate "on the part of the people of Newfoundland rather than on the part of members of this house, certainly at this particular time. If the people of Newfoundland should ever decide that they wish to enter the Canadian federation and should make that decision clear beyond all possibility of misunderstanding, Canada would give most sympathetic consideration to the proposal."

Then Mr. McEvoy went on:

> This position was scrupulously maintained by the government of Canada all the way throughout, until the decision was reached by the people of Newfoundland and formal request was made by the government of Newfoundland to the government of Canada to receive a delegation from Newfoundland for the purpose of negotiating the terms of union.

To those who have a faint heart, or an obstructive inclination, I would commend these words from among those with which Mr. McEvoy concluded his speech. He said:

> For my own part, as a Newfoundlander who supported the cause of union, and as one who signed the terms of union, which will doubtless result in my eternal glorification, or damnation, depending upon one's point of view, it will be a proud day for me when the union is consummated, for I have long satisfied myself that, as part of this great dominion, the Newfoundlander will then take his proper place in the sun. Union with Canada brings to Newfoundland the possibility of realizing itself and of taking its place in a great federation of free and autonomous states. It means Newfoundland's emancipation from the stranglehold of isolation. For Canadians I can only, of course, dare to hope that the entry of Newfoundland into confederation will be the occasion of pride and joy.

I am sure that is the spirit in which all of us on this side of the house would like to see the debate conducted and concluded. That is the spirit with which we would like all Canadians to greet the entry of Newfoundland, to stretch out the hand of fellowship, the hand of brotherhood to these brothers in the British commonwealth who have been our neighbours for so long, and are soon to become sons and daughters of Canada. They will soon become that, Mr. Speaker, if the resolution passes and goes forward with the support of the house—I am sure it has the support of the people of Canada and the people of Newfoundland—so that we may join together in one greater union to make an even greater Canada than we have ever known.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, no one could possibly disagree with the word picture painted by my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat as, in concluding his peroration, he declared that it would mean much to Canada and to Newfoundland to join in confederation. As he read from the confederation debates of 1865 I read from those debates when the Hon. George Brown with pride envisaged the day when Newfoundland would join and become part of the Dominion of Canada.

Last week we on this side of the house joined in support of the agreement tentatively entered into between the representatives of the Canadian government and the representatives of Newfoundland. We agreed as to the favourable position in which it would place Canada, both nationally and internationally, to be joined by Newfoundland. There is, however, no inconsistency in the unanimity of our support last week and the stand now taken by my leader in the amendment he has moved. The amendment has nothing to do with the desirability of confederation. We supported that desirability of union and we are unchanged in that view. But, sir, believing as we do in confederation, we demand that the principles of confederation as set out in the British North America Act be complied with by the parliament of this country, to the end that our constitution shall be upheld. As I listened to my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), who apparently would make shortcuts through the constitution, I was reminded that in 1925 when the question of amending the constitution came before parliament in a resolution moved by the then member for York South Mr. W. F. Maclean, some who have sat with my hon. friend in cabinet made certain statements which were diametrically opposed to the view expressed by him, and which in fact fully supported the stand taken by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), that in any amendment to be made to the British North America Act the provisions of that act shall be fully complied with.

In addition there has grown up, not terms comprised within the written constitution, but precedents under which, when important changes are to be made to the constitution, the provinces must be consulted before those amendments in fact are made. My hon. friend asks, were the provinces consulted at the time Manitoba entered confederation? Were the provinces consulted when British Columbia entered confederation? Were the provinces consulted when Saskatchewan and Alberta entered confederation? I do not think they were, for the reason that those provinces entered confederation within the terms of the principles enunciated in the British North America Act.

Just for a moment, in order to bring the argument back from fantasy to fact regarding the nature of this amendment, I am going to read that amendment again:

> And whereas it is desirable that the government of Canada should consult with the governments of the several provinces in respect to the said matter;
> Now therefore be it resolved, that the government of Canada be required to consult at once the governments of the several provinces and that upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultations "a humble address be presented to His Majesty in the following words":

It is not a question of what the constitution is in Newfoundland. That was made clear in the first speech of my leader, although all desire amity within this confederation. What is at issue here, I repeat, is that the government has endeavoured to get around the constitution, because it believed it could not bring about confederation within the terms of the constitution.

Mr. Claxton: May I ask just one question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If my hon. friend will just wait, possibly I will answer his question a little later on. At the moment I am going to read section 146 of the British North America Act, though I have never been averse to answering questions at any time. That section reads:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable privy council, on addresses from the houses of parliament of Canada, and from the houses of the respective legislatures of the colonies or provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia, to admit those colonies or provinces, or any of them, into the union, and on address from the houses of the parliament of Canada to admit Rupert's Land and the northwestern territory, or either of them, into the union, on such terms and conditions in each case as are in the addresses expressed and as the Queen thinks fit to approve, subject to the provisions of this act . . .

That is the material portion. The government found itself in the position, to use the word of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), where "convenience" dictated departure from the terms of confederation. To me, sir, that was an astounding statement. Whenever the terms of confederation appear inconvenient, that would be a justification for making changes in the constitution. Surely, sir, we have not come to the position that, whenever a section of the British North America Act becomes inconvenient if carried into effect, all parliament has to do is, by a majority of parliament, to pass an address whereby the inconvenience is removed, regardless of what may be the result to the constitution.

It was not until the Prime Minister used the word "convenience" that I realized what the government is trying to do. I was not surprised because, sir, no government since confederation has ever committed the number of invasions of provincial rights, whether under the guise of emergency or defence or otherwise, that the present government has made. There is always an excuse for these invasions. Once it was an emergency; the other day it was the demands of defence; today, sir, the new excuse is the balance of convenience.

What does this address say? We have accepted the terms of the agreement; we have accepted the desirability of confederation. But we demand, sir, that parliament shall never deem it proper to amend our constitution indirectly, for convenience or otherwise, without consultation with the provinces.

I shall read the material portions of the resolution.

> And whereas the agreement containing terms of union between Canada and Newfoundland set out in the schedule to this act has been duly approved by the parliament of Canada and by the government of Newfoundland;
> And whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom to confirm and give effect to the said agreement—

That was as far as we went. We consented to the terms of the agreement. But, at the time we did so, we did not realize nor were we given to understand the method whereby the government intended to circumvent the constitution in order to carry out the terms of union.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): This was on the order paper.

Mr. Howe: He cannot read.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We had no idea then whether or not the provinces had been consulted. I do not hear any guffaws from the other side at that statement.

Mr. Abbott: Listen a little more closely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Listening to the frivolous manner of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), one is led to believe that he regards "facetious" as synonymous with "finance".

Mr. Abbott: I knew that would be a dandy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to continue against such a group—

Mr. Blackmore: Would the hon. member speak more loudly?

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are my hon. friends, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the former Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, saying?

Mr. Howe: I will make my speech presently.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to hear that, because I should like to remind him of the lines:

> But man, proud man,
> Drest in a little brief authority,
> Most ignorant of what he's most assur'd.

Then, continuing to read from the resolution:

> Be it therefore enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:
> 1. The agreement containing terms of union between Canada and Newfoundland set out in the schedule to this act is hereby confirmed and shall have the force of law notwithstanding anything in the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946.

What does that mean? Regardless of the British North America Act the British government is being asked by this house to circumvent a principle engrafted in the constitution. We in this parliament are asked to give approval to this course.

The next section of the resolution is equally clear:

> This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1949, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1949.

The British North America Act contemplated that Newfoundland would join confederation only upon compliance with certain provisions of the act. A roundabout way in the mechanical and legislative process has never been deemed proper at any time in amending the constitution.

I will refer now to some of the statements made in 1925, which are indicative of the support then given by members of the cabinet of the then Prime Minister to the whole question of the amendment of the constitution. There have been changes in the constitution in recent years. In 1946, the first breach in constitutional procedure developed in connection with an amendment concerning redistribution. The advantages achieved were taken as the excuse for circumventing the provisions of the constitution.

At that time I said, as reported on page 2235 of Hansard, and I now repeat:

> . . . the test of looking not at the advantages of the present to be achieved by this short-cut method of amendment of our constitution, but rather at the grave potentialities inherent in making a precedent for amendment of our constitution by a majority of parliament. The great danger of attractive measures such as this is that of the people and the people's representatives, by reason of the very attractiveness, giving up the substance for the shadow.

In 1946 we took exactly the same stand as we now take, namely, that in the matter of amendment of our constitution, consultation with the provinces is absolutely necessary in the interests of our federation.

If I cannot convince by my own argument, or by what has been said by the hon. leader of the opposition, possibly I can convince by some of the statements made by outstanding leaders in this country in 1925. I have already referred to the question that then came before the house, a matter that must be faced in this country in the interests of our common development. That question is the amendment of our constitution to remove anachronisms while protecting the rights of each province within confederation.

One who spoke on the matter was the Hon. Mr. Lapointe, who in dealing with this matter said, at page 298 of Hansard of 1925:

> First, the British North America Act itself is not only the charter of the Dominion of Canada; it is just as much the charter of the provinces of Canada. We derive our powers from the British North America Act; so do the provinces. They have no constitution other than the British North America Act; all their powers they derive from that act.

Then he goes on to say this:

> Second, my hon. friend speaks of protection to minorities. That is not the only thing in the British North America Act in which the provinces are interested. They have all their powers which they have kept to themselves and which have been agreed by everybody to be their powers. Have we a right to amend the constitution without their consent, in the way, for instance, of taking away from them some of the powers which have been theirs since confederation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am being fair in reading this part. Mr. Crerar, who was then a member of the government interrupted and said:

> This parliament would have that power in respect of all provinces excepting the four that originally entered confederation.

Newfoundland

Then Mr. Lapointe said:

I do not agree with my hon. friend in that regard. The other provinces came later into a joint confederation, but they have the same status, powers and rights as the original four provinces and they should be consulted just as much as any other province if any substantial change is asked as regards the British North America Act.

I point out that Mr. Lapointe is not dealing only with the question of jurisdictional powers as between the dominion and the provinces. Then he refers to the views of Sir John Macdonald, Sir George Etienne Cartier, Hon. George Brown and other outstanding members at the time, on the subject of confederation. He also quotes Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at page 299, as follows:

In parliament here we can do as we please; we are in the majority; but are the members of this house prepared to say that if any province finds itself aggrieved by the terms of confederation, which have been accepted by all the provinces, they will ask the British parliament to alter the constitution in the way desired by that particular province? Such a course might be followed by very serious consequences.

He replies to the views of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) as to the nature of confederation in these words:

Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces, but adhered to by all the nine provinces who have entered it, and I submit to the judgment of this house and to the best consideration of its members, that this compact should not be lightly altered. It should be altered only for adequate cause, and after the provinces themselves have had an opportunity to pass judgment on the same.

Mr. Claxton: May I ask how this is altering any compact?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not hear the question.

Mr. Claxton: I asked how our present action would alter any compact.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The arrangement made in section 146 provides for the basis of confederation, in bringing into confederation certain other named areas.

I shall not read the quotation from the remarks of Sir Robert Borden, but he held views similar to Mr. Lapointe's. Finally Mr. Lapointe uses words that I thought were particularly pertinent. He said:

Surely the British North America Act cannot be made a scrap of paper, as that treaty was made at that time.

He was referring to Belgium.

There is a way, perhaps, yes; but the only way is the friendly way, is the legal way, is the constitutional way. It is to approach the various parties to the agreement with a view to arriving at an understanding as to the changes which may be necessary and which may be agreed upon by all the parties to the pact.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I am not entering into a controversy on the question whether confederation was a pact, a treaty, a contract or a statute; but both Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe used the expression "pact" and "compact". Mr. Lapointe continues as follows:

As I have said, I do not think there could be any other way; I believe that any arbitrary action in the matter would simply defeat its own purpose and would strike at the root of our national unity. I think I cite history correctly when I say that every time there has been a dispute in Canada as regards provincial rights, those who were on the side of provincial rights were victorious in the end.

Mr. Rowe: And will be again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that at the Liberal convention last August it was pointed out how far the present government had departed from a recognition of provincial rights. Then I go on to quote further from Mr. Lapointe:

I do not think there can be any attempt to change the mutual charter of both the dominion and the provinces by the arbitrary action of this parliament. I do not think it is possible to do it.

Mr. Martin: What page is that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is page 301, in the first column. To continue:

To those who want changes, and I am willing to admit that there might be the necessity for changes, I would say that the only way to get them is the constitutional way, to ask the consent of the various parties to confederation.

In that statement Mr. Lapointe went even further than did those of his predecessors who had occupied the position of Minister of Justice.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the views of outstanding Canadians who at different times were members of the cabinet of the former Prime Minister of this country. I had referred to the views of the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, and I had referred to some of the statements made at that time by Mr. Crerar, now Senator Crerar.

As reported at page 317 of Hansard for February 19, 1925, discussing the question of the constitution Mr. Crerar said:

The fact is that Canada has moved forward tremendously in the last fifty years. Those of us who have read history know the circumstances in Canada that brought about the confederation of the then existing provinces. I quite agree with the argument advanced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) yesterday that the confederation pact was in the nature of a treaty. It was the result of different provinces getting together and agreeing upon a solution that would lead them out of their difficulties. But while that was one of the reasons behind the confederation understanding or agreement in 1867, there was also another aspiration behind it, and it was voiced, perhaps most strongly, by the great architect of confederation, Sir John A. Macdonald, for in large measure, he was the architect of confederation, even if he could not claim credit for originating the idea.

Then Senator Crerar, as he now is, went on to deal with the question of a united northern British America.

There is in the first place the question of the right to amend our own constitution, a question which one might describe at present as theoretical or academic, although it may come to have in the course of time some very practical bearings. There is secondly the question of the method by which this country should proceed to secure amendment of its constitution should it decide such a step to be desirable and necessary.

And then later on he said:

All of that particular phase of the question was so fully and conclusively argued by the Minister of Justice yesterday that this house, I believe, is practically unanimously of the view that if an amendment of the kind is to be sought, due regard should be had to the view that a compact was made at the time of confederation, and that an amendment of the importance that such an amendment certainly would have, ought only to be proposed after there had been a conference and agreement between the dominion and the provinces.

The amendment to which the then Prime Minister was referring was an amendment that would alter the basis of the amendment of our constitution, and make it possible to have it amended by parliament after consultation and in agreement with the provinces.

How important it is that the rights of confederation in so far as the provinces are concerned be respected was indicated again the other day when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) referred to the rights under section 133 of the British North America Act, and indicated that in his legal opinion, based upon his experience as a fine constitutional lawyer, those rights could be taken away by a vote of a simple majority of parliament.

That viewpoint if accepted goes a long way along the road to destroy the basis upon which—and I use the words of the former Prime Minister—the compact of confederation was founded and arrived at. If it is going to be open to a simple majority of parliament, without consultation with the provinces, to make amendments, then the rights guaranteed minorities under the British North America Act—and I am not referring to powers under section 92, but rather to those other rights in which the provinces have an interest, or in which minorities in the provinces have an interest—could be torn asunder and destroyed by the overwhelming weight of a majority in parliament.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) speaking in the house on July 5, 1943, indicated how far the British parliament would go in passing an amendment to our constitution, regardless of any provincial rights which might be involved. The hon. member, as reported at page 4345 of Hansard, said:

Let me say to him and those who believe with him that, from conversations again and again with members of the British House of Commons, some of them within the last few days, I am convinced that whenever Canada asks for an amendment of the British North America Act—which is, in effect, our constitution—no matter what amendment we may ask, the parliament of Great Britain will accede to the request and adopt the proposed amendment.

If his conclusion is correct—and that was the considered opinion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar at that time; and apparently he has not changed that opinion in the past four or five years, because he used similar terms in the debate on redistribution—then the danger of permitting of amendments to the constitution, without consultation with the provinces, is intensified. It is placed in clear relief.

The amendment is not something new. We stood for this in 1946, as we have stood for the rights of the provinces since confederation. In 1946 we pointed out the danger to constitutional rights when there was held before this House of Commons an invitation to circumvent the constitution in order to secure additional members. We pointed out that short-cuts of amendment would make a pathway which would ultimately lead to permanent highways that would be dangerous to the future of the compact of confederation. In 1946 we took a stand that followed the stand taken throughout the years by Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George Etienne Cartier, Aylesworth, Blake, Meighen and Bennett and, above all, as taken by Mr. Lapointe who, throughout the years, pressed for the necessity of the assurance that the pact of confederation be not amended in whole or in part except after consultation with—and he went so far as to say "with the consent of"—the provinces.

In 1946, on the occasion of the debate on the matter of the address, an amendment was moved by myself which placed our views then before the Canadian people—and this amendment is almost a complete reiteration of the 1946 amendment. I urged then, as I do now, the necessity for the preservation inviolate of rights under the constitution if there is to be unity in this land. At that time I quoted the words of Edmund Burke, which were applicable then as they are now, when he said:

Our constitution is like our island, which uses and restrains its subject sea; in vain the waves roar. In that constitution, I know, and exultantly feel, both that I am free, and that I am not free dangerously to myself or to others.

Great progress has been made since confederation, as was pictured by the Minister of Defence (Mr. Claxton), but those advances were made during a period when the constitution was upheld at all costs by all parties in this country. Having the experience of power gained during the days of war when without restraint parliament allowed the federal authority, the provinces raising no objection, to infringe upon the rights of the provinces, this government is following the precedent on amendment to the constitution in 1946 and is adding precedent to precedent. Unless a stop is put to this course, it will become the unwritten law of this country that our constitution may be amended without consultation with the provinces. There is the danger.

Junius dealt with that when great debates on liberty and freedom were taking place. He dealt with many of the problems that we are faced with in connection with our constitution. He warned of the danger of bad precedents being permitted to find a place in the statute books because the danger was that if once permitted they would continue in the future. He said:

One precedent creates another. They soon accumulate and constitute law. What yesterday was fact, today is doctrine.

What Junius said in those great Letters of his comes back with renewed force. Almost three years ago this parliament, over the stand taken by this opposition, permitted an amendment by voting for an address which provided for an amendment to our constitution that altered one of the main bases upon which confederation was built. We moved an amendment in these words:

That the motion be amended by deleting the words: "A humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words:" and substituting therefor:

And whereas it is desirable that the government should consult with the several provinces in respect of the said matter;

Now therefore be it resolved that the government be required to consult at once the several provinces and upon satisfactory conclusion of such consultations be authorized to present an humble address to His Majesty in the following terms.

That was our amendment in 1946. My hon. friends opposite say that we have changed our viewpoint. That viewpoint we have not changed. Our stand in 1946 is our stand today. Everywhere in this land, in every province in this country, people will be able to realize and build upon this fact: So long as we are in this House of Commons, rights under the constitution will not be kicked about by a government, however convenient it may be to that government to do so.

Mr. Knowles: Before the hon. member sits down, would he permit me to ask a question? The hon. member has referred to the stand his party took in 1946. Will he tell the house where his party stood in 1943? If he won't, I will; they voted the other way in 1943.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I am open-minded about this question of Newfoundland, but I was surprised at some of the arguments used by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). He referred to Newfoundland as being a dominion, but he knows that the British government appointed the Amulree commission whose recommendations were approved, first by the Newfoundland government and afterward by the British government who put them into force. One of the recommendations of that commission was that the legislative and executive authority be vested in the governor, who was to be advised by a commission of six members appointed by the British government. One of those commissioners, Mr. Walsh I believe, was here. Newfoundland is no longer a dominion, as the leader of the opposition knows very well.

We have had some fine dissertations about the fathers of confederation. They were great men, they were statesmen, but they are all dead. I am more interested in the living than in the dead, although I have great respect for the dead. As I say, I was openminded about Newfoundland until a few days ago when I saw a dispatch in the press. I do not think too much publicity could be given to this. It appeared in a French paper as a Reuters dispatch from London dated February 9, and I translate from the French as follows:

Viscount Jowitt, Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, stated that the decision of Canada to incorporate Newfoundland was far from being stingy.

That is my English, of course. It may not be Oxford English, but I am doing my best.

It is certain that union for a great many years to come will be a heavy burden upon the Canadian people, he stated in answer to the Tory Lord Semphill. He said that that was one reason why several people from Newfoundland were under the impression that they were being sold to Canada by the British government.

Lord Jowitt was kind enough to inform Canada of the burden that would have to be carried on our shoulders. If the leader of the British government in the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor, says that this deal will be a heavy burden for Canada, then I may not be for it. I will leave aside all hair-splitting about section 146 of the British North America Act and section 6 of the Statute of Westminster. I have already said and written that the Statute of Westminster is just bunk and changes nothing in the British North America Act. Who ever heard of a law with any of the enacting provisions in the preamble? Moreover, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) knows very well that the Statute of Westminster is valueless, and that it changed nothing in the British North America Act. Therefore I do not know what I shall do about the motion of the leader of the opposition, because his presentation of it was too nebulous. I am against the entry of Newfoundland into confederation at the present time at least. Why should we be in such a hurry? We should take our time. We should see if Lord Jowitt was right or wrong. The Canadian people may blame all members of parliament because they accepted certain conventions blindly. In those circumstances, and owing to the fact that Lord Jowitt has revealed to the House of Lords that it is a bad bargain for Canada, I do not see how we can be bound by such a convention. There is something else that you must note also. Some of the representatives of Newfoundland who came here were the very commissioners appointed by the British government. One of the British cabinet ministers has spoken very clearly in the House of Lords, when he said that they were glad to get rid of Newfoundland. I find that insulting to Newfoundland, but it is a good thing that we know what the situation is.

Every time that all parties of the house are unanimous about something I become suspicious. During the war I was suspicious about conscription. I was suspicious about the so-called gifts we made, and I am suspicious now about this bargain. I warn you, Mr. Speaker, and I warn my hon. colleagues, to take their time. There is no reason for them to swallow Newfoundland in one gulp. Take your time and think about it. Let us wait until we see the Hansard of the House of Lords with the context of the remarks of Lord Jowitt. That is a most important thing to do. We hold a position of trust, and the people of Canada have the right to ask of each one of us, "what is the matter about Newfoundland?"

What are the boundaries between Newfoundland as it is now and Canada? Have they been surveyed? We are told Labrador is a rich country. What are the delimitations of Newfoundland at the present time? That is a question which has not been discussed at all. We have no map of Newfoundland; we only have a script. I want a map; I want to know where Canada ends now, and what will constitute Newfoundland when Newfoundland enters confederation, if she does. I have nothing more to add other than to say that I think Lord Jowitt has rendered a tremendous service to Canada by warning us against haste.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, there has appeared recently during the debate a noticeable tendency to quote the speeches of Colonel George Drew made in 1937, when he was without experience, against the speeches of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) of 1949, after twelve years of experience, much of it gained as premier of Ontario in the administration of the affairs of that province. A man of ordinary intelligence and the honesty to face facts can learn a lot in twelve years. I judge from the way the leader of the opposition deports himself in this house that he is a man of ordinary intelligence, and that he has the honesty to face facts. Let us not be surprised then if the language which he uses today concerning dominion-provincial relations is quite different from the language which he used when he was without experience twelve years ago. Let the members of the present party in power take over the administration of one of the provinces of this dominion, and face realities as they are in Canada and as they have been during the last ten years. They will be different men entirely from the men they are now. They will have made a good many important discoveries that everyone in Canada ought to make concerning the responsibilities which rest upon the provinces, and the financial difficulties which the provinces experience in endeavouring to discharge them.

In supporting the Conservative amendment Social Crediters are not supporting the Conservatives.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: I am making my statement, and hon. members should take it as I am making it. Social Crediters are supporting the principles of provincial responsibility, decentralization of power, and genuine democracy and freedom. We began to support them before the election of 1935 which swept Premier Aberhart into power in Alberta, and those principles have been supported consistently in every public utterance of every Social Credit leader since that time. By this amendment the Conservatives have merely swung into line with the Social Credit contention throughout the years. When the present leader of the opposition made his remarks in 1937 he was opposing Alberta. I doubt very much that the present leader of the opposition, with the experience he now has, would oppose the policies that Premier Aberhart was following in 1937. He has found how necessary they were.

By its vote, parliament has declared itself to be in favour of Newfoundland's entry into the Dominion of Canada as the tenth province. The vote had no reference whatsoever to the method of changing the Canadian constitution, the British North America Act. It seems to me that there is a considerable amount of confusion in the minds of certain members of the Liberal party and the C.C.F. party in this respect. They choose to disregard a vital fact in the situation as a result of which they go astray, either deliberately or by accident.

The present B.N.A. Act is admirably workable by men of good will. That has been discovered by the Social Credit party in its administration of the province of Alberta over a period of fourteen years. Men of good will in both the federal and provincial governments can make the British North America Act of today work successfully in the interests of Canada. There is no need to bring the British North America Act up to date. It is up to date. All that is necessary is to bring the thinking of the men of our country up to date, and to bring the application of the British North America Act up to date. Let the federal parliament exercise its powers concerning currency, credit, and banking wisely and beneficently for the advantage of all Canadians. As all hon. members will recall, those powers were given specifically to the federal government in the British North America Act. Let the federal government exercise them.

I notice a stone wall of determined resistance on the part of many members of the Liberal party against any progressive consideration whatsoever of those two powers. In the B.N.A. Act the dominion government is given power over currency and coinage, over banking, the incorporation of banks and the issue of paper money. I maintain that, if those two powers are exercised wisely by the federal government, all the unhappiness that has existed as between the dominion and the provinces during the past twenty years will have no reason for recurring. Let the federal government pass enabling legislation, as the present government has been doing recently. Let the federal government render available to the provinces the financial means they require to enable them to discharge their responsibilities under the constitution, and there will be no more difficulty.

Let it be borne in mind that at the present time under the constitution of Canada the provinces are charged with responsibility in all matters pertaining to education, health, roads, housing, the support of the unfortunate such as the unemployed, invalids, the aged, the blind and other people who are more or less unable to take care of themselves. It seems to me moreover that any broad interpretation of the principle of property and civil rights must include responsibility over prices and markets within the province also. I do not see how any province can possibly take care of the property and civil rights of its citizens unless that province is able to control prices and markets. How can you guarantee the property and civil rights of a farmer if you have no control over the prices of the things he sells or the prices of the things he buys? That seems to me to very definitely carry the implication that the provinces should have power to control those two important factors in its life. Let the dominion government render available to the province of Nova Scotia, for example, the financial support necessary to enable that province to discharge its responsibilities in connection with property and civil rights, which I have just indicated. Then the dominion will have no further trouble with Nova Scotia or any other province, and the people of Canada will be happy and prosperous.

It will be said immediately by those who are orthodox in their financial thinking, "Well, where are we going to get the money?" That is exactly the matter I referred to when I mentioned the powers given the dominion government in respect of banking, currency and credit, and the issue of paper money. If in addition to the things I have already mentioned the federal government will give wise leadership to the provinces, which in considerable degree the present government has been doing within the last few years, a great many difficulties will be avoided. Call a dominion-provincial conference to deal with all the important matters for which the provinces and the dominion are jointly responsible. Then, after policy has been determined, let the federal government lead out, as it was set to do, and we shall have no more trouble in the dominion. All will then go well in Canada.

Listening to people, watching the way they applaud, listening to the little remarks they make on the side, we find that those in this house fall naturally into two groups. One group is the centralizers; the other group consists of the decentralizers. The centralizers seem to be afflicted with the idea that anyone who is not in this federal government or in this house has no sense and knows nothing about how to govern a province. In other words, they believe that in order to rule the people of British Columbia for instance we have to tell them what to do and see that they do it, instead of leaving it to British Columbia itself. That conception is entirely contrary to the facts. There are just as intelligent men elected to the government of British Columbia as ever came to this house; and they are close to the people and know the problems of the people. They are just as anxious to do what is right. All you need do from the standpoint of this government is provide them with the financial means to discharge their responsibilities under the British North America Act. They will do the rest. We need not try to tell them how to run their education or housing or old age pensions or health or highways. They know how to do it; and they want to do it. Just as soon as we realize that there are wise men in even the smallest hamlets of Canada, and that all we have to do is enable those wise men to rule the country, then we shall have no more trouble. But when you let the centralizers take control of everything right down for example to the acres of peas or beans or carrots a man is going to plant, then you encounter real trouble.

Recently the Canadian people passed through the exacting crisis of the war. During that time they raised a powerful army. During that time they built up an efficient war-time production machine. During that time they designed and put into operation an admirable system of price control, and other economic controls. The present government must be given credit for having done all those things, in co-operation with the provinces. In the process the members of this house and the people of the country have seen this magnificent Canadian people carry on from coast to coast with scarcely a quiver or a creak, notwithstanding the fact that on many occasions this government encroached upon provincial fields, taking over powers that were obviously powers of the provinces. The provinces gladly acceded to the request of the dominion while the crisis continued, showing that there was no desire to interfere or to insist uncooperatively on provincial rights.

The people of this country will do that under any crisis. All that is necessary is to consult them. All that is necessary is to determine with them the objective that must be gained and the method that must be followed in order to do so, and you will find the Canadian people united. It will not matter a particle how much power a province has; it will gladly co-operate with any intelligent leading power in Ottawa.

The thing that is worrying the provinces is that, if they lose the constitutional power to determine the way their people shall be governed, then when crisis comes and they need that power they will no longer have it. During the war we did not find any sign of lack of unity, except perhaps between the two primary races in Canada, and I am not sure there was a great lack of unity there. Nor did we find any sign of any kind of "balkanization." I think one of the members of the C.C.F. party is responsible for that noble word. He will never see the balkanization of Canada as long as we remain Canadians and true to our traditions. Let the provinces have as much power as they desire; we shall find them working together as long as we give them wise leadership.

May I turn for a minute or two to the remarks made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). He said it required a change in the British North America Act to admit the provinces of Manitoba, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Alberta and Saskatchewan. I know that the hon. minister was speaking—

Mr. Claxton: I am sorry, but I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. Blackmore: I gathered that was what the hon. minister said, and that he was using that as a reason why it was quite logical to change the British North America Act in order to bring Newfoundland into confederation.

Mr. Claxton: I know the hon. member wants to be fair. I never said anything of the kind, nor did I intend to say anything of the kind.

Mr. Blackmore: I am sorry, but I was making notes rather hastily and I am not quite sure I got his idea. I gathered from his remarks the impression that he was trying to argue we were proposing to use the same procedure in admitting Newfoundland as was used in admitting these other provinces. Am I correct in that?

In those remarks, I do not believe the hon. member was quite up to his ordinary standard of quick and accurate thinking. You will remember that Alberta and Saskatchewan were already part of the Dominion of Canada, since they were part of the Northwest Territories. British Columbia, Prince Edward Island and Manitoba were not sovereign states. They had never become sovereign dominions under the 1926 imperial conference and the declaration which followed upon that, nor under the Statute of Westminster, as Newfoundland has become. Newfoundland is a sister dominion. Consequently, the admission of Newfoundland to Canada involves certain principles which were not involved in the admission of any of the other provinces mentioned.

May I say a word or two concerning the stand of the Social Credit party on this matter? We Social Crediters favour Canadian unity, but we favour the decentralization of power, once and for all, to enable the provinces to protect their people industrially, financially and politically. We may be facing another depression in a very short time, as all hon. members know. If another depression does come and we begin to go through such trying experiences as confronted the Canadian people during the last depression, then we shall face difficulties which will require real statesmanship. Up to the present time, no federal government has shown any sign of adopting any adequate safeguards against depression.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, it will be found that another depression is the thing that is worrying the provinces. The provinces are concerned about how they will manage their affairs during a period of depression. Look at what happened to the provinces during the last depression. Even the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, with their vast amount of industrialization, became impoverished to a painful degree. The four western provinces and the three maritime provinces were reduced to the point of extreme poverty. Prices fell, but debts remained. Falling prices caused debts which were owing before the depression to almost treble, but the debts remained and the interest was still charged. Men were dispossessed from their farms and homes. All this time the dominion government sat supinely, disregarding the whole matter.

As soon as Premier Aberhart was elected in the province of Alberta and began to defend the homes of the people in that province, he encountered opposition from this federal government. It is easy to state that such a thing will not occur again. Furthermore, all during that depression adverse freight rates continued to place a most iniquitous burden on the western provinces and the maritimes. Nothing was done by the federal government to cushion the impact of those freight rates on the economic life of these provinces. Adverse tariff conditions prevailed, but again nothing was done to cushion the impact of those tariffs on the people of the provinces. If the provinces face such conditions again, they will need constitutionally guaranteed powers which have not yet been granted to them. The provinces need recognized constitutional powers so that they can act to meet depressions or other emergencies which might arise.

The provinces must have a constitutional power to resist any centralization moves of the federal government. An example of this we saw in the Sirois report, a matter which I do not propose to discuss at the present time. The Liberal government at Ottawa proposed to act on the Sirois report, which was designed to utterly destroy the financial independence of every province in this dominion. For example, Mr. Speaker, in connection with adjustment grants—hon. members will recall that the provinces were to receive these grants—Quebec was to receive $8 million a year. The rest of the provinces combined were to receive only $6 million. The province of Alberta alone is today receiving a larger adjustment grant than that every year. According to the Sirois report recommendations, Alberta was to receive nothing, British Columbia was to receive nothing, and Ontario was to receive nothing.

Now that report was seriously considered by the members of the government, many of whom are now sitting on the treasury benches in this house. That report was seriously considered by the party which now controls this country. Can you blame anyone who has the interest of this country at heart for rising in his place to oppose a set-up under which such a thing could occur? We simply must be on our guard if we are going to be worthy of the responsibilities resting upon us. In addition to that, it is important to consider the protection of property and civil rights which are also the charge of the provinces.

Let me make the stand of the Social Credit party abundantly clear. One of the most pathetic things in public life in this country, Mr. Speaker, is that a man will say one thing in this house and his political opponents will go all over the country declaring he said another. I wonder how in the world this country can be honourably governed when men resort to such base tactics? Let me state once more, specifically, the position of Social Crediters in this matter. We did support the principle of the union of Newfoundland with Canada. Anyone who says we did not is lying. We still support that principle, and we shall do so. We did support the proposed terms of the agreement, after careful consideration of all the details presented to the house. We still do. We have not changed, nor do we now change our attitude towards this most important step in the completion of Canadian federation.

In introducing the resolution which is now before the house on the motion of the Prime Minister, the government has chosen however a procedure which could be easily interpreted, as the leader of the opposition has shown, as an amendment to the British North America Act. We cannot, therefore, do less than support his amendment requesting that the provinces be consulted. If we did anything else it could be interpreted as opposition to the fundamental principle of decentralization and provincial autonomy for which we have stood throughout the years. The stand which we propose to take now, we believe to be the only safeguard to our constitution.

I think I have made quite clear the stand we are taking and the reason for our intention of voting with the Conservatives on this amendment to the proposal of the Prime Minister.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a speech for the first time during this session of parliament, you will accept my usual assurance it will not take very long. It seems to me that our whole difficulty may be summarized in the simple statement that, while great men brought about the passage of the British North America Act, they made no provision in that act for a method for revising our constitution. We therefore from time to time find ourselves in the difficulty which confronts this house today. From that day to this we have been obliged to rely on decisions made in the Supreme Court of Canada and in the privy council regarding matters of jurisdiction and amendment. So may I at once say that I agree—as I have always agreed—with what was stated in the radio speech made by the Prime Minister a short time ago, that we need a meeting of some kind to endeavour to find a way to amend the British North America Act; to find a legal method, which will be without difficulty and without cavil, of amending our constitution. But that has not happened as yet. From the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) I gather that it is something which he has in mind, but he said that he had no intention of bringing that idea forward in the present session of parliament.

Some legal questions are unanswered, and this house is entitled to expect to receive answers to them from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who, after hearing the speech made by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) the other day, has maintained a most discreet silence in this house. As a matter of fact, I have not heard him guffaw in his usual manner from that time to this.

Mr. Abbott: Who? The hon. member for Souris?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The question in my mind, and upon which no one has touched, is this. Has Newfoundland a legislature, or has it not? In the broad sense of that word, I know they have no elected representatives. But I also know that, by the imperial act of 1933, I think it was, all the powers of a legislature were conferred upon the governing body. I am only a little police court lawyer. I realize that. I know nothing about constitutional matters.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, the interruption must have been intelligent. It was not from the hon. member for Springfield.

Mr. Sinnott: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting here in my seat all evening, and have not spoken one word since I came in.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May I agree with the hon. member for Springfield, Mr. Speaker, and go even further than he did. May I say that he has not said an intelligent word in this house since I came here four or five years ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member for Calgary West may regret that remark.

Mr. Sinnott: Again I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. Abbott: Ignore it.

Mr. Sinnott: I do not think—

An hon. Member: You never did.

Mr. Sinnott: —that any hon. member of this house should speak to another in the manner adopted by the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Abbott: Consider the source whence it came.

Mr. Sinnott: Yes, I consider the source from which it came.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest that hon. members do not interrupt the hon. member who has the floor.

An hon. Member: He did not interrupt.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest that the hon. member who has the floor should address himself to the Speaker.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I accept your soft slap on the wrist, Mr. Speaker, because there is no one to whom I would pay greater attention that I would to you.

Mr. Grant: The hon. member is obliged to.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Perhaps one of the reasons for that is that I am obliged to do so. But, nevertheless, that is the situation. I now continue. I wish the sharp-shooters in the chamber would speak out so that I could hear them.

Mr. Abbott: Nobody said a word.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I turn now for a moment to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who told us that my leader had reversed himself between last week and this week. That was to be anticipated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): When I went to school, there were no such things as "grades"; the term used then was "books". When some one expects an interruption from the fifth book, he gets one from the second book, as exemplified by the interruption I received from the Minister of Finance just now. These people do not know any better. That is the situation.

Mr. Abbott: Thank you, thank you. Carry on.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Perhaps the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) might address the chair, Mr. Speaker. I am glad the hon. gentleman thanked me, because we have been excellent friends for a long time. I disagree with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). The Minister of Finance knows the difference between facetiousness and finance. He does not know it well, but he knows it.

To continue, I do not intend to quote what anybody said in 1864, 1865, 1867 or at any other time. I shall, however, try to bring this matter down to the present with regard to just what our problem is, and what we are voting on. Before I was so kindly interrupted by the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Abbott: I beg the hon. member's pardon. I have not interrupted my hon. friend tonight. I can only suggest that my hon. friend pay a little bit more attention to identifying those who may be interrupting him. I have not been one of them.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am delighted to hear that, and I apologize most humbly. Perhaps it was the hon. member for Springfield. He would like to be a minister of finance.

Mr. Abbott: I have been trying to read a letter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am sorry to interrupt the Minister of Finance's preoccupation with his letter. I hope it is from his wife and that he will get some benefit from it. But that is neither here nor there.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must ask the hon. member to co-operate with the chair, to address himself to the Speaker and not to make any reference to any other hon. member, especially those who do not interrupt.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I did not hear you, Mr. Speaker, but I agree with everything you say. That is all right. We rely on the Minister of Justice to guide us humble people who know no law. We may have an idea of justice but perhaps not of law. We should like him to tell us, at some time, whether or not under the present set-up Newfoundland has a legislature. But the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has been extremely silent in this debate. He has no papers in front of him, as has the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), who has been getting ready for some considerable time.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

Mr. Martin: My mind has been elsewhere.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am quite sure of that. However, let us not discuss the usual.

Mr. Martin: A very good comeback.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I come back to this and I say to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that I have no doubt he is ambitious. I have no doubt he has now been appointed to the senior team. I have no doubt he wants to be known some day as the rookie of the year—if I may use an expression used in hockey. I point out to him that he has some difficulties in front of him. He has the beneficent administrator of reconstruction and supply, and he has the man with the great smile down here, the minister for whom we have respect and who deals with foreign affairs. I think he had better get into this pretty soon and tell us—because we will all accept his views—just what the law is in this matter.

I now turn to the socialists on my left. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of that party in the house, made a speech. I knew every word he was going to say. I do not mean I could have given it phrase by phrase, but I did know he would support this measure. Why? Because their whole philosophy is the centralization of authority in a single government. Therefore that was his position. The best example we have had of that in recent years was when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) last year, with his tongue in his cheek, brought in a bill with respect to centralizing in this government the handling of coarse grains. The only provincial government supporting it was the socialist government of Saskatchewan. They came through all right; they did not even let the ball have a second bounce. They grabbed it and came right back. So that is their position. I understand it, because it has been the position of socialists from Karl Marx right down to the day of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. That is their whole position; so we can thoroughly understand them.

Perhaps you may think, Mr. Speaker, that it is a bit late; but if I may I should like to turn your mind—perhaps "invite the turning of your mind" would be a better expression—to just what the present position is. This is an amendment to the British North America Act. No one has seen fit to deny that. No one has made a single suggestion that it is anything other than that. So, as far as I am concerned, I am anxious to leave behind what people have said from 1864 until the present time. I have been advised by men who were experts in this business that anyone who is in politics would like to forget everything he ever said. As a matter of fact, it is not a bad idea.

So we come down to this very simple proposition: What does this mean? Expediency, convenience, shortcuts—use any other words you will. It does seem to me that it is just that. Although this is the first speech I have made since the session was called—and perhaps these will be my last words in it—let me ask this: Am I right in saying—and I am sure I am—that it is an amendment to the Canadian constitution?

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Who said no?

Mr. Garson: The Minister of Justice.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Oh, the Minister of Justice said it? I am so happy to have heard him say that. But apparently he has not read the resolution—because it is called that in the resolution. It states—

> The agreement containing terms of union between Canada and Newfoundland set out in the schedule to this act is hereby confirmed and shall have the force—

What?

> —of law, notwithstanding anything in the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946.

And if that is not enough for him—for this rookie in our big league—let him listen to this:

> This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1949—

How in the world could there be a British North America Act, 1949, unless it amended what we have had before?

Then, let us refer to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who said he was not a lawyer—and I am getting fed up with a lot of these fellows, who know nothing about the law, saying that they are not lawyers—and who read—

Mr. Gillis: You are not giving us a bad exhibition, right now.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You know, Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult when remarks like that are made by a close personal friend. You see, the point is this: he knows less than his leader; therefore he is a more difficult man to convince.

Section 2 says this:

> This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1949, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1949.

Now I will give a worse exhibition for the benefit of my good friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South—north, east or west, and never the twain shall meet; but you know whom I am talking about—an act to be passed in respect to another act which was not an amendment to the latter except where it was annulled altogether. And so I come back to this—and it is something all hon. members must consider. I opened my remarks by saying how much I agreed with the Prime Minister's radio speech—that we did need to review our constitution. I agree with that heartily. But I disagree—I heartily and thoroughly disagree—that this House of Commons by a majority vote may vary that constitution.

That is exactly what we are doing here. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) quoted certain people; and he is anxious to get up again, but I see he is leaving that to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). He pointed out, in certain quotations, that the provinces were definitely concerned with the amendments at that time. And so I turn again to the right hon.—no, not the right hon.—the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who said he never knew of any reason why these short-cuts should not be adopted.

I do not care whether you use the word pact, compact, treaty or statute. One thing I will say to him is that it is an agreement, and he has never known an agreement to be varied except with the consent of the parties who signed it. That is the position I take, and the position upon which we stand.

We are told—and they will tell the people of Canada—that we have delayed getting Newfoundland into confederation—the wish, the dream if you like, of the fathers of confederation. We are told that the 31st day of March is the limit—the something or other day—when this must be done.

Now, this is an agreement between the Dominion of Canada and certain representatives from Newfoundland who signed. There is no reason in the world—and this is the very antithesis of what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said—why the signatories to the agreement cannot postpone that D-day, or whatever day you wish to call it. So all this nonsense about hurrying and so on as of March 31 falls exactly where it belongs. It is based on the effort of this government to do in an illegal way what they could do legally if they chose to take a little time and give it a little more consideration.

This point has been raised by the Minister of National Defence particularly. He said most eloquently what has been said by thousands of people before he had chewed his third to the last lead pencil while he was listening to my leader. He has one right there now. He had better try the other side because the teeth on this side are beginning to get worn out.

Mr. Claxton: I have to chew on something.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): He said: If we meet with the provinces, what majority or what number shall we require? May I agree with him most heartily. At the moment we do not know. I agree with him in drawing a distinction between the federation in the United States and ours, that there the residuary powers were left with the state while here they were left with the dominion government.

The minister quoted a Mr. McEvoy, K.C., who apparently has some clients. In that he may be different from the Minister of National Defence, who I am sure has not any. Still that was the position. What Mr. McEvoy said is quite true. That is not news to the various laymen in this body. That is the distinction in our constitution. But when the minister for Rosetown-Biggar quotes sections 91 and 92—

An hon. Member: Member.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Did I make a mistake? I called him minister but I assure you that is not wishful thinking with me. When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar took that position I agreed that he read those sections correctly, but that has no more to do with the problem we are dealing with now than the fact that you have a bit of gum on the heel of your left shoe, as far as I can see at the present time.

We come to this position. If you can by this short-cut method introduce a province into Canada, it is logical and true that by the same method you can throw a province out of confederation. Let the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) answer that one if he can.

Mr. Garson: If I never have to answer anything harder than that I shall have an easy time.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister has been very fortunate. He has been brought up politically with a spoon in his mouth and has never had anything to answer. However, I think that will give him a little trouble.

Mr. Sinnott: The Tories will help him.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): This interrupter has moved over half a dozen seats. Last year, I remember, when the press took a Gallup poll, if I can call it that, of who would be the new leader of the party, there was one vote in the hon. member's favour, and it was his vote. Perhaps he should move down to the front seat.

Mr. Sinnott: I had one more vote than the hon. member.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am bound to agree with the hon. member in that because I do not think I would get any votes on that side. But he did get one so we will just leave it at that.

The point I am trying to make is this: Today we are not dealing so much with the expedition of the entry of Newfoundland into confederation as we are with the greater and broader proposition whether our constitution is not the thing within which we live, whether our constitution is not the thing that protects minorities at all times. If that can be changed by a vote of this house, to quote the words of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, "Then indeed have we chaos".

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, at least I have an excuse for rising to my feet in the fact that an hon. member has requested or challenged me to do so. I refer to the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), who has just taken his seat.

We have had a great deal of excellent oratory during this debate. This amendment is certainly not something which could be anticipated by any prudent lawyer. I enter this debate with considerable diffidence because I took no part in the negotiations and had no contact with the legal problems in that way, but I must confess that when I heard the arguments put forward this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and then got the text of the amendment to the resolution which he moved I was amazed on two grounds.

First, I was amazed that such a thesis should ever be put forward in this chamber. Then I must confess in all honesty that I was amazed at the excellence and the ingenuity of the arguments that were put forward in support of the amendment. Perhaps I should not have been amazed because on a great number of occasions I have heard my hon. friend use one peg after another as something upon which to hang the hat of centralization. I have always found him exceedingly ingenious in supporting the positions he has taken. I do not suppose there is a man in the Dominion of Canada who is better at making the best of a bad case than the leader of the opposition. I suppose it is quite appropriate that he should be the leader of the Conservative party because he will no doubt get lots of practice.

We have heard a great deal of rhetoric upon this subject, excellent in its way but exceedingly irrelevant. Of all the speeches in support of the amendment, in spite of his facetiousness, I think the one made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was much the best. At least he got down to the real nub of the matter, which was more than was accomplished by the rhetoric uttered by the other speakers. Their speeches were interesting, eloquent, and excellent; they were everything but relevant.

What are we talking about here? We are talking about section 146 of the British North America Act. I must apologize if I indulge in the use of platitudes to try to prove the obvious, because throughout this debate there has been a complete disregard of the obvious, of the plain, of the clear, and of the sound. Section 146 says:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable privy council, on addresses from the houses of the parliament of Canada, and from the houses of the respective legislatures of the colonies or provinces of Newfoundland—

I shall not read the others.

> —to admit those colonies or provinces, or any of them, into the union, and on address from the houses of the parliament of Canada to admit Rupert's Land and the Northwestern Territory, or either of them, into the union,—

On what?

> —on such terms and conditions in each case as are in the addresses expressed and as the Queen thinks fit to approve, subject to the provisions of this act;

Then it goes on to say:

> And the provisions of any order in council in that behalf shall have effect as if they had been enacted by the parliament of the United Kingdom and Ireland.

In other words, what we have here, and it is so very obvious a thing that it should not be necessary to explain it to intelligent people, is a provision whereby in British North America, which gives its name to this statute, those areas outside of the four original provinces can be brought into confederation by no more complicated a device than an imperial order in council—not any statute. As a matter of fact, two of the provinces which existed before confederation, namely Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, were brought in after confederation merely by order in council.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Certainly.

Mr. Garson: Does this section say one single word about the consent of any of the provinces already in confederation being necessary to that end? Not a syllable.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Do you not know why?

An hon. Member: If you listen you will know.

Mr. Garson: I suggest, therefore, that it is in accord with both the letter and the spirit of our constitution, and more particularly with section 146, which I have just read, that Newfoundland and these other colonies or provinces should be admitted into confederation without the consent of the provinces already in confederation. The whole set-up contemplates that. As I have pointed out, the practice under this section has been uniformly in accordance with that conception throughout the years.

If Newfoundland had had an assembly, and that assembly had passed an address, and that address, together with the address of this parliament had gone forward to the United Kingdom, the United Kingdom would have brought Newfoundland into confederation by order in council without any question of consent by any of the provinces. Surely that is a sensible, reasonable, and prudent provision for the fathers of confederation to have put into the act; because, starting with the four provinces of Canada, if they ultimately desired, as they obviously did from section 146, to bring into union all of the territories which were then outside of confederation, surely no statesman in his right senses would have made the enlargement of our dominion conditional upon the veto of one province, or two provinces, or half a dozen provinces.

I suggest that my hon. friends, who have put forward this ridiculous amendment to the resolution, will search in vain in the confederation debates, or in the British North America Act itself, for any foundation for their oratory or for their amendment.

What is the difficulty with which the negotiators were confronted in this particular case? It is notorious what it was. The dominion of Newfoundland, as a result of circumstances entirely beyond its control, and certainly beyond Canada's control, had got into financial difficulty, and its legislative government was superseded by another perfectly legitimate and legal government, properly established in accordance with the law. By way of replying to the question of the last speaker, may I say that I do not profess to be an expert on this matter because the whole thing came freshly to my attention with the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). No one will dispute, however, that in Newfoundland at the present time there is a legally constituted government with proper legal authority. But it is not a legislative body and therefore cannot produce the address that is necessary under section 146.

That posed a practical problem for the responsible negotiators of Canada, of Newfoundland, and of the United Kingdom. The law officers of those three governments, to whom we must give some small credit for knowing a little about the relevant law, and who have had perhaps somewhat greater opportunity of digging into it than even the hon. leader of the opposition, or the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) or the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith)—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): And you.

Mr. Garson: Definitely, myself most of all, because you had two or three days headstart on me. Those law officers must be given credit for some knowledge of the law, and credit for some common sense about the proper and legitimate way of achieving their objectives within the spirit of the British North America Act, almost exactly within its text, and certainly within the limits of proper democratic procedure. I apologize for going into all these matters. They are all obvious. They are notorious, and we all know about them. But if my hon. friends will fight the obvious and the notorious, then one must necessarily discuss the obvious and the notorious.

In the absence of a legislative assembly in Newfoundland that could pass an address which would have put this matter through without any question at all, they were thrown back upon what I would suggest to this assembly is a much more democratic procedure than even an address of a legislature. They went back to the fountainhead of all authority under any democratic government, the people themselves. They submitted two plebiscites, the second of which presented to the voters of that dominion a choice between responsible government on the one hand and union with Canada on the other. May I point out that it was only by voting for responsible government that Newfoundland could put itself in the position in which it would have a legislature to pass an address to meet the objections taken by my hon. friends on the other side. That is precisely what the people of Newfoundland voted against. On the merits—going back to the fountainhead of democratic authority, the people themselves—they deliberately chose union with Canada as against that responsible government which alone would enable this matter to be resolved in the perfectly perfectionist and constitutional manner that the legal experts opposite us would recommend. The people voted in favour of union, and I suggest that it is only by a very technical attitude that it can be argued that we have here any departure in substance from either the letter or the spirit of the constitution.

The constitution does not require assent from any province. It is true the constitution requires an address. I am informed that at a very early stage of the proceedings the government of Canada made it clear that it would be glad to receive an overture from Newfoundland to come into union, but it would have no part whatever in any of the arrangements whereby Newfoundland placed itself in a position to make that overture. Therefore all of the proceedings which my hon. friends are criticizing are proceedings which were conducted under the auspices of the Newfoundland government and the government of the United Kingdom. To put themselves in a position to make an overture to Canada, these two governments supplied what, under the circumstances, was the best substitute for an address that could be obtained. The resolution introducing this bill, as drafted by the legal experts of the United Kingdom, Newfoundland, and Canada, is the result. My hon. and learned friend, the hon. member for Calgary West, referred to a certain portion of the resolution reading as follows:

> The agreement containing terms of union between Canada and Newfoundland set out in the schedule to this act is hereby confirmed and shall have the force of law notwithstanding anything in the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946.

Then he says that, because of those words beginning "notwithstanding", he must as a lawyer hold that this must be an amendment to the British North America Act, because any time you use those terms in an act, unless it is merely for the extension of the act, it must be an amendment. Well, I think my hon. friend has a rather short memory, or perhaps he has not had much municipal experience. Anyone who has had experience of that sort can point to countless cases where municipalities come along with, say, a money bylaw. The circumstances are such that they cannot follow the procedure outlined in the municipal act, or there may have been some carelessness and they did not obey it. When they have committed this faux pas or omission, or if they find it impossible to comply with the procedural provisions of the municipal act, the usual thing is that the municipal bylaw which otherwise would be defective is ratified. It is ratified generally in the first place by order in council confirmed later by a provincial statute; and in many cases that provincial statute is said to be an amendment to the municipal act. The statute books are full of them; but it is an amendment only in the sense of curing some procedural difficulty in that specific ad hoc case.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): But this is the British North America Act.

Mr. Garson: It does not make any difference; the principle is exactly the same, and the analogy is very close. There is no use in my hon. friend shaking his head; I took the opportunity during the dinner hour to check this up with people who know better than he does or I do—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Maybe.

Mr. Garson: —and they confirm my view. If my hon. friend stops to reflect, I think he will come to the conclusion that all the law officers who had anything to do with this matter would be in that group.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Who are they?

Mr. Garson: The law officers of the United Kingdom, Canada and Newfoundland.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You met the law officers of the United Kingdom at the dinner recess?

Mr. Garson: Oh, no; I did not say that. Now, sir, it is only in this narrow, technical, police court sense that this can be said to be an amendment of the Canadian constitution.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I admit that, and you don't.

Mr. Garson: In that sense it is true that you must state in the act that this is confirmed notwithstanding the British North America Act. What does that mean? It means notwithstanding the fact that Newfoundland, not having a legislative body, was not in a position to present an address, this is confirmed. Newfoundland did—I will not say the next best thing, but I think a better thing. It went back to the people themselves and then, with the result of the plebiscite in place of the address, it went to the three governments concerned. Under those circumstances, of course, seeing that there was a procedural deviation from the terms of the act, it was necessary to say that this shall be so notwithstanding the British North America Act. But, sir, in no substantial or honest sense whatever can it be said that this is an amendment of the Canadian constitution. The obvious test of that is to ask whether there is anything in this section which is of general application to all the provinces of Canada, and the answer must be no. So when the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) said he wanted to know whether this was an amendment of the constitution and I said the answer was no, this is my proof for the answer I gave.

It would be very interesting to speculate as to what would be the result of this perfectionism that is urged upon this house by hon. members opposite. The only way you could comply with the constitution to the last jot and tittle would be by washing out all the proceedings to date, giving back to Newfoundland responsible government, the very thing against which the people voted in the plebiscite, to the end that then they would have a legislature which could adopt an address that would comply with the section upon which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) hangs his centralization argument. What an argument!

If you did not do that you might adopt the other course that some other speaker recommended; that is, that in the present state of affairs we should obtain the assent of the provinces, which section 146 does not require at all. If you did that would you require a majority of the provinces, and what would be the nature of that majority? The leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) said he thought it might be a two-thirds majority. Suppose you had, as we did in the dominion-provincial agreements, seven provinces on one side and the two most populous on the other. Would you say that was a majority? Or would it have to be all the provinces but one? Or all but two? Or what would it be? In the meantime this agreement, which believe me has been achieved after long months of negotiation and not without some difficulty, would be placed in jeopardy. Under those circumstances I think it is not too much to say that, while hon. gentlemen opposite make a great profession about being in favour of this union with Newfoundland, if they had held the opposite view and were strongly opposed to that union they could not have adopted a more ingenious technicality or a better way of frustrating the union and stultifying the attempts to achieve it than that which they have now adopted.

For that reason, sir, and in order to enlighten the hon. member for Calgary West, who was so anxious to have me break my silence, I can say that I propose to vote against the amendment and for the motion.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there was one remark made by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) with which I am in agreement. I hope I state his point correctly; for, as I understood the hon. member, he feels that the main reason we have the kind of problem with which we are wrestling in this House of Commons today is the lack of any provision in the British North America Act for its own amendment. I agree with him. As has already been suggested by my leader, the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), this brings into bold relief the need for finding a formula for the amendment of the Canadian constitution within our own land.

I confess, however, that there are two things about the debate today that bother me. First of all, it seems strange to me that we should have all these technical and legalistic arguments about this method of securing an amendment to the constitution, when the subject before us is one concerning which there was some mention in the original British North America Act, as pointed out by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). To that extent, namely, in view of what is in section 146, our general contention that there is no provision for amending the British North America Act has to be qualified. There is in fact a provision for amending our basic constitution in the matter of bringing new parts of British North America into confederation.

I am not going to rehearse the demonstration of the obvious which the Minister of Justice has just given to us. But it does seem strange to me that, in relation to this subject about which there is some mention in the British North America Act, we should have all these technical and legalistic arguments.

The other thing that has bothered me in this debate, Mr. Speaker, was brought home during the speech, both before and after the dinner recess, by my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). In common with other members of this house, I always listen with a great deal of interest to the speeches the hon. member makes. I enjoy the way in which he builds up his case, and the use he makes of the material upon which he draws. No man in this house studies more or shows more background in the speeches that he makes. But this evening, he did something—possibly he was unconscious of what he was doing—which amazed me. The member told this house of the position taken by his party in 1946. He stated that position correctly. He referred to the amendment that was moved in that session by himself, and he was correct in saying that that amendment was identical in form with the amendment that is now before the house. What was the issue before us at that time? The question was a request for an amendment to the British North America Act to provide for redistribution. The hon. member and his party took the view in 1946 that we should not ask for or be able to obtain an amendment of that character by a simple majority vote in this House of Commons. When the hon. member finished, I asked if he would permit me to ask a question. Perhaps I was a little too late, since it took some time for the applause for his speech to die down. At any rate, he did not answer my question. I asked him what position his party took back in 1943, but the hon. member made no reply.

May I tell the story. I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to July 5, 1943. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) during the course of his remarks this evening took up a copy of Hansard for July 5, 1943, and quoted a certain passage from a speech delivered by my leader, so I take it he must know the position taken by his party as recorded in that issue of Hansard. He must have known the way in which he voted, and that the question before the house was an amendment to the British North America Act. What for? To postpone redistribution. If the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) will permit me to agree with him on this point rather than with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), I would say it was an amendment to the British North America Act. At the end of that address, there was the usual phrase that all the acts down to and including this one may be described as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1943. In other words, it was an amendment to the British North America Act, and it was achieved by a simple majority vote of this house.

My hon. friends to the right supported the move on that occasion. The member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), who was then leader of the official opposition, spoke on the question, but during the whole course of his speech did not raise the question of reference to the provinces. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) did not speak at all. Only one member of the Progressive Conservative party raised the question at all, and that was the member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Hazen), but he and the member for Lake Centre, the member for Peel and the whole of the Progressive Conservative group who were in the house at that time voted for the amendment. In other words, in 1943, they gave their approval to the principle of securing an amendment to the British North America Act by the simple process of a majority vote in this House of Commons.

I may say to my hon. friend the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who was also protesting a short time ago the consistency of the stand his group had taken, that his group took the same stand. They voted with the hon. members to my right and the majority of those opposite to support this amendment in 1943. There were few members in the house at that time who voted against that amendment. I believe there were nine, all of whom came from the province of Quebec.

When one reads the debates on these two occasions, 1943 and 1946, one cannot but notice the interest members had in the end result of the amendment that was being sought. In 1943, the amendment was to postpone redistribution, and it seemed to be to the advantage of Ontario and all provinces west. In 1946, the amendment seemed to be to the disadvantage of Ontario and the provinces west.

An hon. Member: The war was over.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, my hon. friends are saying it was an emergency, but I do not find the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) joining in that excuse. He was not in the house, but he could tell his fellow members about emergencies.

Mr. Hackett: He was resting at that time.

Mr. Knowles: He can tell his fellow members what he thinks of the use of that word "emergency". All of us who were here on both of those occasions know the reason in the main for the parties taking the stand that they did. The interest was in the end result to be achieved.

Mr. Graydon: The interest was in the war, and you know it.

Mr. Knowles: My genial and hon. friend (Mr. Graydon) knows very well—

Mr. Graydon: And so do you.

Mr. Knowles: —that, had redistribution been put through before 1945, the result would have been a decrease in the number of seats in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Hackett: For the C.C.F.

Mr. Knowles: No, in the total number of seats allotted to the province; so he and his party were quite prepared to agree to a postponement of redistribution, even though it involved an amendment to the constitution by means of a simple majority vote in this house.

I want to say a further word, Mr. Speaker, about the remarks made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). During the course of his speech, if I heard him correctly, he said that his party has taken this position right from confederation down to the present day. He quoted back only as far as 1946, however. But some of us can remember back to 1943, when the opposite stand was taken.

May I say a further word about my hon. friends to my left—the Social Credit group—who are telling us that they do not like us to characterize their attitude as the balkanization of Canada. They say that down through the years they have been consistent in their attitude on this question. But the facts are that in 1943 the Social Credit party voted with the rest of us for an amendment to the British North America Act by the simple means of a majority vote in this House of Commons. Come 1946, and this house had before it, on the same kind of motion, the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre. At that time my hon. friends in the Social Credit party voted for that amendment, which asked that redistribution be postponed until the government had had satisfactory consultations with the provinces. Then, lo and behold, after that amendment had been defeated, after they had demanded consultation with the provinces, they turned around and split with their Tory friends and voted for the motion, which helped to achieve an amendment to the British North America Act by the simple process of a majority vote in this House of Commons.

I have already referred to the fact that there are some Liberals who are equally inconsistent; because there were a number of them in 1943 who, when redistribution was being postponed, did not like it. A number of them, including my good friend the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), voted against it. In 1946 the Liberals turned around the other way, and all of them were quite prepared to vote for redistribution by the simple process of a majority vote in the House of Commons.

I suppose I should complete the record and say what our own party did on those occasions, although I am sure that if I set out to do so someone will interject and say that I am trying to hand bouquets to ourselves. But the fact is that we voted the same way both times, and intend to do so again this time. We voted for the amendment in 1943 even though it might have been said at that time that it was to our political advantage. We took the same stand and voted for the same principle in 1946, even though at that time it might have been regarded as being to our political disadvantage.

The points that I am trying to make in all of this, Mr. Speaker, are two in number. On the one hand, it seems to me that we should try to achieve some consistency in the stands we take in this house. I have collected a few old volumes of Hansard since the hon. member for Lake Centre spoke before the dinner recess, and there was one other I should like to have found if I had had the time. It is an ancient volume in which a former leader of the Progressive Conservative party—

Mr. Cruickshank: Which one?

Mr. Knowles: —the late Lord Bennett, made a statement with regard to parties and members who say one thing at one time and something else at another. It is a classic from the lips of the late Lord Bennett, to the effect that the people of this country expect something better of their public men than that, that they expect all of us to be consistent in the stands that we take.

The other point I wish to emphasize is the one with which I started out, and on which I find myself agreeing with the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). This whole business brings into bold relief the necessity for proceeding with the proposal made by the Prime Minister in his radio address not long ago: the necessity of finding a formula by means of which we make clear just how our constitution can be amended with due regard for such rights as must be protected. In the meantime, with this question before us, in view of the fact that the procedures followed have been those laid down, and in view of what seems to me to be the excellent case just made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), it seems to me that this house will be carrying out the constitutional provisions of 1867 by defeating the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition and passing the main motion.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the house on the good temper which has been exhibited in this debate. Since I have been a member of the house I have seen the British North America Act rigged out in a coat of many colours. The last two speakers especially seem to show that they have a single view and a single heart at the present time. I refer to the Minister of Justice and the whip of the C.C.F. While the Minister of Justice wishes to abolish appeals to the privy council, which is the key to the British North America Act, a predecessor of his in office, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, who was Chief Justice of Canada, counsel for Louis Riel in Regina many years ago, and a leading member of the bar, opposed the abolition of appeals to the privy council. So did Sir Allen Aylesworth, a brilliant lawyer and former Minister of Justice.

How did the Minister of Justice ever win Marquette? He owes it to the Conservatives. I am surprised that today we have in Manitoba and British Columbia a union government. I remember the decisions of the privy council. Let me say to the Minister of Justice that he owes his election, as the hon. member for Marquette, to the Conservatives who supported him.

Mr. Knowles: The truth will out.

Mr. Church: Today he agrees with the C.C.F. We have two individuals with a single view and a single heart on this question of the abolition of appeals to the privy council.

There was another leading Minister of Justice, Sir Allen Aylesworth, who gave a strong opinion. I have a great deal of respect for the present Minister of Justice. We have heard a great deal about him. I believe he will measure up to the hopes expressed by his supporters. But Sir Allen Aylesworth made a strong speech against the abolition of appeals to the privy council.

What put the Laurier government into office in 1896? It was the decision of the privy council. Thomas Greenway won a great victory in Manitoba on the Manitoba school question on a decision of the privy council. From 1908, on, that constituency went Conservative six or seven times.

I support the policy of my leader in connection with this bill. When the matter was referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre in a speech on June 6, 1946, he quoted, from a debate of February 18, 1925, the opinion of Mr. Lapointe who was then Minister of Justice. It was on a motion of mine for constitutional and parliamentary reform that he made that speech. The former Minister of Justice, who was well liked in this house for his many fine qualities, said in his speech that he believed that any decisions about the British North America Act must be settled in the light of the present situation—by the men of today, said Mr. Maclean, of York South.

I have contended that we wanted the British North America Act for the living and not for the dead, and Mr. Lapointe agreed. On February 18, 1925, he said that it could be amended only at the will and at the request of the dominion parliament; but those who are just as much interested in this matter as the dominion parliament must have their say, must be consulted—meaning the provinces. It will be seen, therefore, that the authorities still differ.

I support the policy of my leader. He wants to consult the provinces, get their opinion on it at once, and then address His Majesty accordingly.

Another matter comes up, as to whether you are going to propose to change section 51, of the British North America Act, which deals with representation, giving Quebec sixty-five members, and section 21, which deals with the Senate, and sets out the respective divisions for Ontario, Quebec, and so on.

I remember away back in 1935, when the late Lord Bennett was leader of the Conservative party, the same debate went on as had been heard in 1925. Mr. Bennett, as he was then, as Prime Minister of that day, proceeded to set up a committee. I was asked to serve on it, but I did not like to do so. This was a special committee of the House of Commons which considered the whole British North America Act. That committee had before it the various heads of departments, including the late Dr. Skelton, and the then deputy minister of justice. There also appeared Professor Kennedy and Professor Scott. It was established before that committee that the first seven appeals to the privy council to amend the British North America Act were made without the consent of the provinces. Those appeals were of a great variety.

Could sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act be changed by a majority vote if privy council appeals were abolished? Could section 133, which deals with the French language be changed in like manner? My contention has been in conformity with the view held by an earlier Minister of Justice, who contended that representation of the various provinces in the House of Commons was not a matter exclusively within federal authority.

During the debates in the house for many years past, when discussion was heard respecting appeals to the privy council, I have taken the view that as the British North America Act was a statute, and as it was the written constitution for Canada, it could not after 1931 be altered without the consent of the provinces. I held that minorities had rights under the British North America Act, the same as majorities; and I held further that, under the British North America Act, 1867, the rights of minorities were guaranteed. The provinces were to be consulted regarding those rights.

I also referred to the acquisition by the United States of the territories of Alaska and Louisiana, the latter by means of agreement and treaty with France, which vested in the United States of America the guaranty of language and religion. Then Huey Long came along as governor of that state and, while he supported the Washington administration, wanted to change the whole thing. He did so and got away with it.

If ever Canada got the right completely to amend its own constitution, then we might as well say that the British North America Act would be an act of the majority of the people, and that this parliament, at will, could change section 133 and every other section accordingly. That is a fact; and it is the view I have taken on this matter on other occasions.

May I at this point examine two other features of this proposal, the first of which has to do with the Statute of Westminster, and the legal status of Canada under that statute. Let me refer to the basis of this whole study. In this, the second part of my address, may I make reference to the status we have acquired. If we are to understand how the Statute of Westminster affects Canada, we must first look at certain facts in connection with that statute. Let us first look at what it is. It is a rule of strict law. The British North America Act is also a rule of strict law. But Great Britain has had no strict law as her constitution; she has had an unwritten constitution—a constitution made up of usages, precedents, customs and maxims.

But in the Statute of Westminster we have a fixed statute which must be construed strictly, as Professor Wheare, of Christ Church, Oxford, says in his splendid text book which is often quoted in the British courts and in the British parliament. In 1933 Newfoundland surrendered her status as a dominion. The second part of the consideration of this matter refers to the realm of law. These are non-legal rules. They are not illegal; but the British empire was founded on them.

These unwritten rules, practices, maxims, customs, usages and conventions are described in a leading text book by Dr. Dicey. In it he points out that Great Britain has and always has had an unwritten constitution, and he states that she has depended for her constitution upon these maxims, customs and usages to which I have referred.

Now what is the difference between the first of these, namely, a fixed written statute like the British North America Act, which is construed strictly by the courts, and this second form of constitution, the rights, customs, maxims and usages of the mother country?

The Statute of Westminster is a constitution; it is strict law. It is construed strictly by the courts. Dominion status cannot be decided by the rules of strict law. The most important rules are to be found in the constitutional conventions agreed to at imperial conferences. These rules were declared at the imperial conferences of 1921, 1926 and 1930. And up to the Statute of Westminster, 1931, this organization of constitutional conventions in law has long been felt in the history and development of the British empire, both in their government of these communities and in their relations with each other. This is backed up by executive and legislative powers.

It was asserted that Great Britain and the British empire has an unwritten constitution. Some members in the parliaments in the United Kingdom and the dominions objected to the proposals to pass this statute, not because of the terms of the statute, but because of the fact that it was a fixed written statute.

Lord Buckmaster, at one time lord chancellor, stated, in the debate on second reading of the bill in the House of Lords, that he felt the bill had been a mistake. I said at the time that I looked upon it as one of the most mischievous statutes with which he ever had to deal—a statute which to a very large extent caused the second world war. And as I pointed out, it had led to separatism, isolationism and all that kind of thing.

I agree with what Lord Buckmaster said, when he pointed out that it was the first time an attempt had been made to put into the form of an act of parliament rules which bound the various parts of the empire, and pointed out that in his opinion it was a great mistake.

Newfoundland

Lord Buckmaster stated further that the men who had made that country—and he was referring to Great Britain—had brought it to its present state by an unwritten constitution. He said that Great Britain had never had a written constitution of any kind, and that the consequence was not much, despite the serious mistakes which had been made. He pointed out that, so far as possible, they should avoid putting their constitution into the unyielding form of an act of parliament, such as the Statute of Westminster.

Then the Hon. W. L. M. Hughes, formerly prime minister of Australia, gave his views, as they were expressed at the imperial conference of 1921. He said it was unnecessary to lay down in black and white a constitution for the British empire, and pointed out that the United Kingdom has a constitutional structure based upon maxims of one kind or another. There are certain countries that have written constitutions, such as France, the United States, the U.S.S.R., Sweden and Switzerland. Some of the dominions have adopted the Statute of Westminster but for certain reasons New Zealand and Australia did not adopt sections 7 to 13 until recently and Canada also varied them.

I should like to quote an authority on the Statute of Westminster, Professor K. C. Wheare, who is quoted quite often in the House of Commons. In a chapter dealing with the statute and the legal status of Canada he says:

> Thus dominion status, after the passing of the Statute of Westminster, as before, though its predominant characteristic is conventional equality of status, contains legal ingredients which are different and are unequal from one dominion to another. Apart from this common ingredient of conventional equality, the recipe differs in each case to a greater or less degree.

And again:

> The fundamental fact in the case of the Dominion of Canada was that it was a federation. The powers and functions of the federal and provincial parliaments and governments were demarcated and their existing distribution was guaranteed by an act of the United Kingdom parliament, the British North America Act, 1867. This act was unalterable in essentials by the federal or provincial legislatures in Canada; it was completely alterable by the United Kingdom parliament only. From 1867 to 1930 inclusive, it had been amended seven times by that parliament. No clear rules regulated the procedure by which amendments of the British North America Act, desired by the provincial or federal parliaments in Canada, should be transmitted to and executed by the United Kingdom parliament.

There was one amendment in 1871, one in 1875 and then there were amendments in 1886, 1907, 1915, 1916 and 1930. A committee was appointed in 1935 by my former leader to consider the British North America Act in the light of the changes that had been made.

Many learned men gave evidence before that committee. I quote again:

> But there was not only the question whether amendments should require the request and consent of the dominion parliament as well as of the dominion government. There was the further and more important question whether amendments should require the request and consent of all or of a majority of the provincial parliaments and/or governments. The usage here was that in six out of the seven amendments, action was taken by the United Kingdom parliament as a result of requests from the dominion government or parliament without consulting or seeking the consent of the provinces generally. The amendments of 1871, 1886, and 1915 affected either all or some of the provinces and none of them was consulted. The amendment of 1930 affected certain provinces and these alone were consulted and their consent obtained. The dominion government and parliament evidently did not consider themselves bound by a convention to consult all the provinces or to obtain their consent.

In 1907 they did not consult British Columbia. As I say, various professors gave evidence before Mr. Bennett's committee and they found that some very drastic changes had been made in the whole procedure from that date. I continue:

> These possible consequences were taken into consideration by the O.D.L. conference of 1929. It was realized that the question of alternative methods of amending the British North America Act was a matter for future consideration by the appropriate Canadian authorities, and that, pending some agreed change in the process, the existing system should remain unaltered by the Statute of Westminster. It was thought necessary also to make an express declaration that the passing of the statute in no way increased the area of the powers possessed by the dominion parliament in such a way as to authorize the parliament "to make laws on any matter present within the authority of the provinces, not being a matter within the authority of the dominion."

The leader of the government at that time, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, was able to secure at the imperial conference in 1931 the inclusion of the following two sections in the statute:

> (1) Nothing in this act shall be deemed to confer any power to repeal or alter the constitution acts of the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, and the Dominion of New Zealand, otherwise than in accordance with the law and constitutional usage and practice heretofore existing.
> (2) Nothing in this act shall be deemed to authorize the parliaments of the Dominion of Canada and the Commonwealth of Australia to make laws on any matter at present within the authority of the provinces of Canada or the states of Australia, as the case may be, not being a matter within the authority of the parliaments or governments of the Dominion of Canada and of the Commonwealth of Australia respectively.

I quote again:

> The report of the O.D.L. conference was unanimously approved by the Canadian House of Commons in May, 1930, after some criticism by members of the Conservative party, then in opposition. At the general election of July, 1930, the Conservative party, under the leadership of Mr. R. B. Bennett, was returned to power. Before Mr. Bennett left for the imperial conference of 1930 he received from the premier of Ontario, Mr. Howard Ferguson, also a Conservative, a memorandum in which the terms of the proposed statute were severely examined. In particular the two clauses quoted above were criticized as vague and inconclusive, and it was asserted "that no restatement of the procedure for amending the constitution of Canada can be accepted by the province of Ontario that does not fully and frankly acknowledge the right of all the provinces to be consulted and to become parties to the decision arrived."

After that Mr. Bennett called a conference here in Ottawa in 1931 between the federal and provincial governments, and I quote again:

It appears that the provincial governments had two main demands to make. First of all they wished to have the wording of the section proposed by the conference of 1929 revised so as to make quite certain that the passing of the statute would not alter the method by which the British North America Act was amended. In the second place they wished to have the fetter imposed by the Colonial Laws Validity Act upon provincial legislation removed. In other words they wished the provisions which came to be enacted as section 2 of the statute to apply to the provincial legislatures as well as to the dominion legislature.

This 1931 conference of federal and provincial governments was not like the last conference we had which sought to implement the Sirois report and put all the debt on the two central provinces. It was not that kind of haphazard policy. They are talking now about another amendment to unload the railway debt on the two central provinces by another inquiry. This was a very wise proviso, and one which is badly needed at the present time. My late leader, Lord Bennett, had the correct idea. I continue:

Agreement upon these two questions was unanimously obtained at the conference and appropriate clauses were drawn up. These were adopted by the Senate and the House of Commons in June, 1931, and as a result of them an address from both these houses was included, in the identical form in which they were proposed, in section 7 of the statutes. The extension to the provincial legislatures of Canada of the powers granted to the legislatures of the dominion by section 2 of the statute was carried out in subsection 2 of section 7. The subsection enacted: "The provisions of section 2 of this act shall extend to laws made by any of the provinces of Canada and to the powers of the legislatures of such provinces." This is the most startling innovation inserted in the terms of the statute between the drawing up of the schedule by the imperial conference of 1930 and the enactment of the statute in 1931. The proposal had not been discussed at the conferences of 1926, 1929 and 1930. The provinces had not been represented at these conferences, any more than had the states of Australia. But it is probably not true to say that the extension of the terms of section 2 to the Canadian provinces at the last minute, so to speak, was unauthorized by the conference of 1930.

These are acts and they cannot be changed. They passed the House of Commons and they passed the Senate. Amendments were made by my late leader, and those amendments passed both houses of parliament. Let me point out to the people of the province of Quebec that, as I believe, minorities have the same rights under the British North America Act that majorities have. I believe that it would be a mistake to abolish appeals to the privy council. Under section 133 of the British North America Act the people of the province of Quebec need have no fear as long as the privy council is there. Their rights are protected. I am very much surprised at the views which have been expressed by various ministers. Since I have entered this house I have had many fine friends among members from the province of Quebec. I admire and respect them, and I can tell them that if it were not for section 133 of the British North America Act the situation might be quite different. I can refer them to what happened in Louisiana.

Let me warn the house now, as I warned it before when this matter was up in 1925 in connection with a motion which I offered, and on which Mr. Lapointe spoke about parliamentary reform. At that time I was urging a British North America Act for the living and not for the dead. Again in 1935 a committee of the House of Commons was appointed to study the whole British North America Act, and they validated everything that I had said. I can tell the people of the province of Quebec that they will have to be careful not to lose, by abolishing the great legal protection the privy council gives them, their rights under section 133 of the British North America Act. We do not know what kind of people will be in parliament in the future. We cannot tell what is going to happen in 1950 or 1955 to the Dominion of Canada. We have had two wars, and there are threats of another world war at the present time. We cannot predict what is going to happen in the Canada of the future. If we have the British North America Act it will mean a great deal, particularly the various sections I have named. We should not allow it to be made a scrap of paper only. What kind of government are we going to have in Canada? We do not know. There has been talk about abolishing the Senate, and all that kind of thing. There was a suggestion by the C.C.F. that the Senate be located in Hull, but I can tell you that it will be a sorry day for the people of this country if in Ottawa we have only one house of parliament with a majority vote to handle the business of the nation and, at the will of any majority, turn the British North America Act into a mere scrap of paper. It will interfere with the rights of minorities, and I believe that minorities have rights just as well as majorities. It will be a sorry day for this country if anything like that ever happens.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, to clarify my own position I desire to say a word or two on the amendment. Before doing so, however, I should like to refer to the remarks that were made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he attempted to show that this group was somewhat inconsistent in our vote upon the measure for redistribution some years ago, and our vote upon the amendment that was moved thereto. Perhaps my hon. friend thought he had a rather sound argument. I will not deny that he had some shred of legal argument on the point, but I think if we analyse the situation as it existed then in respect to redistribution we will find that what we in this group were actually doing then was to protect the interests of the provinces.

The measure requiring certain amendments to the constitution in order that redistribution might be deferred was introduced because there had been a shift in the population, and that shift in population left some of the provinces of Canada at a disadvantage. We voted for an amendment that was worded exactly as this one is worded because we desired that the matter should be referred to the provinces for consultation. The amendment was moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). We voted that way because we thought the provinces should be consulted in the matter.

When the main motion was put, realizing that it would protect the provinces because of the shift in population, we voted for it. We see no inconsistency there whatsoever. If the main motion had been in any way detrimental to the provinces we certainly would not have voted for it. May I also suggest that the redistribution measure was not something that was as important as this matter, for the reason that there was not really a principle involved in it. It was a matter of seats in the House of Commons here; and if we had carried out redistribution at the time it would not have been fair to the provinces by reason of the fact that their citizens were living temporarily in other parts of the country.

I favour the amendment, Mr. Speaker; and in doing so I do not look upon it as constituting a motion of non-confidence in the government. I say that because the bill ratifying the agreement and admitting Newfoundland into Canada as the tenth province has been passed, and all parties in the house evidently were in favour of it. If we had been against the measure and had voted that it be referred to the provinces before ratifying the agreement, then such an amendment would have been a motion of non-confidence; but we voted for the admission of Newfoundland as the tenth province and now we are saying that, since we have ratified the agreement and have given our support to the action of the government, we would like to see it referred to the provinces for consultation. To my mind, all the amendment does is to show a desire on the part of this parliament to give the provinces an opportunity of expressing themselves in respect to a people who are to become partners with them in constituting a larger Canada. It seems to me that is a reasonable attitude to take. I think we may presume the provinces are quite willing to welcome this new partner; and if that presumption is correct would it not be pleasing to the people of Newfoundland to know that the nine provinces of Canada were in accord in welcoming them into confederation? I think that would be a good thing to do. If there are any misgivings that any of the provinces are not favourable to welcoming this tenth province, then perhaps the sooner we know it the better, because it may only create complications after we are finished with the matter.

I listened with some interest to the speech this evening by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). He rather ridiculed any thought that there might be a principle of centralization opposing this amendment. I do not agree with him there. In this present day there is a constant urge the world over for the bringing in of this principle of centralization. I do not believe this is done by any casual series of happenings; there is no question in my mind but that it is done by design. There are two world philosophies. One is that of effective democracy, which leads to the freedom of the people. The other world philosophy is one of authoritarianism, which leads to world dictatorship. That is all there is to it, to my mind; that is the only great issue in the world today, notwithstanding all the various groups affiliated with political organizations. And there is a continual urge the world over to apply this principle of centralization.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with a principle in this amendment; and principles do not change. Principles are either right or wrong; and the principle of centralization is the principle of authoritarianism which in the final analysis leads to world dictatorship and world stateism. That principle is right or wrong. Some people may believe it to be right, but that is the issue, right or wrong; and the defeat of this amendment would give the provinces or sections of our people reason to accuse us here of using authoritarian methods, at least in this piece of legislation.

The amendment has been proposed by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew), who leads the Conservative party in this country. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has mentioned already that it is not a matter of voting with the Conservatives or with some other party. That might be what is in the minds of hard and fast machine politicians, but the issue is whether we are to vote for something that is right or something that is wrong. If our Conservative friends propose something we believe is right, we will vote for it. If on the other hand they propose something that is wrong, then we will most vehemently oppose it and vote against it. I know that in the past when we have voted for that which we have believed to be right and our Conservative friends have been like-minded, it has left the impression throughout the country, and certain sections of the press have tried to make it appear, that in their philosophy and beliefs the Social Crediters in reality are Conservatives politically. Well, Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. As far as political parties are concerned, we desire to travel a road which is consistent with the fundamental beliefs embodied in our social credit position.

May I say this, that our C.C.F. friends, my socialist friends, sit next to me—and by reason of that I have to try to love them as best I can. They are very fine gentlemen. I do not know whether they believe all they say they believe, but they are very fine gentlemen anyway. I agree with my hon. friend the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) that, whenever there is a measure before the house, the theme of which is the centralization of power, we can depend upon the C.C.F. to support it. I am not saying that in criticism of them. In fact, I think it is a commendation because, on this measure, they will run true to form and support it.

If there is any reflection upon any party, it is a reflection on the party that now holds office in this country. It will be a reflection for this reason, that they will go throughout the country and, by word of mouth, preach decentralization, the recommendation of provincial autonomy, democracy, free enterprise, freedom and all the rest of it. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, they will go throughout the country in a few months' time preaching those things; yet by legislative action they deny what they say with their lips. During the war years we felt there might be some excuse for that, but that excuse no longer holds good. Let us remain an absolutely free people. Let us do all we can to protect the autonomy of the various provinces of this country. In referring this matter to the provinces, we are referring it to them so they can be satisfied we are not stepping over their heads and railroading something through which they themselves do not want.

I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the wording of this amendment. The wording of this amendment does not ask that the provinces agree. It does not mention anything about a right or a wrong constitutional interpretation. As I read this amendment, it simply says to the government that we, as a parliament, are asking them to consult the provinces. After they have received the views of the provinces, then we will move an address to His Majesty.

May I read the main portions of the amendment?

> And whereas it is desirable that the government of Canada should consult with the governments of the several provinces in respect to the said matter—

Now, is that desirable? I do not see anything undesirable about it.

> —now therefore be it resolved, that the government of Canada be required to consult at once the governments of the several provinces and that upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultations, a humble address be presented to His Majesty—

And so forth.

I claim that that would be the proper thing to do so that no accusation could be leveled either at the government or at parliament that we are going beyond our authority or that we are refusing to consult the provinces. Surely the provinces should be entitled to express their views when another partner is to be admitted into this great Canadian corporation.

There is one other matter, Mr. Speaker, which I should like to mention. This afternoon the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), who has been one of the main speakers for the government in this debate, made a statement at which I was very much surprised. He expressed considerable alarm at this amendment having been made. I think the words he used, and I will stand correction while awaiting their appearance in Hansard, were that this was a sort of surprise move. I am sure the minister could not possibly have meant that, Mr. Speaker. The minister is an intelligent man. I have always regarded him as such. He is a very able man and a clever lawyer. Surely, he could anticipate any move that might be made in the course of one short debate. Surely, he could diagnose or, to use a favourite word of mine, prognose the situation. One would think he could anticipate any future move that might be made. He is a responsible minister of the crown, a very responsible minister, for under his direction is the national defence of this country. In the world in which we are now living, that is an extremely important department. Surely, he is not going to say that, in his department, he does not anticipate what is going to happen in the future. One would expect he would look ahead. Surely, he must have been farsighted enough to realize the possibility of an amendment such as this being brought in at this time, whereby the matter could be referred to the provinces.

If the amendment had been made before the bill was passed, as I said before, it would have constituted a non-confidence vote. At that time, we could have been accused of holding up the measure. But we did not hold it up, we co-operated in seeing that the measure was passed. Now that it has passed, all we ask is that the sovereign rights of the provinces be preserved and that they be consulted in this matter. The amendment is a reasonable one. Its passage will be a magnanimous gesture towards the provinces and will surely satisfy the people of Newfoundland that they can be welcomed into Canada with unanimity. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I am voting for the amendment.

On motion of Mr. Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Graydon: What is the order of business for tomorrow?

Mr. St. Laurent: We will continue this debate and then take up the act to amend the statutes.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.56 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 15, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON FEBRUARY 14

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of personal privilege. During the debate last evening I made some uncomplimentary references to the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott). This morning I do not think that they were either very funny or very clever. Of my own volition, and having regard to my sense of fair play and the dignity of debate in this house, I willingly and sincerely tender him my apology.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): I accept the apology of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), in the spirit in which it is given. It takes a man with a big heart to make amends to a fellow member in the way he has done by a public apology. But I hope he will be careful in the future. I hope also that the press will give the same publicity to his remarks as was given to what was reported in this morning's papers.

Mr. Speaker: In the name of all the members of the house I think I should compliment both hon. members and thank them very much.

FREIGHT RATES

SUSPENSION OF INCREASES IN EXPRESS RATES ON FISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon City): Yesterday I addressed a question to the Minister of Transport as follows:

What changes in express or freight rates are effective or deferred as of today?

As we did not get to the orders of the day yesterday, perhaps the minister will permit me to broaden the scope of my question and have it read: "as of the last day or two" rather than "as of today."

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The board of transport commissioners issued order 71,997 which suspended as of February 14 the proposed increases in express rates on fish. Those rates cover the movement of fish from the productive areas to various parts of Canada.

BULGARIA

CHARGES AGAINST PROTESTANT CLERGYMEN—IMPRISONMENTS IN ROUMANIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the attention of the government been called to the arrest of several Protestant clergymen in Bulgaria by the soviet satellite Bulgarian communist government, fifteen leading Protestant clergymen having been charged with high treason, black marketing, and making what may be described as a satellite type of confession? Will any action be taken by the government in the way of protest? Will the minister also refer in his memorandum of protest to the imprisonment of several other Christian clergymen of Protestant denominations in Roumania?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question. I would say to him that the only information the government has about this development in Bulgaria is that which it has seen in the newspapers. As the hon. member knows, we have no representative in Bulgaria. Immediately on receipt of this information through the public press we took steps to secure if possible official confirmation of the report by asking friendly governments who were represented in Bulgaria to obtain information as to the validity or otherwise of those reports. We have not yet received replies to those inquiries and when we do we shall be in position to decide what action, if any, will be taken.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): Press dispatches indicate that the Minister of Mines and Resources made a statement yesterday to a delegation concerning the trans-Canada highway. The dispatch seems to indicate that the government has reached certain decisions respecting the highway. I should like to ask the minister whether any agreements have been made with the provinces and if so, will he table them in the house? Is he prepared now to make a statement about the highway?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is much too early to make any worth-while statement as to the progress being made. The Department of Mines and Resources is in communication with the ministers of highways in the various provinces as to the route of the highway through their particular provinces, and the kind of road to be constructed. I think that is as far as the statement went that I made yesterday to a delegation from Sault Ste. Marie. They were speaking to me principally on the matter of the route through that part of the province of Ontario. No agreements have yet been arrived at between the federal government and any of the provinces, although negotiations are actively under way.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to ask a question supplementary to the one asked by the member for Vancouver South. Has any determination been made whether the route of the trans-Canada highway shall be by way of the Kicking Horse pass or the Yellowhead pass?

Mr. MacKinnon: No.

Mr. Cruickshank: Where are your provincial rights now?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the minister if it is intended to rely on the recommendations of the provinces.

Mr. MacKinnon: I would say it is.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

QUESTION AS TO PROGRESS TOWARD CANADA'S SELF-SUFFICIENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will the minister make a statement to the house some time soon giving an account of the progress the government has made since January 1, 1946 toward making Canada more self-sufficient? Will he deal in some detail with the progress that was made in 1948, and that is being made in 1949?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The question seems to suggest a very comprehensive study involving considerable research. I shall be glad to examine it. I think certain data bearing on the subject matter were tabled a few days ago in a report on the administration of schedule III of the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act. I will see what can be prepared, and give my hon. friend an answer later.

PRESS REPORT WITH REFERENCE TO USE OF TELEPHONE RECORDING DEVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, arising out of a press report. The press report reads: "Report Drew applied in vain for phone recording device". As I understand it, this device was to record—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have my question here. If this device is to be used to record what she says, may I have television to see what she looks like?

QUESTION AS TO PLANK NO. 11 OF NEW LIBERAL PARTY PLATFORM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister tell the house when the government intends to implement plank No. 11 in the new Liberal party platform?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As the hon. gentleman knows very well, the policy of the government will be announced in due course.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I intended to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, but as it perhaps involves government policy I will direct it to the Prime Minister. On Thursday last I asked the Minister of Labour if the government was giving consideration to assisting employable unemployed in the city of Vancouver. On the basis of a telegram received from the Vancouver district council of the Canadian Legion, I wish to repeat that question today. The telegram states that the unemployment situation in Vancouver constitutes an emergency comparable to the floods of last summer. Will the government assure the house that it will look into the situation with a view to rendering assistance?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should not like to assure the house that the government will look into it with a view to assisting. The government will look into it with a view to determining whether or not the situation is one that requires assistance, and then give consideration to whatever may be found in its first investigation.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): As a supplementary question, may I ask the Prime Minister when that will be done?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am afraid I am not in a position to forecast how long it will take. It will be done immediately, and under instructions to proceed as expeditiously as may be reasonable.

Mr. Rodney Young (Vancouver Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, based on the telegram mentioned by the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). In that telegram the Canadian Legion provincial command states that the number of those who have been receiving veterans grants—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Young: Will the minister say whether it is possible to extend the grants which have now run out, to assist veterans who are unemployed in Vancouver?

PENSIONS

QUESTION AS TO NATIONAL PLAN WITH RESPECT TO INCURABLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Burton (Humboldt): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister received representations from individuals and organizations seeking a national pension plan for incurables? Will the minister be prepared to make a statement now, or at an early day?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. With regard to the second part of the question, I can add nothing more at this time to what I said in answer to a similar question on Friday last.

HARBOURS AND RIVERS

VICTORIA BEACH, N.S., BREAKWATER—WORK OF CONSTRUCTION OR EXTENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): In view of press reports relating to the danger to the fishing fleet at Victoria Beach because of the condition of the breakwater, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. I have already sent him notice of it. Have appropriations been provided for the construction or extension of the breakwater at Victoria Beach? If work has not yet commenced on this undertaking, when will it be proceeded with?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I wish to thank the hon. gentleman for sending me a copy of his question. In the supplementary estimates of last year an item of $20,000 was voted for this work. Actually our engineers in Halifax are preparing plans and specifications, and we expect to have them ready some time in March. The moment they are ready, we will ask for tenders and proceed with the work.

PRICES AND TRADE BOARD

DECISION OF ONTARIO SUPREME COURT IN MCGINN CASE

Mr. H. W. Timmins (Parkdale): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister given consideration to the effect of the decision handed down yesterday by the supreme court of Ontario in the McGinn case as to the present validity and force of the wartime prices and trade board order with respect to prices?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I have seen only newspaper reports of the decision in question. I have not yet received a report from the legal advisers of the wartime prices and trade board.

GANDER AIRPORT

QUESTION AS TO LANDING RIGHTS FOR COMMERCIAL COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to know under what authority the information was conveyed about two weeks ago to embassies, ministries or other official offices of those countries in which there are companies which have commercial air operations going through Gander, to the effect that they would not have commercial landing rights at Gander on and after April 1 next.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member was not able to give me notice of his question.

Mr. Drew: I learned about it only as I came into the house.

Mr. Pearson: I am not in a position to give the hon. member a reply now, but I will look into the matter and see if a reply can be given to him tomorrow or the next day.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NAILS

INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION AND EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. Brunelle (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I gave notice to the Minister of Trade and Commerce of the question I now propose to ask. Is the shortage of nails in Canada due to our exports? If we do export nails, I should like to know in what quantities and to what countries.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The production of nails last year from Canadian steel was 1,656,720 kegs as against 1,546,490 kegs in 1947, an increase of about 110,000 kegs. All these nails were distributed in Canada.

Mr. Fraser: Under priorities, most of them.

Mr. Howe: Do you want to answer this question? It is difficult for a minister to answer a question about nails when we have a specialist in nails in the house. There was one Canadian operation which was simply a conversion process. A company was given the right to bring in United States wire to be converted into nails, and to export the product. That operation provided 59,940 kegs, part of which were exported, as follows:

	kegs
Newfoundland	238
Honduras	690
Venezuela	42
U.S.A.	36,040

Therefore of the roughly 60,000 kegs made from United States steel under the conversion agreement, about 20,000 kegs remained in Canada and the remainder were exported under the agreement.

Mr. Adamson: Were they all steel nails, or were some of them aluminum nails?

Mr. Howe: Steel nails.

Mr. H. W. Timmins (Parkdale): If I may ask a supplementary question, the minister has stated that the production of nails will be expedited in much the same fashion it was expedited last year. I should like to ask just when that expedited production will begin. Will it be in March, or April?

Mr. Howe: As my hon. friend knows, the production of nails in Canada is limited by the capacity of Canada to produce wire from which nails are made. Last year, during the period June to October, there was a diversion of wire from fencing into the manufacture of nails. That diversion is to be repeated this year, but it will start one month earlier and extend to the same termination date. In other words there will be an extra month during which wire ordinarily used for fencing will be diverted to the manufacture of nails.

Mr. Timmins: From May?

Mr. Howe: From May 1 to October 31.

FISHERIES

REGULATIONS WITH RESPECT TO CANNING OF LOBSTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I know the Minister of Fisheries is waiting to answer this question, notice of which I sent him this morning. Is it the intention of the department to permit the canning of lobsters at any time of the year, provided that the lobsters are legally taken from any areas open to fishing?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. gentleman was kind enough to give me notice of his question. The department now has under consideration the matter of amending the regulations under the Meat and Canned Foods Act to permit the canning of lobsters which may have been legally taken at any time of the year.

HOUSING

NIAGARA PENINSULA—ADVANCES TO PRIVATE CONTRACTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. Lockhart (Lincoln): Will the responsible minister or parliamentary assistant try to get me an answer to question No. 14 on the order paper with regard to housing in the Niagara peninsula? When it was called the other day it was allowed to stand. I am anxious to get the information.

NEWFOUNDLAND

TERMS OF UNION WITH CANADA—ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

The house resumed from Monday, February 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King respecting the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

(Translation):

Mr. Maxime Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, having already expressed my views on the constitutional aspect of this question, I would probably not have spoken a second time in this debate were it not for the attempt, on the part of some people, to create the impression that this parliament had, with only one dissenting voice, given unanimous approval to the proposed union of Newfoundland with Canada, according to the procedure followed up to now.

That is not a fact. The hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr Hamel) has expressed a dissenting voice on the second reading of the bill. The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) has likewise expressed his disapproval, but on the third reading of the bill. As for the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) and myself, we have made it clear, on the committee stage, that we were opposed to this union as proposed.

So that there will be no misunderstanding, I take advantage of this resolution, and of the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), to repeat my opposition.

First, as I have already shown and proven during the discussion in committee, the procedure followed by the government is a violation of the constitution. Moreover, if we approve this stand of the government we shall be party to an injustice and to the violation of an undertaking between Great Britain and Newfoundland. I for one want to disengage myself from any responsibility for it.

The leader of the opposition has moved that the different provincial governments be consulted and the union proceeded with after securing satisfactory results from such consultation.

I wish to state that I am not entirely satisfied with this amendment; yet, for want of something better, I shall vote for it. At least it embodies the principle that the provinces should not be entirely ignored in connection with amendments to the pact of 1867. I hold, however, as I did last Tuesday, that not only should the government consult the different provinces which were parties to the pact, but should obtain their consent to any amendment of the constitution. Many reasons justify our securing the consent of the provinces, especially of those which pay the cost of such union.

The Prime Minister has stated that the members elected to the federal parliament from the different provinces represent their respective provinces in such cases as this. I do not share his views, but since he holds that opinion and has the support of a majority in this house, I shall, as one of the representatives of the province of Quebec, state certain reasons for which our province would be justified in opposing that union.

In the second place, the union will entail a considerable increase in our already too heavy burdens. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has already admitted that, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) proved it in the statement he made the other day. Some economists are unanimous in the belief that we are assuming heavy liabilities. And who is going to pay in the long run? The provinces of Quebec and Ontario, in which the main sources of revenue are to be found.

I wish to quote from a Reuters dispatch, published by the newspaper Le Droit on February 9 last, the following statement from Lord Jowitt:

> The Canadian proposals in connection with the incorporation of Newfoundland "are not devoid of generosity" according to the Lord Chancellor, Viscount Jowitt.
> It can be taken for granted that for many years the annexation is going to be quite a heavy burden for the Canadian people, began Lord Jowitt.
> We, in this country, have never sought to gain anything from Newfoundland, while Canada certainly pays a high price in her effort to put that former colony back on her feet.
> Lord Jowitt states that he discussed with a great many people this matter of Newfoundland's entry into confederation and the consensus of opinion is that it was a very good thing for Great Britain, since the Canadian people seem ready to accept this "heavy responsibility."

One has but to analyse the methods used by the commission of government appointed by London to come to the conclusion that Great Britain is more anxious than anyone else to bring about this union. And Canada, ever generous towards Great Britain, has hastened to comply with the latter's wishes.

In the third place, I further object because the union compels us to increase our defence budget. According to statements which have already been made, our expenditures for national defence will be greatly increased this year. If we take into consideration the fact that Canada, with a population of only twelve and a half million people has just as much territory to protect as the United States whose population is now 150 million, we should not think of increasing our present territory. There will result increased expenditures which again will fall, to a large extent, on the Quebec taxpayer, who is already overtaxed. We would imitate the frog who tried to swell itself up to the size of an ox. We are heading for a blow-out.

In the fourth place, that union will drag us into international conflict. We shall be getting a mortgaged property on which the imperial commission has already leased bases to the United States for 99 years. Therefore, should the United States be at war with another nation, we immediately become subject to attack. The presence of those foreign air bases on our territory will involve us in war, whether we want it or not.

In the fifth place, the union will imperil Canadian unity. It will cause problems on account of the pronounced dissensions amongst the people of Newfoundland themselves and on account of their imperialist tendencies. We are contracting a marriage imposed on us by a foreign commission established in London, and this imperial commission is evidently acting in its own interest, judging from its efforts to achieve that union.

Newfoundland

Does anyone wish to increase the disunity already existing in this country?

In the sixth place, alarming things are being said or written.

We, in Quebec, wish to make Canada a united country, seeking first to further Canadian interests. We want Canadians, of whatever origin, to think as Canadians. Now here is what I read in the Winnipeg Free Press on July 28 last, concerning the entry of Newfoundland into confederation:

(Text):

On balance it might be said the island is the gainer out of union. Certainly the standard of living will be raised; services will be improved; the isolation of the island ended. As part of a larger unit, Newfoundland's flimsy economy will be strengthened. But the bargain is not all onesided. Canada also stands to gain. Her population is increased by 350,000 English-speaking stock;—

This denotes views that should give us food for thought.

Considering that the province of Quebec is a minority in this country, that our rights, more particularly those mentioned in section 133 of the British North America Act, are at the mercy of a majority in the house, according to the view expressed by the Prime Minister, which view is apparently shared by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) but not by myself, there is cause for concern over the protection of our rights, with the arrival of seven new members who will be subservient to their views rather than to the national interest. Furthermore, they are being allowed six senators, while Quebec, with a population at least ten times greater, will only have twenty-four; in proportion to her population, our province should have sixty. The newcomers are in an infinitely better position than the fathers of confederation. And thus, to a certain extent, we would leave in their hands the fate of our rights, guaranteed though they be by the pact of 1867. A small guarantee it is if we recall how the majority in the Manitoba provincial legislature annihilated the guarantees provided in the Act of Union of 1870, notwithstanding the provisions of sections 22 and 23 of the said act which read as follows:

(Text):

Section 22. (1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

(Translation):

Section 23 reads as follows:

(Text):

Section 23. Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the legislature, and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process, in or issuing from any court of Canada established under the British North America Act, 1867, or in or from all or any of the courts of the province. The acts of the legislature shall be printed and published in both those languages.

(Translation):

Now, in 1890, the Manitoba legislature violated this constitution by passing the two acts I shall mention. I have here the 1890 Manitoba statutes, and I quote from two chapters, one of which deals with the abolition of Catholic schools.

(Text):

We find in the statutes of Manitoba, 1890, chapter 14, an act to provide that the English language shall be the official language of the province of Manitoba. Section 1 reads as follows:

Any statute or law to the contrary notwithstanding, the English language only shall be used in the records and journals of the house of assembly for the province of Manitoba, and in any pleadings or process in or issuing from any court in the province of Manitoba. The acts of the legislature of the province of Manitoba need only be printed and published in the English language.

(Translation):

That dealt with the abolition of French. As for Catholic schools, chapter 38 of the same statute provides as follows:

(Text):

In cases where, before the coming into force of this act, Catholic school districts have been established as in the next preceding section mentioned, such Catholic school districts shall, upon the coming into force of this act, cease to exist . . .

(Translation):

That is how the majority makes a clean sweep of the rights guaranteed minorities by a constitutional act.

This not only gives us food for thought but shows how important it is for the people of Quebec to oppose any amendment to the 1867 agreement, as planned, without the consent of the provinces.

In closing, I point out, with regret, how unfortunate it is that the Canadian representatives mainly concerned with negotiating the terms of union should have been, at the same time, members of the privy council of Great Britain. No one can serve two masters. Great Britain's interests are not those of Canada.

I will say no more about this for the time being because I do not want to delay the vote on this resolution and on the amendment submitted.

(Text):

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Perhaps some small addition to this debate from one sitting in the very back benches may be acceptable to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house. I should like to say just a few words in order to give to the house some of the ideas which have come to me as I listened to what in my opinion has been a most interesting debate.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) paid a well-deserved tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for the manner in which he had piloted through this house the legislation relating to the union of Newfoundland with Canada. I will not add to the words used by the Minister of National Defence, except to say that his sentiments were shared at least by all on this side of the house.

Of the speeches in the debate on the motion and the amendment thereto, I was particularly impressed by the one made last evening by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). I thought he was most impressive in making his point with respect to the procedure by which Newfoundland chose confederation with Canada as the form of government which would be adopted by their country in the future. I thought his statement that the choice was a fundamentally democratic and free one was of the utmost importance.

I should like to summarize the procedure which was followed in order that the people of Newfoundland might make this choice—so that there may be no question in the minds of hon. members, particularly of those who sit opposite, as to its fundamental nature.

The policy of the British government with respect to the future organization of the government in Newfoundland was announced in the British House of Commons by the Prime Minister of Great Britain on December 11, 1945. That policy can be briefly summarized as follows: that the time had come when the people of Newfoundland were to be given the opportunity of deciding what form of government would be adopted in their country in the future; that this question would be decided by a national referendum in which the people of Newfoundland would be given a free choice as to the form of government they desired to adopt, and that, preceding this national referendum, a national convention of elected delegates would be called together in order to permit of orderly discussion of the various types of government which might be suggested. This policy of the British government was duly promulgated in Newfoundland, and steps were taken to carry it into effect.

Newfoundland was divided into constituencies which followed closely the old divisions of constituencies when they had their own representative assembly. Nominations were called and an election was held. As a result of that election, forty-five representatives were chosen to form the national convention. This national convention was called together in St. John's, and at its opening sessions was presided over by a justice of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland. The task of this convention under the policy laid down by the British government was to make recommendations to the British government as to the forms of government which would be put on the ballot upon which the people of Newfoundland would vote.

The first business of the convention was to adopt and enact rules to govern its own procedure. This was done by an appointed committee which drafted a set of rules and brought them back to the convention for adoption. They were adopted unanimously. One of the rules which the convention adopted for itself by unanimous vote was that each member of the convention would have the right to make known to the British government his own personal recommendations as to the kinds of government which should go on the ballot, on the same basis as the decision of the whole convention, whether it was by a large majority or by a small one only. Therefore the convention decided for itself that each member had full rights to make recommendations on the same basis as the whole convention itself.

It may be of interest to know that 130 individuals were nominated to contest the election which was held to choose the members who would form this national convention. Of these, 128 were nominated without having declared themselves to the electorate as to the kind of government which they favoured for Newfoundland. Two alone made public their opinions as to what the best form of government for Newfoundland in the future would be. One made it known to his people that he favoured confederation, and the other that he favoured the return of responsible government. I point this out to show that 43 of the 45 men who met in this national convention went there free of any undertaking previously made to the people who sent them there as to the kind of government which they would recommend.

The convention met for many months. It worked hard and discussed every aspect of the various proposals which were put before it. Delegations were sent both to Britain and to Ottawa. Their reports were received and thoroughly discussed. When these discussions were completed the convention voted unanimously to place upon the ballot the choice of continuation of commission of government. It also voted unanimously for the inclusion on the ballot of return of responsible government. The choice of confederation with Canada was put to the convention and defeated by a vote of 29 to 16. But remember that the unanimous wish of the convention was that each individual member would have the same right to make recommendations to the British government as the convention itself, and there had been no undertaking by the British government that it would accept any or all of the recommendations of the convention, or that it would accept these recommendations to the exclusion of anything else.

Within one week after the announcement of the result of the voting in the national convention, 50,000 people of Newfoundland either had sent telegrams or had written to the governor expressing their wish and their demand that, in spite of any decision reached by the convention, the choice of confederation with Canada be given to the people of Newfoundland by its inclusion on the ballot which was to be presented to them in the referendum. In other words, Mr. Speaker, in addition to the sixteen elected members of the convention who individually and as a group recommended to the British government the inclusion of confederation with Canada on the ballot, 50,000 citizens of Newfoundland made known their wishes in like manner to the British government in an unmistakable way. As a result of all this, the British government reached its decision to have on the ballot, which was presented to the people of Newfoundland in the referendum, the three choices—return of responsible government, retention of commission of government, and confederation with Canada.

The suggestion has been made that there was some defect in this procedure; that it was not democratic; that it was not a free choice, and that in some way the people of Newfoundland were misled. I should like to quote the words used by the Prime Minister of Great Britain when he announced the British policy to the British House of Commons on December 11, 1945. He said:

> The object of the procedure which His Majesty's government proposes is to enable the people of the island to come to a free and informed decision as to their future form of government.

The suggestion has been left in many minds that the choice of the people of Newfoundland was neither free nor informed. I say that that is entirely incorrect. Their choice was a free one, and it was one which they had known they were to make, from December 1945, through the whole period during which the convention sat, and right down to the referendum.

I believe many thousands of Newfoundlanders who voted against confederation will resent the suggestion that they have been imposed upon; that there was anything undemocratic or improper in the way in which they were permitted to make their choice.

The people of Newfoundland will little appreciate any technicalities of interpretation of the British North America Act or problems of the Canadian constitution. Newfoundlanders who know the facts will realize that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in this house, and those who adopt his arguments, have adopted the arguments and taken over the position of those in Newfoundland who most violently oppose union of the colony of Newfoundland with Canada.

In the last few days in this house much has been said in praise of the people of Newfoundland, and of the strength of the bonds which unite that people with the people of this country. Nowhere in this dominion are these bonds stronger than they are in Nova Scotia, the province from which I come. We have a special knowledge of the people of Newfoundland. Thousands of them live among us. We have a closer community of interest with the people of Newfoundland than the people of any other portion of Canada, largely because of the basic importance to both of us of the great industry of fishing. It has also been said that to know the people of Newfoundland is to appreciate them. To know them better is to appreciate them more. We have had the privilege of knowing them best, and we appreciate them most.

Therefore it is with a particular feeling of pride that the people of Nova Scotia welcome the people of Newfoundland as full partners in this confederation. We feel that they have been given the opportunity to make a free choice, and we are not disposed to take any technical or synthetic position which will prevent the union which both Newfoundland and Canada desire.

Mr. J. G. L. Langlois (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate until I heard the speech made a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond). Since part of my address will deal with his remarks, I think it proper that I should make them in the French language.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I listened with much interest and quite attentively to the speech which the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) has just delivered.

Among the remarks which he saw fit to make in this debate, there was one, if my memory serves me aright, where the hon. member said: "We Canadians from Quebec want first of all to protect the interests of Canada." I must say that all members who come from the province of Quebec agree with the full scope of that remark of the hon. member. We also are concerned with the interests of Canada because above all we lay claim to the title of plain Canadians. But that remark, as made by the hon. member, makes me wonder what our Quebec nationalists would have said if, for instance, we Quebec Canadians and Canadian citizens had let Newfoundland join the United States. Those same nationalists would then have cried shame. They would have described in terms which I would not dare utter in this house—because I have no use for the kind of language to which they resort—as a cowardly dereliction of duty the stand which they charge us with having failed to take.

In my opinion, Newfoundland will be not only a physical but a moral asset to this country. During my six years in the Royal Canadian Navy, it was my privilege to be associated during rather difficult times with companions from Newfoundland, so that I was then able to appreciate their patriotism and high moral qualities. That is why I say with the utmost assurance that Newfoundland's entry into confederation will be for my country, for Canada, a moral asset that will further promote Canada's development and progress. Then the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie expressed great apprehension. If I understand him correctly, he said it might be a threat to our French minority to bring into our confederation the people of Newfoundland who do not share our traditions or way of life. In this respect, I should like to inform the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, if he does not already know it, that 31 per cent of Newfoundland's population are Roman Catholics; in other words, that 31 per cent of Newfoundlanders share the faith of our ancestors in Quebec. In that regard, I have no fear whatsoever because, as I said a while ago, since I had the privilege of associating with people from Newfoundland while serving during the war, I was in a position to appreciate the sterling qualities of these good folk.

Moreover, Newfoundland's population is made up largely of fishermen, worthy citizens whose trade is the same as that of the majority of my constituents, people whose work ever pits them against the elements, who toil and struggle for a livelihood and are used to facing issues squarely and judging on their merits. They have no time to waste on party matters of a purely local character, or on jingoism. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member also mentioned in his speech, if I understood him correctly, that the federal government was seeking to amend the Canadian constitution without consulting the provinces. He made this remark in such a general way that I believe it is my duty to take up this statement. No doubt he has forgotten that in a memorable radio address given some ten days ago, our leader, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), referring to the possible effects of the abolition of appeals to the privy council, stated that consideration should be given to the means of amending our constitution. But on the very next day, here in the house, he hastened to add, in reply to a question by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), that such an amendment to the constitution should not be carried out without the consent of the provinces. Therefore, the hon. member's remarks were not fully accurate and, no matter how he qualified them, do not concern solely, I am sure, the matter now under discussion.

Mr. Speaker, ever since the opening of this session, we have heard a whole medley of contradictory statements. In the first place the attitude of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has been most thoroughly inconsistent.

As I was saying before, I was at first unwilling to take part in this debate. This was because I believed that the leader of the opposition was sincere in objecting, on the first day of this session, to any delay in debating the speech from the throne. I was therefore unwilling to delay further that particular debate by taking part myself in this one. However we have seen how, subsequently, the leader of the opposition turned about completely and, through a series of amendments, himself contributed to delay further the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As a matter of fact, by moving the amendment to the resolution which is now before this house, he maintains the totally inconsistent attitude which he has taken since the beginning of the session. Was he not serious when he opposed a resolution put forward by the prime minister, which called for the adjournment of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne?

Is it any wonder now that we find in his statements such glaring inconsistencies as those submitted to us yesterday by some hon. members who preceded me in this debate?

The leader of the opposition has completely changed his mind. He has made a right-about turn on the question of autonomy. He no longer talks about centralization, about a country made up of a central office with a branch in each province. But today he clamours for wider powers for a more complete autonomy in favour of the provinces, which, in his estimation, should enjoy even wider powers than those of the central government.

But I find it strange that these same provinces to which the hon. the leader of the opposition would grant so much autonomy have not even taken the trouble of officially making known their attitude on the procedure we are presently following in this house.

As a matter of fact, I personally checked up and was informed from official sources that not one of the nine premiers of the Canadian provinces has officially protested to the leader of the government against the procedure which we are following to amend the constitution, that is, regarding the amendment to the constitution we are now discussing.

While the nine premiers were clamouring against federal government persecution, not one of them felt the need of suggesting in an official letter to the leader of the government, the procedure he wished the house to follow in connection with the annexation of Newfoundland. Do these same premiers feel that the provincial autonomy of Quebec, and that of the other nine provinces, is safeguarded by the mere fact that they made contradictory statements, or that they are entrenched for the preservation of provincial rights behind their own recriminating oratory?

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the negative stand taken by the provinces of this country since 1938. No province ever took steps, or submitted to the federal government practical means of amending the constitution, either as a whole or in connection with the taxation structure. Mr. Speaker, we need only go back to the days of the Rowell-Sirois commission. The provinces were consulted by the commission on proposals made thereafter by the federal government.

This commission sat throughout the country, from Vancouver to Halifax. And now these premiers, claiming to have been wronged because they have not been consulted, have taken a stand I shall now explain. To define the stand taken by these premiers at the time I shall refer to Wilfrid Eggleston's excellent book entitled: Road to Nationhood. On pages 115 and 116 of this book Mr. Eggleston writes as follows, and I quote in English:

(Text):

In a letter to the secretary dated July 13, 1938, the Ontario premier concluded: "Under the circumstances, my colleagues and I have decided to disassociate ourselves entirely from any participation in so far as these deliberations are concerned."

Mr. Eggleston continues:

This meant, among other things, that the compilation of the public finance figures of Ontario was brought to a halt.

Premier Hepburn's decision was lauded by premier Aberhart of Alberta, who called the inquiry a "national menace" and a "piece of political futility." These reports were coupled with press statements of "alliances" between Hepburn and Duplessis. The Montreal Gazette contended that there was no longer a commission. The Globe and Mail of Toronto proposed that Right Hon. R. B. Bennett be invited to fill the chairman's place. Other editors wondered what could be salvaged from "the wreck." These circumstances are recalled here to show the atmosphere in which for a part of the time at least the commission was compelled to pursue its inquiry.

And then, at page 107, the author writes:

(Text):

The first serious hitch in the collection of public finance statistics from the nine provinces had occurred early in March, 1938, when Premier Maurice Duplessis of Quebec absolutely declined to go on with the preparation of answers to the questionnaire which had been circulated by the commission for its comparative study of provincial finances. He cloaked his non-co-operative gesture behind the assertion that he could not rely upon the figures of earlier administrations.

This shows the lack of co-operation, not to say the obstruction, on the part of the provincial premiers regarding that commission. And now, the leader of the opposition contending to speak on behalf of those same premiers, asserts that the provinces should be consulted on the proposed amendment to the Canadian constitution.

Yesterday, a speaker interpreted this amendment as meaning that the leader of the opposition was thereby seeking the provinces' consent. The latter might then have to face a dilemma resulting from the following probability: What would happen should one province voice opposition, while the other eight provinces approved? Immediately after, other members of his party stated that such was not the purpose of the amendment, but that it rather aimed at stressing the need of safeguarding the right of the provinces to be consulted in circumstances of that kind. Through this amendment, which has no other meaning, we are saying to the provinces: "Very well, we shall be nice enough to seek your advice, but whatever be your answer, we shall take no heed of it."

To take refuge in such a procedure for the sole protection of our most precious rights and privileges is a strange way of protecting the autonomy of the provinces.

I said a while ago, Mr. Speaker, that so far the provinces had taken but a negative stand in the matter of autonomy, and I believe that my own remarks and those I have quoted have made clear that very important point in these discussions.

The same thing is happening here today. So far we have had but one semi-political statement from a premier who, from his vantage point of premier of the province of Quebec, claims that the province should be consulted in this case, but does not go to the trouble of sending to Ottawa his official protest or suggestions.

If the premiers of the provinces concerned are so jealous of their autonomy, if they are sincere when they claim the autonomy of the provinces is endangered by the central power, it is time they act jointly and positively. Why do they not use the procedure followed by the fathers of confederation?

We are accused of departing from the spirit and the procedure of the discussions prior to confederation. Why then do not these premiers set us on the right road? Why do they not revive that period preliminary to the confederative pact? It would be very easy to do so.

The prime ministers would only need to hold preliminary conferences among themselves such as the Quebec or Charlottetown conferences, for example, which later resulted in joint resolutions being forwarded to the imperial government which sanctions the Canadian constitution.

What is there to prevent the prime ministers from following that course if they absolutely want their autonomy to be protected? I have consulted neither the members of my party nor any member of the cabinet, but I may tell this house with a fair degree of certainty that if the prime ministers of the provinces also held preliminary conferences among themselves and, after considering the different proposals of each province, if they could reach a common agreement accepted by the nine provinces, I am sure that later on the leader of the central government would not object to receiving them and considering the situation with them, the basis of this interprovincial conference being the decisions taken by the above-mentioned preliminary conferences.

Here is a practical action which the premiers of the provinces have not as yet deemed fit to take since the beginning of this long debate on this matter of the Canadian constitution and its amendments.

At the time of the interprovincial conferences we witnessed a political bargaining such as had never been observed in the history of Canada. We saw the provincial premiers come here after having examined—or rather after having had the opportunity to examine—the proposals submitted by the central government, and behave as if it were a matter of making the highest bid.

Is it thus, Mr. Speaker, that we can hope to solve the ticklish problem of amending our constitution?

As the Prime Minister said in a radio speech, the logical consequence of the abolition of appeals to the privy council will be that we shall have to find the means of amending our constitution. That fact provides the provincial premiers with an opportunity to take action. It is now up to them to speak; it behooves them to do something. Let them tell us plainly and with a unanimous voice what they want. Let them tell us how they intend to protect their prerogatives, which they claim are so seriously threatened. I am sure that if the threat is as great as they represent it, the action I am suggesting to them is justified under the circumstances.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I am not afraid to state that their silence will be construed as a stand of non-co-operation, a stand indicating that they wish to carry on the debate, hoping to benefit from it in future provincial elections.

I know that last summer all the sins of Israel were blamed on that lack of understanding between the provinces and Ottawa. There were cries of persecution and despoiling by the federal government. The provincial premiers have there a good alibi for their inertness, an eternal alibi for their failure to provide for social security in their own provinces and they will take no chance of losing it.

Instead of protesting, instead of repeating their autonomist statements, these premiers would be appreciated by all the Canadian people if they had the courage to take the initiative in making concrete suggestions and to tell the central government, with a unanimous voice, what they want.

The fathers of confederation, to which they seem to compare themselves today, did not fear to tell the imperial government with a unanimous voice what their wishes were as to the basis of the Canadian constitution. And I must add, for the benefit of the advocates of federal autonomy, that when the imperial government dealt with the resolutions from the Quebec and Charlottetown conferences, that same imperial government did not lose any of its autonomy for having given first the provinces or colonies the liberty of putting forth jointly and consistently their views on this important question. Likewise the central authority will not lose its autonomy by telling the provinces: "You claim that our method of proceeding is prejudicial to your privileges. Well, kindly submit us your representations, through preliminary conferences, to which, I feel sure, the central authority will be pleased and will make it a point to send the necessary experts and statisticians to supply the provinces with all information and data they may need. I believe I can say that the dominion government does not lose any of its autonomy in acting that way. Moreover, I add that this way of proceeding does not at all conflict with the stand taken in the past by our government with regard to this matter.

I know that some are ready to rise in their place and say yes. They say that today, but they have not always been of that opinion. Nothing in that attitude, in those suggestions, come in any way in conflict with the position taken up to now by the central administration. The dominion government thought it was taking the right course in initiating the move and absorbing the costs of research undertaken by the Rowell-Sirois commission with a view to finding a suitable basis for the settlement of our fiscal problems. The information obtained was intended for the provinces as well as for the central administration and would be made available to both parties to the negotiations. The central power having informed the provinces of its views on procedure, the provinces refused to co-operate. As a consequence, I repeat that the conference was a total failure, and I believe that I have proven my point.

Today the dominion government tells the provinces: "Very well, you contend that we were wrong in acting as we did and in taking the first steps, so go ahead and suggest a better way; tell us, in short, what you wish, and once you have made your wishes known we shall be prepared to discuss with you, on even terms, the findings of these preliminary conferences."

May I repeat that, to my mind, this suggestion reduces to a minimum the possible recurrence of the sometimes disgraceful performances which marked interprovincial conferences in the past. I submit it in all good faith to the consideration of the house and of the government I have the honour of supporting, though I am prepared to modify my views if they should be proved wrong. I say merely that I do not see how we can possibly go wrong if we follow the procedure that governed the pre-confederation conferences which led to the drafting of the federal statute. Through this legislation which set up a central administration and united the Canadian provinces, Canada became the great nation we are now proud to call our own.

I feel there should be no fear to suggest to the provincial premiers that they take a leaf out of the book of the fathers of confederation.

It is all very well for people to claim time and time again that they wish to abide by the spirit and letter of confederation, that they insist on modeling their attitude on that of the men who drafted the confederation agreement. All this, however, would sound much more convincing to the Canadian public if, instead of only repeating that we wish to emulate these great statesmen, we gave concrete evidence that we actually intend to follow in their footsteps and that, as I said earlier, we want to further the development of this great Canadian nation which they pioneered.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

(Text):

Mr. W. Garfield Case (Grey North): It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that a fine legal argument has taken place and we, as laymen, must seek to understand the various arguments presented by the learned gentlemen who have spoken during the past few hours. By seeking to interpret what I have learned from the arguments advanced, particularly as they relate to the amendment moved by my own leader, I feel that I might contribute something.

At the outset, may I say there is no one within the hearing of my voice more anxious to see Newfoundland admitted into confederation with Canada than I am. I hope I have an appreciation of my country and, for many long years, I have visualized the advantages we, as a nation, would enjoy if Newfoundland were admitted into confederation. I submit, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition that would in any way handicap the completion of this union. I have listened to the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), and while I would hesitate to interpret any part of the law expounded by him, I was impressed with his reference to municipal law and to municipal procedure.

I have had some experience in municipal government. I might say to the hon. gentleman that the municipalities in the province of Ontario, while governed to an extent by the statutes drafted by the department of municipal affairs, have a set of bylaws for which those municipalities are responsible. Over the years those bylaws have accumulated in number. I think it would be a tremendous task for the law officer of a municipality to search those bylaws in order to determine whether something already in effect might react against a matter being passed by the municipal council. For this reason we do find in municipal law a wording such as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has used: "Notwithstanding anything to the contrary", or something like that.

The British North America Act is set forth in clear and understandable language. True, after listening to this debate I can understand that there is room for different interpretations. Nevertheless, the act is very well defined. Unless there were some element of doubt on the part of the administration, those words would not have been used in this address. It is because the administration knows the constitution must be amended, and is not prepared to take any chances, that the following all-embracing term is used:

—hereby confirmed and shall have the force of law notwithstanding anything in the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946.

Now, I was rather surprised at the advice offered by my hon. friend the member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris). Yesterday he suggested that this address to His Majesty appeared on the order paper the day before we voted on third reading of the bill. Of course it was on the order paper, but it was not brought before the house for discussion. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that no one would rise in the house at that time to debate something which was not properly before the house. No one had an opportunity of even considering it, because the third reading of the bill was called. My hon. leader, however, alluded to the possibility of something not yet disclosed in his address on the presentation of the bill.

Let me deal particularly with the amendment for a moment. As I understand, Mr. Speaker, there is no one within this party who questions the right of this parliament to make the terms of union with the colony of Newfoundland. We have already given evidence of our approval by our agreement on the bill as it was considered clause by clause. While certain parts of the bill were drawn to the attention of the administration as matters that might be considered for amendment, no effort was made to amend those clauses. We accepted them as the basis of union. In that sense, we have said, this parliament could act.

I think the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) was wrong in seeking to read into the amendment something which was not there. By our approval of the bill we have said to this parliament, in effect, that it is possessed of the necessary authority to make any deal which is in the national interests of this country. No one has questioned that. What we do say is that, when one comes to read the address to be presented to His Majesty the King, one finds a reference which requires an amendment to the British North America Act. Upon that, we say, the provinces should be consulted. After the conclusion of these consultations, the address would then be forwarded and dealt with accordingly. The reference the amendment seeks relates to the constitutional aspect only, not to the terms of union with Newfoundland.

I can quite understand that, if you were to refer the terms of union to the provinces, it might be a long time before you would be able to obtain approval. I believe the sentiment in Canada is overwhelmingly in favour of admitting Newfoundland into confederation. Having regard to that fact, I believe a reference to the provinces at the present time, since the provincial legislatures are in session or will be in session shortly, would receive prompt attention. Owing to the sentiment in favour of union, I feel satisfied that prompt approval would be received. Then the British North America Act could be amended and Newfoundland could be admitted into confederation.

As has been said already, we have a constitution. Either it means something or it means nothing. A great principle is indeed here involved. The position is just the same as that in which a set of rules is laid down for a hockey match or for a lacrosse match. If you disregard the rules, then you are bound to have a more or less chaotic condition, or a complete disregard for all rules. I like to look beyond the present stage. I do not think it requires any reference by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) to the great men who negotiated the deal. I think we all have an appreciation of each other. I do not think it requires any reference to what happened in Newfoundland. That was their responsibility and their business, not ours. The question about which we are vitally concerned is this. Have we the right to amend the British North America Act by a simple majority vote of this house, without a reference to the parties to the original agreement who indeed created confederation in the first place and played their part in the building of the Dominion of Canada?

(Translation):

Mr. Frederic Dorion (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I listened with rapt attention, just now, to the speech of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Langlois).

Of course, I could not attempt to go over all the points he covered as I should like to limit my few remarks to the matter now under discussion.

However, the hon. member for Gaspé offered a suggestion, and it would be most interesting to know whether the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the government are prepared to endorse a proposal that a meeting of provincial prime ministers be held to consider the matter now being discussed.

I imagine that before the end of this debate, the Prime Minister or members of the government will officially confirm the proposal made by the hon. member for Gaspé.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I believe a correction is in order. I hardly think my suggestion was not that now credited to me by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion).

I suggested that, following abolition of appeals to the privy council, the provinces should meet and submit their views as to what they consider the best way of amending our constitution.

My suggestion had nothing to do with the present discussion.

(Text):

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member is entitled to make a new speech. If he wants to put a question to me, I am ready to answer it.

Mr. Langlois: Provided the hon. member makes his speech, not mine.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Gaspé also stated that in the matter at issue, the provincial premiers should rise and make strong representations against the government's stand at this time.

That is a peculiar way in which to discuss the problem now before the house. After all, it is here, in the House of Commons, that we should decide whether or not one of the clauses of the British North America Act is to be cast aside.

It is for us in this house to decide whether we shall violate a provision of this act and, even if the provincial premiers should protest officially, I believe it is here that the matter should be discussed; it is for us to take a definite stand on whether we intend to respect the federative agreement.

I might add too that some protests have been made already, if I am not mistaken, some of them quite vigorous, especially by the premier of Quebec. The hon. member for Gaspé will note too that quite recently those representations had some repercussions in the constituency of Nicolet-Yamaska.

I have heard in this debate, Mr. Speaker, a most peculiar argument. I quote:

The fact that the bill providing for union with Newfoundland was unanimously adopted by the house prevented the amendment now before us from being presented.

Well, such is not my way of considering this matter. When the bill was first presented, the question was to deal with the principle of the union with Newfoundland and to determine the terms of this union.

But today we are considering the procedure, and as a proof of this, the Prime Minister himself refers to the "procedure" when dealing with the resolution.

> It is well known in this house and by the public that there were provisions in the British North America Act of 1867 looking to the union of Newfoundland with Canada—

And from the same page, in the next column:

> The terms of section 146 of the British North America Act being no longer applicable, another procedure had to be resorted to.

A little further on, I quote:

> There is a second reason why procedure not expressly provided for in the British North America Act was resorted to. If that procedure had not been followed there might have been some question as to its legal effect.

Therefore, the address we are now discussing and the amendment that is submitted to us have to do with the procedure to be followed for achieving the union of Newfoundland with Canada, and that procedure is all the more important since it involves a basic principle expounded in the British North America Act.

Reference has often been made to that provision of section 146 and it is there that we find the principle to be followed in such a case as this one.

Besides, if those provisions of section 146 had been followed, it is quite probable that no one would have seen fit to start the present debate, because in that case we would have remained within the limits of the constitution as established at the time of confederation. For instance, in the case of the entry of Prince Edward Island, there was no need of consulting the provinces, because the methods and the provisions of the British North America Act were then followed.

The same thing happened when British Columbia joined the confederation. Consequently, when those two provinces were annexed, it was not necessary to initiate a debate like this one, because at that time we followed closely the provisions of the British North America Act.

But now these provisions are being cast aside.

What amazes me is that we have come to the point where not only do we consider it unnecessary to consult the provinces, but we do not even trouble ourselves to propose an amendment; the provisions of the British North America Act are simply ignored.

Since the first fight I had the occasion to put up in this house, since 1943, we have reached the point where not only is the constitution amended without any regard for the provinces, without their consent, but where a statute such as the one we have before us is passed by bluntly casting aside one of the provisions of the British North America Act. There is no question even of amending section 146.

Well, I find that extremely important and extremely dangerous for our country.

Besides, that is why I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when we see a statement such as that made by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on February 8 and which appears on page 352 of Hansard, we are justified in entertaining fears. This is what the Prime Minister said on that occasion:

> It must not be forgotten that the British North America Act was passed in 1867, almost eighty-two years ago, and that conditions in this country, its people, its parliament and its government are not the same today as they were then. I was surprised at the attitude expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay. Most of us from my province derive perhaps some sentimental satisfaction from the developments that have taken place and that have brought about the situation whereby the prerogative of His Majesty is now exercised on the advice of ministers responsible to his Canadian subjects, but the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay seems to be one of those who have lagged behind, and he is not willing to keep pace with the developments that time has brought about.

As if, because the British North America Act is 82 years old, we should now consider it obsolete, consider it as fit only to be thrown, for that reason, into the waste-basket.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that such views strongly jeopardize the future of our country. Thus, when this amendment came up for discussion, I considered that if the provisions of the British North America Act were to be put aside, it was imperative to consult the provinces because we would be following a different procedure from that provided in the act.

Why should we not consult the provinces? If one or many provinces raise any objection would it not be expedient first to consider the objection in order to deal with it before the entry of Newfoundland into the confederation? If no objection is raised, would not the entry of Newfoundland appear even more solemn? Would it not be easier then for the people of Newfoundland to become true Canadians, even if only because it would bring about that consolidation of Canadian unity we so often ask for? I feel that for these reasons we should adopt the amendment now before the house.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, most of us who came to this chamber yesterday, except those few who were in on the secret, came to praise Newfoundland and not, we thought, to bury it in a wrangle over legality and procedure, with charges—which I do not think we need take too literally or too seriously—that we who favour union with Newfoundland, according to the procedure which the government have outlined, are thereby destroying our constitution.

I should have liked to participate in the welcome which we hoped would take place yesterday. That opportunity has disappeared, for the moment only I hope, because of the amendment which has been introduced by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I hesitate to intervene in the discussion which has been provoked by that amendment, a discussion which has been diverted into the favourite bypath of the leader of the opposition and those who sit with him. I hesitate even more because, to use the elegant language of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), I am a rookie in this chamber, though I am in pretty good company as a rookie. Not only that, but I am not even a legal rookie, Mr. Speaker. However, I do not think it is necessary to speak at any great length on the legal and constitutional aspect of this discussion because that was dealt with pretty effectively last night by hon. members who spoke on this side, more particularly the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), and by hon. members on the other side of the house.

However, I should like to reaffirm some points which have been made and to make one or two which I think are new. For instance, I should like to reaffirm the fact, which I think is beyond contradiction, that if this address is accepted and passed by this parliament not one line of the British North America Act will have been changed thereby. Nor do I think it necessary to deal at great length with the loud and vehement protestations, which were made last evening and this afternoon on the other side of the house, of undying devotion to principle and consistency. I think that was very effectively dealt with last night by hon. members on this side of the house and on the other side. It was pointed out that while some of the speakers of the official opposition dealt at length with the date 1925 and with the date 1946, they forgot the date 1943.

It has been said in criticism of the government that the procedure laid down in section 146 of the British North America Act is not being followed on this occasion. The government is being criticized for not following that procedure, and therefore I suggest, Mr. Speaker, we are entitled to draw from that criticism the conclusion that those who take that view would have followed the procedure laid down in that section.

As has been pointed out before, and I apologize for repeating it, that section provides, with respect to Newfoundland, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, that they may be admitted by the Queen. I quote:

> By and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable privy council.

That means the privy council of the United Kingdom; that is, by the action of United Kingdom ministers, not Canadian ministers. That procedure has not been followed for many years and, I suggest, will not be followed at any time in the future. Canada long since has made it impossible for any act affecting herself to be taken by the United Kingdom government except on advice received from Canada; and that of course is the way we wish it to be.

It was also pointed out last evening by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that section 146 of the British North America Act contemplated that Newfoundland would join the dominion only in accordance with the procedure set forth in that section. I am sure he is too good a lawyer—and I am not a lawyer at all—to believe that that is the proper interpretation to give to that section, which is not mandatory, not exclusive, but merely permissive in character. By its wording, that section does not exclude other methods of bringing Newfoundland into confederation. The reason why certain other methods have to be adopted on this occasion is not a Canadian reason. It is a reason which originated in the circumstances which are present in Newfoundland today.

However, I do not really think that those who have spoken in favour of the amendment can make very much out of the legal and constitutional argument. That does not mean —and this is why I feel it necessary to say a few words on this subject today—that if we vote against this amendment on this side, and on the other side of the house, we shall not be accused of being conspirators against the constitution, wreckers of provincial rights, centralists and all that kind of thing. That is the penalty we have to pay when we talk about a strong central federal Canadian government in the interests of Canadian unity and Canadian nationhood.

In the country today, and I am not referring to anything that has been said in this debate, there is I suggest a tendency, a very dangerous tendency in my view, to stir up the feeling that the provinces and the dominion are somehow and in some way hostile to each other; that the people of Canada as represented in this parliament are in some way different from the people of Canada as represented in the provincial parliaments; that there is, for instance, some inevitable conflict between my duty and loyalty as a resident of this province and my duty and loyalty as a Canadian. I suggest that there is great danger to national development in that trend and in that sort of talk. In this connection I should like to quote some very wise words which were uttered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in 1941, when he said:

> The time has come to start thinking as Canadians. Those who deliberately seek to arouse province against province, race against race are disloyal to Canada . . .

I am sure that there is no one in this house who will object to that sentiment or who will have anything but praise for it.

All Canadians are represented in this house; all Canadians have spokesmen in this house on all issues that come within the federal jurisdiction, as indeed this particular issue does. In connection with this matter they do not have to be represented in the legislature of Alberta or of Nova Scotia or of any other province. If any considerable section of the people of Canada object to what is being done in this parliament of Canada, on this issue of Newfoundland, they have an opportunity to express that objection through their representatives. The fact that there has been so little objection to the course that has been taken shows I am sure that the feeling of the country is almost unanimous in this important matter.

The discussion yesterday and today has ranged pretty far and wide over this general constitutional issue, over the whole question of the development and the meaning of the Canadian federal structure. There are two extreme views on this subject, both of which I suggest are most dangerous to our future development. There is the extreme centralist view which I hope none of us holds. That view has been embodied in words used by the leader of the opposition at another time. I think I should quote him because his words have already been put on Hansard and I think they are quite interesting and of some importance. He said in 1941:

> What we need greatly is to look at government from a business viewpoint, paralleling methods that a private business with a head office and nine branches would employ to promote more efficiency.

I suggest that that embodies the extreme centralist view. The other extreme view, which I think is equally dangerous to unity and progress in this country, is the view that the federal government must not be given sufficient power to permit Canadian progress and ensure Canadian unity. If I may say so, that was the view which was expressed by certain speakers in the Social Credit group, more particularly the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). That hon. member said last night in a very interesting speech that he felt that the powers of the provinces should be increased; that they should get enough money from the federal government to carry out their responsibilities, but that those responsibilities should be increased so that they would have control and power over such things as prices and markets.

I suggest that if we develop too far in that extreme it will be most difficult indeed to maintain the federal structure which is the basis of Canadian unity. I suggest that neither extreme view commands or deserves to command the support of any number of people in this country.

I should like to leave the legal and technical question for a moment and come to what is after all the crux of the question. It is simply this: When should the provinces of Canada be consulted in connection with action taken by the federal government? When is such consultation so desirable that it is in fact, if not in law, mandatory?

Such consultation is certainly not required under section 146 of the British North America Act in providing for union with Newfoundland, nor indeed is it required under a literal interpretation of our constitution in respect to any amendment of the British North America Act.

Last night the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) said—I hope I am quoting him accurately—that 1946 was the first breach in the constitutional procedure of amending the constitution of this country because on that occasion there was no consultation with the provinces. The facts as I understand them are that since 1867 there have been ten substantive amendments to the British North America Act—1871, 1875, 1886, 1907, 1915, 1916, 1930, 1940, 1943 and 1946.

In connection with only two of those amendments were the provinces consulted, in 1907 and 1940. The 1907 amendment had to do with the alteration of provincial subsidies and the 1940 amendment was designed to transfer authority for unemployment insurance from the provinces to the dominion. Those were clearly questions which affected provincial jurisdiction and provincial rights and there should be no question in our minds that consultation on those occasions was appropriate and desirable.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister permit a question? What about 1915, when British Columbia raised objections which were considered by the British parliament?

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry, I do not know the details of the 1915 amendment, but I do recall that in 1907 the government of British Columbia expressed disagreement with the proposed amendment in London; nevertheless the amendment was proceeded with. As I say, I am afraid I am not familiar with the details of the 1915 amendment.

The hon. member for Lake Centre said last night—again I hope I am quoting him correctly—that in the matter of amendment of our constitution consultation with the provinces is absolutely necessary. If it is absolutely necessary, such action has not been taken very often. Certainly there has not been a single case in our history when such consultation took place under a Conservative government.

I think the origin of this idea of consultation is to be found in the theory of the development of our federal structure which is referred to by constitutionalists as the compact theory or the treaty theory or the contract theory. The idea is that at the beginning of the Canadian nation, in 1865 to 1867, the provinces made a contract. They made a contract with whom? Of course not with the dominion government because it did not exist, and indeed not on behalf of all the provinces because they did not exist. At that time there was not even a province of Quebec or a province of Ontario, because they had been joined as the province of Canada. It is also well to remember that in 1865 to 1867 the compact, if you like, which was drawn up at that time in the Quebec resolutions, was itself changed in London before confederation became effective and without consultation with anybody in Canada. I agree however that, whatever may be the law, or indeed whatever may be the convention, of the compact theory of our federal structure, the rights of the provinces, and minority rights, which are not always exactly the same thing—they may be wider than provincial rights—must be protected and must not be changed without the consent of those affected by them.

Whatever may have been the legal situation in the far distant past, and the actions which may have been taken arising out of that situation, I do not believe there is anyone in the house today who would challenge that principle, and very few people in the country who would desire to challenge it. But having gone so far in the acceptance of the compact theory of confederation, and I think we should go so far, I suggest that if we go beyond that point we get into very great difficulties.

Mr. Hackett: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Hackett: Does he consider that the resolution before us contemplates an amendment to the British North America Act?

Mr. Pearson: The answer to that question is that I do not consider it means amendment of the British North America Act. My view on that point was explained last night at some length, and I thought with some effectiveness, by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). At this time I do not wish to repeat that argument. I was about to say that if you go beyond the interpretation of the compact theory in our constitution which I have given, you get into a very strange position indeed. If you insist on a narrow legal interpretation of contract as something which cannot be changed without the parties to the contract agreeing to it, you get into, for instance, the certain difficulties arising from the preamble of the British North America Act. Those difficulties were pointed out in 1942 by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in a very interesting statement which I should like to put on the record. It is taken from the Montreal Gazette of November 13, 1942, and reads as follows:

> Colonel Drew cited the preamble of the British North America Act, with its stipulated consideration that "such a union would promote the interests of the British empire."

That is from the preamble of the British North America Act. The article continues:

> And he made the points that every right claimed under that contract—

The contract being the British North America Act.

> —is dependent and contingent upon that condition.

That is the condition of the promotion of the interests of the British empire. I am sure the leader of the opposition would be the first to say that there was nothing sinister in that statement, and nothing beyond a normal observation on the contract theory and its possible implications. But it does show that if you take a theory and apply it literally and too deeply you will get into a very difficult constitutional position. For instance, it would mean that not one single change should be made in our constitutional structure without the consent of every province, because it would be unthinkable that the provinces should be discriminated against in this respect, and that one province should have a right which another province did not have. That in its turn would mean that a majority of the people in the smallest province would be given a right of veto over every constitutional change in the country. That would mean about 61,000 people. If that course were adopted, and that is the logical implication of the constitutional theory which has been advanced under the compact theory, it would mean we would be saddled with a constitutional strait-jacket in this country which would make any progress and development quite impossible.

Is there any possibility, however, of the application of that kind of ridiculous suggestion to the amendment which we have before us today? Could the amendment be applied in any such form as that? I do not know; I do not know exactly what the amendment means.

An hon. Member: It does not say.

Mr. Pearson: I do not know because there are certain expressions in it which are pretty vague, and the importance of which can only be understood when they are interpreted. For instance, the operative part of the amendment reads:

> Now therefore be it resolved, that the government of Canada be required to consult at once the governments of the several provinces and that upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultations a humble address be presented to His Majesty in the following words.

Therefore the first obligation under the amendment is the obligation of consultation with the provinces, an obligation which was not applied to the provinces when any other new province came into confederation, and which therefore might be considered by the people of Newfoundland not as an honour, as was suggested by a member last night, but almost as an affront. It would be subjecting them to a constitutional procedure which was not adopted in the case of any other province on its entrance into confederation.

But what is this obligation of consultation? What does it mean? Would it mean that the federal government would merely tell the provinces what we have done, and then after a decent interval go ahead and pass an address? Would it mean that we would consult the provinces with a view to securing from them their observations, their comments, after an examination of the terms of union? That, of course, is what consultation normally means. That would take a good many weeks, as those of us who have had to work on this problem for the last eighteen months must realize.

After the provinces had gone into the question, and after they had made up their minds as to what should be done in the matter, then presumably they would report their view back to the federal government. Then if they had any changes to suggest to the terms of union, which have already been passed by this house, presumably they would ask that those changes be made which would mean another conference between the representatives of Newfoundland and Canada. Then after that consultation the parliament of Canada would have to decide whether there had been a satisfactory conclusion of such consultation.

What would be a satisfactory conclusion? Would we ask each province whether the result of the consultation had been satisfactory to it, or would we come back to the House of Commons and ask the House of Commons to decide whether a satisfactory conclusion to the consultation had been reached? In the latter case, would we then decide to act on a majority of one, and if we acted on a majority of one how much better off would we be than we are now?

It has been suggested in the debate that a satisfactory conclusion might be two-thirds of the provinces agreeing to the terms of union. I would ask those opposed to the procedure suggested by the government if they would accept that as satisfactory. Are they willing to accept, as a satisfactory discharge of consultation with the provinces affected, that two-thirds of the provinces agree to the course proposed; or is it desirable that every single province should agree before we have a satisfactory conclusion to the consultation?

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Duplessis' view.

Mr. Pearson: It does show how difficult it would be for any member of the House of Commons to accept an amendment of this kind couched in these terms, with all the vague difficulties and dangers which may arise out of varying and contradictory interpretations. I also suggest that the debate has shown another thing which goes further than this particular amendment, and which has been referred to by other speakers in the discussion. It has pointed up and underlined the necessity for the working out in this country of some agreed method of reforming and amending our own constitution if such an amendment is required. If this debate has done nothing else but bring that nearer I think it will have served a useful purpose. If we are not able to agree among ourselves as to how that should be done, then we shall have endless and bitter argument over this very question of consultation, and what it means. We shall be adding fuel to the fire of those who are stirring up these conflicts of province against dominion, which will not only result in controversy and bitterness but indeed might result in ending all prospects of a strong, united Canada or in fact any Canada at all. No one in this house and no one in this country wants that result.

Just before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote once again from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), who has the great virtue of putting these things in strong, pungent and effective language. On January 1, 1939, when I think there was a provincial election in the offing, he said:

> I shall go to the country clearly on the stand that Ontario is Canadian, one province in a united Canada within the British empire. I advocate the strengthening of national ties and divesting the province of every conflicting authority not necessary for provincial purposes.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure whether I would go quite as far as that or use language quite as strong; but the idea and spirit behind that language, I suggest, are right and good. I agree, and I hope we all agree, that no greater issue confronts the Canadian people today than the reconciliation, in a federal state, of the rights of the provincial and federal governments in such a way that without weakening those provincial rights there will be in Canada that national unity without which there cannot be national strength, national freedom or national progress. Let us raise our country high above the level of its lesser citizens who would set province against dominion, race against race, class against class and creed against creed, and by doing so would debase the great destiny that faces this country of ours.

Mr. John T. Hackett (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, as one of those "lesser citizens"—guiltless of the crimes which were committed for six weeks in Nicolet-Yamaska—crimes against unity, crimes against decency—I dare raise my voice in this chamber.

Mr. Abbott: Nobody over there understood what was said in Nicolet-Yamaska.

Mr. Graydon: You're on the toboggan; that's what is the matter with you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order. I must ask hon. members to refrain from interrupting the hon. member who has the floor. This is a free forum and every hon.

member should be able to present his views without interruption. I want to appeal to hon. members themselves to support the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker and myself in trying to carry out the rules.

Mr. Hackett: For the last four years, Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to be the sole representative of my party elected from the province of Quebec.

Mr. Cruickshank: You will have that honour for a long time.

Mr. Hackett: However, the gods, with that bounty for which they are noted, brought me from Nicolet-Yamaska a little brother the other day, and ere long I hope he will join us on this side of the house and take his part in these debates.

I shall discuss briefly the question that is before us, or rather the questions that are raised by the government's resolution. Those questions appear to be twofold. I think everyone here desires the inclusion of Newfoundland in the Canadian confederation; I have not heard any opposition on that point. There is another point, however, which is under debate, and it is set out in the resolution in these terms:

> And whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom to confirm and give effect to the said agreement and the Senate and House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted an address to His Majesty praying that His Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose . . .

That is the substance of the resolution. An amendment has been offered. I have not the difficulty in interpreting or understanding the clear language of the amendment that has troubled some hon. gentlemen opposite. That amendment suggests that before this resolution is passed the provinces should be consulted. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what the resolution means, because we have varying interpretations from the government. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), supported by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), contends that the resolution does not anticipate an amendment to the constitution. Well, if it does not a great many people, including the government of Great Britain, are labouring under a very serious misapprehension. I do not believe the hon. gentleman who preceded me, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will dispute the fact that the constitution was amended in 1946 by a statute of the United Kingdom, which statute was enacted upon the prayer of this chamber and the other place. Is there any doubt that the constitution of Canada was amended in 1946 when the basis of representation in this house was changed? We find in that imperial statute these words:

[The Acting Speaker.]

> This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1946, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1943, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946.

I turn to the resolution, and I find that not only does it say it is an amendment to the British North America Act, but I find it is couched in identical terms. Listen to them:

> This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1949, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1949.

The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was asked if this resolution anticipated an amendment to the British North America Act. He answered quite candidly that it did not. You will find that question was put to him by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). It is recorded at page 521 of Hansard:

> Am I right in saying—and I am sure I am—that it is an amendment to the Canadian constitution?
> Mr. Garson: No.
> Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Who said no?
> Mr. Garson: The Minister of Justice.

Then, we turn to page 525 and find that when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) addressed the house he said this:

> But, sir, in no substantial or honest sense whatever can it be said that this is an amendment of the Canadian constitution.

There is the statement of the highest governmental authority that this is not an amendment to the constitution. I am well aware of the fact that the House of Commons is not the place in which a constitutional argument can be made with great benefit; yet I do feel this matter is of such importance it is well to have it cleared up once and for all. I submit that this is an amendment to the constitution and I submit, furthermore, that there can be no doubt about it because the act says so.

Let us go a little further. We find that article 146 of the British North America Act provides—what? It provides for the entry into confederation of two classes of territory, provinces which are self-governing, and secondly, unorganized territory within the dominion. What else do we find? We find a provision for the entry of each category in the following terms:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable privy council, on addresses from the houses of parliament of Canada, and from the houses of the respective legislatures of the colonies or provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia, to admit those colonies or provinces, or any of them, into the union—house and the Senate passed an address. The legislature of British Columbia passed an address, and an order in council by the British government gave sanction and effect to that understanding. The same thing happened when Prince Edward Island came into confederation; and, with a slight variation in procedure, the same thing happened when Rupert's Land was incorporated.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I now open a parenthesis. I am mildly astonished when a gentleman holding the responsible office of the last speaker, the minister of external affairs, refers in light terms to legality and legal quibbles when speaking of a thing so sacred as the constitution; of the instrument which makes secure our liberty and freedom of conscience, and which guarantees us the type of life of which we are proud and which the whole world envies. You must remember that this constitution provides a method for taking into this dominion certain areas. It prescribes certain conditions which must exist before those areas can come into confederation. It says that the colony of Newfoundland must pass an address or a resolution by its legislature before it can meet the requirements of the statute.

Let us be quite certain about this matter. This is not our statute; this is a statute of Great Britain. This is the statute enacted by the imperial parliament, the body in which the residuary powers of that island now abide, since their suspension, on the island's request, in 1930 or 1933. Who is it that says it has not the power to deal with this matter? Is it Newfoundland? Is it Canada? No. It is Great Britain that says this statute does not permit the king and his honourable privy council to ratify this agreement, be it good, bad or indifferent. The statute does not permit the ratification of this agreement between Canada and Newfoundland, because one of the conditions precedent, one of the elementary conditions, is lacking, and that is the will of the people of Newfoundland expressed through a duly elected legislature. That is the opinion of the law officers of Great Britain, Mr. Speaker, not of this House of Commons. The government of Great Britain says that under a particular statute the power is lacking to incorporate Newfoundland into the Canadian confederation by order in council. They have not got the power. Then, it is said by Great Britain, the statute must be amended. When the hon. Minister of Justice says that no amendment to the British North America Act is contemplated, he is in error. All I can say is, he cannot have read section 146 of the British North America Act. He should do penance for the omission and make excuses to the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson).

Let us go one step further. The statute has to be amended because there is not the power in the British government to act, owing to the fact that the conditions precedent have not been met. Just by chance, it happens that the statute to be amended is the Canadian constitution. For the moment, I sweep aside the Statute of Westminster and I bring the matter down to a very simple question of fact.

With all of the care and with all of the interest that any statement on legal matters from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) always provokes in me, I have read the argument advanced by him. I know he says that the people of Canada, whether they live in Prince Edward Island or in British Columbia, are represented by their duly elected members in this house. I know that he says, and I am quoting what he said in 1946 as reported at page 1936 of Hansard of that year:

> . . . that there was an assembly of distinguished gentlemen representing in the conferences four colonial legislatures, legislatures which legislated by delegation of the parliament of the United Kingdom . . .

—and that there is no need to consult the provinces. I do not wish to be offensive. The Prime Minister knows that. I admire his advocacy and his subtlety; but I doubt the worth and the actuality of his argument. It is said, and I think it is admitted, that no confederation could have taken place had Quebec not been in agreement. I think that is admitted. Confederation could not have happened unless the delegation from Quebec consented to enter the pact. I will ask my right hon. friend what he thinks the verdict would have been had he stood before a jury composed of Cartier, Cauchon, Chapais, Dorion, Langevin and Taché, and a score of others, and said to them that the conditions upon which they were to enter confederation could be changed at any time that a mere majority of this house and of the Senate asked the British parliament to do it.

I apply to his argument that homely test. I do not think that many here who know the spirit of men like Dorion, and others of that valiant host that took part in those debates, will dare to assert for one instant that, had it ever been suggested to them that our constitution could be amended by the British parliament upon the request of a mere majority of these two houses, that they would have agreed to enter confederation. By applying that test, I think some doubt must be cast upon the validity of the Prime Minister's argument.

Mr. Claxton: It has just been done fifteen times.

Mr. Hackett: Has the hon. gentleman a question to ask?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. I asked if it has not just been done fifteen times.

Mr. Hackett: It has been done rather frequently of late, and I will tell hon. members why. It was done in 1946 when there was no reason to do it. I was as anxious as any man sitting in this house to see full justice done to my province, which had suffered in its representation. But to achieve that purpose it was not necessary to enact an amendment to the British North America Act any more than it was necessary here had it not been for the muddle which now exists in relation to this matter.

I would go a little further. The Prime Minister has told the country, if not the house, that it is the intention of the government to devise some means whereby the constitution may be amended. The fact is that there is no statutory method of amending the constitution. The constitution, whether it be called a pact, a contract or an agreement, was the result of men getting together and coming to an understanding; and that understanding must persist until parties thereto consent to its dissolution. Otherwise, those who break it will be guilty of breach of faith. May I summon to the support of this thesis the following authority:

> The constitution of a country being once settled upon some compact, tacit or expressed, there is no power existing of force to alter it without breach of the covenant or the consent of all the parties.

That statement is from Edmund Burke; it embodies a principle that is fundamental to the civil law of Quebec as well as to the common law of every other province. It is as old as good faith. A contract is binding upon the parties until they are released therefrom.

Why all these amendments to the constitution? I had been wondering about that matter until the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had the kindness to tell us the answer the other evening, and I refer to his remarks as reported in Hansard of February 2. In substance this is what the minister said: The Rowell-Sirois report did not find favour with the provinces; we tried to get it through in 1941 and failed, but we did get it into operation as a result of the war. We all know what has been the effect upon the provinces of the Rowell-Sirois report, for that is name given by the minister to the war agreements between the dominion and the provinces. In good faith the provinces yielded up their taxing powers to the dominion and much of their autonomy for the period of the war; and although the war is now nearly four years in the background, the provinces are still deprived of their prerogatives; their rights have not yet been returned. Knowing that the provinces will not consent to the suggestions found in the Rowell-Sirois report—and there is much that is good in it, but there is also a great deal that is not free from criticism—I am wondering whether we are making these continuous amendments to the British North America Act with a view to formulating a tradition that the British North America Act may be amended by a mere parliamentary majority for the purpose of enacting and enforcing the Rowell-Sirois report. If that be true, I would say to hon. gentlemen opposite who come from my province that they would do well to consider carefully how their vote should be cast upon this matter.

There are two matters involved here. One is the admission of Newfoundland. We are all anxious that that island, which stands as a sentinel on our eastern coast, and its hardy, laborious and God-fearing people, should take their place in confederation. The other question involved is the rape of the Canadian constitution. Much as I desire the advent of the Newfoundlanders, greatly as I would welcome them into the house, I hope that it will not be necessary, as a result, to see the constitution damaged and belittled in this popular assembly.

Some hon. gentlemen appear to be under a complete delusion as to what the situation is. This afternoon I listened to agreeable gentlemen who told us what had happened in Newfoundland. The facts are not very complicated. Newfoundland had a debt and the interest used to come due now and then. At a certain time Newfoundland asked Great Britain to take over its liabilities. It was a condition of the surrender of responsible government that Britain assumed the debts of Newfoundland, and set up a form of government which was not representative. Great Britain, by statute, set up what was called a special commission of government comprised of a governor named by Britain and six commissioners named by Britain, three of whom came from the island and three from Great Britain. The statute said that this form of government would be vested with full legislative power and executive authority. It set forth the modus operandi and enacted that it would remain in operation until Newfoundland was able to assume its financial burdens again.

The British North America Act provides no statutory method for amendment, and in this other British statute no means was provided whereby Newfoundland might regain its status as a self-governing colony. In the debates of the British House of Commons of December 11, 1945, I find that the Prime Minister set forth what the government's intentions were in this regard. He said that a body was to be set up for this purpose:

> To consider and discuss amongst themselves, as elected representatives of the Newfoundland people, the changes that have taken place in the financial and economic situation of the island since 1934, and bearing in mind the extent to which the high revenues of recent years have been due to wartime conditions, to examine the position of the country and to make recommendations to His Majesty's government as to possible forms of future government to be put before the people at a national referendum.

That was the authority for the enactment by the commission of government in Newfoundland of what we would call an order in council, which provided for the election of 45 members to constitute a convention to investigate the situation in Newfoundland and report on what form of government Newfoundland wanted. The convention went far beyond that, and after two popular votes and a majority had said that they wanted to become united with Canada, the convention, instead of reporting to Great Britain, which would then have found a proper way to carry out the intent within the terms of the statute which happens to be our British North America Act, sent delegates to Canada to enter into negotiations. For the moment I am not going to discuss the negotiations; I am not going to discuss what Newfoundland did, and I am not going to discuss the power or the authority of the Newfoundlanders to do what they did; but the result is that a situation has been created, with the co-operation and collaboration of the Canadian government, which makes it impossible to bring Newfoundland into confederation without an amendment to the British North America Act.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hackett: Mr. Speaker, I trust I am not unduly optimistic if I express the hope that even the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will now assent to the fact that we are dealing with a request for an amendment to the constitution. Apparently everybody believes that we are dealing with an amendment to the constitution, except the Minister of Justice and his disciple, the minister of external affairs. I hope that after mature consideration they will be able to rally to the point of view of the British government.

There is another aspect to the question. Hon. gentlemen opposite have dealt in light terms with what they have called matters of form and technicalities. I think I mentioned before adjournment that the convention in Newfoundland had very limited powers of inquiry. Their sole duty was to inquire and report; they had no power to negotiate. Then, it may be said, that does not concern this house. But unfortunately it does concern this house because—if they had no power to negotiate and were not a legislature—the government of Great Britain had not the power under the statute to issue the necessary order in council to bring Newfoundland into confederation. If one wished to be facetious one could say that the habit of writing orders in council in this zone has become so deeply inculcated in the manners of the Canadian government that the possibility of any restriction upon that practice is difficult for hon. gentlemen to conceive.

However, it was found in Great Britain that under the statute the British government could not write an order in council admitting Newfoundland into the dominion because the statute does not give them that power. Hence the statute must be amended and the amendment of that statute, it being the British North America Act and our constitution, does affect us.

I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that the great majority of those who come from my province have preached, and I think many of them have believed, that there was something in the nature of an agreement at the time of confederation. They believed that they had entered into some kind of compact, some kind of understanding which gave them something more abiding, which conferred greater surety than does the volatile wish of a body which is under a party lash.

What are those hon. gentlemen going to say when they go back to their constituents? —because this matter will be taken into the constituencies. What are they going to say when they are asked if confederation was a compact, if it has any abiding significance? Are they going to say that they cast in their lot with those who held that Great Britain must amend the Canadian constitution at the mere request of a party vote in the two legislative halls of this parliament?

What are they going to answer when their electors say to them: Is it true, Mr. Member, that you stood in your place and were counted as being in favour of the proposition that the constitution can be amended merely because the parliament of Great Britain has been asked by the narrowest parliamentary majority to amend that constitution? What are they going to say when their constituents remind them that possibly at some time in the not altogether remote future the government which now holds office may pass from the scene and be replaced by another—I do not know by whom. I do know however that my party is full of understanding, and it appreciates the origin and genesis of our constitution and the spirit of our people. The people of Quebec need have no fear of it. But supposing by chance there happens in Canada what has happened in numerous countries throughout the world today; suppose that the seats of the mighty in the legislature are occupied by men who are hostile to minorities, who are hostile to Christianity, who are hostile to civilization and decency as you and I know it, Mr. Speaker?

Their electors will say: So, you made it possible, by creating a number of precedents passed by the narrowest of party majorities of those sitting in the seats of government, to deny us those things for which we have battled and stood from the day that our forefathers put their feet on Canadian soil. Hon. members can tell their electors of the very able arguments of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), but again I ask them: What will they say when they are asked what would have been the verdict if that argument had been presented to a jury composed of Cartier, Cauchon, Chapais, Dorion, Langevin, Taché and others whose names elude me at the moment? I think my hon. friends opposite who find it in their hearts to support this resolution and defeat the amendment will have to answer these critical and crucial questions.

A great deal has been said about the insignificance—the word is mine and if anybody does not like it I will use another—of the provinces. The provinces have a great role to play in the life of our country. We rely upon them for a large measure of the protection which is necessary to the life of a contented people. These separate centres of political action in this country are the very basis of our confederation and of the contented and orderly life of our people.

In conclusion I therefore adjure the members of this house to consider very carefully their conduct before they make of the constitution of Canada the plaything of a very temporary and possibly vanishing governmental majority.

(Translation):

Mr. J. A. Dion (Lake St. John-Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in the present debate, but following the challenge of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) I feel compelled to reply. He asked us what we would tell our constituents in the province of Quebec when questioned about the way we proceeded regarding the annexation of Newfoundland. Here is what I intend to say to them: First, that a bill regarding Newfoundland was submitted to the house, where it was debated, and that the hon. members opposite did not deem it advisable to oppose it in the first place. However, having suddenly discovered that it entailed a constitutional matter about which they should protest vehemently, the debate having ended, they submitted a motion with the intention of stirring up a new debate. I shall also tell my electors that, according to section 146 of the British North America Act, the Canadian government had all the required authority, granted by the fathers of confederation, to accept Newfoundland and annex it as a province, having had that right since 1867. I shall also tell them that the amendment of my hon. friends opposite amounts to saying that they want consultation with the various provinces in order to ask them what Newfoundland should have done in this instance.

The hon. member for Stanstead is an eminent lawyer, since he is president of the Canadian Bar Association. Therefore, whenever a procedure is referred to him, he must, by force of habit, investigate it to find out whether it applies and is likely to give practical results. In fact, whenever a petition similar to the amendment now under consideration is submitted to a lawyer, he must move for details and particulars; he must certainly require information to find out what is involved and how the petition applies.

The hon. members who were in the house this afternoon realized that the Minister for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) proved peremptorily and rather amusingly that the amendment moved by the Progressive Conservatives had neither rhyme nor reason.

Indeed, the real purpose is not to discuss Newfoundland's union with Canada, nor to consider on its merits the constitutional aspect of the matter, but simply to keep on playing the game of political football begun a few months ago between Ottawa, Quebec and Ontario. That is the only purpose, and this is so true that the remarks of the hon. members of the opposition bear no relation to the wording of the amendment itself. As a matter of fact, the wording of the amendment refers only to "consultation" of the provinces, while the word "consent" constantly recurs in the remarks of the hon. members. Of course, it is an altogether different matter, as the hon. member for Stanstead pointed out. Indeed, when a client comes to your office for a consultation, he is given what amounts merely to an opinion, which places him under no obligation of any sort. That is what is required by the amendment. On the other hand, I do know that when a partner or colleague seeks my consent, it is not the same thing at all. He is requesting a permission without which he is unable to act.

If, in your speeches, you ask for consent, why not require it in your amendment? This is not at all what this amendment calls for. You are calling for a consultation.

You should first agree on what you want. Then we could talk it over.

Now, as to the theory of the confederation agreement or that of the statute, our opponents tell us they want to put up a fence and set on one side of the fence those who favour confederation, and on the other side those who favour adherence to the statute. We are not concerned now, I think, with defending an opponent or a bitter enemy of confederation. We are merely speaking of those who favour confederation and of those who swear by the statute. The statute merely followed the agreement; the wording of the British North America Act is simply that of the confederation agreement.

Now, may I ask you one thing? If we are to abide by the principle of the confederation agreement, should we consult only the four provinces that existed at the time of the initial pact, since the others had not yet entered? Everyone knows where that would lead us. Or should we consult all the provinces? This might bring about rather amusing results. On this point, I should like to quote what was said by the member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Hamel), on June 26, 1946, during the debate on redistribution. An amendment which was almost identical to the one now under consideration was then before the house. Submitted by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), it was worded as follows:

> Be it resolved that the government be required to consult at once the several provinces and upon satisfactory conclusion of such consultations be authorized to present an humble address . . .

It almost seems as though the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) framed his amendment in the exact terms used in 1946 by the hon. member for Lake Centre. The member for St. Maurice-Laflèche continued:

> If it is accepted, the dominion government will have to enter into consultations with the provinces. This gives rise to countless difficulties that are wellnigh insoluble in the present state of our legislation. In what manner will such consultations with the provinces be carried out? Will the provincial prime ministers themselves be asked to express the desire of their respective legislatures, or will the latter be called upon, in a regular or special session, to express their views through a resolution? No one has told us and the matter has not been provided for.

Indeed, there is absolutely nothing in the constitution to this effect and the hon. members opposite have found no such provision. The hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche continues:

> However, let us suppose that an appropriate method of consultation is agreed upon. The problem will then in no way be solved. For the amendment continues: "and upon satisfactory conclusion of such consultations." Who will decide whether the result is satisfactory or not, and on what basis will a decision be reached in that connection? Those are two more questions that remain unanswered. To my mind, it is obvious that the proposed redistribution will abolish certain unjustified privileges as regards representation in the House of Commons.

The hon. member was referring here to redistribution.

As I was saying, this has been shown conclusively and rather amusingly by the minister of external affairs (Mr. Pearson), and we are now told that the consent of the provinces is necessary.

This afternoon, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) said that the premier of Quebec had protested in that regard.

If I am not mistaken, the premier of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis, has merely said that they had not been courteous enough to consult him. He did not claim a right, he simply wanted courtesy, and we all know to what extent Mr. Duplessis is versed in matters of courtesy.

I shall now deal with the assertion which the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) made this afternoon about the cost which the admission of Newfoundland into the confederation is going to entail.

Of course, it will cost something, but I find it strange that the very same people who, on the occasion of the privy council's award, gave part of Labrador to Newfoundland, protested at that time because immeasurable wealth which was included within the territory of Quebec had been made part of Newfoundland's territory.

Those people are the very same who today feel that the boundless and immeasurable wealth which then existed is not worth the price they are being asked to pay.

Mr. Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Would the hon. member allow me to ask a question?

Mr. Dion (Lake St. John-Roberval): Surely.

Mr. Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I understand that the hon. member is referring to what I said this afternoon, but when he adds that people protested against the privy council's award, is he referring to a stand I would have taken or to an expression of opinion on my part?

Mr. Dion (Lake St. John-Roberval): No, I am not referring to him personally but I think that people of the very school of thought to which I believe the hon. member belongs have voiced that opinion.

Mr. Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I am responsible for my own actions, not for those of others.

Mr. Dion (Lake St. John-Roberval): Now that I am talking about this question regarding which I have read the expression of divergent views I must say that the hon. member does not agree at all with his friends from Le Devoir, because not later than two or three days ago, I read an article by Mr. Sauriol in which he said he accepted the entry of Newfoundland into confederation, that it was a good thing for Canada, technically and geographically speaking.

That on which they disagreed was the procedure to follow. I quite understand that there can be differences of opinion on this point. It is understandable and I am not shocked at all.

Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak at length. I believe I have shown that all these points raised at the last moment are not designed to establish whether Newfoundland should be admitted into confederation, in accordance with section 146 of the British North America Act, whether we are seeking an amendment to the constitution, or whether we are violating certain parts of the act, but solely to establish, as I previously pointed out, whether we should carry on that game of political football begun quite some time ago.

As far as I am concerned, I feel we should stick to the point. It is unfortunate that all these questions raised in the house become strictly constitutional matters.

True, their constitution has its importance; it should be respected. I for one wish that we may soon have an autonomous Canadian body empowered to amend our constitution without having to make a humiliating pilgrimage to London, as we are now compelled to do.

In that connection, I take the opportunity of congratulating the Prime Minister on the announcement he made last week over the radio. In the meantime, we cannot by ourselves amend our constitution. We have no choice, so we must act as we do, no matter how unpleasant the procedure may be to us. I hope that before long all Canadians, those from the provinces and those from the dominion—in fact they are the same persons—imbued with a true Canadian spirit will be fond of their province because it is a part of Canada. They will work towards mutual understanding between the various provinces, placing common interests above petty electoral practices, in order to have a constitution which will guarantee full and complete justice to each and every one.

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I feel duty bound to make a few remarks in connection with this debate.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I have no doubt whatever about the sincerity of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in his statement on the matter. He expressed his opinion frankly and directly, in his usual straightforward manner.

Unfortunately I am unable to say as much of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), especially after reading some past statements of his, as reported by the Globe and Mail of September 8, 1939. I quote:

> We have strayed from the road traced by the fathers of confederation. The powerful central government that the provinces have sought to establish is shackled by petty politics. The constitutional difficulties which prevent adoption of urgently needed efficient social legislation, could be overcome without waiting for an amendment to the British North America Act.

And at Fort William, on January 26, 1939, the leader of the opposition said:

> I favour the strengthening of national ties and the removal from the provinces of all powers inconsistent with those of the federal government, not required by the provincial administration.

Such was the frame of mind of the hon. member before he became leader of the opposition. Let us see what has been his change of attitude since becoming leader of the opposition. After reading carefully the amendment he submitted to the house, one readily sees that he maintains his centralizing policy, that he wishes the people of Quebec to believe that he is opposed to centralization and favours provincial autonomy. At the same time he reserves the right to maintain his centralizing attitude—which has characterized his whole political life—should he ever assume power and become leader of our government.

He submitted the following amendment to the house. I quote: "And whereas it is desirable that the government of Canada should consult with the governments of the several provinces in respect to the said matter; now therefore be it resolved that the government of Canada be required to consult at once the governments of the several provinces and that upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultations 'a humble address be presented to His Majesty in the following words':"

"And upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultations". Who will decide whether the consultations are satisfactory? No one. The resolution does not say.

He leaves himself a way out. He shows or rather tries to show the province of Quebec that he is against centralization and for autonomy, but if ever he should come to power, and be criticized for amending the constitution, he will simply reply: "I consulted the provinces and in my opinion these consultations came to a satisfactory conclusion".

Such will be the attitude of the leader of the opposition in the future.

Had he been sincere, had he intended to stand by what he said in his speeches, the amendment he submitted would have included the words: "with the consent of the provinces". That is entirely different from the expression "satisfactory conclusion of consultations".

Instead, he tried to raise an iron curtain between himself and his future political life. This is the attitude of a man lacking in sincerity because, from the political standpoint, this amendment, for sheer hypocrisy, tops any other ever introduced in the house. Nor can I accept the contention of all the speakers who interpreted "satisfactory conclusion" as meaning "consent" of the provinces. Such was the inference made this afternoon by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). He tried to create . . .

(Text):

Mr. Hackett: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman has put into my mouth words I did not utter, and I ask him to withdraw them.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

(Translation):

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Speaker, I feel that under the circumstances . . .

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) has just complained to the chair that the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) has uttered certain words—

Mr. LaCroix: What are the words which the hon. member does not like?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member kindly mention the words the hon. gentleman has used, and which the hon. member says he did not utter?

Mr. Hackett: The hon. gentleman has put into my mouth—

(Translation):

Mr. LaCroix: What expression of mine did the hon. member find offensive?

(Text):

Mr. Hackett: The hon. gentleman has said that I used the word "consent" in referring to the provinces.

Mr. Brunelle: Not that you used it.

(Translation):

Mr. LaCroix: Would the hon. member have any objection to speaking in French? I do not understand what he says.

(Text):

Mr. Hackett: I am not going to be questioned.

(Translation):

Mr. LaCroix: May I, in turn, direct a question to the hon. member? Since he represents a Quebec French-Canadian constituency—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. LaCroix: Since he represents a Quebec French-Canadian constituency, could he repeat in French what he has just said in English?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would suggest to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) that if he did not use the word "consent", he might mention the word he did use so that the hon. member will understand what word he should use.

Mr. Hackett: I have merely stated, Mr. Speaker, that I did not use that word with reference to the provinces. I thought the hon. gentleman would be glad to know that so that he would not be proceeding on a basis which was not founded on fact. I have drawn it to your attention. I thought the hon. gentleman would be glad to know it.

(Translation):

Mr. Hartt: You did not quote his words; you expressed an opinion.

Mr. LaCroix: However that may be, Mr. Speaker, I wish to give the hon. member an opportunity to show whether he is or is not in favour of the word "consenting", because I shall have the honour to move an amendment to the amendment . . .

(Text):

Mr. Hackett: Mr. Speaker, I must ask for a ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member should insist upon the word being withdrawn. If the hon. member, during the course of his remarks, said that the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) used the word "consent" when the hon. member for Stanstead did not use that word, I am sure the hon. member who has the floor will make a correction.

(Translation):

Mr. LaCroix: I was under the impression that the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) had used the word "consent".

Mr. Hackett: I am not complaining at all about that.

Mr. LaCroix: Then the matter is settled.

Mr. Hackett: If a false impression was given, I am not to blame. False impressions crop up everywhere.

Mr. Gagnon: Quite true.

Mr. LaCroix: Besides, it squares with Progressive Conservative policies.

Mr. Lesage: It is consistent with Progressive Conservative policies to leave people everywhere under a false impression.

Mr. Gagnon: They did not give a false impression in Nicolet.

Mr. LaCroix: I am speaking to the Progressive Conservatives. It looks to me as if the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) belongs to that group.

Mr. Langlois: That we know.

Mr. Gagnon: Any group rather than that of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency.

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted, at this stage of my remarks, to move, seconded by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot):

That the words "after they will have given their consent" be substituted for the words "upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultation" in the last paragraph of the amendment.

[Mr. Hackett.]

Mr. Speaker: Mr. LaCroix moves, seconded by Mr. Pouliot:

That the words "after they will have given their consent" be substituted for the words "upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultation" in the last paragraph of the amendment.

Mr. Low: Could you translate it into English please?

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Speaker, I cannot admit either . . .

(Text):

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, could we have that amendment translated into English so that we can all understand it?

Mr. Speaker: I will have the translation made in a few moments, at which time it will be repeated to the house.

(Translation):

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Speaker, I cannot share, either, the view expounded by the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) who holds that whenever a national issue is involved we are entitled to change the constitution without consulting the provinces.

The adoption of this view would lead us very far indeed. There is no telling what we would see if the C.C.F. party, to our great misfortune, ever came to power. This would be true especially of a minority like ours which seeks to conserve its French and Catholic traditions, on the banks of the great and beautiful river which bears the Prime Minister's name, and which considers itself, and rightly so, as the last outpost of French thought and culture on the North American continent.

I do not share the opinion of those who claim that the province of Quebec need not be consulted with regard to the annexation of Newfoundland.

The province of Quebec has too many interests in this respect to allow itself to be totally neglected. What about the borders between Labrador and Quebec, which are not yet clearly defined? That is a question of vital interest to my province, because of the great natural resources which lie in that part of the country.

We must also consider the fact that Great Britain deprived Quebec, by means of an award by the privy council, of all that part of my province which is called Labrador, which I still consider part of the province of Quebec, but this was done by England in order to confer an asset upon Newfoundland in anticipation of her future negotiations concerning union with Canada.

In view of the violent attacks of the C.C.F. party, which favours extreme centralization, and of the fact that Quebec is deeply concerned over the question of natural resources, and because of my own convictions, after the hon. member for Temiscouata showed yesterday that it was possible to wait until such consultation had been effected and the necessary consent obtained, I believe it is my duty to maintain in this house the attitude I have always held: that of stoutly defending the rights of Quebec and the respecting of its prerogatives and privileges.

I must add, however, that I will not vote in favour of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition. I consider it to be lacking in sincerity and like a man who would arrange a way out so as to apply—if he should ever become leader of the government—the policy of centralization he advocated on September 8 and January 26, 1939, and which is not likely to reassure Quebec.

Therefore I state my proposal very plainly and clearly. If the Progressive Conservative party will accept my amendment to the amendment, I shall support their amendment, but if they reject my own, I submit that theirs will forever go down in parliamentary history as an act of hypocrisy.

(Text):

Mr. Ralph Maybank (Winnipeg South Centre): I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, that I am not able to follow the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. Always, when I hear members from Quebec speaking in the tongue that is most familiar to them, I am envious. But, when I find them also conducting a quarrel with a non-French member of the house who is, himself, blessed with a knowledge of "the twa tongues" my envy is still greater. I am unable to make any examination of the remarks the hon. gentleman has made, but perhaps that is just as well because, in the limited time at my disposal, what I really desire to do is to consider the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition.

What I should like to do before this debate comes to a close is to examine what I think is a superficially clever manoeuvre by the Tory party, and just see where we would get if we followed the procedure which the hon. leader of the Tory party has offered to this house. As a matter of fact, sir, I submit to you and to the members of this house that the amendment of the Tory leader shows something very important. It shows that he and all of his supporters are either inane or insincere. That is the proposition I put to the house at the present time with reference to the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Maybank: We observe that the claque clacks quite quickly.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Maybank: The Tory leader has been well served by his claque and probably will continue to be served well by them. We will find members of it moving from place to place and calling out remarks.

Mr. Miller: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, or on a question of privilege, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) has been in this house a good deal longer than some of the rest of us and he knows full well that when he refers to the leader of our party, or he should know—

Mr. Bryce: Why do you boys not go back to Manitoba where you can agree?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would suggest to the hon. member who has risen on a point of order or a question of privilege, that he state his point of order or question of privilege.

Mr. Miller: The hon. member has been referring to the leader of our party as the leader of the Tory party. I maintain that, according to the custom of this house, he should be referred to as the hon. leader of the opposition.

An hon. Member: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Maybank: Mr. Speaker, there have been a great many silly emanations from the opposite side of the house, but I think perhaps that takes the cake.

An hon. Member: Extremely clever.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Maybank: I had remarked on the proposition that this amendment which is before us shows either inanity or insincerity, and it is difficult for an impartial observer to decide which of those terms is the right one to apply. One's love for his fellow men, particularly some of those who are calling out foolishly from time to time, would naturally incline him against believing that there is so great insincerity among them as their amendment seems to disclose. But when you consider the procedure that is offered us, it is extremely difficult to believe that these gentlemen and the leader of these gentlemen can actually be so foolish as this proposal shows them to be. Well, I have to say I do not know which description applies to them; that is, whether they are foolish or insincere.

But perhaps what this amendment says should be examined in the light of the record that we have before us; and I should like, just briefly, to set forth that record. Last week all of these gentlemen were indicating, by their various speeches, that just as soon as possible—and certainly by March 31—they wanted to get the commonwealth, shall I say, of Newfoundland into the confederation known as Canada. And tonight they would claim they still propose to do just that same thing, but by the method and in the manner indicated in their amendment. Bear in mind that whatever must be done is to be done by March 31.

Take a quick glance at the record thus far. The government of the day has negotiated with representatives of Newfoundland an agreement under which Newfoundland will enter the Canadian confederation and become the tenth province. The government comes to this House of Commons and recommends that agreement. All last week we in this chamber debated the terms of union. Speeches were made by Conservatives as well as others; and without exception the right hand of Canadian brotherhood was extended to the people of Newfoundland. There was no indication last week that any of these expressions of good will were not genuine. The Tories seemed to be sincere. If they had a dagger for the agreement, they had it well hidden beneath their cloaks. Yes, it looked as if they wanted Newfoundland to come in. No person put forward any objection to the terms which were proposed and which were settled in this agreement.

All that time, it was understood by every person that every step must be completed by March 31. March 31 was actually to be the date of Newfoundland's crossing the threshold into the house of Canadian confederation. On the basis of last week's debate, not merely every person in this house but every person across Canada and every person in Newfoundland must have felt that the entry of Newfoundland into confederation, on the terms which had been worked out in the agreement, was acceptable all round; indeed, that it was warmly welcomed by all parties and by practically every member in the house. It is important that all people should know that when the debate was going on last week, each member in this chamber, and every Tory who spoke, particularly the Tory leader, knew quite well what the next stage in these proceedings was to be.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention at all of interrupting the irresponsible statements of this hon. member.

An hon. Member: You cannot take it.

Mr. Drew: I point out, however, that the motion to forward this act to the government of the United Kingdom—

Mr. Brunelle: What is this? Is it a point of order?

Mr. Drew: —was not placed on the order paper until Thursday, and at that time the debate on second reading had been fully before this house.

[Mr. Maybank.]

Mr. Maybank: Mr. Speaker, the statement the hon. gentleman has made is not true. You will bear in mind that I have not attacked his veracity.

Mr. Jackman: It does not make any difference. Retract it.

Mr. Maybank: I will prove it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I rise—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: I ask that the member withdraw that statement.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to bear in mind that the member who has the floor should not be interrupted without his permission. If an hon. member wishes to rise to a question of privilege, it is his right to do so. But he should state what his question of privilege is.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on the formality of a question of privilege, I ask your ruling as to whether in this house it is proper for a member to say that a statement made by another member is not true.

Mr. Abbott: It is a question of fact.

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest that the hon. member modify his expression.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Abbott: It is a statement of fact.

Mr. Maybank: Hon. gentlemen who call out "withdraw" and who would not be satisfied with a modification of what I have said need not disturb themselves. My intentions are quite different from any diluting of anything that I have thus far said. I wish to deal—

Mr. Jackman: Withdraw.

Mr. Maybank: I wish to deal for just a moment with this question of order. There is no occasion for me to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will not stand for the reflection which has just been made by an hon. member to my left, if I understood him correctly. He said that I am tolerating something from one side of the house that I would not from the other. I would ask hon. members to be generous enough to listen to the hon. member who has the floor. Actually some hon. members have asked me to be very severe with the hon. member who has the floor. If I had been as severe yesterday as some members suggest I should be today I would have asked many hon. members to withdraw what they had said.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I have every respect for your ruling, and I think other hon. members should have respect for it as well. You have asked the hon. member to at least modify his statement. He deliberately rose in his place and said he would not dilute it.

Mr. Maybank: That is quite right. The hon. gentleman has given the statement exactly as I made it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member who has the floor will be pleased to modify the expression which he has used.

Mr. Maybank: Mr. Speaker, with all respect to you, I must say that there is no occasion for modification unless I should fail to prove that which I have said; but if I should fail to prove it to the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman opposite then I would not merely modify it, I would withdraw it and apologize.

Mr. Rowe: Again I rise to a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again I ask the hon. member to modify his expression, and I hope I shall not be obliged to rise again and ask him to do so.

Mr. Maybank: Mr. Speaker, I just do not know where to start to endeavour to meet your wishes.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Maybank: One thing is certain. You can see, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Rowe: It is an order from the chair.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Maybank: You can see that they do not wish to give any person an opportunity even to follow up your suggestion, sir. Let us see what I said to which they object. What I said was that the statement which the hon. gentleman leading the Tory party said was not true; and I quickly said that it was not his veracity I was attacking. That is the statement I made to which objection is taken. Perhaps I had better start at the beginning and say what I said. I said, "the statement is not true." I will withdraw that statement.

Mr. Jackman: Hear, hear.

Mr. Maybank: How would that be?

Mr. Rowe: That would be fine.

Mr. Maybank: Let us see whether the hon. gentlemen themselves will not say in just a moment that the statement which their leader made was not true. Let us see if that is not so. I will ask any hon. member to look up the Votes and Proceedings. If he does that he will find, in the Votes and Proceedings of Tuesday and not Thursday, the motion which we are debating at the present time. Look it up for yourselves. You know, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen might as well learn that it is always difficult to be a player and an umpire at the same time.

Mr. Rowe: You have just found that out.

Mr. Maybank: However, I will put it to them. They can be the umpires. All they have to do is to look at the papers which they have on their own desks, and they will find the motion there on Tuesday, not Thursday.

Just to reply a little further to what the leader of the opposition said, I should like to make this comment, sir, since all this pother has arisen. Even if I had been wrong, it did not constitute a point of order. He has the opportunity later on to make a speech and show that I was wrong.

An hon. Member: Read the rules.

Mr. Maybank: He has to pop up like a jumping jack. If he does not do a great deal of jumping then some of the members around him will not imitate him and be jumping jacks, and there is nothing he wants more than a crowd of jumping jacks around him. That is why he raised the bogus point of order, and bogus points of order come naturally for him, as you realize when you see how bogus is the proposition which he has introduced in this amendment. I presume they consider it to be their duty to yell out many different kinds of expressions in support of their new peerless leader. They have had about umpteen "peerless" leaders in the last few years.

May I return quietly to the point before the house, with which I was dealing before I was so rudely and unnecessarily interrupted? I was saying that every person knew that the next step in the proceedings was an address to be passed by this parliament, directed to the British parliament, which would request the enactment of the necessary British legislation to effect Newfoundland's entry into the Canadian confederation. The actual resolution requesting that has been on the order paper since last Tuesday, as I have said. Up to last Friday the position was that the Tories were taking the position that they wanted to effect the union of Newfoundland and Canada in accordance with the terms of the agreement already mentioned, and to do it by March 31. They wanted hon. members to believe that that was their attitude. They wanted the people of Newfoundland to believe that that was their attitude. They wanted the people of Quebec, of Ontario, and of all the rest of Canada to believe that that was their attitude. They knew at that time the procedure that had to be taken to effect this union. They never gave any suggestion or any hint of wanting a different course taken. Had they done so they would naturally have been subjected immediately to criticism across the country—as they are now being subjected—of being either insincere or not candid. But yesterday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) moved this amendment, and it needs to be examined carefully. The operative part reads as follows:

Now therefore be it resolved, that the government of Canada be required to consult at once the governments of the several provinces and that upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultations a humble address be presented to His Majesty . . .

The remainder of the resolution would read in the same way as it appears on the order paper at the present time and which was moved by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Fraser: The leader of the Grits.

Mr. Gardiner: Proud of the name.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Who wrote his speech? Who wrote the speech? He is not reading it well.

Mr. Maybank: A little while ago I had to comment about something silly that had come out of Portage la Prairie, but I think it has now been topped by the question of the hon. member for Souris.

Mr. Miller: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I take it that the hon. member has just referred to me as being something silly that has come out of Portage la Prairie.

Mr. Maybank: No, I did not mean that. As soon as I make it clear to the hon. member that I did not mean him personally, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, when I said that something silly has come from there—as soon as I tell him that I did not mean that—I am sure he will be satisfied. I would like to add that it is bound to cause a little amusement when one notices the speed with which he rose thinking that it had been applied to him, himself. My reference was to his own earlier point of order some time back.

Mr. Miller: On a question of privilege, the hon. member has no right to imply by indirection what he cannot by our rules say in straight out-and-out words. He is implying now what he cannot say by straight direction and I demand that he refrain from doing so.

Mr. Irvine: These gentlemen are going to spoil coalition in Manitoba.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Page the Minister of Justice; he ruined it.

Mr. Maybank: What a welcome interruption, to have helped us all to laugh at ourselves. Up until then I must admit that I was tempted to laugh a little at the hon. member for Portage la Prairie for taking umbrage at a remark which he thought was directed at him. I did not suggest that he was silly, I only said that his interruption a while back was silly, and of course that was true. He is now trying to make himself look worse, which is a rather difficult thing to do.

May I just proceed? Before the last interruption—I have just forgotten whose it was—I had read the operative part of the amendment offered by the Tories, and I stressed particularly the words, "satisfactory conclusion of such consultations." What that means is, first, that before asking the British government to pass the necessary legislation to effect the jointure of the two countries there must be consultation with the provinces. Second, in consulting them there would have to be what the amendment calls "a satisfactory conclusion." Third, if, as and when nine satisfactory conclusions have been reached at nine consultations, then and then only should there be presented by the Commons and Senate "a humble address to His Majesty" asking that the necessary legislation should be passed at Westminster. All of this would have to be done by March 31.

The amendment purports to have the provinces determine whether Newfoundland shall be taken into confederation. It must be patent to every thinking person from all that was said in the debate last week, as well as from all the other evidence, that such reference is entirely unnecessary. It is also competely without precedent. It must not be overlooked that the leader of the Tory party desires to introduce into our governmental system the veto of the security council of the united nations and no doubt he proposes to cast one of his Tory premier friends in the role of Joe Stalin in order to prevent anything being done. He would emulate the communists whom from time to time he affects to condemn.

I hope the people of Newfoundland appreciate just what is the attitude of the Tory party, typified not merely by its leader but by every man jack who is sitting around him. I hope the people of Canada fully appreciate the trick that is being attempted.

But even aside from his veto feature, take a look at the practical effect of this amendment. A serious reference of this question to the nine provinces could not be made unless the terms of union were still open. A reference that would be a serious one would have to be one that would give the provinces an opportunity of having some hand in the conduct of the actual negotiations. The proposed reference can hardly be serious. The Tories say in effect: "Let us, the Canadian parliament, make a decision with reference to the terms of union, which matters are within the competence of parliament and then, having arrived at a conclusion as to what are satisfactory terms, submit the agreement, upon which we are in concurrence, to the vote, and possible veto, of the provinces. That most certainly is a travesty of confederation.

In his resolution the Tory leader says that nothing must be done until there is what he calls "a satisfactory conclusion" of the dealings, negotiations, consultations or whatever you wish to call them, with the nine provinces. He is careful not to say what he means by "a satisfactory conclusion". We cannot tell whether he means that he would be willing to let Newfoundland into confederation as a new province if three-quarters of the provinces agreed, whether he would be satisfied with a two-thirds count, or whether he would be satisfied with a mere majority. As it stands now, he commits himself to the principle of the veto. What his resolution means is that he will not allow Newfoundland to become part of Canada unless and until some of his Tory premier friends have expressed their acquiescence.

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Maybank: It is not hard now to indicate which one. I suggest that it is a big price for any party to pay for the support of one individual or several individuals. It means that they are ready to play fast and loose with this serious question of bringing Newfoundland into confederation. They are willing to play fast and loose with that serious question in order to get the support of Premier Duplessis of Quebec.

The odd thing about it is that they can sit there and laugh with glee at the trick they are attempting to play.

Mr. Drew: We are just laughing at you.

An hon. Member: You do not see what we see.

Mr. Maybank: That is right. They do not see what I see and I do not see what they see.

Mr. Abbott: Not bad.

Mr. Knowles: The blind leading the blind.

Mr. Maybank: I am bearing up under the terrible view in front of me. I am keeping my humour despite the horrendous vista before me.

Mr. Rowe: That is about all you have got.

Mr. Maybank: There is another thing I might say to those who made reference to that which they could see, and by inference to that which I could see. They might as well make up their minds now that they are not going to yell me down, or make noises on their desks or with their feet or in any other way, and succeed in stopping me.

Mr. Fraser: We are enjoying it. We would have to pay half a dollar to see a show.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Maybank: It is a great thing when people will pay half a dollar to see themselves as a show—and a rather poor show they are making in this particular matter. People who would put forward this kind of proposition, which is patently insincere or crazy, are surely pretty irresponsible people when they can sit there and laugh about it.

An hon. Member: We are laughing at you.

Mr. Maybank: Their position is that they are willing to give a veto to one man on this very important question in order to obtain his continued support. That is what it amounts to. You know, I am not sure but what something has been paid already. This may be the pay-off. Maurice has helped very substantially in Nicolet-Yamaska, and this is their payment, the payment to him.

Mr. Rowe: It might be your pay-off, too.

Mr. Maybank: I can say to the hon. gentleman who interrupted with that cynical remark that if I had to win by this kind of sale I never would win at all. I should like to appeal to some of those fine, decent men over there to stop this Tory business of endeavouring to buy their way into Quebec.

As I speak, something reminds me of Walter Savage Landor, who has written a few volumes of very fine stories under the title, "Imaginary Conversations". They are very interesting. I would recommend that the hon. members opposite read some of them. They would find much that would be helpful. I was playing with the idea of what Landor could do in writing another story. It could be a conversation between the premier of Ontario and the premier of Quebec. I suppose the imaginary conversation would have been something like this: "Well, now, look, Maurice, you may depend upon this. There will never be anything done of a constitutional nature without your having the last say. I can assure you of that, Maurice." The reply would be, "Well, George, remember if you do not keep that promise I can ruin you just as quickly as I can make you."

Some of these men who are pinning their faith on the same sort of thing that their party has attempted before had better remember that their good friend, Maurice, can ruin them just as quickly as he can make them, if he can "make" them at all. They had better remember that. They will always have to pay through the nose for any support they get. However, that is their business, not mine. Of course, along with Maurice they get such characters as the one mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) a few days ago, Paul Sauriol. They get the support of that sort of character, too. They make bedfellows of themselves with Monsieur Houde, the "imperialist," Camillien. Oh, yes, they get that. They get Chaloult thrown into the bargain, and a great many like him. They the great flag wavers acquire these friends. They get all these people I have mentioned as long as they give to Maurice Duplessis the power of veto on any measure of the sort we have before us tonight. Just before I conclude I wish to say this.

Some hon. Members: Don't stop.

Some hon. Members: Stop.

Mr. Maybank: When these gentlemen make up their minds whether or not they want me to go ahead, then I will know. They seem to be a little uncertain. By their amendment the Tories have put themselves in the position that, according to them, the resolution proposed, whereby Newfoundland will be brought into confederation, is wrong, and that the only right way is to have the amendment carried which would send the matter to all of the provinces one after the other for agreement, or veto. A good many remarks were made by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) which seem to indicate that is, indeed, the position they are taking. If that is their line, if the procedure of their amendment is what must be done, then they should vote against the motion of the government to bring Newfoundland into confederation. They should vote against it if they have the nerve to do so. I challenge the Tories now to vote against the resolution. I tell them to their faces that, in spite of all their talk, yelling and laughter, they have not got the nerve to do so. They are again trying to play both ends against the middle. They are hoping to be able to go out and say, "We did everything we could to bring Newfoundland in"; and they want to say in some places, "We did everything we could to keep Newfoundland out except on your say-so." They want to be in the position of saying both.

Under their scheme you will find them striving to get as many votes as possible in Ontario by saying, "We took the proper line for Canadian expansion to bring in this fine new province." That is what they want to say in Ontario. In some places in Quebec they want to say, "You see, we did all we could to put Maurice Duplessis in the position we wanted him to be, the arbiter of all such things as this." That is their position, and I dare them to vote against the resolution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have been asked to read in English the amendment to the amendment which was moved by Mr. LaCroix. It is as follows:

That the words "after they will have given their consent" be substituted for the words "upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultations" in the last paragraph of the amendment.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate for one main purpose; that is, to clear up an obvious misconception which exists as to the real meaning of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). But before I do that I feel I must make reference to some remarks which have been made, mainly from the other side of the house. I think most hon. members have heard about as much as they wish to hear from or about the hon. member who has just taken his seat, but I cannot allow his remarks to go altogether unanswered, so I shall start with them though I shall not dwell on them for longer than is necessary. The hon. member made a great deal of the words "inanity" and "insincerity". From the whole tenor of his remarks it becomes obvious to hon. members, I think even on his own side, that anyone so incapable of experiencing or understanding sincerity as he would not be able to see any sincerity in a suggestion made by anyone else.

There is one thing, however, on which I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South should be congratulated. He has studied the rules with such care and diligence and to such good effect—and apparently just for this purpose—that he can come closer than any other hon. member can to unparliamentary language, procedure and behaviour without actually overstepping the bounds.

But that is the only thing upon which he is to be congratulated. Indeed, if success in this house to is be measured by the proportion of calculated insult and contumely carried in speeches, then certainly the hon. member for Winnipeg South, who has just resumed his seat, would have scored a remarkable victory.

Mr. Maybank: I want to raise a point of order, with which I believe the hon. member will agree. I am sure he would not wish to have those remarks directed to the wrong member. Mr. Mutch is the hon. member for Winnipeg South; I am the member for Winnipeg South Centre. I hope the hon. member will get that fixed up, because I should like to get it all in the right place.

Mr. Rowe: So would the other hon. member.

Mr. Maybank: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: If it is necessary to ask for any correction in Hansard, I most certainly do so, but I feel quite certain that no hon.

member of this house can have any doubt as to the hon. member to whom in fact I was referring.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I propose to turn to remarks made in the course of this debate which are more worthy of serious consideration. I do so, as I said when I rose, for the purpose of correcting an obvious misconception as to the real meaning of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition. I do not intend to discuss the question whether confederation was a contract or a pact or a compact, nor do I feel qualified to make any lengthy dissertation on constitutional law. I do propose to say a few words, however, on what I believe is the point at issue in this amendment. I do so because on reflection and on studying the remarks of speakers from the government side, and indeed from the C.C.F. party, it is obvious that many of them have missed the point. I refer particularly to the speeches of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). The Minister of Justice made a great deal of what he said was the unfortunate necessity thrust upon him of having to deal with the obvious. He then proceeded to deal with the obvious. He dealt with matters which were obvious to all hon. members in the house, and he dealt with them in an exceedingly obvious manner. But unfortunately he had missed the point, so while he did deal with what was obvious and dealt with it plainly and in a straightforward fashion, his remarks were not in fact a contribution to the point at issue.

Briefly, Mr. Speaker, the point at issue is this. The point of the amendment is not whether the present nine provinces should be consulted on the merit or otherwise of admitting Newfoundland into confederation. Rather it is whether they should be consulted on the very important and serious question, in which they have a direct interest, of the method and manner of amending the constitution. The question of admitting Newfoundland into confederation, whether it is desirable and whether the terms are mutually advantageous, was settled, I take it, in the discussion which took place in this house last week. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar himself pointed out, all parties then were in agreement that this was a desirable objective, and that generally speaking the terms were just and fair. But what we are discussing now is whether the procedure by means of which that objective is to be attained is something which can be supported and particularly whether it is something which should be carried out without consultation with the provinces, because the method to which the government is now resorting involves directly the question of an amendment to the constitution, and on a matter which is of direct concern to the provinces.

Last evening the Minister of Justice devoted the major portion of his remarks to the proposition, which he described as obvious, that the procedure followed here does not involve an amendment of the constitution. Incidentally, during his remarks the Minister of Justice said the leader of the opposition should be congratulated because, as he put it, he had made the best of a bad job. That remark was not altogether generous, because after reading over what the minister himself said one cannot fail to be impressed by the fact that not only did he have a very bad job to deal with but that in fact he made a rather poor job of a bad job, which was a great contrast to the speaker to whom he was referring.

I say that for this reason. The Minister of Justice, having stated it was obvious that no amendment of the constitution is involved here, then gave away his case when he pointed out—inadvertently, I presume—that in fact nothing more or less than an amendment of the constitution is the point at issue. At page 523 of Hansard for yesterday he is reported as having said:

> No one will dispute, however, that in Newfoundland at the present time there is a legally constituted government with proper legal authority. But it is not a legislative body, and therefore cannot produce the address that is necessary under section 146.

By those words he destroyed the case he was trying to make. If, as he has said, an address is necessary under section 146 of the British North America Act and if, as he has said, the government of Newfoundland has no legislative body and cannot pass an address, it becomes obvious that an amendment to section 146 of the constitution is necessary.

Then referring to the British North America Act, he said, as reported at page 524 of Hansard:

> The constitution does not require assent from any province. It is true the constitution requires an address.

Those are the words of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). The Prime Minister has stated there is at the moment no machinery in existence in Newfoundland by which an address could be passed. The Minister of Justice admits that the constitution requires an address. If that be the case, then the government has to do just what it is doing, that is, ask for an amendment to the constitution so as to overcome the requirement laid down in the constitution. There is no address, therefore the constitution must be amended.

It is true that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) brushes this question aside as being a matter of little importance. He says it is only a procedural difficulty with which we are dealing. It is only a procedural weakness which is being removed. The Prime Minister referred to it as a matter of convenience. Call it what you will, Mr. Speaker, it is still an alteration of the constitution to ratify the doing in one way of something which the constitution calls for doing in another way.

What is the true position of that with which we are dealing? It is an amendment to the constitution. All these remarks which have been brought forth in such number about the lack of necessity for consulting the provinces with respect to the admission of Newfoundland into confederation become quite irrelevant. The amendment does not suggest that. When the suggestion is made in our amendment for consultation with the provinces at this stage, it is not suggested they be consulted on the merits of the question of admitting Newfoundland, but that they be consulted on the question of amending the constitution. This amendment to the constitution is made necessary by the fact, perhaps an unfortunate fact but a fact for which we are not responsible, that the procedure called for by the constitution cannot be complied with.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) made some remarks on this point this afternoon. It was obvious he had missed the point at issue. He took the position that, in the speech which was made by the leader of the opposition as well as the speech made by the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the government was being criticized for not following the procedure of section 146. Of course, that is not the fact. The government is being criticized because it departed from the provisions contained in the constitution without consulting the provinces. The constitution is not only the constitution of this federal parliament; it is the constitution of the provinces and of the provincial legislatures.

It all comes down to a question which has been aired in this house before, and that is whether the constitution, which is the constitution of the provinces as well as of the dominion, can be amended in particulars and in a manner which is of interest to the provinces without the provinces being consulted. Referring this afternoon to this question of consultation with the provinces, the Secretary of State for External Affairs brushed it aside. He said—I think I am quoting him correctly—that it was absolutely unnecessary to consult the provinces. Bearing in mind the fact that what we are consulting the provinces about is an amendment to the constitution, not the merits or otherwise of the admission of Newfoundland, it must be said that the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not reflect the opinion of the great men of his party in the past. It is frequently true, of course, that recent converts are carried away by their zeal, and it may be that the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was so enthused by his recent conversion that he spoke without due reflection.

Certainly, it becomes obvious he has not studied the position taken in the past by the great leaders of his party. I should like to direct his attention to the remarks of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when dealing with this question of consultation with the provinces in the session of 1906-07. The question before the house at that time was a change in the representation in the House of Commons for the maritime provinces. Sir Wilfrid Laurier emphasized the extreme seriousness of any proposal to amend the constitution. After saying that the deviation from the principle laid down in the confederation act which was sought in the resolution then before the house was only a very slight one, he enunciated the following principle, and I am quoting from his remarks as found at page 2195 of Hansard, 1906-07:

> But, though the deviation from the principle is limited, yet it involves an amendment to the constitution, and an amendment to the constitution is always a serious matter and one which should not lightly be entered upon.

So that to say that union with Newfoundland is desirable and, therefore, we should not pay any attention to the procedural difficulties or let the constitution stand in the way, is a position which we cannot accept. It is a position diametrically opposed to the position taken by past leaders of the party now in charge of the government.

This afternoon we have heard references to the very broad subject of discussion with the provinces, not concerning the merits of the change the government is seeking to make, but discussion with the provinces on the very question whether or not the constitution could be amended so as to take a procedural short-cut. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had some remarks about that on the same occasion. I should like to direct the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the further remarks which Sir Wilfrid made on that subject. At page 2199 of Hansard, 1906-7, he said:

> Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces, but adhered to by all the nine provinces who have entered it, and I submit to the judgment of this house and to the best consideration of its members that this compact should not be lightly altered.

Then he made this very significant remark:

It should be altered only for adequate cause, and after the provinces themselves have had an opportunity to pass judgment on the same.

What Sir Wilfrid was saying there was, not that the provinces should necessarily be consulted as to the merits or otherwise of the proposal then before the house, but that they should be consulted as to the method and as to the necessity of altering the constitution to effect that end.

That is just the issue which is before us now. It is a question which is too greatly charged with serious consequences for the future welfare of this country for us to permit ourselves to deal with it on the basis of expediency, on the basis that it is a mere procedural matter, on the basis of convenience, or whatever word you choose to use. As was well said this afternoon by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), it is a matter of the constitution under which the development of this country has proceeded in the past; it is a matter of the constitution which guarantees or has guaranteed to us the freedom and liberty, and the opportunity for advancement and self-expression, which have made Canada and the Canadian people the country and people that they are.

Again I say that it is not enough to dismiss this question by saying that the constitution does not provide for consultation with the provinces on questions of admission of new territory into the dominion, because the position is that the constitution itself provides methods by which new territories could be added. So long as the constitutional method is followed, there is of course no necessity of consulting with the provinces. Whether we consider that the British North America Act is a pact, a treaty, a compact, or a contract, the inescapable fact is this: the original parties to confederation had in mind the possibility of the subsequent entry into confederation of new territory. They considered that matter carefully, and agreed to and laid down certain procedures which should be followed when that event should come to pass. That agreement having been entered into and having been given binding form under the British North America Act, if that procedure is followed there is then no need to consult with any of the provinces or any of the other members of confederation —and I would point out that the provinces are members of confederation. But that is not the position here. The position here is that the constitutional procedure, the procedure already agreed to by the parties to confederation, is not being followed. Surely, therefore, it is not only legally correct but it is only morally just that the parties to confederation should be consulted as to the variation of the procedure which they themselves had previously worked out.

I have referred to what is the actual point at issue here, as I see it. Last week we settled the question of the desirability or otherwise of the admission of Newfoundland into confederation. In spite of all the slighting remarks which have been leveled at the members of this side individually and as a party for what is said by our opponents to be a reversal in our stand, the fact is that we have not reversed our stand. We stand firm by our original position that it is a desirable thing that Newfoundland should be admitted into the family of the confederation of Canada. What we raise objection to is that now the very fact of that desirability, which we sincerely and in good faith agreed to, should be urged as a compulsion on us, in an effort to force us to agree to an unconstitutional method of attaining a desirable objective. If there be any insincerity in the approach to this matter, it is on the part of those on government benches when they seek to resort to methods of that kind.

Here again we see asserted the principle that the constitution can be amended in a matter of vital importance to the whole framework of confederation—the question of the admission or exclusion of new territory—without consultation with the parties to confederation, by mere majority vote in this house. We have in the past taken our stand against that proposition. Our stand is one which actually needs no justification beyond its own merits. It is in fact justified and supported by the principles laid down by past great leaders of confederation, including great leaders of the Liberal party.

We again question and again deny the principle contended for by the present Prime Minister when he was Minister of Justice in 1946 and introduced the resolution upon which was based the redistribution of that year. We deny the principle that the federal parliament has the right, by a mere majority vote, to recommend to the British government, and in some cases even to make, any changes it wishes in the constitution of this country, except with respect to sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act.

If this startling new enunciation of principle be accepted as correct—and that is what we are asked to do now—it means that there are few features of the social, political and economic life of this country which could not be changed as the result of a majority vote of the House of Commons. It is true that there are certain divisions of powers, as laid down in sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act, which would still be unalterable. But, for instance, as to all our constitutional processes, language, qualifications for representation in this house, legal and moral customs and a host of other matters, all the safeguards from which we benefit at present could be swept away. Nearly all members of this house have personal knowledge of the heights to which passions can be roused on subjects about which, rightly or wrongly, there is deep feeling. Hon. members will recall with what suddenness, on occasion, reason is supplanted by the rule of emotion and ungoverned prejudice. I am sure, therefore, that on serious reflection hon. members on the other side of the house, as well as those on this side, will find that it is regrettable—indeed, that it would be dangerous—to attempt now to use the occasion of a desirable objective in order to bring compulsion or pressure of any sort to bear upon members on any side or in any part of this house to accept a principle so much at variance with the best principles and traditions of our constitutional history.

It is not enough to say that, by taking the stand which we take here, we are standing in the way of progress, because progress is not measured only in terms of material things. As I see it, progress is measured also in terms of the extent to which men, in seeking to accomplish and in actually accomplishing desirable objectives, nevertheless retain level heads and right motives, and follow right procedures.

In conclusion, I repeat that no one in this house is more sincere or desires more fervently than we in this party to see confederation completed. But we would not be true to ourselves, to the country, or to the province which we now seek to make a member of confederation if we allowed that to come about by methods such as these, so fraught with danger and possible bad consequences to ourselves and to these very people whom we are now trying to include in what we want to see, a happy, prosperous family of confederation.

Mr. Elphege Marier (Jacques Cartier): When the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) rose he said that he would explain the real meaning of the amendment proposed by his leader. He did not explain the amendment but instead spoke about the proceedings taken to make Newfoundland a part of our country. The hon. member said that the government ought to consult the provinces because the constitution of Canada requires it. The leader of the opposition said in his amendment:

> Now therefore be it resolved, that the government of Canada be required to consult at once the governments of the several provinces and that upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultations "a humble address be presented to His Majesty . . ."

That consultation took place many years ago. In 1864 the four provinces known as Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia met in Quebec city to discuss confederation. I hold in my hand a copy of the Quebec resolutions adopted in 1864, and on page 137 I find the following:

> In the federation of the British North American provinces the system of government best adapted under existing circumstances to protect the diversified interests of the several provinces, and secure efficiency, harmony, and permanence in the working of the union,—would be a general government charged with matters of common interest to the whole country, and local governments for each of the Canadas and for the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, charged with the control of local matters in their respective sections, provision being made for the admission into the union on equitable terms of Newfoundland, the Northwest Territory, British Columbia, and Vancouver.

When these provinces met in Quebec in 1864 they agreed that Newfoundland would be admitted into confederation then or at any time on equitable terms. Therefore they were consulted and they agreed, but they went further. On page 138 of the Quebec resolutions we find the following:

> The colony of Newfoundland shall be entitled to enter the proposed union, with a representation in the legislative council of four members.

They provided for the number of members that would be in the legislative council to be formed when Newfoundland became a new province of the confederation.

In paragraph 12 they provided that the members of the Newfoundland legislative council should possess properties either real or personal. On page 139 of the Quebec resolutions we find the following:

> The basis of representation in the House of Commons shall be population, as determined by the official census every ten years . . .

And that Newfoundland should have eight members. Therefore they provided for the number of members which Newfoundland was to have when she joined confederation. On page 142 of the same resolutions we find the following:

> Until the consolidation of the laws of Upper Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Prince Edward Island, the judges of these provinces appointed by the general government shall be selected from their respective bars.

They went further and on page 146 they said:

> Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, not having incurred debts equal to those of the other provinces, shall be entitled to receive by half-yearly payments in advance from the general government the interest at 5 per cent on the difference between the actual amount of their respective debts at the time of the union, and the average amount of indebtedness per head of the population of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick.

Therefore the different provinces agreed that Newfoundland would be permitted to join confederation, and the interested provinces were ready to admit Newfoundland.

Paragraph 72 on page 147 of the resolutions states:

The proceedings of the conference shall be authenticated by the signatures of the delegates, and submitted by each delegation to its own government, and the chairman is authorized to submit a copy to the governor general for transmission to the secretary of state for the colonies.

They were not satisfied just to approve the resolutions to admit Newfoundland into confederation at that time. They said that the resolutions so adopted by these four provinces at that time should be authenticated by their own governments and should be signed by the officers authorized to do so. These resolutions were submitted to London and were approved by the British government. In section 10 of the London resolutions you will find the following:

The colony of Newfoundland when admitted into the confederation shall be entitled to a representation in the legislative council of four members.

That was approved by the London conference and the London resolutions were adopted on December 4, 1866. Later on, these resolutions were included in paragraph 146 of the British North America Act, which said that when Newfoundland decided to join confederation it could do so by the procedure provided in section 146. It is true that this section cannot be applied exactly today because Newfoundland has no legislature at the present time. That is a question of procedure and not a question of right. I submit that when the three provinces interested at that time—because at that time Quebec and Ontario formed only one province known as the union of upper and lower Canada—agreed to form the confederation, they decided by the different articles of the resolutions which they sanctioned that Newfoundland could be added to confederation on equitable terms. The provinces were consulted and gave their consent in advance not only to the consultation as provided by the amendment of the leader of the opposition but to the fact that they would admit Newfoundland into confederation at any time. What we are discussing is only the terms and conditions provided for in the admission. As the resolution sets out, that admission must be on equitable terms to be decided on between Newfoundland and the different provinces of the country now known as the Dominion of Canada. When we say that we are amending the constitution, that we are changing the law which governs our country, we are saying something which is not true, because the provinces interested at that time in forming confederation were consulted and gave their consent to admitting Newfoundland at any time. What we are doing is not asking to amend the constitution. In my humble opinion, what we are doing is not really amending the constitution; it is just a change in the procedure determined by section 146 of the British North America Act. We are not being asked to change the British North America Act; we are just giving our assent to a decision which was arrived at in 1864 and confirmed in 1866.

Mr. Hackett: Why does the British government require an amendment to the British North America Act?

Mr. Marier: They do not require an amendment to the constitution. What they ask is that this procedure be followed by the present government. It is not an amendment to the constitution; it is a matter of procedure under section 146.

Mr. Hackett: Why not follow the procedure?

Mr. Marier: There are no houses of parliament in Newfoundland at the present time. This is a matter of procedure.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, there have been some good speeches during this debate and I regret that there have been some that have not been so good. My purpose in rising to speak at this time is not to try to convince anyone as to how they should vote on the motion and the amendments before us; it is simply to make my own position clear as to why I cannot vote for the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and why I feel I must vote for the motion.

It is not contended by the supporters of the amendment that the terms of union are not satisfactory. I think the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) made that quite clear. It seems to me that the whole question is one of the procedure to be followed in seeking the amendment that will bring Newfoundland into confederation. I believe that the resolution moved yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) follows the procedure which has been followed in the various amendments that have been made to the British North America Act at least since I have been here.

Since I have been a member I can remember three measures that came before this house that required amendments to the British North America Act. First there was the amendment in 1940 to allow the dominion government to enact an unemployment insurance act, and then there were amendments in 1943 and 1946. In 1940, because the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act would concern the provinces, the provinces were consulted; but in 1943 and 1946 the changes were made by resolutions somewhat similar to the one we have before us.

We have been following precedent, but if this house should accept the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition we shall be creating a precedent which I maintain may prove dangerous. Before I sit down I shall give my reasons for saying that.

As I said, in this instance we are following the precedent which was set in connection with other amendments. I have in my hand the parliamentary debates of the House of Lords, volume 142, for the session 1945-46, which contains the report of the debate on the amendment of 1946 when it came before the House of Lords. I should like to quote the opinion of a gentleman who is well known to my hon. friends of the official opposition. Here is what Viscount Bennett said in regard to the method of making the change, as reported on page 698:

> There has been a good deal of discussion about an amendment of the constitution being a political measure. Canada is the only one of the dominions in which a party majority can amend the constitution.

Viscount Bennett was a man of considerable learning in the law, a man of great ability and a well known Conservative. He makes it quite clear that a resolution by a majority in the houses of parliament in Canada can change the constitution. He continues:

> They cannot amend it directly, but they do it indirectly, because we have agreed—

That is, the British parliament have agreed.

> —that we will consent to pass any legislation that they may petition to have passed by this parliament.

I submit that that is as it should be. I can hear the hullabaloo that would be raised in this house if the present government of Great Britain said that they would not pass legislation that was asked for by the houses of parliament of Canada.

That being the case, in this instance we are following the procedure that has been followed by other governments. Evidently, then, the purpose of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition is to create a new procedure, that in all matters the provinces must be consulted. We should examine the amendment very carefully, then. I think that was done very well this afternoon by the minister of external affairs. The operative part of the amendment, which is really the part we are concerned with, reads as follows:

> Now therefore be it resolved, that the government of Canada be required to consult at once the governments of the several provinces and that upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultations "a humble address be presented to His Majesty in the following words":

The difficulty I find in connection with the amendment is that there is no definition of the words "a satisfactory conclusion of such consultations". If the consultations are to be such as will effect what we are going to do, then that in my opinion must mean consent by the provinces. The question that we ask is: How much consent do we need; how much consent will we require; must we have the consent of all the provinces or only of some? The matter of veto was mentioned this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and although I had referred to it when making my notes this morning I shall not refer to it now. But it is indeed important. Let me show how a precedent will be created if the amendment carries. I think it was the member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) who, when supporting the amendment last night, made it mean so little that he did justice neither to himself nor to the amendment. I should like to quote a part of what he said, to be found on page 533 of Hansard, reading as follows:

> I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the wording of this amendment. The wording of this amendment does not ask that the provinces agree. It does not mention anything about a right or a wrong constitutional interpretation. As I read this amendment, it simply says to the government that we, as a parliament, are asking them to consult the provinces. After they have received the views of the provinces, then we will move an address to His Majesty.

Surely that is an over-simplification of consultation. How does he know that we will move an address after consultation? Suppose all the provinces say, "No, we do not agree." Are we then going to proceed with this address? If we are going to proceed with the address whether the provinces say yes or no, why consult the provinces at all? It is not as simple as the member for Macleod makes it out to be. Either consulting the provinces means something or it does not mean anything. If it means something it may affect what we will do here. If it does not mean anything, if we are going to do the same thing after we have consulted the provinces, regardless of what they say, as we would have done in the first place, then we are merely spoofing the provinces.

Mr. Garson: Look at all the fun we would have consulting them.

Mr. MacInnis: Yes; but I am not so sure that it would all be fun because most fun has an aftermath.

An hon. Member: Are you speaking from experience?

Mr. MacInnis: You would be surprised. In this instance, I do not know exactly what we would be consulting the provinces about in the first place, but suppose in any event they were unanimous. In my opinion that would create a precedent, and the next time that we consulted the provinces we would be told we could not proceed unless they were unanimous. The veto would indeed be applied. My chief reason for opposing the amendment is that it creates a precedent, and we do not know where it may lead us.

An hon. Member: It would lead to chaos.

Mr. MacInnis: As someone behind me says, it would lead to chaos, because it would mean there could never be amendment of our constitution, of the British North America Act, unless all the provinces were unanimous. Is there any member of the official opposition who wants that state of affairs? Is there anyone on the other side of the house who wants that state of affairs? As a matter of fact, if we are going to carry on in that way, then parliament will lose all its significance as a national legislative body. Then again a great deal was said, particularly by my Social Credit friends, about the dangers of centralization, and the dangers of stateism, whatever that is. I imagine stateism means having things done by the state. If that is a correct definition of stateism, I do not believe there are many people in Canada who are opposed to it, because almost every group in Canada is asking the state to do something. They are not all asking the state to do the same thing, but every one of them is asking the state to do something for them.

Let us see how much is in all these warnings about the dangers of centralization. If we followed the argument of my Social Credit friends to its logical conclusion we would not have a confederation at all, because confederation in itself is centralization. We have been told again and again in this house that the fathers of confederation, and particularly the greatest of the fathers, Sir John A. Macdonald, wanted a strong central government. Do we want a strong central government, or do we want a government which, whenever it wants to do anything of a national character, must consult every province? Do we want a government that cannot act until every province says, "yes, go ahead"? Surely that makes nonsense of our pretensions of nationhood. It makes nonsense of almost everything that has been said by the official opposition and the Social Credit party during the past two days. There is always a danger that power will be abused, but the way to assure that it will not is not to create a situation where no one will have any power to do anything. The way to provide against that is to have an educated public opinion which will understand what is required and know when governments are going too far. Then the sovereign people on the one day that they are sovereign, election day, will take such action as will bring about the results they desire.

I have been interested in the political affairs of Canada for some considerable time. I have watched legislation in the provinces, and I have watched legislation in the dominion parliament. I am bound to say that, as far as I can see, on the basis of the legislation that has been enacted by our provinces and the legislation that has been enacted by this parliament, the freedom of the Canadian people is just as safe in the hands of the parliament of Canada as it is in the hands of any of the provincial legislatures. Why be afraid then that a government has the power to do the things that the sovereign people of Canada want it to do?

I do not know that there is any reason why I should say any more. I think I have made it clear that in the first place the resolution before us follows a precedent that has long been established by this parliament; and that, in the second place, the amendment if it were adopted, would create a new precedent and one which, in my opinion, is dangerous because we do not know where it would lead. Where it would lead would perhaps depend upon the whim of the government of one province. Let us have faith in this Canada of ours, and faith that the men and women we elect to the parliament of Canada will do the things that are in the best interests of all the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): There is plenty of time. We have been trying to solve this problem since 1867. We should not try to finish it tonight. I am going to take about ten minutes because in the past couple of weeks, on this question of international law, the British North America Act and the rights of the provinces I as a layman have had a first-class demonstration that very few people in this house know very much about it, and that the whole matter can be twisted to suit the viewpoint of a particular person for political reasons.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said he wanted to make his position clear, and I am rising at this time to make my position clear. When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke he indicated that as far as we were concerned this group would support the original motion, and I stand by that. But during the debate on the speech from the throne I said I was disappointed that the government had permitted the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) to set the tone of that debate, completely ignoring anything that was in the speech from the throne and saying very little about what was not in it. He decided that the issue in this house as far as he was concerned was going to be dominion-provincial rights. Well, my assumption is that he has in mind the next election. One place in Canada where his party is very weak is the province of Quebec, where they are very strong for provincial rights. Another place they are very weak is the province of Nova Scotia, where they have no members in the legislature and very little leadership. But the premier of Nova Scotia is also very strong for provincial rights, as he indicated at the last dominion-provincial conference. So I may be excused for my assumption that the leader of the opposition has those two provinces in mind.

In addition, when we began to discuss the Newfoundland agreement the same theme was interjected into that discussion. Again it was dominion-provincial rights; and unfortunately the government, instead of trying to bring the house back to the real bread and butter issues of this country, fell into the trap and went along with the discussion of provincial rights. As a result we have had a straight academic discussion in this house that very few people outside the house can understand. I know letters I have received have been to this effect: "Why are you fellows wasting time up there? Prices are away up. Unemployment is increasing. There are many internal issues to which you should be devoting your time."

In my opinion we settled the question of Newfoundland. After a long debate we decided that the agreement was fair and reasonable, and this house voted unanimously that Newfoundland should come into confederation. All right. Then there was the question of giving effect to the decision we had made in connection with the agreement. That meant we had to change the statutes of Canada in order to back up the decision already made unanimously, or with one exception; one hon. member down here said no. That should have been a simple process, taking very little of the time of this house, if we meant what we said when we voted to bring Newfoundland into confederation. Instead of that, however, the very capable leader of the opposition set out to raise an issue for the next federal election that would not mean anything to the people of this country. "Keep away from our economic problems. Keep away from the problems that affect the average, everyday person in this country in connection with the things that go on his table. Let us make the issue at the next election the question of dominion-provincial relations, which does not mean anything to the people of this country, but which gives us a good opportunity to set up an issue with which we might be able to confuse them."

That is my conception of the thing as I have watched it develop. The leader of the opposition moves an amendment to the original motion, in which he says the provinces should be consulted. Well, what happens after they are consulted? As the hon. member for Vancouver East pointed out, one province has the veto, and you are finished. What happens to the decision we made to bring Newfoundland within confederation? That is out also. The people of Newfoundland have said they want to come in, and the Canadian people want to bring them in. We know that, if we bring Newfoundland into confederation and make available to them the social services that we have in this country, we will be relieving human misery; and as far as I am concerned the legality of any action is determined by the justice of the cause. I am willing to take any step, after consulting the members of this House of Commons, to relieve human misery because I think that is a justifiable action.

The amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition does not mean anything. It merely created the opportunity for a debate. It provided a chance to get the headlines. The leader of the opposition is fighting, but he is not firing many shots. He is careful to propose an amendment that does not mean anything after the provinces are consulted. The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), seconded by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), moved a sub-amendment that means something. That sub-amendment says the provinces not only should be consulted but that they should give their consent. I shall be watching with great attention to see how my hon. friends vote on that point.

As far as I am concerned the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), when he took part in this debate a few days ago, stated the question very clearly and fairly. The other four or five provinces he mentioned were brought in after a discussion in this House of Commons. No plebiscite was taken; the matter was determined here. We had the same British North America Act at that time. Newfoundland has been consulted; two plebiscites were taken, after all the issues and terms were made available to the people of Newfoundland. And they decided to come in. As I said when I spoke briefly on this matter a few days ago, I was amazed at the representative vote that was obtained. Those people had not cast a ballot since 1934. The great majority of them cast a ballot for the first time in those plebiscites. They were isolated, in outports, with no radio available and the propaganda coming practically from one side only. But when the people of Newfoundland sifted out the issues and used their franchise for the first time they demonstrated that they are an intelligent people who, with a half-decent break, can become a great asset to this country.

I am telling my hon. friend over here that I am going to vote against his subamendment. I am going to vote against the amendment of the leader of the opposition, because I want to get something done and not merely talk about it. We have said already we are bringing Newfoundland into confederation; we voted for it unanimously. I do not think any stop blocks should be put in the way of the legal steps necessary to back up our previous decision and amend our statutes so we can make available to the people of Newfoundland the things we have to give them.

That is my position in the matter. I am awfully sorry that in this day and age, living in the world as it is now, where there is trouble and misery, and where so often we find ourselves on shifting sands, this House of Commons has not given the people of Canada a demonstration that we are honest and truthful, and that regardless of where we sit in this house we are going to do the thing that is best for the Canadian people. I think the action taken by the government at this time is not only good for the Canadian people; it is also good for the people of Newfoundland because it will relieve human misery, and it should not be made a political football for election purposes by any section of this house.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I desire only two or three minutes, Mr. Speaker, in which to make a statement on the subamendment of my hon. friend, the member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix). I do not desire to go into any lengthy refutation of the speeches that have just been made by my hon. friends of the C.C.F. In that regard, I will confine my remarks to the argument of my hon. friend the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who has just spoken. Without question, it is another clear demonstration of the arguments one sees when someone tries to make the end justify the means; that is the old socialist, communist argument. It does not hold good within the boundaries of a free parliament. He may just as well carry it to its logical conclusion, as my hon. friend the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) says. On the basis of his argument we should also bring into confederation India and China because the people of those countries are certainly suffering great hardships.

Mr. Archibald: They might be better citizens than you.

Mr. Low: Some more of my communist friends.

Mr. Archibald: If you are calling me a communist, you are stating what is not true.

Mr. Irvine: Amen.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, it would be beneath my dignity to pay attention to my friend because those are exactly the tactics the communists use.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The group with which I am associated has no connection with communism. It has fought communism all through the years, and though I deprecate calling my hon. friend what he was called just now, I can understand why it was done. I feel this kind of thing should not be permitted.

Mr. Low: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Cruickshank: Let us have the vote.

Mr. Low: Yes, we will get to the vote. I do not intend to carry this particular question any further.

I should like to say the Social Credit party has given most earnest and careful consideration to the submissions of all the learned gentlemen who have spoken in this debate. We have weighed the arguments to the best of our ability and according to our lights. We have concluded that the procedure adopted by the government in this final step does, beyond any reasonable doubt, constitute an amendment to the British North America Act. This, therefore, introduces a new and tremendously important element into what, until yesterday, was nothing more than a clearly desirable objective, namely, the bringing of Newfoundland into confederation. In our view, that objective is still a desirable objective. We think it should be consummated at the earliest possible time. But, in the process of completing confederation, we do not propose to lend our hand to an amendment to the British North America Act by a simple majority vote of this house. We believe the constitution is much too sacred to be constantly subjected to the possibility of repeated changes by such means, particularly in this day when individual and minority rights and freedoms—yes, and human life itself—are valued so cheaply and are even held in utter contempt in many places in the world.

I said last night that it is our conviction that a satisfactory procedure for constitutional amendment should be formulated at the earliest possible time. It is a matter of urgency in my opinion because, as I view what has been taking place over the past few years, particularly since the beginning of the war, I find that the government has been laying down, piece by piece, a pattern of precedents which the government evidently hopes will govern the procedure for all future attempts to change the constitution.

In our opinion, this is no safeguard to the rights and freedoms of the people. We believe that an immediate effort must be made to establish adequate safeguards. It is precisely because powerful and evil forces are at work attempting to break down our bastions and render us powerless to protect our liberties that we sound anew the warning uttered so many years ago by the apostle Paul to the Galatians when he said,

Stand fast, therefore, in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free,—

Mr. Irvine: Hallelujah!

Mr. Low:

—and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage.

We propose to heed that warning. It is for that reason we must call a halt to the tampering with the British North America Act in the manner that has been followed so often in the past. For these reasons, we will vote for the subamendment. If that does not carry, we will vote for the amendment. Should that be defeated, we will vote against the resolution solely on the ground that it does involve an amendment to the British North America Act.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Témiscouata): I spoke for five minutes yesterday, Mr. Speaker, and I shall speak for two or three minutes today. In the first place, it is my intention to thank the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) for having said that the subamendment of my hon. friend the member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) is something, and the amendment of the leader of the opposition is nothing. I hope I have correctly quoted the hon. member.

Mr. Gillis: That is correct.

Mr. Pouliot: I found the speech of the leader of the opposition yesterday rather nebulous and it was for that reason I expressed no opinion as to how I would vote. Naturally, I will vote for something, and I will vote for the subamendment of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency. I will not vote for the amendment of the leader of the opposition unless he agrees to amend his own amendment by incorporating in it the subamendment of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency.

The leader of the opposition has often been accused of being inconsistent. I do not know if that is true, but I shall give him the benefit of the doubt. If he wishes to be consistent with his last speeches, however, and if the Conservative members who have spoken about provincial rights want to be considered consistent with the speeches they have made, they have only to make a gesture which will establish their sincerity. To establish their sincerity, they have only to vote for the subamendment proposed by my hon. friend the member for Quebec-Montmorency. I am very happy to congratulate him on that subamendment.

I want to warn the leader of the opposition. From the very beginning, I have been a consistent defender of provincial rights in the house. He can read the speeches I have made against the succession duties act; what I have said about the Rowell-Sirois commission, and my denunciation of the bureaucrats who made that report. My votes have been consistent. I can compare myself favourably with anyone in the party of the hon. leader of the opposition. I will go further. I will tell the hon. leader of the opposition the real meaning of the subamendment. It is a desire to give the veto to the provinces in connection with this Newfoundland business, in the same way as San Francisco has given the veto to the major powers. If the veto is good enough for the Russians, it is good enough for the provinces. There is no reason why the provinces should not have it.

I therefore warn the leader of the opposition that when he votes for the subamendment of my hon. friend, which I was glad to support, he will vote to give a veto to the provinces. Thereby he will tell the country that his sincerity was real, that his sincerity was greater than it appeared in the first place from his amendment, and that he wants to show that he is the real defender of the rights of the provinces and, to refer to St. Paul, that he has found in this house his road to Damascus. That does not mean that the leader of the opposition is my favourite apostle, but I treat him with the same consideration as I treat any one of my colleagues; and I offer him an olive branch. That gesture shows the kindly spirit animating the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) and me. We do not desire any tribute for that act of generosity. Our idea is to save the face of the leader of the opposition so that he will not be ashamed of himself when he returns to Carleton county and when he shaves tomorrow morning.

It is therefore my great pleasure to support wholeheartedly the subamendment moved by my hon. friend. With regard to the leader of the opposition and his satellites I will use the great words of a great Englishman, "We will wait and see."

Similia similibus curantur—the same evils are cured by the same remedies. It was perhaps wrong to give the veto to the major powers at San Francisco. To apply that Latin proverb, similia similibus curantur, the only thing to do in order to repair the evil that was done at San Francisco is to give the veto to the provinces.

I wish to pay a tribute to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), who was a precursor. He was the first one to mention the union of Newfoundland with Canada. He did so years ago. He deserves a special tribute. I also want to pay a special tribute to Senator Neil McLean, who has been most interested in this matter.

That being said, let me say it is not Newfoundland that I desire in the first place to join Canada. As my hon. friends will remember, years ago I suggested in this house that as we have no tropical regions in this country, if the British empire were to be split into fragments, the fragments that should come to us were Bermuda, Nassau, Jamaica and Trinidad. Now that there is no longer any British empire—we have been told that we are in a commonwealth instead of an empire, and that O.B.E.'s and M.B.E.'s have no more meaning—I wish to belong to the empire of Canada which will, with glory, succeed the British empire. The leader of the opposition is in such a mood of Canadianism that he will be glad to see the British empire replaced by the empire of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Howe: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the main motion.

Mr. Coldwell: No, Mr. Speaker; the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Glengarry): Mr. Speaker, I should not like this debate to conclude without an opportunity of saying a few words on the all-important question of the entry of Newfoundland into confederation. I doubt if hon. members would wish to wait longer this evening. Some have already asked that there be an adjournment, and therefore I move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow I hope we will have unanimous consent to answer the questions on the order paper and to proceed with the notices of motion for the production of papers. Afterward we will continue with this debate and, when it is concluded, take up Bill No. 12 to amend the statutes to adapt them for application to Newfoundland.

Mr. Graydon: And after that?

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, tomorrow is Wednesday; I do not think there will be anything after that.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.33 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—DEDUCTION OF UNION DUES

Mr. Arthur Williams (Ontario) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (deduction of union dues).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Williams: The purpose of this bill is to amend the federal labour code, which was adopted last year, by adding a new subsection 3 to section 6 of the act. The effect of the new subsection is to provide for the revocable voluntary check-off of union dues.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—ENFORCEMENT REGULATIONS

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 20, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (enforcement).

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—DEFINITION OF EMPLOYEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 21, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (definition of employee).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: This bill deletes a portion of subparagraph (i) of subsection 1 of section 2 of the federal labour code in which employees are defined. Its purpose is to remove a discrimination against certain groups of employees. In other words the bill would afford to certain categories of employees, now excluded from the provisions of the act, the right of collective bargaining.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENSION FUND SOCIETIES ACT

EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS TO OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF SUBSIDIARY CORPORATIONS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 18 (from the Senate) to amend the Pension Fund Societies Act.

CANADIAN SHIPMENTS OF AIRCRAFT TO CHINESE AIR FORCE

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Have any airplanes been shipped from Canada to Colonel W. M. Wang, A.T.S.C., Chinese Air Force, 10 Hainan road, Shanghai, China?
2. Were such airplanes supplied by Canada free of charge? If so, how many?
3. Were these airplanes sold by War Assets Corporation? If so, how many and at what price?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. There were no airplanes shipped by any government organizations to the addressee mentioned in this question. The Canadian Commercial Corporation, acting on behalf of the Chinese air force, did purchase from War Assets Corporation all Mosquito aircraft, and all spare parts, spare major assemblies, spare engines, tires and ground maintenance equipment, which are peculiar to Mosquito aircraft, and all armament and related spare parts as commonly used for arming Mosquito aircraft, which were reported to War Assets Corporation, as surplus, by the Department of National Defence.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM, YUKON TERRITORY

Mr. Black (Yukon):

1. What has the establishment and operation by the government of an experimental farm about 100 miles from Whitehorse in Yukon Territory cost, showing items of expenditure including salaries and wages?

2. What financial returns have there been from said farm?

3. What new agricultural information has been obtained from the operation of said farm, information not in possession of the Department of Agriculture prior to the establishment of said farm?

3. Previous to the establishment of the Whitehorse experimental substation, soil surveys had revealed the existence of several areas of land in the southern Yukon which appeared suitable for agricultural production, but no information was available on actual crop production. The operation of this substation has definitely proved that fair quality wheat, as well as excellent quality barley and oats, can be produced in this district, despite the more rigorous climatic conditions as compared with the Dawson area, in which investigations had been previously conducted. It has also been proved possible to produce reasonably good yields of the hardy vegetables and also of forage crops for hay and grazing purposes.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

METAL CURRENCY—ACQUISITION BY BANK OF CANADA OF GOLD PRODUCTION

Mr. Low:

1. What was the total face value of all coins minted at the Canadian mint, during 1948, for use in Canada?

2. What was the total value of recoined metal currency produced by the Canadian mint during 1948?

3. What government department, board, or agency placed the orders with the Royal Canadian Mint for the coins minted during 1948?

4. To whom, and for whose credit, were the coins minted for use during 1948, delivered?

5. By what detailed procedure does the Bank of Canada acquire the gold production of Canada?

Mr. Belzile:

1. Silver, $2,829,956; bronze, $708,300; nickel, $615,500.

2. Silver, $47,191.10; bronze, $42,428.21.

3 and 4. Subsidiary coins are produced in response to public demand. As the public desire more coins of various denominations, they obtain them at various branches of the chartered banks throughout Canada either by cashing cheques or by exchanging Bank of Canada notes for coins. The banks, as a result of this public demand, apply to the Bank of Canada for the coins which they require or which they estimate they will require. The Bank of Canada then orders appropriate amounts of the varying denominations of coins to fill the orders that have been given by the chartered banks and to maintain a small reserve to meet urgent demands. The coins are delivered to the agents of the Bank of Canada at Calgary, Halifax, Montreal, Ottawa, Regina, Saint John, Toronto, Vancouver and Winnipeg. From these agencies of the Bank of Canada they are delivered to the main offices of the chartered banks at agency points and then distributed by such main offices to other branch offices in the area as required.

5. The bank does not acquire the gold production of Canada—it does not now buy any gold for its own account but acts as a depository for gold held on account of the government and performs certain services in connection with gold transactions.

Nearly all gold newly mined in Canada is sold by the mines to the crown at the Royal Canadian Mint. The mint refines the gold and pays for it out of the consolidated revenue fund. The refined gold (except for a small amount sold for ordinary industrial or commercial purposes in Canada) is then transferred to the exchange fund account, which is a special statutory account maintained by the Minister of Finance under the provisions of the Foreign Exchange Control Act. The gold is transported from the mint to the vaults of the Bank of Canada where it is held in safekeeping for the exchange fund account. The exchange fund account reimburses the consolidated revenue fund for the value of the gold. Gold in the exchange fund account is part of Canada's exchange reserves. It may be sold by the account on instructions of the Minister of Finance, in which case the foreign exchange received in payment replaces it as part of the exchange fund account.

A small part of Canada's gold production which cannot be economically treated in Canada is exported to the United States under licence issued by the Minister of Finance. It is refined in the United States and sold there. The United States dollar proceeds must, in accordance with the foreign exchange control board regulations, be sold to the board and thus become part of the exchange fund account.

IMMIGRATION—DISPLACED PERSONS

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. How many displaced persons were brought into Canada in 1948 under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour?

2. How many displaced persons were brought into Canada during 1948 by individual employers?

3. How many displaced persons were brought into Canada in 1948 by individuals who are not employers?

Mr. MacKinnon:

1. The Department of Labour co-operated with the immigration branch in arranging for the entry of 21,012 persons for whom employment was found in Canada.

2. and 3. Information is not compiled in such a way as to permit of a precise answer to these questions. In addition to the total of 21,012 displaced persons shown in answer to question No. 1, 24,962 displaced persons admitted to Canada during the calendar year 1948 were destined to relatives under existing immigration regulations, and 632 were admitted under guarantee of employment by their sponsors. In some cases the relatives in Canada also supplied employment.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—COSTS OF ADMINISTRATION

Mr. McGregor:

What has been the cost in each of the last two fiscal years of the administration of unemployment insurance (a) expressed as total number of dollars for each year; (b) expressed as a percentage of the unemployment benefits paid in the corresponding year?

Mr. Coté (Verdun):

(a) The cost of administration of unemployment insurance, that is the collection of contributions and the distribution of benefits, is not ascertainable. The total cost of administration of the unemployment insurance commission, including all these functions, was: Fiscal year 1946-1947, $18,726,118.86; Fiscal year 1947-1948, $17,640,405.24.

Mr. Hatfield:

What was the amount per bushel or hundredweight paid to the starch factory in New Brunswick; also to the starch factory in Prince Edward Island in the year 1946-47 for potatoes processed under the agriculture prices starch support program?

In Prince Edward Island potatoes of the same grade were purchased from the growers at 92 cents per 100 pounds and sold to the starch factory at 60 cents per 100 pounds. In all cases the potatoes sold to starch factories were for starch making and not for resale.

2. If so, what steps are being taken in this connection?

Mr. McIlraith:

FLOUR—NITROGEN TRICHLORIDE AS BLEACHING AGENT

Mr. Young:

1. Has the government taken any action with respect to the use of nitrogen trichloride (NC_3), by millers, as an agent in the bleaching of flour?

Mr. Reid:

1. Yes.

2. (a) The food and drugs divisions of the Department of National Health and Welfare sent a representative to hearings in Washington, at which the use of nitrogen trichloride in flour was investigated.

(b) Although there is no evidence that nitrogen trichloride is harmful to humans in the amount present in white flour sold in this country, nevertheless, owing to the suspicion cast upon it by some animal experiments, regulations under the Food and Drugs Act are being revised to prohibit the use of nitrogen trichloride in flour sold in Canada.

Mr. McIlraith: Order for return.

Mr. Cockeram: May I ask when I can expect the return to be tabled? I do so because a similar question was asked last year; the return was tabled on February 18, and I think these figures are available in the department today. I would like to get them before the resolution on the order paper today with regard to the Foreign Exchange Control Act is brought before the house.

Mr. McIlraith: My information is that the figures will not be available until March 1. The return will be brought forward as soon as the figures are available.

Mr. Cockeram: The answers were given on February 18 of last year.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

1. What is the rate of postage on gift parcels to (a) England; (b) other European countries?
2. Who sets the rates of postage for these parcels?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Return tabled.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—VETERANS

Mr. McKay:

How many veterans were in receipt of unemployment insurance in Canada during (a) 1947; (b) 1948?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other communications exchanged between the government of Canada and the provincial governments from January 1, 1948 to date, concerning the construction of a trans-Canada highway.

Mr. MacKinnon: So far as we are concerned we are glad to have this order pass, but there appear to be confidential letters from some of the provinces, and I should like first to clear those letters with the provinces. In the meantime the order might pass.

Mr. Speaker: Carried with the reservation made by the minister.

INCOME TAX—RURAL TELEPHONE COMPANIES

Mr. Burton:

For a copy of all documents and correspondence exchanged during the past two years between the Saskatchewan government Department of Telephones and the Department of National Revenue regarding income tax returns by rural telephone companies.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLANNING

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of the architect's plan for the national capital project together with all letters and communications relative to the area thereof and the estimated cost of (a) acquiring the necessary lands; (b) removal of buildings thereon and all other anticipated costs and expenditures.

Mr. St. Laurent: I believe there is no objection to the motion, but I should like to state what I understand from it, to see if that is what the hon. member has in mind. The architect's plan to which he refers is presumably the report of Mr. Greber, who is the consultant of the national capital planning committee. That report has not yet been approved by the national capital planning committee, nor has it been submitted to the government. It is expected shortly, and as soon as it is received it will be tabled.

[Mr. Caouette.]

The motion refers to the area of the national capital project. As far as the area is concerned, there may be some confusion between the area it was felt desirable to designate as the national capital area for the purpose of establishing a framework within which planning could be carried on, and the parcels of land which it may be thought desirable to acquire for government buildings, driveways, and so forth. The national capital area is a large region, and has significance for purposes of planning, but there is no thought that it would ever be acquired in totality by the federal government.

We would understand that the letters and communications sought are in relation to the definition of the national capital planning area, while the estimates of costs are in relation to the lands of which the project recommends the acquisition. If that is what the hon. member wishes to have tabled, I will see to it that the report is prepared at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, what the Prime Minister has stated represents generally the purpose of my request. I should like to ascertain, though, if I may, when the report of Mr. Greber may be expected. There is a great deal of interest in it. I understand that a committee has been sitting in Ottawa from time to time in connection with the matter, and it seems to me the time has come for the Prime Minister to make a statement to the house and to the country.

Mr. St. Laurent: I will communicate with the chairman of the national capital planning committee and tell him it is the desire of the members of the house to have this document at the earliest possible moment.

Motion agreed to.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters and communications containing representations or suggested terms made by the government of Canada since January 1, 1948, to the united nations or its committee on international rights relative to the international declaration or charter of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

FAR EASTERN COMMISSION

Mr. Green:

For a copy of any reports issued by the far eastern commission subsequent to the report of the secretary general for the period from February 26, 1946 to July 10, 1947.

Mr. Lapointe: The report referred to in this order was tabled by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on Monday last.

Mr. Green: I believe there was a report tabled after my motion had been put on the order paper. If there are no other reports, I am satisfied to have the motion dropped.

Mr. Lapointe: There are no reports other than the one the minister tabled.

Motion dropped.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—OFFICE SPACE AT SIOUX LOOKOUT

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, memoranda, and other documents, in the possession of any department of the government having to do with the renting of office space for the unemployment insurance commission at 39 King street, Sioux Lookout, Ontario; also having to do with the amount of rent paid for the same; dated since January 1, 1946.

ACCIDENT STATISTICS

Mr. Church:

For a return showing the number of Canadians killed by (a) motor cars on the highway; (b) drowning; (c) accidents at level crossings; (d) fires in homes, showing number injured; (e) other accidents, showing number injured.

Mr. Howe: It will be observed that no period of time is mentioned in the question. The government will of course be glad to bring down the information, but there should be a limit to the period to which it shall apply. Perhaps my hon. friend will let me know.

Mr. Church: The bureau of statistics can give the information.

Mr. Howe: Does the hon. member want the information for 1948? If he will indicate his desire in that regard, I shall be glad to carry out the request.

SALE OF RAILWAY FLAT CARS

Mr. Young:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and agreements exchanged from June 1, 1946, to January 1, 1948, between War Assets Corporation, Manfred and Company of New York, and Quadra Trading Company Ltd., importers and exporters, of Vancouver, British Columbia, or their agents, Jones, Luscombe, and Leese, Ltd., of Vancouver, British Columbia, regarding the sale of railway broad-gauge flat cars.

INCOME TAX—LONDON, ONT., BUILDING

Mr. Manross:

For a copy of all correspondence, agreements, leases, contracts, documents, and building specifications exchanged between the government of Canada and Westmount Realties Limited of Montreal, and any other contractors, investors, or other persons in London, Ontario, regarding building to be erected in London, Ontario, for use of Income Tax Department.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS

QUESTION AS TO INQUIRY BY ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a question of the Prime Minister which has some relation to the motion for papers made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church)? Has the government been asked to appoint a royal commission to investigate the liquor problem in all its aspects, but with particular reference to highway accidents? If so, will the Prime Minister say whether such a royal commission will be set up?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): To the first part of the question the answer is in the affirmative. To the second part of the question the answer is that the representations made to the committee of cabinet have not yet been brought before council for consideration, but that will be done at the earliest opportunity.

CRIMINAL CODE

COMMISSION TO CARRY OUT REVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon B. Isnor (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, on January 31 the Minister of Justice, in reply to a question as to the appointment of a commission to carry out the revision of the Criminal Code, gave the names of the representatives from the various sections of Canada. Is it the minister's intention to appoint to this commission a representative from Nova Scotia? If so, is he in a position to give the name of that representative?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. W. C. Dunlop, K.C., of Windsor and Halifax, is to be appointed the maritime representative on this committee.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLANNING

QUESTION AS TO EXPROPRIATION OF PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister arising out of a statement he made in connection with the motion for papers standing in the name of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). As I understood him, the Prime Minister said the architect's report has not yet been approved by the national capital planning committee. If that is so, may I ask the Prime Minister under what authority properties are now being expropriated for the purposes of the national capital project?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The hon. member would be under a false apprehension if he felt that nothing could be done for the requirements of the public service until the project was shown on the Greber plan and approved by the national capital planning committee. There are many projects being considered individually and being dealt with on that basis. The reference was to a general report for the planning of the national capital, looking forward for many years. Such a general report is now being considered by the national capital planning committee, and, as I stated a few moments ago, I will ask that committee to expedite its consideration of the report so that it may be brought before the house at the earliest possible moment.

WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS OF SESSION OF 1947-48—QUESTION OF NECESSITY FOR PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. Bentley (Swift Current): Will the Minister of Justice inform the house whether it is his intention to give a ruling on the need for provincial legislation to make effective the amendments to the wheat board act passed during the last session, as requested by the then premier of Manitoba?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The hon. member omitted to give me any notice of the question. I shall try to bring an answer down tomorrow.

IMMIGRATION

REGULATIONS GOVERNING ENTRY INTO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Douglas G. Ross (St. Paul's): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources. I have not given him notice of the question, and I do not apologize for that. It seems to me there is a certain amount of misunderstanding—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Ross (St. Paul's): —in connection with immigrants coming to Canada. What regulations are there in this regard? I have a great many letters—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows very well that the purpose of a question is to obtain information from the ministry, not to give information.

Mr. Ross (St. Paul's): I could have put my question the other way around, but it is this: Will the minister make a statement on immigration, and give the authority under which the regulations are made? Will he do this in the near future, so that the people of Canada may know more about it? I want an answer.

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): I shall be glad to look at the question of the hon. member. There will be opportunities for giving the information for which the hon. member has asked. Upon further consideration it may be deemed advisable to make a formal statement, and if that is so I shall do so.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

QUESTION AS TO SALE OF PORTIONS OF LAND PURCHASED UNDER VETERANS LAND ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Can the minister say whether consideration has been given to allowing veterans, who have bought land under the Veterans Land Act, to sell a portion of the two or more acres before the ten-year period expires which is mentioned in the agreement? If this were allowed it would permit the veteran to pay part of his indebtedness to the government. There are many veterans who need permission to do this.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I can tell the hon. member that consideration has been given to that proposal, but it has not been decided to put it into effect.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO CHOICE OF ROUTE THROUGH B.C. MOUNTAIN PASS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Matthews (Kootenay East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. I am sorry I was not able to send him notice of my question. Is it true that the central route through Kicking Horse pass has been definitely chosen for the Trans-Canada highway in British Columbia?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): I have not heard of it.

WHEAT

PAYMENTS DURING PRESENT CROP YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Wood Mountain): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can he inform the house whether or not the twenty-cent advance in the price of wheat will be paid during this crop year, as announced by him and by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) at the Alberta and Saskatchewan wheat pool convention last November?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I can speak only for myself. I have not announced a twenty-cent payment on behalf of the wheat pool. I have announced that there will be a payment, and I can say that such payment will be made before seeding of the next crop.

Mr. Argue: According to press reports, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce announced a twenty-cent increase.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture, supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Argue). Did the minister make an announcement that a twenty-cent payment would be made to the farmers?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member is asking me?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes. Are you not the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Rowe: One sows and the other reaps.

Mr. Gardiner: The answer to the question in a word would be no, but I hardly think that would satisfy the curiosity of my hon. friend. The statement which I made, I think on the same day that the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke in Calgary, was to the effect that an additional payment would be made, and that it would be approximately twenty cents. I might say that I think that suggestion will be carried out when the announcement is finally made.

Mr. Rowe: The ministers should have had a rehearsal.

GANDER AIRPORT

QUESTION AS TO LANDING RIGHTS FOR COMMERCIAL COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the leader of the opposition asked my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) a question in connection with facilities at Gander. The question was as follows:

> I should like to know under what authority the information was conveyed about two weeks ago to embassies, ministries or other official offices of those countries in which there are companies which have commercial air operations going through Gander, to the effect that they would not have commercial landing rights at Gander on and after April 1 next.

The reason I am answering the question is that the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that I do so, in his absence. The information I have is that no such information was conveyed to the embassies, ministries and the like. The air service operations to the island of Newfoundland are threefold. First, there are the operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines; they are to be continued and perhaps expanded after the union. Then there are the commercial air services other than T.C.A. and Newfoundland has been told that they will be permitted to continue operation without interruption. Finally, there are the international air services which operate through the port of Gander. Those services are performed by international companies enjoying landing rights by virtue of the international air transit agreement, as well as traffic rights, and also by virtue of the bilateral agreements which the United Kingdom government has entered into with other countries and which the government of Newfoundland has also entered into. After union it is the intention of the Canadian government to see that any policy relating to international agreements and the granting of commercial rights in Newfoundland be consistent with policy followed in Canada. Our policy which was adopted in respect of international civil aviation and the granting of commercial traffic rights in Newfoundland must be consistent with the general policy normally followed by the government of Canada. We have already entered into discussions with these countries, with a view to bringing these agreements into line with our Canadian policy. Discussions to this end are now under way.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the minister would permit me to clarify the question which is raised by the explanation he has given on the third point. What he has said on the third point is in conformity with the information I have received and which led to the question yesterday, namely, that communications had been conveyed through official channels which indicated the revision of existing commercial landing rights at Gander in Newfoundland as of and after April 1. The statement the minister has made, that these arrangements are to be brought into conformity with existing arrangements in Canada, indicates an important change in the situation which I think should be noted and followed up. I do not intend to pursue the matter now, but the minister will find that the result will be to limit the landing rights of those international carriers to what are described as technical landing rights as distinguished from commercial landing rights. The limitation will have a profound effect upon transportation in and out of Newfoundland by this means of communication.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FILMING OF NATIONAL CAPITAL PLANNING PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, following his statement with regard to the national capital project. On what authority has the national film board, as reported in the press, spent $13,000 or $14,000 on filming the capital planning when this planning is not even completed, according to the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I will look at the hon. member's question and ascertain whether or not there is any foundation for the press reports to which he refers.

NEWFOUNDLAND

TERMS OF UNION WITH CANADA—ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King respecting the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Glengarry): I should not like the debate on this resolution to conclude, Mr. Speaker, without saying how greatly pleased and grateful I am to have the opportunity of joining with my fellow members of this House of Commons in the concluding stages of the necessary steps to be taken to bring Newfoundland into confederation. When the resolution is adopted, this House of Commons will have taken, so far as its authority extends, the last necessary step to effect the union of Newfoundland with Canada.

As you, Mr. Speaker, will recall, on Friday afternoon last the Prime Minister indicated that there were some hon. members who would wish to speak on the terms of union but who were not present at the time, and that an opportunity would be given them to speak on this motion. It was the desire, I think, of all who were present that the third reading should be carried on Friday afternoon, and it was so carried, after but one hon. member had spoken.

In my remarks this afternoon, which will be brief, I hope no exception will be taken to my referring to the debate on the terms of union as approved by this house. In other words, I do not wish to be held too strictly to speaking solely on the matter of procedure, which is the one dealt with in the resolution.

I count myself as very fortunate in having had the privilege, as head of the government at the time, of welcoming to Ottawa in the name of Canada the delegation from the national convention of Newfoundland, headed by the Hon. Mr. Bradley, which came to Ottawa to consider and discuss with representatives of our government whether there was a fair and generally acceptable basis for federal union with Canada. The delegation had its first meeting with representatives of our government on June 25, 1947. That was the beginning of the conversations which led to the negotiations that resulted in a basis of union since drafted into an agreement that has met with the approval of hon. members. It was also my privilege to have shared with some of my former colleagues in some of the other proceedings which led up to that agreement.

The basis of union having been firmly established, and the terms of agreement having been approved by this house I should like to take the earliest opportunity of warmly congratulating the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his colleagues, who carried on the subsequent conferences with representatives of Newfoundland, on the successful manner in which they have carried through the negotiations. Their task was not an easy one. It required on all sides a good deal in the way of tact, judgment and patience. It speaks well for the representatives of Newfoundland and the representatives of Canada that in the time at their disposal it was possible for them to reach an agreement which has since commended itself so favourably to hon. members of all parties in this house.

I should like to say a special word about the Prime Minister's contribution to the success of the working out of the terms of the agreement. I happen to know something of the zeal which he showed in upholding the cause of union. From the very beginning he made the cause of union his own. He spared neither time, energy, nor aught of his great abilities in seeking to bring about the happy result which in this house we are rejoicing over today.

May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, as the oldest member of this House of Commons—I hasten to say, not oldest in years, but in years of membership in this house—to congratulate hon. members collectively on the quality, yes, the excellence of the debate which took place on the terms of union. The debate, naturally, was one of the memorable debates in the annals of our country's history. It is bound to be so regarded, it will be so regarded, since it marks one of the significant milestones in Canada's development. It was a debate of which Canada's House of Commons may well be proud, a debate in every way worthy of the purpose that it was intended to serve, the high and noble purpose of bringing confederation to its full stature.

May I congratulate hon. members, not only collectively but individually, on having come into the right of being included among members of that distinguished company which is known as the makers of Canada. Every one in this house who assisted in bringing about this union has earned some title to that distinction.

It was all of a century and a quarter ago that one and more of the leading public men in this country began to advocate what was then referred to as a union of all the British-American colonies. It is that union which has been all but brought about at this time. Not only has that result been achieved, but today we have all but succeeded in bringing about what we all I think have had much at heart, namely, the rounding out, in its true proportions, of the Canada we had all hoped to live to see.

I should like particularly this afternoon to speak as a Canadian, as a representative of the people of Canada in this House of Commons. I hope we all remember that we are here not merely as representatives of individual constituencies, but as representatives of the people of Canada as a whole. In speaking as one of such, I should like above all to say how warmly and sincerely all Canada, as at present constituted, will welcome the entrance into confederation of the island province of Newfoundland and how delighted we are at the welcome which we know awaits Newfoundland when, as the tenth province of Canada, she is greeted by her nine sister provinces.

It must be a source of deepest satisfaction to the people of Newfoundland who followed the debate on the terms of union, as it is to the people of Canada, to realize that with respect to each of the essential successive steps in this historic transaction, there has been, with the exception of a single dissenting voice, unanimous approval by the members of Canada's House of Commons. The one dissenting voice has only helped to emphasize the completeness of our unanimity. Nothing could more eloquently express the warmth of the welcome which this House of Commons extends to the people of Newfoundland on becoming a part of Canada. Nothing could more eloquently have expressed the feeling of the people of Canada, as disclosed by their representatives here, than this unanimity. When Newfoundland comes into confederation it will be a day of nation-wide rejoicing, rejoicing over the northern half of an entire continent from sea to sea, rejoicing from the break of dawn on the easternmost shores of the Atlantic, to the last glow of the setting sun on the westernmost shores of the Pacific.

I have desired to say only these few words, Mr. Speaker. I have felt that in the minds of some, the discussion of the last day of two on a matter of procedure may have served to dim the brightness of the achievement itself, the great objective which was reached so splendidly in the course of the debate on the agreement.

There can be no doubt that the union of Newfoundland with Canada will be to the mutual advantage of the peoples of both countries. It will, however, mean more than mere mutual advantage. The talent, the enterprise, the resources which each will contribute to the other will help to strengthen both. What is more, at a time such as the present, it will help to give each of us a greater confidence as we face the uncertainties of the future.

There will undoubtedly be difficulties to be overcome; there will be obstacles to be surmounted; there will be rough places to be made smooth once the union has taken place. Readjustments are always difficult but these are domestic matters which will be as successfully met as similar problems in the past have been met. What, I believe, is most important of all, is the fact that this union, when it comes into being, will be of great mutual advantage not only to Newfoundland and to Canada, but to all countries which, directly or indirectly, are concerned with the maintenance of peace. It will mean more effective co-operation between free nations at this time of great uncertainty in world movements and affairs. It means much to have the most effective co-operation between all of those nations that cherish kindred ideas and ideals and which are anxious to protect their freedom.

Union will be of advantage not only to the provinces which have combined to make a larger Canada, advantages in the way of strength and security. It will be of advantage in particular to other parts of the British commonwealth of nations and to the United States of America in their common efforts at the maintenance of peace. The more that can be brought about in these days by way of effective co-operation between nations which seek to maintain the peace, the better it is going to be for mankind.

It is true that sometimes it takes the small things of the world to confound the strong. It may well be that out of this union of two democracies on the North American continent, this union of forces in no way comparable to some of the great world forces, there may nevertheless be imparted to other communities some of that strength which will help to preserve the freedom of mankind. May we not all wish and believe that a divine blessing will rest upon such a union.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the wholehearted and genuine applause which greeted the former Prime Minister, the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King), upon his happily chosen words this afternoon, will be an indication to him of that unanimity, to which he referred in his remarks, with which the admirable people of Newfoundland will be welcomed into a great, and perhaps now an even greater, Dominion of Canada.

I have followed the right hon. gentleman in this debate; and, if I may, perhaps I might at this stage follow the procedure he adopted in a debate in 1943 on a somewhat similar matter, which procedure is reported at page 4347 of Hansard of July 5 of that year. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, I intend to move at once that this question be now put.

Then the right hon. gentleman proceeds to indicate his authority for moving in that fashion. Basing my motion now upon the same authority as that used by the right hon. member for Glengarry, I desire at this stage to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green):

> That the question be now put.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the motion placed before the house, I wish to say that I feel sure every member in the house shares the feelings expressed by the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) toward the people of Newfoundland, and the desire for harmonious union with that ancient colony more recently given the status of a dominion, the future of which is under consideration at this time.

Every speech—or shall I say nearly every speech—made in the debate has indicated the extremely warm feeling of the people of Canada as expressed through their representatives in the House of Commons towards those splendid people, whose background is so closely intertwined with our own. And there has been, almost without exception, a very strong feeling of sentimental attachment toward a people whose association in peace and war has brought to our own people an increasing respect for all that they represent.

Obviously, however, there has been some misunderstanding of certain aspects of the discussion which has taken place in this chamber. The issue which has been under discussion, and in relation to which many members have expressed their opinions, is not the issue of Newfoundland entering into the union of Canadian confederation, or otherwise. The discussion which has been taking place on the main motion is one relating to the procedure by which that association is to be consummated. Any attempt to create the impression that a discussion of the constitutional aspects of this problem is out of place in this debate is not in keeping with the position of this House of Commons, and is not in keeping with a recognition of the fundamental importance of the constitution, not only to the people of Canada, but to the people of Newfoundland who must look to that constitution as their assurance of the validity of the undertakings now given to them. And the very time we should be least willing to tamper with the provisions of our constitution in any way is the time when we extend the hand of friendship to the people of Newfoundland, and say to them, "Here are the terms we offer you; and, as an assurance of the sanctity of those terms, here is the constitution under which we live."

It is so easy to make statements to the effect that a different point of view has been expressed on different occasions. I would suggest to those hon. members who make these loose assertions, more designed for consumption outside than inside the house—

An hon. Member: How well you know it.

Mr. Drew: —that they bear in mind that there has been no more vigorous advocate of the sanctity of our constitution than the right hon. member for Glengarry, who has just spoken.

It was said last night by one hon. member immediately to my left that, after all, there were matters of urgent importance to consider, that we must examine those from the point of view of the welfare of the people of Newfoundland, and that we must not be too concerned with a mere argument as to technical details. This is not the first time discussions have taken place in the house on matters of great importance, and which were of great concern to many people at that time. It will be recalled that during the 1930's there were most urgent reasons for steps being taken to meet the very difficult conditions which arose at that time by reason of the economic storm which swept the whole world. It will be recalled by every member of the house that, in an effort to deal with the conditions which then existed, the Prime Minister of that time, who has been quoted in this debate, placed before the house legislation designed to meet some of these extremely difficult human problems which were causing concern to every thinking Canadian. It will be recalled that the various social security measures put forward by the Prime Minister of that day, the late Lord Bennett, did not come into effect until some time afterwards, because it was pointed out that there were constitutional reasons why that should not be done, and that, no matter how desirable action of that kind might be, it would be most unwise to create, for the future, a precedent which was established upon a violation of the constitution.

It will be recalled by every member of the house that it was the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) who, exercising his very proper prerogative as leader of the opposition, pointed out what he regarded as constitutional defects in these extremely important measures which every Canadian knew were to the advantage of Canadians at that time in so far as the purpose was concerned.

Mr. Howe: He did not bring them down.

Mr. Rowe: You were not even here then.

Mr. Howe: I was not around.

Mr. Rowe: That is why you do not understand it.

Mr. Drew: It can always be read in Hansard. Those bills dealt with matters of great human concern. No one can plead today, any more than he could plead then, that there were not urgent reasons why this parliament should deal with those matters if it lay within its power to do so. It will be recalled that at that time the argument was put forth that it could be done under the broad reference of peace, order and good government, having relation also to certain undertakings which had been given in the international sphere. During the course of the debate which has taken place about the entry of Newfoundland into confederation with Canada, we have heard that the thing which must be considered here is whether or not this parliament has that measure of supremacy which makes it possible for it to deal with the things which could be done by the representatives of Canada. The argument is not new. In fact it was put forward in support of the measures to which I have referred, and which undoubtedly were measures that were being sought by the people of Canada at that time.

When it is suggested that an unusual practice is indicated when the proposal is made that the provinces should be consulted about amendment of the British North America Act, which unquestionably affects their interests as well as the interests of Newfoundland, may I remind hon. members that in the very discussions to which I have referred the need for consulting the provinces was mentioned, and was emphasized in most vigorous arguments. Perhaps it would be appropriate that I quote certain words spoken by the then leader of the opposition, who is now the right hon. member for Glengarry, because they indicate recognition of this very principle. Granted the subject matter was different, granted that some of the constitutional questions hinged on different points, yet it must be remembered that a proposal had been made that the dominion government deal with the matter by virtue of its overriding powers under the constitution. The argument had been made that this was something which it was essential for the government to deal with, but the proposals were opposed, and this was one of the statements made in the debate. I read, from page 750 of Hansard of February 12, 1935, the words of the right hon. member for Glengarry. They are as follows:

> We have all seen, understanding the jurisdiction to be as we all along have believed it to be, that, if a national scheme of unemployment insurance was to be drawn up, it could be done only in one of two ways. One way was by agreement with the provinces whereby they would act within their jurisdiction and the government of Canada would contribute grants in aid, as has been done in the case of old age pensions; the other way was by amending the British North America Act in a manner that would enable this federal parliament alone to deal with the question. We always said that a conference with the provinces, if properly carried on, would enable us to reach agreement on an amendment of the British North America Act, but five years have been lost in the holding of any conference of the kind. I say here that we will yet discover that such a conference must take place.

May I remind the members that I am quoting from the words of the right hon. member for Glengarry.

> I say here that we will yet discover that such a conference must take place; we will yet discover, before any legislation of this character comes within the jurisdiction of the federal government, that it will have to be by the path of some conference between the dominion and the provinces, and through agreement reached as a result thereof.

Mr. Martin: Was that the unemployment insurance debate?

Mr. Drew: On February 12, 1935.

Mr. Martin: The unemployment insurance measure?

Mr. Drew: I have given the page reference, page 750 of Hansard of that date. As the members will recall, the provinces were subsequently consulted, and as a result of that consultation, agreement and understanding, the amendment to the British North America Act, providing that the dominion parliament could deal with unemployment insurance, was duly advanced in the ordinary way. Surely no one will question the fact that the subject matter of the discussion on that occasion was a matter of vital concern to Canada, and to the people of Canada.

Mr. Mackenzie King: If I may interrupt my hon. friend on the essential point of what he is discussing, is it not that the matter he refers to was one which belonged to the provinces and could not be dealt with by the federal government without agreement by the provinces?

Mr. Drew: Yes, but I think perhaps the right hon. member for Glengarry may not have been here when I pointed out that there is nothing in the British North America Act which draws a distinction between those cases where the interests of the provinces are involved and where they are not, where it is within the exclusive jurisdiction and where it may not be. Never yet has there been any settlement as to where the borderline is; and one of the things under consideration for some time, which was actually discussed at the meetings of the dominion-provincial conference which began here in Ottawa on August 6, 1945, was the desirability of establishing a clear division of responsibility, a clear division of legislative and administrative authority, and also finding a way in which we could actually deal with our own constitution without any uncertainty as to how it was to be done.

In this case we have before us a matter that does involve an amendment to the British North America Act. Any suggestion that it does not involve such an amendment has been disposed of by certain statements made by hon. members on the opposite side.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sorry to have to intervene, Mr. Speaker, but on a point of order I think I owe it to the house, having the responsibility of leadership in the house, to point out that it is the rule that a matter which has been decided by the house cannot be debated again during the same session. The question whether or not the provinces should be consulted in respect of this matter was debated during two days and was determined yesterday by a rather decisive vote. Though it is always most interesting to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on these matters, I do not think it is in order to hear him again on the matter which was decided last evening.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to debate the point that has been raised. I am speaking on the motion, and I will be happy to furnish the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) with the best authority I have seen on the right of an hon. member to debate a motion of this kind, since the matter was in fact discussed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and is provided for in the rules of this house. But I am not going to argue the point because I want to proceed with the main motion, following the remarks I have made.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not challenging the right of the hon. gentleman to debate the motion that the question be now put. I am challenging the right of the hon. member, in debating that motion, to raise issues that were decided by the vote of last evening.

Mr. Drew: I have no intention of debating the point raised by the Prime Minister because, very conveniently, he raised the point exactly at the time I had finished my remarks in that respect.

Mr. St. Laurent: I should like a ruling on my point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Prime Minister has brought to my attention the fact that last evening the question whether this matter should be referred to the provinces was decided. In view of that, under the rules of the house that point is not again debatable.

Mr. Drew: As I indicated, Mr. Speaker, I intend to proceed with a discussion of the remarks that have been made and of the main motion.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You have spoken already on the main motion.

Mr. Drew: Or rather with the motion with which we are dealing.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Under the rules of the house an hon. member who has already spoken on the main motion may speak on the motion now before the house.

Mr. Drew: As was indicated earlier, and as I have already indicated this afternoon, there is almost complete if not complete unanimity in the desire to bring Newfoundland into Canada under terms that will be acceptable to that country and that will maintain harmony and good will in that new part of Canada in the years that lie ahead. As has been pointed out on many occasions however, we in this house have a responsibility to make sure that the course we follow is in keeping with our own practice and our own constitution, and that it produces no precedents which may endanger the sanctity of that constitution; and also that we do nothing to weaken respect for our constitution on the part of those whom we intend to welcome as members of the Canadian federation. I have already quoted the words of the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King)—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —indicating the necessity of recognizing the importance of that constitution; and I am pointing out now that the debate which has been going on in this house has related to constitutional procedure, that we have already dealt with the principle involved, and that this is not what is now before us. We have stated our position clearly. We have made it plain that there is a way to deal with this matter which does not violate the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: We want to welcome Newfoundland into Canada on terms that will preserve harmony, good will and unity in the coming years. We do not want them coming in by the back door; we want them coming through the front door as friends welcomed into the Canadian family.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make it clear that, recognizing the importance of the principle involved, and insisting that the constitution be respected, it is our intention to vote against this improper procedure which is now before us.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I was hoping that the remarks of the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) would conclude the debate on a high tone and with unanimity; but I regret that we have now had a discussion, entirely out of order, dealing with matters which were voted upon and disposed of last evening. You know, there are some people who think of constitutions when it suits their convenience. There are constitutions that govern the relationships of the various parts of a country; there are constitutions that govern bodies of men and women elected to public office. We have in this house a constitution which lays down certain rules of procedure; and if we are going to respect constitutions generally I think all of us should set an example by observing the constitution of this house; for example is much better than precept.

In the debate last night we disposed of certain aspects of the constitution. When the hon. leader of the opposition was speaking, I was tempted to have something further to say about the attitude of the early fathers of confederation, and particularly Sir John A. Macdonald. Since that is not permitted by the rules of the house, I am not going to do so. I am not going to repeat what I said before about the entry of Newfoundland into confederation. It is a great event in our Canadian history. As the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) said a few moments ago in a few well chosen words, it rounds out this great confederation.

One hundred and twenty-five years ago we were a few scattered colonies in British North America; today we are united, and I hope permanently united, people. We are not stretched in scattered communities across this continent, but welded together as a great, powerful, influential and prosperous nation. If we are going to preserve that nation, there are in relation to our constitution some matters that we should be considering at the present time. During the course of this debate, we have heard so much about the constitution. We like to think our constitution preserves freedom of speech. I am afraid that, in some parts of Canada today, freedom of speech has been threatened from time to time.

Equally important with some of the aspects of the constitution that have been discussed within the last few days is freedom of worship according to the dictates of one's conscience; freedom to associate in our religious organizations; freedom to express ourselves through press and radio. At this time I mention those three particularly because I have been reading the newspapers. I have read that the allies of my hon. friends of the Conservative party are undermining all three of those freedoms. Only this morning I read in my hon. friends' newspaper, the Montreal Gazette, that the leader of L'Union Nationale, Mr. Duplessis, in the province of Quebec had advised retail merchants to exert pressure upon the newspapers to prevent a certain kind of publicity in that province. I say, Mr. Speaker, that that kind of thing reinforces what the leader of the opposition said in 1936, that there was a growing fascism in the province of Quebec. This undermining is done by the ally of my hon. friends.

If we are going to guard the great heritage given to us by the fathers of confederation, we have to have the right to promote the development of our individual cultures. I do not think there is anyone in this house who would gainsay the fact that at the very root—

An hon. Member: You do not know.

Mr. Coldwell: Someone says I do not know; that might be said of some of the people about whom I am talking this afternoon. There is no one in this house who should fail to recognize that the very foundation of this country lies upon the recognition of the right to divers cultures. We want to see that that right is adequately protected in our country's constitution. We want protection of the right to maintain those things given to the provinces under section 92 of the British North America Act; the right to maintain those social welfare services and responsibilities attached particularly to family life.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that if we are going to build the kind of nation we wish Canada to be, then those problems that are of national importance can be dealt with only on a national scale. In order that all our people shall have an equal opportunity, such matters must be placed more under the control of this parliament; that is not centralization.

Mr. Fleming: It certainly is.

Mr. Coldwell: It is common sense. Today we have no national health program.

Mr. Martin: Oh, yes, we have.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Fraser: You should not kick your bedfellow.

Mr. Coldwell: We have no national health program comparable to those which exist in other civilized and progressive countries. True, some foundation may have been laid by the health grants, but those health grants are a long way from the kind of national health program this country needs at the present time.

We need a national marketing system. The predecessors of my hon. friends to the right, the Progressive Conservatives, enacted such a a bill in 1935. It was declared ultra vires of this parliament. We need national social security. Those are policies we need and they should be the constitutional right of Canadian citizens; the right to security, life, liberty and happiness from the cradle to the grave.

So I say that, when we are thinking of the entry of Newfoundland into this confederation, I hope it will highlight some of these problems which are as much constitutional problems as those other factors which have been debated in this house during the past two or three days. On behalf of my colleagues and myself, I should like to say we welcome the people of Newfoundland. They have a remarkable history. I am not going over their history again because I mentioned some of its interesting features when this matter was introduced in the house. They are the descendants of hardy fisherfolk, in the main; descendants of the people who braved the storms of the Atlantic and settled on the island to the east of us against great odds, discouragements and preventions. Today I wanted to mention some considerations which we must keep in mind if we are to make Canada great, not geographically, but in humanity, in progress and in welfare. We must keep these basic conditions in mind if we want to build a great country which will be an example to the rest of the world. Let us hope that, when Newfoundland is gathered into the family of Canadian provinces, we may go forward with renewed courage and renewed hope to a healthier, happier and more secure Canadian nation.

(Translation):

Mr. Frederic Dorion (Charlevoix-Saguenay): In view of certain remarks that have just been made, I feel bound to add a few words.

I had not intended to participate in this debate, but I believe it behooves me to do so, on account of some remarks which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has just made. Even if this debate has only served to reveal the stand of our public men with regard to certain ideologies which are now spreading across Canada, I must say that it has had a good result.

Even though the leader of the C.C.F. should make a show of fighting communism, as he has claimed he was doing these last few days, even though he should tell us to protect ourselves against communism, it is well that we should know where he stands. It is edifying to see him take the defence of communism as he has just done by his remarks on the province of Quebec.

I am proud of the fact that the present government of the province of Quebec has set an example to the whole world in the fight it is now waging against communism, against the subversive ideologies of this day; and if governments had followed the same course in Hungary, in Czechoslovakia, in Poland and in Roumania, we would not have to lament what is now taking place, we would not have to lament the scandalous persecutions which we are now witnessing.

It is well, Mr. Speaker, that we should know what direction our political men are taking, and who are their supporters and friends; and I am glad that this debate has been initiated this afternoon, because it has given us the opportunity of ascertaining where the friends of communists are to be found.

(Text):

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The point of order is my contention that it is impossible to adopt the main motion now since it contains a statement which is not true. I mention one in particular. Before that, there were joint motions from the House of Commons and the Senate. At the present time the motion is submitted to both houses. In the motion I read the following paragraph:

> And whereas the agreement containing terms of union between Canada and Newfoundland set out in the schedule to this act has been duly approved by the parliament of Canada and by the government of Newfoundland;

I do not know whether the government of Newfoundland has approved it. It may have done so. But the parliament of Canada has not yet approved it. The Senate is still at it. Although this is the last stage of discussion in the House of Commons, I do not see how we can adopt the motion without an amendment to the effect that it has not yet been adopted by the Senate. The wording of the motion is wrong. If we vote in favour of that motion, we approve a procedure which has not been rightly drafted. My point of order is that the motion should be amended accordingly or the debate should be adjourned until the Senate has passed the bill in all stages.

Mr. St. Laurent: Speaking to the point of order, I would invite the hon. member to read the resolution. It is a resolution that a petition be presented jointly by the two houses of parliament. The hon. member can have the assurance that the petition will not be presented until parliament has finally disposed of the bill; and when it is presented it will be true that parliament will have approved the measure in question.

I take it that I am concluding the debate. I would not want to go on at this point if there are other members who wish to speak.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, certainly I do not wish to speak, but if the Prime Minister speaks now he is speaking to the previous question which was moved by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). He can speak again later on.

Mr. St. Laurent: The previous question prevents any amendment of the main motion. The previous question having been moved, nothing else can be decided but the main motion. There does not have to be a previous decision on the previous question. The moving of the previous question prevents any other matter but the main motion being put to the house. All those who are entitled to speak on the main motion may of course do so now. If there are others who wish to speak, I will not do so at this moment, because I would be closing the debate.

Mr. Graydon: I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister has fully appreciated the point that is involved here. The debate to which I referred when I was moving the motion in the original instance, that is, on July 5, 1943, bears out, I think, my understanding that the motion then was on all fours with this, both as to the substance of the resolution and as to the procedure. I think the Prime Minister will readily see that there are two matters to be disposed of. One is the motion I made, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), that the question be now put. If the Prime Minister will turn to page 4367 of Hansard of July 5, 1943, he will find that the first motion put there was the motion of the right hon. member for Glengarry, then Prime Minister, who moved at that time that the question be now put. That motion was then decided by a vote of the house. When that motion had been disposed of, the Speaker then said, "The question is on the main motion", which was the motion moved by the then Minister of Justice, now Prime Minister; and upon that motion the house decided. But there were two different motions which had to be disposed of by the house, by means of a vote or otherwise.

Mr. St. Laurent: The whole of the debate must take place before either of the motions is put. When the motion "that the question be now put" has been affirmed, it is immediately put.

Mr. Knowles: But it might be defeated.

Mr. St. Laurent: If it is defeated, of course the debate goes on.

Mr. Graydon: That is right.

Mr. St. Laurent: But if it is agreed to, the question is immediately put. If I have anything to say on the main motion, I must say it now; otherwise, in the event of the previous question being adopted by the house, I would be deprived of my right of saying it.

Mr. Graydon: That is quite right.

Mr. St. Laurent: On the main motion, I merely wish to make two short points. The first is that should the attitude announced by the leader of the opposition be the attitude of the house—that is to say, that this motion be rejected—that would mean that there would be no union of Newfoundland with Canada on the terms that have been approved by this house.

Mr. Rowe: Not necessarily.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, it would; because, unless there is a petition, there cannot be a bill in the parliament of the United Kingdom. And unless there is a bill in the parliament of the United Kingdom, receiving the royal assent before March 31, 1949, all the work that has been done up to this time falls by the wayside and must be started over again. The second point I wish to make is this. I would ask Mr. Speaker, when putting the main motion, to call for the yeas and nays so that all members of this house, on this historic occasion, may have the privilege of standing up and letting their fellow members in this house and their fellow Canadians know what their position is.

Mr. Speaker: The question before the house is the motion moved by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and seconded by the hon.

Newfoundland

member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), that the question be now put. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the motion of the Prime Minister?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The house divided on the main motion (Mr. St. Laurent) which was agreed to on the following division:

(Text):

STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT

AMENDMENTS TO IMPLEMENT TERMS OF UNION OF NEWFOUNDLAND WITH CANADA

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, to amend the statute law.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Knowles: May this section stand until the Minister of Finance returns?

Section 6 stands.

Sections 7 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

On section 13—Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Mr. Nowlan: I think it is desirable that the Minister of Transport should make a statement with respect to the incidence of the Maritime Freight Rates Act as far as Newfoundland is concerned. I do not know whether he wishes to do that now or whether the section should stand until some other time. I am particularly concerned with the Maritime Freight Rates Act in so far as water carriage is concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: The section is clearly indicative of the intention of the agreement, namely, that the advantages that are contained in the Maritime Freight Rates Act should be made applicable to the province of Newfoundland. In the previous debate I dealt with the freight rates structure at some length, and I do not think it is necessary that I should repeat everything I said on that occasion, except to say that the freight rates structure of the maritime provinces will be made applicable to the province of Newfoundland. I take it that in due course the Canadian National Railways will file tariffs and tolls with the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada on the basis of the structure in the maritime region. It will then be open for anyone who feels that he has been discriminated against to make an application to the board.

I doubt very much if there will be any applications of that kind, because I am informed that the tariffs of tolls in Newfoundland are substantially higher than those in the maritime region. The other evening I was unable to say what the percentage was, nor would I like to venture a guess at this stage, but there is a substantial difference. Section 13 will give the same benefits and the same advantages to the Newfoundland railway that the Canadian National and other railways now enjoy under the Maritime Freight Rates Act in the select region, and that will come into effect upon entrustment to the Canadian National Railways of the lines they will operate in the new province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Nowlan: The section as drafted refers specifically to trade moving from Port aux Basques to Sydney and from Sydney to Port aux Basques. As the minister knows, there are other ports in the maritimes through which such traffic moves. I am looking for information, but I believe that under the Maritime Freight Rates Act as it applies today freight going through the port of Halifax for export, for instance, moving all the way over the Canadian Pacific railway to Halifax, we will say, does enjoy a preference under the present act. I think I am correct in saying that once Newfoundland becomes a province of Canada, goods moving from Halifax to Newfoundland would not be going for export; it would be an internal movement within our own country. It just occurs to me on casually reading this section, and I would like the minister to clear it up, that the Maritime Freight Rates Act will not apply to freight moving over the Canadian Pacific railway to Halifax and then being transshiped by water to St. John's. The minister has the figures and I have not had a chance to check them, but I would suspect that if there is not more freight moving from Halifax to St. John's by water than is moving from Sydney to Port aux Basques, at least there is a very substantial amount of freight going that way. I should like to know particularly whether the furtherance rate will apply to goods moving over the C.P.R. to Halifax, for instance, going up the valley over the D.A.R. and then shipped from Halifax to St. John's, or will it have to move over the Canadian National system only? If that is the case I suggest that this section should be allowed to stand until it can be carefully studied.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want me to enter upon a discussion of particular rates. That is a technical matter I would not attempt to deal with, because I think it is a matter for experts. If he wishes I can obtain the information he desires, though I do not think the question he puts can be answered except by application to the board. I would say, however, that the position as far as the maritime provinces are concerned is not in any way changed or affected by this act, and the island of Newfoundland is being brought within the purview of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Beyond that I am sure my hon. friend would not expect me to go at this time.

Mr. Isnor: I want to support the thought expressed by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. As he has said, a large amount of freight from the west is shipped from the port of Halifax for export. What he has in mind and what I have in mind is whether that export freight rate will apply to shipments for continuous routing through to Newfoundland. Section 31 of the act, as I recall it, only mentions North Sydney. We feel, of course, that Halifax, Pictou and other ports similarly situated should enjoy that preference also.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I cannot add anything to what I said a moment ago.

Mr. St. Laurent: I participated in the discussion of this matter. This is something which will have to be considered and dealt with by the board of transport commissioners when they deal with the tariffs. Technically goods now shipped from a point in Canada to Newfoundland are exported. When Newfoundland becomes part of Canada those goods will not be exported. The board of transport commissioners will have to consider the appropriate tariff to apply to goods moving from points in what is now Canada to points in what is now Newfoundland, so as not to disturb present trade relations. This matter was fully gone into with the representatives of Newfoundland, who were also quite concerned about it, and the best we could tell them was that the board of transport commissioners would have to take that into account. The rates might be the same or might be lower than export rates, but technically they would not be export rates.

Mr. Nowlan: As the Prime Minister says, this is a matter for the board of transport commissioners, who will have to fix a rate in view of the changed circumstances. If my suggestion or my thought—I am not saying it is more than that—is correct, and the Maritime Freight Rates Act will apply only to goods going from Sydney to Port aux Basques, whatever rate may be fixed by the board of transport commissioners on goods going through Halifax, the freight moving the other way will get the advantage of the twenty per cent reduction, as compared to goods moving over the C.P.R. through Halifax. So I would suggest that this matter be allowed to stand.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is something also which was carefully discussed with the representatives of Newfoundland, and they were told that all these matters would have to be taken into consideration by the transport commissioners. What is provided is that this connection to Port aux Basques is a part of the railway rate, but the maritime rate will apply within Newfoundland. It does not apply now to the traffic carried by water from Halifax to any point in Newfoundland; but in determining what will be proper rates to charge for rail movement the board will have to take all appropriate factors into consideration. The delegates from Newfoundland finally were satisfied with this position: that we do not want to have things happen which will interfere with the economy of Newfoundland, and we do not want things to happen which will interfere with the usual trading practices of the maritime provinces. We hope that instead of there being interference there will be promotion of trade relations, and that is something with which the board of transport commissioners will have to deal. Of course they have no jurisdiction with respect to water rates, and they will have to take into account what the water rates are in fixing tariffs for goods that will be apt to move by water out of the port of Halifax after having been carried by rail from some other point in Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: This section states specifically that as far as traffic between North Sydney and Port aux Basques is concerned it shall be treated as rail traffic. I quite agree with what the right hon. Prime Minister has said. I am sure it is fair to Newfoundland and may be fair to everyone else, but frankly my particular concern is for the people who were not consulted in this connection, the people who operate and serve the Canadian Pacific railway and the Dominion Atlantic railway, who now obtain employment because of the movement of goods through Halifax on their way to Newfoundland. I am afraid this amendment as drafted, and I think perhaps narrowly drafted, will give the advantage in such traffic to the Canadian National Railways.

I am suggesting, sir, this matter should be further considered and the section should be widened so as to make sure it gives to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to goods emanating from the port of Halifax, the same advantage as that enjoyed by goods moving over the Canadian National Railways through the port of Sydney.

Mr. St. Laurent: As I understand the hon. member's suggestion, it is that something should be done with respect to water-borne traffic carried out of the port of Saint John. This cannot be dealt with under this arrangement. According to this section, the Canadian government undertakes to provide water transportation between Sydney and Port aux Basques. The undertaking is that such transportation will be treated as if it were part of a rail haul. Neither the Canadian government nor the Canadian National Railways can make the operators of those ships plying between Halifax and other maritime ports part of the railway system. They are private enterprisers and they make their freight rates on a competitive basis. Whatever those rates might be, they will be taken into account by the board of transport commissioners in fixing the rates over which they have jurisdiction, that is, the rail freight rate.

Mr. Nowlan: The Prime Minister has misunderstood me. I realize that neither this house nor the board of transport commissioners has jurisdiction over water rates. My argument is that at the present time goods moving by rail to Halifax for export to St. John's enjoy the benefit of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. As this section is drafted, Newfoundland ceases to become an export point and becomes a local point. That rate is therefore lost on goods moving through Halifax over the gulf. Shippers will have to pay an additional rate on goods moving through Halifax and will therefore not use that port.

An hon. Member: Let the section stand.

Mr. St. Laurent: There is no point in having it stand. It is a matter that has to be decided. It has been considered and an arrangement made in accordance with the section as it is drawn. It is part of the agreement that water transportation between Sydney and Port aux Basques will be on the same basis as if it were a rail operation; that is the agreement. There is a suggestion here that something else be done. We cannot prevent what may happen, in fact. After the union is accomplished, goods moving out of Halifax to Newfoundland will not be exported goods. By law, we cannot make it otherwise. It will be proper for the board of transport commissioners to take that into account in dealing with the rates. I do not think we can go beyond that.

Mr. Isnor: It is not a matter of freight rates, but rather the principle by which we were given certain privileges under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. We are now asking, and we are much concerned about it, whether this arrangement will be interfered with in so far as Halifax and Nova Scotia are concerned? In other words, will we lose anything by this arrangement?

Mr. St. Laurent: I hope you will not. You are not intended to lose anything. I do not know how the people of Newfoundland are going to have their traffic directed. It may be that this advantage of having the water transportation between Sydney and Port aux Basques treated as rail transportation will cause some of them to ship their goods that way. I do not think we can prevent that. I would not imagine it would be done to an extent that would interfere with the usual trading operations that go through the port of Halifax.

Mr. Isnor: Will it interfere with the benefits we now enjoy? That is what we want to know.

Mr. St. Laurent: I hope it will not, but that will depend, I suppose, on what the shippers and consumers do in routing their freight.

Mr. Hackett: I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether there is anything in the act or in the agreement which anticipates the purchase of the railway in Newfoundland by the Canadian National?

Mr. St. Laurent: No. The agreement is that the railway becomes vested in the Canadian government without any other payment than the assumption of that portion of the existing debt of Newfoundland which is provided for in the agreement. The railway itself becomes vested in the Canadian government without any other agreement or contract being required than the terms of the agreement.

Mr. Hackett: Are there no liabilities which affect the railroad specifically, or are those liabilities just part of the debt of Newfoundland?

Mr. St. Laurent: There are, I understand, some liabilities in the form of equipment bonds. Of course, they come to the Canadian government with the liens attached thereto.

Mr. Nowlan: I think some more information ought to be forthcoming on this section. If we cannot get it, I will ask that the section stand.

Mr. Bracken: I think it would be of help to the member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, as well as to other members of the house, if the Prime Minister could answer this question or give us assurance on this point: Is there anything in this agreement which prejudices the position of Halifax as compared with Sydney in the matter of business going through those ports respectively? Is there anything that is disadvantageous to Halifax as a result of this agreement?

Mr. St. Laurent: There was no suggestion that there was anything that would prejudice Halifax. I cannot say whether the provision in the agreement, that the water transportation between Sydney and Port aux Basques shall be considered as part of the through railway rate, would create a preference for that route over any other route. That is something about which I am not in a position to give any information. Through traffic moving by rail and having to take this jump across the water will be treated on the same basis as if that mileage were part of the railway haul. I do not know whether or not that creates a situation which would make the route more attractive than the route through Halifax.

Mr. Bracken: I have only this to say: If, as a result of this agreement, the position of Halifax were worsened, I can see the reason for opposing what now appears in this clause of the bill.

Mr. Gillis: I had not intended to say anything, Mr. Chairman, but I think the question asked by the hon. member for Neepawa requires an answer. I do not think the Prime Minister's answer was a full one. The request made by the member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and the member for Halifax could cut both ways.

As I understand, we are now amending the statutes of Canada to give effect to the decision we have already made to bring Newfoundland into confederation under the circumstances and conditions now prevailing. The Maritime Freight Rates Act applies on the Canadian National railway down to Sydney, where the national railway ends. As I understand the agreement, it would place that 96-mile water haul across the gulf under the provisions of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Many Canadians think of Halifax as the most easterly part of this country. In considering this proposal that all freight moving through Halifax to Newfoundland by water be considered as a rail haul, the board of transport commissioners will be considering something new. It is a matter which will have to be decided. If it is to be brought under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, it will prejudice the port of Halifax as compared with the rail haul to Sydney. That is not so at the present time.

The exporters ship out under their own arrangements. The Maritime Freight Rates Act was established to take care of the disabilities suffered in Nova Scotia as a result of inadequate rail service. I want the Prime Minister to consider this matter carefully when he is presenting it to the board of transport commissioners, to include water shipment from Halifax under the Maritime Freight Rates Act and put it on all fours. It is not being done now.

Mr. St. Laurent: No.

Mr. Gillis: The Prime Minister says it will be considered?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. Gillis: If it is considered and it is established in this way, what will happen is this. Anyone shipping from Ontario or Quebec to Newfoundland will certainly not ship from the port of Halifax because of the long. decrepit and outmoded railroad from Halifax to Sydney. It certainly is not reasonable to put freight on a train that takes fourteen hours to go approximately three hundred miles, then take it off the train, put it on the boat and ship it across that gulf. It means that practically everything shipped from this end of the country will be shipped by water to Newfoundland through the port of Halifax. I am not blaming the two hon. members for arguing for that kind of arrangement. They live in that part of the country. At the same time, it is my responsibility here to see that nothing is done that will prejudice the end of the country in which I live. The people living there suffer under sufficient disabilities at the present time.

Mr. Isnor: The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings made the point that a subsidiary company of the Canadian Pacific Railway runs through the Annapolis valley. That does not go beyond the port of Halifax. The Dominion Atlantic railway runs from Yarmouth through to Halifax. It is about the shipments from the valley that the hon. member is particularly concerned; and naturally, when they reach the port of Halifax, I am concerned about them because of the pleasant relationships which have existed between the shippers in Newfoundland and in Nova Scotia. I want to see the continuation of those pleasant business relations. That is the point I am particularly concerned about. I want to know whether we in the western section of the Annapolis valley and the port of Halifax will lose anything by the arrangement under this particular section.

Mr. Dickey: The effect of this section, as I read it, is simply to extend the benefits of the Maritime Freight Rates Act to the new province of Newfoundland, including the water haul from North Sydney to Port aux Basques. As I see it, there is nothing in this section which affects the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act within the maritime provinces.

As I said in the house the other day, the great bulk of the freight traffic from Canada to what is presently Newfoundland passes through the port of Halifax. As the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings points out, on the rail haul from the point of origin in Canada to the port of Halifax, that freight is now under export rate fixed by the board of transport commissioners. The board still has the authority to deal with that rate after the union of Newfoundland is completed. It will not and cannot be an export rate, but it will still have to be decided by the board of transport commissioners on some basis or other. The basis upon which it will be necessary for them to decide it is, I submit, the application to that rate of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, which is, and will remain, in effect in respect of the maritime provinces.

In the second place, it will be a competitive rate. It will have to compete with the rate, whatever it will be, between the same point in Canada and St. John's or any other terminal point in Newfoundland which will be fixed for the route Port aux Basques-Sydney.

That is nothing new. We have competitive rates all over this country. Competitive rates are now in effect between points of origin in central Canada and Halifax, competing with water rates from Montreal to Halifax. It is true that those are only seasonal rates, but they are competitive rates and they are fixed on a basis of comparison. As I see it, the situation will be that the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Dominion Atlantic Railway and the Canadian National Railways will have to make application to the board of transport commissioners to have a competitive rate set. In view of the long rail haul between Port aux Basques and St. John's, the competitive position, having regard to the port of Halifax, should be extremely good. I am sure the rate which the railways will be able to propose to the board of transport commissioners will be such that the port of Halifax not only will not be discriminated against but will get its full share of advantage from the increase in traffic which will come about after the union of Canada and Newfoundland; and if the position of Halifax is in any way discriminated against, we will certainly be able to deal with it at that time.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to refer the committee to the agreement itself. Paragraph 3 of section 32 reads:

> All legislation of the parliament of Canada providing for special rates on traffic moving within, into, or out of, the maritime region will, as far as appropriate, be made applicable to the island of Newfoundland.

At the present time we have a Maritime Freight Rates Act which applies to traffic going through Halifax or traffic going through Sydney. I am suggesting that, by the statute which is before us, that act will not apply to traffic through Halifax. I am not concerned about the competitive rates referred to a moment ago by the hon. member. I am just concerned about the Maritime Freight Rates Act itself. Will the Prime Minister assure this committee that the Maritime Freight Rates Act will apply under this legislation, and that, if it does not, he will see that the necessary changes are made whereby we can still maintain the benefits of the Maritime Freight Rates Act for goods passing through Halifax over the C.P.R.? If he gives that assurance, I am certainly prepared to accept it, as I am sure everyone else will be. But I suggest to him that wittingly or unwittingly —and I think unwittingly—there has been a violation of this agreement itself. I do not know what the word "appropriate" means. But in the agreement all the benefits were to be maintained. I suggest that under the statute that is before this committee the benefits are maintained only in part, and the rates apply only to the Canadian National Railways on goods passing, as my hon. friend said a few moments ago, on the long and tortuous haul down there. That might be the case. I quite realize that the competitive rates will offset that. I could make a dissertation on maritime freight rates, but I do not intend to do so now. I think that is something which must be considered in the near future, for whatever it may be worth.

It is worth something in principle. I do not want to see the principle of the act whittled down, and I am not speaking for the valley or for North Sydney or for any other place. I say that we have a principle there which is of benefit to the maritimes, and I want to see that principle maintained. I suggest that in the bill before us that principle is being impinged upon and whittled down and, if we once accept that, sooner or later it will be removed entirely.

Mr. St. Laurent: We are dealing of course with the implementing of the agreement. If the implementation of the agreement imposes any hardship on other parts of Canada it could be and should be dealt with; but I do not think it would be appropriate to deal with it now. If I understand the hon. member correctly, he says that the preferred movement resulted from the fact that it was export movement going through the port of Halifax. But my impression is, and it is confirmed by the language of section 4 of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, that the preferred movement is both export movement and local traffic out of the area. Local traffic all rail within the maritime area is a preferred movement just as is an export movement. I do not think it will have any other effect there than making possibly a rate from any point in the hon. member's county to a point in St. John's, Newfoundland, an export trade. It will no longer be an export trade; but if there has to be substituted for it something that cannot be called an export trade, all the pertinent factors should be taken into account.

Mr. Nowlan: It can only be a rate from Halifax itself. Then you would have to have another one from there on, whereas now you do not separate them.

Mr. St. Laurent: I understand that now the rate has to be the rate which stops at the port of Halifax. If it is for goods that have a destination in Newfoundland it is an export rate to the port of Halifax.

Mr. Nowlan: Will the Prime Minister look at paragraph (c) of section 4.

Mr. St. Laurent: Paragraph (c) of section 4 is in the same terms as paragraph (a), local traffic all rail. Both are traffic movements to which the Maritime Freight Rates Act applies; but it may make this difference, because any trade moving from the hon. member's constituency to Halifax for St. John's, Newfoundland, will not, after union, be an export traffic. Presumably the board will have to make a rate which it will not call an export rate, but which should be the equivalent of an export rate. However, the 20 per cent that the exchequer reimburses on the rates that are set by the tariff will still apply.

Mr. Isnor: If we are assured of that it will be all right.

Mr. St. Laurent: The definition of the statute is that these movements, whether you call them local or export, are preferred movements to which the freight rates act applies. Therefore the only point is one which I do not think can be settled by legislation. It is the rate that the board of transport commissioners put into the tariff. We are to pay the 20 per cent whatever it is. There will be the further point of getting the board of transport commissioners to make a local rate that will not be higher than the present export rate.

Mr. Isnor: That is what we want.

Mr. St. Laurent: That will have to be done by the board of transport commissioners.

The Chairman: Shall section 13 carry?

Mr. McLure: No, Mr. Chairman. I think the section should stand until we get some other information about it. It contains a great deal. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister say—and I hope the Minister of Transport took notice of it—that the board of transport commissioners had no jurisdiction over water rates. I took up this matter with the Minister of Transport several times, but he never would agree with me. I took exception to his sending the board of transport commissioners to Charlottetown to settle rates on water. However, they went down there and settled that matter although they had no jurisdiction to do so. They set water rates for us between Borden and Tormentine, over which they had no jurisdiction whatever. I hope that the committee will permit this section to stand until we can get a few of these matters cleared up.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. members says that the rate from Borden to Tormentine is a water rate. That is deemed to be a rail rate, and it is part of a rail movement which is provided for by the local tariffs. What I said was that the board had no jurisdiction over water rates which are treated as such and fixed as water rates. By special disposition of parliament we have ferry services which are treated as a part of the land rail movement.

Mr. McLure: The act clearly specifies that the board of transport commissioners have no jurisdiction over water rates between provinces or between a province and territory of the British empire. They cannot treat one body of water between two provinces as a railway rate and another as a water rate. Authority over these things is given to the Canadian National Railways, which are subcontractors of the government for fixing a rate on water over which they have no jurisdiction.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Nowlan: No; it is not carried. I suggest that the committee would make more progress if we allowed this section to stand, because I want to get more information on it. I made some inquiries from people here in the city who are authorities in these matters, and they concurred in the points I have raised. This is a real problem and the section should not be hurried through.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have no desire to hurry it through. If the hon. member says that he wishes to make further investigation and therefore to have the section stand for that purpose, I am agreeable. I did not wish to have it stand for the purpose of getting more information, because I think we have all that can be made available. If the hon. member wishes to make some investigation on his own, and to have the section stand for that purpose, I am agreeable to his suggestion.

Mr. Jackman: May I ask a question about a matter which is simple but of considerable interest to people who call themselves philatelists or stamp collectors. I am glad to see the Postmaster General in his seat. This matter might have been taken up under section 7, although I see no relevant section at all. Will Newfoundland unused stamps be of any value after union takes place? Will they be of value for putting on letters in Newfoundland and also in all of Canada?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): I know that officers of my department and of Newfoundland have had conferences and have decided points of interest to both countries. Unfortunately I have not had a chance to get in touch with them and I do not know exactly what has taken place. If the hon. member will allow the matter to stand I shall answer either tomorrow or the day after.

Section 13 stands.

On section 14—Fugitive Offenders Act.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I wish to ask the Minister of Justice a question on this section. I do it under this section because I believe it is the section which has closest reference to the criminal code, although there is some reference to judges at page 21 of the bill, and there is also reference to the mounted police. The Fugitive Offenders Act is regarded as part of our criminal law, and is indeed part of it. When the minister introduced the resolution I asked him whether we were going to have references made, and whether a study had been made of all the statutes. His answer was that that had been done.

I wonder if the minister is sure about that. I accepted his word completely, of course. For example, I am thinking of the jurisdiction given to the different courts. I am thinking of summary trials, speedy trials, and those matters which come within the jurisdiction of what we call a magistrate, whose duties are defined in the criminal code.

I know that the exceptions in the code applying to Alberta and Saskatchewan, because at one time they were governed by the Northwest Territories Act, will have no application here. For instance, I turn for a moment, if I may be permitted, to that section at page 21 of the bill which refers to judges. I would be happier if I knew that we were setting up the same system we have in all the other provinces, namely a distinction between superior and district or county courts, as they are variously called.

Turning to the section at page 21, we find this:

> Section six of The Judges Act, 1946, chapter fifty-six of the statutes of 1946, is amended by adding thereto the following:
> "Three district judges of the admiralty District of Newfoundland, each, 333.33"

I presume that figure represents a monthly wage, or something of that nature. Then, the rest of the section is easily understandable. Have these district judges in admiralty jurisdiction in criminal matters similar to that of a district or county court judge in the other provinces? Sometimes admiralty judges are at sea in matters of admiralty, and they might be just as much at sea in matters connected with the criminal code.

I am wondering just how careful a study has been made of the criminal code with respect to statute amendments. I cannot place my finger at the present time on anything more than I have mentioned; but it does strike me that in many places in the code there are sections which have particular application to certain areas.

For example, I notice there is nothing in here about the Official Secrets Act. If anyone buys an edited edition of the criminal code he will always find in the back of it the Penitentiary Act and the Fugitive Offenders Act, all of which have to do with the administration of the criminal law of this country. I am just a bit concerned as to whether the situation has been studied with sufficient care so as not to leave ourselves in the air, so to speak, in Newfoundland, in connection with the administration of our criminal law.

Mr. Garson: If the hon. member will turn to page 9 of the terms of union he will see this:

> Subject to these terms, all laws in force in Newfoundland at or immediately prior to the date of union shall continue therein as if the union had not been made, subject nevertheless to be repealed, abolished, or altered by the parliament of Canada or by the legislature of the province of Newfoundland according to the authority of the parliament or of the legislature under the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, and all orders, rules and regulations made under any such laws shall likewise continue, subject to be revoked or amended by the body or person that made such orders, rules or regulations or the body or person that has power to make such orders, rules or regulations after the date of union, according to their respective authority under the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946.

And then subsection (2):

> Statutes of the parliament of Canada in force at the date of union—which would include the criminal code . . .

> —or any part thereof, shall come into force in the province of Newfoundland on a day or days to be fixed by act of the parliament of Canada or by proclamation of the governor general in council issued from time to time, and any such proclamation may provide for the repeal of any of the laws of Newfoundland that
> (a) are of general application;
> (b) relate to the same subject matter as the statute or part thereof so proclaimed—

That is, if Newfoundland law covers the same subject matter as is covered by federal law, then such Newfoundland law may be repealed. And—

> (c) could be repealed by the parliament of Canada under paragraph one of this term.

That is the agreement between the two governments relating to what should be done with regard to the respective laws of the two countries.

That will involve something with which we are not concerned in the bill now before the committee. It will involve bringing into effect, by statute or proclamation, all of those laws of Canada, such as the criminal code—and that is the outstanding example—in the province of Newfoundland. But for that statute or proclamation those laws would not have any application to Newfoundland, and we must have these federal laws made applicable to Newfoundland.

The statute we have before us today is one covering all the consequential amendments in the various statute laws of Canada, necessitated as a consequence of bringing Newfoundland into the union. In other words, we have for example the Fugitive Offenders Act with a gap in it, because there is no definition of what in Newfoundland shall be a superior court within the meaning of that act. Therefore we must fill that gap.

Addressing myself particularly to my hon. friend's question, these laws such as the criminal code will be brought into force subsequently. What we are doing now is merely tidying up the sections so that when they are brought into force they will mesh in properly with the federal laws applicable to the other provinces on one hand and with the Newfoundland law on the other hand.

The hon. member has referred to summary jurisdiction and summary convictions, and he has referred to district court judges. My answer to the hon. member is that the Department of Justice circularized all the other departments of government asking them to submit, advise or request any consequential amendments in statute law which they desired, and which were within their administration. Then, having received those returns from the various departments, the draftsmen in the Department of Justice collaborated with their legal officers in the preparation of the material which forms the bill now before the committee.

If this bill be passed, then our federal statutes will be in such form that we can proceed to invoke section 18 of the terms of union by proclaiming all the appropriate federal laws as being applicable to the province of Newfoundland. There are three notable exceptions to that, and that is the law relating to income tax. We thought—and, in view of the question he asked me the other day when the bill was at an earlier stage, I think the hon. member will agree with me—that where we are imposing a tax upon a people under an income or any other tax act it is preferable to have any and all revisions of that tax act come in in the form of amendments to the tax act itself, rather than as a section in an omnibus bill such as the one now before us.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. St. Laurent: The business tomorrow will be the continuation in committee of the consideration of Bill No. 12. If it is completed we would prefer to return to the continuation of the debate on the resolution of the Minister of Justice to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain emergency orders. It has been brought to my attention, however, that hon. members had understood that as soon as we finished the proceedings dealing with Newfoundland, even though the fortnight that was provided for in the resolution had not been taken up, we would immediately resume the debate on the address. I should not like to have anyone think that we were breaking faith with them in any way. If it is the desire of the members that that should be done, of course we will comply. If this bill is completed tomorrow, and there is no objection, we will resume the adjourned debate on the resolution of the Minister of Justice; but if there is objection from any part of the house, and an expression of the view that we should resume at once the debate on the address, we will comply.

Mr. Knowles: May I thank the Prime Minister for the attitude he has taken on this question. As members are aware, there was a misunderstanding in the house the other night. May I suggest that perhaps he might consult with the various parties tomorrow morning. I am sure it was our understanding that we would resume the debate on the address, but in view of the fact that there are only two days remaining of the period allotted for the discussion of the Newfoundland matter, some agreement might be reached. I suggest that he consult with the parties tomorrow morning.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let us proceed with the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. That is what you want?

Mr. Knowles: It was our understanding that was what would happen. I think the Prime Minister is taking the right stand now when he says that if that is what is wanted the house should go on with it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That was my understanding.

Mr. St. Laurent: We can leave it in that form, and I will endeavour to obtain information from the whips as to what seems to be the desire of hon. members. If there is a desire to resume the debate on the address as soon as we finish this bill there will be no objection from this side of the house. If, on the other hand, it is agreeable to everyone to resume the debate on the resolution dealing with emergency measures we would prefer to do that.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 17, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

HALIFAX HARBOUR

COLLISIONS WITH HALIFAX-DARTMOUTH FERRY —QUESTION AS TO RADAR EQUIPMENT

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Last week the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) asked me this question:

Was the naval tug Glenevis, which was in collision with the Halifax-Dartmouth ferry in Halifax harbour this week, equipped with radar? Is there any shore-based radar available at that port? Was harbour craft No. 303, which was in collision with the North Dartmouth ferry in Halifax on the same day, equipped with radar?

The answer to all three questions is in the negative. So far it has not been considered necessary to install radar in these circumstances.

BUTTER SUBSTITUTES

PROTECTION OF PURCHASERS AND USERS AGAINST DECEPTION

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22, to provide against the deception of purchasers or users of margarine, oleomargarine or other butter substitutes.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I explain this bill.

Mr. Sinclair: Louder.

Mr. Cruickshank: I think even the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) will agree when I state the provisions of the bill, leaving out the preamble:

1. No person shall colour margarine, oleomargarine, butterine or any substitute for butter so as to resemble butter.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Cruickshank: I shall explain why in a minute.

2. No person shall sell margarine, oleomargarine, butterine or other substitute for butter unless it is clearly labeled as such.

3. No person shall supply such commodity for consumption in any hotel, restaurant or other eating place where meals are supplied for a charge, unless on the bill of fare or menu or by some other means the purchaser or consumer is notified that such commodity is margarine, oleomargarine, butterine, or other butter substitute as the case may be.

4. Every person who contravenes any provision of this act is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $500, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

Briefly, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is not merely to protect the dairy farmers but to prevent deception of the public.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PISTOLS, AIR GUNS, MOTOR VEHICLES, LEVEL CROSSINGS AND PAYMENT OF FINES

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 23, to amend the Criminal Code (pistols, air guns, motor vehicles, level crossings and the payment of fines).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Church: Mr. Speaker, wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us. We should use our best endeavours in the present session to remedy the evils covered by this bill, such as motorcar accidents, drownings, fires in homes, accidents at level crossings, and the slaughter of the innocents by hit-and-run drivers. Transportation should be a means to an end, not an end in itself. Nothing has added more to the comfort and education of the people than the motorcar, but, like every other invention of science, its use is one thing and its abuse is another. Warfare has turned into a curse, by their abuse, the many discoveries of science in physics, chemistry, biochemistry, medicine and other blessings to humanity.

In a news item in the Toronto Telegram of January 29 I noticed the headline: "Nine little victims, adult, await burial side by side." These people were the victims of a fire in New Waterford, Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ALL JURORS TO BE FEMALE IN THE TRIAL OF FEMALE PERSONS

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 24, to amend the Criminal Code (juries).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Church: This bill is different from the one I introduced last year. Women comprised fifty-one per cent of the voting population in the 1945 election, and it is proposed that they be given jury duties, subject to the same qualifications as apply to male jurors. This provision appeals to me particularly from the point of view of the inspection duties of juries. If women were on the juries inspecting such institutions as the Mercer reformatory and the old Toronto jail in my constituency, the condition of these institutions would be much improved. I believe the matter is worthy of consideration.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LIVESTOCK

TUBERCULOSIS TESTING OF CATTLE IN MIDDLESEX COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture or his parliamentary assistant. In view of the current T.B. testing of cattle in Middlesex county, is it the intention of the government to complete the tests in all the townships? If not, in what townships are the cattle not to be tested, and why not?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): It is my understanding that tests will be completed in all the townships of Middlesex county.

CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

QUESTION AS TO CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN CONDOLENCES TO THE POPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frederic Dorion (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Was Canada represented yesterday when the representatives of the civilized countries of the world expressed their condolences to His Holiness the Pope on the sentencing of Cardinal Mindszenty?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I did not receive notice of this question, which mentions action taken by the representatives of the various countries accredited to the Vatican. Canada is not represented at the Vatican; therefore no Canadian representative was present on this occasion.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE RESTRICTION OF IMPORTS FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ronald Moore (Churchill): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of Britain's unfavourable balance of trade with this country, is the minister in a position to say whether the Canadian government expects action by the British government to reduce its unfavourable trade balance by restricting imports from Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The government does not expect such action.

PRICES

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): In view of the fact that the house may soon be debating the resolution on certain emergency powers, including price control, will the Prime Minister state when we may expect to have the report of the royal commission on prices?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I believe I did state that the information I had received from the printers was to the effect it would be available before the end of the month.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO CHOICE OF ROUTE THROUGH B.C. MOUNTAIN PASS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): Yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Matthews) asked me whether any decision had been arrived at with respect to the route of the trans-Canada highway through the province of British Columbia. I answered that I had not heard of any such decision. A communication has been received from Hon. Mr. Carson, Minister of Public Works for British Columbia, enclosing a plan of the proposed route through British Columbia. This plan shows the route to be the one commonly called the Banff-Big Bend route through the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia. I am not sure that decision is definite as yet, Mr. Speaker, but that represents the recommendation coming to us at this time from British Columbia.

STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT

AMENDMENTS TO IMPLEMENT TERMS OF UNION OF NEWFOUNDLAND WITH CANADA

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 16, consideration in committee of Bill No. 12, to amend the statute law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 13—Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Yesterday, when this section was being discussed, a number of questions were asked, and there seemed to be some misapprehension as to the exact meaning of it. I have communicated with the officers of the Canadian National Railways in connection with section 13 as set out in the act to amend the statute law, and I should like to make this statement.

The provision in the bill that through traffic between Canada and Newfoundland shall be treated as all-rail traffic when passing over the water route between North Sydney and Port aux Basques on the steamship now owned by the Newfoundland Railway is nothing unusual. It is the same practice as was followed with respect to the vessel service between the mainland and Prince Edward Island many years ago, when through rates were made via that service; the only difference is that the steamer service between the mainland and Prince Edward Island has been changed to a car ferry. It is not possible under present conditions to establish a car ferry between North Sydney and Port aux Basques; therefore the steamship service must be considered as a substitute for a car ferry service.

Under the circumstances it is quite proper for the through rates prevailing in the other maritime provinces to be extended through to Newfoundland via the steamship service on a basis somewhat comparable to the rates within the maritimes; in fact as soon as the Newfoundland Railway and its steamship service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques come under the provisions of the Railway Act, the provisions of that act will require the extension of reasonable through rates between the other provinces of Canada and Newfoundland.

The same situation exists with respect to the water service now carried on via the car ferry between Mulgrave and Point Tupper—that is, the rates between the rest of Canada and Cape Breton are on a through rail basis.

The reductions in the rates which will result from the taking over of the Newfoundland Railway and steamship service by the Canadian National is exactly the same practice as has been followed with other railways taken over by the Canadian National. For example, when the railway from Matapedia to Gaspe was taken over, in accordance with the requirements of the Railway Act the rates were reduced from a combination over Matapedia to a joint through basis which was comparable with the main line of the Intercolonial railway for approximately similar distances.

Mr. McCulloch (Pictou): What year was that?

Mr. Chevrier: I have not the exact date, but it was some time ago.

Under the bill the Canadian National Railways is required to file tariffs with the board of transport commissioners on March 31, assuming that confederation takes place on that date, and assuming also that the lines of railway on the island of Newfoundland and the steamer service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques are entrusted to the Canadian National Railways on the same date. Such rates will have to conform to the general pattern of rail rates in the other provinces of Canada; otherwise they would be discriminatory. Discriminatory rates, either higher or lower than in the same general territory, cannot be maintained under the Railway Act. Therefore, as stated, the rates will follow the general pattern of the rates in the other provinces.

There is a great deal to be done in working out the details of these rates; therefore no quotations are available at the present time. But it may be stated that, from what has been done so far, the scheme of rates to and from Newfoundland compared with the rates to and from Halifax will result in substantial differences between the Halifax rates and the Newfoundland rates. If private steamship operators wish to continue to operate between Halifax and Newfoundland, and particularly St. John's, Newfoundland, the difference between the local Halifax rates and the Newfoundland rates should be sufficient to enable the steamship operators to carry on service at fair and reasonable rates.

On some commodities very low rates have been published from Montreal and points west to Halifax and North Sydney for furtherance to Newfoundland. These rates were established many years ago when there was a steamship line operating between New York and Newfoundland, and the rates to Halifax and North Sydney were established to meet competition via the port of New York. Combined with the local rates of the Newfoundland service beyond North Sydney or the private vessel rates beyond Halifax to Newfoundland, they resulted in very high rates.

The through rates now proposed by the legislation to and from Newfoundland will be on a more reasonable basis, and the steamship operators at Halifax cannot expect the railways after the union to carry such extremely low rates to Halifax and North Sydney and thus result in the diversion of traffic from the through route of the Canadian National Railways.

There is nothing, however, in this act or the Railway Act to prevent other carriers, such as the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Dominion Atlantic Railway, from maintaining rates to Halifax via the route through Saint John and Digby for furtherance to Newfoundland, and in connection with steamship operators from Halifax providing competition with the joint through rates over the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate the courtesy of the minister in making the statement he has made. Partly because of the difficulty in hearing him, and partly because it will take some time to digest the statement, I am not in a position at the moment to deal with it fully. With most of what he said I think we are in substantial agreement. I take objection, however, to one of the references made by the minister, if I understood him correctly. He said that the rates which were to be made in Newfoundland would be fair, reasonable and nondiscriminatory; in other words, they are to be on the standard pattern of railroad rates. That is one of the matters directly dealt with by the Maritime Freight Rates Act, section 7 of which reads as follows:

> The rates specified in the tariffs of tolls, in this act provided for, in respect of preferred movements, shall be deemed to be statutory rates, not based on any principle of fair return to the railway for services rendered in the carriage of traffic; and no argument shall accordingly be made, nor considered in respect of the reasonableness of such rates with regard to other rates, nor of other rates having regard to the rates authorized by this act.

If I understood the minister correctly his statement implies that the principle of the Maritime Freight Rates Act is to be whittled down by having whatever rates may be imposed in Newfoundland on a fair and reasonable basis. That matter was fought out many years ago. I understand that the statement read by the minister, and prepared by his responsible officials, cannot be at all derogatory of the statute, and that the statute still governs. But I want to take special exception to that principle enunciated by him.

As to the rest of what the minister said, I do not think it differs materially from what I suggested last night. My quarrel with this section is that it cuts down the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act in the maritime provinces. If hon. members will look at section 4 of the act, they will find that preferred movements are defined by two subsections. Section 4(a) defines one as "local traffic, all rail." Obviously traffic can only move "all rail" into Newfoundland over the Canadian National Railways, because by this bill we are adopting the principle that the steamer between Port aux Basques and Sydney becomes part of the railway. That would be an "all-rail" movement, and in that way a preferred rate could be established over the Canadian National Railways, but certainly not over any other system.

The only other definition which is open, and which, I suggest, will be closed after this section is adopted, is section 4 (c): "Traffic moving outward, export traffic. . ." As the Prime Minister agreed last night, traffic moving today to St. John's, Newfoundland, is export traffic. After March 31 it ceases to be export traffic, because if the legislation which we have been considering here is enacted in the proper places, Newfoundland will become a province of Canada and there can be no export traffic to Newfoundland. There will then be only one way in which the Maritime Freight Rates Act can apply, namely, under this specially-designed section which applies to only one railway, and to traffic moving in one particular manner.

I suggest that this minimizes the effect and implication of the Maritime Freight Rates Act in the province. I suggest that, if necessary, this section of the Maritime Freight Rates Act should be amended so as to maintain the scope which exists today, by virtue of which freight moving over any of the railways in the province obtains the benefits of the act. I appreciate the fact that at the present time much of that freight moves from Halifax by water. As the minister well knows, established shipping lines, such as Furness Withy and others, have been operating freight services there for many years.

Over the Canadian National Railways it will be possible to obtain a through all-rail rate, obtaining the benefits of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, from any point within the area to any point within Newfoundland. I suggest that this section be changed to apply to freight moving over the Canadian Pacific Railway, if you like, or over the Dominion Atlantic Railway, coming into Halifax, and that a through rate be provided so that if that rate is established it can be in competition with the one which will be fixed by the Canadian National Railways.

We know what will happen. The Canadian National Railways will apply and fix a through rate for goods moving eastward.

That is all to the good; but other carriers should be permitted to file through rates over any other system so that the accommodation of rail and water, if necessary, out of Halifax or out of Pictou or any other port, as mentioned by the senior member for Halifax last night, could be taken advantage of. Other carriers, if they desired, should be permitted to file through rates in competition. That will be prevented by the bill we are discussing at this time.

I do not propose to move an amendment; this is a matter of government policy and the government must accept responsibility for it. I suggest, sir, that they are reducing and belittling the effect of the Maritime Freight Rates Act within the maritime provinces. They are prejudicing those who are using other carriers, and they will reduce employment in Halifax and other districts which are served by the Dominion Atlantic Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and others. That is contrary to the principle which this house recognized many years ago when the Maritime Freight Rates Act was first adopted. At that time it was a matter of reducing costs to benefit shippers out of that area. I suggest in all deference that this section is so designed as to benefit the Canadian National Railways, to give that system a monopoly of traffic within the new province of Newfoundland, and to prejudice all those in other areas.

Mr. Isnor: I wish to compliment the hon. member who has just taken his seat on the way in which he has presented this subject to the committee. The Minister of Transport made an important statement, and I think we should have an opportunity of studying it; moreover, we should give the same opportunity to those who are interested from the competitive standpoint. Before I conclude I am going to suggest that the sponsor of the bill allow this section to stand until such an opportunity is given. I judge that that does not meet with the approval of all concerned, but I am going to urge it for the following reasons.

The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings has said that the minister's statement indicates the creation of a monopoly, and I believe it does. The statement prepared by the officials of the Canadian National Railways presented one view and one view only. There must be competition if we are to bring about the benefits which Newfoundland and the maritimes expect from the Maritime Freight Rates Act. I do not wish to go into the question that arose at the time of confederation in relation to the maritimes. We do know that in the negotiations preceding confederation the question of transportation was given serious thought, because of the need of connecting the maritime provinces—the same question arises now in respect to Newfoundland—with central Canada in the way of trade. Instead of developing trade as we thought we would in the maritimes, the railway carried people who built up a large population in central Canada. The result was that in Ontario, for example, a population of three and a half million was built up within a radius of a hundred miles of Toronto. Because of that large market, industrial centres have developed in central Canada to such an extent that we in the maritimes are suffering under a handicap. The same situation may develop in respect to Newfoundland if we are not careful in dealing with the question of transportation to that new province. We hope to continue to have products in the maritimes to ship to central Canada, and we want the Maritime Freight Rates Act, and the benefits we derive from it, to be undisturbed. For that reason we believe there is a definite thought of monopoly in the statement presented by the Minister of Transport.

The shipowners who have been carrying on business between the maritime provinces and Newfoundland should still enjoy the opportunity to carry on that trade through the shipping business which they have built up. The statement made by the minister more or less eliminates water-borne traffic because of the monopoly mentioned by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. We should carefully study the effect that this is likely to have on the maritime provinces, particularly on the large shipping ports. May I emphasize the fact that Halifax depends to a very great extent on employment along its waterfront. I am concerned about it. Before this section passes the shipowners of Nova Scotia should be asked to give us their advice about it.

Mr. St. Laurent: I fear the hon. member is under a misapprehension as to what is being done. No increase is being provided in rates from any point within the preferred area to any point in Newfoundland. At the present time there are no through rail rates from Halifax to Newfoundland. There is a rail rate to Halifax, and then water carriage beyond that. Under this arrangement a through rate will be possible from points within the preferred area through North Sydney and Port aux Basques, treated as an all-rail rate. All hon. members know that the procedure provided in the Maritime Freight Rates Act to give the benefits recommended by the Duncan commission required that new tariffs be filed twenty per cent below what they would normally be, and this house votes a special appropriation each year to the amount of twenty per cent of the freight bill. What is being done here is that twenty per cent of the freight bill on traffic moving under the Maritime Freight Rates Act to Newfoundland will be borne by the federal exchequer, including that portion of the freight bill which covers the ninety miles between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. Twenty per cent of the freight bill from any point within the preferred area to Halifax will still be paid by the federal exchequer.

What the hon. member would like to have done, perhaps, would be to have the federal exchequer assume twenty per cent of the water carriage bill from Halifax to St. John's. That is a matter which was discussed with the delegation, and we could not agree to it. There is no control, other than that arising out of competition, over the amount of freight that water carriers take. We could not agree to pay out of the federal exchequer twenty per cent of the cost of water-borne traffic from Halifax to ports in Newfoundland. The other rail rates are not being changed in any way. It may be that having the ninety miles between North Sydney and Port aux Basques treated as rail movement would make a rate which would be more attractive than a water-borne rate from Halifax to St. John's, but it would be merely for Port aux Basques and nearby operations, because a through rate all rail from any point in Canada to St. John's via North Sydney and Port aux Basques will be a rate that should be higher than a combination of the freight rate to Halifax plus a fair and reasonable water rate from Halifax to St. John's. On the rail portion, either within Nova Scotia or New Brunswick or within Newfoundland, the federal exchequer will reimburse the shippers twenty per cent to the railways, but it will not reimburse twenty per cent of the water freight from Halifax to St. John's or any other port, and it never has. So it is not creating anything different in that respect. As a factual result, it may be that because the ninety miles water haul between North Sydney and Port aux Basques is to benefit from the twenty per cent reduction, it will prove to be more effective for Port aux Basques than if there were a rail rate to Halifax and then water carriage from Halifax to Port aux Basques. But when you consider that these are two rail movements, water carriers from Halifax should be able to quote a very reasonable freight rate for their portion of the water carriage and still have the total remain under the all-rail rate.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. Isnor: I think the Prime Minister has forgotten one point, namely, competition in water-borne freight. As has been said, in Halifax we have four or five large shipping companies which have been doing a good business between the mainland of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. Naturally we do not want those firms to be put out of business because of a monopoly in transportation. As was pointed out yesterday by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the Canadian National has a long line from Halifax to Sydney to carry freight. And if freight is carried over that line it will not be beneficial to the merchants and users in St. John's and other sections of Newfoundland.

I believe that if freight from Halifax or other points in Nova Scotia is carried by water it will lessen the operating cost and bring down the rate. That is what we want—to create open competition from Halifax to Newfoundland as compared with a long rail haul. If we can have the assurance that there will be no interference with that competition and rate, that is what we want. In the meantime, while I am willing as a rule to take the word of the Prime Minister or of the Minister of Transport, I doubt whether either is as well versed in these transportation matters as the men who carry on the work. For that reason I ask that an opportunity be afforded to present the statement of the Minister of Transport to the shipping firms in Halifax.

Mr. Gillis: I listened carefully to the Minister of Transport, and so far as I am concerned the statement he made was fair and reasonable. I cannot follow the argument of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings—I wish they would shorten the name of that constituency—or the argument of the senior member for Halifax, because this arrangement with Newfoundland is not changing anything.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, it is.

Mr. Gillis: It was in existence before the proposal to bring in Newfoundland was made, with the exception that the Maritime Freight Rates Act has been extended and made applicable to the ninety miles between North Sydney and Newfoundland, and to the railways in Newfoundland. That does not affect the port of Halifax at all; it does not do anything to that port which was not in existence before.

I understand the argument of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, because a section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, a privately-operated company, runs through that valley. And while these private companies argue that they do not want any entanglements with the government, they are always willing to put their hands out for anything the government may be able to give them.

Mr. Isnor: Competition.

Mr. Gillis: The senior member for Halifax says that this will be a great monopoly. If it is a monopoly, then he is arguing against a monopoly of his own government.

Mr. Isnor: That does not matter.

Mr. Gillis: Apparently he has very little faith in it. The Canadian Pacific Railway would be affected to only a very small extent. They still fall within the terms of the Maritime Freight Rates Act from the valley into the port of Halifax.

Mr. Nowlan: No.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member is now arguing for these privately-operated shipping companies, and saying that they should have the freight cost offset by twenty per cent and brought under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. This competition about which he speaks is only camouflage; it is something like Duplessis' Union Nationale—take the mask off, and it is the Tory machine. This question of competition, and this argument against a monopoly, and all that kind of thing, is just a false face to cover up what the hon. member is really after, namely, to subsidize private shipping companies out of government funds. If they are not able to carry on on their own, in my opinion they should not be in business, and it should be handed over to the government.

Money used in connection with the Maritime Freight Rates Act comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers of Canada. We provide millions of dollars each year to make up the deficit of the Canadian National Railways. I believe the action taken by the government in this instance—and it has not been done in every case—in trying to maintain their own organization in competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway is a step in the right direction. While the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings is interested in getting something for the valley, and the senior member for Halifax is interested in the business done by the port of Halifax—I do not blame him for that; a good deal of grass has grown on the railway into that terminal in the past twenty years—

Mr. Nowlan: What are you interested in?

Mr. Gillis: I am interested in my own end of the country. As I said a moment ago, I do not blame these hon. members for taking their stand and telling us what they want done. Nevertheless when they speak about competition, monopoly, and all that kind of thing, they do not make a good case.

Mr. Isnor: You do not like monopolies?

Mr. Gillis: If the arrangement these two hon. members suggest is accepted, it will be applicable not only to water shipments from Halifax to Newfoundland, from the valley, but it will include everything that comes down from Quebec and Ontario. There is no argument as to the competition between the old obsolete railway from Halifax to Sydney and the modern shipping facilities from Halifax to St. John's. There is no competition there.

If the arrangement suggested by the hon. members to whom I have referred were to go through, it would mean that you might as well take up the rails between Halifax and North Sydney; it would kill that port, and I should not like to see that happen. There are three hundred miles of road down there, and a flourishing little seaport, both of which are kept up by the present arrangement. It would not be a question of establishing competition there; it would mean the scrapping of a great deal of essential material which was built and paid for by Canadians in that end of the country.

Apparently I have more faith in the Prime Minister than the senior member for Halifax has. The Prime Minister stated yesterday that the point raised by the two hon. members is one which would have to be dealt with by the board of transport commissioners. He said it would be dealt with, and the arguments advanced would be taken into consideration. I know that in a debate on this bill affecting Newfoundland we have not the opportunity to remedy that condition. With the assurance given by the Prime Minister that the best possible arrangement will be made for all concerned, I am satisfied to let the case rest.

Mr. Isnor: Apparently the hon. member for Cape Breton South missed the point entirely. He began his speech with an argument, and then proceeded to tear that argument to pieces. I just want to reply to the hon. member's reference to my confidence in the Prime Minister. I say to him that if on measures brought in by the Prime Minister he votes as I vote, I shall be quite satisfied.

Mr. Gillis: Every time the Prime Minister is right, I will support him.

Mr. Isnor: He is right more often than the hon. member thinks he is.

Mr. Gillis: He is right in this case.

Mr. Isnor: If the hon. member for Cape Breton South is sincere in his efforts to help his own particular section of the country and to improve that railroad, then he should support us in bringing about open competition. There is nothing like competition to improve a service and bring about what the hon.

member has been trying to bring about for many years. I ask the hon. member to get back of the maritime provinces in their efforts to keep all ports busy, not just one port. We shall then have the competition which will improve the service about which he has been complaining.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I want to compliment the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings for bringing up this matter and placing it before us so clearly. He has been supported by the senior member for Halifax. I am in agreement to some extent with the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I am especially interested in seeing that all the ports in the maritime provinces are treated fairly. I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South that since confederation eastern Nova Scotia has been handicapped, having regard to the amount of traffic that is handled, more than any other part of Canada. For many years we have been trying to get a crossing over the strait of Canso and to have the railroad serving eastern Nova Scotia reconstructed.

The whole situation has been changed in bringing Newfoundland into confederation, because this traffic will now be interprovincial. The maritime freight rates, for which we fought for so many years and at last obtained, and which are prized so highly in the maritime provinces, will now be made applicable to Newfoundland and to the water crossing from North Sydney to Port aux Basques. This is quite a concession to the shippers in Newfoundland, and I am in hearty agreement with it. I do not think the government could have done otherwise.

As has been pointed out, this is now interprovincial trade, and any traffic from Halifax or such points to Newfoundland will be on the same basis. Traffic from Halifax to points in Newfoundland should not be handicapped; it should receive the twenty per cent subsidy provided by the Maritime Freight Rates Act and made available via other routes. Otherwise it will be discriminated against in the future. I do not see how the government can avoid granting this twenty per cent subsidy to traffic between Halifax and other points and Newfoundland.

I compliment the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings upon presenting the case so clearly. I think the important statement which has just been made by the Minister of Transport should be allowed to stand so that we may have an opportunity to review it in relation to this entire traffic—unless the Prime Minister is able to give us assurance that the maritime freight rates subsidy will apply to all traffic, and there will be no discrimination created when Newfoundland enters confederation, and all receivers of goods will benefit.

Mr. Nowlan: I think we are confusing the two things that are before the committee. I am surprised that the hon. member for Cape Breton South should intimate that his famous railroad is dependent upon outward traffic rolling down toward Sydney. I always had some suspicions that the steel and coal industries of Cape Breton were substantial factors in the maintenance of that railroad.

As I say, there are two things before us. There was the suggestion made originally by myself and by the senior member for Halifax that these rates should apply from Halifax to St. John's, that traffic between those points should come within the scope of the freight rates act. I suggest that the hon. member for Cape Breton South is wrong, and I suggest also, with deference, that the Prime Minister is wrong, in saying that no change has been effected by this amendment. It may be that both are technically correct, that the Canadian National Railways are simply being extended over ninety miles of water. But if the right hon. gentleman will look at section 4—I would not want to set myself up as an expert on the interpretation of statutes as opposed to the Prime Minister, especially in view of his standing before the bar—I think he will find that the preferred rates come within one of two classifications. First, there is the local traffic, all rail. Certainly this is not local traffic, all rail. Second, there is traffic moving outward, export traffic. Certainly this is not export traffic. Therefore I suggest to the hon. member for Cape Breton South and to the Prime Minister that the situation is changed and that they must distinguish between the problems now before the committee.

There is the matter of compensation for freight moving from Halifax or other ports to Newfoundland, and there is the further matter, I suggest, of the interpretation of section 4. I contend that the Prime Minister was not correct when he stated that the Maritime Freight Rates Act would apply to goods moving over the Canadian National Railways to Halifax. Goods would have to be shipped direct to Halifax locally and then be reshipped, because the provisions apply only to local traffic, all rail, and export traffic.

It is not export, and if it is to be local, all rail, you would have to consign it to Halifax and then reconsign it to St. John's. I think that is correct. This traffic will be restricted to traffic over the Canadian National if the benefits of the Maritime Freight Rates Act are to apply. I suggest that if that principle is to be maintained, section 4 of the Maritime Freight Rates Act should be amended by striking out the words "export traffic" so that the benefits of the act will apply in so far as Halifax, Digby or other ports are concerned.

Whether or not the government wishes to extend that provision is a matter of policy for which the government must assume responsibility. But I state with deference, and I think the Prime Minister almost accepts my contention, that if it is not done, the benefits of the Maritime Freight Rates Act will be lost in relation to all shipments moving to Newfoundland except those moving over the Canadian National, unless they are first shipped locally to Pictou or Saint John or Halifax and then reshipped. Of course that would create an impossible situation which I do not think it is the intention of the government to bring about.

Mr. Church: The question of maritime freight rates is not a local question. I remember back in 1922 when I first entered this house I proposed a national fuel policy under which all coal would be mined under the British flag. At that time boats were coming into Toronto harbour from Swansea, Wales. My suggestion was that coal should be mined in Wales, the maritimes or Alberta. A select committee of the House of Commons was appointed and it considered this motion for three days. The committee heard evidence for weeks and reported favourably. The discussion of this matter continued from 1922 onward. In 1925 the late Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe, took steps to have the Duncan commission appointed to go into all these involved questions.

My proposal was a system of bonuses, subventions and subsidies to cure the ills from which the maritime provinces were suffering at that time, but my proposal did not commend itself to the house. As I understand it the present maritime freight rates will not apply to Newfoundland, because it ceased to be a dominion in 1933, as my leader said last evening. What was that system of bonuses, subventions and subsidies that I proposed? I believe such a policy would cure all the ills from which all the provinces are suffering. In that connection I say freight rates should not be made a political question by one province at the expense of the others. That is the difficulty we have had in this house with railway rates of all kinds. We have had them dealt with by professors and such whose only knowledge of freight and freight rates was what they gained by looking out the windows as they traveled on our railways.

In my opinion the government should fully implement the recommendations of the Duncan commission which was appointed in 1925. There was a debate on parliamentary and constitutional reform, and a committee of this house presided over by the present Mr. Justice Carroll inquired into these matters and made a report. One or two of the maritimers supported the policy I advocated. The late Mr. Logan, who was later appointed to another place, and Mr. Carroll were the only two members from the maritimes who supported my program which was designed to initiate a national fuel policy with particular application to the maritimes. At that time there was a very large body of public opinion in the province of Ontario which sympathized with the maritime provinces. They wanted to use that coal, and they needed it.

The Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member is getting away from the section under consideration.

Mr. Church: After union the present maritime freight rates will not apply to Newfoundland, I repeat, unless there is a special agreement covering that point. The water rates will continue to apply, I suppose, but I was referring to the recommendations made by the Duncan commission in support of my proposal for a dollar a ton bonus, so that millions of tons of coal could be moved from the maritimes to Ontario.

Will the present bonuses, subventions and wartime rates for freight extend to Newfoundland? I say they will not, unless after union there is some special agreement. I believe there will have to be a new arrangement with respect to freight and passenger rates and all the other things which were mentioned the other evening. I believe it is only sound policy for us to do everything within our power to aid the maritime provinces along the lines laid down by the Duncan commission.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Chairman, I have listened as well as I could from back here to the discussion that has been going on, and from what I was able to hear and understand it seems that the great advocates of private and free enterprise are now interested in getting some government subsidies for some section of a private enterprise railway as well as private enterprise shipping. It seems to me that is a great contradiction. If private, free enterprise is the strong and virile factor they would have us believe it to be, for the life of me I cannot understand why it should not stand on its own feet. After all, this is a government-owned institution that is contemplated, carrying freight down in that area; and I think it would be extremely foolish for the government to subsidize one of its competitors. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, since we are discussing railway matters, I am particularly interested in that section of railway which runs through the main street of the city of Oshawa in my riding. I want to see that stretch of railway picked up by somebody, I do not care who does it or where they take it.

All I want to say is that I think the government is perfectly consistent in following the course the minister has outlined, thereby looking after the interests of the institution for which it has the responsibility.

Mr. Nowlan: Is the hon. member prepared to state that he is opposed to the principle of the Maritime Freight Rates Act? If so, is he speaking for his party in making that statement?

Mr. Williams: That is the trouble with sitting back here; people do not speak loudly enough. They blame it on the acoustics of the chamber, whereas if they would only speak as well as they can one could hear and understand much better what is going on.

Mr. Graydon: They can hear you in the galleries all right.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not want to take sides in any discussion as to the advantages or disadvantages of these various routes, but in fairness to the hon. member for Halifax I do want to say that I do not pretend to know what rates the water carriers charge from Halifax to St. John's. In our discussions with the Newfoundland delegation, however, we assumed that they took lower rates for comparable mileage than the railway companies take. I do not know whether or not that is so. If it is so, the argument I submitted is valid.

With respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, with much of what he said I agree, but I think there is this confusion which perhaps does not exist in his mind but which may exist in the minds of those reading his remarks. From what he said one would be inclined to understand that the maritime rates applied to export traffic the whole way. That is not so. They apply to export traffic originating within the select territory and only with respect to the portion of the journey made over a railway; that is to say, in the case under discussion, only to Halifax. You can bill something from any point in the select territory to a point outside Canada and it is export trade, but the rate the carrier charges is the total of the rail rate plus the water rate, and the Maritime Freight Rates Act applies only to the portion of that charge which is the rail rate. That will not be changed in any way here. If something is going from the select territory today to any port in Newfoundland, the portion of the rate that represents the rail journey to Halifax will still get the twenty per cent.

Mr. Nowlan: Will the Prime Minister say under what section that comes?

Mr. St. Laurent: It is local. It is all rail and it gets the benefit of the maritime rate, provided it originates within the select territory.

Mr. Nowlan: Would it not have to be billed local to Halifax, and then re-billed from Halifax on? It would not be billed all rail from Diamond Junction, for instance, to St. John's, Newfoundland; it would have to be billed local to Halifax and then re-billed to St. John's.

Mr. St. Laurent: In my view that would have to be local all rail, and the railway companies would collect from the federal exchequer 20 per cent of the rate for the operation from Diamond Junction to Halifax and 20 per cent of the rate from St. John's to the ultimate destination in Newfoundland.

Mr. Nowlan: Then the words "all rail" have no significance at all?

Mr. St. Laurent: The words "all rail" have the significance that that portion of the rate borne by the treasury does not apply to any part of the haul that is not for rail transportation. If it does not work out that way, the hon. member can have the assurance that it will be.

Mr. Isnor: Will the Prime Minister allow the section to stand until tomorrow? It is very doubtful whether we will get through the entire bill today. I feel we should have the opportunity of having expert opinion on this matter.

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps we could make this compromise. We will let the section stand for the moment and proceed with the remainder of the bill. If we get through the bill today, we can go back to section 13, but I hope we would not have to have any more discussion on that section.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Before this section passes, I should like to get some information from the Minister of Transport in relation to the steamship Kipawo. This boat was privately owned and operated under a subsidy on the bay of Fundy. During the war, it was handed over to the dominion government for the naval service, after which it was sold by war assets to Newfoundland. As I understand, the boat has been operated out of Newfoundland since then. Can the minister tell the committee whether the ownership of the Kipawo now reverts to Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: There is no provision in section 13 or any other section of the agreement to cover the point raised by my hon.

friend. I remember the interest which he had when the matter came up before. He was particularly interested in the ferry service which existed at one time from Parrsboro to Wolfville, via Kingsport, I think. During the war years, this service was stopped. There is no objection to a group of people making an application for a subsidy for such a service, if that is what my hon. friend has in mind. I am sure the maritime commission would give consideration to such an application. At the present time, there is no application before it. Under a section which deals with freight rates and does not deal with ferry services, I doubt very much whether it would be possible to meet the position of the member for Cumberland.

I have dealt with this question before, during the consideration of my estimates. I think I gave a reason then why it was not possible to re-establish the service. I understand there is a road going around the basin of Minas which tourists may use. Alternatively, they could use the ferry between Digby and Saint John. If my hon. friend knows of a group of people interested in establishing a ferry service, I can assure him the maritime commission will give their application the usual consideration.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I was interested in ascertaining whether the ownership of the Kipawo would now revert to Canada or remain the property of the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Chevrier: As I do not know the corporation or group of people owning the Kipawo in Newfoundland, I cannot answer the question, except to refer to the section of the agreement which covers the Clarenville boats. Certainly, it does not cover the Kipawo.

Section 13 stands.

Section 14 agreed to.

On section 15—Immigration Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to say a word about this section of the bill since it deals with the Immigration Act as well as the matter of domicile in so far as lawful admission into Newfoundland is concerned. The reason I mention that at this time is this: I believe the people of Newfoundland have the right to know something which frequently we in this house do not know, and that is the degree to which orders in council have been passed ratifying the unlawful or illegal entry of people into Canada. I should like to raise the question whether or not there are in existence any secret orders in council or orders in council under the Immigration Act, which will become the law of Newfoundland upon the admission of that country to union.

I mention particularly the act as it stands, chapter 93, wherein the rights of persons to enter Canada are provided, and wherein the reasons for prohibiting people from entering Canada are stated. Section 3 of the Immigration Act provides that:

> No immigrant, passenger, or other person, unless he is a Canadian citizen, or has Canadian domicile, shall be permitted to enter or land in Canada, or in case of having landed in or entered Canada shall be permitted to remain therein, who belongs to any of the following classes, hereinafter called "prohibited classes":

Then the various prohibitive classes are set forth. Among those particularly designated are the persons covered by subsections (q) and (r).

These subsections read as follows:

> (q) Persons guilty of espionage with respect to His Majesty or any of His Majesty's allies.
> (r) Persons who have been guilty of high treason or treason or of conspiring against His Majesty, or of assisting His Majesty's enemies in time of war, or of any similar offence against any of His Majesty's allies.

The minister has certain powers which are set forth in section 4 of the act. The minister may issue a written permit authorizing any person to enter Canada or, having entered or landed in Canada, to remain in this country without being subject to the provisions of this act.

Section 18 of the act provides that any decision made by a board of inquiry shall be final, except that the minister may, of course, subject to section 4, allow prohibited groups or persons belonging to any of those groups to enter Canada.

The situation to which I have reference today relates to the entry into Canada, illegally and unlawfully, of certain individuals who came in some time prior to the 13th of September, 1948. Those people came into Canada under forged passports. They are not in the position of refugees who, fleeing from political persecution, seek refuge and then afterwards, being found within the country, are granted within the provisions of section 4 a written permit authorizing them to be in the country. In one or more cases these persons come within the qualifications of prohibited persons by reason of conviction within their own country, and of coming in under false, fabricated and forged passports.

Mr. Garson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the matter which is before the committee now is whether section 15 of the act should be considered and passed. With all deference, I think the remarks that my hon. friend is now making have no strict relevancy to this section. Plenty of opportunity will be given him, I understand, to express an opinion upon the point he is raising, but I suggest that this is not the proper time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This section to which I am referring brings the Immigration Act into effect and makes it applicable to Newfoundland.

Mr. St. Laurent: It does nothing of the kind.

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes.

Mr. St. Laurent: It does nothing of the kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will read the section. It is as follows:

> For the purposes of the Immigration Act, chapter ninety-three of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, domicile in Newfoundland prior to the first day of April, nineteen hundred and forty-nine, shall be deemed to be domicile in Canada . . .

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I continue my argument on the point of order?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This Statute Law Amendment Act provides for the necessary changes to make the statutes applicable to Newfoundland. What I am trying to do is to find out—and I think the people of Newfoundland have a right to know—how many secret orders in council were passed by the executive; and in this case I say that, illegally and without any justification under the law, this order in council was passed. I am trying to find out how many of these are today applicable and will be applicable to the new citizenship of Newfoundland when it joins Canada. I submit that, after all, the orders in council that are still applicable to the facts at issue will apply to Newfoundland.

My question at this time is this. To what degree will the secret orders and secret laws —vestiges of the Star Chamber—be in effect and applicable to Newfoundland when Newfoundland is finally admitted to confederation? I start with that question because I think it is one of material importance, the answer to which should be known not only by all those in this house but also by Newfoundland. I want to know the degree to which the exercise of executive power, in this case without any legal justification whatsoever, shall apply to Newfoundland.

Mr. Garson: May I ask whether my hon. friend has finished his remarks on the point of order? Is that the end of the argument?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: If it is, I would point out that the section before us does not make the Immigration Act applicable to Newfoundland. It merely provides that, for the purposes of the Immigration Act, domicile in Newfoundland prior to a certain day named shall be considered to be domicile in Canada, and that the expressions "land" and "enter" include lawful admission into Newfoundland under the laws of Newfoundland. That is all it provides. It does not make the law of Canada applicable to Newfoundland. My hon. friend's point of order is therefore not well taken, in my opinion.

The Chairman: I should point out that, under standing order 58 (2), all discussion in committee must be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration. As the Minister of Justice has pointed out, the whole Immigration Act is not being discussed at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I am sure that in saying I bow to your ruling, as I always do, I am not denied the opportunity of saying to my hon. friend that I can realize this is one subject which he did not want discussed at this time.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member is quite wrong. He knows that there have been no secret orders in council. He knows there have been no orders in council that were illegal. He also knows that there will be ample opportunity for him to examine the whole matter. But this is not the time to do it.

Mr. Garson: For the sake of the record, I should like to say that I have no desire whatever to prevent this matter from being discussed. But in a house of this sort I believe it is better to discuss a subject at the proper time.

Mr. Abbott: We must observe the constitution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement of course is quite unjustified. I rose to a point of order. I received an adverse ruling. I accepted your ruling, Mr. Chairman. As to my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, I would say to him that the rules here are somewhat different from those of the house whence he came.

The Chairman: Shall section 15 carry?

Mr. Lockhart: Will the movement of persons from Newfoundland to any part of Canada be entirely free, just the same as the present movement from one province to another?

Mr. St. Laurent: Exactly the same.

Mr. Miller: Will that word "domicile" be interpreted under the laws of Newfoundland as they are today or under the laws of Canada? Will there be a provincial or a dominion interpretation?

Mr. Garson: As my hon. friend will see when we reach subsequent sections of the bill, it will be interpreted differently, depending upon the section. For example, when you come to citizenship, the domicile that is required in Newfoundland is one year. In Canada it is five years. When we come to that section my hon. friend will see that we will be submitting an amendment to the text of the bill to make the new domicile five years for the purpose of Newfoundland and Canada, in order to have it uniform all across the country.

Section agreed to.

Mr. Abbott: May we revert to section 6, which I believe was held over last night? Someone wanted to ask some questions.

On section 6—Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Knowles: I wished to ask a few questions yesterday but the Minister of Finance was not able to be here at the time. Perhaps he could answer them now. I should like to know the precise basis upon which we take over responsibility for Newfoundland superannuated civil servants. I would break my question in the main into two parts. First of all, what is our responsibility, and how will we discharge it, with respect to civil servants who are already retired? My second question will then be obvious. What is our responsibility, and how will we discharge it, with respect to government employees in Newfoundland who now become federal government employees but have not yet retired?

When the minister is answering my question, I should be glad if he would give some indication as to the rates of pension as between Newfoundland and Canada. Thinking again of the first group, the people who are already retired, are the pensions they are now receiving of the order that our own superannuated civil servants are receiving? Will they be brought up to what we are paying? That is rather the wrong phrase to use because some of them are very low. Will uniformity be established with respect to those who are now retired? The same thing applies to those who are still working. Will they be on a basis comparable to the set-up in Canada?

Mr. Abbott: May I reply first to the question as to what the position will be with respect to the Newfoundland civil servants who are retired prior to the date of union. The agreement of union provides that their pensions will continue to be paid by the province of Newfoundland, and they will be considered as retired provincial civil servants.

The section that we are now considering is designed to give effect to term 39 of the terms of union. Perhaps it would be well if I were to read that, Mr. Chairman. It reads as follows:

> 39. (1) Employees of the government of Newfoundland in the services taken over by Canada pursuant to these terms will be offered employment in these services or in similar Canadian services under the terms and conditions from time to time governing employment in those services, but without reduction in salary or loss of pension rights acquired by reason of service in Newfoundland.
> (2) Canada will provide the pensions for such employees so that the employees will not be prejudiced, and the government of the province of Newfoundland will reimburse Canada for the pensions for, or at its option make to Canada contributions in respect of, the service of these employees with the government of Newfoundland prior to the date of union, but these payments or contributions will be such that the burden on the government of the province of Newfoundland in respect of pension rights acquired by reason of service in Newfoundland will not be increased by reason of the transfer.
> (3) Pensions of employees of the government of Newfoundland who were retired on pension before the service concerned is taken over by Canada will remain the responsibility of the province of Newfoundland.

This is a fairly complicated matter, as hon. members will appreciate, and during negotiations with the Newfoundland delegation an attempt was made to draft a term of agreement which would provide in detail for the way in which the pensions of public servants transferring to the service of the government of Canada would be dealt with. After a great deal of study it was found to be feasible to include a term only in the rather general language which I have just quoted. That was so because of the many variations between the Newfoundland pension scheme and our own. To illustrate, some of these variations include such things as:

(1) The Newfoundland scheme is noncontributory.

(2) The pension, under the Newfoundland scheme, is based on the average salary of the last three years' service, and the Canadian scheme is based on the average of the salary of the last ten years of service.

(3) In certain cases in Newfoundland a credit is given for longer service than is actually performed.

(4) The rate of computation of the Newfoundland pension is different from the Canadian rate.

(5) War service is treated differently under the Newfoundland scheme from the Canadian scheme.

I give these as an illustration and not as a complete list of variations between the Newfoundland scheme and our own scheme. The experience of the law officers of the crown in drafting section 6 of the bill which is now under consideration was somewhat similar to their experience in drafting term 39. Several attempts were made to draw amendments to the Superannuation Act, our Canadian statute, which would deal in detail with all matters affecting the pensions of transferred public servants. It was found that this could not be done without the most precise information in each case, and more precise information than we have at the moment. As a result of the study it was believed that in general Canada's undertaking in the provisions of the term which I read a moment ago will be fully carried out if the Superannuation Act is made applicable to the transferred employees. Some variations will be made necessary of course by the terms of union. Moreover, in some cases, particularly in the cases of employees who may retire shortly after the transfer, it may be necessary to fix a specific amount in order to give effect to the terms of union.

Subsection 1 of section 6 which is before the committee defines the employees to whom it applies in accordance with term 39. Subsection 2 authorizes the governor in council to take the action just indicated by regulation. Subsection 3 is an administrative section and provides that payments received from Newfoundland under term 39 of the terms of agreement shall be credited to the superannuation account. Payments of superannuation to transferred employees will be made out of the superannuation account.

Under term 39 Newfoundland is bound to reimburse Canada where Canada pays a pension to transferred employees by paying either an amount equal to the amount of pension for his Newfoundland service or an amount equal to the contributions that he would have been required to make if during his Newfoundland service he had been in the Canadian service.

When all eligible employees have joined the Canadian service and all the facts are known, it is expected that it will be necessary for us to make detailed amendments to the Superannuation Act. But until that has happened it is really impracticable, if not impossible, to prepare such amendments. The amendment which is now proposed in this section is merely transitional to put it in the power of the government of Canada to carry out its obligations under term 39. The pensions which will be paid to former Newfoundland civil servants who become pensioners under the Superannuation Act will be paid of course under the same rate of pension as if they had been in the employ of the Canadian government throughout the whole term of service.

Mr. Knowles: The most helpful sentence in what the minister has just said is the suggestion, almost the assurance, that when all Newfoundland civil servants have been taken into the pension set-up there will be an overhaul of the Superannuation Act. If that takes place it will be one more of the advantages of the confederation of Newfoundland with Canada.

Mr. Abbott: It is a pretty good act now.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says, "it is a pretty good act now." I grant that it is in many respects. But, as he knows from information that was placed on Hansard yesterday by one of his parliamentary assistants in response to a question of mine, there are a great many Canadian retired civil servants and their widows whose pensions are pitiably small. I hope that the experience of bringing in these Newfoundland people, when it calls for a revision of the Superannuation Act, will result in some consideration of all these people in Newfoundland and in the other nine provinces who are in these low brackets.

I shall try not to stray over the line and to talk on this matter of raising the superannuation benefits of our own employees, because I realize that that is not the subject now before us, and the minister and the committee know my concern about it anyway. But I did note in what the minister said just now a comment with reference to one particular class of Newfoundland civil servants. I was wondering about this group as he was going along, and he answered my question. He said that in the case of Newfoundland employees who would come into the Canadian civil service and then retire shortly afterwards—he may have said within a year or two but that was the impression I got—it might be necessary to fix, under the amendment that we are now passing, a sum to provide pensions for these people. I take it that the reason it might be necessary would be out of simple justice, namely, that otherwise the amount of pension that these people would have would be far too small.

Mr. Abbott: No; I am sorry if I misled my hon. friend. I simply meant that in that event it might be necessary to fix rather arbitrarily an amount to be paid into the superannuation fund with respect to that particular employee. There will be—or should be—no difficulty in establishing the pension to which he is entitled.

Mr. Knowles: My optimism has led me up the wrong path again. I thought there was something in it for the poor government civil servant who, when he would retire, would find that his pension was $20 or $30 a month, such as some retired civil servants receive now. That is what I thought he meant; so I urge upon the minister that when these people come in, just as soon after April 1 as possible, consideration should be given to the plight of superannuated civil servants from British Columbia to Newfoundland, particularly those in the lower brackets.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention that superannuation benefits of a civil servant employed in Newfoundland will be the same as those of a civil servant employed in British Columbia?

Mr. Abbott: That is right. We will make no difference between our civil servants in any province. And, provided they come into the civil service of Canada—that is, provided members of the former Newfoundland civil service are taken over and come into the civil service of Canada—they acquire all the rights of Canadian civil servants. On superannuation they will receive Canadian superannuation at Canadian rates under the superannuation act. Perhaps a rather difficult adjustment will be necessary, between the dominion of Canada and the province of Newfoundland, in their respective contributions to the superannuation fund. However, that is a technical and mathematical matter which need not concern the civil servants, particularly.

Mr. Knowles: The minister spoke about the possible overhauling of the superannuation act after all these Newfoundland people come in.

Mr. Abbott: My only reference was with respect to the amendments necessary to make the act properly applicable to Newfoundland.

Mr. Knowles: Granted. My question is this: Is that just a suggestion the minister is now making as something which will probably take place, or was there any kind of commitment given to the Newfoundland delegation that that would be done?

Mr. Abbott: It had nothing to do with the Newfoundland delegation. It is purely a matter of domestic management for ourselves. But my officers who are charged with the responsibility of administering the superannuation act inform me that, when all the facts with respect to the incorporation of Newfoundland civil servants are found, it will probably be necessary to make some special amendments to the superannuation act in specific terms in order to carry out our undertaking under the terms of union.

Mr. Bentley: There are in Canada at the present time a certain group of veterans of the armed services who have been or are civil servants, and who feel they have been excluded from having their time in the services included in their government employment for superannuation purposes. I am not going to discuss the matter further, because I believe they have sent in a report which is being studied by a departmental committee. However, is there a comparable group in Newfoundland, and how are they being treated?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I cannot say. I have not any information at the present time on the subject. All I can say is that, with respect to superannuation privileges, those Newfoundland civil servants who are veterans will be treated as other Canadians. I mentioned that among the variations between the Newfoundland pension plan and our own was a difference in the method of treating veterans. Newfoundlanders, when they become Canadians, will receive the benefits of Canadian law in that respect.

Mr. Hazen: Will any of the services which have been carried on by the Newfoundland government be discontinued by the dominion?

Mr. Abbott: It is perhaps a little difficult to answer that question. The officers of the two governments have been examining existing services in Newfoundland to see which of those services will be taken over by the dominion and which will probably be continued as provincial responsibilities. It might well be that there are some existing provincial services which would be merged with the dominion service; I should think that extremely likely. However, I should not like to make any specific answer at the present time.

Mr. Cockeram: How many civil servants are there in Newfoundland at the present time?

Mr. Abbott: I have not that information at hand; but I can get it readily and give it to the hon. member before the discussion on the bill is concluded.

Mr. Pearkes: Reverting to the question asked by the hon. member for Swift Current, is it not an instance of the disadvantages of the Canadian system being applied to ex-members of the armed forces from Newfoundland? This applies particularly to the recipients under part V of the Militia Pension Act as compared with the recipients under part IV, as a result of which the recipients under part IV have credit for their overseas service while those under part V have not?

Could the minister say whether those same distinctions apply in Newfoundland and, if so, whether the recipients under a regulation corresponding to that under our part V of the Militia Pension Act are again to be handicapped by confederation, or whether the government is considering now amending the regulations under part V so that they will conform with those under part IV.

Mr. Abbott: This section does not relate to the Militia Pension Act. The pensions we are here considering are those under the Civil Service Superannuation Act. My colleague the Minister of National Defence is not in the chamber at the moment, and I do not know what his view would be with respect to the Militia Pension Act which, as my hon. friend knows, is on a basis somewhat different from the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Pearkes: I raised the point only because it was raised by the hon. member for Swift Current.

Mr. Abbott: I thought the hon. member for Swift Current was referring to war service by veterans constituting service in the civil service of Canada under the superannuation act—at least that was my understanding of the point he made.

Mr. Pearkes: It is exactly the same thing.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Will the pensions paid to Newfoundlanders be charged against contributions already made by Canadian civil servants, or will that be a special vote?

Mr. Abbott: There will have to be a special vote by the House of Commons of the amount necessary to put in the superannuation fund an amount appropriate to cover the pensions of the Newfoundland civil service.

Mr. Bentley: Over and above the other sum?

Mr. Abbott: It will have to be a special vote.

Mr. Green: How much will it be?

Mr. Abbott: It has not yet been possible to estimate it.

Mr. Green: In approximate figures?

Mr. Abbott: I gave a figure the other day. I am speaking from memory, but I believe my estimate for the first year was something in the order of $2 million. I do not wish to be held to that, but I believe that was the figure I mentioned. It will be a reasonably substantial sum.

Mr. Brooks: Did I understand the minister to say that any civil servant retired now in Newfoundland would be paid by the provincial government of Newfoundland?

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Brooks: With respect to any civil servant who will be retired within the next year, does the federal government pay the full amount of the retiring pension, with no contribution?

Mr. Abbott: No. The terms of union, which I quoted before the hon. member entered the chamber, provide that a Newfoundland civil servant who becomes a Canadian civil servant will, upon retirement, be paid the Canadian superannuation at the rate provided in the superannuation act, and the cost of that pension will be divided between the two governments. Broadly speaking, the Canadian government will pay a contribution to cover his service in the Canadian public service, while the Newfoundland government will pay an amount to cover his service in the Newfoundland civil service.

Mr. Green: The minister mentioned an amount of $2 million to be paid this year. Will there be payments each year in the future, or is that payment of $2 million final?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that I can give my hon. friend a definite answer at the moment, but speaking generally I would think that in a subsequent year when all the civil servants have been taken into the Canadian service and it is possible to assess their service in Newfoundland and decide what proportion we shall pay here a further lump sum will have to be voted. It may take six months or a year to make that assessment, but after that I would think that the contribution would be the regular one that we vote each as the government's share.

Mr. Green: Has the minister an estimate of what that second payment will be?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that it has not been possible as yet to make an estimate.

Mr. Green: Could the minister not give an approximate figure?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that the major portion would be included in the $2 million figure that I gave, but I caution again that that is only an estimate. As hon. members know, this pension business is a terribly complicated thing mathematically and actuarially. A good deal of basic data is required, and then when you have that data you must make many actuarial calculations before an amount can be finally arrived at.

Mr. Green: How do the salaries compare at the present time?

Mr. Abbott: I understand that in most cases they are somewhat lower in Newfoundland.

Mr. Lennard: If the rates in Newfoundland are lower than in Canada will the Newfoundland civil servant be required to make up any back contributions?

Mr. Abbott: The obligation will be upon the government of Newfoundland to make the contribution, as the Newfoundland system was not a contributory system. As I understand, they do not have a superannuation fund as we do, the pensions being voted each year out of current revenues. Under those circumstances it was necessary that the contribution should be made by the Newfoundland government.

Mr. Cockeram: May I ask the minister first if there has been a pension fund in Newfoundland and if contributions have been made by the employees?

Mr. Abbott: There has never been a contributory pension fund of any kind in Newfoundland. I am informed that the government pays the pensions out of current revenues.

Mr. Case: This discussion, of course, has regard to future conditions that will arise when union is completed. Will there be any financial obligation on the part of Canada to Newfoundland before March 31? Will these amounts be included in our budgetary plans for the next fiscal year?

Mr. Abbott: It will all be after March 31. As I explained the other day, when final steps have been taken it is my intention to bring in special supplementary estimates showing the amounts which it is expected will be spent in the public service in Newfoundland during the fiscal year commencing April 1. While I am on my feet I should like to correct an answer I made to the hon. member for Vancouver South in connection with the $2 million figure. That figure related to our contribution to the unemployment insurance fund and not to the superannuation fund. I am informed that no estimate can be made until more is known about what civil servants will be taken over and until Newfoundland decides which of the two options she will exercise. Those options are provided in article 39 of the terms of union. Newfoundland may make a contribution to Canada in respect to the service of its employees or it may reimburse Canada for the pensions of those employees. The amount which it will be necessary for Canada to pay into the fund will depend to a large extent upon which option is exercised.

Mr. Green: Has any estimate been made of the amount that would be involved in each plan?

Mr. Abbott: It has not been possible to make an estimate. That was one of the terms of union to which the Newfoundland delegates attached a great deal of importance: that the public servants of Newfoundland would have their position protected and be taken into the public service of Canada without prejudice to their pension rights. Naturally we could not have two classes of civil servants in the country; they must all be treated in a comparable fashion. Therefore the Newfoundland civil servants who come over to our service will get the Canadian rates of pension, but the Newfoundland government will have to decide which of these two options it wishes to exercise in making its contribution. One may be slightly more advantageous than the other, although it is hard to say at the moment. I am told that that would depend upon the number of civil servants affected, the length of their service and so on; but, generally speaking, the feeling of the Canadian government was that we should be fair and generous in this particular field.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Is there a Canadian pension fund comparable to the unemployment insurance fund, or are all contributions paid into the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. Abbott: The superannuation fund is a special fund set up under the superannuation act, and it is from that fund that the pensions are paid.

Section agreed to.

Sections 16 and 17 agreed to.

On section 18—Militia Pension Act.

Mr. Pearkes: I do not want to embarrass the minister by repeating the question I asked a few minutes ago on the other section, but I ask him to note that under the Militia Pension Act certain members of the permanent force were let out of the service before they had completed their normal term of service. They were retired to pension, but had they stayed in the service a few more years they could have retired under Part IV. Under Part V they are not in the same advantageous position as those who had retired under Part IV, should they enter the public service of Canada.

I do not know whether they have anything comparable to our Part IV and Part V in Newfoundland and I should like to ask if consideration has been given to amending Part V of our Militia Pension Act in order to make it comparable to Part IV. I urge that it would be to the advantage of Canadian ex-service personnel and Newfoundland ex-service personnel if that could be done so that the conditions of Part IV would apply to all those who seek service in the public service of Canada.

Mr. Abbott: As far as I am aware no consideration has been given an amendment such as that to which my hon. friend refers. I am not as familiar with the provisions of the Militia Pension Act as he is, or as I am with the superannuation act, which comes more directly under my jurisdiction. But I shall consider the suggestion he has made and I shall bring it to the attention of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Pearkes: I ask the question because I brought the suggestion to the attention of the Minister of National Defence during last session, and he mentioned that it was receiving consideration at that time. If possible I should like to know what has been the result of those deliberations.

Mr. Abbott: I shall bring my hon. friend's point to his attention.

Mr. Cockeram: Can the minister tell us how many men come under the Militia Pension Act, and also what the cost of this is likely to be?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid that to have these questions answered the section will have to stand until the Minister of National Defence is here, because I have not that information. They have sent to ask if he can come down, and I understand he will be here in just a few minutes.

Section stands.

On section 19—Old Age Pensions Act.

Mr. Green: I had hoped to ask the Prime Minister a question in reference to section 19. I wonder if it could stand, too?

Mr. Knowles: Before it is allowed to stand I want to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It is a question of a legal nature, not with regard to the substance of the old age pension question. The minister is smiling; perhaps he was hoping I would do the other.

Mr. Garson: Which other?

Mr. Knowles: Talk about the substance of old age pensions, or the lack of substance. My question is this. In some other sections of this act which the Minister of Justice is piloting through the house there are references to the effective date of April 1, 1949. For example, in section 18, with which we were just dealing, that is the case. There is no such reference in section 19. It simply says that for the purposes of the Old Age Pensions Act residence and presence in Newfoundland shall respectively be deemed to be residence and presence in Canada. By the provisions of the last section of the bill, this act does not come into effect until midnight of March 31 of this year. Perhaps the minister sees my point. Is there any danger after March 31 of an applicant for old age pension in the province of Newfoundland claiming that residence in Newfoundland prior to March 31, 1949, was residence in Canada, and finding that this section does not say so? Please note that the preceding section talks about service or domicile, or something of the sort, in the forces of Newfoundland prior to April 1, 1949. It does not say that in section 19, and my fear is that later on somebody in the minister's department may say, "Well, residence in Newfoundland is residence in Canada from and after the date this act came into effect, but not necessarily so prior to that date". It is no longer proper in this house to say that one is not a lawyer, but the fact is I am not; nevertheless I suggest that it might have been wise to say "residence before or after April 1, 1949" or something similar.

Mr. Garson: Under the Old Age Pensions Act certain consequences flow in favour of the applicant for an old age pension by virtue of his residence or presence in certain places. He has to be resident and present in certain places in order to get a pension. The meaning of section 19 is that on and after March 31, the date on which it comes into effect—and that is the effective date of the union—residence and presence in Newfoundland shall be deemed, for the purposes of the act, to have all the consequences that residence and presence in Canada would have. I think my hon. friend has answered his own question by very astutely, for a layman, looking at the last section of the act and discovering the date it comes into effect; because if the act comes into effect on March 31, as there stated, it is not necessary from a drafting point of view to repeat that in section 19.

Mr. Knowles: If I answered my own question, the minister has now raised a doubt in my mind. From what the minister says it is perfectly clear that on and after April 1, 1949, residence in Newfoundland will, for the purposes of the Old Age Pensions Act, be residence in Canada. But I am concerned about the person who two years from now will be seventy, who will apply for old age pension and say, "I have had twenty years' residence in Canada, eighteen years in Newfoundland prior to confederation and two since." I thought the understanding was that such a person would qualify. I see the Minister of National Health and Welfare is here now, and I would ask him if that is not the case.

Mr. Martin: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. Knowles: I agree with the minister that under the terms of union there is no doubt as to the intention; but in what he has said just now the Minister of Justice has made it clear to me at least that residence in Newfoundland after April 1, 1949, is residence in Canada.

Mr. Garson: The act comes into effect on March 31. If the vote taken in the house the other day, for example, had gone the other way, there would be no union at all. Once this amendment is made to the act, however, it provides that the residence which has taken place prior to the application being made can be residence either in Canada or in Newfoundland, either of which will be equally effective for the purpose of securing a pension for the applicant.

Mr. Knowles: If the minister is satisfied, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare makes it very clear that is what is meant, I need not worry about it unless the problem comes up. But I am still puzzled as to why it was not written into section 19 as it was into section 18, where there is something similar.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at section 18 he will see that it is a provision to add to section 53 of the Militia Pension Act subparagraph (gg), and it has to be read along with the preceding part of the paragraph. If my hon. friend checks it up I think he will find there an answer to his question.

Mr. MacInnis: I was just wondering if another layman might give a legal opinion on this. Does not section 19 merely state that for the purposes of the Old Age Pensions Act Newfoundland will be a part of Canada?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Martin: That is to say, if a Newfoundlander lived in Canada for two years and had lived in Newfoundland for eighteen years, we would add the two years to the eighteen spent in Newfoundland. After the passage of this act, for the purposes of the Old Age Pensions Act residence in Newfoundland is deemed to be residence in Canada.

Mr. Green: When this section was called I asked that it stand because the Prime Minister had left the chamber. Since then the Minister of National Health and Welfare has come in, as well as the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister, and I shall be glad to ask my question now so the section may pass.

During the discussion the other day, there was a suggestion that an attempt should be made to provide for old age pensions commencing on the 1st of April, if that were at all possible. Some of us suggested that the Canadian parliament could make provision for retroactive payments, subject, of course, to the government of the new province of Newfoundland making some similar provision. I think there is a way in which that can be done. In any event, I should like to ask the minister to give careful consideration to the matter because I believe everyone in this house wishes to see old age pensions payable in Newfoundland on the 1st of April, just as family allowances are to be payable.

Section 3 of the Old Age Pensions Act is so worded as to make it possible to bring about that result, subject to the provincial government of Newfoundland passing an old age pensions act and providing that the pensions shall commence on the 1st of April. Section 3 reads as follows:

> The minister, with the approval of the governor in council, may make an agreement with any province for the quarterly payment to such province of the total of the amounts the government of Canada is under sections eight and eight A of this act authorized to contribute—

These are the words I stress.

> —in respect of pensions paid during the preceding quarter by the province pursuant to any provincial statute, to the persons and under the conditions specified in this act and the regulations;

It will be noticed that the dominion can pay if the province has authorized payment. There is no restriction upon the dominion making these payments for a prior period.

Sections 8 and 8A of the act would seem to me to contain no provision that would prevent these payments being made as of the 1st of April. I would ask the ministry to give very careful consideration to the question whether, if the government of Newfoundland passes an act calling for payments commencing on the 1st of April, Canada can make her contribution likewise commencing on the 1st of April.

Mr. Martin: I can assure my hon. friend that, not only will there be no delay, but there will be a great desire on the part of this government to enter into an arrangement with the new province of Newfoundland to make payments under the Old Age Pensions Act at the earliest possible date. If it can be done the 1st of April, it will be.

Mr. Claxton: Supplementing my colleague's answer, I should add that the matter received very serious consideration during the negotiations. The situation was examined from every possible point of view. It does involve serious difficulties which the hon. member will appreciate. This government will do everything to overcome those difficulties, but the question is, can they be overcome legally without getting this arrangement out of line with the other provinces?

Mr. Green: That is what worried me the other evening. The Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence seemed to take the position that no provision could be made for retroactive payments because the other provinces might claim there had been unfairness. I do not think there is anything in that argument. I do not believe any of the other provinces would claim there had been unfairness. I do suggest that, as the Old Age Pensions Act reads today, it is possible for Canada to provide for the payments to start on the 1st of April. I believe that should be the only test. If it cannot be done under the present act, that may be a reason for not making the payments retroactive. I do not believe it is a good reason, however, since the Old Age Pensions Act could be amended as it is being amended by section 19 of this bill. I do ask the minister to give further consideration to this question.

Mr. Martin: My answer was as complete as possible. We are anxious to enter into an arrangement with Newfoundland as quickly as possible.

Mr. Nicholson: I was interested in the comments the Prime Minister made when this matter was dealt with before. He admitted it would have been possible for the commission of government in Newfoundland to provide for the payment of old age pensions immediately. I would imagine, if these details had been discussed with the delegates from Newfoundland, financial arrangements satisfactory to the people of Newfoundland could have been made. I am sure this type of legislation would be very popular with the people. I cannot see any good reason why the commission of government was not prepared to pass the necessary legislation to enable payments to start on the 1st of April. Will the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of National Defence indicate why that procedure was not followed?

Mr. Martin: I can only say that the government of Newfoundland will have to speak for itself. I cannot make myself any clearer. I have said that the government will be anxious to enter into an agreement with the provincial government of Newfoundland, as it then will be, at the earliest possible moment. We are anxious that the old age pensioners of that province receive at the earliest possible date the benefits which the act provides. Seventy-five per cent of the pension is to be borne by this government.

Mr. Nicholson: Would the minister indicate what attitude the delegates took during the discussions? For what reason were they not prepared to proceed?

Mr. Martin: I do not think it would be proper for any of us on this side to say what is the policy of the government of any province.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, for once I find myself in agreement with the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Martin: We have agreed many times.

Mr. Graydon: I am speaking of this afternoon. I do not see how the minister could give any other answer than the one he gave with respect to the attitude of the government of Newfoundland; after all, we cannot speak for the Newfoundland government. But that does not touch the point that ought to be considered. This government can say what it would do, if it is not too timid.

When an agreement is entered into with the provincial government of the new province of Newfoundland, will this government be prepared to make payments to the old age pensioners provided that is the desire of the Newfoundland government and provided that government is prepared to pass the necessary legislation to make these payments retroactive? The government can answer that question because it is a subject within the jurisdiction of this government.

I do not want to repeat all I said before, but perhaps I can put some of it more clearly. We all know that the machinery of government sometimes operates slowly. I am quite sure there is no one who understands that mechanism better than the present administration, so they will understand what I am driving at. First of all, the setting-up of the provincial government is one thing; to have a provincial constitution set in operation after the 1st of April is another. To have a provincial election is one thing and to have a provincial cabinet is another. The setting-up of the necessary offices and administrative detail enters into the question of old age pensions.

So long as this government sees fit to have on the statute books a statute that calls for means tests and all that kind of thing, may I say, as one who has at least observed how slowly the machinery of government sometimes operates, that I think it may be a long time before the pensioners of Newfoundland will find their first old age pension cheques in the post office box. That is the thing that bothers me. I can understand that at the moment perhaps this government can do little in the way of hastening the date when the first cheque may be given. But they can overcome the disappointment, the discouragement and, if I may say so, the injustice, by making retroactive to April 1 the payments under the Old Age Pensions Act to every one of Newfoundland's senior citizens who is entitled to the old age pension. This government and the provincial government of Newfoundland will be largely forgiven for the delay, provided the old age pensioners know that, when that cheque comes, it will be a cheque covering the whole period from the day Newfoundland entered confederation until the day the cheque arrives.

One other matter which was raised in this debate, and I think in a previous one as well, was that perhaps some other parts of Canada might be offended because Newfoundland old age pensioners were to get a retroactive payment. I do not think anyone anywhere in Canada will quibble over a matter of that kind.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member has changed his position since yesterday.

Mr. Graydon: I do not think the minister understood our position anyway.

Mr. Mitchell: I do not think the hon. member understood it either.

Mr. Graydon: There are many other things I might say about the agreement. I think we should take it for granted that Canada is prepared to see that the old age pensioners of Newfoundland are given retroactive payments to April 1. Despite what the Minister of Labour may say about it, I think we on this side of the house at least can guarantee that there will be no opposition to such a course.

Mr. Green: I think there would be great value in the government's giving an assurance that Canada is prepared to make these payments retroactive to April 1. If Canada gives that assurance, it is much more likely that the new government of Newfoundland will pass the necessary provincial legislation. For that reason, if for no other, I hope that the government will come right out and say whether or not it is prepared to make these payments retroactive.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for Peel has been, I am sure, intentionally helpful in what he has had to say, and for that reason I greatly appreciate his remarks. The same applies to other members. I can only repeat what I have said twice already, namely, that the government does not require any additional legislation to enter into an agreement with a province with a view to providing the benefits under the Old Age Pensions Act. As this is a matter that does not involve action by one government alone, but presupposes an arrangement between the federal government and a provincial government, I am sure hon. members will agree that I can do nothing more than say that just as soon as the government of Newfoundland asks for an agreement to provide old age pensions this government will enter into such an arrangement.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister if he is favourable to the proposal I have just made in the committee?

Mr. Martin: I do not think I can answer the question any more clearly than I already have.

Mr. Graydon: I think the minister could because all he has said is that the government is prepared to enter into an agreement with Newfoundland once a provincial government has been set up. But that is not what I asked of the government. I wanted to find out what the government's policy would be on the proposal that I have made to make these payments retroactive to April 1. There is no harm in the government, if they favour the proposal, saying that if Newfoundland were willing, the government is willing. That is all I asked the minister to do.

Mr. Martin: I have said that.

Mr. Graydon: I do not think the minister has.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Section agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Section 18 stood.

On section 18—Militia Pension Act.

Mr. Pearkes: I had asked the minister a question and I think he said he would get the answer later. That would be satisfactory.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—Pension Act.

Mr. Bentley: It is a pity that in the bill these statutes have been drawn up in alphabetical order, because this section and section 50 are similar. The former deals with pensions and the latter with the war veterans allowance. I notice that section 20(3) reads as follows:

> A British subject resident and domiciled in Newfoundland at the time of enlistment who served in the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty or in any of the naval, military or air forces of any of the countries allied with His Majesty during world war II shall be deemed to be a member of the forces for the purposes of section eleven of the Pension Act . . .

There is a similar paragraph in section 50 of this act dealing with war veterans allowance. What this means is that Newfoundland veterans who were imperial veterans, and will be up until the time of union, are now to come under the benefits of Canadian pension and other legislation applying to veterans. I have no quarrel with that. I am glad of it. It should be that way. But it seems to me that the government should now go a step further and proceed to include, for the purpose of this section and other parts of the veteran legislation, those imperial veterans who at present are excluded simply because they did not actually live in Canada the day before they enlisted. If the government is not generous in this regard, and if the imperial veterans who have had long years of residence in Canada between the wars—and some before world war I—are not included, they will feel discriminated against. I think this opens up a way for the government to make a generous gesture. The Minister of Veterans Affairs should give us some assurance that the government is considering action of that kind.

Mr. Gregg: I think the hon. member's conclusion is slightly overdrawn. This section 20, for purposes of pension, places those who served in Newfoundland on exactly the same basis as those who served in Canada, whatever their home or origin may have been.

Mr. Bentley: That is true. But the fact remains that up until April 1 of this year they were imperial veterans.

Mr. Garson: Oh, no.

Mr. Bentley: Oh, yes. The veterans of world war I were imperial veterans, and there are veterans of the same class who live in Canada.

Mr. Gregg: Those who served in world war I were, for the most part, serving on behalf of Newfoundland just as those who in world war I served on behalf of Canada. Those who served in world war II were Newfoundlanders who served in British units but could not perhaps be classified exactly as what we have always referred to in Canada as imperial veterans.

Mr. Green: I think the hon. member for Swift Current has raised a good point, and I hope there will be an opportunity to discuss it further when we are dealing with the War Veterans Allowance Act. I have understood, from the terms of union and also from the proposed arrangements which were submitted by Canada to Newfoundland in October of 1947, that the veterans of Newfoundland were to be placed in the same position as the veterans of Canada. I thought that was the underlying principle. I submit that that is not being done by the present legislation. For example, subsection 1 of section 20 refers to sections 45, 46 and 46A of the Pension Act. Subsection 2 deals with section 11 of the Pension Act, and subsection 3 also deals with section 11 of the Pension Act. As far as these sections of the Pension Act which are referred to are concerned, perhaps this amendment is all right. But take for example section 21 of the Pension Act which provides for a meritorious service pension. As hon. members know, a veteran unable to qualify for pension directly by reason of his disability having been caused by war service, if he has meritorious service, is still able to get a pension under section 21. The same is true of the widow or the dependents of a veteran who was unable to qualify directly under the provisions of section 11.

This new section 20 is not going to be of any help to a veteran of Newfoundland in getting a meritorious service pension. It looks to me as though he is just out of luck when it comes to qualifying for a meritorious service pension. Therefore that veteran is certainly not being put on the same basis as he would be if he were a Canadian veteran. Another example will be found in section 33 of the Pension Act which provides for payment to a veteran's parents who are in need. The qualification there is that it must be the parents of a member of the forces. I would have thought that a member of the forces, as defined in the Pension Act, should have been extended to include members of the forces of Newfoundland as well as members of the forces of Canada. If that had been done, the parents of a Newfoundland veteran would have been eligible under section 33. Another example is the dependent brother and sister, which comes under section 34 of the Pension Act. The act reads that the dependent brother and sister of a member of the forces can get a pension under certain conditions. Because a member of the forces is not defined to include a Newfoundland veteran, his dependent brother and sister cannot qualify under section 34. I have not had time to go through the Pension Act carefully but I have no doubt that there are other instances in which the veteran of Newfoundland is not going to be in the same position as the veteran of Canada simply because the amendment to the Pension Act is restricted to these sections which are referred to in section 20 of the bill before us.

If the intention is that the Newfoundland veteran shall become to all intents and purposes a Canadian veteran, then section 20 had better be withdrawn and the law officers of the crown had better work out some sort of an amendment which will make the Newfoundland veteran in effect a Canadian veteran. Without going into it carefully, I think it might be done by defining a member of the forces as including a member of the Newfoundland forces.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at the explanatory note of section 20 he will see that this amendment is required by term 38 (a) of the terms of union. By comparing term 38 (a) of the terms of union with this section 20 he will discover that—

Mr. Green: Actually it should be 38 (b).

Mr. Garson: In any event, whether it is (a) or (b), the instructions from which the law officers of the crown work in a case of this kind are the terms of the agreement which was reached between three sovereign governments. That is a circumstance which hon. members should not overlook. Ordinarily, when a government brings down a bill, there is room for the persuasive powers of the opposition to convince the government that it has taken the wrong position and that it should modify the terms of the bill which is before the house. But where you are implementing an agreement reached between governments, the Canadian government in fairness to the Newfoundland government, which is one of the parties to this arrangement, must in all honesty carry out the provisions which have been agreed to. If hon. members will make that comparison they will see that section 20, which is approved by the pension commission, is reflecting exactly the conclusion reached by the delegates when here as set out in term 38 of the terms of union. It completely fulfils that requirement. These are our instructions. That is all we can draw the bill to. We have an agreement. Our task is to draw a bill which carries into effect the terms of the agreement. I suggest that we have no power to vary it.

Mr. Green: May I follow up my point? If this section stands as it is submitted to the committee today the result will be that there will be two kinds of Canadian veterans, namely, the veterans in the nine provinces who get all the benefits of the Pension Act and the veterans in Newfoundland who get only some of the benefits of the Pension Act. I am sure that we do not want that condition to exist in our pension legislation. The Minister of Veterans Affairs and his parliamentary assistant have both said, if not vocally at least by nodding their heads, the intention is that the veteran of Newfoundland is to be treated in exactly the same way as the veteran of Canada. Frankly I would be amazed if that were not the intention of these two hon. gentlemen and in fact the intention of every hon. member.

Mr. Mutch: That is the contract.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Justice takes the stand that there is an agreement between the three governments and therefore Canada must comply exactly with that agreement. The Minister of Veterans Affairs is sitting behind the Minister of Justice. He says that the intention of the Canadian government was to treat the Newfoundland veteran in the same way as the Canadian veteran is treated, and the terms of union are open to that interpretation. I admit that on this point they are not as clear as they should be. That is why when opening my remarks I asked whether it was the intention that the veterans in both dominions should be treated in the same way. The terms of union contained in term 38, which are applicable, read as follows:

> 38. Canada will make available to Newfoundland veterans the following benefits, on the same basis as they are from time to time available to Canadian veterans, as if the Newfoundland veterans had served in His Majesty's Canadian forces, namely. . .

Paragraph (a) deals with war veterans allowances. Paragraph (b) deals with pensions and reads as follows:

> (b) Canada will assume as from the date of union the Newfoundland pension liability in respect of the first world war, and in respect of the second world war Canada will assume as from the date of union the cost of supplementing disability and dependents' pensions paid by the government of the United Kingdom or an allied country to Newfoundland veterans up to the level of the Canadian rates of pensions, and, in addition—

Mark these words:

> —Canada will pay pensions arising from disabilities that are pensionable under Canadian law but not pensionable either under the laws of the United Kingdom or under the laws of an allied country.

I suggest that, in view of the wording of that term and the stand taken today by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the amending legislation should be such that the Newfoundland veteran would get exactly the same treatment as the Canadian veteran. That certainly is not done under section 20 of the bill.

Mr. Gregg: I do not propose to enter into a legal argument; but I reaffirm that not only is it the intention of the government that the Newfoundland veterans shall be treated in every respect, both in general and in detail, as Canadian veterans, but that this point was also discussed fully by the two delegations in conjunction with the officers of the Department of Veterans Affairs, including our own legal representatives. I was assured definitely that the points the hon. member has made, and others in the same category, could be worked out in exactly the way he and I desire they should be worked out.

Mr. Green: It is not a matter of how it can be worked out. It should be set out definitely in the legislation, so that anyone who reads is can understand it. I submit that, if this section 20 contains the only amendments to the Pension Act, Newfoundland veterans will be ineligible for meritorious pensions, the parents of Newfoundland veterans will be ineligible for the benefits set out under section 33, and dependent brothers and sisters of Newfoundland veterans will be ineligible for the benefits in section 34. And there may be other benefits from which they are excluded, simply by reason of the way in which this amendment to the Pension Act has been drawn.

I do urge upon the ministry seriously that they do not try to stand on their present amendment and say, "It is good enough; we can get around the difficulty later in some fashion or other." I suggest that they ought not to take that attitude, but that they should go right back and have the law officers of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of Justice go through the Pension Act with a fine-tooth comb with a view to making whatever amendments are necessary to make the Newfoundland veteran in effect a Canadian veteran.

Mr. Mutch: During the consideration of pension legislation in conjunction with the delegation from Newfoundland, the intention was clearly expressed, and has been re-expressed here today, of making the position of the Canadian Newfoundlander, as he will be after he becomes a Canadian, exactly the same as that of other Canadians. We examined this carefully and in detail with the pension commission itself, which, as my hon. friend knows, has in the interpretation of the Pension Act the powers of a high court—

Mr. Green: That may be; but they make mistakes.

Mr. Mutch: I am sure they would be the first to admit it. However in committee we did have the advantage of their opinion, and also had advantage of legal opinion from our own department. We have been assured that it will be possible to make operative, the undertaking made in section 38 of the agreement with the changes proposed here. In other words, the best advice we can get is that these changes are all that are necessary to make the Canadian Pension Act fully operative so that there shall be no distinction between the Canadian who was born and all his life has been living in what is now Canada and the new Canadian who will become such as of March 31 this year.

That is the intention of the legislation; that is the agreement. I shall not argue on legal grounds with my hon. friend—I have tried it once or twice with varying results. However, that is our advice; that is our conviction, and that is the intention of the agreement. If it should prove that my hon. friend is right, and that at some later date some further changes are required, they will be sought.

Mr. Green: What is the objection to changing the definition of "member of the forces" as it appears in section 2 (1) (i) to include service in the Newfoundland forces? The definition now reads:

> "a member of the forces" means any person who has served in the naval, military or air forces of Canada since the commencement of world war I.

Mr. Mutch: I think the reason is that there is a desire not to confuse terminology but to make application of benefits to Canadian forces to all intents and purposes identical to the Newfoundlander who served in the Newfoundland forces. That is after March 31 it would place him in the same position as the Canadian who served in the Canadian forces. In order not to confuse terminology, it was not done. Our opinion is that it is not necessary, to make it operative; and if it is not necessary, I submit it is useless to clutter up the act with it.

Mr. Bentley: The explanations of the minister and his parliamentary assistant are most encouraging; and their words on Hansard will no doubt carry some weight. But they would not carry weight in a court of law, because they are not written into the act. I am only a layman in legal matters; but, in listening to the hon. member for Vancouver South who is a lawyer, and having sat with him in the committee on veterans affairs, I am pretty sure he is right in this instance. Yet, where this section states that it applies to certain sections of the Pension Act, it must automatically exclude other sections.

If it was the intention of the government to do those things which the minister and his parliamentary assistant have said it is their intention to do, then why could it not be done in the act and thereby be given the force of law so as to remove any shadow of doubt some of us might have. Because certainly what the hon. member for Vancouver South has said is going to take place. No matter what the future intention might be, if this passes, changes will find opposition. And when the opposition comes, it may be some time before it can be overcome. Newfoundland veterans brought in under the act may be affected.

Why could not the law officers of the crown or other legal gentlemen discover a way of including them, without having to mention only some of the sections in which they are included? Why could not the whole dominion act have been made to include Newfoundland veterans?

When we reach section 50 we will find the same difficulty. In that section certain portions of the War Veterans Allowance Act will be given force of law; and, as those sections are cited in the bill, it automatically follows that the other sections are excluded. What I suggest would be a simple procedure; and I notice the hon. member for Vancouver South nods his head in agreement.

Mr. Garson: I do not think there is any doubt that the amendment as drafted carries into effect exactly those conclusions reached by the delegation, as set out in term 38 of the terms of union. However, in order to remove any possible doubt which may be in the minds of hon. members opposite, I suggest that at the dinner recess we check with the pension commission. The section could be allowed to stand in the meantime, so that we would have an opportunity to give that assurance to hon. members. I think it will be found that the section as drafted is adequate.

Mr. Green: I am afraid the section as drawn was drawn to meet the narrower interpretation of term 38(b), which provides—

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Green: I do not say that that was done intentionally, but I think that the law officers who drew up section 20 merely read term 38(b). Taking the more narrow interpretation, they have drawn up the section accordingly.

Mr. Garson: That can easily be resolved because we will double-check the matter.

Mr. Brooks: I do not think there is much that can be added to what the hon. member for Vancouver South has said. The marginal note opposite page 8 reads:

Section 11 of the Pension Act provides pensions generally in respect of military service.

The cases which the hon. member has mentioned are not general cases; they are particular cases. We who have served on the veterans committee for many sessions recall that we had to bring up these particular cases under section 20 and section 34. As the hon. member for Vancouver South says, many other sections are involved. This indicates to me, as it must indicate to all hon. members of this committee, the necessity of having a veterans committee. If this matter had been brought before the veterans committee these complaints would have been cleared up. I am not satisfied with the statement of the Minister of Justice that this section covers all the cases that have been mentioned.

Mr. Garson: I said that it covered the agreement reached by the delegates and they were supposed to cover the whole field.

Mr. Green: It may be that the Newfoundland delegates did not realize the different provisions of the Pension Act. No doubt section 11 of that act is covered, as is set out in the explanatory note read by the hon. member for Royal, but there are other disabilities not arising from service, such as pensions to a dependent parent or a brother and sister.

Mr. Mutch: The hon. member's suggestion is that they should be specifically mentioned.

Mr. Green: My suggestion is that a general clause should be written into the Pension Act saying that the Newfoundland veterans will get the same deal as the Canadian veterans. That is what we are all aiming at and it certainly is not achieved by section 20.

Mr. Gregg: I assure my hon. friend that the Newfoundland delegation studied every phase of the Pension Act.

Mr. Bentley: If that is the case, will the minister or any of those who attended the meetings say that the Newfoundland delegation did not question any of these items? Is this the result of tough bargaining on the part of the Canadian delegation?

Mr. Mutch: It can hardly be suggested that there is tough bargaining in connection with an agreement the preamble of which says that it is giving everything we have. If that is tough bargaining we certainly were not on the tough end.

Mr. Bentley: I did not suggest that; I simply asked a question. I am pointing out, as I pointed out before, that in the way this bill is written certain sections of the Pension Act are excluded, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. Mutch: And denied.

Mr. Bentley: The parliamentary assistant was not present when I pointed them out. What he and the minister have said is most helpful and we appreciate it. However, the fact remains that their words on Hansard do not have the force of law. If this got before the courts their words would not have any effect. In the way the bill is written there are certain sections of the Pension Act which would be automatically excluded by the inclusion of this section.

Mr. Mutch: I am glad the hon. member has given me an outline of what I missed when I answered the telephone. The fact remains that the difference between us is not one of intent, it is one of belief. We have consulted the law officers of the crown and we have accepted their advice, but you do not believe them. If what hon. gentlemen across the way are saying is proved to be correct and we have not achieved what we set out to achieve, then I am sure the necessary provisions will be inserted. But at the moment we believe we have done what you wish us to do.

Section stands.

On section 21—Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Mr. Pearkes: Will paragraph (ii), which refers to time served on active service in the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty raised in Canada or Newfoundland, apply to the man who left Newfoundland to join the Royal Navy?

Mr. Garson: The effect of this whole section is that any Royal Canadian Mounted Police recruit in Newfoundland may apply service in the military forces or the civil service of Newfoundland toward his pension.

Mr. Pearkes: It is not clear.

Mr. Garson: The section reads:

"service" means time served in the force and includes for the purpose of making contributions under this part and of computing pensions, allowances or gratuities

(i) time served in the civil service or the permanent naval, military or air forces of Canada or Newfoundland;

(ii) time served on active service in the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty raised in Canada or Newfoundland during time of war; and"

He can get credit for time served in the civil service of either Canada or Newfoundland or in the permanent naval, military or air forces of Canada or Newfoundland, and in addition he can get credit for time served in the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty raised in Canada or Newfoundland. The purpose of this section is to bring the Royal Canadian Mounted Police recruit in Newfoundland on the same level as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police recruit in Canada in respect of pension.

Mr. Pearkes: Perhaps I had better put my question in another way. Would the Newfoundlander who joined the Royal Navy at the outbreak of war or during the war be entitled to these benefits?

Mr. Garson: I see the hon. member's point and I will check it up.

Mr. Drew: This wording is of particular importance to Newfoundland because of the large number of Newfoundlanders who enlisted in the Royal Navy. This section would impose real limitations if they were not included.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Before the committee rose we were considering section 20.

On section 20—Pension Act.

Mr. Bentley: I believe the minister was going to give us an explanation of this section.

Mr. Gregg: The Minister of Justice is unavoidably delayed for a few minutes, so I would ask that this section stand for the time being.

Section stands.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

On section 21—Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Mr. Pearkes: I had asked some questions of the Minister of Justice before the committee rose for the dinner recess, and I would request that this section stand also.

Section stands.

Sections 22 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

On section 32—Bank of Canada Act.

Mr. Knowles: What is the reason for the increase to twelve directors of the Bank of Canada? In other words, what is the set-up of that directorate?

Mr. Sinclair: Could this section stand until the minister is in the house?

Section stands.

Section 33 stands.

Sections 34 and 35 agreed to.

On section 36—The Transport Act, 1938.

Mr. Pearkes: Would the minister explain this?

Mr. Martin: Let it stand.

Section stands.

On section 37—The Penitentiary Act, 1939.

Mr. Brooks: Is it the intention of the government to use the penitentiary at Dorchester, New Brunswick, as a penitentiary for Newfoundland, just as it is used for the other three maritime provinces?

Mr. Mutch: The Minister of Justice will be here in a few moments. This might be allowed to stand.

Section stands.

Section 38 agreed to.

On section 39—The Veterans Land Act, 1942.

Mr. Pearkes: Could the minister say whether the same restrictions that apply in Canada with respect to the size of the area required before a veteran can get a loan under the Veterans Land Act will apply in Newfoundland? Will it be necessary for the veteran in Newfoundland to have an area of at least three acres before he can obtain a loan? Would the minister explain, also, whether it will be necessary for the veteran to own property before he can get a loan on any fishing equipment he may desire to obtain?

Mr. Gregg: The answer to the first question is that the provision with respect to the size of the small holding will be the same as in Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: That is three acres?

Mr. Gregg: Yes. In Newfoundland certain benefits have been granted by the government in connection with commercial fishing, but where those have been less than our act provides the veteran will have an opportunity to make application to move it up to the terms of our act.

Mr. Pearkes: Are there any cases where the arrangements in Newfoundland have been more beneficial to the veteran than those in Canada? If so, will the Canadian veteran get the advantage of the Newfoundland arrangements?

Mr. Gregg: We have not had an opportunity to investigate the matter in detail, but my impression is that the provisions under their commercial fishing plan were not in excess of our own.

Section agreed to.

On section 40—The National Physical Fitness Act.

Mr. Church: This does not apply to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which have rejected it. I think this is simply a political organization, and many parts of Ontario and Quebec are strongly opposed to it. In addition I notice that recently some of these people toured the whole dominion and then had a meeting here in Ottawa, at which they accomplished nothing at all. I think this whole thing is very unfortunate.

Section agreed to.

On section 41—The Family Allowances Act, 1944.

Mr. Wright: What will be the position of families who have moved into Newfoundland during the past three years? Will they receive the family allowances immediately or will they be required to have three years' residence in Newfoundland after confederation takes place?

Mr. Martin: It will be the same situation that applies in Canada today.

Mr. Wright: If a family has moved into Newfoundland within the last two years, after confederation is completed will it mean that this family will have to be there three years from the date of confederation?

Mr. Martin: Moving there from where—Canada?

Mr. Wright: No, from Europe.

Mr. Martin: The act will apply just as it does to Canadians at the present time. The three-year residence requirement is still part of the law of the land. Unless they have been there for three years they cannot qualify.

Mr. Knowles: That might be changed soon.

Mr. Martin: Government policy will be disclosed in due course.

Mr. McKay: Could the minister give us any estimate of the number of children who will qualify for family allowances and, if so, what it will probably cost the federal treasury?

Mr. Martin: I am afraid I cannot say offhand how many children will qualify, but I can say that the estimate—and it can be no more than an estimate—of family allowance payments to Newfoundland, which will be paid forthwith at the first opportunity after confederation becomes a fact, is $8,400,000. Those are the estimated payments.

Mr. McKay: Is that for a full year or for one month?

Mr. Martin: That is for the rest of the year. The end of the fiscal year is March 31, and I assume confederation will be effective as of that date.

Section agreed to.

Section 42 agreed to.

On section 43—The National Housing Act, 1944.

Mr. Timmins: I would like the minister to explain this section.

Mr. Howe: As acting minister of reconstruction I can say that the only purpose of this section is to change the terms of the National Housing Act to define a Newfoundland veteran. He is now defined as a resident of Newfoundland at the time of enlistment, who served in the armed forces raised in Newfoundland or in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Timmins: Does the minister know whether any housing plan is being carried on in Newfoundland at the present time? Is there any plan that will be co-ordinated with our National Housing Act? What is being done for the veteran there now in the way of housing?

Mr. Howe: There is a very ambitious housing project at St. John's partially completed. I have had the pleasure of inspecting it within the last two weeks, and the houses are well built. They are not rental housing, however; they are built for sale. A few of the houses are rented, but the purpose of the development is to build houses for sale. I know Mr. Mansur of Central Mortgage and Housing has discussed the future of that project with its sponsors in Newfoundland, but I do not know what has been the outcome of the discussion. I believe arrangements are being made so the National Housing Act may assist in the completion of that project.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to ask the minister a question about the National Housing Act. I believe he is well aware that there is no clause in the National Housing Act that protects the veteran in the other provinces of Canada against financial loss or inferior workmanship in his house. The minister probably knows that I am referring particularly to the case of the veterans out west. I do not want the same thing to happen in Newfoundland.

It has been brought to my attention today by telegram that foreclosure proceedings are being taken against the veterans in Calgary. Possession of their houses is being taken away. It seems to me that, in view of the experience not only in Alberta, but in Nova Scotia, Vancouver and Winnipeg, where veterans have put into these projects every last cent they have, only to be faced with foreclosure proceedings, we should not permit the same thing to happen in Newfoundland.

Last year when we were talking about this question, as the minister will recall, I asked him whether the National Housing Act afforded sufficient protection to forestall the very thing that is taking place. If my memory serves me correctly, he informed me that the act sufficiently protected the interest of these veterans. I now ask him most sincerely whether the veterans will be properly protected, and their houses properly built according to the plans and specifications.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend talks in broad generalities. Will he give me five instances where veterans have been dispossessed of their houses through foreclosure of the mortgage under the National Housing Act?

Mr. Johnston: Yes, I will. Just before I left Calgary, foreclosure proceedings were taken against a man named Hamilton. By airmail letter today, I was informed that the Manufacturers Life was taking similar proceedings against a number of other veterans under the National Housing Act. The understanding is that proceedings will be taken against them one by one until they are all closed out. The minister knows that; he was in Calgary.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend is talking about an integrated project that got into trouble. Veterans who were not wards of the government, but who themselves made contracts with the builder, got into difficulties through the bankruptcy of the contractor. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is lending its good offices to straightening out the trouble. The Central Mortgage company was not a principal in the matter in any way, shape or form and, therefore, any action taken is certainly not taken by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I do not know what relation this has to the bill now before us.

Mr. Johnston: It comes under the National Housing Act, does it not?

The Deputy Chairman: I should point out that a general discussion on the housing act relating to Canada as a whole should not take place under this clause. This pertains to an agreement with Newfoundland.

Mr. Johnston: I am speaking of the National Housing Act as it applies to Canada and, particularly, as it will apply to Newfoundland. The minister went on to point out—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member will please confine his remarks to the clause now before the committee, which deals with the Newfoundland veterans.

Mr. Johnston: This deals with the National Housing Act of 1944, and I am speaking about the National Housing Act. It is true that an integrated housing plan comes under the National Housing Act. There are three parts to the act, and the integrated housing plan comes under the first part. The minister has just pointed out that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation did not have any contractual obligations with the builders. May I point out to him—

The Deputy Chairman: I think my hon. friend will agree with me that the National Housing Act, 1944, is before the committee only in so far as it applies to Newfoundland. The hon. member should confine his remarks to that.

Mr. Johnston: I am speaking about it as it will apply to Newfoundland. By way of illustration, I have cited what has happened in the rest of Canada. I am asking the minister if he will be so good as to see that the veterans in Newfoundland are not treated in the same manner as the veterans in the rest of Canada. With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, I think that is in order.

The Deputy Chairman: I think it would be in order for the hon. member to ask that question, but not to enter into a general discussion of the housing act as it applies across Canada, and the various ramifications of it.

Mr. Johnston: I do not want to be at all stubborn about the matter, but that is not my point. If we are going to allow the National Housing Act to function in Newfoundland as it has functioned in the rest of Canada, I think it is wrong. I am asking that the act be so framed that the veterans in Newfoundland will not be subjected to the unfair treatment our veterans received under the National Housing Act.

Mr. Church: This particular section of the bill applies to the National Housing Act, 1944. It describes who is entitled to the benefits of that act. Subsections 1 and 2 of section 43 read as follows:

(1) in any of the naval or military forces of Newfoundland or, having been recruited in Newfoundland, in any of the naval, military or air forces raised in Newfoundland by or on behalf of the United Kingdom, or

(2) in any other naval, military or air forces of His Majesty and at the time of his enlistment therein was domiciled in Newfoundland, shall be deemed to be a veteran for the purposes of section four B—

I am surprised that more has not been done for the veterans. Some improvement has been made recently, I believe, so far as this act is concerned. What we need in the province of Ontario is a better suburban service. In some large cities there is only a ten-minute interval between trains, and we would be getting some place if we had that in Ontario. Today we are getting nowhere.

Mr. Hazen: This would appear to be an amendment to the National Housing Act. I am not clear about it because it does not state it is an amendment. Is it intended to be an amendment to the act or is it supposed to be a statute by itself?

Mr. Howe: If you read the title of the bill you will find it is, "An act to amend the Statute Law." They are all amendments.

Mr. Hazen: Some of the sections state that certain sections of certain acts are amended and other sections are repealed. This does not state that. Section 42 of this bill states that:

Subsection one of section three of the Fisheries Prices Support Act, 1944, chapter forty-two of the statutes of 1944-45, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

In the wording of section 43 of this bill there is no statement that the National Housing Act is amended "by inserting the following." If you will turn back to the other sections you will find that wording is used, or some similar wording. Is there some particular reason for doing it in this way?

Mr. Howe: This is a new section to the act, as I understand it. It is amended by adding this section. Nothing has been repealed here.

Mr. Hazen: You are amending it.

Mr. Howe: We are just adding another paragraph.

Mr. Hazen: You are amending it by adding another paragraph.

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Hazen: It does not state that. It does not state that this is a new paragraph added to the housing act. Perhaps there is some other explanation.

Mr. Howe: Perhaps my hon. friend is right and it should state that a new section is being added. If he will allow the section to stand, I will examine that aspect of it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The same thing applies to other sections.

Mr. Pearkes: I have another question I should like to ask, and it is similar to the question I asked with reference to section 21. It refers to the man in Newfoundland who left there at the beginning of the war, went over to England and there enlisted in the Royal Navy. Is he or is he not entitled to this benefit? This paragraph reads:

. . . at the time of his enlistment therein was domiciled in Newfoundland.

Actually he had left Newfoundland in order to go over to England. He enlisted in the British army or the Royal Navy while in England. Actually he was not living in Newfoundland then; he was not resident in Newfoundland. This paragraph also contains the expression "recruited in Newfoundland." We should have uniformity in terms. In section 21 the language used is "raised in Newfoundland." We are using a great many different terms which vary slightly in meaning.

Mr. Howe: My recollection is that this description of a veteran in Newfoundland is exactly the same as that given a veteran in Canada. For the purposes of the National Housing Act, 1944, I think the definitions are on all fours. But since the section is to stand, I will call the matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Drew: There is just one thing I should like to emphasize in that connection. When the section is under review, a distinction might be made between recruited in Newfoundland and having served with the navy, army or air force of the United Kingdom, and simply having served with those forces; because naval veterans were practically all reservists in the Royal Navy in the first world war, and perhaps would not be recruited in the ordinary sense of that word or in the strict meaning of the word.

Mr. Howe: I shall be glad to call the matter to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The word "domicile" is used in several sections in this amending act. I wondered if any search had been made to find out whether or not Newfoundland might have a statutory domicile. We have been proceeding on the basis that it is a broad word that we all understood fairly well. But—as is the situation in some other jurisdictions—has examination been made to find out whether or not there is a statutory domicile there?

Mr. Howe: As I understand, after confederation "domicile" will mean domicile by Canadian law. My hon. friend is wondering if there may be a broader definition of domicile in Newfoundland?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Yes, or a narrower one.

Mr. Howe: I shall be glad to refer the matter to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I think the matter might be looked into.

Section stands.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the committee be kind enough to turn to section 33, Canada Shipping Act, 1934. The minister is here now.

On section 33—Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain that section?

Mr. Chevrier: That section can be divided into three parts. First, the masters and mates holding certificates of that type in Newfoundland will be entitled to a Canadian certificate of the same kind. Then, as an alternative to that, certificates of competency now held by masters and mates in Newfoundland may be exchanged for our own, or a statement on the face of the certificate approved of by the officers of the Department of Transport will be indicative of competency in those classes. Finally, there will be some of course who will not have any certificate, particularly those who operate schooners of more than ten tons gross engaged in the coasting trade. They will be required to pass a sight test and the prescribed oral test that every other individual in Canada must pass at the moment. I am referring now to section 118B of section 33. That is almost in the same language as the present act. The ten tons gross mentioned in the section is the minimum size of a vessel in which experience has to be obtained to qualify. This was done at the request of the people of Newfoundland who wanted to be assured that those who operate coasting craft without masters' or mates' certificates should, if they so desired, be able to obtain certificates of service on passing the prescribed examination.

Mr. Hazen: May I ask if section 305 is a new one? That levies a duty of two cents a ton.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a national revenue matter. That part of the Canada Shipping Act comes under the Department of National Revenue. I am unable to answer that question.

Mr. Hazen: May the section stand until we get an answer?

Mr. Young: Must sailors now sailing under Newfoundland regulations carry a discharge book?

Mr. Chevrier: At the present time they must.

Mr. Young: They must?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; so I am informed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Hazen: I would ask that the portion of section 33 at the foot of the page, section 305, stand until we get an explanation.

Mr. Chevrier: All that is being done there is the addition of the word "Newfoundland."

Mr. Hazen: It is not a new duty?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Green: In the future will the qualifications be the same as in the past for the men on Newfoundland vessels, or will there now be a stricter examination?

Mr. Chevrier: Those who do not have certificates as masters or mates will be required to pass prescribed examinations under the regulations as they exist in the department.

Mr. Green: Will that make much of a difference in Newfoundland?

Mr. Chevrier: No. I am told that it will not.

Section agreed to.

Mr. Sinclair: I would ask the committee to revert to section 32, in order to permit me to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

On section 32—Bank of Canada Act.

Mr. Sinclair: The change from eleven to twelve was merely to accommodate one Newfoundland director. At the present time there are two from Ontario, two from Quebec and one from each of the other provinces of Canada. This amendment raises the number to twelve for the inclusion of a Newfoundland director.

Section agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Section 36 was allowed to stand. I would ask the committee to turn to that section.

On section 36—The Transport Act, 1938.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I should just say a word with regard to this section. Strictly speaking, it would not have been necessary to include this section in the act at all, because part II of the Transport Act says that its operation will not come into effect until it is proclaimed by the governor in council; and really until it is proclaimed it does not affect anyone. However, in order to reassure the people of Newfoundland, it was thought that it would be better to include this particular section which takes out of the operation of part II of the Transport Act transportation by water.

Mr. Brooks: That is the point. I was wondering why it was included.

Mr. Garson: It should not be included at all, but the delegates at the conference felt that for greater certainty they would prefer to have it there and we put it there.

Section agreed to.

Mr. Drew: While the section has passed, there is a point which I should like to place before the minister in connection with section 33. At the bottom of page 13 of the draft bill it will be found that No. 305 is given to a section which relates to levies on ships entering certain ports, and the words "or Newfoundland" are added. Unless this is a new section there is something missing in the section before us. Unless this is a new section a provision should be added that some other section is stricken out.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps the hon. gentleman was busy on something else a moment ago when I said that the duty and the levy part of the shipping act is a matter for national revenue and not for transport; therefore I am not familiar with the details. At first glance my reply to the hon. member for Royal was that the only change was the addition of the words "or Newfoundland". I am not in a position to give any further details on it because it does not come under my jurisdiction.

Mr. Drew: The importance of the point I am making is that, unless this is a new section, there is obviously something lacking from the whole of section 33. If 305 is not a new section of the act, then obviously there should be a provision that some section of the earlier act be stricken out and this be substituted. On the other hand, if it is a new section it is not in conformity with what the minister has explained. It is one or the other. I think it should stand.

Mr. Knowles: I do not think it is necessary to have the section stand. There has been a mistake in the printing. If the minister and others will follow me they will find that the paragraph ahead of 305 is a short paragraph which begins with the figure 2 in parentheses. That is the paragraph which explains what is to be done with 305. In other words, the line down the left-hand side of the page should be cut off just above the paragraph numbered 2 in parentheses.

Mr. Chevrier: Does that answer my hon. friend?

Mr. Drew: I think that is the explanation. I think the placing of the line was misleading.

Mr. Chevrier: If there is any change it will be approved of.

Mr. Drew: If there is any change it should be reopened.

Mr. Knowles: I saw that not because I am a lawyer but because I am a printer.

Section agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the committee turn to section 21.

On section 21—Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Mr. Pearkes: Is the minister going to give us an explanation of this section?

Mr. Garson: The point was raised by members of the opposition that the definition of service for Royal Canadian Mounted Police recruits as set out in section 21 would not include a man who had served in the forces which were not raised in Newfoundland. These are the facts. Under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, which was passed by this house in May 1948, there is a part V which relates to all of the new members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police taken on staff. This part V has not yet been proclaimed but it will be in due course. In part V, section 91, subsection 1, paragraph (j), subparagraph (ii) will be found these words:

> Time served on active service in the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty raised in Canada during time of war.

What is being done for the Newfoundland recruits of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is to apply to them the identical language which is applicable to the Canadian recruits. My hon. friend may still argue perhaps that, because time is not recognized in the case of those who enlisted elsewhere and served in the forces and then later became recruits in the mounted police in Canada, that is a very poor reason for not recognizing it in the case of Newfoundland. I have checked with the officials of the mounted police. They tell me they are satisfied that this wording will cover the cases which they expect to encounter; but they say that they have no desire to exclude anyone who has served, and if both of these sections—that is the one which is already in the act relating to Canadian recruits, passed in May, 1948, and this one which is now before us—can be permitted to stand as they are for a year, we can see whether they will exclude anyone.

My information is that in both world war I and world war II the British had recruiting depots for both naval and military personnel, and the great likelihood is that the bulk of those who served in the British forces would be coming into the forces through these depots. In any event, we have carried out exactly the arrangement which was made, which was to extend to the Newfoundland recruits the same status which the Canadians have.

Mr. Pearkes: A Newfoundlander who left Newfoundland and served in the Royal Navy and came back would receive the benefits of this section?

Mr. Garson: No. To come under either the Canadian section or the Newfoundland section, he would have to serve in naval, military or air forces of His Majesty raised in Canada or raised in Newfoundland. My information is that the great bulk of all Canadians and all Newfoundlanders who served in His Majesty's forces were raised in their respective countries.

Mr. Pearkes: This is a very important point, Mr. Chairman, because there were a great many men who left Newfoundland and who served in the Royal Navy during both the first and the second world wars. There were also a large number of men who left Newfoundland and served in British units of the army in both world war I and world war II. I think the history of the service of Newfoundlanders bears me out in that. I do not want to see these men who were Newfoundland born and bred, who went overseas and served with the Royal Navy or with the British army and then returned to their homes in Newfoundland, excluded from the benefits of this section. What the minister has just said indicates that they would be excluded unless they served in forces raised in Newfoundland or in Canada. I imagine that must mean the Royal Canadian Navy or the Canadian Army, or that they had joined through some depot in Newfoundland which transferred them from Newfoundland to units of the British navy or the British army. I submit that there were a great many who left Newfoundland under their own arrangements. They proceeded to the United Kingdom and there joined up immediately after they reached the United Kingdom. I want to make quite certain that that type of man will receive the benefits herein outlined. I gather the minister said that they would not.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: I do not think that my hon. friend's statement regarding those service personnel who were raised in Newfoundland or in Canada was exhaustive. I do not think they would necessarily be in depots, as he has suggested. It is to be noted that this wording is not to be applied in relation to the granting of any pensions for their service. It is to be applied to new recruits, new volunteers in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police either in Newfoundland or in Canada who say, upon enlistment in that service, "I have some service in the navy"—or the air force or the army, as the case may be—"and these are the circumstances of my service. I want to get credit for this service towards my mounted police pension".

The officials of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police tell me they anticipate no difficulty at all in taking care of the problem in connection with the recruits who come to them. If any difficulty does develop, I do not believe there would be any disposition on the part of the government for one moment to stand on the retention of those words. My only suggestion is that we might let them stand the same for Newfoundland as they are for Canada for the period of a year; then if we found any difficulty presenting itself we could change the wording—and I am sure my hon. friend would agree it should be changed equally for both of them.

Mr. Pearkes: Is this not the time to do it?

Mr. Garson: We have no amendment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act before us at the present time. To be frank, I do not mind stating that I got in touch with the draftsman during the dinner recess, and asked him if he would have any objection to striking out the words "raised in Canada" or "raised in Newfoundland" as the case might be. He said, as all draftsmen do, "Well, I should like to look at all the sections of the act to make sure that we would not be getting into any trouble by doing so."

As to the merits or substance of the case, however, I must say that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have no desire—why should they?—to raise these matters, because they are looking for good men to serve with them, and they are prepared to recognize service in His Majesty's forces.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): But they cannot do it unless the statute says so.

Mr. Garson: They expect no difficulty at all; and I think they are fairly close to the subject. As a matter of fact the official to whom I was speaking had served with Newfoundlanders in the navy, and he told me he was under the impression that the great bulk of them had been raised in Newfoundland.

He served with them, and he said he did not think there was any objection to this wording. However, if anything develops, we shall have no objection in the world to changing it. But I do not think anything will develop.

Mr. Pearkes: The minister says he has no objection. That being so the simplest way would be to amend this subsection by deleting the words "raised in Canada or Newfoundland" so that the subsection would read:

Time served on active service in the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty during time of war.

I so move.

Mr. Claxton: That cannot be moved.

Mr. Abbott: The amendment is out of order, because it affects the revenue. I suggest the amendment should not be offered in this way, and that we should not extend to veterans or those who have served in Newfoundland something which is not extended to those in Canada who served in His Majesty's forces.

The law as it stands now provides that in order to obtain these benefits under the section a man must have served in His Majesty's forces raised in Canada, and the proposed amendment suggests that it be extended by adding the words "in Newfoundland". I do not think it is competent for a private member to suggest any further extension, because quite obviously it would involve an added charge on the revenues of Canada. Surely that is perfectly clear.

Section agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: We now turn to section 37 dealing with the Penitentiary Act.

On section 37—The Penitentiary Act, 1939.

Mr. Brooks: I asked the minister if the penitentiary at Dorchester, New Brunswick, would be used as a penitentiary for Newfoundland, as it is being used for the other three maritime provinces.

Mr. Garson: This section carries into effect paragraph XVI of the memorandum, which states:

For the time being it is understood that Newfoundland will continue to operate its own penitentiary and prisoners sentenced by the courts of Newfoundland to terms of imprisonment of two years or more may be incarcerated therein subject to the rules and regulations laid down for the management and control of the institution by the provincial authorities. Maintenance of such prisoners will be paid by the Canadian government on a per diem basis at a rate to be mutually agreed upon between the Canadian government and the provincial government.

Mr. Brooks: Will a separate penitentiary be maintained in Newfoundland, or will the one at Dorchester, New Brunswick, be used for that province?

Mr. Garson: The memorandum speaks for itself. It says that for the time being it is understood that Newfoundland will continue to operate its own penitentiary. Hon. members will understand that in bringing the administrative machinery of two countries together, as we are doing here, some things can be put into effect almost immediately, while it takes some time to merge others.

The law officers have gone through no less than five hundred federal statutes to see which of those required the type of consequential amendments set out in this bill. Of that five hundred there are perhaps about two hundred which we hope may be proclaimed into effect by March 31.

There are a number of others however which will have to wait for some time. For example, there is the matter of weights and measures, where we have to have inspectors for checking purposes before we can proclaim our weights and measures act as taking effect in Newfoundland. Under this heading of penitentiaries the position is, as I have said, this is the best information I can give because, as the hon. member will see, this memorandum is a statement of those points of agreement between the two countries not sufficiently of a constitutional nature to form part of the terms of union, but upon which it was necessary to have an agreement of a less formal character. The position is that, for the time being, until Canada and Newfoundland both see how they are going to proceed, Newfoundland will continue to operate its own penitentiary.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I should like to make a suggestion which I think may be of some assistance in drafting. About the middle of section 37 we find these words:

—or for a term of years, not less than two, shall be sentenced to imprisonment in the place operated by the province of Newfoundland at St. John's for the confinement of prisoners.

My first suggestion is that it should contain the words "at the city of St. John's", because I am sure there must be parishes named St. John's in Newfoundland, as there are in other parts of Canada. You must do better than that. You must imagine the position of a judge about to sentence a prisoner. The only thing he can do under this section is to sentence a man to so many years in the place operated by the province of Newfoundland at St. John's. That is a rather unfortunate way to handle it. I have never been there but I imagine there are a number of places of confinement at St. John's. I am quite sure that at the city police station—I think St. John's is a city—they would have places of confinement, although temporary it is true. I assume that what is meant here is some sort of jail which is maintained at St. John's, Newfoundland.

The two points I am raising are going to be helpful to the minister so he will know exactly what is being done when people are sent to a jail in Newfoundland. Perhaps I could raise the second point and the minister can take cognizance of both points, or either. I read again:

—at St. John's for the confinement of prisoners, and shall be subject to the statutes, rules, regulations and other laws pertaining to the management and control of that place of confinement.

Surely that is surplusage. I do not see why it is needed at all because, if it is a penitentiary under the Penitentiary Act, then obviously it is subject to all the rules presently in force in the Dominion of Canada and applying to penitentiaries. For instance, we do not have a set of rules or a statute dealing with Dorchester apart from Stony Mountain or Kingston or St. Vincent de Paul. I ask the minister to reconsider the drafting of this section. I would suggest that he eliminate the latter part which I think is surplusage and simply identify the place of confinement so that the judge might say, "I sentence you to serve so many years in the prison on State street," or wherever it may be in the city of St. John's.

Mr. Garson: I want to thank the hon. member for Calgary West for giving us another example of his friendliness in the suggestions he has made in connection with this bill. They have been most helpful. The gentleman who drafted this bill is an extremely skilful draftsman and I am inclined to think that he cast it in its present form—

Mr. Matthews (Kootenay East): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, may I ask the minister to speak a little more loudly. We cannot hear him and we are interested in what he has to say.

The Chairman: I think if there was less talking in the chamber we would be able to hear the minister.

Mr. Garson: I was thanking the hon. member for Calgary West for the useful suggestions he has made in connection with this bill, and I was going on to say that the gentleman who drafted this bill is a most skilful draftsman and I am rather inclined to think that he cast this particular section in the form in which you find it because of the necessity of meshing in with some of the Newfoundland provisions. It will be noted that the section starts out with the words:

Notwithstanding anything in the Penitentiary Act, 1939,—

It would appear that it was intended to eliminate this, for the time being at any rate, from the operations of that act. The member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) has made very worth-while suggestions, and perhaps while another section is being taken up on which some of my colleagues can speak I can get in touch with the draftsman and lay these proposals before him to see how he views the suggestions of my hon. friend. Out of fairness to him I would not like to disturb his handiwork without giving him an opportunity to express his opinion.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am merely trying to find clarity in the bill because we all know that in the administration of justice you must dot your "i's" and cross your "t's" rather carefully. When a criminal is to be sentenced we do not want a writ of habeas corpus or certiorari to let him out on purely technical grounds. I mentioned this when we were dealing with this matter. There is no mention in this amending statute of the Criminal Code. There is reference to the Fugitive Offenders Act; there is reference to the Penitentiary Act; there is reference to the Judges Act; but there is no mention of the Criminal Code.

Following the question that I then asked him, I wonder if he has made any inquiry about this one thing. Under our Criminal Code there are provisions with respect to speedy trial which may be held on election before a county court judge, as they are called here, or a district court judge, as in the western provinces. I find no provision under the judges section for the appointment of officers with the jurisdiction I am discussing. I do not want an attempt made to administer criminal law in the province of Newfoundland without there being the proper machinery for its administration.

No doubt men will elect to have speedy trials and if there is no means or method of granting them speedy trials we will be up against a stone wall. I realize that no doubt the superior court judges will have all the powers of a district court judge, but they in turn may be confined to various matters in the province. I want the minister to be sure that we are not trying to do something without having the necessary machinery with which to do it.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend raised this point or a similar point on Wednesday at about six o'clock. I had the floor and was in the midst of giving an explanation when at six o'clock I had to stop. This is a very important point and I think it would be wise for me to review briefly the remarks that I made on that occasion, and then complete them as I was then unable to do. My hon. friend said this:

When the minister introduced the resolution I asked him whether we were going to have references made, and whether a study had been made of all the statutes.

That was the first part of a very pertinent observation by my hon. friend in the early part of the discussions. He wanted to know whether there was going to be just some general clause authorizing appropriate amendments to be made, or whether there would be separate sections in this present omnibus bill specifically amending each section in each act which required amendment. I told him then, and this is a most important point, that we were following the proper method of bringing down specific amendments to the sections of the various statutes in order to achieve that clarity which he very properly said should be a desideratum. Then he said:

His answer was that that had been done. I wonder if the minister is sure about that. I accepted his word completely, of course.

But he still had doubts.

For example, I am thinking of the jurisdiction given to the different courts.

In reply I said:

If the hon. member will turn to page 9 of the terms of union he will see this:

and I referred him to the item near the bottom of the page, "Continuation of laws", pointing out that it was a term of the union that all the laws in force in Newfoundland should continue therein as if the union had not been made, subject nevertheless to being repealed, abolished or altered by the parliament of Canada or by the legislature of the province of Newfoundland, according to the authority of the parliament or the legislature as the case may be. That is to say, all the Newfoundland laws would continue; but we must remember that before Newfoundland comes into confederation the laws of Newfoundland cover all subjects, including many which now will come within federal jurisdiction; these would be continued, unless we now repeal or amend or change those laws of Newfoundland which come within federal jurisdiction. Amongst those would be the criminal law, as to which my hon. friend is deeply concerned. In the terms of union, turning over to page 10, there is a provision that by an act of the parliament of Canada or by proclamation the laws of Canada can be brought into force on a date or dates to be fixed by this act or proclamation. That is what we propose to do with the Criminal Code and all these other federal statutes. As I have said, no less than five hundred federal statutes had to be examined, and there will be upward of two hundred or more in respect of which we will issue a proclamation. Until that proclamation is issued those laws will not be in effect in Newfoundland at all.

The purpose of the present bill is to go through these various federal statutes which we propose to bring into force by proclamation, tidy them up, and put them in shape to be applied to Newfoundland by inserting in the proper sections the appropriate references to Newfoundland, so that before we proclaim them they will be in proper shape to be made applicable to that province, and to all parts of a federal state which include Newfoundland.

This omnibus bill will cover all the statutes that require consequential amendment with three notable exceptions, one of which I had mentioned just before six o'clock the other evening and two of which I shall mention now. The one I mentioned was the Income Tax Act. We thought it was much preferable that a statute which imposes taxes upon the people should have the amendments made to the act itself rather than as sections of some omnibus bill, to the end that people who may be concerned about how much they have to pay in taxes will always have the assurance that if they go to the Income Tax Act and its amendments all the law relating to that subject will be there. Another is the amendments to the Criminal Code which are now in course of preparation and which will be laid before the house shortly, which bill will include some consequential sections relating to Newfoundland. The third one is the Bankruptcy Act, and the amendments there will be introduced in a complete revision of that act which will be brought in this session, probably in the Senate in the first instance.

As far as the court set-up is concerned, I shall deal with it in general terms. The Supreme Court of Newfoundland is the high court there, and is much the same as the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island. It is divided into trial and appellate divisions, but there is just the one supreme court. There are no county courts in St. John's; the difficulty in adapting the federal statutes which we now propose to make applicable to Newfoundland, in so far as they call for the exercise of discretion by a county court judge, has been successfully overcome, we think, by conferring county court jurisdiction under such statutes upon the judges of the supreme court in Newfoundland. Various sections scattered through this omnibus bill containing the words, "the judge shall be a judge of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland" are there for that purpose. If you took the trouble to compare such a section with its counterpart applicable to the province of Ontario, you would find in some cases that in Ontario it would be the county court, in Saskatchewan the district court, to which the sections applicable to Ontario and Saskatchewan would refer.

Then in Newfoundland they have a number of stipendiary magistrates who exercise in that province the jurisdiction which in other provinces is exercised by police magistrates, magistrates and justices of the peace.

The other night my hon. friend made a reference to a set of figures at the back of this omnibus bill, $333.33, which certainly on their face looked mysterious, as payment to three district judges of the admiralty district of Newfoundland; and he wanted to know whether these men would exercise any criminal jurisdiction. As my hon. friend knows, the admiralty court is a branch of our own federal exchequer court, and our original proposal in relation to the admiralty court of Newfoundland was that one of the judges of the supreme court there would exercise admiralty jurisdiction as an appointee of the admiralty division of our exchequer court for a salary of $1,000 a year as a supplementary to his salary as a supreme court judge.

But the chief justice of the supreme court in Newfoundland said that all three judges of that court were well versed in admiralty, were trained in hearing cases in admiralty, and they would prefer that the admiralty work of that division of the exchequer court should be divided among three rather than centered in one. Inasmuch as it was proposed to give the one judge $1,000, we are dividing this sum into three so each judge will be paid $333.33 per year.

My hon. friend raised one other point in connection with the Official Secrets Act, the Juvenile Delinquents Act and other acts of that character.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Secret commissions.

Mr. Garson: Quite so; all those acts which a lawyer would recognize as being usually embraced along with the Criminal Code in one book, whether annotated or not. I checked up on that in view of my hon. friend's observation the other night. I had discussed this in a general way before but not with specific reference to these particular pieces of legislation. I made a double check on these pieces of legislation and I was assured by Mr. Driedger, the excellent draftsman to whom I referred, that all of these statutes are amongst the five hundred statutes he examined to ascertain whether consequential amendments were required and he assured me they do not require any consequential amendments. Later on, either by statute or by proclamation, those statutes will be brought into effect in Newfoundland.

In the meantime, care is being taken to avoid errors. This gentleman examines the statutes, forms his own opinion as to those which are to be made applicable, and then he submits the results of his research to the legal authorities of Newfoundland in order that they may check those results and form any counter opinion. In that way we are attempting to make sure we bring the proper statutes into effect. We want to make sure we repeal all the Newfoundland counterparts of federal statutes in order that, on the one hand, there will be no overlapping, nor on the other any part of the field not properly covered.

I think that is all that requires comment, except perhaps to make a reference to the fact that there are a certain number of statutes not mentioned, such as the Weights and Measures Act. This penitentiary provision appears to be a temporary one and, for that reason, it contains the clause notwithstanding the provisions of the Penitentiary Act, Newfoundland shall continue to run its own place of confinement. It may be described in those terms in some statute, so we are merely carrying into effect the clause in this memorandum which says that for the time being Newfoundland will continue to operate the existing penitentiary. In order to carry this provision into effect, we have this section to which my hon. friend has taken exception. I will check up on it anyway.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): We must keep in mind that the minute union occurs Newfoundland has lost a great deal of its jurisdiction in many matters, one of which is the criminal law. It goes in the twinkling of an eye; it does not last a second after union has taken place. What I have in mind is that either the gentleman the minister mentioned or someone else should be able to assure us that at that second there is no hiatus between the incidence of the criminal law and the administration of it.

The minister mentioned that during this session there would be some amendments to the Criminal Code, some of which might have specific reference to Newfoundland. My hope is that we in this parliament will have our statutes referring to Newfoundland in such shape that, the minute union takes place, we will have the gown of our criminal law ready to drop into place.

Mr. Matthews (Kootenay East): The hon. member for Calgary West has been dealing with this section from the legal point of view, but there is in my mind another question upon which I should like some information. Is this particular prison in St. John's, Newfoundland, a federal penitentiary or a provincial jail?

Mr. Garson: I was not a member of the group carrying on these negotiations, but I would refer the hon. member to the memorandum—I am sure he has a copy of it—entitled "Statements on Questions Raised by the Newfoundland Delegation". If the hon. member will turn to page 10, at the top of the page, item xvi, penitentiaries, he will see:

> For the time being it is understood that Newfoundland will continue to operate its own penitentiary—

From that statement I gather that the delegates on both sides were agreed there was a penitentiary and that was the penitentiary to which they were referring.

May I say that the application of Canadian federal law to Newfoundland will be by this proclamation to which I referred. I have not directed my mind specifically to this particular problem, but I feel quite safe in saying that the laws of Newfoundland will remain as they are until this proclamation we issue makes our federal statutes applicable. The very formidable task which our law officers, in collaboration with the law officers of Newfoundland, have in examining all the relevant statutes which might have some application to Newfoundland to make sure we proclaim no federal laws that are inappropriate or not within federal jurisdiction and, secondly, that we do not overlap any provincial laws but make certain that the provincial counterparts are repealed, will take some time to accomplish. We must also take pains to see that there is no part of the field which is not covered. We must also avoid this hiatus mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary West. I am not very much concerned about the hiatus because, as I conceive it, the law of Newfoundland will remain the law of Newfoundland until we proclaim our law. If our proclamation is properly drawn, no difficulty will be experienced.

The hon. member for Calgary West says he wants us to take great care. I do not think we can take any greater care than we have already taken. We have put the very best man we have on this task. He has devoted a long time to this study and has been in the closest collaboration with the law officers of Newfoundland. We have not achieved perfection, because it is not human to be perfect; but, subject to human frailties, we have done about as good a job as it is possible for human beings to do.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Hazen: Just a minute. I thought the minister intended to make some inquiry of the gentleman who drafted the section.

Mr. Garson: I will make inquiries.

Mr. Hazen: I think the section should stand, having regard to the point raised.

Mr. Garson: Yes. We had better let it stand.

Section stands.

On section 20—Pension Act.

The Chairman: Shall this clause carry?

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Garson: I think a word of explanation is due on this section. On checking with the same draftsman, Mr. Driedger, and with the chairman of the Canadian pension commission, Mr. Melville, we find that the statement I made to the house before the dinner recess is quite correct, and that it bears out the statement made by my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs. If my hon. friends will look at Bill No. 12, page 8, paragraph (3) they will find it reads as follows:

> A British subject resident and domiciled in Newfoundland at the time of enlistment who served in the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty or in any of the naval, military or air forces of any of the countries allied with His Majesty during world war II shall be deemed to be a member of the forces for the purposes of section eleven of the Pension Act, if the disability in respect of which the application for pension is made is not pensionable by virtue of subsection one or two of this section.

There is a similar reference in subsection 2 of section 11 of the Pension Act. I am informed both by the draftsman and by the chairman of the pension commission that the entitlement under section 11 of the Pension Act carries with it not only the general rights of pension but all of the specific or ancillary pension rights to which my hon. friends, notably the hon. member for Vancouver South, referred before the dinner recess. So that when my colleague said that the intention of this government had been to extend to the Newfoundland veterans the full privileges to which the Canadian veteran is entitled, that statement is exactly correct. It is also true that that provision was made in the terms of union. As hon. members will recall, I told the house that the law officers of the crown, in drafting this Bill No. 12, had regarded—and quite properly, in my opinion—as their instructions the terms of union, and had produced the first draft of it, which was submitted to the pension commission. The pension commission thought there should be some change in wording, which was accordingly made. What we have before us here is the product of the consultation of those two authorities, and both of them assure us that it gives complete coverage in accordance with the intentions of my colleague, in accordance with the terms of union, and in accordance, I am sure, with the desires of the members of the committee.

Mr. Green: I think there is one weakness in the position taken by the Minister of Justice, and it is this. He says the draftsman in the Department of Justice and the chairman of the pension commission both say that this amendment is all right, and therefore it is all right. In fact, that is his argument. In my opinion, that is not the position that should be taken by a minister of the crown. A minister of the crown must himself stand behind those amendments, as must the house.

Mr. Garson: Oh, I do.

Mr. Green: Just a minute.

Mr. Garson: I stand behind them one hundred per cent.

Mr. Green: I would ask the minister to wait until I finish. With regard to this amendment to the Pension Act and with regard to the amendments referred to by the hon. member for Calgary West, the minister has taken the attitude that the draftsman is a fine draftsman; therefore everything is all right and we must not question his work. Time and again in the special parliamentary committee on veterans affairs we have seen amendments to the Pension Act brought in which have been passed by the counsel of the department, by the chairman of the pension commission, and by everyone in the department who has considered them. Yet we have found them to be full of holes. I am sure that this is just another such case.

Section 11 of the Pension Act refers to disabilities attributable to or incurred on service. As I pointed out today, section 21—which is the meritorious service pension section—does not deal with that kind of pension at all. It deals with a pension which is based on meritorious service. The same argument applies to pensions to a dependent parent and to a dependent brother or sister. I cannot see why there should not be an amendment making it absolutely clear that these pensions which are not based on disability arising through service are to be available for the veterans of Newfoundland. It is just slipshod drafting, and now the government will not even take the trouble to set it right.

Mr. Claxton: It is not slipshod drafting at all.

Mr. Green: The government are asking us to take their assurance that everything will be lovely, that the pension commission will interpret this amendment in the way it should be interpreted, and that nobody need worry. That is not good enough for the veterans of Newfoundland any more than it would be good enough for the veterans of Canada. I am sure that if there were a special committee on veterans affairs it would never be satisfied with the amendment that is now brought down. Once again I urge the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Veterans Affairs to put in a clear-cut amendment so that the veteran in St. John's who reads the act will know exactly what he is entitled to, and will not need to be referred back to some draftsman in the department.

Mr. Garson: I think that my hon. friend, quite unintentionally, has been most unfair to the draftsman. There is nothing slipshod about any of this work. I do not know about these other cases of which my hon. friend speaks. They may not have been done by this gentleman. But I would put him up against any draftsman in the whole of Canada.

Mr. Green: Surely this house is not just dependent on the draftsman.

Mr. Garson: Just a minute; I would ask my hon. friend to be patient until I finish. We are not simply standing behind the draftsman or simply invoking his skill or talents as a draftsman; that is not the only reason for our stand. But my hon. friend is the one who is attacking this section. We say it is quite adequate, and we stand here as responsible ministers and quote the responsible head of the pension commission and the draftsman, who also say that it is quite adequate. They say that they have been acting under it for some considerable time and have been so interpreting it.

Mr. Green: They have not yet acted under it at all.

Mr. Garson: No, not under this, but treating entitlement under section 11 as carrying with it these other benefits under these other sections of the act. If my hon. friend says that is not correct, in the face of the responsible statements that are being made to that effect, I think he owes it to the committee to get up and give some demonstration of the accuracy of his statement. We are committing ourselves on Hansard if you like, and making a statement of government policy, which is also contained in the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada, as to exactly what we propose to do. I do not see how we can be any more specific.

It may be that my hon. friend detected some note of caution in my remarks when I said this afternoon that it was necessarily the duty of the law officers, when they were drafting a bill to carry into effect the terms of union between the two countries, to go to these terms of union to find the basis of the bill that they were drawing. That is all I said. I did not indicate any more than our contention that the bill which the committee has before it carries into practical and effective application the terms of union. My colleague then rose and told the committee exactly what the arrangements and understanding were. The terms of union are before the committee. Hon. members can read the sections which relate to veterans' pensions. In the face of all that, I do not think it is reasonable for my hon. friend to say or to intimate that this is a piece of slipshod drafting. If you submit it to any group of competent lawyers who are skilled in draftsmanship I am sure they will tell you that it is nothing but a very good piece of draftsmanship.

Mr. Green: I refer the minister to section 21 of the Pension Act. He is apparently taking the position that the section under which all pensions are granted is section 11, that it is the foundation for all other pensions. I shall read section 21, paragraph 1:

> The commission may, on special application in that behalf, grant a compassionate pension, allowance or supplementary award in any case which it considers to be specially meritorious, but in which the commission has decided that the applicant is otherwise unqualified to receive such an award or supplementary award under this act.

That expressly takes out of consideration any award under section 11.

Mr. Garson: Why does it?

Mr. Green: Because it says "otherwise unqualified". Section 21 is applicable to a man who cannot qualify under section 11. I do urge that at least the minister include in this amendment "for the purposes of sections 11 and 21".

Mr. Garson: We do not want to appear in any way stubborn in this matter, but we have checked with the law officers in the first place a bill which we regard as satisfactory and adequate to achieve the purpose in hand. My hon. friend, in the diligent exercise of his duties, for which I wish to compliment him—it is what he should do—raises this question. We go back on the strength of the representations which he has made. We check with the draftsmen who drew the bill. We get the chairman of the pension board and check with him. We check with the minister and with the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Green: He does not know much about it.

Mr. Garson: We confer and we come back and we say to you on our responsibility as ministers that the objections you raise are taken care of. In the face of all that, we have the right to be taken as acting with some degree of good faith and responsibility.

Mr. Bentley: I am not going to take the same position as a lawyer would because I am not a lawyer. I am just a simple sort of citizen and I like simple language. I am willing to take the minister's word that the draftsmen and the chairman of the pension commission meant what they said when they said that this section covers all the objections which were raised before the recess by myself and by other hon. members. If that is so, will the minister tell me why simple wording would not have covered it? Veterans either in Newfoundland or in Canada are not all lawyers, but we do like to understand as clearly as we can the legislation which affects us. If this section is supposed to cover all the objections that were raised, why could it not have been worded something like this and be done with:

> A citizen of Newfoundland who is a veteran of the armed services will be taken to be a veteran as defined in all Canadian pension legislation and entitled to all the benefits therein contained.

If that were done I would have no doubt about what was meant. Why should not a lawyer be in the same position as myself and also have no doubt about simple language?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend has asked me one of the most embarrassing and difficult questions that a layman has ever asked a lawyer, and to give a proper reply would take a much longer time than is available at the moment, and it would try the patience of hon. members.

Mr. Knowles: Especially a lawyer.

Mr. Garson: That is right. My hon. friend must remember—and I am sure he knows this—that pension legislation is exceedingly complex. That is the point he has just made. So far as the present problem is concerned, our task is to fit into this complex statute a new group of pensioners whom we are bringing into Canada from another country. I am not going to take up the time of the committee to attempt to answer my hon. friend's question. There is a good answer to it but it would take a much longer time than the committee would care to listen.

Mr. Bentley: I would listen for a long time to get it.

Mr. Garson: These men who spend their lifetime drafting statutes are not the fools that people take them to be; and if there were simpler ways of doing these things I am sure that they would use them. Remember this, they have to make sure not only that people understand the law but also that no one who wishes to misunderstand it can misunderstand it. That is one of the things that have to be taken into consideration. It is a much more difficult task than a layman thinks it is. If it were as simple as my hon. friend's suggestion, I think I would offer him a job as a draftsman right now.

Mr. Lennard: If the statutes were as simple as the hon. member for Swift Current would wish them to be, the lawyers in this country would have nothing to do. That is one very good reason why the statutes are so difficult to understand.

Mr. Garson: That is very ungenerous.

Mr. Lennard: I should like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if additional commissioners will be appointed to administer the act in Newfoundland. Will they necessarily be Newfoundlanders and will they be veterans of either of the two great wars?

Mr. Gregg: The additional load brought about by applicants for pensions in Newfoundland will be carefully considered, and if it is necessary to increase the number of the present pension commissioners it will be done. In doing that I can assure my hon. friend that the need for a close understanding of veterans problems in Newfoundland will be kept in mind.

Mr. Lennard: The minister means, then, that Newfoundland will have its proportion of any additional commissioners who are appointed.

Mr. Gregg: In increasing the number of present commissioners, that will be carefully considered.

Mr. Ferguson: It is refreshing to see the Minister of Justice going over the laws that are to become effective in Canada. That is entirely different from the war years, when orders in council and new laws were passed without any discussion. Fortunately, through the recent efforts of a very bright lawyer, Mr. John Hamilton of Toronto, the court of appeal of Ontario showed quite clearly that some of the laws made by order in council without discussion should be repealed at the present time. It is found that the fines and penalties imposed are not holding up. Certainly these laws should be discussed thoroughly before they are made effective in the new province.

Mr. Case: Is it the general practice of the Department of Veterans Affairs to employ veterans?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 43 and 44 agreed to.

On section 45—The War Service Grants Act, 1944, and The Veterans Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. Brooks: We note from the terms of union that sections 6, 7 and 8 of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act will be extended to Newfoundland veterans of the second world war. In looking at section 6 of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act we find reference to allowances while awaiting returns from business, allowances where there are rehabilitation grants, and the time within which application may be made. This last subsection is as follows:

> (3) Except as hereinafter otherwise provided, no allowance may be paid under this section unless application therefor is made by the veteran within twelve months after the date of termination of the war or the date of his discharge, whichever is the later date.

I do not see how, in view of this time limitation, that subsection can be made to apply to Newfoundland. We know the war has now been ended for some three years. These persons could not possibly make application for benefits under that subsection within the time limit specified, unless some amendment were made to the act—at least, that is the way it strikes me.

Then section 7 refers to allowances during vocational or technical training, and the time limit within which the application is to be made is, to use the words in subsection (2):

> No allowance may be paid under this section unless application therefor is made by the veteran within twelve months after the date of termination of the war or the date of his discharge, whichever is the later date.

I do not see how that section can apply to a Newfoundland veteran. Frankly I do not see the benefit of these sections, or why they are included in the bill.

Then, section 8, which deals with allowances where veterans are undergraduates, sets a time limit of one year and three months after discharge.

It is possible that what the Minister of Justice said a few moments ago is true, namely, that the drafting of the act has been done carefully, and that there are no mistakes. But it does seem obvious to me that if we are going to limit the time for application to twelve months after the close of the war, or to one year and three months, and say to a Newfoundlander, "You will receive the benefits of this act if your application is made within that time", we will not have accomplished anything. I should like to have an explanation of this, and would ask to be told how these sections can apply to veterans of Newfoundland.

Mr. Gregg: Again this reverts to the governing paragraph 38, which has been discussed at some length, to ensure that every item is carried out on the same basis as for Canadian veterans. As I said the other evening, there are some exceptions, particularly in respect of a veteran who may have been in hospital since the close of the war. I said at that time that, like those taking university training, there would be very few who would be able to take advantage of the other sections. But the sections to which the hon.

member has referred are inserted by the draftsman to carry out the intent of section 38 of the terms of union.

Mr. Green: In the terms of union we find in section 42 reference to the merchant seamen of Newfoundland. I would point out to the minister that there are certain defects in the provisions now made for these men. These provisions are of particular importance to Newfoundland, because the men of that dominion have been men of the sea. I do not think there can be any doubt that a much larger proportion of Newfoundlanders have taken to the sea than would be found in any of the nine provinces in Canada.

On December 29, 1948, order in council P.C. 5983 was passed which, at long last, did provide some help by way of rehabilitation for Canadian merchant seamen. However, it does not go far enough. For example, a merchant seaman cannot qualify for vocational training unless he is under thirty years of age. This means that a man of twenty-two or twenty-three years who joined the merchant navy in 1939 is now ineligible for this training. To me this is an unnecessary and unwise limitation.

I cannot see why the age limit should have been inserted, particularly in view of the fact that the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of Transport have wide discretion in either granting or refusing such vocational training. Now that we have before us the question of what is to be done for the merchant seamen of Newfoundland, I suggest that that thirty-year qualification be removed, and that merchant seamen be permitted to take vocational training no matter what their age, if it is considered that such seamen can benefit from the training offered.

There is a further restriction which states that the applicant must apply by July 1 of this year; otherwise he is not eligible for training. I cannot see the reason for that provision, either. Many of the men of the Canadian merchant navy are away on their ships, possibly in the Indian ocean or across the Pacific, and may not return for many months. Yet, unless they are back in Canada and have made their applications before July 1, they are ineligible for this vocational training. I submit that restriction should be removed from the order in council.

I have one further complaint to make about the present provisions. As a matter of fact, I have several other complaints, but at the present moment I am pressing only one of them. It is that these merchant seamen have not been given any educational training rights. While they are permitted to take vocational training, for some reason or other they are not allowed to take educational training. I know of several young men in Vancouver who served in the merchant navy, men who were under fire and who served on ships which were sunk. Yet these men cannot qualify for educational benefits. In the same classes, however, are army men who did not get out of Canada, but who do qualify for educational training—a situation which I say is most unfair. It has never been just. Now that we are dealing with a large number of merchant seamen from Newfoundland, I suggest that this injustice should be rectified.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Green: I should like a statement from the minister.

The Chairman: Before the minister makes a statement I think I should point out to the committee that a general discussion at this time on the questions that have been raised would be out of order because that particular act is not before the committee and the committee could do nothing about it.

Mr. Green: I submit that the questions I have asked are not out of order at all. They may have been asked under the wrong section, but I do not think they have. We are dealing with the rehabilitation act and if the chairman will refer to the explanation opposite page twenty of the bill he will find a reference to the terms of union having to do with merchant seamen. Those terms bring up the very points that I have raised. If the discussion is not in order under section 45 of the bill it would be in order under section 47. As a matter of fact I think it is in order under both sections.

Mr. Garson: This is a bill containing consequential amendments to make our law applicable to Newfoundland for the purposes of carrying out the terms of union. Surely that does not open up all the subject matters covered by that law. If it did, we could sit here for months discussing everything covered by all these acts. The only thing before the committee is whether this particular section shall be amended as stated in the bill. We are not discussing the propriety of the policy.

We have not raised objections before because we did not want to be technical about the matter, but as a government we have not much choice because we have entered into an arrangement with Newfoundland and have agreed to a contract known as the terms of union. In order to implement that, we require amendments to certain sections of our statute law. The only question that is really before us is: Are we to amend them or not?

This provision has been brought down to amend the sections, but I submit that that does not open up the subject matter of every one of these statutes.

Mr. Green: Section 42(2) of the terms of union deals with vocational training as applied to merchant seamen, and rehabilitation is dealt with in section 45 and also in section 47 of the bill. The explanation opposite section 47 points out the various enactments which give these rights. The enactment to which I have been referring is a particular order in council and I submit that I am in order in asking the Minister of Veterans Affairs why a change should not be made in the order in council along the lines I have suggested.

The Chairman: The work of the committee is, as I understand it, to consider whether these acts and the order in council to which the hon. member has referred should be made applicable to Newfoundland. I do not think that allows a discussion of each and every act referred to. As the Minister of Justice has pointed out, if it did, we would make no progress whatsoever. As I stated before, if hon. members think that some particular act which is now to be applied to Newfoundland is wrong or improper and should be changed, this committee can do nothing about it because that act is not before the committee. I think the work of this committee is to decide whether an act as it now stands, good or bad, should be applied to Newfoundland. But, in my opinion, to go further than that would be going beyond the powers vested in the committee.

Mr. Green: I suggest that the minister be allowed to make a statement at this point.

The Chairman: I had not intended to stop the minister but I thought I should point out what I thought was the proper procedure for the committee.

Mr. Gregg: Within your ruling, Mr. Chairman, with which I heartily agree, I would say to my hon. friend that the terms which apply to Canadian seamen will apply to those of Newfoundland, and the order in council to which he refers and which extends those benefits to Canadian seamen will also apply to Newfoundland, even if amended.

Mr. Young: I take it from your ruling, Mr. Chairman, that the question we have to decide is whether we are in favour of applying this section to Newfoundland. Whether it is good or bad must necessarily have some bearing upon whether we are in favour of applying it to Newfoundland. The hon. member for Vancouver South has pointed out that we do not think it is good enough for Canada and that is why we do not think it is good enough for Newfoundland.

Mr. Gillis: This is a matter we have been kicking around for a long time. I am not going to repeat anything the hon. member for Vancouver South has said because I agree with everything he said. This is not the first time he has made this statement in committee and in the house. I agree with the ruling of the chair that there is not much we can do with the section at this time. In view of the fact that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has stated that no veterans affairs committee will be set up at this session, he should before the house rises make a statement on this question of merchant seamen.

They have had a terribly raw deal. There are not many of them and it would not cost a great deal of money to apply to these merchant seamen the benefits given to veterans who served in the armed forces. To class the merchant seamen who served during the war as just ordinary seamen working for a private company is shabby treatment when we consider the contribution they made to the war effort. This is not good enough even for the Newfoundland seamen. Before we go to the country for re-election this is one mistake that should be remedied. The provisions of the act should be changed in order to remove this injustice. I am not arguing the merits or demerits of the act; I am merely associating myself with the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Section agreed to.

On section 46—The Canadian Citizenship Act.

Mr. Fraser: The suggestion to be added reads:

A person who was a British subject on the first day of April, nineteen hundred and forty-nine and (iii) was domiciled in Newfoundland on the said first day of April; is a Canadian citizen.

A British subject domiciled in Canada must wait five years before he can become a Canadian citizen.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I have an amendment to move which covers the point my hon. friend has in mind, that a British subject should be required to be domiciled in Newfoundland for the same length of time as in Canada, that is five years, before he would automatically become a Canadian citizen. The amendment I wish to move is, first, that the words "had Newfoundland domicile" be substituted for the words "was domiciled in Newfoundland" in line 42 on page 19; second, that the words, "Newfoundland domicile" be substituted for the words "domicile in Newfoundland" in lines 9 and 10 on page 20; third, that the words "and Newfoundland domicile means domicile in Newfoundland for at least five years," be added after the word "Canada" in line 12 on page 20. The effect of that amendment would be that a British subject who had been residing in Newfoundland would require to have five years' residence before automatically becoming a Canadian citizen.

Mr. Pearkes: The same draftsman?

Mr. Fraser: I guess it was the same draftsman the hon. member for Vancouver South was talking about. I want to direct a question to the Secretary of State. The citizenship forms from A to O are, I understand from court clerks, rather vague, and in many cases they have difficulty in discovering which form they should use. I wonder if those forms could be checked over, perhaps by the same draftsman, to see if some corrections could be made, or if they could be made simpler so they may be understood by these court clerks, who are very intelligent people. I wonder if the minister has had any complaints in that connection.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): No, I have had no complaints, but I shall be glad to have the matter looked into. Of course those forms do not come up for consideration under this section—

Mr. Fraser: I know they do not.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): —but I shall be glad to do as my hon. friend suggests, and see if any improvement can be made for the benefit of those applying for citizenship.

Mr. Fraser: Those forms will have to go to Newfoundland, and I thought they should be as simple as possible so they may be easily understood.

The Chairman: Would the committee like to carry the amendment and then discuss the section as amended?

Mr. Jaenicke: No, Mr. Chairman; I want to speak to the section first. Under the citizenship act a natural-born Canadian citizen includes one who has been born on a Canadian ship. In this section there is no provision for anyone born on a Newfoundland ship. Does not the Secretary of State think provision should be made to cover such person? As I read the section, a person would not be included as a natural-born Canadian citizen who was born on a Newfoundland ship.

Mr. Irvine: It will become a Canadian ship now.

Mr. Jaenicke: But he is already born.

Mr. Howe: I do not think there is any such thing as a Newfoundland ship, because I do not believe there is a Newfoundland registry.

Mr. Adamson: The amendment makes even more pertinent the question I want to discuss; that is, the status of a woman who married a foreigner prior to January 1, 1947. Under our citizenship act a Canadian-born woman who married a foreigner, other than a United States citizen, prior to January 1, 1947, loses her Canadian citizenship and status. If she marries a foreigner after that date she retains her Canadian citizenship. During the war a great number of women—and I propose to speak to the minister about this—married Norwegians and citizens of Holland and other countries, and these women have lost their Canadian citizenship. Recently in the United Kingdom an act was passed, which I presume would apply in Newfoundland as well, making the national status of a married woman retroactive. In other words, if a citizen of the United Kingdom married a Norwegian or a citizen of Holland, she retained her United Kingdom status and citizenship, and presumably the same applies to a Newfoundland woman.

We are going to have an anomaly here. This is a question I hope to bring up later when we discuss our own citizenship act, but it has a direct bearing on these women in Newfoundland. Any Newfoundland woman who married a foreigner prior to January 1, 1947, will find herself deprived of Canadian citizenship because of the non-retroactive nature of our legislation. I feel that at least the position should be clarified at the present time, so that women who were married to foreigners prior to January 1, 1947, will be able to regain their Canadian citizenship, just as the women of the United Kingdom have been enabled to do.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The hon. member is quite right. If a British subject married a foreigner and acquired the nationality of her husband she did lose her status as a British subject. That has caused a certain amount of difficulty, and consideration is being given at the present time to bringing forward amendments to our citizenship act dealing with some aspects that we have come across since the act came into force on January 1, 1947. I do not think the difficulty would apply in the case to which my hon. friend refers, that of a resident of Newfoundland. If, as he says, she regained her British citizenship under the terms of the British citizenship act, then at the time Newfoundland comes into confederation she will be a British subject already.

Mr. Adamson: I am very glad to hear the minister make that statement, because many Canadian women who married foreigners prior to that date are now in great distress. Take the case of a Canadian woman who married a Norwegian airman and now wishes to return to Canada. She finds herself blocked by all the regulations and restrictions that we place on immigrants coming to Canada. There are some Canadian-born women who are back in this country under temporary permits and who, unless the law is changed, may be forced to return to Norway or some other foreign country even though their husbands may have died in the meantime. So I am glad to hear the minister say consideration is being given to this situation.

Section 47 agreed to.

On section 48—The Explosives Act, 1946.

Mr. Hazen: Will the minister explain this section?

Mr. Garson: I think it is fairly self-explanatory. It reads:

A licence or permit issued under the act of Newfoundland relating to the manufacture, storage, importation and sale of explosives . . . shall be deemed to be a licence or permit issued under The Explosives Act, 1946 . . . for the purposes stated in the licence or permit, as the case may be.

In other words, they have a Newfoundland licence now subsisting. That will be accepted under our act as a licence for the manufacture or storage of explosives under the Canadian statute. My information is that the existing licences in Newfoundland will carry them through the present licence year.

Mr. Hazen: These licences are granted only for a year, are they?

Mr. Garson: Yes, or for a definite licence period.

Mr. Hazen: Would there be two authorities that could grant licences?

Mr. Garson: Oh, no. The dominion will be granting the licences from now on, after our laws go into effect. In the meanwhile, the people of Newfoundland have paid something to the Newfoundland government for a licence. If this provision were not enacted, we would be guilty of trying to make the people pay double for this licence period by making them get a new Canadian licence.

Section agreed to.

Section 49 agreed to.

[Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West.)]

On section 50—The War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946.

Mr. Drew: There are two or three points about section 50 that I think should be taken into consideration. First of all, there is the wording of section 50. It now reads:

For the purposes of paragraphs (b) and (c) of section four and section nine of the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, chapter seventy-five of the Statutes of 1946, His Majesty's Canadian forces include His Majesty's forces raised in Newfoundland—

For the purposes of what I wish to mention in that respect, I need not go further with the quotation.

In section 49, there is a noticeable difference in the wording which, it seems to me, has some meaning. In subsection one of section 49, we read, in any of the naval or military forces of Newfoundland or, having been recruited in Newfoundland, in any of the naval, military or air forces raised in Newfoundland by or on behalf of the United Kingdom . . .

From the the reading of those words in section 49, it would appear that a distinction is drawn between recruited and raised. It would appear that the word "raised" relates to the forces and not to the individuals and that, consequently, unless the forces were raised in Newfoundland the individuals who left Newfoundland to serve in those forces could not be included in the wording of section 50. I think the minister will see the point I am making. The word "raised" in section 49 relates to the forces and not to the individuals. If that is correct, then the individuals recruited by or on behalf of the United Kingdom in forces raised outside Newfoundland would not be included in the provisions of section 50. I am sure the minister has my point quite clearly in that respect and, that being so, I will pass on to the next point I wish to make in regard to section 50.

This relates to a very special type of provision for veterans. It is not a provision relating to the length of service, the extent of injuries or anything of that nature. It was a special provision enacted some years ago to deal with those cases of ageing veterans for whom no other provision was made in the various acts. The expression used at the time was that it was a provision for burnt-out veterans. In other words, it was to take care of ageing veterans who, for various reasons, were incapable of earning their livelihood. Instead of placing them in the ordinary position of dependents on state support, special provision was made which had regard to their military service.

It seems to me that, no matter what may be said in other provisions regarding veterans, this special provision on behalf of the so-called burnt-out veterans should apply to all veterans whether they served in the armed forces of Canada, the armed forces of Newfoundland, which will become a part of Canada, or the armed forces of the United Kingdom. The Minister of Veterans Affairs is well aware that this subject has been placed before him at different times, not only by the Imperial War Veterans Association on behalf of its membership, but also by the Canadian Legion, who have urged the inclusion of the imperial veterans. It is appropriate to discuss this subject at this point because this section could now be amended so that it would include, in respect to those veterans now in Newfoundland who would be affected by the provisions of the war veterans allowance, all the imperial veterans as well as the veterans who would be included under this provision as it is now drafted.

I recognize immediately that a point could be made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs that, if this section were amended to include imperial veterans as well as the veterans of the Newfoundland armed forces or veterans of the forces of the United Kingdom recruited in Newfoundland, there would be an inconsistency between the provisions of this act as it applies to those veterans living in the new province of Newfoundland, and those veterans living in the other nine provinces of Canada. I recognize that, and therefore I concede immediately that, if the minister were to concur in my recommendation, it would be necessary to decide at the same time that there should be a similar amendment so the war veterans allowance would apply not only to the veterans of the armed forces of Canada but also to all imperial veterans in Canada.

I raise this question now and urge the acceptance of the amendment, recognizing that it would also properly call for an amendment to the general act to apply to these veterans throughout the whole of Canada. I believe that is a step which should be taken. It has been recommended by the Canadian Legion and the Imperial War Veterans Association. I do not wish to repeat unnecessarily what I have said, but I urge that the distinction be recognized between this provision and many of the other provisions relating to veterans where the force in which they served is the guiding factor, and the length of service or the nature of the wounds they received has some bearing on the consideration given. I repeat that this is a special provision for ageing veterans which is intended to avoid the necessity of those veterans being dependent upon other societies or the state, and recognizing the special type of service they have rendered to the state.

I believe that, under such circumstances, the imperial veterans who have come to Canada, who have become citizens of this country, and who find themselves unable to work because of war exhaustion in addition to the effects of age, should receive this allowance. I believe the imperial war veterans in Newfoundland, which will shortly be a province of Canada, should also receive it. I urge consideration of this matter.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word about this section. As a member of the veterans affairs committee of last session, I am very glad to see that, in the new leader of the opposition, I have a new recruit for my party. I had the privilege of urging this very action before the veterans affairs committee of last session. I did not think that I would have an opportunity to speak on it now, but apparently it is in order.

The Chairman: I cannot agree with the hon. member that the discussion is in order at this time. I did not stop the leader of the opposition—

Mr. Cruickshank: Are you going to stop me?

The Chairman: —and I have no intention of stopping the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I should point out, however, that the discussion is not in order.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member for Fraser Valley, but I wish to question the statement that this discussion is not in order. It is certainly within the competence of the government, if they see fit, to make the amendment I have suggested with regard to Newfoundland veterans, and then at a later date to make the amendment with regard to veterans now in Canada. I am relating my remarks to this section as it relates to Newfoundland, and the only way that I referred to the Canadian veterans was in stating that, if this amendment were to be made in regard to imperial veterans in Newfoundland, it would certainly also have to be made with regard to veterans in the rest of Canada. But I submit that the suggestion that this section be amended to include imperial veterans is certainly in order.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should have qualified my remarks in the way mentioned by the leader of the opposition. The discussion, however, is out of order if it relates to an amendment of the War Veterans Allowance Act. That act is not before the committee for consideration at the present time. As the leader of the opposition has stated, if an hon. member suggests an amendment to the section which is now being considered, namely, section 50 of this bill, it is in order. But I want to tell the hon. member for Fraser Valley again that I did not rise for the purpose of interrupting him, but rather merely to point out that in my opinion a general discussion on the War Veterans Allowance Act at this time is not in order.

Mr. Herridge: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I am sorry I cannot agree with your ruling in this respect. I thing it is over-generous. I believe we are passing a bill to give to Newfoundland present legislation in Canada.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Herridge: In my opinion, the amendment submitted by the leader of the opposition is definitely out of order. A good many members on all sides of this house have advocated this principle with regard to Canadian veterans but have not taken part in this debate because they considered they were out of order in discussing that question at this time. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that if the leader of the opposition and others are permitted to discuss this amendment on that basis, we shall have an open discussion actually related to changing the present Canadian legislation.

An hon. Member: Something which is not before the committee.

Mr. Ferguson: I believe the hon. member for Fraser Valley only wanted to show his keen desire to follow my leader.

Mr. Cruickshank: I guess I am not going to get a chance around here at all. Any time the leader of the opposition is not out of order, I am not either. He was not ruled out of order.

Mr. Ferguson: The hon. member will never go wrong by following my leader.

Mr. Cruickshank: I was glad to see that he was adopting some of my policies. Three members of his party, who were also members of the committee on which I sat last year, did not see fit to be present and vote when this question was being dealt with. Instead, they were out fighting by-elections.

Mr. Green: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, may I say I am amazed that the hon. member for Fraser Valley should attempt to make a statement of that kind. He made the statement at the Canadian Legion convention, and my own name was brought up. A day or two after I left for the west I was replaced on the committee by another member. Yet I was most unjustly accused by the hon. member for Fraser Valley of having run away from the veterans affairs committee. That was a most unfair statement to make.

Mr. Cruickshank: There is only half an hour left, Mr. Chairman, but I will get my word in yet, if no more points of order are raised. The hon. member for Vancouver South is quite correct when he says he was replaced by another member who did not see fit to attend. I made the statement that two members worked in by-elections; I could mention the ridings in which they worked. When it comes to the question of fairness, I want to point out to the hon. member for Vancouver South that he did not hesitate to come before the Canadian Legion in Vancouver and say that the member for Fraser Valley, on a straight vote of confidence, did not vote in favour of this measure, when it was before the committee.

Mr. Drew: This is out of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Cruickshank: Let us have a little bit of fairness here. It works both ways. Hon. members here know that.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: I shall now come back to the section, if I may be permitted to do so.

Mr. Timmins: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Fraser Valley says that he now intends to discuss section 50.

Mr. Timmins: The hon. member for Fraser Valley referred to me. I was the member who succeeded the hon. member for Vancouver South on the veterans affairs committee. At that particular time I was attending three standing committees of the house, and I attended the veterans affairs committee as many times as it was possible for me to do so. The record will show that I attended on most of the occasions on which it met. I highly resent the suggestion made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley that I did not do my duty as a member of that committee.

The Chairman: May I now ask the committee to consider section 50.

Mr. Cruickshank: All right. Speaking on the point of order, Mr. Chairman, before continuing—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I did not say that the hon. member for Parkdale was not doing his duty. He has always done his duty in this house. I never insinuated for a moment that he was not doing his duty. I accept his apology for attending an inferior committee instead of attending the veterans affairs committee. I now want to come back to the section. I believe that if the veterans from Newfoundland—and I am one of the few who know how to pronounce the name of our new province—

Mr. Archibald: That is where the margarine comes from.

Mr. Cruickshank: It has not yet been sold in British Columbia. But as I was about to say, I believe that if the veterans of Newfoundland including the imperial veterans there, are entitled to this increased allowance —and I believe they are—then the veterans of Canada should be entitled to this increased allowance right now. A burnt-out veteran, which is the term usually used, gets less than an old age pensioner. Surely it is not the desire of the people of Canada that a veteran who is burnt out, through serving his country, should get less than an old age pensioner gets, little as that is. Speaking right on that section, and I am sure I am in order, let me say that, if the veterans of Newfoundland are to get this burnt-out pension, I think they should get more. I am referring to the section, Mr. Chairman. I say they should get more; and the only way they can get more is to get exactly the same as Canadians are getting. I am strongly urging on the government that reconsideration be given to the matter. I am still sorry that my friends in the opposition did not see fit to attend that meeting of the committee to which I have referred, because there was a tie vote, which was decided by the chairman. If those hon. members had been there, instead of working in by-elections, the measure would have been passed.

Mr. Williams: I should like to put in my threepennyworth on this matter anyhow. The hon. member for Yale and I had a conference with some of the legion officials here in Ottawa on this question that has been tossed into this discussion. On the advice of these legion officials we refrained from injecting into the discussion of questions referring to veterans of Newfoundland anything pertaining to veterans of this country. We did that at the express request of some of the legion officials here in Ottawa. We have deliberately refrained from taking advantage of either the legion or the temper and patience of the house by injecting this question into this discussion. I am sorry to see that it has been brought up, because my colleague, the hon. member for Yale, and I were impressed with what the legion officials told us. On this veterans question the legion officials were particularly anxious—

Mr. Ferguson: Where?

Mr. Williams: Here in Ottawa.

Mr. Ferguson: That may be so.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: We are veterans, and we do not agree.

Mr. Williams: I am not disputing that you are veterans. You may also be something else besides veterans. I am not going to get into an argument on what you are. I am just making a statement in the house and I think I have the same right to do that as the leader of the opposition. I do not want to make a Donnybrook Fair out of it, but if you insist we shall have one.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Williams: I was going along all right until the interruptions started. I can be as patient and quiet as any hon. member of the committee until they start making it awkward. As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, we did this at the express request of the legion officials. I am sorry to see that it has been injected into the discussion at this time, particularly when the legion requested us not to do so; yet their name has been rung in on it. They want to see that the veterans of Newfoundland are getting at least the same as the veterans of Canada. What they do afterwards is something the legion is going to decide, but at this moment the legion is particularly anxious to see this section on veterans affairs go through without any amendment or without any discussion whatsoever, and I hope that we listen to the voice of the veterans organization and see that that is done.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I want to say just a word here.

The Chairman: I wonder whether I might make a suggestion. We have had remarks from representatives of three parties in the house. I think I have given a great deal of leeway in the strict interpretation of the rules; I have not been strict at all. But from now on the discussion should be strictly relevant to the section.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I think what I want to say has some bearing on the section. Mr. Chairman, probably you will permit me to endorse the remarks of my leader and of the hon. member for Fraser Valley. Having been present when the vote to which he referred took place, I want to endorse what he said about the actions of that committee. I think that under this section I should be permitted to say that we should have a standing committee of this House of Commons on veterans affairs. Nowhere will you find a greater need for it than right in this section.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Ross (Souris): This section does show the house and the country how important it is, and what some of the future difficulties will be for the servicemen from Newfoundland when they are taken in. That will be only one of their very many grievances. As I have requested in past sessions, I think it is important that the Minister of Veterans Affairs reconsider the matter of setting up a standing committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. Merritt: Before section 50 passes, may I say there has been considerable discussion as to whether it is in order to advocate under this section that imperials be brought under the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

The Chairman: Order. I have ruled that such a discussion is not in order.

Mr. Merritt: I am aware that you have so ruled, Mr. Chairman. My point arises not out of the general question whether imperials should be brought under the act, but out of the wording of the section itself. In bringing in the bill the government has seen fit to select certain Newfoundland veterans to come under the provisions of the War Veterans' Allowance Act. The veterans they have selected are those who served apparently in His Majesty's forces raised in Newfoundland. I am certain that the number of Newfoundland veterans who served in the forces raised in Newfoundland must be a small proportion of the total number of Newfoundland citizens who served in the forces.

In the first part of his remarks the leader of the opposition raised the question whether the words, "His Majesty's forces raised in Newfoundland" went as far as the words in the previous section "persons who had been recruited in Newfoundland." I think it is perfectly clear that they do not go as far as the words used by the draftsmen of the bill in the previous section. It is going to become very important indeed, Mr. Chairman. For if, as I think most of us believe, there are among our new Canadians in the province of Newfoundland a very large number of ex-servicemen who served in the imperial forces and who did not serve in the Newfoundland forces, we may be limiting the application of the War Veterans' Allowance Act to forces in Newfoundland and cutting out the major proportion of Newfoundlanders who served in His Majesty's forces in the recent war.

It is my belief that the only way you will get around this point is probably to include all who served in the imperial forces. Certainly these words "His Majesty's forces raised in Newfoundland" are quite inadequate and I do not think the section should carry without a statement from the minister as to how many it will include. What proportion of the total number of Newfoundlanders who served will be included in this phrase?

Mr. Garson: I wonder whether we might get a definitive statement of this matter by saying that, under the terms of union, section 38, we undertake to do the following:

> Canada will make available to Newfoundland veterans the following benefits, on the same basis as they are from time to time available to Canadian veterans, as if the Newfoundland veterans had served in His Majesty's Canadian forces, namely,
> (a) The War Veterans' Allowance Act, 1946, free hospitalization and treatment, and civil service preference will be extended to Newfoundland veterans who served in the first world war or the second world war or both . . .

That is the substance of the contract between the two countries. Section 50 is intended to implement that undertaking, and it says:

> For the purposes of paragraphs (b) and (c) of section four and section nine of the War Veterans' Allowance Act, 1946, chapter seventy-five of the statutes of 1946, His Majesty's Canadian forces include His Majesty's forces raised in Newfoundland, and for the purposes of paragraph (d) of section four and paragraph (b) of section nine of the said act domicile in Newfoundland shall be deemed to be domicile in Canada.

Turning to section 9 of the War Veterans' Allowance Act we read this:

> In this part, unless the context otherwise requires, "veteran" means
> (a) a person who served during world war I and world war II as a member of His Majesty's Canadian forces; . . .

That is covered in section 50 by "His Majesty's forces raised in Newfoundland". Then section 9 (b) of the War Veterans Allowance Act states:

> A person who served during world war I as a member of His Majesty's forces other than Canadian forces—

That refers to the point mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

> —and was domiciled in Canada when he became a member of the said forces and was a member of His Majesty's Canadian forces during world war II.

In other words, it brings in the idea of domicile. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard would admit that, once domicile is brought in, the fact that the returned man was not serving in His Majesty's Canadian forces but has Canadian domicile would bring him under section 9 of the act.

Then section 4 of the same act states:

> In this part, unless the context otherwise requires "veteran" means
> (a) Any former member of the Northwest field force who served in a theatre of actual war in the Northwest rebellion;
> (b) Any former member of a Canadian contingent who served in a theatre of actual war during the South African war, or any former member of His Majesty's forces, other than Canadian forces, who served in a theatre of actual war during the South African war and was domiciled in Canada immediately prior to the eleventh day of October, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine, if in either case the former member landed in South Africa prior to the first day of June, one thousand nine hundred and two.

And then going on to paragraph (d), this being the one made applicable to Newfoundland residents:

(d) Any former member of any of His Majesty's forces, other than Canadian forces, or of any of the forces of any of His Majesty's allies, who was domiciled in Canada at the time he joined any such force for the purpose of the war and who served during such a war in a theatre of actual war, or is in receipt of a pension for an injury or disease incurred or aggravated during his service in such force, or has, in respect of a disability rated at more than five per centum of total disability, received, pursuant to the laws affecting the members of the forces with which he served, a final payment similar or analogous to the final payment authorized by the Pension Act.

I think that covers it pretty thoroughly.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to labour the point, but I think there is a slight distinction which has not been recognized by the minister. The effect of section 50, as I see it, is to widen the meaning of the words "His Majesty's Canadian forces", as included in the sections he has just read, to include still further "His Majesty's forces raised in Newfoundland". That is correct, is it not?

Mr. Garson: As I understand it, it includes first of all His Majesty's forces raised in Newfoundland.

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Garson: And then, secondly, for the purposes of paragraph (d) of section 4, which I have just read, and also paragraph (b) of section 9, domiciled in Newfoundland shall be deemed to be domiciled in Canada, and will entitle them to be considered as veterans within the meaning of those sections. And that includes not merely service in Newfoundland forces or the Canadian forces but, in respect of section 4, it includes service in forces of our allies and in His Majesty's forces other than Canadian or Newfoundland forces.

Mr. Ferguson: I do not understand how the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Williams) could take it upon himself to speak so forcefully on behalf of the veterans. It was only recently in a by-election in Carleton that the veterans spoke so clearly in stating that they wanted the leader of the Progressive Conservative party to speak for them in the House of Commons—not the C.C.F. party.

Section 51 and 52 agreed to.

On section 53—The Emergency Exchange Conservation Act.

Mr. Drew: This section certainly requires some explanation, I think, because it is a section which undoubtedly has the most unusual effect of any provision in the bill. It provides that, for the purposes of the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act, goods which have been imported into Newfoundland before the date upon which Newfoundland becomes a province of Canada are to be regarded as having come from the place where they were manufactured or produced for a year after the date on which this agreement with Newfoundland is consummated. I suggest we should have some explanation of the real purpose of this section and why a limitation of that kind was considered necessary.

Mr. Abbott: As the committee will see, the purpose of this section is to prevent evasion of import restrictions now in effect. We learned some time ago, when negotiations were in progress with Newfoundland, that it seemed likely that some people in Newfoundland might take advantage of the delay which would elapse before the union by importing into Newfoundland articles which were prohibited or under quota—articles such as expensive automobiles, textiles and the like.

Mr. Drew: Or liquids?

Mr. Abbott: I am not so sure about that—but possibly liquids, too.

And then it was thought that subsequently they might send them into Canada, after union was effected. This point was brought up during discussions with the Newfoundland delegation. We informed them we would have to take steps to protect against such a contingency, and I made a public statement on December 13, 1948, in connection with some other matters, to this effect:

Mr. Abbott also announced that the government proposes to take steps to prevent the shipment of prohibited or quota goods of foreign origin from Newfoundland to the other provinces of Canada after the date of confederation. If such steps were not taken, it would be possible for importers to defeat the exchange conservation measures by creating stocks of prohibited and quota goods in Newfoundland prior to union, for shipment to Canada after March 31, 1949. If such shipments were permitted, unfair advantage would be gained by those who attempted to get around the import controls in this manner.

The committee will realize that it was important to see that no such advantage should be taken, and that it would have afforded opportunity for importers in some cases to make substantial profits, which would have been manifestly unfair to their competitors in Canada.

I may say that the Newfoundland delegation accepted the point without question, agreeing that the action was necessary. This section provides a term of a year—simply for the purpose of placing some time limit on it. We do not want it to carry on indefinitely. It simply means that we will look through the situation in Newfoundland to the country of origin.

Mr. Drew: How would the department determine what was affected by this section, and what was not? It seems to me that in passing a law we want to be sure it is practical as well as desirable.

Mr. Abbott: I am not sure of the details. I may say, however, that this was discussed with the deputy minister of customs, and we were assured that it was easily capable of enforcement. My colleague the Minister of National Defence confirms that view.

Section agreed to.

On section 54—Coming into force.

Mr. Shaw: A moment ago the hon. member for Fraser Valley indicated he was one of the very few who pronounced properly the name of the area now to be joined with Canada. I have made a check in recent hours indicating no less than seven pronunciations of the name of this island which we hope will become the tenth province of Canada.

In the interests of unity it might be well for some member of the government to indicate to the house and country the correct pronunciation of the name of this area to become our tenth province.

Mr. Drew: Well, it is not New Zealand.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Shaw: I am not joking about this. I actually have before me seven pronunciations. The Minister of National Defence, the Prime Minister and others have been associated with gentlemen from that area and surely they should be in a position to give us an official pronunciation. I taught school for a number of years and I know the difficulties that teachers and children in our country are confronted with in connection with certain names found in the text books. I urge that this committee be given an official pronunciation of the name of this proposed tenth province.

Mr. Claxton: I can tell the hon. gentleman that I was just as concerned about this as he is when we began to meet with the Newfoundland delegation to discuss negotiations for the union of Canada and Newfoundland. I listened attentively to the opening and successive speeches and I found that the representatives of Newfoundland used three or four different pronunciations. All we can do is the best we can.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Shaw: It might be wise to ask those gentlemen to make an official submission to this parliament.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Minister of Justice another type of question before we finally pass this bill? Some of the sections state specifically that they are amendments of existing statutes; they state that section so and so of an existing statute is to be repealed and the following substituted therefor. Other sections merely say that for the purpose of such and such an act such is the case. There are two questions in my mind. The first relates to the office consolidations of acts and the other relates to the Revised Statutes of Canada, in connection with which we passed an act last year. Will all these sections be included in the office consolidations, or only those sections which take the place of sections already in the statutes?

Mr. Garson: I thought my hon. friend was going to ask me how to pronounce "Newfoundland."

Mr. Knowles: The minister has shown that in Manitoba he learned a great deal about New Zealand.

Mr. Garson: By way of reply to my hon. friend's serious question, I may say that the usual way to pick up these amendments provided by an omnibus statute of this sort is by an editorial footnote in the office consolidation or by a section inserted between the other sections of the consolidated act.

Mr. Knowles: That answers one question satisfactorily, but can the minister say what will happen with respect to the revised statutes?

Mr. Garson: In what respect?

Mr. Knowles: What will the commissioners who are to revise the statutes do with this bill once it is passed?

Mr. Garson: They will certainly take cognizance of it, and I should think that it would be published and then cross references would be made in the different statutes to which it refers. This is a statute of Canada and when all the statutes are revised this will be included along with the others. As to the statutes which this omnibus bill amends or changes—the Penitentiary Act, for example—they will be revised and will include the references made to them in this omnibus bill either by way of footnotes or inserted sections.

Section agreed to.

On section 37—The Penitentiary Act.

Mr. Hazen: We have not had an explanation from the minister in connection with this section.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member for Calgary West raised three points in reference to this section. First, he objected to the use of the word "place". I discussed this with the draftsman and while he thinks—I share his views—that "place" is all right, there is no objection to substituting for that word the word "penitentiary".

Then the hon. member suggested that the words "city of" should be inserted before the word "St. John's". We have no objection to introducing those words. If the word "penitentiary" were used, we would have to strike out the words "that place of confinement" at the end of subsection 1 and substitute therefor the words "the said penitentiary".

Then the hon. member referred to the fact that whereas the section states that the place of confinement shall be subject to the statutes, rules, regulations and other laws pertaining to the management and control of it he contended that those words were surplusage, for in his view it would be under the Penitentiary Act. That is not so. As I pointed out to the committee in reply to a question by an hon. member, this section is being introduced to carry into effect the provisions of section 16 of this memorandum which states that for the time being it is understood that Newfoundland will continue to operate its own penitentiary.

The point here is that this penitentiary is continuing under the management of Newfoundland and is not coming under the Penitentiary Act. As I indicated before, this section starts out with these words:

> Notwithstanding anything in the Penitentiary Act—

Since it is not to be under the provisions of the Penitentiary Act it has to be left under the statutes, rules, regulations and other laws now pertaining to its management. Otherwise it would be under no rules at all. Therefore these words are not surplusage.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would move the amendments suggested by the Minister of Justice.

Amendments agreed to.

On section 13—Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Mr. Isnor: Would the Minister of Justice be good enough to advise if the Canadian National Railways are to take over the coastal services?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Knowles: Can we have the business for tomorrow?

Mr. St. Laurent: Unless objection is taken by hon. members desiring to revert to the debate on the address, it would be the intention to proceed with the resolution concerning emergency regulations, No. 6 on the order paper of today, and if that is disposed of to continue the debate on the resolution of the Minister of Agriculture, No. 4 on today's order paper.

Mr. Knowles: As far as this group is concerned, as indicated earlier today there is no objection to that procedure. I merely rise to make that statement now with the thought that others might do the same in order that we may know definitely what will be the business tomorrow.

Mr. St. Laurent: My understanding from the whips was that there would have been no objection to going on today with Nos. 6 and 4 on the order paper if earlier in the day we had disposed of the bill with which we have just concluded. I assume there will be no objection tomorrow, that we will be able to proceed with No. 6 and, having disposed of that, to revert to a continuation of the debate on No. 4.

Mr. Knowles: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 18, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, February 18, 1949

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 18th February, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to a certain bill.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

PRIVILEGE

REMARKS OF MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER CENTRE, REFERRED TO ON JANUARY 27—STATEMENT OF MR. YOUNG

Mr. Rodney Young (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On January 27 the attention of this house was drawn to a reference made by me outside the house on July 25 last. Shortly before coming into the chamber on that day I informed the leader of the C.C.F. that I expected that the matter would be brought up, and told him of my intention to withdraw the language about which the complaint was made. Unfortunately the atmosphere which developed led me to believe that my withdrawal would be misunderstood by this house. I do now make this withdrawal, and I ask hon. members to believe that no one is more desirous than I am of maintaining respect for parliament and its members, as well as for parliamentary procedure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. James Sinclair (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, this apology and retraction is quite satisfactory to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) and myself. Obviously it has been so received by the house. For this reason the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and I will not proceed with our motion as indicated.

WHEAT BOARD

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should like to advise the house of changes in the personnel of the advisory committee of the Canadian wheat board.

It is a matter of regret to the government and to myself personally that Mr. C. Gordon Smith and Mr. D. A. Campbell have found it necessary to resign from the committee. Mr. Smith has resigned for business reasons, and Mr. Campbell's health is such that he cannot continue to serve. I should like to take this opportunity of expressing the government's appreciation of the services rendered by both Mr. Smith and Mr. Campbell.

Mr. Smith served with distinction as assistant chief commissioner of the board during the difficult wartime years from 1939 to 1944, and has been a member of the advisory committee since 1946. Mr. Campbell has represented the milling industry on the advisory committee since 1940, and for a period of over eight years has given conscientious service to the committee.

Mr. D. I. Walker has been appointed to the committee to succeed Mr. Campbell as the representative of the milling industry. Mr. Walker has had long experience in the milling industry in Canada, and I am pleased that he has consented to act on the committee.

Mr. J. C. A. Nijdam has been appointed to succeed Mr. Smith, and will represent the export trade on the advisory committee. For many years Mr. Nijdam has been active in the export trade in Canadian grain, and his experience will be of great value.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE THE ELIGIBLE AGE OF VOTERS FROM 21 TO 18

Mr. H. R. Argue (Wood Mountain) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 27, to amend the Dominions Elections Act, 1938 (age of voters).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Argue: The purpose of this bill is simple. It is to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, to provide that the eligible age of voters shall be reduced from twenty-one years to eighteen years.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

PRESS ANNOUNCEMENT OF REMOVAL OF PERSONNEL FROM WINNIPEG TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has his attention been called to an announcement in the press this morning, made by Mr. G. R. McGregor, president of Trans-Canada Air Lines, concerning the removal of another 155 T.C.A. personnel from Winnipeg to Montreal? In view of the fact that last summer the minister gave me an assurance by letter that movements of this kind would not take place, can he make a statement about the matter on the floor of the house?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not seen the item in question. I am aware that Mr. McGregor intended to give to the public a full explanation with regard to the plans of the company. My hon. friend speaks of another transfer. His question obviously refers to the same transfer he asked about on a former occasion during this session of parliament. I have nothing to add to Mr. McGregor's announcement.

PRIZE MONEY

DISTRIBUTION BETWEEN NAVY AND AIR FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. L. Langlois (Gaspé): In view of the representations which I have received with regard to prize money, and which I have brought to the attention of the Minister of National Defence, will the minister elaborate on the statement he made in this house on February 4 in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton)?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): This matter has been brought to my attention by the hon. member for Gaspé, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), the hon. member for Kamloops, and several others. In view of the widespread interest in the question, with the leave of the house I should like to make a statement on it, supplementing the previous statements in the press and to this house.

Prize money is the term used for the old naval custom whereby the officers and men of the Royal Navy and privateers had their pay supplemented by grants out of the money received from the sale of captured enemy merchant ships. Part of this money was kept in the exchequer, and part was paid by the crown to the crews directly concerned. It should be emphasized that no one had a right to payment, but that payment was made as an act of grace. Formerly this was done by the king himself under the royal prerogative.

In modern war it has become increasingly difficult and increasingly unfair to allocate prize money to individual officers and men taking part in the capture of the prize. Consequently in the first great war officers and men of the Royal Navy shared according to to their rank and the amount of time they had spent at sea. Personnel of the Royal Canadian Navy shared in this allocation made by the British parliament as if they had been members of the Royal Navy. The scale operated so that an admiral, commander in chief, got 283 times as much as an ordinary seaman.

In the second world war it had become still more difficult to apportion prizes because of the part played in each capture by large numbers of ships and planes, frequently including ships and personnel of several different nations. An agreement was therefore made under which the countries of the commonwealth would share in the proceeds of the prizes taken in proportion to the peak strength each of them had had in the navies and air forces engaged on naval operations.

There is no law or custom under which any individual has any right to any part of this money.

In the United Kingdom it has been decided that one-third of the United Kingdom's share would be kept by the crown and that the remaining two-thirds would be divided between the Royal Navy and Royal Air Force in proportion to the peak strength of these two services engaged on naval operations. The navy's share will be paid to the officers and men having more than six months' service at sea on a graduated scale, which provides for the payment of ten times as much to senior officers as to men. It was decided, however, that the air force share should be paid to the Royal Air Force charitable and welfare societies caring for present and past members of the service.

In Canada the government proposes not to take one-third off but to divide the whole

Canadian share in proportion to the numbers engaged on naval operations, which works out at sixty-eight per cent for the navy and thirty-two per cent for the air force.

In considering how the navy's share would be divided, the whole position was thoroughly reviewed. Obviously, on the British scales which are predicated on responsibility, officers, particularly senior officers, would benefit substantially, as their shares would run into considerable sums; but in the case of men, the share would be about $10 each if paid to all the sailors who had been on sea operations for six months or more. A distribution on this basis would, it was considered after careful examination, be very much less desired by naval personnel themselves than to have the money used by their own representatives to meet needy cases. This was particularly desirable in view of the fact that the system of disposing of canteen profits in the navy resulted in the Royal Canadian Navy benevolent trust fund receiving less funds in proportion than those made available to the other services. Moreover, the fund is being expended at a rate which will speedily exhaust it. Accordingly, both the navy's share and the air force's share will be paid into the trust funds for the benefit of veterans and members of these services. In other words, a distribution to individual personnel would involve a gain of small consequence to those who might be eligible, but by the method proposed the scope of assistance to those who are in genuine distress will be materially greater.

It was felt that the great majority of veterans and active force personnel concerned would want the money to be used to help former comrades and their families who are in need.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENTS UNDER WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has the government given consideration to the brief of the Canadian Legion asking for payment under the War Veterans Allowance Act of $50 a month to single men and $85 a month to married men? If so, what action has been decided upon?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, the government has given consideration to the matter, and the results of the consideration will be announced in due course.

Mr. Harkness: When will that announcement be made?

Inquiries of the Ministry

MARSHLANDS

BAY OF FUNDY AREA—PROGRAM FOR CURRENT YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. When may we expect a statement as to the program which will be carried out this year with respect to the five-year program of reclaiming the marshlands of the bay of Fundy area?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): As the hon. member knows, legislation was passed at the last session of parliament which provided for a five-year program, the costs of which are to be split three ways, among the federal government, the provincial governments, and the farmers concerned. Negotiations in connection with the program are under way, and when we are on the estimates of my department which are concerned with special expenditure I expect to be able to give full details with regard to any action which will be taken this year.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I ask the minister when we may expect a statement from him, and when his estimates will be brought down? A great many people are interested in the government's policy in this respect, and sometimes the estimates do not come down before two or three months from now.

Mr. Gardiner: The committee had a meeting this week. Our officials have been down in the maritimes, and I think the matter has been fully discussed with the people concerned. I do not think there is any doubt that they will be kept fully informed as the discussions continue. So far as hon. members are concerned, they will get full information when the estimates are before the house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF MAIN ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to ask the Prime Minister when we may expect the estimates of the coming fiscal year to be tabled in the house.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): It is my understanding that it is not the practice to table the estimates until the address in reply to the speech from the throne has been disposed of. As soon as that is done the estimates will be ready for tabling. If there is any unexpected delay in concluding the debate on the address, I hope arrangements may be made to have the usual practice departed from and the estimates brought down at an earlier date.

Mr. Graydon: May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works? May I ask him to make sure that when the estimates are brought down, the urgent need for permanent development of Port Credit harbour be not overlooked?

HOURS OF SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Garfield Case (Grey North): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is likely to give favourable consideration to changing the hours of sitting of the house so that we may sit from two to six and eight to ten p.m.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): That is not a matter for the government to decide. It is one which would be decided by the members of the house themselves.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question to that asked by the hon. member for Grey North? Will the Prime Minister consider calling together informally the members of the committee which dealt with the rules last year, to see whether we can make some progress in connection with some of the changes which have been suggested?

Mr. St. Laurent: I shall be glad to hear the views of any members of the house as to what might be done to accommodate the greatest number of members in respect of the hours of sitting.

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO TAPPING OF TELEPHONES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister received protests from any member of parliament or of the press gallery about the telephones being tapped?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): No.

VACANCY IN CONSTITUENCY OF WETASKIWIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to call an early by-election in Wetaskiwin in order that the people there may have representation in this house.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): It is my impression that the formalities required by law to bring officially to your notice, Mr. Speaker, the fact that there is a vacancy in Wetaskiwin have not yet been fulfilled. I can assure the hon. member that as soon as they have been complied with the government will proceed in the manner provided by the statute.

Mr. Graydon: Does that mean a by-election?

Mr. St. Laurent: My hon. friend can read the statute.

Mr. Graydon: It does mean there will be a by-election sometime?

Mr. St. Laurent: It does mean that there will be a by-election in the manner and at the time prescribed by the legislation passed by this parliament.

Mr. Graydon: That means a delay.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REFERENCE TO LIGHTING AT EASTERLY APPROACH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Has his attention been drawn to the fact that although the lights are now on again in Ontario, there is still a blackout on parliament hill? On the most easterly approach to the parliament buildings the lights have been gradually fading, until last night there was a complete blackout. I would urge that the minister remedy this as soon as possible.

Mr. Graydon: They have been out ever since Nicolet-Yamaska.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): May I thank the hon. member for calling my attention to this matter. In his question he mentioned the lights at the most easterly approach to the parliament buildings, and pointed out that they have been gradually fading. I would remind him that the easterly side of the building is the opposite to this one, and I can assure hon. members that the government will do its utmost to enlighten that side of the house.

SMOKE FROM PUBLIC BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Referring again to blackouts, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. For some mornings now there has been a blackout in this district because of the smoke issuing from public buildings and clouding the sky. Is the minister providing smoke abatement appliances for public buildings?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have noticed the condition to which the hon. member refers. I can say that the department is doing its utmost to relieve it. We are trying to find means to make the smoke disappear as soon as possible.

PRICES AND TRADE BOARD

DECISION OF ONTARIO SUPREME COURT IN MCGINN CASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It has to do with the debate which will come up today in reference to emergency powers. Several days ago the supreme court of Ontario declared ultra vires a section of the wartime prices and trade board regulations dealing with the matter of fair prices. What were the reasons for the declaration of the court and the judgment that was rendered? Does the department intend immediately to appeal this judgment in order to make sure that this legislation will be carried into effect?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): My hon. friend did not give me notice of this question. I shall be glad to bring down an answer in due course.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is five days since the minister was first asked the question.

Mr. H. W. Timmins (Parkdale): I should like to repeat the question I asked the Minister of Finance four or five days ago. Has he given consideration to the decision in the McGinn case? If so, what is the result of that consideration?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I apologize to my hon. friend for not having answered his question before. The reason is that the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board returned from Newfoundland only yesterday. I have sent a note out to ask whether he has yet received advice from the legal advisers of the board as to what action should be taken concerning the decision referred to. Hon. members will recall that it relates to what has been referred to as the just and reasonable clause in section 8 of the wartime prices and trade board regulations. When we reach the bill which is based upon the resolution to be considered this afternoon hon. members will see that it contains a provision that in the continuation of these powers no prosecutions will be taken under that section. The reason is, as I indicated to the house the other day when the resolution was first introduced, that price ceilings will apply only to articles on which there are now specific ceilings. I shall give my hon. friend an answer later this afternoon.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, my question will be brief—and it may have to do with a blackout. Has the government yet received a copy of the judgment in the McGinn case? If so, will it be made available so that we may look at it?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I have received a note indicating that a copy of the judgment was received only yesterday. Mr. Spence, counsel of the board, is now considering it, and I hope I may be able to make a statement with respect to it some time early next week.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Could the minister have a copy made?

Mr. Abbott: I shall lend the hon. member my copy.

SEED GRAIN

FLOOR PRICE UNDER FLAX, RAPE AND SUNFLOWER SEED FOR 1949

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister now, or at an early date, indicate to the house and to the country whether it is the intention of the government to establish a floor price under flax, rape and sunflower seed for 1949, and what that floor price will be? Most farmers want to make arrangements now for their seed grain, and I think some indication of the government's intention with respect to the matter should be given.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Consideration is being given to the matters referred to by my hon. friend, and a statement will be made in due course.

RAILWAYS

PAINTING OF DIESEL TRAINS IN BRIGHT COLOURS TO ASSIST IN AVOIDING ACCIDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, of which I have not yet given him notice. In view of the increasing use of fast-moving diesel trains on our railroads, will the minister consider the advisability of providing that such trains be painted in some bright colour, such as yellow, to help highway travellers to see such diesel trains sooner and thus avoid fatal accidents?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Knowles: Did the minister give the hon. member notice that he was not going to be here?

WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS OF SESSION OF 1947-48—QUESTION OF NECESSITY FOR PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. Bentley (Swift Current): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Will the minister give a reply to my question of February 16 with reference to the request of Mr. Garson, premier of Manitoba?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I have not received any notice of this question. I shall have to look up the record to see what the premier of Manitoba asked for.

Mr. Bentley: The minister promised to do that the other day. Forty-eight hours have elapsed since that promise was made.

ASSINIBOINE RIVER VALLEY

WORK UNDER P.F.R.A.—QUESTION AS TO POSSIBLE DAMAGE BY FLOODING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. C. Miller (Portage la Prairie): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, of which I have not sent him notice. Will the minister tell us what, if anything, has been done during the last twelve months to have a survey or investigation of the Assiniboine river basin made by engineers of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act or by his department with a view to taking such steps as may be necessary to remove, as far as possible, flood damage by an overall scheme?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The work of investigation has been going on at the Assiniboine river valley for some years, and much of the detailed work has been carried out as far down the river as the city of Brandon. Much work was done last year in the way of putting in safeguards around Brandon, and I am sure that some investigation has been carried on further down. I am not certain that all the work will be carried out this year.

HOUSING

PROJECT IN ALBERTA—FORECLOSURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) or, in his absence, the minister who is taking care of the department. In view of the foreclosure proceedings by the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company of Calgary, Alberta, against home owners who have houses under construction by the Bow River Construction Company, will the government see to it that these veterans, and some civilians, will not lose their financial equity in their property as a result of these foreclosures?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In the absence of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, I suggest that the question be put on the order paper.

INCOME TAX

CANADIANS IN THE UNITED STATES—ASSISTANCE IN MAKING OUT RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Press reports indicate that the United States has detailed one of its agents at the embassy in Ottawa to help United States citizens with their income returns. Has the minister's department done the same thing in the United States?

Mr. Cruickshank: I wish they would help me to pay mine.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): We have never had any request for such an officer.

THE PRIME MINISTER

VISIT TO TORONTO ON FEBRUARY 19

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is to visit Toronto tomorrow to turn over Christie Street hospital to the city. He will be the guest of the mayor and the corporation of that city at a civic luncheon to be held at the Royal York hotel at 12.30 in the afternoon. I can assure the Prime Minister of a cordial welcome in Toronto, where he is well liked on account of his many fine personal qualities. He opened our winter fair. I understand he is to tour the city. For three parliaments I was the federal member for the district in which that hospital is situated. I regret I cannot return for the reception, but I assure the Prime Minister that it is the desire of every member from Toronto that he receive from all the people of that city a most enthusiastic welcome.

TRANSITIONAL MEASURES ACT, 1947

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Monday, February 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that the contents of this resolution for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council does not constitute the whole of the program the government intends to bring in at this session in connection with the very serious matter of prices and distribution facing the country today.

The people of Canada are expecting effective government action at this session relative to the present unprecedented high cost of living. The rank and file of the Canadian people are not asking for more controls; but they are asking for relief from the burden of high living costs. People generally are waking up to the fact that the government itself is perhaps the chief culprit in this whole matter of extremely high prices. I claim the government has contributed very largely to the making of any emergency which does exist at the present time, four years after the close of the war.

For example, the people of Canada are aware that the Liberal government last year overtaxed them by at least $600 million in hidden and indirect taxes alone, which taxes were added to the price the consumers had to pay for the things they have to buy from day to day. Perhaps the most vicious of all these hidden taxes is the sales tax.

I was much interested in the excellent speech delivered in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne), an experienced manufacturer. In his speech he illustrated the bad effects of the government's eight per cent sales tax, and showed clearly that this tax, applied at the manufacturer's level to, for instance, $100 worth of cotton goods—I believe he mentioned shirting—often pyramids to $30, or 30 per cent of the manufacturer's price by the time the goods reach the consumer.

We need only look around us and do a little investigating to find that on most articles we have to buy from day to day government taxes constitute up to as high as 74 or 76 per cent of the consumer price. I need not go into details, because I am sure all hon. members have run into examples of the same thing.

This raises what I consider is a serious point for consideration, a point about which I have complained in this house on a number of occasions and about which I intend to complain now. During the last half century governments have moved in to prevent the people from realizing the benefits that should have accrued to them from technological improvements in machines and processes and manufacturing. As everyone who has studied the situation knows, through the use of machines things can be made today faster, cheaper and better than ever before.

But I ask this question: Can we buy them more cheaply than ever before? Certainly not. In the last fifty years improvements in machines have greatly reduced the real cost of production, but the benefits from the use of those machines have not been passed on to the consumer. Goods that are totally produced by machine today cost five or six times what they did in the day when they were totally made by the hand of man. The major reason for this is the fact that as savings have been effected by the improvement in processing and machines, governments have stepped in and have imposed scores of different kinds of hidden taxes at different levels of manufacture and production. As a result we have today sales taxes, processing taxes, turnover taxes, excise taxes of a dozen different varieties, and customs duties. All these things pyramid the costs of things to consumers.

Is it any wonder that under the circumstances the cost of living to the Canadian people is high? The people of Canada have a just right to complain about this high-handed and I would say tyrannous way in which the government has arrogated to itself, not only all the savings that have been effected in the cost of production through the use of machines but many more times these savings as well.

I have stated on a number of occasions and I repeat today my firm belief that the government is the main culprit in the high cost of living situation. However, I should like to point out that they are not alone responsible. Many Canadian industries have proceeded to price themselves out of future markets. Many of them have taken advantage of scarcities to charge all that the traffic will bear. That practice is reprehensible and I think the industries that have been guilty of it will in time come to see that it is not to their advantage let alone to the advantage of the Canadian people so to do.

I should like to point out another factor in this high cost of living situation that is rarely if ever considered. The C.C.F.-C.C.L. hook-up must shoulder a considerable share of the blame for the condition under which many Canadians actually suffer because their incomes are inadequate to enable them to pay the high prices for the things they need. The C.C.L. unions have been badly led and badly advised in their blind and determined drive for high wages. They have constantly refused to face facts, particularly the fact that when wages and salaries rise, costs also rise. That is inevitable. It is not just the amount of money that they get with which labour should be concerned; they should be concerned about the purchasing power that is available to them.

Mr. Irvine: Is it not true that wages were the last to rise? Is it not true that the cost of living rose so high that the unions had to ask for more wages?

Mr. Low: I shall have to answer part of that "yes" and part of it "no". To the latter part I would have to say, "Definitely no." I say that for various reasons. As I said, it is the total of the purchasing power available to labour that measures its prosperity or the lack of it, and not the monetary return they receive. I say that, had the C.C.L. unions—this is in answer to my good friend, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine)—been better advised and led, their first efforts would have been directed toward holding the price line by a means that would not have discouraged the incentive for all-out production; that would not have imposed an unbearable burden of taxes upon the people.

That could have been done by insisting that whatever increases were won to supplement salary or wage incomes should not be first passed through the channels of industry in the form of salary or wage increases that enter and inflate costs. They were encouraged by the C.C.F. to believe that they should strike for higher wages and that the government would be driven to reimpose over-all price controls without wage controls, thus making all wage increases a net gain to labour. What has been the result? Organized labour did go out after higher wages, but the government did not impose over-all price control. Indeed they claimed that they could not do so in peacetime without imposing wage ceilings at the same time. The result was that production costs went up in an alarming fashion and of course consumer prices spiraled to new heights.

Once more we have had in this country a demonstration of the cat going around and around in an effort to catch its own tail. I notice that the C.C.F. has not been so urgent of late in their demands for control.

Mr. Probe: Give us a chance.

Mr. Low: We will give you a chance. Nor have we heard so much about planned economy this session as we did in other sessions. In fact I have noted quite a significant change in this respect. In his contribution to the throne debate the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) spoke of planned objectives, but not once did he say a word about planned economy.

Mr. Coldwell: You cannot include everything in one speech.

Mr. Low: I realize that and the hon. member will have a chance. We used to hear a great deal from the C.C.F. about the superior economy which has been established in socialist Britain. I had the privilege of visiting Britain last autumn and was able to see something of the socialist planned economy and the results of the over-all government controls which have been imposed in that country. I certainly came away from Britain much more impressed with the far-reaching results of bureaucratic control than I was with any good that has been accomplished through them. Let me point out a few examples. These are only a few and I do not mean to be unfair to Britain when I mention them.

When we first got to Britain we found that according to a government order there was a ceiling of five shillings on meals in restaurants. However, we found that after we had ordered our meal and had eaten it, such as it was, they imposed a cover charge, a surcharge, a supercharge and a house charge in addition to the fairly substantial tip that we were expected to give.

Mr. Bryce: What kind of a dump were you in?

Mr. Low: I will have something to say about that pretty soon.

Mr. Irvine: You are speaking about the Savoy.

Mr. Low: I will have something to say about that, too. These charges usually brought the price of the three-course meal up to a grand total of twice the ceiling price, or an amount which would compare with what we would have to pay for a very good meal of four or five courses at the Chateau Laurier. I went into a small place which possibly the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) might call a joint. I do not know, but I tried to eat in various places. I noticed when I went into small luncheon places that a snack of fish and chips, a dark flour roll, and a cup of tea would cost about what the price of a good lunch would be at the Cavendish restaurant in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. Thatcher: That was caused by the war, not by the Labour government.

Mr. Low: Then what about milk in this planned economy? So much has been said about the wonderful things they are doing about milk, and I acknowledge they have done some good things. I understand that today the children are getting more milk than many of them have ever had in their lives. I think that is quite true, but the older people, of course, are rationed very severely, and receive just a modicum in a week. This is the thing that I wish to point out. I found by staying with a family in the country for a little while that families could get an extra supply of milk if they dug down and put up a fairly substantial tip to the milkman, provided they could afford the tip. I am only pointing out to you—

Mr. Coldwell: What kind of family were you visiting, black marketers?

Mr. Low: No, I was visiting a nephew of mine in West-Cliffe on Sea. I found that ordinary workingmen with families knew that it was a common practice, and that they could get more milk if they dug down for a penny, a shilling, or more.

Mr. Coldwell: My relatives are not black marketers.

Mr. Low: This was not black marketing. It was the regular thing.

Mr. Coldwell: The buyer is just as bad as the seller.

Mr. Low: I do not know, but everybody is doing it.

Mr. Coldwell: No, they are not.

Mr. Sinclair: Even Belcher.

Mr. Thatcher: It is not the fault of the Labour government.

Mr. Low: It is the fault of controls. Meat is very scarce in that country, and they are having a difficult time. Consumers can buy the occasional joint at a subsidized price that is quite reasonable. I noted, for example, that they could buy certain Canadian beef at from 36 cents to 40 cents a pound, and we could not buy it for that amount by any means. Taxes, of course, have to be high for all of the people to take care of the subsidy. The amount of meat they can buy is wholly inadequate. Therefore they turn to other things, fish, fowl and sausage. The sausage is wonderful, Mr. Speaker. I must say a word about the sausage.

Mr. Sinclair: Oatmeal.

Mr. Low: It was something in casings that tasted very much like a mixture of oatmeal and sawdust, although I am quite sure it was not sawdust.

An hon. Member: Haggis.

Mr. Low: I have tasted haggis that was worse.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Low: But the price which they had to pay for the substitute for the real thing, this phony sausage, was away out of proportion to the value of the contents. That is just an example of the situation that one gets into in a controlled economy. In order to supplement their meat supply under the subsidized plan people would turn to fowl, but I noticed that an ordinary roasting chicken cost around $4. What chance would they have under such circumstances? Taking it all in all, I should like to say that, according to my observation, British bureaucracy is experiencing real difficulty in the enforcement of the controls which they have.

I observed also that when the general run of the British people got through providing themselves with the bare necessities of what I thought was a rather lacklustre and monotonous living, they had nothing left to put away for a rainy day. In that respect they are hardly any different from the general run of the Canadian people except that we in this country are much more fortunate in the variety and the quality of the things we buy.

Mr. Thatcher: That is not because the government is better.

Mr. Low: I was not saying that the government was better. I am telling you what the situation was as I found it there, and it cannot be denied.

Mr. Irvine: Oh, yes, it can. Don't ever get away with that idea.

Mr. Low: I think there is no doubt that in Great Britain all-out efforts to produce have been discouraged by the bureaucratic controls employed by the socialist government. Regimentation has been the poison that has killed the spirit of every nation down through history. It has killed the spirit of every nation which has imposed regimentation and bureaucratic control. I am convinced that regimentation and bureaucratic control will destroy Great Britain if the people suffer them to remain a major part of their economic life for very long.

The point I wish to emphasize is that there is nothing in the socialist British system of a controlled economy that commends itself for introduction in Canada. On the other hand, no one can deny that some worthwhile things have been done towards ensuring social justice to a good many people of that country. Any honest person must make that admission.

Mr. Thatcher: Who won the by-election yesterday?

Mr. Low: There again I cannot tell who won the by-election.

Mr. Thatcher: The Labour government did.

Mr. Low: That has nothing whatever to do with it. The improvements, which they have made in social security for many of their people, have been things which could have been done just as well in other ways without involving bureaucratic control and regimentation. For their particular emergency, and there is no question that they have been in a state of emergency, doubtless some controls have been necessary; but in England and Scotland I met many well-informed people who believe that the final objective of the socialist intellectuals, who are now in control of the policy of the Labour government, is the complete sovietization of the people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: That is absolute rot, undiluted rot.

Mr. Low: I repeat that in my journey through England and Scotland I met a good many people who sincerely and earnestly said they believe that the policy being advocated by the intellectual socialists who are in control of the policy of the Labour government is the final sovietization of the people of Great Britain.

An hon. Member: Spoken like a fascist.

Mr. Low: More of my hon. friend's polished remarks. Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, what I have just stated does not seem to be the desire of the bona fide trade unionists who have come up through the ranks of apprentice and journeyman, and into the master class. I spoke to a good many of them, and it appears to me that there is a growing and serious divergence of views between the two divisions of government supporters, the intellectual socialist who thinks he has an itch to control everybody's business, and the true trade unionist who is an honourable fellow who came up through the ranks in an honourable way.

An hon. Member: Where do you stand?

Mr. Knowles: I am laughing, too.

Mr. Low: I have not heard the C.C.F. talking about controls very much or very ardently during this session.

Mr. Coldwell: Give us time. Two weeks on Newfoundland.

Mr. Low: Perhaps in the course of the years they have been giving some second thoughts—

Mr. Knowles: Tell us something about free money.

Mr. Low: —to this subject, just as one of their brain-trusters has done. I refer to Professor Frank W. Underhill, the distinguished Canadian socialist philosopher and co-author of the book "Social Planning for Canada", which our friends have been putting before the public for some years.

In an article written for the Canadian Forum of August, 1947, Professor Underhill had this to say:

> —and when socialists keep on harping about controls as the essence of their policy, they lend plausibility to the charges that they are really frustrated bureaucrats with an itch to manage other people's business for them.

At another point in the same article, he says:

> Still, the socialists should ease up on their persistent talk about controls. What the world needs chiefly at present is enterprise and imagination, initiative and vision. The defenders of capitalism are quite right in maintaining that these qualities were given full scope in the capitalism of the past and that this was the reason for the great material progress of recent generations. We still need enterprise.

Those are the words of the brain-truster of the socialist party of this country.

Mr. Coldwell: Read the next paragraph.

Mr. Low: It is evident that he has done a good deal of thinking since the time he wrote the book "Social Planning for Canada" or helped with the writing of it.

Today, the government is asking for an extension of certain control orders and regulations that were imposed by order in council during a real war emergency. It is not possible, sir, to get a full picture of the government's request from consideration of this one resolution, No. 5 on the order paper. To get a complete picture it is necessary to consider, along with resolution No. 5, the resolution on foreign exchange; the resolution on the Agricultural Products Act; the resolution on the export and import of fish and fish containers; and resolution No. 6 in connection with the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act.

If the powers requested in these resolutions are granted, the government will then have control over foreign exchange, agricultural products, rentals and price ceilings on flour, bread, butter, citrus fruits, imported canned citrus fruit juices, certain imported fresh vegetables, onions, certain fresh fruits, molasses and sugar. In addition to that, there will be steel control, timber control and price control of certain steel products. This represents a sizeable centralization of power under present-day conditions.

When these various resolutions are before the house, I take it the minister concerned will make a statement to justify the request contained in those resolutions. There should be justification, particularly, of the continuation of control by the procedure which is being followed, namely, by resolution and continuing orders in council, rather than by specific acts of this parliament.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say that the people of this country are going to be bitterly disappointed if the government fails to supplement these orders, which are now in the form of resolutions, by positive action aimed at reducing the cost of living. I declare there is no better place to start than in their own taxation structure, especially the iniquitous sales tax. This tax is not an economic necessity. It is an instrument of policy which pushes up the cost of living by fully 20 per cent. At the polls, sir, the people of Canada are going to show their extreme displeasure if this tax and a number of other nuisance taxes are not abolished. If at this session this government does not make a substantial effort to bring down the cost of living to a reasonable level by eliminating the sales tax and using the modest subsidies which we have proposed from time to time on selected items used from day to day by families, which subsidies could be paid for not out of taxation but with interest-free money, then the people of the country will be disappointed. With a single stroke the government can cure the major cause of the high cost of living. The people of this country are demanding action along the lines I have suggested, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. H. W. Timmins (Parkdale): The resolution before the house this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, reads as follows:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

In 1947 we had before us the first one of these orders for continuing the emergency powers that had been granted the government during the war. At that particular time, I believe there were some fifty-seven of them and the Minister of Justice of the day told us each one of these controls contained a principle. It is the principle contained in these control measures of which I wish to speak this afternoon.

A similar debate dealing with the continuation of controls was held in 1948. Last week, on the 7th of February, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) gave us some indication of the controls it was proposed to continue. We have not been told whether it is proposed to continue them for one year or two years. At that time, in dealing with one of the controls, steel control, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, as reported at page 317 of Hansard:

> We have been importing roughly 30 per cent of all the steel that is used, and those imports have been obtained with a great deal of difficulty.

For a few moments, Mr. Speaker, I propose to deal with the matter of steel control. I am quite prepared to admit that what the minister says is true. We have been importing 30 per cent of our steel and he has had a great deal of trouble in obtaining it. As I see it, however, that is his job as Minister of Trade and Commerce, and probably he has done a very good job. In respect of this measure of steel control, we have also the continuing powers of the steel controller, which is quite a different thing, so far as I am concerned. It is about the continuation of those powers that I wish to speak.

Through the press, the steel controller has reported what he considers our position to be in respect to steel in 1949. In the Globe and Mail on the 27th of January last, he said:

> Makers of all steel products from cans to cars and bolts to bridges can look for steel supplies to be no better and no worse in 1949 than they were in 1948.

Then he goes on to say:

> Canadian production this year should be up by about 75,000 product tons from last year's 2,300,000, but the import from United States will be down by about 120,000. The difference which makes the outlook "about the same for 1949," will be made up by increased supplies from Belgium, Austria, the United Kingdom, and other European sources.

I suppose we have to depend upon the steel controller for information concerning our position in 1949 and what provision we are going to make for industry to proceed as it should. I suppose he ought to know the situation at first hand. But on the other hand his report is not the only one that appears in the papers. The Canadian Manufacturers Association's special committee on steel met within the last month. They issued a statement to the effect that, as to United States mills, there are positive signs that the pressure for delivery of steel is easing up, and that the prospect is that by the third quarter of 1949 a buyers' market will develop in some steel products. It is this matter of steel that the government is seeking to control in this bill. The quotation continues:

> While there has been no apparent move on the part of the United States or Canadian governments to enlarge the nominal Canadian import quota of 200,000 to 220,000 product tons of steel per quarter, the only actual control exercised over imported steel in Canada has been the rather loose one on structural steel.

That is a report from people who are in the business. It is a report from a committee of steel manufacturers. They tell us that by the third quarter of 1949 steel will be easier. In fact, they go on to say that there is quite a chance that the production and use of steel may be almost on an even footing. Just yesterday another report came from New York through the Associated Press. I should like to quote from it:

Steel people believe that the next sixty days "will answer a lot of questions" as to extent of demand for steel, the "Iron Age" metalworking trade weekly said.

Noting that some American companies are planning capacity operations into June, the publication said: "They don't say June will be the turning point, they simply are unwilling to guess too far ahead."

Going to the second last paragraph of the article, I find it reads as follows:

For the fifth consecutive week, steel production in the United States has been maintained at an annual rate of more than 97 million tons. The first quarter of this year, the publication said, probably will see an all-time record for production of steel.

It continues: "Every week the industry continues this tremendous production pace it moves the market factors of supply and demand nearer to the point of balance. Some people inside and outside the steel industry are beginning to wonder what will happen when that precarious point is reached—possibly during this year."

So I am pointing out to the minister and through him to the steel controller that, as a matter of fact, there are in the industry people who seem to think that during this year we shall reach a point where we shall have not only in the United States but here in Canada sufficient steel for our purposes.

How is this control exercised here in Canada? Last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) told us, when he was dealing with the matter of the import and export bill, that there was no restriction on steel coming through from the United States, that we would take all the steel we could get. I understand, and the minister will correct me if I am wrong, that the practice is for the manufacturing concerns in the United States to ship their steel directly across to those of our Canadian buyers who wish to buy steel from them, and that in that respect there is little or no control; we take all the steel that we can get, with this one exception of structural steel. I believe the Department of Trade and Commerce, under the export and import act, exercises some control over the fabricator of steel and says that this steel may go to such and such a project and that other steel shall go to such and such another project.

Last year when I was speaking on this matter I asked the minister if there would be steel for theatres, and I believe his answer was that there would not be. I also asked him if there would be steel for office buildings, and I remember pointing out one particular office building that was going up. The answer by the minister was that steel would not be allowed for that project. As I pass the building from day to day, however, and see it progressing, I see that it has steel and that it is an office building. If we are to have control in respect of steel in our own country, there should be some formula or some plan so that we might know who may have steel, in what quantities, and for what purposes.

The emergency control order which we saw last year, and which I presume may be presented again in somewhat the same fashion this year, is a fairly all-embracing one, giving wide powers. As it is said—and I believe it to be true—that we are getting to the point where steel in Canada before this year is out will be in sufficient quantity that we can do what our manufacturers and our people want to do, it seems to me that there should be some relief from these controls instead of a further measure of increase of them. Before the debate is over I should like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to reaffirm what he said last year about what was needed and what kind of permit would be given with respect to the delivery of structural steel.

Within the industry itself there are some controls exercised by either the steel controller or the Department of Trade and Commerce—and I was under the impression that it was through the Department of Trade and Commerce—whereby, as the minister said as reported at page 317 of Hansard:

We are also moving semi-finished steel from the Dominion Steel and Coal Company at Sydney to Hamilton, to the extent of about 10,000 tons per month. That 28,000 tons of steel, which cannot be finished at Algoma or at Sydney, would ordinarily go for export and be finished in other countries. That was the pre-war history of the surpluses of those two plants. By moving that steel to Hamilton 28,000 tons per month of additional basic steel are turned into finished products.

I think that is all to the good. It helps us to keep up employment in our own country and it helps the industries to work between each other and complement their various plants; and I suppose to some extent the price at which the finishing is done is fixed through the control order. But the fact of the matter is that under these controls the situation is getting to the point where a plant may survive or perish depending on how the controls are exercised. I was in a plant in which they were doing what I presume would be called metal stamping. I found that they were working only at about 50 per cent capacity because, as they said, they could not get sufficient steel to carry on with, and it was all subject to what they could get from Canadian firms through the controller of steel. They also told me that they had not been able to take an order in almost a year because they did not know what the future was to be in respect of production.

Mr. Howe: May I ask the hon. member if he knows where the stampings were to be delivered? Were they to be delivered in Canada or outside of Canada?

Mr. Timmins: It was my impression that they were being delivered in Canada.

Mr. Howe: I think the hon. member is mistaken.

Mr. Timmins: The point I wanted to make was this. When I asked for permission to use the material and to give the names of the manufacturers who were involved in this matter, I found that there was a great deal of resistance on their part to being quoted in any way. This is no reflection on the minister, but the fact of the matter is that the industry is so much in the hands of the Department of Trade and Commerce and of the steel controller that they just could not afford to be complaining openly for fear that their steel might be curtailed to a point where they could not carry on. When we get the steel industry of the country in that position, then we are getting to the point where there is dictation. I am not suggesting to the minister that he is dictating, but I do say that we are in a trend, and the control trend is increasing to such a point that if we do not watch ourselves this whole industry will be under control. If one refers back to the control measure of last year, and examines the controls that are contained in that measure, he will easily discover that there is hardly anything the controller of steel cannot do. He can even go out and prospect for iron ore. He can run a smelting mill; he can run a melting mill; he can take possession of steel wherever he finds it. He can sell it for whatever price he wishes; he can run a refinery, a foundry and a warehouse. He can fix and regulate prices. There is hardly anything that he cannot do. He can do all this at a time when indications would seem to show that we are coming out of a shortage of steel.

I was disturbed when I read what the controller of steel had to say the other day as reported in the press. He said:

> I do not wish to detract from the magnificent increases in production which have been achieved by the Canadian steel industry since 1939, but merely to point out that if Canada is now fully developed from the viewpoint of steel production, the United States and Great Britain are hopelessly overdeveloped.

He went on to say:

> The United States does not take the latter view. The United States is prepared to give assistance to expansion, and "if the industry is not prepared to expand with governmental assistance, the expansion will be effected by the government without recourse to the industry."

I do not believe that these words were used with respect to Canada. I believe they were used with respect to the United States, but a little later on referring to Canada he said:

> As for government assistance, he thought it unlikely the government "would go into the steel business by creating any plants of its own but would make loans for the expansion plans of others."

Then he went on to say:

> Every ton of steel made in Canada has a definite home at least sixty days before it rolls off the production line. For this reason, if the flow of steel to a particular project must be increased, it can be done only at the expense of other users.
> "It is for that reason," he said, "that those enterprises which are being supported by the government have been confined to a small number of projects of a national character."

This quotation from the controller of steel would seem to indicate that there is a trend to increase the control of steel. Perhaps some of the powers that we had in the bill last year and which are to be brought forward this year will lead us into new fields in which the government will be taking an active part. So far as I am concerned, this is a matter which, just as quickly as the government can do it, should be left to the people who are in the enterprise. If we are ever to get this country on its feet the one hope that we have of obtaining enough United States dollars is in the production of iron ore and the fabrication of steel in this country. The day will probably come, and I hope it will come soon, when this industry will be the saviour of the economy of Canada. I hope that by its own efforts it will bring itself to the point where we shall produce sufficient iron and steel so that we shall have enough United States dollars to carry on with. When we come to the bill itself I hope we shall see that a great many of these powers that were contained in the bill of 1948 will not be carried forward in the 1949 bill. I hope that a great number of these powers which the controller of steel has been using up to this time, or could fall back on, may be discarded.

I understand that we are to have a new controller before very long. Perhaps this will be the time at which we should make these reductions in control because we do not want the new controller to begin his duties with the same thoughts in mind as the present controller seems to have, namely, that the government might get into the steel business.

I should like now to say a word or two about rental control. I presume we shall have the same bill before us this year as we had last year. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has already said what his proposals in the matter were going to be. At page 316 of Hansard he said:

> As the house is aware the government announced some time ago that it proposed to ask parliament to authorize the continuance of rental controls until March 31, 1950, and that provision would be made in the order continuing that control to provide that the dominion government would withdraw from that field in any province where the province requested that it do so, and that parliament would also be asked to make provision for paying the costs for one year of rental controls in any province which might see fit to exercise control in that particular field.

The minister knows full well that rental control, whether by good judgment or bad, was brought about by this government in 1945. He knows that the solution does not lie in throwing the responsibility onto someone else when all the mechanism of dealing with the housing situation, which is at the bottom of it all, rests with the federal government itself. As a matter of fact, how could the provinces hope to do anything in the realm of housing, which is our major problem today, when timber control is entirely in the hands of the federal government? In addition to that, steel control is in the hands of the federal government, and out of steel control emanates the production or non-production of bathtubs, basins, hardware, soil pipe, furnaces, and so on. All these things are under the control of the federal government. Further than that, building priorities are a subject matter that the federal government has stuck close to and still holds on to in order to produce the type of house that they think should be produced in Canada. So long as these elements are in the hands of the federal government it is useless for the minister to say that we shall turn this over to some other government who will do the job from that point on. As a matter of fact, the federal government has no housing program for Canada. It simply stumbles on, from year to year, telling us two or three times each year how many houses have been produced in that year, mostly by private enterprise, and then telling us that next year so many more houses will be produced. If the government would take this problem by the throat, shake it a bit, and then shake themselves, we would probably have some houses built in Canada. When we had the houses we might consider doing something about this rent control measure. Until such time however as the government really gets hot about this matter of producing houses, the matter of rent control will stand where it is.

It would not be so bad if we did not see so many anomalies under rent control. For instance, I believe the people of Canada, by reason of rent control regulations, in a sense are losing faith in themselves in the matter of looking after their own housing rights and responsibilities. For instance, how many tens of thousands of Canadian people have had to look to someone else to provide them with the kind of accommodation they have been unable to produce themselves. And there are thousands of others still living in accommodation not fit for human habitation.

Further when the government seeks to put through amendments to rental orders, I say it is in duty bound to see that it makes workable amendments, instead of the sloppy and inefficient amendments which do harm to hundreds, perhaps thousands, of good Canadian citizens. For instance in November of 1948 an amendment was made to the rental order which provided that an owner who had been owner of a property on November 1, 1947, could give six months' notice to the tenant to vacate, provided the landlord needed the accommodation for himself.

That was a sloppy amendment. It has struck more fear and terror to and caused more anguish in the hearts of more people throughout this country than any other provision in any amendment to a control measure. As a matter of fact, when the tenant receives such six months' notice he does not have a chance in those six months to find out whether the landlord actually needs the property, and is going to be able to prove his need before a judge or not. The result is, there is no way for the tenant to know whether he is going to be put out at the end of six months, or whether the notice is invalid and he should pay no attention to it.

The fact of the matter is that, after two or three months, not being able to get any satisfaction, and not knowing what his position is, he tries to find ways and means of getting other accommodation, often of an inferior type, when, as a matter of fact, if at the beginning he had been given an opportunity upon receipt of the notice to go before a judge and have the matter decided, he could have known whether, at the end of six months, he would have to move or not.

In addition to that, the amendment does not show in what legal jurisdiction the decision is to be made. There is no commissioner, such as applies in respect to other regulations under the rental orders. The decision would probably be made by a county court judge; but the county court judge does not get his authority from the rental order, but rather from the landlord and tenancy act of the province in which the tenant may be living.

So that, in respect of probably a thousand notices now being given, there are a thousand families in Toronto who do not know today whether or not they can be put out six months hence. Those of us in the House of Commons have some responsibilities in respect to what amendments are made by the minister's department. To be a party to the sort of amendment I have described does not reflect any credit upon the minister or upon us.

By reason of the various amendments made to the rental order, without any thought to the housing situation, in Toronto today there are about four thousand people who on the first of May or June next will be evicted, if judges make orders against them, and who will be forced to try to find some other accommodation. This happens at a time when the government takes no responsibility whatsoever in respect to a real housing program.

Last year those of us who spoke on rental control suggested that, if this control was to be continued, some further relief should be given to veterans. Perhaps it was intended that the amendment of 1948, of which I have just spoken, would give that relief. I do believe however that at this time the minister ought to give thought to bringing that relief to the veteran who, prior to December 31, 1948, had acquired a home and paid for it, and who finds it necessary to get into that home. It seems to me that in all circumstances a veteran, on six months' notice, ought to have the opportunity to get into his own home, if he purchased it prior to December 31, 1948. I suggest the minister should give some thought to this matter.

Finally, speaking generally in respect to control of prices, we know that just this week the court of appeal sitting in Toronto handed down a decision in the McGinn case. That was a case in which a hardware merchant had been convicted of selling nails in contravention of section 8 of the wartime prices and trade board order at a price that was higher than was reasonable and just. In that particular instance, the man dealing in the nails —I believe he was a builder who dealt in nails rather than, in the strict sense, a hardware merchant—made a profit of $3,661.48 on 1,532 kegs of nails, when the average profit would have been $965.16.

I do not believe the court of appeal handed down a written judgment. My information is that the judgment was delivered orally. It may be that someone took down in shorthand the effect of the judgment but, as I say, I understand it was delivered orally. Perhaps reasons for judgment will now be forthcoming. The fact of the matter seems to be, however, that the court of appeal felt that the expression "higher than is reasonable or just" is so general in its application, and lacked such definition, that it could not possibly permit the conviction to stand.

Last year the government told us that in respect of control of rising prices two remedies could be had. The first was that under the Combines Investigation Act a person who did not play the game in the matter of prices could be brought to book or that, under the wartime prices and trade board order, there was provision to look after the man who was a shyster and who took advantage of the situation to make exorbitant profits. Now we seem to be down to only the Combines Investigation Act. In that connection I was interested to read again the conclusions of the committee on prices which sat last year, to see if, having regard to the decision in the McGinn case, the Canadian public could take any comfort out of the committee's conclusion with regard to prices.

Conclusion 11 of the committee reads:

> The committee realizes that in the long run the federal government may be faced with constitutional difficulties in regard to its operations in the field of prices. This is clearly a matter in which, within the Canadian federal structure, responsibility normally rests with the provincial governments, although the federal government, under wartime emergency conditions, was compelled to take action in this field.
> The committee is therefore forced to the conclusion that the solution of the problem of the adequate protection of the Canadian consumer will require the co-operation of the provincial governments with the federal government by taking the measures required in meeting their responsibilities.

That just lands us simply nowhere. I suggest to the minister in connection with the McGinn case, either that it be appealed right away, or that he see to it that the wartime prices and trade board order be given some teeth with respect to prices.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this measure with regard to our domestic policy is the most important measure we have had before us this session. Under the authority of this resolution it is proposed to introduce a bill which will continue certain orders and regulations that were exercised during the war. Of course the principal part will be that dealing with prices and the authority under which price control has been exercised.

I am glad the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is in his seat. Although the resolution is in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), in this case he is only the innocent bystander—he is only giving the bride away. The main proposal has been made by the Minister of Finance and it is chiefly to him I wish to refer when I refer to the government.

About a year ago this house set up a special committee to investigate the price situation in this country. There were those in this group who said that it would be a waste of money and time to set up a committee which would only make excuses for the policies of the government. That committee, together with the royal commission which is still operating and which is about to make its report, will cost this country about $100,000.

One of the duties of parliament at this time is to assess the work done by the special committee—we have not the means available to assess the work of the commission as yet—to look at its proposals or recommendations and decide whether the government is doing or has done anything to carry out the recommendations of the committee or to warrant the time and money expended in gathering that information.

I contend that the government has made no attempt whatsoever to carry out the recommendations of the prices committee which worked so hard under difficult conditions. The Minister of Finance is the chief culprit in making a complete farce of the work of that committee. I was astounded when this matter first came before the house to see the Minister of Finance blithely get up in his place and give us a preview of the bill which is to follow this resolution. That was a most unusual course to follow because on other occasions when we were anxious to find out something about bills that were to come at a future time we were told, "Oh, no, we cannot tell you anything about the bill until the resolution is passed." On this occasion, with only the slightest encouragement, the minister was apparently glad to give us a running account of what is to be contained in the bill.

Mr. Abbott: It was just my naturally frank nature.

Mr. Zaplitny: Perhaps. Although I am not of a particularly suspicious nature I wonder if it was not a bit of appeasement; I wonder if the minister was not trying to forestall the hue and cry that is bound to be raised in this house and elsewhere over the government control of prices and its carrying on in a bureaucratic manner. I think the minister was just a little too anxious to get out from under. He was just a little bit anxious to say to the powers that be, "Do not worry yourselves too much; this bill is going to be even less insignificant than the bill of a year ago." He said that it was going to cover a restricted field and a rapidly diminishing one. In other words, this is going to be a decontrol bill.

After having read the report of the special committee and the publicity in connection with the royal commission, many people were under the misapprehension that something would be done. The royal commission carried on a tremendous task in gathering material and hearing witnesses and no doubt will be making recommendations. But before the report of that commission is even tabled in this house, the government is telling it that its work has been wasted, that it has made up its mind not to impose controls but to propose a decontrol bill which would cover a restricted field and a rapidly diminishing one.

Mr. Abbott: Does my hon. friend suggest that the commission was set up to recommend controls?

Mr. Zaplitny: If the commission was not set up to make recommendations, I wonder why it was set up at all?

Mr. Abbott: I am asking the hon. member if he thinks it was set up to suggest controls?

Mr. Zaplitny: I did not say that. I said that even before the tabling of the commission's report the government is telling the house and the commission what it proposes to do; it is telling them that it is going to present a decontrol bill.

Before referring to the actual report of the special committee on prices, I should like to consider for a time the situation in the country, which is creating concern in the minds of the people of Canada. I have never argued in this house or elsewhere that high prices as such were a burden upon the people, or that inflation in itself was the chief evil in this country. High prices or inflation are burdensome only to the extent that they create injustice in the distribution of prices across the country.

If there is a general rise in prices affecting all producers and all other people equally, then the only harm that is done is the inconvenience of having to carry a bigger pocketbook. But when the prices of the products of some people are going down while the prices of the things they have to buy are going up, a real injustice is created. That is where price control comes in.

By that proposition it follows that price control is not, as some people seem to think, merely a matter of keeping prices down. It is a matter of keeping prices properly adjusted so that no injustice shall be done to any occupational group in the country. That is the responsibility of the government, whether they admit it or not. There is one occupational group in this country, the primary producing group which would include farmers, fishermen and ranchers, that is seriously concerned at this time because it is beginning to see a trend similar to what happened approximately twenty years ago.

If any one had said in 1929 that it was necessary to have price control many people would have laughed, would have said, "What for?" At that time prices were quite reasonable. The primary producers were receiving a fair return for their products in relation to the prices of the manufactured products they had to buy. But in a brief space of time what happened? I have the figures here to show the double-barreled trend that came upon us so suddenly that the people were completely unprepared. At that time we had what is now known as a depression. Some people blamed that on spots on the sun while others claimed it was due to certain mystic causes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was in socialist countries as well.

Mr. Zaplitny: Would you name those socialist countries?

Mr. Diefenbaker: New Zealand and Australia.

Mr. Zaplitny: My friend had better study his history as well as his law books because in 1929, 1930 and 1931 they did not have socialist governments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But after they came into power the people still suffered.

Mr. Zaplitny: The Labour government of New Zealand did not come into power until 1935. Now that we have our history straightened out let us go on. There was a double-barreled trend that hit the country all at once, and particularly the primary producers, with the prices of farm products taking a sudden drop and the prices of manufactured products leisurely taking their time about coming down, and in some cases not coming down at all but going up. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will remember the time when the price of wheat was dropping by ten or twelve cents a day, and at the same time the prices of farm implements were actually increasing. I have figures here which illustrate the situation as to prices for cattle and hogs. The table is as follows:

Cattle and Hog Prices, December, 1933

	Per 100 lbs.
Hogs	$5.43
Beef Steers	3.00
Cows	1.45
Bulls	1.38

You could feed a multitude of people with the price of a cow at $1.45 per hundred pounds. In 1934 the Robert Simpson Company was doing fairly well. I have figures showing that on certain types of clothing they made profits ranging from 101 per cent to 374 per cent at the same time that farmers were giving away their produce for practically nothing. In some cases the cost of transportation was more than the value of the animal shipped.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Was that gross or net profit?

Mr. Zaplitny: That is the percentage of profit in relation to cost.

Mr. Merritt: Gross profit.

An hon. Member: What are you quoting from?

Mr. Zaplitny: I am glad that question was asked. The figures are taken from the report of the special committee on price spreads and mass buying. The chairman of that committee was Hon. H. H. Stevens, who was appointed by the Bennett administration.

Mr. Garson: It is markup, is it not?

Mr. Zaplitny: That is the percentage of profit in relation to cost. It is the markup, and that would be the gross profit. When we are talking about gross profit and net profit it might be just as well to quote the figures of total farm income for comparable years. I cited the year 1934 in relation to the profits of the Robert Simpson Company. According to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics the gross income per farm in Canada was $535, and the net income was, if you please, $98 per farm.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): If you take the total income it makes it even worse. I think it was only $86 million.

Mr. Coldwell: That makes it worse.

Mr. Zaplitny: The reason I am putting these figures before the house is to show that price control is not merely nor chiefly a matter of holding prices down. It is a matter of adjusting prices in order to make them fair to all concerned. As I mentioned on a previous occasion not so long ago, the main objective of the primary producers of the country, as expressed through their organization, the Canadian federation of agriculture, is the stabilization of their position. Farmers today are prepared to carry their share of the load, but they do not wish to see their prices diminishing while other prices are still climbing, and thus be given an unfair share in carrying the burden of the country's economy. I think that is a reasonable position to take. It should be one of the chief objectives of the house to work out a program under which agriculture will be stabilized in the future, and without a measure of price control I do not know how it can be done.

I want to say with all sincerity that when I read the various party platforms I find much in their proposals for agriculture with which I can agree; but frankly I fail to see how any of them can be carried out unless we have a system of price control in order to stabilize the economy of our country. All parties start out by saying something like this: "We believe in giving the farmers a fair share of the national income." How are you going to do that under a system of free enterprise if the trend is the same as it was in the period of ten years from 1929 to 1939? Under free enterprise what government of that day could have given the farmers a fair share of the national income, and what government made any attempt to do so? Therefore, if we are going to carry out the pledges to the Canadian people that we have made in our election platforms, we must carry them through to the point where we are willing to accept responsibility in the house for providing and setting up machinery which will do what the various party platforms say they will do for agriculture.

To return to the report of the special committee on price spreads and mass buying, the chief question that arises is, who is responsible for the increase in prices. I am not going to say that all the responsibility lies in one quarter, but I do say that the chief villain in the drama is the profits that have been taken by various industries. There are those who will challenge that statement; there are others who will say that profits are not the main cause of price increases. Let me refer them to a newspaper clipping I have of a public opinion poll taken in July, 1947. The heading is: "Big profits are pointed to as the number one price villian." On reading it I was interested to find that they not only gave figures about public opinion on the question as a whole, but they also broke it down by political parties. I am not saying it is perfectly accurate, but it gives us a general picture. The question was asked: "Do you think the main cause of high prices in Canada is high wages, big profits or some other cause?" Fifty-five per cent answered, "big profits". More than half of the people of Canada said that big profits were the cause of high prices. When we come down to the party groupings we find that 54 per cent of the Liberals questioned admitted that the main cause was high profits. Forty-five per cent of the Conservatives questioned said the main cause was high profits, while only 35 per cent of the Conservatives said that it was high wages. Then it goes on to show that 72 per cent of the C.C.F. said that the main cause was high profits. That gives us an indication at least of the general public opinion on the question in 1947. I believe that nothing that has happened since that time has had any effect in changing their opinion. If anything, their opinion would be reinforced, because on the whole profits in 1948 were higher than they were in 1947.

What did the committee on price spreads and mass buying say? First of all I will quote from page 4 of the report which is in the section dealing with their findings. I read:

> In its investigations the committee found that, in certain instances, opportunists, taking advantage of the special conditions existing, made unprecedented profits. While it may be true in some cases that such profits were of a non-recurring type, there is no doubt that the high prices that produced these profits did raise the cost of living at that time.

That is a very mild way of putting it, but it is admitted that the profits involved were the cause in that instance of prices going up.

Then, on page 8, under recommendations, the committee says:

> The government should give consideration to the desirability and practicability of restricting price rises by special taxation of unreasonable profits.

If they were not unreasonable profits, why would the committee recommend a special tax on them. It is a clear indication that the committee felt very uneasy about the unreasonable profits that were being taken.

On the tenth page of that report, the committee makes a direct recommendation asking the government to consider the reimposition of certain control measures and the application of some measure of temporary subsidy. The committee which sat during last session made that direct recommendation. This committee cost the country $88,000, and the government has already announced, through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), that it is tossing the report aside and is not going to act upon it.

We go further through the report and on page 24 we find these words:

> —there can be no doubt from the experience of the committee that unreasonable and unjust profits and prices have been brought to light.

On page 25, we find these words:

> —there were indications also that it represented in some exceptional cases a selfish attitude of trying to get the most out of the public without regard to the well-being of the consumer. This contention is based on the theory that so long as the public will pay a higher price, a higher price may be charged.

This is a reference to the attitude taken by various companies on the question of what constituted a fair price. The president of Canada Packers in his classic reply said that the price policy of the company was to buy as cheaply as possible and sell as high as possible.

An hon. Member: What are you doing?

Mr. Zaplitny: That seems to be the attitude all the way through. Some members ask me, "Is there anyone who has not that attitude?" A little while ago we heard from the member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who told us it was a most reprehensible thing for anyone to take advantage of the condition in the country by extracting as much as possible in the way of profits. If that is a proper thing to do, as some members seem to think, if that is the proper way to carry on under a private enterprise system, then we might as well say so and throw it wide open.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Will the hon. member permit a question? Is that not the way he operates his own farm or his own business?

Mr. Zaplitny: I am not going to argue about my private business. As it happens, I do not buy or sell things. The main point, however, is whether we are going to accept the proposition that it is proper for any industry or business in this country to gouge the customer as much as possible. If we accept that principle, there is no further argument. There is no need for this bill at all. On the other hand, if we accept the principle that our first concern should be for the public, that human rights take priority over property rights, then it is necessary for this house to provide legislation which will keep prices at a proper level. We can take one stand or the other.

When in doubt one likes to seek expert advice. This time, I am going to call a witness who, I think, will be acceptable to all members of the house in spite of some of the unkind things that have been said about him in the past. I still believe he was a faithful and loyal citizen doing a fine job in a difficult position. I refer to the former chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, Mr. Donald Gordon. During 1946, he made several broadcasts in which he frankly put before the Canadian people the choice they must make and the things that must be kept in mind in making that choice with relation to price control generally. I should like to quote a remark he made on the 1st of November, 1946.

People that want price increases sometimes suggest that removing the controls at this time would not result in any serious advance in the price level. That is sheer nonsense. That sort of view is the kind of logic used by an ostrich when he hides his head in the sand.

I am not going to make any comment on that remark, but I shall go to the next quotation, which is from a speech made on the 15th of November, 1946.

So, we Canadians have to make our choice—to decide whether the readjustments needed in present abnormal conditions should be controlled or uncontrolled. If our choice is to let the readjustment take place without government supervision or control, then we must be prepared to accept sudden and sharp advances in prices of many necessities and a condition of near-chaos in the field of shelter.

Those words were borne out by the argument of the hon. member who spoke just before me. I continue with the quotation:

We must also be prepared to take the very serious risk—in my view, it is a certainty—of a following slump in prices, in employment, in incomes and especially in farm incomes. Every lesson of the past shows how booms are followed by slumps. It seems to me that this fact must be one of the main certainties we must all have before us because assumptions to the contrary have been so consistently disproven.

In those few lines he not only pointed out, as far back as 1946, that if price controls were removed we would have to expect immediately the higher prices and hardships which we have been experiencing in the past few years; he also warned that, when the peak had been reached and passed, we must expect a sudden slump in prices in this country. We in western Canada who have seen the years of depression and the effect they had on the farm population know very well what he means by a sudden slump in farm income. Any member coming from the prairies or any member coming from a farming community should take that warning seriously, because as surely as we allow profiteering to run hog-wild, as surely as we allow industry to form combines and create monopolies in order to create artificial prices, then just as surely are we going to have another depression in this country. All the horrors, suffering and privation will be experienced again.

I could quote many more of Mr. Gordon's statements but I think I have quoted enough to indicate that, in his opinion, we could either throw the doors wide open and leave our price structure to speculation and profiteering, which seems to be the course some members in this house wish to take, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), or we could have what has been described as a planned economy. The planned economy was scoffed at by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), but such scoffing was in poor taste because, in order to implement the social credit theory, it would require the most meticulously planned economy. In any event, we believe there must be planning on a national scale in order to see that the interests of the public are protected. I am sure the members of this house who are fond of reading should read a book entitled "Sweden, the Middle Way". It was written quite a few years ago and if it were rewritten to bring it up to date, it would be even more interesting. It is, however, one of the best books I have read to show what a democratic people can do in planning their economy, step by step, through co-operatives and so on. There is some private enterprise in that country as well. Sweden has natural resources similar to those in Canada, but not as much wealth; yet Sweden has managed to obtain a standard of living equal to any and to keep prices at a reasonable level at a time when other countries have been experiencing either booms or slumps.

It seems to me, if this house is going to make a decision, it will have to be based on a knowledge of prices. There are those who throw up their hands in horror if you mention control to them in any shape or form. They scream for free enterprise. No one is opposed to free enterprise in its legitimate form. May I remind the members that as far back as 1934 or 1935, at a time when we were in a slight depression, we had just gone through a period in which we had the closest thing to free enterprise we ever had in this country.

All during the years of the depression we had no wheat board. There was no wartime prices and trade board, no rent control or control of any kind. Yet at the end of that period, as was well borne out by the report of the Stevens prices commission, it was found necessary to recommend to this parliament that certain forms of control be provided for in this house. Unfortunately, before many of those recommendations could be carried out, parliament was dissolved, there was an election in which the administration was defeated and a new government came in which of course tossed the whole thing out.

Even at that time, let me quote some of the words used in that report referring to what they call laissez-faire capitalism which is supposed to be the essence of free enterprise. This is what was said:

> As the great master of English classical economists, John Stuart Mill, wrote in 1893, "that principle—

That is, laissez-faire.

> —like other negative ones, has work to do yet, work mainly of a destroying kind; and I am glad to think that it has strength left to finish that, after which it must soon expire . . ."

That was written fifty-five years ago. It means this. The economy of this country and that of all countries which have gone into what we have called the machine age has reached the point where, even if it were desirable, it is no longer economically possible to leave the running of the economy of the country—the main decisions as to the economic steps that shall be taken, the direction in which the economy shall expand, the amount of distribution and production and so on—to free enterprise; because we have reached the stage in our development where we find it possible to produce a far greater quantity than before.

But along with that tendency, along with the machine age, there came the modern development of capitalism which is aimed at monopoly. Every big industry and business operating under capitalism strives to create a monopoly; or if it is too small to do it alone, it tries to create a combine with other businesses so as to restrict competition, do away with competition, and to set an artificial price structure in order to gouge the consumer. That process has been going on before our eyes for the last decade or more. Report after report has been handed to us by the commissioner investigating combines, cartels and so on. This government and past governments have been absolutely powerless to do anything about it under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Ferguson: May I ask my hon. friend one question?

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes.

Mr. Ferguson: Can he name two combines of which he knows in the Dominion of Canada and which he can prove are definitely combines setting prices and controlling them absolutely?

Mr. Archibald: Canadian Industries.

Mr. Ferguson: I asked the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny). I will have a couple of questions to ask the hon. member who interjected, which he will not be able to answer.

Mr. Zaplitny: I will answer the question as soon as my hon. friend sits down.

Mr. Ferguson: I am sitting down.

Mr. Zaplitny: The distribution of bread is one example.

Mr. Ferguson: I asked for two. I thought my hon. friend would give that one.

Mr. Zaplitny: Optical lenses is another. There is the dental industry, Canadian Industries Limited and International Nickel. I could name a few more, but I think my hon. friend asked for only two.

Mr. Ferguson: My hon. friend wants to be fair.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: International Nickel does not control the price of nickel.

Mr. Bentley: Let the hon. member make his own speech.

Mr. Ferguson: I may be able to help my hon. friend along in his, if he will listen.

Mr. Bentley: The hon. member has not anything to tell anybody.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. Zaplitny: I do not mind answering questions provided they are asked in good spirit, and I am sure that is the way in which this question was asked. I am sure that if my hon. friend seriously wishes to find out whether there actually are combines and monopolies operating in this country, he has only to read the report of the combines investigation commission and the report of the price spreads commission which was submitted by H. H. Stevens, once a member of his own party and who later on created a party of his own.

Mr. Blackmore: The combines are much bigger now.

Mr. Zaplitny: If he reads those reports, he will be thoroughly convinced that there is a strong and pronounced tendency towards monopoly, combines, cartels and all the rest of the things about which I have been speaking.

Mr. Ferguson: I have read them, and I am not yet convinced.

Mr. Archibald: Stick around.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am not responsible for that.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit me to ask one question which I assure him is a sincere one?

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The hon. member mentioned the bread situation in western Canada. Is he aware of the fact that the bread people in western Canada, who have been castigated by Mr. McGregor, are doing exactly the thing which the wartime prices and trade board forced them to do all through the preceding years? The wartime prices and trade board controlled their price, forced them to make it level; and now they are doing exactly that thing which the government forced them to do.

Mr. Zaplitny: There is one important factor that the hon. member left out of the question, and that is that, while they may be doing the same thing, they are going in the opposite direction. That is fairly important. The wartime prices and trade board set price ceilings on bread. What these people are doing is setting price floors on bread and gouging the customers.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The wartime prices and trade board—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order. I would call the hon. member's attention to the rule which says that the hon. member who has the floor should not be interrupted.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is quite right. I will not say any more.

Mr. Zaplitny: In the time left at my disposal, let me review briefly what are the proposals that have been placed before this house at various times by the various groups here. I should also like to make clear my own stand on this question. Last year the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) made this statement, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star of January 24. I have checked the statement with him since then in order to ascertain that it was a correct quotation, and he assured me that it was. He was discussing prices, the cost of living, and also speculating as to who the next leader of the Liberal party would be. He said:

> I hope that such a leader will have the same fidelity to the principles of reform. If we don't have that fidelity, then we become indistinguishable from the Tories.

Later on he went on to say:

> We as Liberals admit we made a mistake, so we have put the controls back on again.

The first part of the last quotation is correct: they did make a mistake. But the second part is hardly correct. They have not put controls back on again.

The thing that intrigues me is that in an extremely frank way the hon. member said that, if the Liberals are not loyal to the principles of reform, they will be indistinguishable from the Tories. I think that point has been reached. The almost tie vote in Nicolet-Yamaska was a good indication that the voters could not tell them one from the other. In order to set at rest the minds of any hon. members who may think I am making a false assumption as to the basic philosophy of the two parties which sit to the left and the right of the speaker—that is, the Liberal party and the Progressive Conservative party—I would refer them to a statement of one of their own recently-elected members whose frankness may perhaps be forgiven because, as a new member, he possibly has not quite the experience of shadow-boxing which others can claim.

Mr. Gardiner: On the basis of that argument, my hon. friends did not have any supporters there.

Mr. Zaplitny: In speaking to a Progressive Conservative group, the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) said this, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of February 17:

> Mr. Nowlan agreed with the statement that "there is not much difference between the Liberals and Progressive Conservatives. On the great mass of problems, we have the same general beliefs although our methods of doing things are different."

When you go a little further west to Manitoba or British Columbia you find that even methods are not very different, because there they have embraced each other and are carrying on as a coalition. In what direction are they going? I can quote from another paper, the Winnipeg Citizen, which came to hand today, and this is what one of the members who became fed up with the coalition and walked across the floor of the house said.

This gentleman was one of the Liberal members of the coalition. He said:

> The time has come to tell the people this government has been too reactionary.

He gave certain reasons for saying that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Who was the member?

Mr. Zaplitny: I think the hon. member knows who he is.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I ask who the member was?

Mr. Zaplitny: I shall be glad to provide the information. Mr. Prefontaine was the member. After having been in the coalition for so long he should know what he is talking about.

Mr. Garson: That happened after I left.

Mr. Zaplitny: It is interesting to note that in this house we have two former premiers of the province of Manitoba, both coalition premiers, sitting on opposite sides of the house. I would suggest that we provide them with a little desk in the middle of the aisle, because they really do not belong to either side. They could then sit together.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? I think the house would be delighted to know to which party the member referred to belongs, whether Liberal or Conservative.

Mr. Zaplitny: He has crossed the floor only recently. So far as I know he has not declared any affiliation. He was a member of the Liberal party.

What I intended to show was that so far as the price control issue is concerned we can assume that both the Liberals and the Conservatives have the same basic policy. They do not believe in controls. They believe in getting rid of all controls and carrying on on the so-called free enterprise basis.

We come now to the Social Credit group. The leader of that party is reported by the Canadian Press under dateline Ottawa, January 10, as having suggested the reimposition of price ceilings on meat, butter, milk and vegetables.

In view of what he said today, I am not just sure which policy he intends to follow, because today he indicated he was opposed to price control. In the past he said that he was opposed to planned price control. I suppose if they were sufficiently unplanned he would not mind having them on these agricultural products. I am amazed that an hon. member coming from Peace River, where he represents an agricultural area, would advocate that this parliament pass legislation to hold meat, butter, milk and vegetables under ceilings and let all the rest go scot free. Surely that is the situation we have today because in giving us a preview of his bill the Minister of Finance told us what is still under control and what he proposes to keep under control for the time being. He mentioned flour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Zaplitny: I was going to quote the words of the minister in which he gave us the things that are still under control. He said that the things under control are flour, butter, vegetables, sugar, bread, fruits, molasses, steel and then of course rent control. It will be noticed that practically all the things mentioned by the minister which are to be put into the bill are products of agriculture with the exception of steel and rent control. These things are to be put under control at a time when the prices of agricultural products are on the way down and the prices of manufactured products are still on the way up. If there ever could be a more bedevilling situation I do not know who else could bring it up but the Minister of Finance. We of the C.C.F. group believe that the time has come to give the primary producers of this country a break, and that is why we have advocated price controls and advocate them today, and intend to continue to fight to have price controls on these things which enter into the cost of production of primary producers as well as price ceilings on essential commodities such as food and clothing.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon City): I was not at all sure whether I would take part in this debate until I heard the speech of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). His allusion to Britain and the British government I did not particularly relish, and I shall have a word to say about it in a moment. The bill to be introduced, I take it, will propose the continuation of some of the orders in council in force at the present time. It will not provide for any further controls, and I presume the government at its own option can drop at any time any of the controls in existence at the present time and to be renewed.

If apathy in regard to the matter of prices has been apparent in this house for some time, if the tumult—and it has been a political tumult—of the last few weeks would seem to show a comparatively greater interest in legalistic arguments in regard to constitutional law than it does in things such as prices, I may say that the matter of prices is still a vital thing in 80 per cent of the homes of the people of this nation. If they have appeared to accept high prices through becoming used to them, then I say that it is the acceptance of despair and the apathy of discouragement.

I believe that my hon. friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), was not far wrong the other day when he attributed the result of a recent by-election to the government's failure, its persistent and consistent failure, to do anything about prices. Even if prices do come down in the near future—there is some sign that in some directions they may, though I notice that the cost index is still staying at about the same level—the failure of this government in that regard will be remembered for a long period to come.

The record of my own group on this matter of prices, its particular stand in regard to it, has been clear all along and has been consistent. We have been consistent; we have been constant; we have been ardent in our protestations against the abandonment of price control, in at least as far as it guaranteed the standard of living of the great masses of the people of this country.

The rising tide of the desire for profits on the part of business, big business generally, I think was too much for the government to contain, and the dam of controls, if I may call it that, was punctured in many places. There is no good to be derived from referring to these historic occasions such as the 12½ per cent rise in the price of implements and the punctures all along the line which took place until the whole structure collapsed and the country was inundated by this flood of rising prices, and the savings of the people were swept away and their dollars were devaluated.

Not only has the control of prices been abandoned, but monopolies have been condoned. We had a query a few moments ago in regard to monopolies which I think was satisfactorily answered by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny). I am surprised that in this day and age any hon. member, or any public man anywhere, would ask the question which was addressed to my colleague this afternoon. The question was asked if there existed in this country anything that could be called a monopoly. The hon. member asked that question after having had three government publications made available to him, namely, the McGregor reports, which should have instructed the hon. gentleman in that regard.

I may be making a strong statement, but I believe it to be true that this government stood by and allowed people to be robbed in their purchases of bread—and when I say "robbed" I mean just that—and their purchases of spectacles and dental supplies. As a matter of fact I had those three items down here in my notes, the three things mentioned by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny).

In respect of the last two items, namely spectacles and dentures, sometimes I am inclined to wonder whether the helplessness of the victims was not the reason for the choice of those two groups of items for purposes of exploitation. I have wondered whether the choice might not have been brought about by the fact that, for the most part, the people who use these things are aged people, most of whom are not well off, and thus become good victims for these commercial predators.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I see the hon. member is wearing spectacles.

Mr. Knight: Yes, and I paid $23.50 for them, too.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You were trimmed.

Mr. Knight: That was a long time ago. I understand the price now is even higher. It will be higher when my hon. friend goes to get his. Many of the old people have to have spectacles, and it is unfortunate that the prices are so much higher than they were before.

Why has not the government acted against these people? That is a fair question, and one often asked me by my constituents. My only answer to them is that I do not know. I do know that the government did prosecute in one case; but owing to some legal and technical difficulty, which certainly I, and I am sure any average person in my constituency, could not understand, the case was dropped and the thing goes merrily on.

Someone suggested the other day that the government might be saving up to have a showing of these particular prosecutions to coincide with this favourable budget which we are supposed to be having from our friend —so often called our genial friend—the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), some of these days. Coincidentally, perhaps, the budget would be presented with a parade by the government of renewed good intentions, by way of showing at the proper time that the government has the good of the people at heart.

But the government has been in power long enough to have done some of these things it now intends to promise to do. I hope in this matter of controls it may even yet pull some of the chestnuts out of the fire. My view is that the government should now extend the power of this measure so that for another year at least they would be able to exercise, for the benefit of the consumer, the slight power left to them under the act.

I now turn to some of the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) which I deprecate and which I was sorry to hear in the House of Commons. Let me say at once to the hon. member that he is not the only one who has ever crossed the water and looked at conditions on the other side. I understand this was the hon. gentleman's first visit. I would remind him however that one usually sees what he looks for. And I would remind him further that one's opinions are often influenced by the company he keeps and the people with whom he talks.

I am not going to suggest that one of the people he saw was Oswald Mosley—but from the opinions he expressed, I should think such opinions might easily have been garnered from that source. The hon. member sneers at the intellectuals in the British Labour party. I am reminded of the old saying that the cat can look at the queen. I did think there was something incongruous in hearing the hon. member for Peace River criticize a man like Sir Stafford Cripps.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Why not?

Mr. Knight: As I said, the cat can look at the queen.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): He is a lawyer out of place; that is all that is wrong with him.

Mr. Knight: I, too, was in Great Britain this summer and, while there, I saw some of the work carried on by those intellectuals. I saw the houses they have built there—and that is more than I can say for the intellectuals sitting on the government benches in this house. I saw over there the great power plants coming into operation. I saw the result of the national investment carried on there in the last few years. I only wish we had some of those intellectuals over here. We could do with a few of them on both sides of the house, but for the moment I would rather see them sitting opposite, so that we might have something done. I would say to the hon. member for Peace River that this—

Mr. Gardiner: Get new glasses.

Mr. Knight: —was not my first visit to the old land. I did not hear the interjection of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Perhaps he would like to repeat it—or get another pair of glasses.

Mr. McCann: No combine on them.

Mr. Knight: In defence of the suggestion that my opinion is just as good as, if not better than, that of the hon. member whose speech I am criticizing, let me say that I have visited the old country consistently and periodically for a good many years. Perhaps in that way I am able to note better than most people the changes which have taken place. Perhaps I have seen more, and my opinion would be as good as that of a man who visited there for the first time and had only a few days to look at those things which came under his observation.

I deplore this attack upon Great Britain. The state in which she found herself was that of bankruptcy—a bankruptcy which was caused by her war effort. Everyone knows that. And, if I may say so, that war effort was not exerted wholly on her own behalf. Let us not forget that for many days and months she stood alone. Let us not forget that after the war her foreign trade had gone, her foreign investments had gone, but that she did her share—and did it nobly—of feeding the starving people of Europe.

What did she do? There would have been some excuse for her if she had thrown up her hands, as many other countries would have done. But no, not the Britisher; he sat down and made plans. So far as I am concerned, this procedure of sneering at planning does not apply to Great Britain, because she planned, and planned to some purpose. She went to work and made the best arrangement she could with her creditors. And let me say that she did not try to meet her debts with funny money, either.

She clamped down on her people for the purpose of carrying out a severe program through which her export trade might be gained back again. The hon. member sneered at the food over there. Well, I was over there, and I did not lose any weight. Here are people who are doing without luxuries in order that they may pay their debts. I do not know that that is a thing to sneer at. They did all this in order that they may pay their debts, restore their economy and keep their heads high among free men.

Mr. Coldwell: And, incidentally, they are free men.

Mr. Knight: The food does lack variety; of course it does. It is plain, but there is ample supply, and it is well distributed. Statistics of the social welfare department in England show that on the average children are both taller and heavier than they were a few years ago.

I shall not take much more time, but if I had the time I could give more detail of life on the farms over there. It so happened that I spent most of my time on the farms. I did not see any of those things the leader of the Progressive Conservative party has been quoted as having said he saw in connection with the agricultural situation in England, to the effect that it is in a bad way. Indeed, my observations were the exact opposite. I do not know whether I was in a better part of the country than the part the leader of the opposition visited. I will say this however that, in all the trips I have made over there, this was the first time I did not find the farmers complaining. And when you find farmers who do not complain you can conclude that they are fairly well satisfied.

For the first time farm labour is contented in spite of the assertions that come from many quarters that that cannot be brought about. They have proved that it can be done, that farm labour can be placed on a basis of decent wages and decent working hours.

The district to which I refer happens to be in the north of Ireland. It is interesting to note that the government there is perhaps the only Tory government in the world, certainly in the commonwealth, with the exception of the one my hon. friends over here are interested in, in the province of Ontario. It is called a Tory government but it does not qualify as such according to my understanding of the term.

In my opinion they have more socialistic measures in force in Northern Ireland today than they have in any other country in the world that is not under a socialist government. As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will be able to tell you, they have a rigid system of farm inspection and seed inspection for things like potatoes. They have a rigid system of inspection of those things which they export to the British market. In addition they have a socialized transport system. You can buy a ticket on the train and then use the other half to return by bus. I suggest to my Tory friends in this country that they wake up and study some of the measures that government has put into force.

Of course, as I say, it is not really a Tory government. Anybody who understands northern Ireland or southern Ireland knows what kind of government it is. You would never believe it to look at me now, but I was brought up to be a good Conservative and all my people were Conservatives. What they have there is really a unionist government; it is not a Tory government at all.

I do not want to get into Irish politics because they have been at it for three or four hundred years and have not got things settled yet. I shall not delay the house any more with what are becoming anecdotes rather than remarks in connection with this bill.

I was delighted to see the things I saw because they meant prosperity to the people I knew in the old country. Many of the things I saw were directly due to the system of controls and subsidies that was in force. While the farmer was receiving excellent prices for his products, the working people and those who lived in the small towns were, under that same system of subsidies, able to buy the necessities of life at prices which they could afford to pay.

It is for these reasons and because of the observations I made that I think we in this country should not be too hasty in abandoning this idea of controls and going back to a system of unbridled private enterprise which brought us to disaster in the past and which may bring us to disaster again.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight) as he portrayed the operations of socialist agriculture in Great Britain. While he paid high tribute to it over and over again, I think for three times in succession he referred to what he called the benefits of the rigid system.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker informed the house that the Deputy of the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

An act to approve the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: At the time of the adjournment, Mr. Speaker, I had just referred to the very interesting address delivered by the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight), in which he used the words, "rigid system" as necessary in the economic field. This phrase was repeated on several occasions. So far as I am concerned, rigidity such as he pictured must inevitably lead to a degree of regimentation that will deny our way of life. In saying that I deny the necessity of rigidity in our economic system, I realize the necessity for state intervention in any system of private enterprise in order that the social rights of the individual within the state shall be protected and maintained.

We are dealing with a resolution respecting the continuation of certain controls. What those controls will be, we have merely an indication. Within the field of the control of prices, controls prevail over flour and bread, butter, sugar, cane molasses, imported fruits and canned vegetables. There is a further control over rentals, and there are also the specific controls requested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in respect of steel. Steel control was dealt with this afternoon in a very able and commendable manner by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Timmins).

So far as prices are concerned, the minister has made no statement indicating the degree to which controls will be maintained. The committee on prices, whose chairman was the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), sat for three or four months last session and made recommendations which the government has not seen fit to put into effect at all. Following the adjournment of the meetings of that committee, a royal commission was set up. The commission has proven true to the record of many royal commissions in that, while it sat for a long period of time, its recommendations have not been acted upon. They must be of so little importance that we have not them before us at the present time, when the whole question of price control is being discussed. Indeed, the only hope we have of seeing this commission report is at the end of the present month when the printer has finally completed his task.

Royal commissions are set up for one of two purposes: first, to secure information upon which a decision may be made or, secondly, to evade responsibility for the making of any decision. Until we see the commission's report, each of us is left in a position of personally determining which of these two reasons prompted the setting up of that royal commission.

These control resolutions are based on the principle of the continuation of a national emergency. When the legislation was first introduced in the house in 1945, I remember well that it was generally understood the ministers of the crown expected the emergency arising out of the war would be of comparatively short duration. The government believes that we still have it with us although within the last year there has been a considerable reduction in the fields in which the government has been able to infringe upon the jurisdictions of the provinces by means of the powers granted under the emergency controls.

An outstanding judgment in connection with emergency powers was delivered by the chief justice of the court of king's bench in Manitoba, in the case of Nolan v. Hallet and Carey, reported in 1948, (2) Dominion Law Reports, page 726. If I understand that judgment, it limits the sphere within which orders in council may be passed that purport to be passed under the powers contained in the emergency powers act.

Prices are at an all-time high and all the government has done has been to have a royal commission sit on the question, the report of which is still concealed in the hearts of the members of the government. We have the highest taxation in the history of this dominion and yet there is no apparent realization of the necessity of a substantial reduction in income tax rates to the end that there will be a greater incentive to producers and workers in the country. The Canadian dollar is at its lowest ebb in its history. In the international world, trade is disappearing at an accelerated pace, where our exports are being greatly reduced in our customary markets.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not referring to the United States; I am referring to our customary markets. As a result of the rigidity of bureaucratic controls, international trade finds itself jammed between controls brought into effect on foreign exchange and the controls on exports and imports. The world is in a condition of prohibitions, embargoes and quotas that determine whether there shall or shall not be trade. If ever there was a time when there should be an extra incentive for production, it is today.

Some of the members of the government may laugh, but throughout our country people are demanding, and demanding in tones that even this government should hear, that there must be a reduction in taxation. There is no excuse for the continuation of a system whereby, within the first nine months of the present fiscal year, the amount of excess taxation imposed by this government totals $610 million. On a per capita basis of population that means that, at a time when there should be an incentive, when there should be a further expansion on top of the expansion already taking place, $165 in unnecessary taxation has been extracted from every Canadian family within the last nine months.

At this very time when such a tremendous surplus is being built up the government is continuing to expend, and to expand controllable expenditure, at an unusual rate. The facts are available as at January 15, 1949, in the issue of the Canada Gazette. It is set out there that the revenue and expenditure for the first nine months of 1948 starting April 1, 1948, resulted in a surplus of $609,949,000. It is also shown that within the same period controllable ordinary expenditures by government departments have increased by some $140 million, or at the rate of 48·9 per cent. If ever there was a time when the government, in the interests of the people as a whole, should be reducing its controllable expenditures, surely it is now. Do they say it cannot be done? I call as a witness Senator Crerar, a former member of this house and an experienced parliamentarian. Speaking on this question a few months ago he stated that, with fair application, and without in any way diminishing necessary services, the government of this country could reduce its controllable expenditures by $500 million. That is a statement by a statesman who sat in this house.

Mr. Abbott: I should like to have him in my department.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He sat with my hon. friends opposite and was a member of the cabinet to which certain of my hon. friends belonged, between 1935 and 1944.

Mr. Abbott: He is now translated to a higher sphere.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Recently there have been a great many translations.

Mr. Graydon: He cramped their style.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I say that there will be some more translations when the next election comes around.

Mr. Mutch: Those on this side have a chance; those on the other side have not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are all feeling in good humour tonight, Mr. Speaker, and we shall not become annoyed.

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will take the question now.

Mr. Garson: Does my hon. friend agree with the view that expenditure can be reduced by $500 million? If so, will he tell us in what departments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The question before the house is with regard to the continuance of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council. I am just wondering how this discussion and the question which has been asked relate to the resolution under consideration.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Your ruling is a correct one, Mr. Speaker. I cannot go into all the particulars—

Mr. Knowles: Saved by a ruling.

An hon. Member: Saved by the bell.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I suggest to my hon. friend that he interview the former member of the cabinet to which he now belongs.

Mr. Garson: I was asking the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) what he thought.

Mr. Diefenbaker: An hon. member to my left says, saved by a ruling. To him and those connected with him I say that the government can always expect to be saved by support from that direction.

Mr. Gardiner: Saved by regulation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You asked a proper question, Mr. Speaker, as to the relationship of this discussion to the matter under consideration. At the moment I am dealing with the question of prices, and what measures could be taken with regard to them. The first is the expansion of production by the reduction in income taxation as well as the increase in the exemption. All that the government has done is to make the income tax form brief. What the government must do is to make the income taxation briefer than it is. In the second place, as to a direct method of reducing prices, remove the 25 per cent tax on so-called luxury goods, which bears down upon the jewelry businesses of this country. Many of the things that are taxed in this connection are necessities, not luxuries. It results in the price paid by consumers being increased by 25 per cent. It is discriminatory. A reduction in that tax would reduce prices to the consumer on many items.

Another thing that could be done is to reduce the sales tax. As to such reduction, nothing has yet been said or even suggested.

As to the jewelers' tax, apparently the first major leak in the coming budget has taken place within the last two days. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that for some months a jeweler in Pembroke, acting as the modern John Hampden, opposed the taxation imposed by this government. John Hampden finally landed in custody, and the modern John Hampden finally decided to keep out of custody by an apparent promise made by the government that the tax in question would be removed or be reduced in the coming budget.

Mr. McCann: Who said that?

Mr. Abbott: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Abbott: Does my hon. friend know that such a promise was made?

Mr. McCann: It does not make any difference.

Mr. Abbott: I am just interested.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I know is what the modern John Hampden said.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCann: His name was Simpson.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister is well acquainted with the case. In answer to the Minister of Finance, I would say this. All I know is that within the last two days, following a recent caucus, the rumour throughout this building has been that income taxation must be reduced in the interests of the salvation of the government, and the reduction would include this taxation on jewelers.

Mr. Howe: Was that the Wednesday night caucus the hon. member speaks of?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know anything about the caucus to which my right hon. friend refers. He may have been at one that night that he does not know anything about. I was not.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member should know more about his own caucuses.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish now to refer to the maintenance of control upon farmers' prices while at the same time permitting a removal of most controls on the prices of the things which the farmer purchases. Now I shall get some support from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) in this connection.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Provided it is the right day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is one who will agree with me in this. Having recently been in a position of responsibility in Manitoba, he realizes that one of the major criticisms made by the farmers is that their prices have been controlled while the prices of things they must purchase have not been controlled, in general, since the war. I know he cannot disagree with that because on March 25, 1948, he wrote to the Minister of Trade and Commerce a letter in which he pointed this out. I know that the western farmer will now have an ally, and that the minister will see to it that something is done to place the farmer in a position where he is not caught between a ceiling on his prices and an ever-rising cost of commodities which he is required to buy.

[Mr. McCann.]

In the letter the hon. gentleman said:

> At this point may we ask the question, "what other products of Canada, either primary or secondary, is the government going to fix the price of and leave the burden of carrying the difference between the government price and the market price upon the producers of these products?"

In these words the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) expresses exactly the view that was expressed by the former leader of this party, now the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken), by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), and by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller). Then he went on to say:

> If this is a good policy for wheat and pork and beef and poultry products, and now oats and barley, why is it not a good policy for copper, newsprint, fish, tractors and farm implements?

I suggest that the Minister of Justice communicate his ideas in this connection to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and that he at least secure from the government of which he is now a member a policy in keeping with the views which he expressed in the letter of March 25, 1948. He refers to another matter which is another reason why the farmer objects to this government's policy. His first objection is to the discriminatory nature of the income tax in its application to agriculture. His next objection is that there is a controlled price of his products; or, as my hon. friend said in a letter to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the government having fixed a political price for his products, he finds himself faced with lower net returns because of the ever-rising cost of the things he has to purchase. My hon. friend said, on page 5 of the letter:

> If in the interests of national policy and for the Canadian people as a whole, the price of oats and barley is set at a level which is less than would otherwise be available, and it is not the intention under your legislation to have the whole Canadian people make up the difference between these two prices, by what arguments do you and can we justify this course?

In these words my hon. friend expressed the views of farmers generally throughout western Canada and throughout the whole country. There is a widespread demand by all our people for a reduction in taxation. There is a widespread demand by farmers of this country, without whose prosperity there can be no prosperity, for a reduction in taxation. Wheat agreements have been made at prices lower than world prices and the farmers should not be required to pay the difference between world prices and the price fixed in these agreements.

I am going to pass on to another phase of this particular resolution. The house is entitled to all the orders in council passed during the last year, either under this act or pursuant to the powers contained in this act. Yesterday I mentioned an illegal order in council, and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said there were no illegal orders in council. There is one decided to be such in the judgment of Nolan v. Hallet and Carey, which declared that it was beyond the powers of the government to pass an order in council beyond the powers contained in the act.

I should like the minister to lay on the table of the house the orders in council which have been passed since January 1, 1948, to date under this act or under the powers contained in this act which have not yet been published in the Canada Gazette or tabled in the House of Commons.

Mr. Abbott: There are none.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like him to set forth the particulars of the regulations passed within the last year under the powers contained in the act which parliament passed last year. We have a right to expect that, when there are extraordinary powers such as have been granted under this act, the orders in council issued thereunder should be placed before parliament, and when they are important ones they should also be published in the Canada Gazette so that the country as a whole may know what laws are being passed.

If order-in-council government is still being continued in extraordinary measure we should know it. I am not talking about the legitimate use of order in council; I am speaking about abuses under order in council. I can refer to several which must have been passed under the extraordinary powers of this act, which are not justified, and which should not have been passed. One is referred to in the Public Accounts of 1948 which is wholly unjustifiable. We have had orders in council reducing interest rates on annuities and adjusting rates upwards under a statute passed by parliament. We have had orders in council passed changing the customs tariff. When the powers were granted to the government to do that, representation was made at the time by the then Minister of Finance that they would not be used without consulting parliament. The culmination of order in council is referred to on page 4 of the auditor general's report. Under section 9 of the auditor general's report appears one of the most flagrant abuses in the use of order in council by this government. I realize it has a long record in the uses to which orders in council have been put. We have had the introduction of taxation without an order in council. We have legislation under the Aeronautics Act, a statute passed by parliament, and evaded by order in council.

Mr. Howe: What is that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the order passed under that act which my hon. friend made whereby private companies were not required to give up their flying contracts, or rights, or whatever you wish to term it, although parliament had passed legislation that they must do so.

Mr. Abbott: I never like to interrupt my hon. friend, but what have orders in council which have been passed under the Aeronautics Act to do with a resolution preceding a bill concerning emergency regulations? I think we should stick to the matter before the house. My hon. friend frequently makes speeches on the alleged abuses of government by order in council. I have no doubt that during this session he will make at least a dozen others. I do not think this is the legislation under which to make them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was pointing out that these were intermediate stages, but the culmination finally came in 1948. My hon. friend says that I can make ten speeches on the abuses of order in council. I can—I can do that without referring to the same order in council in any one of the speeches. The culmination came in 1948 with a government spending away beyond anything ever spent by any other government in peacetime, in so far as controllable expenditures are concerned. And finally, in 1948, there was a sum of $689,967, which had been voted by parliament and would at the end of March, 1948, have lapsed, it being an unused balance. The Department of National Defence, so that it would not lose that expenditure, advanced it to certain corporations, so that they could spend it in the coming year. How serious that is is set out in the auditor general's report where it says this—

Mr. Abbott: I have allowed my hon. friend to state what the order in council is. But it has absolutely nothing to do with the resolution which we are considering. It is in the auditor general's report. I would ask for a ruling that we stick to the resolution we are discussing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understood the hon. member for Lake Centre to say that it was an order in council passed under the act now before the house for reconsideration. But, from what he has read, I do not think the order in council comes under that act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if I might say so, there is no justification for the course taken and there was no power in the government to act as it did except under the transitional powers act. The Auditor General, with regard to this, says:

> None of the orders in council cites any authority on which reliance is placed to give directions to pay in advance.

It means that either the transitional powers act was used, or an order in council has been passed—

Mr. Abbott: I ask my hon. friend to stay within the rules. He knows, or he should know, that there is no power under the transitional powers act of 1947 to pass new orders in council.

Mr. Howe: I think we ought to have a ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is aware that he cannot discuss orders in council generally. He was endeavouring to relate those expenditures to orders in council under the transitional powers act. But the Minister of Finance has pointed out that those orders in council cannot possibly have been passed under that act, and I would ask the hon. member not to continue with that point.

Mr. Knowles: There is no authority for it at all. That is the trouble with it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then, Mr. Speaker, if what my hon. friend says be correct, because he is a member of the government, there is no justification—

Mr. Howe: That is a deliberate insult to the presiding officer in this assembly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Let the hon. member proceed.

Mr. Graydon: Let the presiding officer speak for himself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You know, Mr. Speaker, that any insults in parliament do not come from me. My right hon. friend has too great a capacity for that. In view of these extraordinary powers, parliament has a right to know how they will be used. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance says that the only justification they have for passing orders in council is within the narrow ambit of the undertaking given by him last year when the bill was introduced. I say to him that within the last year orders in council have been passed which we in this parliament do not yet know about, and which have not been published.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member state under what statute they have been passed? Is the hon. member suggesting that they have been passed under the transitional powers act? If not, I do not think he should continue with it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think, sir, the minister should be able to tell us whether they were passed under the transitional powers act, or without any authority at all. Now there has been progressive—

Mr. Grant: Conservative.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and continuing action on the part of this government in passing, under this legislation, orders in council which have not been justified under the legislation, as was stated by Mr. Chief Justice Williams, in the case to which I have referred—orders in council with sweeping powers over the economic life of the nation. In the use of those sweeping powers parliament has a right to demand, before this resolution is passed, that each and every order in council that will be passed under this legislation shall be made known to the House of Commons, to the end that the act will not be used during the next year for the passing of orders in council which are not justified, and which do not come within the provisions of the legislation passed by this parliament.

I am going to be frank and say that there has been a reduction during the last year in the numbers of orders in council passed under this legislation. There is room for a greater reduction in those numbers. We in parliament have a right to demand that orders in council used for legislative purposes shall not become the law of this country, unless parliament knows what such orders in council are and is assured that orders in council, whether secret or not, shall not be kept from the public gaze until, as a result of investigation, they are brought to light.

Mr. Arthur Williams (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house has to do with the continuation of certain controls. Right at the outset I want to say that, speaking for myself at any rate, not only am I in favour of continuing controls but I am also in favour of enlarging their scope.

I hope what I have said will be noted by friends to my left, because this afternoon quite a play was made of the fact that we had not spoken so much about controls. We talk a good deal about controls whenever the opportunity arises; and I am certain we are talking the language of the people of this country. Because one thing which confronts them more than anything else is the free rein given to this noble free enterprise, to run high, wide and handsome in the field of establishing prices.

I should like to see some check put on the activities of people who are inclined to be so very irresponsible. I cannot quite understand why a man like the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), a very nice and very intelligent fellow—

Mr. Howe: The first kind words you ever got.

Mr. Williams: —should prostitute his intelligence by subscribing to a philosophy of the kind to which he subscribes. Harsh but true. The truth is always harsh.

An hon. Member: What philosophy does the hon. member follow?

Mr. Williams: At the moment, the philosophy of socialism which I am here in the House of Commons partly to expound.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Where is the other part?

Mr. Williams: Apart from expounding the philosophy of socialism in the house I feel that I should also direct attention to the needs of the people outside. That is the other part.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The mine mill and smelter workers' philosophy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member for Lake Centre found the house in good humour tonight when he was making his remarks, but I do not think hon. members should interrupt unduly the member who has the floor. I ask hon. members to permit the hon. member for Ontario to proceed without interruption.

Mr. Williams: Thank you very much. I am sorry the hon. member for Calgary West has just left the chamber.

An hon. Member: He is coming back.

Mr. Williams: The hon. member made an interjection a moment ago to the effect that I had some connection, or at least he implied that I had some connection, with a union known as the united mine mill and smelter workers. I want to correct that and inform the house that in all my union activities I have never belonged to the united mine mill and smelters workers union.

An hon. Member: What does the hon. member have against them?

Mr. Williams: For the benefit of the hon. member for Calgary West and perhaps others who may be similarly mistaken in their designation of the union to which I belong, may I say that I belong to district 50, united mine workers of America. That union has in its constitution the provision that no communist can belong to or hold office in the union.

The reason I referred to the hon. member for Lake Centre was that I felt that if he faced up to the real fact about the wild spree that has occurred in the increasing cost of living he could not with his intelligence maintain the point of view he does. To me it is a simple question. Controls were on during the war and in that period the cost of living went up only 18·6 points. When the controls were taken off, the cost of living went up 39·5 points.

Mr. Fraser: Subsidies were taken off at the same time.

Mr. Williams: During the whole period of the war the cost of living rose just 18·6 points because controls were on; during the brief period of four years since the war ended the cost of living has gone up twice as much as it did during the war period. If the cost of living could be arrested so effectively during the period of the war, surely it is evident that if controls had been maintained since the war the cost of living would not have soared to its present high point.

That is the kind of thing that causes a great deal of worry among the people. I am certain that if any party attempted to deal with that particular problem strongly, effectively and boldly it would have the wholehearted support of the people in the country. After all, the people in the country are concerned only about the simple things such as the cost of living. I am certain they are not particularly interested in how that is effected, whether it is by some adjustment in the income tax or sales tax or by rolling back prices and putting on ceilings. All that they ask is that there be some arresting factor.

They have asked for a housing program and a health program. Their requirements are simple. Some hon. member said that the subsidies were taken off. This afternoon I listened with no great degree of pleasure to the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). An interjection was made earlier to the effect that I was harsh. I am of old country stock with relatives still in that country and I want to say that what the hon. member for Peace River said was harsher than anything I have ever heard. Is the Britain that we heard about this afternoon the same Britain about which we spoke so glowingly a few years ago?

An hon. Member: A different government.

Mr. MacInnis: A better government.

Mr. Williams: I should like to quote from a publication of the United Kingdom information bureau.

Mr. Lennard: When was it published?

Mr. Williams: In 1947, but the conditions to which these particular parts I am going to quote refer are probably the same now as they were then. This is entitled "Fifty Facts About Britain's Economic Position." I am going to start at No. 20 and I will tell hon. members that I am not going to read up to No. 50.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Williams: I do not think hon. members would laugh about a matter of this kind if they understood the character of the sacrifice made by these people.

Mr. Lennard: We certainly are not laughing at the contents of the book because the hon. member has not read it yet.

Mr. Williams: Starting with No. 20 it says:

20. Before the war, half the cost of Britain's vast imports was covered by income from shipping and overseas investments, and only the remaining half had to be paid for by exports. Britain's shipping and investment losses during the war have thus created a heavy burden.

21. More than half of Britain's pre-war merchant shipping was sunk during the war. Even with new building and acquisitions, Britain was left at the end of the war with sixteen million tons of merchant shipping, compared with twenty-two million tons before the war.

22. Despite lend-lease, Britain had to sell overseas investments to the value of $4,500 million to help finance her war effort. In addition, she acquired new indebtedness during the war amounting to $11,500 million. This, together with losses of gold and dollar reserves, brought her total wartime losses overseas to $17,000 million.

No. 23 and No. 24 are along the same lines, indicating the sacrifices that Britain made. There is no reference in this book to the other sacrifices that she made that cannot be measured in dollars and cents, the terrors of her people during the air raids, the destruction of property and the loss of human life. It was Great Britain, more than any other nation on the earth, that saved the civilization of the world. Apparently it is expected that in the short period of four years since the war Great Britain should have rehabilitated herself completely. As the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) said, she had a terrific burden to bear in regard to food. How sneeringly he referred to the sausage. Frankly I do not like the sausage in Canada either. I do not like sausage whether it is British or Canadian.

An hon. Member: Why condemn it then?

Mr. Williams: Because I do not like it.

Mr. Grant: Do you like bologna?

Mr. Williams: No, I shall let you enjoy that.

Mr. Sinclair: We are all laughing.

Mr. Reid: He is not enjoying it.

Mr. Williams: During the period when Great Britain has been trying to rehabilitate herself she has done things that have never been done before. It has cost a lot of money, but the people of Great Britain have gladly accepted the burden. Let anybody in this parliament, or in any other parliament of Canada, tell me where they can get a social security program such as they have in the old country for four and eleven pence a week, about $1.25. What do they get for it? Complete sickness benefits, maternity benefits, maternity grants, maternity allowances, attendance allowances, widows' benefits, unemployment benefits, guardians' allowances, retirement pensions, industrial injury benefits. They get all those things. It is not enough to measure how much a people pay without taking into consideration what they get for it. Here in Canada, for example, a little child buys a chocolate bar, and it is dearer now than it used to be. It would not be so bad if the child was getting the same size chocolate bar.

Mr. Reid: They will not suffer.

Mr. Williams: But the children are soaked by the higher price, and then the manufacturer soaks them again by making a smaller chocolate bar.

Mr. Reid: A smaller bar is good for the children. It is good for their health.

Mr. Williams: I shall let my hon. friend deal with that particular phase.

Mr. Reid: I will take you up on that any time. You cannot deny that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Reid: It is better for the health of the child. I defy any man to disprove that.

Mr. Williams: I did not hear a word the hon. member said.

Mr. Reid: I will say it again. The hon. member did not want to hear it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. members are aware that they may ask questions of the member who has the floor only with his consent. It is improper for an hon. member to sit in his seat and ask questions.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised at the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). Just the other day I heard him speak in the house, and one of the points he made was that he remained quiet and listened most attentively to whatever was being said.

Mr. Reid: But when such palpable untruths are being uttered I must interrupt. I am compelled to.

Mr. Williams: What I have quoted from is the booklet that was distributed in Great Britain by the ministry to all participants in the social security plan.

An hon. Member: That explains it.

Mr. Williams: The booklet was for the purpose of explaining the plan to the beneficiaries.

Mr. Gardiner: Most of those things started under Lloyd George.

Mr. Williams: To me that is the picture of Great Britain as I know it. I knew it when it was much different. This great system which you support, and to which you would like to return—

Mr. Ferguson: It was good enough for you to come to.

Mr. Williams: You would like to see all other avenues closed, and you ruling the roost. There was a time when you did.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): There were no emergency powers then.

Mr. MacInnis: There were emergencies.

Mr. Williams: During that particular time the condition of the people was a lot worse than it is now. Great Britain is being criticized most harshly in some quarters, but I can remember that until the nationalization of the mines quite recently the Duke of Northumberland—

An hon. Member: A Tory.

Mr. Williams: And how he was a Tory! He drew, by way of royalties from the mining industry, 24 shillings every minute of every day of the year whether he was awake or asleep, well or ill. There was a railway line which ran for about twelve miles from my own home in Wales. It was known as the Golden Mile, and the great lord got four pence for every ton of freight that passed over the line.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think I should remind the hon. member that the resolution under consideration has to do with the continuance of certain orders and regulations. I would ask him to direct his remarks more strictly to the resolution.

Mr. Williams: I am making certain points in explanation of the situation in Great Britain which was dealt with by the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understood the hon. member for Peace River was blaming controls for the conditions which now exist in Great Britain. He was not stopped, and I am not stopping the hon. member if he is explaining the controls in Great Britain.

Mr. Williams: With very great deference to you, Mr. Speaker, I think that my remarks are pertinent to the question, because I am endeavouring to show, dealing with the points raised by the member for Peace River, what happens when there are no controls. There were none at all in Great Britain in those days. Certain people carried on without any obstruction, and had it all their own way. It is because of such consequences that governments have had to step in to protect the people, and I am quite satisfied they will have to step in in Canada more than they have already. There are people running wild in this country who believe in the philosophy of buying for as little as they can and selling for as much as they can. That is precisely what has caused the present high cost of living. It was necessary to stop it during the war and it is necessary to stop it now.

The other day I heard the hon. member for Peace River quote St. Paul. It is true that at that time the subject of debate was the British North America Act. The words he quoted appear at page 578 of Hansard of February 15, and read as follows:

> Stand fast, therefore, in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage.

This was a very fine quotation, Mr. Speaker, but it is important to know to what St. Paul was referring when he spoke of bondage. This quotation was from the first verse. At any rate, in that particular address, St. Paul was exhorting the Galatians on the subject of circumcision. During the course of further remarks made by the hon. member for Peace River today, he chided my leader for some reference he made the other day to social objectives because he did not use the word planning. He went on to say that we in this group do not talk so much now about planning and controls. Even as St. Paul made other speeches, Mr. Speaker, we have made other speeches. We did not put all our eggs in the one basket. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to go beyond my time.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Williams: We still believe in planning and we will continue to talk about those things we believe it necessary to mention. We will continue to talk about them wherever we are because we think, and personally I believe we think rightly, that those are the things of vital concern to the people.

May I come back quite seriously to this particular question? So far as I am concerned, I would say to anyone who quotes the scriptures that what I heard this afternoon was so low that it beats anything I have ever heard before. I should like to tell you what St. Paul said when he addressed the Corinthians.

> Therefore seeing we have this ministry, as we have received mercy, we faint not;
> But have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

I should like to use that particular approach. All the people are asking is some degree of decency. They are not asking for twenty-four shillings a minute; they are not asking to own a city; they are not asking to own big factories. They are asking for these simple things. I am very certain that, if this government not merely did what is contained in this resolution but enlarged its scope, it would receive the blessing of the people. I hope it will seriously consider doing this.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): I trust, Mr. Speaker, I shall speak with a bit more circumspection than the last speaker. I shall therefore leave St. Paul and all the rest of them out of it. The debate on this question has been generally related to the increased cost of living, and price control. Last year, the government appointed a special committee of this house to investigate the cause of the increase in prices and, allegedly, to try to find some cure for it. The reason for the appointment of this special committee was the fact that, at this time last year, prices were rising rapidly and had been doing so for some time. There was widespread alarm throughout the country on that account. The uproar was so great, the government felt compelled to do something to quieten it. As a result, the committee was appointed.

This committee was appointed, however, with power only to inquire and report back to the house. It did not have the power to recommend any action to the house. In other words, all the committee could do was to call witnesses, and it did call them for an interminable length of time. Eventually, the evidence ran to thousands of pages. For my sins I had to sit on that committee, and I became very tired of the futility of it. So far as I could see, it accomplished nothing. I now see, however, that it did accomplish one thing. It put on the record a great mass of evidence in connection with the reasons for the rise in prices during the past two or three years. It also put on the record a great deal of factual information as to the actual profits which producers, wholesalers, retailers and processors procured, particularly in connection with food products. As far as I can see, that is the only useful thing the committee did because it provides us at the present time with information which totally discredits the position taken by the C.C.F., and disproves many of their most-used arguments.

I regret as much as anyone the steep increase which has taken place in the cost of living. Particularly do I regret the hardships which, because of that fact, have been imposed upon people with small pension incomes; the so-called white-collar workers whose salaries, in a large number of cases, have not been increased to any great extent; the old age pensioners and the war pensioners of one kind and another. Their plight has been rendered really desperate in many cases by the steep rise in the cost of living. I also regret the false picture put out in connection with the causes for the increase in the cost of living by the members of the C.C.F. in this house and throughout the country. They are at the same game they played last year, of trying to discredit the free enterprise system.

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): It is discredited.

Mr. Harkness: They have been trying to do that by attempting to sell to the country the idea that the rise in the cost of living has been chiefly due to the enormous profits secured by companies and businessmen across Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Is that not right?

Mr. Harkness: It is absolutely not right. This special committee sat for several months last year, and none of the evidence placed before it would in any way support the contention of the C.C.F. in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Now who is defending the government?

Mr. Harkness: In no industry which we investigated did the evidence show that the rise in prices has been due, in any appreciable degree whatever, to enormous profits.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to ask a question of the hon. member. When he makes a statement of that kind, I wonder if he read the evidence placed before the committee.

Mr. Harkness: I heard the evidence. I am sorry to say I had to sit there and listen to it month after month, in addition to reading it afterwards.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to ask the hon. member another question.

Mr. Lennard: Make your own speech.

Mr. Harkness: If the question is a reasonable and sensible one, I shall be only too glad to try to answer it.

Mr. Sinclair: That is a challenge.

Mr. Thatcher: Does the hon. member recall the evidence given by Canadian Industries Limited to the effect that in 1947 profits were about $1 million and the total wages for the whole factory, including executives, were only $957,000?

Mr. Harkness: I must protest, Mr. Speaker, against the hon. member asking permission to ask a question and then attempting to make a speech.

Mr. Thatcher: I asked the hon. member if he remembered that.

Mr. Harkness: I remember the evidence quite well, and in the course of my remarks I shall deal with statements of that kind which members of the C.C.F. are so fond of making. The only thing of that kind that the evidence before the committee showed was a few gouges on the part of some fruit and vegetable men in Toronto, I think it was.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Harkness: And the undue profits they took on those few occasions were possible because the government imposed import restrictions at that particular time and thus provided the background which enabled those people to gouge the public in that way. As I say, there were few instances of that kind of thing. Apart from that, there was no instance in which it was shown that anything that might be called undue, unjust or enormous profits had been made.

The leader of the C.C.F. party and his followers are fond of quoting percentages of the increase in profits of some companies, and attempting by that means to show that most of the increase in the cost of living has been due to this big increase in company profits. As anyone with any knowledge knows, of course—and the leader of the C.C.F. knows it as well as I do—the quoting of percentages does not present a true picture of how a company is doing, of what profits actually were made, and whether the profits were just or unjust. To take an extreme case, you might have a company with a turnover of $1 million. If it made a profit of only $100 in one year, and in the following year made a profit of $1,000, the increase is 1,000 per cent, but the profit may still be extremely small.

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): It is not companies like that about which we are talking.

Mr. Harkness: I object to this business of using percentages or lump figures and saying, as the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) said a moment ago: Did you know that this company made $1 million last year? It may have made $1 million, but $1 million may still be a relatively small profit, and a just one, in comparison with the amount of business done.

Mr. Thatcher: When they paid out only $957,000 in wages?

Mr. Lennard: Make your own speech later.

Mr. Harkness: In the prices committee last year, as a matter of fact, the hon. member for Moose Jaw was fond of attacking the packers—I have heard various members of the C.C.F. doing the same thing since—and talking about the enormous profits made by the packers, which they say is a terrible thing. On the one hand they were trying to represent to the farmers that the packers were squeezing them to the last cent with regard to the prices paid for livestock, and on the other hand telling the consumer that they were paying high prices because the packers were making such enormous profits. The evidence before this committee—and it worked on the packers for a long time—was to the effect that the three major packing companies in Canada made a profit ranging from one-seventh of a cent to one-fifth of a cent a pound during the last ten to fifteen years.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): What did they make on capital investment?

Mr. Sinclair: What did they make on butter last year?

An hon. Member: And on meat?

Mr. Harkness: If the members of the C.C.F. desire to present an honest picture to the country, they will go out and tell the housewives that if the packers made no profits at all they would save one cent every time they bought a seven-pound roast of beef. I do not think they will find many housewives who will vote for them if they tell them that, but it is true.

Mrs. Strum: Why tell them that, then?

Mr. Harkness: In my opinion, it is not intellectually honest to quote these percentages, bulk figures and so on, and thereby attempt to sell to the general public the idea that the reason prices have gone up so much, that people are paying so much for meat, or for this, that or the other thing, is that this, that or the other company is making an enormous profit. That just is not the case, as is shown by the evidence before that prices committee.

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): May I ask the hon. member a question in a kindly way? Would he tell the house—

Mr. Lennard: Wait till he says whether he will permit the question.

Mr. Harkness: I am quite happy to have the question.

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): Will the hon. member tell the house how much the packing houses made last year on butter? I have reference to the three major packing houses.

Mr. Harkness: The matter is not particularly germane to the discussion, but one packing company really made quite a large profit in butter last year. I think it was around half a million dollars.

Mr. Sinclair: But it cut the price of margarine this year.

An hon. Member: Just ten cents.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It is peanuts compared to the margarine profit.

Mr. Harkness: Their total profit on butter over the last ten or fifteen years was negligible. If they had not made that profit last year, they would have been well in the hole on butter on the ten to fifteen years' operations. If you look for evidence of that last year you will find it. Just look it up. I do not want members of the C.C.F. party to rise in their places in this house and go around the country and say that I am a great defender of the packers. I have no particular love for the packers. I am one of those who have to sell all of their farm products to the packers. I am one of the very people whom the C.C.F. are always trying to persuade that they are badly done by these packers. I want it clearly understood that any axe that I have to grind is to cut down the profits of the packers and not to increase them. I certainly want as much for my livestock as I can get, but I do think that these things should be presented in an honest way. It is popular to attack the big fellow, the big packing house. If you kick him everybody likes it; it is very popular, but it is not intellectually honest to do it in the way in which it has been done.

The best evidence that the special committee on prices was given last year as to the reason for the price increases was from Mr. Taylor, the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, and from Mr. Graham Towers, the governor of the Bank of Canada. The evidence that they gave was that the rise in prices was caused first of all by the general world shortage of goods which of course caused a great increase in the world level of prices, and it was impossible to isolate Canada completely from that price increase. Our price levels had to come up to them to some extent. The second reason was the increase in the amount of money in circulation. The amount of money in circulation in this country has increased greatly from 1939 to the present time, and that has created an inflationary pressure. The third reason was the rising costs of production and factors of that kind. Another important factor which these witnesses were not allowed to give evidence on was the high level of taxation. Since it was a political question, they had to refrain from giving evidence on that. But that is one of the main reasons for the high price of many goods which people have to buy at the present time. I am not going to emphasize this particularly, but I hold in my hand a letter which I received today, and which illustrates how prices are increased by taxes. This letter comes from a man who is trying to build up an importing business in Calgary. He sent to the old country for a trial shipment of some small goods which he thought it might be possible to sell there as a test. He says:

> There has been a considerable amount of complaint lately in the press that one of the reasons we were not able to handle more English goods was because of the excessive prices charged by the British manufacturers. British prices are high, but let me give you the dope on this small shipment. I have an extra invoice so I am attaching it.

He gave me the invoice. The goods he bought were shoeshine goods and pocket sets, combs and manicure sets and so forth. They cost him, including postage and packing, £3·1·10, which is just over $12. Here is what he had to pay in taxes before he could get the goods out of the customs house: Duty 12½ per cent; sales tax, 8 per cent; excise tax, 35 per cent; customs brokerage, 75 cents, making a total of $8.62. His cost price, including other charges, amounted to just over $12. The duty, taxes and so forth on these goods came to $8.62. With wholesale and retail markups added to that, it would mean an increase in price on these goods of at least $12.

Examples of this sort of thing could be multiplied endlessly. There is no doubt that in a large number of cases the cost of goods is from one half to double what they would be were it not for the numerous taxes imposed. One of the chief ways in which we can get a reduction in the cost of living, one of the reasonable ways in which we can do it, one of the practical ways, is to reduce these taxes.

I should like to read some of the evidence given by Mr. Taylor and by Mr. Towers before the prices committee as to the actual cause of the increase in prices, and put it up against the nonsense put out by the C.C.F. as to the causes of the increase in prices. This evidence of Mr. Taylor can be found in the first copy of the minutes and proceedings of the special committee on prices last year. He said:

> But I think it is important at the outset to underline the fact that prices have been rising steadily and rapidly all over the world for the past eighteen or twenty months.

He gave a lot of examples following that to back up his statement. He says:

> I emphasize these facts,—

That is, of the various rises in prices throughout the world.

> —not to belittle the very real problem of rising prices here in Canada, but to suggest to the committee that while there may well be remediable internal or domestic influences pushing or drawing prices upward, I do not think you will find all or even a major part of the explanation of this problem within the boundaries of our own country.

Mr. Taylor went on to give in great detail his considered opinion of the reasons why prices had risen. He mentioned first general world shortages of goods of all kinds, particularly food products; secondly, he went to some extent into the increases in the amount of money in circulation; in other words, the amount of currency inflation which had taken place. Then he went on to say:

The third general factor in the present world price situation is one which I approach with some diffidence. It is the large amount of buying and selling through direct or indirect government agencies that is going on all over the world. Let me say at once that there can be and are many socially desirable aspects to government bulk purchasing and selling, but there are also very real dangers of inefficiency, instability and unduly high prices.

I should like to call your attention to that particularly, Mr. Speaker. In other words, Mr. Taylor's opinion was that, of the general factors causing price increase, bulk buying and selling by governments was one. I think the amount of bulk purchasing and bulk selling, and so forth, which has been done by this government is one of the reasons why the farmers on the one hand have received as little as they have, and the purchaser or consumer on the other hand has had to pay as much as he has had to pay. When you get into state trading, bulk purchasing and so forth, as this witness said, there are very real dangers of inefficiency, instability and unduly high prices, and we have had that. Mr. Taylor went into more specific factors bearing directly on the Canadian price structure. He said:

First, the cost of imports. Canada cannot control the prices of things we have to import, and many of our imports are of really essential importance to our economy. The prices of many of our basic imports have been rising at extraordinary rates during the past two years.

Then he takes a number of examples, including petroleum, vegetable oils, hides, cocoa beans, and so on, which I shall not discuss in detail. Then he continues:

Secondly, external prices largely determine the prices of our principal export commodities. The recent sharp increase in pork prices was directly related to the new and higher export price. Base metals are another striking example.

Then he goes into the various other examples of how external prices have forced up our prices, because we are exporting those commodities. Mr. Taylor says:

The Canadian prices of all these things, and indeed the whole Canadian price level, could not be insulated from these external forces except by an elaborate and continuing system of export controls by licence and permit or by a government monopoly of the selling; and by a very complicated system of import subsidies and import allocations, and government monopoly of the buying.

Well, of course, that is exactly what the socialists want. They want government monopoly of buying. They want to have everything run by licence, by permit and government monopoly in connection with selling, and so on. Naturally I can see why they are trying to sell the idea of bulk purchasing and of controls. It is by such action that there can be fastened on this country a socialistic system which later on we would find it extraordinarily difficult to get rid of. Mr. Taylor went on to say:

Thirdly, there are the primarily internal factors affecting prices.

Almost all costs of production have gone up. There are a great many elements in any cost of production—materials, labour, administration, selling and fixed overhead. I have already referred to the costs of materials. Labour costs have gone up, how much it is very hard to say.

Then he goes on with the rest of these things. Those, essentially, are the reasons of a trusted economist of this government—a man in whom I think most leaders in the economic field in this country have confidence —as to the general basic reasons for the increase in the cost of living, and rising prices.

I have mentioned another important name in this connection. Mr. Graham Towers brought up an extremely interesting point in connection with prices, and I should like to read briefly what he said in that regard. No. 65 of the report of the prices committee for Friday, May 28, contains some questions by myself addressed to Mr. Towers. My questions and Mr. Towers' answers are as follows:

It seems to me that your most significant sentence is the one on page 13, "prices during 1948 will clearly depend to an important extent on grain crop prospects and harvests in western Europe and the chief exporting countries." You also mentioned yesterday the effect of crops. Would it be fair to take from that, or is it correct to take from that statement, the view that the level of prices essentially and basically depends on the relative scarcity or otherwise of food products of all kinds?

A. Not entirely but certainly food has a major influence on price level, both directly and indirectly.

Q. Would it be correct to say that is perhaps the basic determining factor in connection with prices?

A. It is a major factor.

Q. That being the case would you say there is practically no chance of prices going down throughout the world as a whole, and of course particularly here in Canada where of course we are most interested, as long as the world scarcity of food continues?

A. I think that is probably the case.

That is the thing which I wish members of the C.C.F., who do so much talking about this matter, would tell the farmers in western Canada. I am sure those farmers would be most interested to hear from them; and I am also sure that the members of the C.C.F. party will not tell it to them.

Mr. Thatcher: I am sure the hon. member wishes to be fair. Mr. Towers went ona to say that prices might have come down if controls had been put back on.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Towers did not.

Mr. Thatcher: I have his quotation here.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member questioned him in connection with the matter. We then went into a discussion about controls, to which I shall refer in a moment, and concerning which I shall put on record what these gentlemen had to say.

So much for the causes given in the prices committee as to the rise in prices. I should like to say something about the constant cry of my socialist friends that controls should be reimposed to bring down prices. The evidence we had in the prices committee could be summarized by stating that this could not be done. The evidence was that the reimposition of controls could stabilize prices at their present level, and prevent their going higher; but it would not reduce them. It was not a practical proposition. It was stated, furthermore, that such an attempt to bring down prices by imposing over-all controls, or even controls to try to stabilize prices at present levels, was not workable in peacetime, that controls would need to be much more rigorous than they were during the war, and that they would lead to widespread black-markets and extraordinary difficulty in trying to maintain them. It was pointed out that the result would be either a breakdown of the controls or the imposition of what would amount to a dictatorial system of government.

I have a good deal of evidence here in connection with that matter. I do not wish to take up the time of the house to read all of it. However, I believe I should put on record some of the evidence given by Mr. Towers and Mr. Taylor in this connection. At page 3358 of the evidence the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) questioned Mr. Towers as follows:

Q. This morning you made the observation that when controls were applied in 1941, that was postponing the trouble. Would you mind enlarging on that observation, please?

A. That is the way it necessarily turned out; and that, of course, could have been predicted at the time by anyone who foresaw that the war would last until 1945; but it was postponing it I believe to the great benefit of the public and of the war effort. To the extent that a runaway situation was averted during those years, I am sure that our war effort was much more effective than it could otherwise have been.

And again:

What I meant by saying postponing, was that price control did hold things so stable that we could not hope in a post war period to maintain that degree of perfection. There had to be some catching up with higher costs. And, of course, there often had to be a reflection of higher prices in other countries.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

In the last annual report of the bank I have expressed this view (this will be found on page 20 of the report):

"Short of substantially appreciating its exchange rate and increasing its taxation, no country could have insulated itself completely from the world-wide rise in prices. Theoretically it might be contended that this could be done by means of direct controls, but these would have to be very much more rigorous and complete than those of wartime, to say the least."

I should like to draw this evidence given by Mr. Towers to the attention of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Williams), who just spoke and stated that it was only reasonable and common sense that controls which worked in wartime would work just as well in peacetime. The men who had to work on these controls and who were responsible for them to a large extent do not agree with him. Another question asked Mr. Towers was as follows:

Q. Does that add up to this: If there were an attempt made to reduce the level of prices by resort to controls would they have to be a very different type of control, very much more drastic, than those we had in wartime?

A. I would think so, yes.

I shall not bother reading what Mr. Taylor had to say because it was to the same effect. These gentlemen stated that over-all controls in a country such as this are not workable, that they can be worked only in a police state or something approximating a police state.

I should like to deal with the resolution before us more pointedly than I have in the general remarks I have been making. A bill was introduced in 1947 which contained a long list of orders in council, regulations of the governor in council and so on which were to be continued, and the little bill that we passed last year was simply a continuation. I should like to know how many of those orders in council, regulations and so forth have been done away with and what things are really to be under control after this bill is passed. We are dealing only with the resolution and we do not know in what form the bill will be, but I presume it will be similar to the one last year and provide for the continuance of these powers.

Personally I would not be so much concerned if the things to be continued were stated specifically and with no power to add to them. I should like to see them limited to the commodities and services which were mentioned by the ministers, such as rent control, steel control, timber control, priorities control and price control on certain commodities.

Mr. Garson: Where there are price ceilings.

Mr. Harkness: I think we should get rid of some of these controls. I can see no reason why a ceiling should be maintained on butter.

Margarine is now being sold and, I think, provides sufficient competition to keep the price of butter down to a level where people will not be charged unduly for it.

Mr. Gardiner: Apparently the hon. member was following the evidence given last session in connection with butter. Has he noted that there has been no such profit this year as eleven cents per pound? Does he not admit that the present controls on butter have brought that condition about?

Mr. Harkness: No, I do not admit that.

Mr. Gardiner: Is it true?

Mr. Harkness: I do not know. As a matter of fact I have not seen the report of the royal commission on prices to which I think the minister is referring, as it has not been tabled.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member said that according to the evidence there was a considerable profit on butter last year. There is no such profit this year as a result of what has been done.

Mr. Harkness: I do not know whether there is or not.

Mr. Gardiner: I am telling the hon. member.

Mr. Harkness: The profit that was made on butter when decontrol took place was due to certain factors which would not repeat themselves. That profit could not be made this year no matter whether there was a ceiling or not. That had nothing to do with it. In any event, margarine is now on the market and those who do not want to pay a high price for butter can buy margarine.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is the hon. member in favour of that?

Mr. Harkness: Those people who prefer butter, and are willing to pay the price the farmer thinks he should get to cover his cost of production, may continue to buy it. I can see no logical reason for keeping butter under a price ceiling; it should be removed. The same thing applies to the rest of those foods still under price ceiling, such as bread, citrus fruits and other things. Personally I would be happy to see the price of citrus fruits go up two or three times so that the people of this country would drink apple juice, carrot juice and other things we have in this country, and thus help to eliminate some of the difficulties faced by the apple growers in Nova Scotia and other parts of Canada.

There is no reason for the continuation of these controls and I should like to see the government eliminate them. I do not think it is practical to get rid of rent control immediately. The government has managed to get the country into such a horrible mess as far as housing is concerned that the elimination of rent control would probably be catastrophic. Until the present mess is cleared up I think we will have to have some measure of rent control. The same thing applies to steel control because of the shortages in that essential commodity.

I think the timber control might well go out the window. The lumber yards in Calgary appear to have an over-supply of lumber. There seems to be no shortage from what I can see and I do not think the continuation of this control is justified.

I think the government will get a much better reception for this bill if it provides only for the continuance of the same measure of control on the commodities I have mentioned and does not indicate an intention to impose further price ceilings.

Mr. Rodney Young (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) with a great deal of interest. I do not know how the people in Calgary East feel about the controls that have been under discussion, but I do know how the people feel in the area which I represent. With all due respect to the hon. member for Calgary East, I venture to say to him that if the speech he has just delivered here in this House of Commons were delivered on a platform in my constituency he would certainly meet a very hostile audience. It may be that in my constituency there are not many packing-house owners or many lumber barons.

Mr. Harkness: You must be very badly informed in your constituency.

Mr. Young: Whether or not they are badly informed in my constituency, I think they are better informed than the hon. member for Calgary East. Those people have to use lumber. They are on the end when it comes to paying for the lumber. I am sure that young veterans returning from the last war, or munitions workers who saved their money and put it into government bonds in the hope that some day they would achieve the ambition of most Canadians, to own their own homes, when they came to buy lumber at present prices would be sufficiently disappointed. If they had to buy lumber without any price control they certainly would not like it in spite of the fact that in some parts of the country, perhaps in Calgary East, there may be a surplus of good lumber. There is no surplus in the place where the lumber originates, British Columbia. At the present time, I venture to say, the people of British Columbia will be most affected by the removal of the controls which this government proposes to carry on. I am dealing only with these controls, not with the innumerable controls which I should like to see the government institute on a number of things. Hon. members to my right may make the most of that, but I am simply dealing with the controls that the government proposes to continue.

The removal of those controls at the present time would affect certain classes of people in our country who are in desperate and straitened circumstances. It happens that they are centred in my constituency, because it is a place of rooming houses, and a large area is a place of slums. In these rooming houses, in the basement and in the attic, and in the slums, are the $40 a month burnt-out pensioners whom this country at one time treated as heroes. There are also the old age pensioners existing on $35 or $40 a month, people who gave the best that was in them to build the country and make possible the profits which my friends on the right consider to be reasonable and just. I suggest that this house represents them just as much as it does the lumber barons. Those are the people to whom we should have some sense of responsibility, and for whom these controls are essential.

I should like to point out that it was argued by the hon. member who spoke last that taxes, import duties, and the various tariffs that are placed on different things, are one of the essential causes for the maintenance of the present high prices. During the course of the discussion it was brought up as a matter of reproach that we should not look at things from the point of view of making as high a profit as we can. It was pointed out that we should not look at things from the point of view of buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest. It was pointed out that was essentially a philosophy which should not be followed. That statement was greeted with laughter on the right, and on the government benches. If that is the philosophy that is followed, and apparently it is, then if we remove all these taxes, if we remove all these tariffs, and if we make it possible for buying and selling to go on without the government taking any slice out of the amount for which the commodity finally sells, have we any reason to suppose that people will voluntarily bring down prices who believe they should make all the profit they can because when the next depression comes they may have to take a few losses?

Mr. Merritt: Competition will do that.

Mr. Young: Competition has not succeeded in doing that at any time. On the contrary, prices are determined at the present time, as was pointed out, by war produced shortages where prices are uncontrolled, but wages are determined by the demand for labour. At the present time in my constituency, and in my part of the country, there are not less than 25,000 people drawing unemployment insurance. They certainly are not able to pay the prices which would result from the lifting of the existing controls. In addition to that, there must be at least half as many again who are unemployed but are not eligible to draw unemployment insurance. There are 7,000 between New Westminster and Abbotsford in the Fraser valley, as the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) will tell you. In my section of the country at the present time fifty per cent of the industries have shut down because of the power shortage, resulting from a cataclysm of nature over which we have no control. These are the people whom I represent, and these are the people who would suffer if the policies advocated by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) were carried out.

I would say that by and large the people of the country are suffering from a reduction in the standard of living compared to that which they had a few years ago. It is pointed out in the speech from the throne, and the government has amply demonstrated, that we are going through a period of maximum prosperity. At the present time maximum prosperity, as it is regarded in orthodox free enterprise circles, is a period of maximum profits. At a time of maximum prosperity and maximum profits it is poor philosophy to rise on the floor of the house and demand that a reduction be made in the amount of taxes that industry has to pay. That section of labour power which has been incorporated in the commodity which we call surplus value, and for which the average wage worker receives nothing, is being cut into by the state, and big businessmen, and indeed some of the small businessmen are greatly annoyed about it.

But at the time of the hungry thirties, when there was no such surplus, when business was in a condition where many of the businessmen were facing bankruptcy, the type of controls that we have today were unnecessary. At the same time we are facing the prospect of a return to that sort of economic debacle unless we have some sort of planned society. These controls are a small step in that direction. It is at least a recognition by the state that they have some responsibility for the economic development of the country. They have some responsibility for maintaining the standard of living of the producers of the country. They have some responsibility for seeing that those citizens who have the weakest defences under a society of unlimited competition, under a society in which there is no possibility of quarter being given, are protected, because they have no other protection.

I think that the policy of the government, while it is to that extent on the right track, should be carried further, that the existing powers that were given to the government by the house should be extended further. I believe that for this reason. I live in a section of Vancouver where I am three blocks from the industrial waterfront. I live in what is called a slum area, an industrial area. I, together with thousands of my fellow veterans, returned from overseas and I could not find accommodation. I had to live in an area where my standard of living, and the standard of living of thousands of other Canadian producers, has been cut away from under us, although we have always been led to believe that we had a right to the high North American standard of living.

Owing to the fact that prices make it impossible for us to build our own homes, we are compelled to live in a slum district. Two blocks away from where I live there is a house in which there are twelve adults and seven children. There is no bathroom and only one toilet. The chimney catches on fire regularly every month. The place was condemned years before the war. Yet we are compelled to utilize such accommodation simply because the existing price structure is getting in the way of expansion which is necessary to maintain a standard of living commensurate with the great wealth of the country. The contention has been made tonight that price controls could not continue in peacetime, that it would mean a police state. I ask hon. members whether they think that old age pensioners, burnt-out pensioners, and superannuated civil servants are bothered much about a police state provided they can keep prices within reach of their tiny means. By stigmatizing this progressive policy with the reactionary name of a police state, the critics are not going to alter anything in the minds of the people. The people feel this thing personally. They are not discussing it, as we are, in a theoretical atmosphere. Price controls mean something to them and are essential to them.

Great Britain has entered this discussion a considerable number of times today. I should like to say that Great Britain maintains a system of price controls. These controls had to be maintained because, unlike this country, the British people are not sitting on top of the world in so far as natural resources are concerned. There are perhaps forty to fifty million people concentrated in that tiny island. They have to import all their raw materials at high prices and then compete in the highly competitive markets of the world with their finished products. The people of Britain have had to share and share alike. In that country, it is not possible for an extremely wealthy person to get what an extremely wealthy person can get in this country. It is possible, however, for poor children in that country to get all that is necessary to make for healthy bodies, much healthier than they were under the capitalist system. Together with this system of price control or perhaps because of this system of price control in Great Britain, the government is able to give the people security from the cradle to the grave; health insurance and old age pensions for women at sixty and men at sixty-five. Canada is one of the wealthiest nations per capita in the world, yet we are unable to afford those things because of the unlimited competition of capitalism and because of the irresponsibility of those who, at the present time, control our natural resources, our mines, mills and smelters.

Mr. Hackett: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Young: I will permit a question later, but at the present time I am in full spate like the streams of British Columbia and I do not want to be interrupted.

An hon. Member: Just like a phonograph.

Mr. Young: It is no record to which you are listening. In any event, the people like it and will continue to like it for some time. It will be heard more frequently on the floor of this house because the people like it. I would say that, so long as the prosperity, so called, continues at the existing level, there will be only discontent. The existing discontent has produced a protest to parliament in the form of the group of members I am amongst in this house. If the existing prosperity and the circumstances that go with it deteriorate, if they deteriorate only a little, we are going to experience in this country a tremendous change of heart.

The head of the welfare chest and the secretary of the red feather organization in the city of Vancouver, who is as far from being a socialist as my friend to the right, recently made this statement: that unless the federal authorities are willing to accept the responsibility for the mass unemployment which has developed there, and the lack of unemployment insurance to cover that situation, there will be serious riots and disturbances in that city. I have not been to Vancouver since early January, but this is the word of a man in a responsible position and drawing a salary equivalent to that of anyone in this house. He is a man whose business it is to know these things. Situations of that type are the direct consequence of the lack of control, the lack of planning, and unhampered competition.

At the present time the newspapers carry reports of very damaging floods in the south end of Vancouver island resulting in the loss of $100,000 worth of property. This flood is the direct consequence of the cutting-down of our trees in British Columbia without any thought of the necessity for replanting. In Sweden when one tree is cut down another is planted. They have been planting and cutting trees for hundreds of years. Owing to the lack of government controls in my province, in forty years we shall probably have no commercial timber within easy reach. We shall be going up to the top of the mountains for timber. Now, when the snow comes, it lies on the bare hillside and the first breath of warm weather brings flash floods. If the snow were shaded by the large trees, such floods would be avoided. At the present time the trans-continental trains are delayed twenty-four hours getting into the city of Vancouver. The same thing occurred last year on a tremendous scale, as this house knows.

I may sound rather radical to my hon. friends to the right and I may seem to have become somewhat emotional. I should like to say I have listened rather attentively to their point of view. I have not interrupted, nor do I intend to do so. I give my friends on the right credit for believing what they say, although I do not see how it is possible for them to believe all they have said. I do, however, give them credit for believing it. I know they believe it is their duty, but I should like them to have a look at this matter from the point of view of the man on the bottom of the pile. These controls are not being urged by the members of this group because we love controls. We love freedom as much as any man in this house. We do not want controls for the sake of controls. I do not want a policeman looking down the back of my neck or giving me a ticket every time I move. If it can be demonstrated, and I believe it can be, that in the interests of the country as a whole, during the transitional period from the production of war materials to the time when our peacetime production is again fully developed, controls are essential to the welfare of the majority of the people, then by all means let us use controls. Let us not look upon controls as a police state, but let us look upon controls as a means to an end and let that end be the best interests of the useful people of Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I do not know whether I can make the remarks which I hoped to be able to make by strictly adhering to the rules of the house. I think I can say all I wish to say, however, by remaining as close to the rules as the other speakers have. The remarks which have just been made should, I think, have some reply. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Young) has covered considerable territory. I am sure he must have realized, as he was speaking, that a number of the subjects he was discussing were not of direct interest to the members of this house.

His reference to the control of the cutting of timber, for example, is a case in point. In this country the cutting of timber, if it is under the control of a government, is largely under the control of provincial governments. The natural resources, belong to the provinces and are, naturally, under their control. The only authority under which this government may take control over such matters is the type of authority we get from a measure such as the one under discussion this evening. I only wish to impress upon the hon. member the fact that we are being accused by the members of the official opposition now of trespassing upon provincial rights and we would probably be trespassing upon them still further if we attempted to do some of the things the hon. member has suggested.

I am very sorry I was not in the house this afternoon when the member for Peace River (Mr. Low) delivered his address. From what has been said, I would judge he had certain things to say with regard to conditions in the old land which he had recently visited. I have been in Britain on a number of occasions since 1936. I do want to agree with much of what has been said by the last speaker about the condition of the people and with much of what has been said by the member for Ontario (Mr. Williams). I am not prepared, however, to give all the credit to the present government in Great Britain for those conditions.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend says, Why? One of the reasons is that most of the social services referred to by the member for Ontario were placed upon the statute books of Great Britain by no less a person than one of his own very great countrymen, Lloyd George, a Welshman. That was many years ago, Mr. Speaker. It is true that other governments, Liberal, Conservative and Socialist, have added to the basic principles that were established by earlier governments. But when socialists attempt to take credit for all that was done by all social reformers back over the years, they are taking in much too much territory.

Then when I listen to the description of the condition of the people in London and in Britain at present, I am inclined to agree. But I should like to say to my hon. friend that the members of the present government were calling my attention to those conditions during the first six months that they were in office. Anyone who knows the city of London realizes that conditions such as those that are being described could not have been created by any government in six months. The fact of the matter is that practically everything they have in Great Britain in the nature of controls of the distribution of food was placed upon their statute books and in the regulations by no less a person than Lord Woolton, the present chairman of the Conservative party in Great Britain and not a socialist at all. If any credit is coming to the present government in connection with those regulations and that legislation, it is due to the fact that they showed good enough sense under all the circumstances to continue the regulations which had been introduced under the Churchill government, and which are still in force.

May I say also that, in spite of the fact that much of the criticism has been made with regard to the controls they have in connection with agriculture, which might not be acceptable in the Dominion of Canada because of our different conditions, many of those controls also were not placed there under the present government. Some of them were introduced before the war and some of them early in the war during the period that Mr. Hudson was Minister of Agriculture in that country. I make these statements only for the purpose of keeping the record straight. In this country we have people who are trying to claim the credit for everything that has been done by anyone who has been interested in reform for a generation before there was a socialist party either in Great Britain or in Canada; and I think it is well that we should keep the record straight as to who is responsible for what, in order that we may be able to make decisions as to what we ought to do under certain circumstances.

Mr. Bryce: Those were the days when Liberals were liberal.

Mr. Gardiner: Liberals are still liberal.

Mr. Bryce: Not any more.

Mr. Gardiner: My friend Scotty, the hon. member for Selkirk, will be a Liberal some time in the future when he has made up his mind that he is no longer a socialist; because no Liberal ever desired to be controlled to the extent that the socialists want to control us. I have never known a Scotch Liberal who could stand for it for any great length of time.

Coming down to some of the discussions to which we have been listening, we on this side of the house have been the audience. We have been listening to a debate between the socialists and the Conservatives on the subject of controls. The socialists maintain that we ought to be controlled in every direction and with regard to everything we are doing.

An hon. Member: They never said anything of the kind.

Mr. Gardiner: I am glad they are not quite as radical as they were a few months ago.

An hon. Member: Keep the record straight.

Mr. Gardiner: They too, or most of them, are coming back a little nearer to where they were at one time. Probably we shall find them doing as some of them used to do, organizing for one of the old parties. We shall probably find them even going to conventions and trying to get conventions for one of the old parties. Some of them, when they had tried on three or four occasions to get a convention for one of the old parties, and were not able to get it, then of course organized a party of their own and ran in order to try to get elected.

Mr. Knowles: Page the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott).

Mr. Gardiner: I realize that in order to get here they will have to do similar things, and probably some of them will be talking a little differently from the way in which they are now talking.

The argument that has been going on has been one as to whether we should or should not have controls; and again I say that we have been greatly interested in it. The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness), who is not here at the moment, had something to say with regard to butter, and I also want to say a little bit about it.

Mr. Case: It is a fairly slippery subject.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, it is a slippery subject. A certain party slipped out of power on it once, and the opposite party slipped out on another occasion. Someone might slip out again, but I do not think it will be this party.

An hon. Member: Do not be too sure.

Mr. Gardiner: The question raised a few minutes ago with regard to butter is one that is well understood in this country. The farmers of Canada produce in the summertime twice as much butter as we consume, but in the winter months they produce half as much as we consume. As a result, speculators can have a good time with our butter if they are left free to do so. I rather imagine that some of those speculators would even be socialists who would be taking a chance on making a little bit out of butter.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Oh, no; surely not.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact, when you have twice as much of any product coming onto a market from which you cannot afford to let any of it go because you must have it all in order to supply the market completely throughout the year, if everyone is allowed to do what he likes about it, someone will do just what was done last year. The only reason such a great fuss was made about it last year was that it had not been done that way for seven or eight years. We had been at war, and the marketing of butter in this country had been under absolute control all the time. Then, when we let it out of control for a period, the butter was bought at under fifty cents a pound.

Mr. Burton: Just what we told the minister would happen actually did happen.

Mr. Gardiner: I think I told my hon. friend it would happen. He might have agreed. It was bought at under fifty cents a pound. I think the evidence given to the committee was to the effect that even throughout the whole summer it was bought at an average of about fifty-one to fifty-two cents a pound. Then during the winter months, when there was coming onto the market only half enough to supply the requirements of the people, those who had in storage the butter which had been produced in the summer months were putting it on the market at a higher and higher price, until when it reached sixty-seven and one-half cents a ceiling was placed on it. That ceiling was the only thing that prevented it from going up higher. The only reason that the ceiling was put on was for the purpose of seeing to it that, since the butter had been bought at a lower price, it was not allowed to be sold to the people at any higher price than it had then reached.

When the matter was gone into by the committee it was found on the evidence that one of the companies had sold the butter at an average of between 11 cents and 12 cents a pound higher than it had been purchased, and of course everybody called that a profit. But what I want to emphasize is the fact that unless there is some kind of control some place that thing will happen in spite of what anybody tries to do every year from now on. The only reason that this government cannot do anything about it, unless a measure such as is before the house at the present time is passed, is that the authority to deal with that kind of thing is with the provinces. I am quite certain that if this government were to attempt to take that authority away from the provinces we would experience some of the same kind of criticism that this debate started off with this evening. The first speaker, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), said, as I was coming into the chamber, that he was going to discuss certain orders from the point of view that they were encroaching, or allowing this government to encroach, upon the authority of the provinces. That has been quite an issue in almost everything that has been discussed this session, and I presume it is going to be made the issue by hook or by crook with regard to everything that is discussed from now until the end of the session.

What I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, is that in so far as butter and many of these other products are concerned, there is now no effective control over them unless greater authority is given to the federal government than it has in relation to these matters up to the present time. The only reason that we were able to control butter during the war, the only reason that we have been able to control it last year, is that we had the War Measures Act during the war and we had the extension of the powers contained in the War Measures Act under the legislation which is under discussion at the present moment.

The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) was inclined to question my suggestion that the controls during this year made it impossible for those who have been handling butter to make as great a profit. Probably I was stating it the wrong way around. Probably what I should have said was that the controls, as they have been exercised this year, made it possible for men who have been trying for years to be honest in connection with this matter, and to trade with people honestly, to find a method of doing it under the controls as they are up to now. All that these controls did was to place a floor of 58 cents a pound under butter. That floor has not been operative at all during the past year in connection with the handling of butter because butter has never been down to that price or anywhere near it.

Mr. Hackett: We had to import butter.

Mr. Gardiner: But having said that the ceiling price is approximately sixty-seven and a half cents—it differs a little from that in different places in Canada but that is the basis of it—may I say the fact is that all the butter has been bought at sixty-seven and a half cents. All the butter produced last May when there was twice as much coming on the market as was required, all the butter produced in June, all the butter produced right through the year, has been bought at approximately sixty-seven and a half cents a pound delivered at a certain point in Canada.

The regulation allows a certain margin, a certain markup, between that wholesale price and the retail price. With that certain markup between the wholesale price and the retail price—that markup is only a few cents; it does not permit of any profits to anyone of the kind that these people could make back over the years under the conditions that existed in this country—that narrow margin of markup has been all the profit that anyone could get. Therefore those who are storing the butter have been quite prepared to take delivery of butter, and pay the producer a certain price right through the year, whether in the summer or in the winter, for that butter. I think that every farmer in this country will say that sixty-seven and a half cents a pound is more money a pound for butter in the summer months than he needs to get in order to cover his costs of production. But I think every producer in this country will say that under present conditions sixty-seven and a half cents a pound for butter in the wintertime is not quite as much as he ought to get. But the two have averaged out at the best he has ever received in peacetime, possibly at any time.

Mr. Hackett: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Hackett: Is it not a fact that milk which goes into butter yields a lesser return to the farmer than that which is used in any other form?

Mr. Gardiner: That is right, but it has not very much to do with what I am discussing at the moment.

Mr. Hackett: It caused the sale of herds.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps the consumer ought to realize that the farmer is getting less money out of butter than he gets out of cheese, or out of canned milk, or out of whole milk sold at so much a quart each day; and as has been indicated, it is the lowest price. What I was trying to point out was that this year the farmer got approximately sixty-seven and a half cents a pound for his butter wholesale at, let us say, Montreal. The butter was then sold at a certain markup throughout the year, with the result that the man who was storing butter did not need to take all the risks that he used to take in connection with it and therefore did not need the margin. The risks are largely taken by the retailer who handles the butter. He may take delivery of it the day it is bought from the farmer, leave it in storage and take delivery of it from the wholesaler as he requires it for his customers.

I do not think there is an hon. member in this house—who fully understands the conditions under which butter is produced in this country, and fully understands the conditions under which butter must be marketed—who will not agree that some reasonable degree of control on the marketing of that butter ought to be put into effect and ought to be retained in effect. But I repeat, the only way that we can have that kind of control is by having some kind of understanding between this government and the provincial governments, which does not exist in a legal sense right up to the present time.

Mr. Wright: Is not that one of the best arguments which can be used for a Natural Products Marketing Act to co-ordinate the marketing agencies?

Mr. Gardiner: That may be so, but it is not an argument for socialism.

Mr. Wright: I do not care what you call it.

Mr. Gardiner: It is one of the things which make people vote for socialism, because people who are not socialists do not regulate it, but it is not socialism.

Mr. Wright: Why are you not doing that?

Mr. Gardiner: We are doing it at the moment, and we are asking you to give us authority to do it for another year. That is all that is before this house at the moment. I am simply answering the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary East who says that he does not want to give us that authority this year.

Mr. Knowles: Don't pay any attention to him.

Mr. Gardiner: I may not pay attention to him, but I pay attention to the people to whom he is talking when he speaks in this house.

Mr. Burton: Will the minister permit one question? In setting these prices for the handling of butter in the legitimate trade, is the minister getting complaints from these people or from those who want to speculate in butter?

Mr. Gardiner: So far as I know, we have not had any complaints from anybody this year. We have had no complaints from the farmers, from the retailers, from the wholesalers or from the consumers, except that some of the consumers who are probably not too well informed do not know what was suggested a few moments ago, namely, that our butter is being sold at the lowest price of anything that is made from milk.

Mr. Hackett: And our herds in the eastern townships have been sold for the same reason.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not want to go into the discussion of that tonight. I am afraid my hon. friend will make me discuss it some other night when I come to my estimates. I merely wanted to deal with this one suggestion. On the one hand, people tell us that we must not step on the toes of the provinces, and on the other hand, occasionally by agreement with the provinces or in some other way, we find it absolutely necessary to do something which we have not the authority to do, in order to accomplish the things which people believe ought to be done in this country, no matter to what political party they belong.

It was not my intention to have taken up so much time in dealing with one product, butter. I had intended to spend more time in discussing the general position which has been discussed this evening. Our friends of the C.C.F. party have been maintaining, as they always do, that we should have retained all, or practically all the controls, and probably that we should have put on new ones that we did not have before. Then, our friends of the official opposition have been arguing that we have kept on too many controls up to now, and that we should have got rid of all of them, or at least the greater part of them.

An hon. Member: You took the wrong ones off first.

Mr. Gardiner: I have an idea that out of the argument there has come a thought which perhaps did not occur to many of those who were speaking. My hon. friends of the C.C.F. party have been dwelling at great length upon the cost of living, and hon. members of the official opposition have occasionally drifted into that argument—that the cost of living is too high.

The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) has tried to impress upon the house that food costs were possibly more responsible than anything else for increasing the cost of living; and hon. members in another part of the house argue that that is not so.

I should like to place on record one or two illustrations I have run across out in the country, to indicate the weakness of those arguments. Last summer while out in Saskatchewan I picked up a pamphlet which had on the back of it a big 59 in red numbers. Then, over the top of that was printed the inscription, "The purchasing power of the dollar today is only 59 cents". I looked at it, and then I said to the farmer I was visiting, "Do you agree with that?" "Well," he said, "it is not working out that way with me. I do not know just whom they are talking about. Perhaps they are taking an average all across Canada, and in that I do not know whether they are right. But," he said, "in so far as I am concerned, I built a house this year; and the reason I built it was that I could build it with 34 per cent less wheat than I could have built it with before the war. I could have built it with 40 per cent fewer hogs than I could have built it with before the war. I could have built it with 56 per cent fewer cattle than I could have built it with before the war. So," he said, "my purchasing power in respect of those particular things today, with the dollar that I have, represented in products I have been selling, is away beyond what the pamphlet makes it out to be."

I think his reasoning was much sounder than the reasoning of some of my hon. friends who have spoken this evening.

Last summer out in the middle of Saskatchewan, where I did not think anyone knew me—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Where could that be?

Mr. Gardiner: —I walked into a restaurant. I will not tell you where it was.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Did you have to go there to eat?

Mr. Gardiner: I had intended only to have a dish of ice cream to cool me off.

An hon. Member: Getting pretty hot?

Mr. Gardiner: The lady who was there ready to wait on me was seated at a table with a copy of the Winnipeg Free Press in front of her. She had not been reading the editorials they have been writing recently—but she was looking at the stock page. She called me by name and said, "Come over here, I want to show you something".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: And she was not thinking about the same things as the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Williams). When I went over and took a look at the paper it showed the picture of a big white steer, over which was the inscription, "The farmer got $546 for this one".

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): "Come up and see me some time".

Mr. Gardiner: I said to her, "That is a pretty nice steer". She said, "That was not what I was thinking about".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: I said, "What were you thinking?" She said, "I was thinking that we could buy a tractor with three steers like that. I was just wondering how many it would have taken in the years just before the war". That was an exceptional steer, it is true.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Exceptional woman, too.

Mr. Gardiner: Nevertheless, one could buy a tractor with six steers of the ordinary type. They would have brought just as much money as she would have had for three steers of the type of which she was speaking.

What I am hoping to do by these illustrations is to point out to the house that there is some truth in what was said by the hon. member for Calgary East, namely, that when we come to quoting percentages, quoting lump sums, and trying to apply our arguments to every condition that exists, no matter where we happen to be in different parts of this country, quite often we are talking with people who know a great deal more about their local conditions than we do. And I am afraid if my hon. friend the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Young) goes around to some places and talks as he was talking a few moments ago he would find that in due course people would not be as well pleased as he thinks.

After all, most of the farmers in this country whom I have met—and I have met a great many of them—are thinking just as straight with respect to the economic problems of this country as are any group of people to be found anywhere. Most of them believe that they are enjoying as favourable economic conditions today as they have ever enjoyed at any time.

And they know why that is. Hon. members have been discussing the matter this evening. Someone over here said, "They cut out the subsidies"; and someone in another section of the house said, "They increased the cost of coarse grain," and so on. That is the kind of argument we have heard here, there and everywhere. Someone said, half under his breath, that at a particular time this was being done at the expense of the farmer; that in other words we did not let him have the highest possible price when prices were at their peak. And it is suggested that because we did not do that, we ought to throw our markets wide open now.

May I say to him that there are very few farm products which a farmer could sell in the United States market today at a better price than he is getting for them in the Canadian market—very few.

Mr. Brooks: What about potatoes?

An hon. Member: Butter.

Mr. Howe: Butter is higher in Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, butter is higher in Canada. I look at the official prices every day, and I know the price has been down around 60 to 63 cents on comparable markets for some considerable time.

Mr. Cruickshank: Not in whole milk?

Mr. Gardiner: Milk powder has been lower in the United States for about two years than it has been in this country. Then, cheese cannot be shipped from Canada into the United States, with freight and duty paid on it, and be sold at as high a price as it can be sold in Canada. That is why I am getting appeals every day from people all over this country who want us to take cheese off their hands, cheese that they have been holding for one or two years. This market is the best market they have at the present time, but it does not bring enough to cover all the carrying charges in addition to what was paid for it.

I repeat that there are not many farm products that can be sold on the open market outside of this country at prices better than can be obtained in the country at the present time. Anyone who stands up in this house and advocates a lower cost of living by reducing the cost of food products is trying to make it absolutely impossible for this government to carry out the undertakings which they gave back in 1944 to maintain for a time during the transitional period floors under the prices of farm products.

My hon. friends in the opposition say that we denied the farmers the top prices at a particular period. If you allow prices to go down to the level of prices in some markets in order to satisfy consumers all over the country, then the farmers will lose on the long-time experience.

I think we have had enough men standing up in this house and saying that the farmer lost money on wheat because he did not get the top price, that we should have been on the open market all the time, and then advocating at the same time that we ought to make all farmers—there is only a small proportion, some 200,000 out of 750,000, who raise wheat—that we ought to make all the other 550,000 farmers and their families accept a lower return for their products simply because they cannot be sold at a higher price in some other place for the time being. That kind of argument is going to make it absolutely impossible to carry out even the kind of control that is necessary to stabilize prices for a limited period of time.

It was necessary during the war and after to hold down prices for farm products and other products, and prices were held down. If we are to have stabilized prices it may be necessary to hold up farm prices. My hon. friends of the C.C.F. say that because we have no ceiling price, therefore we have no control. They are not talking in accordance with the facts.

An hon. Member: Never said that.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member says "never said that". They said that controls have all been taken off farm products and not off other things.

An hon. Member: It is the other way around.

Mr. Gardiner: Rather that controls have been taken off other things and not off farm products, with the result that farmers suffer. The keeping on of floors tends to keep up prices and for a period of time it tends to give the farmer back something of what he lost during the period when he was not allowed to take the peak prices he might have taken.

Let us examine for a moment or two the conditions and the time during which he did take comparatively low prices. The United States had controls right down to the end of the war and our people were not able to get much if any more, even if they had been able to get into the United States during that period. Shortly after the war the United States took off controls and prices rushed up very rapidly. Some people were inclined to say that we should have taken them off also and allowed our prices to run up just as rapidly. In other words we should have sold in the American market. Whether it was right or not, we did not do that; we maintained our prices at lower levels not only for food products but for labour and everything else. My hon. friend shakes his head. Probably there were a few things that one would buy once in twenty years or once in ten years that were higher.

An hon. Member: Gasoline.

Mr. Gardiner: You can buy more gasoline with a bushel of wheat today than you could at any time over a long period. One hon. member said "What about rye?" I know this will not be an answer because I do not know where it came from.

An hon. Member: Assiniboia.

Mr. Gardiner: If it came from the C.C.F. group it will not be an answer. If it came from the Social Credit group, it will be an answer. If it came from the Conservatives, it will be an answer. Some people have been saying that we should have kept the market open all the time, that there should have been a free market, that we should have let prices go where they would. Well, we did that with one product and I am going to tell the house why it was done because I was the culprit in the picture.

When controls were put on back in 1942 reasons were given for doing that. The first was that we wanted to keep down the cost of living in order that we could get more for the money that we were spending during the war period when we had to spend great sums of money to do the things that we would not do in ordinary times. It was thought that we should keep down wages in order to keep down the cost of production. We were working toward that end. With a few exceptions we controlled everything.

One thing we did was this. We did not tie the prices of food produced by the farmer to the price of the month period to which we tied almost everything else. We allowed the price of live hogs, we allowed the price of live cattle, and we allowed the price of grain to go up to higher levels before we put on absolute controls which resulted in those prices not going higher. Not only did we do that; we entered into contracts with Britain which took all our surplus at higher prices than we could have got in other places at that time. In other words, we improved the condition of the producers of food during that period.

That is one reason why the prices of food products were allowed to get up to a level which was much higher than the level at the time the prices of other products were fixed. Does anyone believe that the price of hogs did not go up between 1942 and 1945-46? Of course it did. Does anyone believe that the prices of farm products did not go up during that period? An effort was made by some people in this country—it was not the government—to tie wheat at the price it was selling for at that time, that is 78 cents. But the government did not permit wheat to be tied at 78 cents and it went up until it reached $1.25 before any particular effort was made to control it.

The only thing the government did during that period was to take wheat that nobody else would take. There was not an elevator company in this country, farmer, co-operative or otherwise, that would buy a bushel of wheat during the early forties at 50 cents. They all came to the government and said: "Take this wheat off our hands; put it in the elevators and allow us money with which to build annexes to our elevators so we can store it". The government did everything to make it possible for this product to be carried on to a later time in order to assist the farmers over a difficult period.

I think these things ought to be said when a discussion is going on of the kind that is going on here tonight. Those things were done. That is the reason why farmers will tell you when you drive into their yards that they are able to put up a building now with less wheat than ever before. That is why they tell you that they are buying their gasoline, even at today's high price, for less bushels of wheat than they bought it before, or for less of the other farm products. These prices were not held at a dead level as of 1941. They were deliberately allowed to go up until they reached a higher level, and that higher level was maintained on products such as wheat right down to the end of the war. When wheat was sold at that price every single nickel was returned to the farmers with the result that the men who delivered during that period of time received another $60 million. We did not charge them the $60 million, Mr. Speaker, that we lost in the years just before that. We paid that out of the treasury.

When these people are figuring what has been lost and what has been gained they ought to go back to the beginning and figure the thing properly. If they figure it properly every one of them will come to the same conclusion that my friends have come to on rye. I got a letter from a man in Alberta the other day. He said, "I made a mistake. I put all my land in rye for the last three years, and I was hailed out for two of those years. This year it is down to less than $1 a bushel where I am." He hoped to get $4 a bushel for it when he put it in. That is what a so-called open market does for these fellows; that is what it does for them. Rye was around 50 cents a bushel when this thing started. Rye went right on up until it got to $4.30 a bushel. Farmers of the west put in rye against the advice of the government, against the advice of others. There was the offer staring them in the face; there was the propaganda from the grain exchange.

When I am on this question what I should like to say to my hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Ross) is this. I have heard him stand up in the house and say he is against the grain exchange.

Mr. Sinnott: It is not on the record.

Mr. Gardiner: I have heard him stand up in this house and say—

Mr. Ross (Souris): The hon. member for Springfield says that it was never on the record. I will show him in Hansard where I moved a resolution. He is not making a true statement of fact.

Mr. Gardiner: It is on the record.

Mr. Sinnott: Can you give us the date?

Mr. Gardiner: He can get the date, and if he does not get it I will get it, because it is on the record.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The minister will correct you.

Mr. Gardiner: The record shows my hon. friend has been against the grain exchange. The record shows that my hon. friend is in favour of the wheat board. That is a logical position to take; but when I listened to him the other day, putting forward all the arguments that anyone ever put forth in support of the grain exchange, I began to wonder whether he was arguing for what he believes in, or whether he was arguing for something that somebody else believes in. If so, I should like to have his reason why he was arguing for something somebody else believes in. In so far as rye is concerned, rye started out below 50 cents a bushel at the beginning of the war and ran up to $4.30. It dropped from $4.30 down to $1.14 at Fort William, according to yesterday's paper. That is a very good illustration of what happened to wheat in the first war.

When we are able to say now what we are able to say in that regard I think we have something that is worth putting before the people of the country from time to time. To finish my story on rye, I said I was going to tell you that I was the culprit. Back in 1942, when the argument was on to keep down the cost of living, I said that rye was a crop which did not enter into the cost of living in this country. We do not eat rye bread, or very little of it. We do not convert it into flour. Even our chickens will not eat it. We only get our hogs to eat it because they do not have anything else. They do not like it. I said, "It is not used generally by farmers for feed and it is not used generally by human beings for food. The people who grow it live in the driest areas of western Canada where it is most difficult for them to grow anything, and if they can get a higher price for it at the present time it is not going to hurt anybody very much. It is not going to affect our cost of living, so let them have it."

I found that people who will take your advice when the price is going up refuse to take it when the price is going down. Last year I was saying to people not in the drought area, "Get out of rye. One of these days you are going to take an awful bump." Some of them did not get out, and they have learned now why an open market is not as good a thing as some people think it is. There is nothing of the nature of socialism in the fact that a man says that one system of marketing is better than another. That is not socialism. It is not socialism to be on either side of the question. The system which we have had for the last seven or eight years, whatever it may have done in the past and whatever it may do in the future, is the system that operated to the satisfaction of our producers all over western Canada. I am sure that unless they can be shown something better they will support it right through the years.

On motion of Mr. Hansell the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: On Monday we will resume the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The Prime Minister has given notice of motion to give precedence to that debate.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 21, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR PRECEDENCE OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): With the unanimous consent of the house I should like to move the resolution of which notice is given on today's order paper, as follows:

That consideration of the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament have precedence over all business except introduction of bills, government notices of motions, questions and notices of motions for the production of papers, on and after Monday, February 21, 1949, until disposed of.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to suggest an amendment to the Prime Minister's motion. I may say that I have had a word with the Prime Minister about it, and I understand he is willing that my amendment be put to a vote of the house.

The amendment relates to the evening hours of sitting of this house. As hon. members are aware, there has been discussion from time to time about this matter, and it has been suggested that we change the evening hours to permit adjournment a little earlier than eleven o'clock. Last year the committee on procedure which sat, Mr. Speaker, under your chairmanship, made a unanimous recommendation that we change the hours so that, instead of sitting from eight to eleven, we sit from seven to ten. I understand that although there is considerable support for this proposal, there is some objection to it. There was also the objection that a standing order should not be changed without considerable thought.

My suggestion now is not that we change any standing order but rather that we make an experiment merely for the time during which the debate on the address is before the house. The house, having experimented for two or three weeks with a different set of evening hours, would then be in a position to decide whether it wished to continue on that basis.

I should like to add this further word, Mr. Speaker, before I read my proposed amendment. In Your Honour's committee last year I personally supported the proposal that the evening hours be from seven to ten. There are some, however, who feel that by its adoption the dinner recess would be too much shortened; therefore as an experiment I suggest that for the next two or three weeks we try sitting in the evenings from 7.30 until 10.30. This would mean no change in the total number of hours we sit each day, but would enable all of us in this chamber, including those who must be here because we are—page boys, Hansard reporters, members of the press gallery, and so on—to get home a half hour earlier.

Had I felt that there was strong objection to an amendment being proposed to the Prime Minister's motion, I would have merely have put it forward as a suggestion. But the Prime Minister tells me he is prepared to let the house make its free decision in the matter. In that spirit, therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson):

That the last three words of the motion be deleted and the following substituted therefor immediately after "1949":

"Provided that, except on Wednesdays, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair at six o'clock p.m. until seven-thirty, and shall adjourn the house at ten-thirty p.m., without question put, until consideration of the said speech is disposed of."

I think the amendment speaks for itself. If it carries, the experiment will be made only while the address is being debated, and the house can then decide what it wishes to do.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member showed me the amendment he wished to move, I consulted my colleagues and we came to the conclusion that we would not attempt to influence in any way the decision that hon. members might wish to make upon this proposed experiment of having the house sit from 7.30 to 10.30 p.m. Unless something else is ordered in the meantime, this would be only for the duration of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The words "except on Wednesdays" are clear, because on Wednesdays, as provided by the standing orders, the house would continue to rise at six o'clock.

The position of the government is that this is a matter which should be disposed of in the manner which best suits the convenience of the greatest number in the house. If the majority of hon. members feel that we should try these new hours of sitting while the debate on the address is in progress, the government offers no objection.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is it possible to move an amendment to the amendment? If so, notwithstanding the great inconvenience to hon. members from Ontario and Quebec I should like to move that we sit on Wednesday evenings and Saturdays. We cannot go home on Thursday nights and come back on Tuesdays. I cannot see the value of the hon. member's amendment.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Not having had the advantage that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his colleagues have had of considering this proposal prior to its being made in the house today, we are confronted now with a suggestion, which may have considerable merit, as to the hours of sitting. But it seems to me that rather than submitting a motion of this kind to a snap decision of the house it would be better to defer it until tomorrow, and in the meantime let all the parties consult their members in the matter. I do believe there is a general feeling that some changes in the hours of sitting might well be made. But if that is to be done, let us seek common agreement, without being called upon to make a snap decision now which may or may not be in accord with the general feeling of hon. members. I suggest, therefore, that the amendment stand until tomorrow. I imagine that all hon. members would agree to have the matter brought up without advance notice, and in the meantime it will be possible to ascertain the general feeling of hon. members in this regard.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I ask the leader of the opposition one question? I should like to know if he meant that we should consult the provinces.

Mr. Drew: I admit that we have heard a great deal about that in the past few days, but if I did use that expression, I meant hon. members of this house. I must admit that there has been an attempt in some instances for hon. members to identify themselves with their provinces, and it would be a natural error to fall into. I am not aware that I did make it, but if I did, that might be a reasonable explanation. I repeat my suggestion that in order that we may reach a satisfactory solution of this matter, which has been under discussion before, an opportunity be given to all parties to consider it.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the two hon. members from this group who propose this change in the hours of sittings of the house did so, I presume, for themselves. So far as I am concerned, I do not think the difference would amount to much. Half an hour would be juggled in between. I think the house should convene at nine o'clock in the morning and go through until six in the evening. Let the house do a full day's work, and then hon. members may dispose of their time afterwards as they see fit.

Mr. Mitchell: May I ask my hon. friend, who is an old trade unionist, a question? Would it be time and a half for the other three hours?

Mr. Ferguson: May I suggest that if the government would run the country in a more businesslike way we would all be able to stop work at six o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must remind hon. members that there is a motion before the house, and an amendment. Hon. members know that the rules prevent their speaking on a motion as often as they wish.

Mr. Knowles: On a question of privilege, sir, perhaps you will permit me to answer what I regard as a reasonable request on the part of the leader of the opposition. If the house will give its undertaking that we shall consider the matter tomorrow as a substantive motion, I am willing to withdraw the amendment. We can hardly let both the motion and the amendment stand over, because that would prevent the house from going on with the address today. If the house will give that assurance, I shall be glad to let this matter stand for consideration and decision by the house on a free vote at three o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre shall have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) withdrawn.

Motion (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN HOME ASSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East) moved the first reading of Bill No. 28 (from the Senate) to incorporate the Canadian Home Assurance Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

OTTAWA TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION—OTTAWA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West) moved the first reading of Bill No. 30 (from the Senate) respecting the corporation of the city of Ottawa, Ottawa Transportation Commission and the Ottawa Electric Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

AMENDMENT AS TO AGGREGATE AMOUNT OF LOANS, LIABILITIES AND EXPENDITURES

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 29 (from the Senate) to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BULGARIA

CHARGES AGAINST PROTESTANT CLERGYMEN —CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct to the Prime Minister a question which relates to one which was asked earlier. In view of the reports that fifteen Protestant ministers in Bulgaria are to be tried next Monday, may I ask the Prime Minister what steps are being taken by the government in the matter? Perhaps at the same time he might indicate, in view of the fact that the question has already been raised, the position of the government in connection with the trial of Cardinal Mindszenty, and what steps have been taken in that regard.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before I left the city on Friday, some notes had been prepared for a statement I expected to make today. The notes were extended during my absence, and I received them only a short time ago. Upon reading them I find they are not quite in the form in which I should like to have them. I should prefer, therefore, to make the statement tomorrow afternoon.

IMMIGRATION

COUNT JACQUES DE BERNONVILLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources. Is the minister prepared at this time to make a statement about Count Jacques de Bernonville?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the intention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North to ask a question reached me through my secretary; however, the question of which I received notice was somewhat different from the one which has been placed before me today.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I am not going to make a statement at the present time in connection with this case, except to say that Count Jacques de Bernonville, a citizen of France, did apply in Montreal for permanent admission to Canada. His application was rejected because he did not come within the admissibility clauses, and further, because he was certified as being a prohibited person, on medical grounds.

Count Jacques de Bernonville appealed against that decision, and I dismissed the appeal. He then took habeas corpus proceedings, and the press has informed me that the appeal was granted this morning. I have not seen the judgment, but I have instructed my officials to have the immigration board reconstituted and the case proceeded with, on the assumption that what I am informed by the press is correct.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I apologize to the minister for the rewording of my question.

INCOME TAX

APPEAL BOARD—INQUIRY AS TO OPERATIONS AND PROCEDURE—SITTINGS OUTSIDE OF OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. I am sorry I did not give him notice, but perhaps he will make a statement tomorrow. When will the income tax appeal board begin its sittings, and what procedure would be required of applicants? Will the minister also indicate the method by which the board will inform the public where and when they will be in various localities?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The income tax appeal board comes under the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of National Revenue. Perhaps he will answer the question.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The income tax appeal board is already set up, and is functioning to the extent that regulations are being drawn up under which the board will act. The office of the board will be on Mackenzie avenue, in the offices formerly occupied by the wartime prices and trade board. If the regulations were not in last Saturday's Canada Gazette, they will be in the Canada Gazette of this week.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. What arrangements have been made to have the new income tax appeal board sit in the provinces in the west? Is it to sit only in Ottawa?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): It is the intention of the income tax appeal board to hold sittings from time to time in different parts of the country, but an itinerary has not yet been arranged.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ARTILLERY RANGES—HALIBURTON COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.) I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Is it true that a new artillery range will be established in Haliburton county? If so, where; and will the one at Petawawa be abandoned?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): There is no intention whatsoever of abandoning the range at Petawawa.

Mr. Hodgson: The minister answered only my second question.

Mr. Claxton: I am sorry; I did not hear the first question.

Mr. Hodgson: Is it true that an artillery range will be established in Haliburton county?

Mr. Claxton: I will have to look into that matter, but I would doubt it very much. The two major ranges we have in Canada are at Petawawa and Shilo. Certainly I have not had submitted to me for my approval any suggestion respecting a further artillery range. However, one may be under consideration; I shall make inquiries and answer the hon. member as soon as those inquiries are made.

With regard to Petawawa, a considerable extension of buildings and equipment has been going on. The range is being developed rather than curtailed.

Mr. Fulton: With the big guns of the Liberal party.

TELEPHONES

QUESTION AS TO USE OF RECORDING DEVICES BY MINISTERS AND PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, how many cabinet ministers and parliamentary assistants have recording devices attached to their telephones? What is the purpose of such devices, and who installed them?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I received notice of the question only about an hour ago, and was able to get in touch with the cabinet ministers who are present today. I can say that not one of them has the recording device referred to in this question. One of my colleagues—possibly two—I have not been able to reach, and I have not had time to reach the parliamentary assistants. I shall communicate with each of them, and then I shall bring down a return in the form which would be considered proper if the hon. member's question had been placed on the order paper and an order for return made in respect thereto.

WHEAT

AGREEMENT WITH BRITAIN—QUESTION OF ECA SUPPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question might be directed to either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It has to do with an article in the Financial Post of last Saturday to the effect that Canada stands in great danger of losing economic co-operation administration support for her wheat agreement with Great Britain. The article continues: "Whether the fund will then be withdrawn from us, or whether an alternative solution can be found"—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —"is not clear." My question is this: While in Washington did the Prime Minister deal with this matter? It is of great importance to Canada. Is there any danger at the present time of the United States withdrawing ECA support in relation to the purchase of British wheat in Canada under the United Kingdom agreement?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The hon. member's question is similar to one from the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), of which I received notice when I came into the house. His question is expressed as follows: "Would the Prime Minister state whether during his recent visit in Washington he received any American assurance that Canadian wheat will continue to be purchased under the Marshall plan, despite the present United States surplus?"

The conversations I had with the President of the United States covered a fairly wide range of subjects, and were of course private and confidential. I cannot give any specific information at this time as to the views or conclusions which may have been reached in regard to the matters discussed. I can say, however, that the president indicated a friendly understanding of the Canadian position in regard to wheat exports. I do not think I should go beyond that, without asking special leave from the president to be more specific.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

DESTRUCTION BY FIRE OF ADMINISTRATION BUILDING AT VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Apparently the administration building and control tower of the Vancouver airport were destroyed by fire over the week-end. Are any steps being taken to make sure that the airport can be kept in full use, despite this loss?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The district controller of air services advised officials of the Department of Transport that the administration building at the airport had been destroyed on Sunday, but that the other services, such as radio, meteorological and lighting services, had not been affected and were in full operation. However the service had to close down on that day.

Today departmental officials have been informed that the air traffic centre is again operating normally. The building is owned by the city, but we are interested to the extent of several thousand dollars. All arrangements are being made to house the officers of the Department of Transport in radio and meteorological buildings.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask a question supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) in regard to the unfortunate airport fire. Will the minister give consideration to transferring the terminal of the T.C.A. to the only fog-free airport in British Columbia, located at Abbotsford in Fraser Valley?

RAILWAYS

PAINTING OF DIESEL TRAINS IN BRIGHT COLOURS TO ASSIST IN AVOIDING ACCIDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Last Friday the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) asked the following question:

In view of the increasing use of fast-moving diesel trains on our railroads, will the minister consider the advisability of providing that such trains be painted in some bright colour, such as yellow, to help highway travellers to see such diesel trains sooner and thus avoid fatal accidents?

I asked the officials of the board of transport commissioners to give consideration to the suggestion of my hon. friend, and I am informed that the question of using distinctive colours for diesel operated trains has been under consideration for some time by the board and the railway companies. In fact some discussions are going on at the present time, but no decision has been reached.

WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS OF SESSION OF 1947-1948—QUESTION OF NECESSITY FOR PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. Bentley (Swift Current): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, notice of which I sent him. Is the minister prepared to give a ruling as to the need for provincial legislation to make effective the amendments to the wheat board act passed at the last session of parliament?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The minister has not been asked for a ruling as to the need for provincial legislation to make effective the amendments to the wheat board act passed at the last session of parliament. The whole matter to which this ruling would refer is now under discussion with the premiers or their representatives, and with representatives of the farm organizations of the prairie provinces.

Mr. Knowles: Didn't you get your own letter?

GRASSHOPPERS

SASKATCHEWAN—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO MINIMIZE DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. McKay (Weyburn): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question, notice of which I have sent him. In what way is the federal government assisting in order to minimize damage likely to be caused in Saskatchewan by the heavy grasshopper infestation in that province?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): There has been a well-arranged understanding between the provinces and the federal government with regard to grasshopper infestation. We are carrying on this year in exactly the same manner as we have in other years in the matter of assistance.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, February 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, at the time this debate was adjourned I was speaking on the amendment to the amendment, and dealing with certain questions which had been raised having to do with dominion-provincial relations and with certain of the points which had been discussed.

In the course of the earlier discussions I was amazed to hear the suggestion that there was occasion for surprise at my having discussed subjects which were not clearly set out in the speech from the throne. If there is one principle which should apply in the debate on the speech from the throne it is that those who are not supporting the government on the motion should be able to point to things which have been omitted from the speech from the throne. To carry the argument to the ultimate absurdity that has been put forward would mean that it would only be necessary to present a speech from the throne which said nothing, and then there would be no debate at all. Obviously the less the speech from the throne says, the wider the field of discussion must be outside of the actual wording of the speech itself.

The speech from the throne is simply a statement by the government as to what it proposes to put before the parliament of Canada. They are not the words of the king's representative; they are the words of the government. Under our constitutional procedure the king's representative reads the statement of the government to the parliament of Canada. It is then the duty of hon. members speaking in the debate to examine that statement of the government, and to point out what they think should have been included, as well as any defects they see in the statement itself.

Having regard to the importance attached by many members of the opposition to dominion-provincial relations, as indicated in their speeches to this house, it is indeed surprising that there was no reference to that in the speech from the throne. It was because it is so vitally important that I discussed it.

I should like to point to something in the speech from the throne which, though it was brushed over lightly and without much comment, is of immense importance to hon. members of the house and to the people of Canada. In the first paragraph of the speech, reference is made to certain dangers in the existing situation, and it is stated that "one of these is the communist menace." A little later the speech refers to "international communism"—those are the words; nothing more. At another point it uses the words, "in striking contrast with communist countries", speaking of the situation here in Canada. Later on in the same paragraph the words "influence of subversive doctrines" are used. That is the only reference, direct or indirect, in the speech from the throne to the subject of communism and its effect on domestic conditions or external relations of Canada. I am convinced that among all the things with which we are called upon to deal, there is no single subject of greater importance than the threat of communism in the world, and the threat of communism right here in Canada.

In this house we have heard statements by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in answer to questions in regard to what would be done by this government in respect to the trial of Cardinal Mindszenty. Questions have been asked as to what this government proposes to do about the trial of fifteen Protestant evangelical clergymen who have been arrested in Bulgaria and whose trials are to commence next Monday. We also know that in recent months the Lutheran bishop of Hungary was arrested and is in custody. The same pattern is being established all over Europe on the other side of the iron curtain. In Paris only a few days ago Mr. Selden Chapin, United States minister to Hungary, now on his way home to Washington from Budapest, said:

> As far as conditions are concerned in the country I left yesterday I would like to say this much: that no one today, except the blind and the twisted, can fail to see that the Hungarian people are under the complete total domination of a group of Moscow-trained communists whose sole allegiance is to the Kremlin.

Those words, Mr. Speaker, describe the situation in every one of the countries of Europe where the communists have seized power. Today as never before we see the pattern of communist suppression taking its clear form and being displayed before the whole world through the press reports that come from those countries. As has not happened in centuries, all religion, and particularly Christianity, is being suppressed, is being persecuted, is being fought by the communists in accordance with the stated purpose of that vile doctrine, and in exact accordance with the promise of Lenin that they would fight religion in every way they could.

But this has been true at all times. The only difference now is that it is clearly before the eyes of every one of us to read, to see, and to understand. I am sure that there is not a thoughtful person in the world today who believes that the trial of Cardinal Mindszenty was anything but a cruel sham from beginning to end, and that every device employed by the vilest form of tyranny the world has ever known was used to produce precisely the pattern which is emerging already in Bulgaria. With the trial there a week away, the reports of reliable press agencies carry the story that two of the ministers who are to be tried have already made confessions of their guilt of supposed crimes that are parallel to those attributed to other religious leaders who have been persecuted in the same way on earlier occasions.

Surely no one can be so lacking in a sense of reality as to imagine that these religious leaders of different denominations and in different countries could, under any conceivable circumstances, all have been guilty of precisely the same technical offences in each country, although separated by hundreds of miles. Read the charges that are to be preferred in Sofia next Monday. They read almost word for word with those that were preferred against Cardinal Mindszenty, that were preferred against the Lutheran bishop of Hungary, that were placed before the clergymen who were tried earlier in Roumania. It is the same pattern that has been followed through the whole of Europe on the other side of the iron curtain.

The whole picture of cruel and vile suppression of religious freedom, which is now unfolding before the eyes of the free world, follows right through from the murder of the metropolitan of Russia immediately after the revolution of October 1917. Through the years it has been the same; through the years communists have sought to destroy the firm rock of Christianity throughout the world because they know that it is the strongest defence against the evil doctrines that they preach. We have gone through a period when it was difficult for people to realize that this suppression of religious freedom was a reality. In fact misguided religious figures have come to this country, and to other countries, and said that there is in fact religious freedom in Russia today, and that there has been religious freedom throughout the years. It is difficult to use temperate words in describing the effect of such a misinterpretation of what has been going on in Russia. In this regard I am not depending upon secondhand information. I have seen the anti-religious museums in Russia. I saw the anti-religious museum on Gorki street in Moscow, where any visitor to Moscow before the war could have seen it and should have seen it, because it was operated by the state; and it was recorded in their literature describing the things that should be visited in Moscow. It was used for the purpose of holding up to ridicule everything that people who believe in Christianity hold dear.

That anti-religious museum is not there today. In the intervening years the leaders of communist organization in Russia decided that it would be easier to gain the support of the western world if they removed this evidence of their real purpose. Therefore the large anti-religious museum on Gorki street has been torn down, as have other anti-religious museums which I saw there before the war. These were only the visible and clear expressions of a determined effort by the state to suppress religious observance in every way, and to try to instil in the minds of the children growing up in Russia a lack of faith in the religion of their fathers and their mothers. It has not succeeded; the core of religion is still strong there, but only because of the inner faith in the hearts and minds of the Russian people themselves.

What we are seeing now is part of the clear, stated pattern of the communist party in Russia and in every land where it gains power. They are opposed to all religion; but, as it happens, it is the Christian faith that is coming most directly in contact with communism today in all those countries throughout Europe where it has been such a deep and fundamental part of the lives of the people ever since the beginning of the Christian era. Never before in the lifetime of any one of us was there so much reason for unity of purpose on the part of Christians of every denomination, who see their beliefs challenged by this anti-Christian, anti-religious force which has spread its power over such a great part of Europe within the past few years.

The Prime Minister has stated that tomorrow he will make some statement in regard to this matter. When that statement is made I hope it will leave no doubt about the indignation of the government of Canada, of this House of Commons and of the people of Canada that freedom of worship should be suppressed and challenged as it is challenged in so many parts of the world today. I hope that from this house will go clear and positive evidence of the indignation we feel, and that on the part of all free nations there will be expressions of indignation more vigorous, more challenging and more effective than anything yet uttered in regard to the indignities which have been visited upon religious leaders in Hungary, Bulgaria, Roumania and other countries of eastern Europe.

But it is not only what we say, Mr. Speaker. The vigour and promptness with which our indignation is expressed will have much to do with the effectiveness of the course that is to be followed. We are only one nation, it is true, among many nations; but the voice of Canada is respected in Europe and throughout the world, and our motives are not challenged. Few voices could be raised which would be heard with greater respect than that of this free nation, which, with its thirteen million people, has come to occupy such a tremendously important position in the family of nations. As a nation we have our own responsibility, which is not dependent upon the course followed by any other nation. Whether or not any other nation is prepared to state its position vigorously, whether or not any other nation is prepared to express its condemnation in terms that can leave no doubt, our duty is clear. We should say what we think of these outrageous breaches of the most precious of all the freedoms that have been assured to the peoples of the world by the charter of the United Nations. That charter, signed by Russia and by many of the nations in which religious and other freedoms are being suppressed, is the instrument under which the meetings of the United Nations take place. It seems to me that if the meetings of the United Nations are to have any sense of reality whatever there is no subject that can be placed on the agenda ahead of the subject I am now discussing, and there is nothing that calls more strongly for immediate action by the members of the United Nations than the barbaric conduct of the communist governments of those countries which take their orders from the Kremlin. At this supremely critical hour in the history of the world, let us as Canadians speak with a strong, determined and united voice, making it clear that no matter what may be said in any other land we are agreed that by every means within the authority of the United Nations, of which we are a member, steps should be taken to restore that freedom which was promised when the nations met at San Francisco and signed this historic charter.

As we examine the events happening abroad, as we look at the evidence of this vile tyranny never exceeded in its cruelty or barbarity in the long history of mankind, we should not only consider what our responsibilities may be to those beyond our borders who suffer under that tyranny today. It seems to me that at such a time we should consider the position right here in Canada, and what we should do with the communists who are seeking to undermine the strength of this great and free state. Many woolly-minded intellectuals still toy with the idea that communism in Canada is just another form of political thinking, and that under no circumstances should we place it in any different category from that of other political points of view which we say should be freely expressed, no matter how much we may agree or disagree with them. Those who argue that communism is only another form of political thought cannot have carefully examined what the Canadian communists themselves have said to be their purpose. As we have impressed upon us so dramatically what has happened in such beautiful free lands as Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Roumania, Poland, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia, to say nothing of the Baltic states, with their ancient traditions of freedom going back centuries before our own, it seems to me we should examine just what the communists have told us really is their purpose.

Of the intention of the communists within our borders, we in Canada have a more accurate statement than exists in any other country. That is the result of two extremely important and useful series of trials which took place some fifteen years or more apart. In the first of those trials Tim Buck, the then leader of the communist party here in Canada —and he is still the leader of that party— was convicted along with seven other communists and sentenced to a term in the Kingston penitentiary. Following the discovery of espionage activities here in Ottawa and elsewhere, further trials took place, and we have a clear, unchallenged and unchallengeable statement of what the communists really intend to do. Let me just read their own words, and only a few of them; they leave a clear picture of what they are trying to do.

In no field of human relationships have the communists been more active than in that of labour relations. That is so because of their stated purpose. In the past few days in the press we have read of the vigorous disputes which are taking place within the ranks of organized labour in this country and of how those who are opposed to communism are challenging those who support communist ideas and who today occupy official positions in unions in this country. For that reason it is well for us to see just what Tim Buck himself has said as to the purpose of this activity. These are his own words, and they are in recorded evidence which, fortunately, is preserved and will be preserved. I am quoting from a statement made by Tim Buck to his lords and masters in Moscow as to what they were trying to do here in Canada. These are his words:

> The political line of our party is to utilize this tendency of radicalization by adopting a policy of developing demands and initiating movements in different industries . . . On account of the position of the Canadian working class it is necessary to develop demands in advance rather than merely wait for sporadic outbreaks. Spontaneous strikes do not generally assume the proportion or the possibilities that the spontaneous strikes in the United States do, because of the difference in the size of the centres and the industrial concerns. The political value of these strikes therefore tends to be less, unless we ourselves can prepare them in certain industries. The result is that we have adopted the policy of developing demands in many industries and on this basis sharpening relations and developing strike movements.

That is a clear enough statement of what their purpose is. What then do they seek to achieve if they are able to carry forward that first objective?—which, I might say, is similar to the stated objective put forward in a circular recently sent out to every communist in Great Britain by the head office of the communist party there. Is this line just for the purpose of causing friction and dispute? No; it is not. Again we have Buck's words as to what their intention is:

Once we have mastered the political strike, the general strike is but a step. And the general strike during a political crisis is the gateway to revolution.

That language seems strong enough and clear enough. But the communists tell us, while they are still putting on their mild and false fronts, that they are not talking about a revolution such as the Russian revolution or any of the other bloody revolutions which they have stirred up and brought about in order to gain power. But again we do not need to guess what kind of revolution they mean, because the communists make sure that their party followers know the meaning of the words they use, and they have therefore defined "revolution" in their own statements. This is the definition used in their official statements:

Revolution means an historic event when one part of a population imposes its will upon the other part of a population by bayonets, guns and rifles.

That language is clear enough. No matter how mild or how honeyed may be the expressions of those who put forward the communist doctrine here in Canada, that is what they mean by the words they use. Those are the definitions they have given their own people. Those are the intentions they have put before them. What, according to their own words, is their ultimate objective by that bloody form of revolution? Again we have Buck's own words. Hitler was not the only one who put his purpose into book form. Buck, it is true, has not written quite so thick a volume but he has stated his purpose; and in one of his books "What We Propose", this is what he tells his followers and anyone who wants to read his words:

We shall lead the workers forward through struggles to power and the victorious establishment of our soviet Canada.

Let no member of this house or no Canadian laugh at the suggestion that these people are working deliberately, carefully and with an ultimate hope of success, for a soviet Canada. Let it be remembered that in Czechoslovakia, in Yugoslavia, in Bulgaria, in Hungary, in Roumania, in Poland, in Latvia, in Lithuania, in Esthonia, and in every country now under the communist yoke, there were times when the percentage of communists in the population was smaller than it is right here in Canada today. Let us not ignore the reality of this threat when one of the senior officials of the communist party in Canada can run for the office of controller in the city of Toronto and receive over 40,000 votes in the municipal election, coming within striking distance of being elected. In fact, on an earlier occasion this man was elected.

Mr. Mitchell: Is that the only place in which it happens?

Mr. Drew: No, it is not. I took Toronto, of course, because it happens that the total vote was larger there than in any other city; but unfortunately they have elected communist representatives in other municipalities and in other provinces. Because of this, and because of what they are trying to do, it may be well to read a few words more of what Buck has said. These are his words:

Few radicals realize the value, in a struggle such as this, of official positions in local bodies; and yet local officers have, if organized, tremendous power; and the education and training gained by holding such positions makes for local secretaryships, presidencies, vice-presidencies, etc., points of strategic importance, possession of which might easily make the difference between victory and defeat.

These words indicate exactly the course which has been followed in other countries. They obtain official positions of various kinds, and then use these official positions to gain power, and always to gain power with nothing but a very small minority of the population behind them. In this country, as I have said before, we have the evidence of what has happened. We have the evidence which has been produced at trials, and it is evidence given under oath. That is valuable to us and to others.

However, one of the reasons why communist activity has gone as far in Canada as it has, and one of the reasons why communist espionage in Canada had succeeded so well as it had, was that effective steps had not been taken earlier to suppress communism in Canada. I spoke about the first trial when Buck and several others were sent to Kingston penitentiary. They were sent to Kingston penitentiary under section 98 of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Parent: Who took it out?

Mr. Drew: That section was repealed by the government which still sits on the opposite side of this house, and they put nothing effective in its place. They left that place vacant in the Criminal Code and it is still vacant. Many people, including certain hon. members in this house, appear to have the idea that section 98 of the Criminal Code was an arbitrary provision directed at the suppression of communism. That is not so. Section 98 of the Criminal Code made it an offence to plan or to conspire to overthrow by force this free system of ours. It went further and provided that any organization which has for its purpose the overthrow of our free system by force could be declared by the courts an illegal organization, and that membership in that organization, with knowledge of that fact, was a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment.

Section 98 of the Criminal Code could have been improved and reworded, but it dealt with something that there should always be power to deal with. It provided a means of dealing with subversive organizations whose activities fell short of the very limited provisions which make it possible to convict for treason.

In the face of the words which I have read, namely, Buck's own statement that they are working for revolution, with their own definition of a bloody revolution, with their purpose declared as being a soviet Canada, who can doubt the evidence available to place before any court to show under a proper section of the Criminal Code that the communist party is a disloyal and treacherous party which should be denied the right to organize and to carry on its activities in Canada?

There are those who say that we must not endanger freedom. The very time when freedom is threatened is the time for freedom to be protected, and protected against those who do not seem to understand the seriousness of the subject with which we are dealing. It is extremely important that there be a provision which makes it possible to take into the courts those who are receiving their instructions from outside of Canada, and under those instructions from outside of Canada trying to set up a vile dictatorship here on the same pattern as has emerged in the past few years in so many countries in Europe. By all means, let us protect freedom, but freedom does not mean freedom to destroy freedom itself. We should make it possible by clearly defined, well-drawn provisions in the Criminal Code to have this subject dealt with by our courts in the true democratic way.

I am not suggesting for a moment that we should place on the statute books any statute which gives to this government, and this government particularly, power by order in council to deal with the freedom of any individual. I am not suggesting that power should be placed in the hands of this government, and particularly this government, to hold inquiries in secret as a basis of subsequent prosecution. Let us have a clearly drawn section of the Criminal Code which will make it possible for the courts to find that any organization which has as its stated purpose the overthrow of our free system is guilty of a criminal offence and that those who, as members of that organization, take an active part in an attempt to overthrow our system shall also be guilty of a criminal offence and punishable by a long term of imprisonment.

Let us go still further; it has been stated here that communists would not be employed in secret posts of the civil service, where their treacherous activities could so easily become effective on behalf of the sovereign state they serve.

Only a few days ago in Great Britain several highly skilled chemical engineers were dismissed because of their known communist affiliations. If it is a ground for denying the right to serve in the civil service, then surely it should also be a ground for denying the right to those people to sit in the parliament or the legislatures of Canada. If it is dangerous to have these people in places where their known treachery can undermine our system, then why permit them to sit in those legislative bodies where the laws of the country are made and where, even if only by power of suggestion, they can undermine confidence by their constant appeals to prejudice, and to the various slogans and devices they employ?

If anyone wants to know why communists are so often to be found actively associated with supposedly worthy objects, it is necessary for him only to go to Lenin, whom they follow rigidly and so precisely. Lenin put the proposition before them in this way:

> Is there a single class of the population in which no individual, groups or circles are to be found who are discontented and therefore inaccessible to our propaganda? Our task is to utilize every manifestation of discontent and to collect and utilize every grain of even rudimentary protest.

That explains the mechanism of their efforts. They seek the ground of discontent; they seek the ground of dissatisfaction; and then by joining in apparently innocent false fronts, they fan the flames of prejudice. They use slogans which have been handed down from the German, Karl Marx—and which, unhappily, are no less effective today than they were a hundred years ago. In fact, with all the power of radio, and other media of propaganda, they are more effective than ever before.

Unfortunately many people repeat those slogans and that type of propaganda, without realizing that these are weapons drawn from the arsenal of Karl Marx. With the threat abroad, and with the threat here at home, the highest duty of Canadians is to do all within their power to strengthen the fabric of Canadian life. We are told that the best way to resist the advances of communism is to create conditions in which communism cannot exist. Unquestionably, the worse conditions are, the easier it is to fan the flames of prejudice.

But it is not necessary for conditions to be bad in order to have communists carry on their activities, and in order to have others who are not communists repeating communist slogans, often without knowing where those slogans had their origin. The arguments of Karl Marx against our free system, written one hundred and one years ago and repeated over and over, are repeated now by other than communists. They undermine public confidence; they undermine respect for authority; and instead of assisting in improving the conditions of the people they serve only to delay the effective solution of problems by creating uncertainty, discontent and strife, which prevents that measure of cooperation and unity which would make it possible for people to join in bringing about a solution of any of our problems under our free system.

The draftsmanship of legislation is the responsibility of the government—because there are two aspects to every bit of drafting which must be done. One of those is the legislative, and the other the administrative. The best drafted piece of legislation will be ineffective unless it is properly administered, and with an intent on the part of those responsible for administration to carry it into effect.

Therefore under our system actual drafting is the responsibility of the government itself, in respect of those matters of major importance which are incorporated in our great laws, and which they must administer. The Criminal Code is one of those in which administration goes hand in hand with legislation. Because of that blank spot in the Criminal Code where section 98 once was, communists have been running free here in Canada, and have been doing their dangerous and deadly work with very little interference—except when their activities became so extreme that, consistently with the safety of the state itself, prosecutions at the very highest level could not be avoided.

But there is all this other activity going on today, activity which is not confined to any one field. Do not let anyone take from what I have said the suggestion that this is in only one field. Right here in Ottawa, through official representatives of governments, behind the iron curtain, communist propaganda moving pictures have been circulated in Canada and shown to Canadian children by various organizations masquerading under cultural names. I have seen those pictures: they are clever; they are dangerous.

These highly trained men, many of them trained in the school of political warfare in Moscow, organize very attractive-sounding social groups, invite the children in and show them pictures of what is happening in the lands behind the iron curtain. I remember one picture taken in Budapest itself, a place about which we have heard so much, and about which at this time we should hear so much. That picture showed the scene of destruction. It showed all the beauty of Budapest destroyed by the cannonade at the close of the war. It was stated that the picture showed the destruction that had been done by the German army which was serving the cause of the capitalist west. But then in came the communist army and with garlands draped about their necks and with love exuding from every pore they marched along the streets, acclaimed by the population which realized that salvation was being brought to them under the hammer and sickle.

They did not tell anybody that those pictures showed the destruction that had occurred through the wanton actions of the Russian artillery, absolutely unnecessary action at a time when resistance in the city had ended. There had been destruction, but all those beautiful spots along the Danube, the Fishermen's walk, St. Stephen's church, the Golden bridge, all those things that have inspired a sense of pride in those who have seen them over long, long years, were destroyed, mainly by the wanton activities of the Russian army itself. But communist propaganda will use any destruction in an event of that kind as grist to their mill.

These things have been going on and I suggest that the time is long overdue for the government of Canada to instruct every official office which represents any country now dominated by a communist government that if it is to remain here it is not to circulate communist propaganda in that way. We even had an example of effrontery in one of these ministries taking it upon themselves to attack me as premier of Ontario. I am not concerned with any personal attack, but I occupied an official office, as do others in this country. A communist ministry issued a paper criticizing a statement I had made about the activities of certain communists behind the iron curtain and the publication of a letter which indicated their efforts to threaten people here in Canada. Just imagine what would happen to anyone in their country who had the temerity to circulate for general publication criticism of the all-powerful government within their land. Let us show these people that when they have official representatives here, no matter how wrong their ideas may be and no matter how foul the system which they serve may be, we do not want any of their activities carried on in Canada outside of their own official places.

Therefore I urge, and in urging I hope that this will be dealt with in the spirit of urgency which it demands, that there be drafted a clear and explicit and effective section of the Criminal Code along the lines I have suggested so that by appropriate judicial decision in our courts, consistent with the great traditions of our free laws, those who seek to impose a foul and evil dictatorship here in Canada shall receive the punishment they deserve.

I should like now to refer to something that was stated earlier in the debate. In his reply to my earlier remarks the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) challenged me to give an example of centralization. We have several examples before us in the resolutions that we have been called upon to deal with, one of which has been considered already. They embody, within the powers dealing with the control of industry, the control of agriculture and the control of currency, as wide a measure of centralized power as any country has ever had in years of peace.

I want to refer to another example of centralization which seems to have escaped the government's attention. It is a very old statement that power to govern is the power to tax. It is perfectly clear that if any government is to have full discretion to do those things that it thinks should be done on behalf of the people it serves, whether it be a national, provincial or municipal government, it must also have discretion over the amount of the revenue which it can raise to carry out its responsibilities. If it has not that discretion then its legislative discretion obviously is limited.

We had great centralization in Canada during the war years. As has been said, the provinces of Canada concurred in that centralization as a temporary measure because the waging of a war, of the nature of the war in which we were engaged, called for the centralization of direction of military production, of military supplies and of all other supplies which seemed to justify a corresponding centralization of provincial power. But it will be recalled, and I want to repeat it, that when the government asked the provinces to agree to centralization of that kind they gave their solemn undertaking that at the close of the first full fiscal year after the end of hostilities the taxing powers of the provinces would be restored undiminished. That undertaking has been honoured only in its breach.

Let us see exactly what has happened in regard to the taxation with which the various levels of government carry on their business. In 1939 the taxes collected from the taxpayers of Canada, who are the same taxpayers no matter which administrative body draws the taxes, amounted to $915 million, which was divided as follows:

Dominion government	$468,000,000
Provincial governments	172,000,000
Municipal governments	274,000,000

I ask you to realize the implications of those figures. They constitute the following percentages of total taxes collected from the taxpayers of Canada: The dominion government collected 51·2 per cent of all taxes, provincial governments collected 18·8 per cent, and municipal governments collected 30 per cent. May I repeat those figures, because the position has changed so greatly. The dominion government collected 51·2 per cent of all the taxes collected from all the taxpayers of Canada; provincial governments collected 18·8 per cent; and municipal governments collected 30 per cent.

Let us see what has happened in the intervening years. The year 1947 is the last full fiscal year for which figures are available, and the figures used are to the date nearest to December 31 ending a fiscal year. The dominion government was then collecting $2,452 million; the provincial governments collected $398 million; and the municipal governments collected $346 million. But let us see what happened to the percentages. The dominion government is now collecting 76·7 per cent of all taxes collected from all taxpayers. The provincial governments are collecting 12·5 per cent, and the municipal governments 10·8 per cent. If it were possible to imagine greater centralization than that, I would find it difficult to suggest what it could be.

There are other percentage figures which illustrate even more vividly what has happened—the percentages of the total amounts collected by the different governments in relation to the amounts collected in 1939. In 1939 the dominion government collected $468 million, and in 1947 $2,452 million, an increase of 423 per cent. In 1939 the provincial governments collected $172 million, and in 1947 they collected $398 million, an increase of 131 per cent. In 1939 the municipalities collected $274 million, and in 1947 they collected $346 million, an increase of 26 per cent.

Let us see what this means. Municipal councils, and they are municipal governments, those local governments that are closest to the people and which do those things which in many ways are of most concern to the people in their daily lives, have had greatly increased responsibilities in the intervening years. Yet because of the centralization of taxation those municipalities are able to increase their revenues by only 26 per cent. When you consider the commodity value of the dollar you find that in the actual working dollar the municipalities are collecting less today than they were in 1939. That is the reason that so many of our municipalities are now pressing at every meeting of municipal bodies in every province of Canada for a general adjustment of the taxation structure of the country, so that they may be able to obtain adequate revenues for their tremendously important responsibilities without stifling the initiative of those who want to buy or build homes in these communities.

One of the reasons that there are some limitations on the possibility of building homes in many communities today, when the bank deposits of our people are at such a high level, lies in the concern about municipal taxes as they are. If many of these municipalities carried out all the things that they really want to do, and legitimately want to do, on behalf of their people, they would have no choice but to increase still further the burden of municipal taxation. The tremendous centralization of taxing power is having its impact upon the ability of municipal governments as it is having its impact upon the discretion and the power of provincial governments to carry out their many duties.

In the course of this debate the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) explained that, while I was premier of Ontario, I put before the conference held in Ottawa figures which it is was impossible for the dominion government to consider, and therefore they had no choice but to end the conference and refuse to call it together again. Let us see exactly what has happened in that respect. We put forward proposals at that conference, and Mr. Ilsley said that no government with any sense of responsibility could have considered them. It is very interesting to see what happens when times change, and when a government seeks to gain the favour of the provinces by progressive increases of the contributions they are making. I made proposals on behalf of the province of Ontario—and they were not the only proposals—which the dominion government should have examined. They should have examined them, and they should have come back and met us again after they had.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): For 1939 he gave a figure of $468 million representing the taxes imposed by the federal government, and for 1947 the figure he gave was $2,452 million.

Mr. Drew: That is right.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Can the hon. gentleman tell us what amount of the increase was owing to the fact that we were at war, and that we were spending for war while the provincial and municipal governments were not?

An hon. Member: Not in 1947.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): During all those years.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, there is no question about very substantial payments being made on account of the war; no one would suggest otherwise. But anybody would be far from reality if he suggested that the whole or even the major part of the increase was the result of what we expended on the war. It is true this concentration has developed during the war years, but it is also true there has been a great concentration of powers, and the entry by this government into fields that were not their own. I shall follow my own trend of thought and then come back to that point. That will be more simple, because I want to deal with one minor example, but one which illustrates my point. Under the proposals that I put before the Ottawa conference in the spring of 1946, the adjusted payments on those proposals, having regard to increases in population and so on, would be $235,656,000. That is to all the provinces if all provinces had accepted payment from the dominion government under our proposals in a transitional agreement. The figure is $235,656,000. The actual amount that is being paid now on the payments that are being made to seven provinces under the Abbott proposal is $240 million, or $5 million more than the proposals I put forward at that time. Yet we were told by Mr. Ilsley at that time that no government with a sense of responsibility could have accepted them. If that is so I can only suggest that a proper definition be found of the action of this government in raising the ante as it did.

The fact is that at that time six taxes were being collected by the dominion government which previously had been collected by the provincial governments alone. They were the succession duty, the amusement tax, the gasoline tax, the stock transfer tax, the parimutuel betting tax and the tax on electricity; and the total of those at that time was $102 million. They said they could not give those up; they could not think of it. The only one they have not given up is the succession duty. The other provinces kept urging for further consideration. They got it, and one by one those other taxes were given up. That is what has happened in the years intervening since the adjournment of that conference.

I was asked a question a moment ago, and I want to point out how a great many of these costs could be checked and where a certain amount of care could well be exercised, and why it would be highly desirable to have an inquiry into government administration similar to the Hoover commission in Washington. In a flattering way hon. members opposite as well as some to my left seem to have been assiduous in reading past speeches of mine, to which I pay much less attention today than they seem to. The interesting thing, however, is that throughout all those speeches I was emphasizing a basic principle which has never changed; that is, that I believe under our federal system there should be a strong central government with clearly defined powers and there should be strong local governments with clearly defined powers, all having taxing powers, clearly defined, adequate to carry out their responsibilities. For years I have criticized overlapping as between the dominion government and the provincial governments. I have criticized increased overlapping on the part of the dominion government, as I have criticized overlapping by the provincial governments. By such an inquiry as was urged by myself and others at the dominion-provincial conferences that overlapping could be effectively eliminated.

Let me give an example of the sort of thing that happens when you do not have an orderly functional relationship between the governments. Reference has been made briefly to this point already, but I think perhaps it will illustrate the way in which savings can be made and overlapping avoided. Under our constitution hospitalization, except military hospitalization, is under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. Personal health is under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. The responsibility of the federal government is in another field. In the discussions that have taken place it has been proposed that the dominion government should join in a plan under which financial provision would be made for a uniform health and social security plan covering the whole of Canada. Under our constitution, unless it is amended or changed by agreement, the administrative responsibility would rest with the provinces. But I want to give an example of the sort of thing that can creep in where you have not this clearly defined functional relationship, which does not exist today for one reason only, and that is the refusal of the dominion government to carry on these conferences. The treatment and care of the Eskimos is under the dominion Department of National Health and Welfare. Unhappily these Eskimos suffer greatly from tuberculosis. Already brief reference has been made to the construction of a hospital at Moose Factory near the mouth of the Moose river where it flows into James bay. Something was said about the fact that the contract for the construction of that hospital was let by order in council, without tenders being called for, and that the usual procedure was not followed.

Let us see exactly what happened. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) decided there should be a hospital in that area to care for the Eskimos; and no one who has seen the conditions that exist around the shores of James bay and Hudson bay would question the necessity for providing effective hospitalization for these unfortunate people, who seem to be strangely sensitive to tuberculosis because of the change from their original native condition to the somewhat more protected life they now lead. But the procedure was rather unusual. On April 6 of last year an order in council was passed approving a project of the Department of National Health and Welfare for the construction of a hospital at Moose Factory, at an estimated cost of $1,500,000, and authorizing the Department of Public Works to proceed with the letting of contracts for this purpose. It was to be a 125-bed hospital, and unquestionably extensive hospitalization is needed. The construction of that hospital was undertaken, however, at a most difficult point. Doubtless many hon. members of this house have been in that area and know the low, flat islands in the estuary just south of James bay. No doubt many have been on the island where Moose Factory is located and know how soft the water-sodden silt is and how difficult it is to build over it, and what skill and great experience in building are required at that particular point. I am not going to enter today into a discussion on the comparative merits of building a hospital of this kind at Moose Factory over on the island or at Moosonee on the mainland. There are strong contentions both ways. Moosonee is served three times a week by regular railway service coming right to the town, and consequently has many advantages. In the summer it is about three miles by rather tricky water from Moosonee to Moose Factory, and everything going to that hospital will have to be transshipped. In the winter, of course, materials can be carried over the ice, and the route is shorter and less expensive than in summer. Most of the heavy material is in fact carried over the ice, and at the present time they are stockpiling about a thousand tons of coal, carrying it over the ice from Moosonee, to which everything must come by rail from North Bay.

Here is an illustration of why an effective functional relationship between the governments would be so important, and how money could be saved. Over long years the province of Ontario has operated extremely efficient tuberculosis hospitals. Many people who come to visit them regard them as among the best in the world in the treatment they offer. They are scattered across Ontario, and there is a large staff with a wealth of experience in treating tuberculosis.

Not only have they practical experience in hospitalization itself, but they have practical experience in the kind of buildings that are required, the type of room that is most suitable, the kind of clinical facilities that should be installed, and so on. Right from the outskirts of Ottawa through to the western end of the province are these great hospitals for the treatment of tuberculosis, with a wealth of accumulated experience behind them. If we were carrying on our health activities in this country with a due appreciation of businesslike methods, it would seem to me that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) would have gone to the Department of Health in Ontario for which this new hospital for the treatment of tuberculosis was to be put up—and was to be put up only because it happened to be the responsibility of the dominion government to deal with Eskimos—to find out from them something about their experience. He would have worked out, in co-operation with them, plans which would most effectively make use of the money that was to be expended for this purpose. He would have got some advice as to what would be the best kind of hospital.

It would also have seemed desirable that they consult those provincial officials who had the responsibility of building all these hospitals throughout Ontario, and avail themselves of their experience. Actually the province of Ontario has had some experience in building right in the area in question. We had just completed the construction of a modern school at Moosonee, and had acquired a good deal of experience which might have been helpful. What actually happened was this. By order in council a contract was let to the Sterling Construction Company Limited of Windsor, Ontario.

Mr. McGregor: That is getting close to home.

Mr. Drew: It was, of course, a fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare knew them. There was no doubt about that. But the fact is that they were not a firm with wide experience in construction of this kind; and there were available construction companies with wide experience.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not know what the intention of the leader of the opposition is. If he wishes to discuss that contract on the speech from the throne, I am ready, or will be later on, to answer him. When he says that the Sterling Construction Company had no experience in building hospitals—

Mr. Drew: I did not say that.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): —or buildings of this kind, I think he is wrong. I could show him the record to prove that they have had experience, and are actually constructing buildings of this type for the federal government.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Where is the point of order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I just want to put the facts straight.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The minister will have an opportunity to do that later on.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the leader of the opposition wishes to leave some impression that these people do not know their work, I must protest; because they have been doing a good deal of work for this government, and obtained their contracts after tendering for those jobs. In this case we could not get any tenders.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: I am quite aware of the fact that this company has had extensive contracts from this government.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And even from the Ontario government.

Mr. Drew: Yes, that is true. They have had some road construction contracts; and as the minister knows, of course, they were mainly a road construction company until they reorganized recently. Every one of the contracts they obtained from the Ontario government was by tender, opened in the proper way.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As I said, we asked people to tender on this building, but could not get tenders.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Reid: The minister has a right to reply.

Mr. Drew: I am quite aware of the fact that this company had a contract to do some hospital construction in London for the dominion government; I believe it was one of the military hospitals.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): For the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Drew: Yes, for the dominion government. But that is not Moosonee. What I said was that there are construction companies which have knowledge of building in that northern area where building conditions are of a strange and unusual nature. I find it most difficult to accept the proposition that, on a cost-plus basis, any of these experienced companies would not carry out a contract. They were not prepared to carry out a contract on a fixed basis because of the uncertainty connected with building in soft, shifting sand. But that is a totally different thing from building on a cost-plus basis. While the cost was stated to be in the neighbourhood of $1,500,000, the most recent estimate is $2 million; and it is generally accepted that it will be considerably in excess of that, as was pointed out by the officials of the Ontario Northland Railway at Moosonee who knew the conditions and who pointed out some of the problems that were confronting those who undertook this contract.

The point I am seeking to make is this. The matter is one that was raised briefly on a previous occasion but it illustrates the kind of thing that would not happen if there had been an effective businesslike relationship between those departments which have similar activities.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Public Works may say, oh, oh. I grant that this company might not get as many contracts without competition. But the fact remains that here was a case in which all the skill of the Department of Public Works in Ontario could have been made available to this dominion department in construction of that nature, because they had knowledge of this particular type of building. There would have been available also a wealth of information as to the problems to be faced, as to certain details of hospitalization, as to the desirability or otherwise of having a large hospital of this kind, costing $2 million or more, separated from the mainland completely for the best part of a month in the fall and for a month in the spring, during the freeze-up and break-up, when patients cannot even be taken in and out by air. All of these things would have been carefully considered. The situation that I have described spreads right across the whole piece. I am not arguing as between Moose Factory and Moosonee—

Mr. Bradette: Yes, you are.

Mr. Drew: Oh, no.

Mr. Bradette: Yes, you are, and I am going to answer that.

Mr. Drew: I am not. Please do not go back to that part of the country and suggest that I was, because I will take good care to read to the people the Hansard record of what I actually said. I do not want to say anything unkind to the hon. member who has interrupted, because in his earlier remarks he was most generous; and I feel sure he has no thought of misinterpreting what I said. He may not have been in this chamber when I spoke earlier and pointed out that it was not a case of deciding now which would have been best. That matter cannot be redecided. The construction is under way. What I am pointing out is that this is an example of the considerations that could have been examined jointly before this action was taken. If the argument were in favour of Moose Factory as against Moosonee, there were many considerations that could have been put forward with regard to the facilities that were required, as to alternative facilities on the mainland in certain cases, and so on. I am giving this illustration as an example of what could be repeated right across the board with regard to every department in which similar activities are engaged in by the two governments.

Mr. Hackett: That is true also in other provinces.

Mr. Drew: It is indeed. I was speaking of this instance, of course, because it had been raised earlier.

We speak of centralization. I want to refer to the emergency controls, the power over agriculture that we are asked to accept, foreign exchange control, and these other details. Of course in regard to foreign exchange control, it will be possible to deal with it in much more detail on other occasions and doubtless other hon. members will deal with it during this debate; but hon. members, in examining centralization, and in examining the dangers of centralization, and what has happened, could very well read and reread some of these orders which are being put before us now for consideration.

When we were discussing the emergency powers on Friday night the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his speech, which expressed many clear and understandable points of view in regard to the agricultural situation, left no doubt about his thought that there is nothing temporary about these controls which are before us in the emergency control legislation. In referring to the control on the price of butter he said, as reported at page 712 of Hansard:

> But what I want to emphasize is the fact that unless there is some kind of control some place that thing will happen in spite of what—

Mr. Knowles: Order. On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is not in order to quote in one debate the remarks made in another debate during the same session.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): I hope that the leader of the opposition will leave that matter until that resolution is before the house again and we are dealing with that subject.

Mr. Drew: I shall paraphrase what was said because it has a very direct bearing on what we are now discussing. The Minister of Agriculture made it clear that he had no thought that this was a temporary measure, but that it would be necessary to carry it on for years.

Mr. Gardiner: Not the measure, but some understanding.

Mr. Drew: Some arrangement in regard to it; but let us see just what that means. We are being asked to consider controls over industry, over agriculture and over foreign exchange, in a bill which calls it foreign exchange control but which is really more than that. It is import and export control. We are asked to do this under the continuance of emergency powers. The government have hardly even made the pretence of suggesting that there is an emergency in the real meaning of the word. They have hardly even bothered to put forward any contention that there is an emergency which would justify the extension of these wartime powers.

Remember that these emergency powers are in certain cases orders in council passed during the war. Emergencies are then given statutory effect by an omnibus statute which in turn gives them the effect of statutory law. The only possible ground for continuing these emergency measures is that we are still in an emergency similar to that which justified the passing of these orders in council at the time they were passed. The war ended in 1945, and this is 1949. There must be some time when government by order in council ends and responsible government by the parliament of Canada returns. There is not one of these measures which, if it is justified in the light of events and has constitutional support, could not now be put forward in the form of a proper statute defining the functions of the government, the responsibilities of the government, and the rights of those affected.

There is just a little tendency on the part of Canadians to examine the way that bureaucratic controls are creeping up in other lands, and without examining with sufficient care the extent to which bureaucratic controls are embedded in our legislation right now in Canada. The emergency controls are far-reaching to say the least; and these emergency controls are worded in such a way that they challenge every basic concept that we have of the right of the individual in time of peace to protect himself before a court under the properly stated laws of the land.

Last week we heard arguments that a desirable objective should not be defeated by any constitutional limitations. If these things are so desirable, state them in statutes; if these things are so desirable, define the powers; if these things are so desirable, give the individual knowledge of what he can do and what he cannot do, and give him some rights to protect himself. It is not enough to say that these people should have no rights anyway. That is the way dictatorship has come in other lands. When any of those who have public responsibility are prepared to support their theories by the argument that the theory is so good that protection should be withdrawn from any members of the community in that particular field, then we are asking to open the doors to authoritarian practices here in Canada. I do think that these orders which were carried forward last year, and which presumably are the same orders which are to be put before us again, should be read and reread by those who believe in the right of parliament to decide what the laws of the land will be and what our people can and cannot do.

Just let me read from one of these orders, and again it has nothing to do with the purpose of the order but with the way it is carried out. This is the provision in the order in council re-establishing the wartime industries control regulations. This section provides that a controller may make orders in regard to—and I am referring to subsection 2 of section 12 of that order—any books or records, and carry these books or records away and they may be held at the discretion of the controller. It goes on in subsection 4 to say that the powers conferred upon a controller to make any order shall include power to provide in such an order, by way of prohibition or otherwise, for any or all matters which the controller deems necessary to the effective operation of such order. Well, now, this is in Canada. It is in free Canada that a controller who has discretion can make any order as to anything that shall be done in order to carry out the purposes of this act, and in most cases without effective right of appeal.

Let us take the order respecting construction materials and priorities. Under section 2 the priorities officer shall have almost any power that any human being could need for almost any purpose without limitation. One of these, just indicating the breadth and scope, is section 2(e) which states:

> The priorities officer shall have power to take possession of or otherwise acquire any construction materials wherever found, and to use or to dispose of them.

And so it goes, right through the whole piece. Then, with all these wide powers, let us see something else. Section 5, headed "Delegation of Power", states:

> The priorities officer shall have power to delegate from time to time to any person or persons any power vested in the priorities officer under these regulations, including any power involving the exercise of discretion and any order made in the exercise by any such person of a power so delegated shall be final and binding unless and until it has been varied or vacated by the priorities officer.

Oh, we may think that these Canadian priorities officers could not do wrong. But that is a pretty wide measure of confidence to repose in any human being. The fact is that there is hardly a provision in any of the dictatorships which goes wider than that order today. And the only security we have against excesses and abuses is the common sense, discretion and decency of the Canadian people. Of course, they are human beings; they are not all perfect. And there is no one who has had contact with these activities who does not know that there have been many abuses of these very powerful provisions.

Unfortunately, often there is hesitation to take effective steps to bring public attention to them, as should be done. Then, section 6 goes on to state this:

> The priorities officer, any deputy priorities officer and any person acting for or on behalf of or under the authority of any of them shall not be or become liable to any person for anything done or omitted in the exercise or purported exercise of any power or authority from time to time vested in the priorities officer.

That means that the priorities officer can go out, pick up any person he likes and delegate authority to him. Then that person, with little or no knowledge of the act, may go out and do anything he sees fit to do; and if he even purports to be doing his duty under this act, there is no liability, no matter how great the damage is that he has done. That is what it means, exactly.

There is an old legal maxim which every lawyer in the chamber will know, and which states delegatus non potest delegare—a delegate cannot delegate. When this parliament delegates its authority to a controller, a deputy controller or some person he may name, there should be some limitation to the delegation of that authority; there should not be any denial of the right of redress to those individuals who may be affected by the things done by such controllers.

This is only symptomatic of the whole tendency of the government in connection with the exercise of many of its arbitrary powers. I hope members in the house have read the reports of the decision by the income tax branch as to how it was going to make sure that the waiters in this country did not escape payment of income tax on tips received. After all, if any waiter in Canada does not properly declare the tips he receives, there is a provision in the act by which he can be haled before the courts in the usual way. If he has failed to comply with the provisions of the act, he should be brought before the courts in the ordinary fashion, and have the right to the protection of the court as well as being made subject to any possible punishment the court may impose upon him.

But a new device is employed. Officials of the income tax branch are given the power to determine what they estimate to be the tips received, and then to impose income tax on their estimate of what the tips had been to the men or women in question. Surely that illustrates the extent to which these powers are being carried in various fields of government activity. The official of the department, in this and in other cases, becomes the person who makes the order; he becomes the person who enforces it; he becomes the person who carries it into effect. And this is a denial of what we all regard as the basic ideas of the protection of the individual by the free process of our courts.

I do again urge members, and particularly those on the government side, to read carefully these arbitrary powers, these orders in council carried forward by statutory enactment, and which we are asked again now, in 1949, four years after the termination of hostilities, to renew. There you will see the mechanism of dictatorship. There you will see power to exercise almost unlimited authority over agriculture, over industry and over the economy of our country. Wider powers could hardly be imagined. And those powers are exercised, not under the direct authority of parliament, but under the executive power of the government itself, without any clear definition of their limitations or purpose.

Objection has been taken to the suggestion that this sets up a police state. Well, there are those in this chamber who know how close we came to being a police state. There are those who can recall something very similar to a police state, and the exercise of police powers—

Mr. Cruickshank: In Ontario.

Mr. Drew: —for purposes that had no bearing on the welfare of our people, in fact, the use of the great Royal Canadian Mounted Police for purposes quite inconsistent with the traditions of that force.

But we do not need to emphasize that aspect of it. The police have been used improperly under some of these powers. But if it is not a police state, in the strict interpretation of that term, then it looks strangely like it at the border, in the way they carry out some of these extraordinary powers announced to the people of Canada over the radio, without the authority of parliament. If this is not a police state, at least it can be said without contradiction that these orders are creating a snooper state. We have the unpleasant and humiliating picture of a host of inspectors, of controllers, of priorities officers and of those who have had power delegated to them but who cannot be named in advance because they may be delegated anywhere at any time; all these people are snooping around trying to find grounds for prosecution under these loose, ill-defined and all too powerful orders that have been carried forward from the war.

It is time, and past time, for this free parliament to assert its right to pass laws under which the rights and duties of our people will be determined. If any of these powers should be carried forward, then let us stop pretending that they are wartime orders; let us have legislation dealing with the matter. In his remarks during the debate on the speech from the throne the Prime Minister said that he had offered every province the right and the opportunity to take over rent controls. He said that the replies he had received indicated how difficult it was to get the co-operation of the provinces in regard to some matters.

An hon. Member: Consent.

Mr. Drew: No, they are not content.

An hon. Member: Consent.

Mr. Drew: I thought the hon. member said "content" and I can assure him that they are not content. Any provincial government attempting to take over rent control, with these loose, undefined powers over supplies still in the hands of the dominion government, would not have the responsibility it should have as a provincial government. That was the reason they did not take them over.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Garson: Pardon the laughter.

Mr. Drew: It is most amusing to see the strange translation that has taken place since the former premier of Manitoba became Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice apparently needs to find some little pleasure to amuse himself and I am glad he got it from that silly remark he made.

An hon. Member: It was not so silly.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Justice seems to regard it as amusing that his successor as premier of Manitoba should have recognized the difficulties presented by a problem of this kind. It is one thing to say that they are ordinary rent controls, but the fact is that, because of the manner in which these loose and arbitrary powers over supplies have been exercised, rigid controls are necessary in order to prevent the chaotic conditions which would result from the confusion created by those powers.

If there is any right to extend, at this time, the order in council affecting rent controls, then there is a constitutional right to introduce a separate act dealing with rent controls, dealing with price controls and dealing with these other controls, in the ordinary way. If those acts cannot be passed under the present constitutional position, then there is no power in this parliament to continue those orders under a statute which gives them continuing authority. That kind of legislation would actually return to this parliament the responsibility it should assume.

The other day the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was speaking of one aspect of agricultural powers and of price control. He also is seeking an extension of his powers. It is true that in part those powers relate to the marketing of crops, but they give absolute authority to the minister to go onto any farm and seize any product of that farm. That again is not power that should be conferred on any minister, no matter how much we may think of that minister as an individual.

Mr. Gardiner: He has never done it.

Mr. Drew: If the minister does not agree that those powers should not be continued, then a proper act should be brought in clearly defining the responsibility and the manner in which deliveries of products will be made and the way in which contracts will be carried out with the assistance of those who are experts in the various fields of agriculture.

These arbitrary orders are having an effect upon our trade. Not only are these arbitrary orders affecting agriculture and exchange in the domestic field; they are stopping the movement of goods between our country and other countries, particularly between our country and the United States. In that respect I want to state our position, as it has already been stated, in order to leave no doubt as to where we stand in regard to unnecessary restrictions on the movement of agricultural and other products of that kind between Canada and the United States, or the other way.

The party to which I and those associated with me belong stated its position in this house some years ago, and it has been the position of this party down through the years. The Conservative government under Mr. Bennett in 1934 put before the government of the United States proposals which were clear and definite and which would have been effective. They were read into Hansard of February 10, 1936, and they can be summed up in the following quotation from page 60:

> The government of Canada is prepared to join the government of the United States in a declaration that their common objective is the attainment of the freest possible exchange of natural products between the two countries.

That is a clear statement of purpose that was put forward then and that has been carried forward to a limited extent, and it could well be advanced today. However, it is being restrained by many of these arbitrary controls which have been imposed under the orders to which I have referred.

There is before this house an amendment and an amendment to the amendment, and it is on that amendment to the amendment that I am speaking. In this debate this house has an opportunity to say by its vote that the time for arbitrary powers has gone; that the right of parliament to enact laws on behalf of the people should be restored; that any legislation which should be continued should be continued only in the form of proper statutory terms and that those things which we are asked to deal with should be dealt with only in the form of statutes.

From the attitude of some of the ministers, to say nothing of their supporters, it does not seem that they are very much impressed with the extent to which these arbitrary powers challenge the right of our free people to be protected by clearly stated laws which can be interpreted in the courts. If that is so, then the challenge is to every member on both sides of the house to say whether he believes in government by order in council or by the proper authority of parliament expressing itself in statutory form. They have a right and a duty to say whether they want the continuance of the snooper state, or whether they want a return to the free, democratic processes that were themselves in issue in the war that ended nearly four years ago.

The amendment to the amendment presents limited objections to the conduct of the government, and what is stated in the speech from the throne. That in itself might be interpreted as a general want of confidence motion, but it also might be interpreted as simply limiting criticism of the government to those points that are set forth in the amendment to the amendment. I for one do not feel that it touches upon some of the most vital points that are before us, and particularly the right of parliament to assert its authority as against the right to govern by order in council. For that reason I think that the amendment to the amendment is inadequate. There is an amendment before the house which is a straight motion of want of confidence in the government. There is before the house an amendment which, unless someone is trying to evade his responsibility to vote against the government, or unless he is unprepared to vote against the government, presents a clear statement of the issue. I hope that some of those members on the government side, who have criticized orders in council procedure outside parliament, will take this opportunity to express their views according to their conscience. If they do, and the other bodies in the house express their want of confidence in the government as they have outside, then the government will be defeated by the vote and will go to the country, as it should, so that the people can restore responsible government in Canada.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned two weeks ago last Friday we had listened to the first address of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). If I had followed him that evening I should have liked to have congratulated him on his maiden performance, and to have made some comments on certain advice he gave to the house and to Canada. Although a couple of weeks have passed since then, I think one of his comments may bear some consideration. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, as reported at page 237 of Hansard, said:

> In every country the communists have two great allies, social and economic injustice on the one hand, and political reaction on the other. If we can destroy these allies and build up a strong, healthy, and progressive society on a democratic foundation, we can destroy communism. That should be, I suggest, our purpose and our objective.

I submit that that is advice which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) might heed, because I think it is well established that, in every country where the communists have found allies, social and economic injustices on the one hand and political reaction on the other have made it easier for them to gain support.

Shortly after the Secretary of State for External Affairs finished speaking, the Ottawa Evening Journal carried a story on housing conditions in Hull, just across the river. The heading is: "Paying no rent, 59 Hull tenants of doomed flats refuse to move." There are pictures of disgraceful housing conditions. I believe that the former Prime Minister, the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King), saw these homes every time he drove from parliament to his summer home at Kingsmere. The story in the Journal gives the name of one fifty-year-old invalid who lives in a single room with his wife and four children. The newspaper article reads in part:

> The fifty-year-old invalid, who lives in a single room with his wife and four children, said residents of the rotting, city-owned, frame structure did not intend to arm themselves and barricade all doors, but added "we all mean business."

He was commenting on the fact that they were not going to move out and live under the skies until alternative housing had been provided. This particular gentleman goes on to say:

> I guess I am in a worse spot than the others. My wife and I sleep on a studio couch, while my two boys and two girls have to sleep in a single bed. There is not much room for furniture in our one-room flat. All we have are a table, a few chairs and a wood stove.

Another of the residents is quoted in the article as saying:

> That is the best news I have heard since I moved in here three years ago. I am looking forward to the day when we can say good-bye to this firetrap and its vermin, rats, mice and cockroaches.

The article refers to still another occupant who lives in two rooms with her twelve children and elderly mother. With regard to her the story has this to say:

> All tenants welcomed the thought of moving "as long as decent accommodation is provided us."

I submit that stories of that type in Canadian newspapers present evidence that we have social and economic injustices in Canada. In the Ottawa Journal of December 6, 1948, I find another story. The heading is: "Sells five new homes for $100,000". It gives the name of a well-known builder and contractor who has just completed the construction and sale of five new homes. The article reads:

> These homes are of distinctive and striking designs, sturdy construction, well laid out and particularly well insulated. The price of these homes runs over $100,000.

That is for the five of them, an average of over $20,000 per unit.

> Some of the said homes have library, built-in breakfast nook, playroom in basement, master bedroom has private bathroom, also extra bedroom and washroom on ground floor. Some have dish and clothes washing machines with drier, exhaust fans and garbage disposal units installed in the kitchens, and many other modern built-in features for easy housekeeping and solid comfort.

I must remind you, Mr. Speaker, that in one edition of the Ottawa Journal we have a story of the disgraceful conditions which exist for these Hull tenants, pictures of which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of February 4, and in another edition we are told of five houses having been purchased recently at a cost of $100,000. I submit that while there are houses being built and sold to one group of our Canadian people at a price of $20,000 each, and you have slum conditions remaining undisturbed year after year, you have a situation which breeds communism. In the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of July 18, 1947, there is an editorial headed: "Action on housing needed".

> It seems ironical that nations which can produce atom bombs, develop radar and thousands of other wartime inventions, and send planes circling the globe in a matter of hours—feats which our ancestors of one hundred or two hundred years ago would have thought fantastic—have lost the knack, which those long dead pioneers had, of putting up homes without draining the family's financial resources dry.

A great many young men and women who fought for Canada, who fought to save their homes and to get homes, find it very difficult in 1949 to understand why the nation that could do all these marvellous things from 1939 to 1945 now seems so helpless when it comes to dealing with our housing problem. Last year the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) mentioned that the cost of defence was going up, and that one of the commitments he had authorized was a $600,000 gun. I heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) state that defence now is very costly, that every time we take three hundred men into the armed forces we increase our national expenditure by $1 million per year. I think the time has come when those who are responsible for appropriating funds in this parliament must find money with which to tackle our slum clearing and housing problems in the same way we tackled our defence expenditures in time of war.

When I have discussed the question of housing in previous years I have made the mistake of leaving the important matter of rural housing until the end. Unlike the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) I have not unlimited time at my disposal, so today I plan to make my reference to rural housing before reaching the end of my time. In 1944 Professor Arthur, who was a member of the committee appointed by the government to prepare the well known Curtis report, gave an interesting lecture on housing for Canada. In the section devoted to farm housing he drew attention to the fact that Canada needed at least one hundred thousand new houses for our farm folk to replace obsolescent homes and at least another twenty-five thousand to provide separate units for farm families. In his comment he said:

> We are inclined to assume too readily that the farmer and his family are happy with their outhouse, their oil lamps, lack of refrigeration and lack of bathing facilities except where provided by a galvanized basin. Of the total farm buildings in Canada (730,000), 677,100 or 92·7 per cent were without bathing facilities and 92 per cent lacked flush toilets.

I want to suggest to the new minister of reconstruction (Mr. Winters), who soon will be confronted with the problem of providing employment for Canadians, that the installation of bathing facilities and flush toilets in 92·7 per cent of the farm homes of Canada should provide an outlet for a great deal of material as well as employment for a great many artisans. Professor Arthur referred to the tables showing the condition of farm houses all across the country, and it is a picture of which we cannot be very proud. I am sure many of our young people have left the farms and gone to the cities because it has been so difficult to get running water, electricity and modern conveniences in the farm homes of Canada.

Of course I realize that this is partly an economic problem. If the farmers could have a fair share of the national income over a period of years I am sure many of them would modernize their homes. But unfortunately the farmers have not been receiving a fair share of the national income, and consequently a fair share of the material and labour used in the construction of homes has not gone into farm homes. In one of the green books prepared for the dominion-provincial conference in 1945, entitled "Public Investment and Capital Formation" some very interesting information may be found relating to the percentages of the gross investment, according to types, over a number of years. The percentage of building materials used on farms was shown as follows:

1927	4·8
1928	4·5
1929	3·6
1930	2·8

Since 1930 it seems that the farmers, who comprise between twenty-five and thirty per cent of the population, have had to get by with about three per cent of the total volume of construction.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Nicholson: At six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was referring to public investment and capital formation in Canada, and I had mentioned that not since 1926 had the farmers of this country more than 4 per cent of the total amount spent on building materials used on farms; and I concluded that, since from 25 per cent to 30 per cent of Canadians reside on farms, that fact would indicate that we have not been able to get a large enough share of the material or manpower to deal with farm building programs.

In the Curtis report at page 207 there is an analysis of the information compiled in 1941, following the taking of the last census. We are told that the average value of all farm buildings in Canada was $1,481. This was down from $1,843 in 1931 and $1,943 in 1921. The average value of the farm houses in 1941 apparently, in the opinion of the farmers, amounted to only $1,095. I possibly should observe that 1940 was a fairly difficult year for farmers in all parts of Canada. Many farmers, if they had been offering their farm holdings for sale, would have been unable to get for farm and buildings a price that would pay for the original cost of the buildings. So when the farmers were asked to place a value on their farm buildings, it is not surprising that they suggested an amount much less than the replacement value. I might also mention that these figures were arrived at after taking a sample of every tenth farm in Canada.

In his report Curtis comments on the fact that even those figures indicate low standards, poor structures or facilities, or deterioration, or something of all of them. More than 40 per cent of the farm buildings in Canada were in need of external repairs in 1941. All across Canada, in every province, the census reports indicated that farm buildings were in a bad state of repair. My own constituency had an extremely undesirable record at that time. I am happy to say that, because of improved farm prices since the war, I am sure there has been a great improvement. In Mackenzie there were 44,000 people living on farms, and there were 13,000 non-farm people. We found that our people had 3·4 rooms per dwelling and that there were 4·6 persons per dwelling. The average value of these houses was $656 on the farms, and $813, non-farm. Of the houses on farms, 2·4 per cent had furnaces whereas the percentage for non-farm houses was 9·6. If you take into consideration these modern conveniences, which are taken for granted in most of our cities—radio, automobile, telephone, and vacuum cleaner—one farmer out of 1,000 and 6·6 out of 100 of the non-farm people had them.

I submit that these statistics give some indication of the potential market that is available in Canada if the dominion government, the provincial governments, and the municipal governments will face up to the solving of Canada's rural housing problems. I admit that the federal government is able to produce statistics which would indicate that more houses were built in 1948 and in 1947 than in any other years in our history. But later on I hope to say something about the fact that 90 per cent of the houses that have been built were going to the 10 per cent of people who needed shelter least, and that not more than 10 per cent of the houses built were being made available to 50 per cent of the people who were urgently in need of better housing. In concluding my references to rural housing, I should like to urge that the National Housing Act be made more extensively available in the rural areas in Canada.

The 1948 report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has not been supplied to hon. members, but when the report was tabled a year ago we read that no applications were received in 1947 for farm loans. I have on the order paper a question which has not been answered yet, asking how many were received in 1948 and how many were completed. Last year no formal applications were received from co-operatives. I submit that the federal government should take the initiative in encouraging farmers and co-operatives to make use of national housing legislation.

In the Curtis report there is an interesting section dealing with housing for farm labourers. Information is supplied here indicating the insecurity which confronts farm labourers in most parts of the country. In every province we have a great deal of difficulty in finding farm labour at busy seasons of the year. If Canada were prepared to make some advance in granting assistance to farmers or to communities to plan and build living quarters for farm labourers, I am sure that some progress would be made in solving this problem.

One further suggestion that I believe has a good deal of merit has been to the effect that direct subsidies on specialized goods should be provided for rural housing, such as furnaces, plumbing equipment, electrical supplies and refrigeration. Let me remind the house that we have approved a subsidy of nearly half a million dollars to Crane Limited, but this parliament took no interest in finding out what happened with regard to this subsidy. We have no way of knowing whether the materials produced as a result of this subsidy went into extra bathrooms in these $20,000 houses about which, just before the dinner recess, I read from the Ottawa Journal. I think it would be much more desirable to have the subsidies used so that we would have an improvement in our rural housing situation.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend talks about these $20,000 houses. Has he any knowledge that this money went into the extra bathrooms?

Mr. Nicholson: Before the dinner recess—

Mr. Mitchell: That is all right for the boys back home, but not here.

Mr. Nicholson: As I was saying, before the dinner recess I read from the Ottawa Journal a statement to the effect that five houses were sold in December in Ottawa for over $100,000, or over $20,000 per unit. The story also mentioned the fact that some of these houses had extra bathrooms. That was one of the features. Rather than supplying subsidies to Crane Limited so that they could put extra bathrooms in $20,000 houses, I think it would be much better to provide subsidies so that farmers, fishermen or people in the slum areas in our cities could have the direct benefit of them.

Mr. Mitchell: That was not the point. The hon. member is just skating around it.

Mr. Nicholson: I cannot hear the mumbling of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Mitchell: I am not mumbling. I want to say that I do not think it is fair—

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, my time is expiring.

Mr. Mitchell: That is all right—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Mitchell: What my hon. friend is saying is all right for consumption back home; these speeches are printed for consumption back home.

Mr. MacInnis: The people back home hear the minister, and they do not like what they hear. They will let him know that shortly.

Mr. Knowles: The minister will then have to find a home.

Mr. MacInnis: He will have to try to find a home.

Mr. Nicholson: My time is passing quickly, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to say something about an urgent problem that confronts so many Canadian people. During the dinner recess I was glad to read that the Prime Minister has changed his attitude. I think he made an unfortunate statement about a year ago to the effect that no government of which he was a member would take any part in a low-rental, subsidized-housing scheme. But in Toronto, over the week-end, he indicated that he at least has an open mind. In the Toronto Telegram of today I read the following:

> Although the federal government has no intention of becoming a landlord to civilians, Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent hinted today that the dominion may provide additional financial assistance for low rental housing projects initiated provincially or municipally.
> Mr. St. Laurent did not indicate in detail what form the extra housing assistance might take but, in a general way, it was evident that he will propose an extension of slum clearance grants from the federal treasury.
> His statement was significant in view of the fact that about an hour earlier, he and Mayor Hiram McCallum had visited the Regent park housing project.

At this stage I should like to thank again the Toronto board of trade for the very interesting tour they arranged last year when members of parliament were in Toronto. On some occasions of that sort people who are your hosts take you only to the best residential areas in the city, but our hosts in Toronto took us to the Regent park area, and I am looking forward with a great deal of pleasure to going back to see what has taken place in that slum area since we were there a year ago. I continue with the quotation. The Prime Minister said:

> "I believe I am correct in saying that it is the first time in Canada a municipality has undertaken a large scale project to look after the housing needs of low income families.
> The Regent park project demonstrates that, when the local authorities really mean business, they can secure the effective co-operation of the provincial and federal governments."
> The Prime Minister plainly made a courtly and pleasant bid for Toronto's favour. At another point in his address he declared that: "The city of Toronto has given an outstanding example of the practical way in which governments can work together in the public interest."
> "Perhaps," he added, "you will excuse me for saying that there was so much goodwill between the city and the federal government that it overflowed and brought in the provincial government as well."

I am delighted to find that the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition are on such friendly terms that they go to the city of Toronto and together take some credit for the fact that they were even able to work out for the Toronto municipal authorities the program which has been carried on there and which is going to result in about 1,000 low-rental houses being made available to these people who are living in the Regent park area. I understand that the area where the houses are to be demolished contains forty-one acres. They have undertaken to house everyone living in that area and about 200 additional families. In addition to having grounds for flowers and vegetables around the units, they are going to have about ten acres in park land in that project. While funds have been used from the federal treasury, and while Toronto is one of the wealthiest cities in Canada, yet as a member representing a rural constituency I am glad that Canada has made a start and that Toronto is going to show the rest of Canada what can be done when municipal, provincial and federal authorities bury their prejudices and work out a program to serve the best interests of the greatest number.

I have a few newspaper clippings from across the country to indicate how general the interest is in facing up to the housing problem which confronts so many of our people. The Financial Post carried an interesting story on July 19, following the representations made by the mayors association in trying to get the federal government to meet with representatives from the provinces and the municipalities to work out the details. The Evening Times of Saint John of June 23, 1948, carries a story which reads as follows:

> Low-rentals housing plan still problem. The Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities today was faced with four choices in its efforts for a low rent program in Canada.
> "If our analysis of the situation is correct," he said, "then we can conclude that the outlook for minimum standard low-rental housing for low wage families, as part of the national over-all house construction program, is a doubtful prospect until the federal and provincial governments have come together and resolved a program of action."

The Ottawa Evening Journal of June 24 carries a story from Halifax where the mayors had their annual meeting. From the Winnipeg Citizen of September 27, 1948, we get the following story written by Beland Honderich, financial editor of the Toronto Star:

> The federal government's advisory committee on post-war reconstruction recognized this point in its housing study. In its report to the government in 1944—four years ago—the housing subcommittee bluntly stated that the provision of adequate low-rental housing was essential to the solution of the shortage. It said:
> "The proportions of the post-war (housing) program which will be supplied through publicly assisted building for ownership and publicly assisted low-rental housing will depend on a number of factors . . . But that a very large and long range program of low-rental housing must be contemplated is an inescapable conclusion from the available facts."
> With such a detailed and authoritative report to guide them, the inactivity of the various levels of government is a bit difficult to understand. Equally disturbing is the attitude of acting Prime Minister

St. Laurent. For in face of this report, he said in a speech last November: ". . . no government of which I am a part will ever pass legislation for subsidized housing."

If Mr. St. Laurent's statement means what it says, then the solution to the housing shortage is a long way off. In fact, it is hopeless. For the provincial and municipal governments alone cannot be expected to carry the financial burden of low-cost housing. The cost is too great.

I have also a story from the Halifax Mail of March 28. I have several more that I will not have time to discuss.

I should like to refer for a moment to a section of the Curtis report dealing with the position in which many of our low-income families find themselves. In 1941, in connection with the taking of the census, a special study was made in twelve metropolitan cities in Canada. These cities contain 60 per cent of the urban population of the whole dominion. They went to 834,000 dwellings and found that 530,000, or two-thirds of them, were rented. They found that one-third of this very large number living in rented accommodation received an annual income of $703. The second third had an average income of $1,389. The one-third who were getting $1,800 or thereabouts were able to look after their own accommodation but for at least two-thirds of these 530,000 families in the twelve metropolitan cities we find that their income was quite inadequate to provide food, clothing and shelter. It is a well established principle in all countries that not more than 20 per cent of one's income should go for rental, or if one is buying one should not pay more than two years' total salary for a house. On this basis we find 88 per cent of the people in the lowest income brackets in these rented houses were paying a disproportionate amount for their living quarters. For example, those who were getting an average of $703 a year were paying $7.28 per month more than they should have paid for living quarters. About 50 per cent of those who were getting an average of $1,389 were also paying more than they should have paid for rent. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the fact that in Canada we have a large number of people on salaries and wages fixed so low that they are unable to buy or rent living accommodation presents a very urgent problem to all of us.

In 1919 a special commission was set up to look into the unrest which existed all across Canada. In reporting, the late Mr. Justice Mathers said:

Another cause of unrest which we met with at practically every place we visited was the scarcity of houses and the poor quality of some of those which did exist.

A number of years passed without anything being done. In 1935 parliament set up a special committee to study the housing problem. The hon. member for Broadview is the only member of the present parliament who was on that committee. He has been able to survive three federal elections since that time. Naturally the hon. member was keenly interested in housing problems and said:

As you know, this country cannot solve any problems at all because of its "passing-the-buck" act, the British North America Act; it cannot settle any problems at all, except objectively. If we want to do something in this committee we need to get busy, particularly because spring is coming; and I do not think many of the municipalities are able to go ahead on their own. Men are waiting for jobs and cannot get them.

That was in 1935. Spring is coming again, and very little has been done by way of dealing with the problem, which concerns so many people.

One of the cities discussed upon that occasion was Cleveland. The committee took the trouble to hear evidence from Cleveland, where they had made a study of slum problems, and from that city the committee obtained statistics showing what it had cost to maintain the slum area over a number of years. I am happy to say that in the United States, as a result of the progressive leadership of the late President Roosevelt, they passed legislation in the thirties, when we were paying large sums of money to keep carpenters and plumbers on relief. In the United States they decided that it would be better to clear away their slums, to build new houses than to pay people to do nothing, and Cleveland was one of the places where they took action.

When one stops to consider the wretchedly unsanitary and unsocial conditions formerly existing in these slum areas, which have been eliminated; the ramshackle frame buildings, which have been torn down; and then goes into one of these neat new apartments with steam heat, hot and cold water, sanitary plumbing, with modern laundry facilities, well-lighted and ventilated rooms, good sidewalks with growing trees, green grass and shrubs, assembly halls, club rooms and nursery and kindergarten rooms; playground equipment, tot lots with sand boxes for the youngsters—all away from the noise and danger of street traffic—he begins to realize the fundamental nature of these improvements.

Furthermore, private charity in one year poured into this slum district $490,836 to supplement the city expenditures. Fire protection in this area cost the taxpayers $18.27 per capita previously, while the average in the city was $4.37. It would be difficult to estimate the incalculable losses in physical health, social morale and political domination, which always result from slum areas and bad housing.

I am sorry I have not enough time to deal at some length with the municipal housing program in Toronto. Before concluding however I should like to refer to a publication entitled "Rents for Regent Park", a study made by Humphrey Carver and Alison L. Hopwood, which provides a pattern for the Toronto housing association, determining rents which should be paid. They refer to the system followed in Birmingham, where the central government provides a subsidy of $66 a year for each of the families which have been rehoused, and Birmingham provides $22. So that the monthly rental is $15.13 for modern houses. Mr. Carver refers to some of the projects in the United States where they follow a pattern of taking approximately 20 per cent of an individual's income for rent, the balance being paid partly by the central government and partly by the association. In other words, if one were receiving an income of $1,100 he would pay $26 for the smallest type apartment.

In Australia they have a similar plan, where the central government provides three-fifths of the cost, by subsidy, and the state government two-fifths. The municipality of course is charged with the responsibility of managing and servicing the area. Professor Carver worked out an elaborate program which will be in effect in Regent park, I understand. Those who get $80 a month, if they have six children, pay only $19 a month, made up of $11 rent plus $8 for service charges. And if one lived in the same quarters, and had an income of $299 a month, he would pay $62 a month. I believe that is a fair and sound principle, namely, that the individual should pay according to his ability, in connection with these projects in which the federal government, the provincial government and the municipality have an investment.

In concluding I would urge again that the dominion government act on the suggestions made by the association of mayors, the Canadian Legion and many other organizations. A conference of the dominion, provincial and municipal authorities should be convened immediately to discuss around a table just where we go from here. I believe the least the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) can do is to take the initiative in calling the conference.

It must be pretty obvious that these are responsibilities for the federal government. It is the federal government which decides where war industries will locate, which decides that farmers are to get such low prices that farm boys must go to the cities and thereby create housing problems in those cities. The federal government must take some responsibility and part in financing and making grants for rent reduction funds and for slum clearance.

The provincial governments also have responsibilities. They must direct the use of the land. They must enact legislation authorizing the establishing of local housing authorities. They must encourage and legislate both for housing and for community planning. They must be prepared to undertake the actual execution and management of housing projects in rural areas and in scattered communities. The municipal authorities, I believe, are the natural ones to establish the local authority charged with the building and operation of the public housing projects. They must take the responsibility for acquiring the land, preparing the designs, the letting of contracts on a competitive basis and maintaining the project in good repair. They must be responsible for the selection of tenants, the collection of rents and the general well-being of the tenants.

Mr. Case: Does the hon. member intend to include the nationalization of farm lands?

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, well, don't be silly.

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. member knows my position very well. I have never advocated the nationalization of farm lands, nor has any member of this group ever advocated it.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like first to join with other hon. members in complimenting the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) who moved the address in reply, and the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Demers) who seconded it, upon the very excellent speeches they delivered in carrying out their important function in this regard.

The hon. member for Essex West has spoken well in the house before. His contribution was well prepared and well delivered, in accordance with the standard his colleagues expected of him. On the other hand, the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains had the more exacting task of delivering his maiden speech in the house. I am sure the electors of his constituency have been proud to learn of the exceedingly fine contribution he made; and the ovation with which the conclusion of his remarks was hailed was a tribute not only to a most excellent maiden speech but also to the good judgment of all those who sent him to represent them here.

Most sincere congratulations also are due to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) upon his selection by his party to assume the heavy responsibilities he has undertaken, also on the magnificent speech which he delivered in this debate, a speech which has been hailed on all sides as a tour de force and which to his followers and well-wishers, both within and without this house, has been and will continue to be a source of inspiration and extreme gratification.

Turning now to the speech from the throne I should like to discuss several matters which I think are of particular interest to my province and to the constituency of Halifax, which I have the honour to represent along with my colleague (Mr. Isnor). Halifax is a city which in the past has been touched by the hand of war. Throughout its 200 years of history it has been closer to the succession of armed conflicts which have marked these two centuries than any other part of the territory which now comprises the Dominion of Canada. Against this background of the awareness of the realities of war there will be throughout the province of Nova Scotia general agreement with the statement of government policy in connection with matters that are in the sphere of international relations.

A large majority of the people of Nova Scotia will have welcomed also the elaboration of government policy in this regard which was provided by the Prime Minister when he set out the measures which this government and the Liberal party consider it is necessary to take in the interests of the peace and security of this nation.

The north Atlantic security pact is accepted, I think, by the people of my province as a necessary and wise precaution to ensure that any potential aggressor will be faced by a united group of free nations before, rather than after, such an aggressor may have become committed to a policy which would make inevitable the outbreak of a third world war. We regard this treaty, and I think the majority of the Canadian people so regard it, as a realistic attempt to prevent the course of our dealings with today's aggressive dictators following the melancholy and fatal course which was followed in the dealings with Hitler and Mussolini. In these days of tension between the east and the west we run the risk of war, but it is a calculated risk which most people agree is one that we must accept and undergo if we are to hope for the future firm establishment of peace.

The house and the country appreciate the excellent maiden speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). His speech was such that I feel somewhat presumptuous in complimenting him upon it, but I do so most sincerely and wholeheartedly.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) spoke in this debate on the first occasion for some two hours and twenty minutes. During that speech he found it possible to devote less than one hundred words to the all-important question of external affairs. He spoke for forty minutes two weeks ago Friday night, and today he spoke for two hours and fifteen minutes. It is almost unbelievable that in that time the simple but today expressive words "north Atlantic security pact" are not to be found from the beginning to the end of his remarks.

The leader of the opposition in the meantime explained this omission on the ground that he did not feel free to discuss this pact until the pact itself had been brought before the house. The strictness with which hon. members who sit around him have observed the same reticence in their contributions to this debate marks this as a matter of party policy rather than the personal opinion of their leader. In spite of any virtue which that explanation may have in point of ingenuity I am satisfied that it will not commend itself to this house or to the country as deserving of belief. It seems to me to lack completely the characteristic of reality which is a condition precedent to credibility. To follow the diplomatic phraseology of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, it does not command respect.

For example, we find it impossible not to ask ourselves how this ingenious explanation can be made to coincide with statements made in other circumstances by hon. members opposite with respect to the supremacy of parliament and the importance of this debate on the address. We heard further statements of that nature this afternoon. It is not difficult to imagine what the reaction of the same hon. gentlemen would be if such a limitation were attempted to be imposed from this side of the house. However, it is not necessary for us to rely upon our powers of imagination. The leader of the opposition, and much more particularly his followers, have discussed, with commendable freedom of choice, the measures and matters forecast in the speech from the throne, with the sole exception I believe of the north Atlantic security pact.

Mr. Case: Is the hon. member aware of the stand of the United States on the north Atlantic security pact?

Mr. Dickey: That is a matter of United States government policy that will be announced in due course. There is another point which I do not think will go unnoticed. After the leader of the opposition had spoken on Friday in the manner which I have described —he has spoken twice since then in the same manner—on the following Tuesday he moved the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance. What was that matter? It had to do with Canada's participation in the north Atlantic security pact. What had occurred in the intervening four days to make this matter, which, although mentioned specifically in the speech from the throne was not on Friday accorded even a passing reference, on Tuesday a definite matter of urgent public importance? The explanation given to the house by the leader of the opposition was that a statement had been made, and reported in the press, some weeks before by an hon. member on this side of the house referring to the fact that the conclusion of the Atlantic pact would be accompanied with some risk of war with Russia.

Does the leader of the opposition wish the people of this country to believe that up until reading that statement in the press it had not occurred to him that the negotiation of a treaty of this importance might carry with it the danger that some country or countries might make it the pretext for hostilities? I venture to suggest that, if that was so, the leader of the opposition is the only person in this country, or for that matter in any country, who has given this matter any thought at all and has come to such an extraordinary conclusion.

I think most hon. members will agree with me that the signing of the north Atlantic security pact is not absolute insurance against war; it is merely our best chance of avoiding war. If war does come, it will be a war that was, unknown to us, inevitable in any event.

I for one consider extremely significant the pointed and obviously intentional avoidance of any mention of the north Atlantic security pact by the leader of the opposition and other members of his party who have already spoken in this debate. They have not referred, either to support or to condemn, to the clearly stated and courageous policy of the government, which is following what it considers to be the path best designed to secure for this country the peace and security which all the people of this country so passionately desire. The silence on the part of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), and those who sit behind him, is something which the people of the part of the country from which I come, the province of Nova Scotia, will not appreciate, but will in fact deeply resent. Perhaps there is no part of the country which takes its politics more seriously than the province of Nova Scotia. When political considerations and tactics in relation to a by-election campaign, or even in relation to a general election campaign, are carried to the extent of muzzling a whole national party and its entire representation in the House of Commons, preventing them from according a just share of attention to one of the most important questions of policy with which this house is faced, then those people who have the clearest appreciation of real political values will be among the first to register their complete disapproval of those mistaken and ill-advised leaders and their followers who can so easily lose sight of national interests and subordinate them to the most selfish of party motives.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition made a very strongly worded speech on the dangers of international communism, and communism within this country. With everything he said about communism we on this side of the house agree. He should not be too surprised to hear that, because what he said in that regard has been said before by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and others on this side of the house, during this session and in previous sessions.

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Dickey: I should like to make a personal observation to the leader of the opposition. He spoke of the necessity of everybody in Canada doing their utmost to fight communism both within the country and in the international sphere. This is a personal opinion, but I say it with the utmost conviction. The best thing that the leader of the opposition could have done to contribute to the defeat of communism, both inside and outside Canada, would have been to have risen in his place, not today, not two weeks ago, but the first time he rose to join in this debate, to have taken into his hands the speech from the throne, to have read from it the words of government policy with respect to the north Atlantic security pact, and to have said, "I wish to tell the house and the country that I and my party are prepared to support the government in the conclusion of the north Atlantic security pact," and to have gone on to say, "I make this statement notwithstanding any other contrary statements that may have been made by the leader of my party in the province of Quebec." Actions still speak louder than words. As far as actions are concerned, I think that the anti-communist record of this government is pretty good. It is pretty good in an absolute sense and, when compared with the record of any government of which the leader of the opposition has been the leader, it is very good. When the present leader of the opposition became premier of Ontario in 1943 there were two communist members in that legislature. The last I heard, they were still there. At the same time there was one communist member in this house. I would ask the leader of the opposition where that communist member is today. He is certainly not here. He is in fact undergoing what is cavalierly called durance vile, and it was the action of this government which made it possible to put the member for Cartier in the penitentiary.

Mr. Knowles: The former member.

Mr. Dickey: The former member for Cartier. I apologize to the present member for Cartier. The government received very little support from the members who now sit around the leader of the opposition for what it did at that time.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Nonsense.

Mr. Dickey: The leader of the opposition complained that there had been some criticism because he had discussed matters that were not mentioned in the speech from the throne. As I understood the criticism on that point, it was rather a complaint that he spoke so long and spoke so little about matters that were in the speech from the throne. He is at perfect liberty to talk about other things as well. But let us look at the speech from the throne and see what important matters with which he could have dealt, proceeding then to deal with other matters, in addition, as he pleased. There is the matter of fisheries, something that we in the maritimes regard as extremely important. There is the matter of agriculture, which is regarded as extremely important throughout Canada. There is the matter of domestic and external trade, a subject which we would like to hear the leader of the opposition and the members of his party discuss. Then there is the question of the administration of justice, and the question of veterans affairs.

Mr. Knowles: He did not have time.

An hon. Member: Only six hours.

(Translation):

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Speaker, I now wish to extend to the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Raymond) and to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde) my very special and most sincere congratulations for their splendid contributions to this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dickey: The hon. members have pointed out a fact of national importance and which the majority of the Canadians have come to realize, namely, that any desire for peace, however genuine, is not sufficient to avoid war.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dickey: The sad lessons of the past have taught us to recognize the true nature of the views shared by those who are still credulous enough to trust in isolationism, that nefarious policy whose sole remaining followers perhaps are the most active disciples of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in the province of Quebec.

I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Wright for the manner in which he quoted the words of His Holiness Pope Pius XII on the moral aspect of war.

To any Christian, war is a moral problem which must be solved in his own conscience. The moral authority of His Holiness admittedly ranks among the highest in the world. And the policy which he outlined on December 24 last is in my estimation a source of inspiration to whoever is anxious to find a solution to this problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dickey: Unfortunately, there is today a marked difference between the ordinary life of man and his Christian life. I was therefore very happy to hear the hon. member so conscientiously applying those great principles of moral science to the political problems.

(Text):

In the speech from the throne reference is made to the co-operation which has been received from all the provinces in connection with the national health program announced last session. Nova Scotia is one of the provinces co-operating to the fullest possible extent in bringing to its people the benefits of this magnificent program. In the constituency of Halifax alone already two country hospitals, commenced through the initiative of the people of small but virile communities, have received assistance through the grants in aid of hospital construction. Under this plan contributions by both the dominion and the provincial governments have been made to hospitals at Sheet Harbour and Musquodoboit Harbour. The need for these hospitals was so great that, even before the national health program was announced, leaders in these communities had formulated their plans and organized themselves to provide in their localities the best hospital facilities that could be established. The assistance under the hospital grants program has been of the greatest value to them in bringing their plans to realization in the form of substantial buildings with all modern facilities for the treatment and care of the sick, thus filling a long-felt need in these communities. Their pride in their own achievements I know is mixed with feelings of sincere appreciation for the assistance provided through the national health program. I only hope other communities and districts in my own constituency and in other constituencies throughout this country will plan to take the utmost advantage of the assistance being made possible through the wholehearted co-operation of the dominion and provincial governments in this all-important matter of public health.

The forecast in the speech from the throne of measures to assist the Canadian shipbuilding industry is extremely welcome in Halifax, and the legislation the government intends to bring forward will be anxiously awaited. Halifax Shipyards Limited and other firms connected with the shipbuilding and ship repairing trades in Halifax are extremely important elements in the industrial economy not only of our city and county but of the province and country as a whole. Through the efforts of both management and labour the capacity and efficiency of the Halifax shipyards were tremendously extended during the years of war, and it has been a source of great satisfaction to all those interested in the maintenance of prosperous conditions in Halifax that the activities of this great industry have been maintained at a very high level.

In this connection I would remind the house that Canada, particularly the maritime provinces, has a tremendous stake in the sea and the commerce of the sea. The citizens of Halifax realize how closely their prosperity is bound up with the fortunes of Canada as a maritime nation. The remarks in this debate by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) therefore call for some comment. I would remind the hon. member, and call the attention of the house to the fact, that the argument he adopted in reference to the difficulties presently being experienced by the operators of the Canadian merchant marine is regarded by many people who know the facts as nothing but communist propaganda. The hon. member's discussion and interpretation of the Canada Shipping Act and his exchanges in this connection with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) were amusing, but I do not propose to enter into any discussion of the statutory provisions to which they referred. I am speaking rather of what the hon. member had to say with respect to the possibility of the Canadian flag slowly disappearing from the seas.

To indicate to the house the opinion held by many people, not only in Halifax but in other parts of the country, with respect to the kind of argument put forward the other evening in the hon. member's presentation to the house, I should like to quote from a story which appeared in the Halifax Free Press of January 28, 1949. The story is headed, "Communist propaganda floods Halifax and other ports." The subheading is, "Experienced seamen forced to stay ashore while landlubbers and 'one-trippers' get jobs thanks to union." The story goes on:

> In one of the most blatant propaganda hoaxes in recent Canadian history, the communist-run Canadian seamen's union has been flooding Halifax and other Canadian ports with misleading advertisements and handbills concerning the sale of Canadian ships and hiring of aliens to man ships purchased or chartered by foreign interests.

The story then lists a number of facts with which I need not burden the house, and then goes on to comment:

> Ostensibly the CSU has tried to improve working conditions and wages for Canadian seamen, but the end result of CSU policy has been that, while the jobs are better, Canadian ships are being hounded out of business and the jobs go with them.
> CSU supporters are spreading propaganda to the effect that wages make up only ten per cent or thereabouts of the operating expenses of Canadian ships, when thirty-three per cent would be nearer the truth. Moreover, union tactics prevent Canadian seamen from doing efficient work in shipshape fashion, thus forcing ships' maintenance cost to record heights.

The story then refers to the handbills mentioned earlier.

> On Tuesday of this week landlubber members of the CSU distributed on the streets of Halifax a handbill allegedly printed in Montreal, which was entitled "Canadian seamen become D.P.'s!"
> The advertisement stated that:
> "This is what idle seamen and idle ships mean to Nova Scotia.
> "It means more lay-offs for shipyard workers.
>
> "It means jobless seamen.
> "It means empty shipyards.
> "It means less work for freight handlers, longshoremen and other waterfront workers.
> "Halifax's prosperity depends upon a busy waterfront!
> "Save Canada's merchant marine! Maintain employment in the maritimes."

This is all true, Mr. Speaker; there is danger of Canadian ships being driven from the seas. But the real argument is as to who is responsible for this unpleasant possibility and what can be done to remedy the situation. I would ask the hon. member for Cape Breton South and others who adopt his argument to have some consideration for those experienced Canadian seamen who have no sympathy with the radical views and destructive intentions of the leaders of the Canadian seamen's union. Men who have followed the sea for years find themselves unable to secure employment in their calling because of their fundamental disagreement with the union bosses. Their places have been taken by younger and less experienced men whose qualification is simply that they are more inclined to listen to and agree with the radical views of those union leaders.

I would ask the hon. gentleman also to have some consideration for the men who, with great effort and ability, have built up the Canadian merchant marine. Often in this house the hon. member has pointed out that the profit motive is of importance to business men. I think he would be the first to admit from his experience that as long as the owners of a business find they can profitably keep it in operation, they will make every effort to do so and continue to make their profits. I know he will also have to admit that in the socialist state he advocates activities of a commercial nature will be carried on by the state with a close approximation of this attention to profitable operation. Recent experience in Saskatchewan has indicated that a socialist government will not hesitate to close down commercial operations which under existing circumstances it cannot see its way clear to continue. In view of this, does the hon. member expect this house or the country to believe that Canadian shipowners are intentionally destroying their own business, the Canadian merchant marine, while it is still possible to operate it under existing conditions?

The fact is that under existing conditions, brought about largely by the Canadian seamen's union, the operators of the Canadian merchant marine find that under present high costs they cannot continue to operate in competition with ships of other flags. If the Canadian merchant marine is to be saved—and it is of supreme importance, Mr. Speaker, that it be saved—it will be necessary for the shipowners and seamen to come to agreements which will permit Canadian ships to operate on a competitive basis with those sailing under the flags of other maritime nations.

There is one matter of some considerable national interest and significance to which I should like to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, and that of the house. On June 21 of this year the city of Halifax will celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of its founding in the year 1749. Halifax is the oldest English speaking settlement in that great portion of North America which is now the Dominion of Canada. An anniversary of this nature is a milestone in the life not only of the city itself but of the province of Nova Scotia and of the country as a whole. Patriotism and proper national pride find their firm and enduring basis in a long and proud history. We in this country have the advantage of enjoying an almost unique mingling of two main currents of history and culture. The city of Halifax and the city of Quebec share the leading roles in these two histories. Throughout colonial times, these two cities, by reason of their early establishment and strategic situations, were the focal points about which the events of history revolved.

The story of Halifax's two hundred years as an organized community is preceded by a history of the use of its magnificent harbour as a haven for mariners and fishermen which goes back to the days of the earliest Norse voyagers. The whole of this history will be commemorated by the celebrations which will mark the observance of this bicentennial, and which will continue over a period of some two months. Halifax has been preparing energetically for many months to make suitable arrangements for appropriate commemoration of this event. Halifax hopes to welcome many visitors from all over this continent and elsewhere in this her bicentennial year. The best possible provisions are being made for the entertainment and accommodation of everyone who may find it possible to accept our most cordial invitation to attend our birthday party. I hope that many members of this house will do us the honour of paying us a visit.

Mr. Speaker, I have left to the end one extremely pleasant task, and that is to congratulate the three new ministers of the crown who joined the government during the recess. The selection of all three of these gentlemen to the honourable posts to which they have been called has been greeted with the most profound satisfaction. I shall perhaps be forgiven if I single out the new minister from Nova Scotia for a special word of congratulation and good wishes. The Hon. R. H. Winters follows hard on the heels of a minister of the crown of many years' experience, the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, who was a great Nova Scotian and a great Canadian. Looking into the more distant past, he follows a most illustrious line of ministers of the crown from Nova Scotia. In his exacting task I can say to the new minister that his colleagues in this house, and all those who know him, look to him with confidence to maintain the great tradition of those who have gone before him.

Mr. Hodgson: May I ask the hon. member a question? Did I understand him to say—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member wish to put a question to the hon. member for Halifax?

Mr. Hodgson: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Then he must first have his consent.

Mr. Dickey: What was the question?

Mr. Hodgson: Did I understand the hon. member to say that the government dealt with the former member for Cartier and had him sentenced to jail?

Mr. Dickey: To answer the question, I said that the government had taken action that made possible the sending to the penitentiary of the former member for Cartier, and received little support from the opposite side of the house in doing so.

Mr. Hodgson: The government had little to do with it. It was the court.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) has taken his seat. The hon. member who asked the question must not carry on a debate with him.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Although only three members have participated in the debate thus far today, Mr. Speaker, discussion has roamed over a wide field. During the time at my disposal tonight it is not my purpose to deal with all those matters which have been mentioned, but I should like to make a special reference to the observations of the leader of the opposition when, this afternoon, he was discussing the question of communism. Each year during each session the members of the Social Credit group have constantly emphasized the dangerous situation which has developed in Canada as a consequence of serious communist infiltration. Undoubtedly there is a crying need for action to repel such advances. I should like to remind the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey), who just finished speaking, that to me it is extremely significant that it has been during the tenure of office of the Liberal government that communism has been able to make such great headway in the Dominion of Canada.

An hon. Member: You mean that it was uncovered.

Mr. Shaw: The right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated as much last summer when addressing the Liberal federation convention here in this city. Naturally he did not state that it occurred during the Liberal administration, but it was an obvious deduction for any of us to make, that it occurred during that period of time. I think the Canadian people should be constantly alert to the dangers which exist as a consequence of the activities of those who, as I say, have infiltrated into our nation and threaten to destroy the very foundation upon which democracy rests.

With respect to the debate on the speech from the throne, it always seems to me that it is an extremely unhappy arrangement to adjourn the debate and then return to it later on. It inevitably results in repetition. Goodness knows there is repetition enough without the additional repetition which comes as a consequence of the procedure which we have followed in the last few years. It does of necessity prolong the debate on this particular subject.

This year the speech from the throne was particularly significant in one respect, namely, the rather veiled inference that the Canadian people would enjoy reductions in taxation. It has also been indicated, Mr. Speaker, that this was an unusual thing to have occur. Of course, those of us who realize that an election cannot be too far away very quickly determined the reason for its having occurred this year. However, I would say to the Canadian people, knowing what most of us know about the many utterances of the government, that they should not feel too certain that the present expectations of theirs will bear the type of fruit which they would have them bear. Not only did the speech from the throne indicate the possibility of tax reductions, but several other hints have been given out. We know that certain very mysterious messages have come out of Liberal caucuses. I realize that these caucuses are supposed to be secret affairs. On the other hand, even though they are secret, I am sure that when some message designed to please the Canadian people should get out it will get out. For example, I am not so certain that the newspapermen were just guessing when they referred to certain things which had happened in the Liberal caucuses.

Those of us who listen to the radio also hear some very strange things sometimes.

Mr. Low: Sources close to the minister.

Mr. Shaw: Yes. I happened to tune in to the Minister of Justice quite by accident the other night and I heard him making certain references to tax cuts which could be expected. However, I am not going to try to repeat what I heard him say over the air, but I am going to quote the Ottawa Citizen of February 18, which referred to what the Minister of Justice had said. It is as follows:

> Mr. Garson hinted indirectly at the possibility of tax reductions in the forthcoming budget. Defending the government's use of surpluses to reduce public debt he said this did not mean "we cannot have further reductions in taxes." He added, "because we have reduced debt we are in all the better position to keep down taxes. But the extent of these tax reductions is a matter of policy."

Mr. Low: Hope deferred maketh the heart sick.

Mr. Brown: Amen.

Mr. Shaw: Just about every second day there are in the press articles which are not, I would say, based upon mere flights of imagination, also indicating that we can expect these tax cuts. To me it has been extremely interesting to observe that earlier in this debate private Liberal members have been popping up here, there and everywhere to assert that this year the government must lift at least part of the burden from the backs of the Canadian taxpayers and reduce taxes. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, that is all right from the government's point of view, because it is realized by many that this is occurring in many quarters for the first time. I believe I know why some hon. members are doing that. They are now trying to create the impression in the minds of their constituents that during the past two, three or four years this has been the course of action which they have pursued. I assume that they will probably have these speeches printed and circulate them widely throughout their constituencies in an endeavour to create that impression. I am not saying that that is not good strategy, but I would say to the Liberal members that they should give their constituents a little more credit than they are giving them when they assume that they are not going to examine what happened a year, two years or three years ago to find out what their positions have been since the termination of hostilities.

Hon. members on the government side who are now urging tax reductions were fully aware that last year the tax burden was unnecessarily oppressive. They knew that last year. Surely to goodness the Canadian taxpayers have expressed themselves vigorously enough during the past couple of years. Moreover, I think hon. gentlemen over there were perfectly aware that the exemptions for the single and for the married taxpayers were scandalously low. They knew last year, and they knew the year before, that because of the application of sales taxes which inflate prices artificially, hidden taxes and a great number of nuisance taxes, the cost of living in this country was being kept at a level higher than was necessary.

It always amazes me that the government of this country, and hon. members supporting the government, yell about prices, and yet they have consistently refused to take any action either to make known what part of the prices was made up of taxation or to reduce these taxes and thus strike a blow for lower consumer prices.

Hon. members on the government side of the house have also been aware of the rank discrimination which has existed in these tax impositions. It is not necessary to go beyond just one or two examples. One of the most obvious is the special 25 per cent luxury tax. Go into a jeweler's store and ask him what commodities are taxed the 25 per cent luxury tax, and he will show you a list of commodities. Come out of his store and go into an adjoining store. While you will not find exactly the same commodities, you will find commodities which by no stretch of the imagination can be put in another category, and yet they do not bear the 25 per cent luxury tax. It is my belief that one of the reasons for the jewelers complaining so vigorously about this 25 per cent tax is the fact that it is discriminatory in its application.

I might also refer to the high percentage increase of certain commodities. Take the soft-drink industry as an example. Take the lowly chocolate bar, which has been frequently mentioned in this house. If you take the total tax imposed upon these commodities, and work out the percentage of tax on the commodity, you will find one of the most outstanding examples of discrimination in the application of taxation.

In 1948 the Liberal members of the House of Commons knew, along with the rest of us, that living costs in Canada had reached an all-time high. They realized that the 1948 budget granted no significant reduction in taxation, and they were also conscious of the fact that it was estimated there would be a surplus of something of the order of $600 million; yet when the budget came down last spring I did not see members on the other side criticizing or condemning it. All of them seemed sufficiently satisfied with the tax proposals to give wholehearted support to government policy. All one has to do is to examine Hansard for May 27 of last year to determine where they stood on this matter of taxation.

I recall vividly last March moving an amendment to the speech from the throne. My amendment at that time was designed to do certain very specific things. I am going to refer to it because, so far as my colleagues and I are concerned, our position has not changed one iota with respect to that amendment. I would move it again tonight, if it were not for two factors, one that we already have two amendments, and the second that last year it was ruled out of order on the ground that it was not sufficiently abstract when dealing with a matter which might involve an expenditure of government money. On this ground 99 per cent of all the amendments moved in the House of Commons might be ruled out. Therefore, even if there were not two amendments already before the house, I would not go through the mockery of moving this one again tonight.

However, I am going to deal with it briefly. I argued last year that my amendment was designed to contribute toward the stabilization of the Canadian economy. It had a second purpose, namely, to contribute toward meeting the existing crisis in living costs. I called first for exemption from income tax of incomes of married persons of $2,400 and less, and of single persons of $1,500, these to be progressively increased to $3,000 and $2,000 as production increased in relation to demand.

The second point in my amendment called for the elimination of the sales tax, and a substantial reduction in excise, processing and all other hidden and nuisance taxes. I emphasized at that time that the most vicious aspect of the sales tax was its cumulative effect from the time it started as a raw commodity until it reached the ultimate purchaser. I was pleased to hear an hon. member on the government side refer to this very point not very long ago. He gave specific figures and, as a businessman, he was in an admirable position to do so. I commend him for that information; and I shall also watch him to see how he votes if he does not get what he asserted the people should have.

Then we also called in our amendment for substantial increases in family allowances and, I would add, the removal of a number of discriminatory conditions which at present exist in connection with the application of family allowances. We pressed for increases in old age pensions, together with the elimination of the means test and a reduction in the pensionable age.

Before discussing in greater detail the matter of old age pensions, may I point out that in that same amendment we asked for adequate provision for all disabled adults, and selective subsidies, especially on food products and necessities of living.

May I for a moment discuss in greater detail the matter of old age pensions. I was delighted to learn that this year the government is going to reduce the pensionable age for women to sixty years and for men to sixty-five years, and remove the means test. I notice some eyes opening on the other side of the house; perhaps I should hasten to advise hon. members that I have not been let in on any secrets to which they should have been a party. No doubt many of them are aware of that to which I am now going to refer.

I have before me the February issue of the official organ of the old age pension organization in British Columbia. Let me emphasize that this is the February issue. I find from New Westminster this extremely interesting report, which states:

All roads led to New Westminster on Thursday, January 13, when No. 2 branch held open house for their annual banquet in the Eagles hall.

Then, after referring to those who were present, it states:

Mr. Tom Reid, M.P.—

Who, incidentally, is a parliamentary assistant, and would speak with greater authority than if he were just a private member—

—is reported as having said—

I shall read the paragraph just as it appears here, so that there may be no confusion—

Mr. Tom Reid, M.P. in a brief address stated he fully expected that the federal government would revise the Old Age Pensions Act and bring in the following improvements: reduce the pensionable age for women to sixty years and for men to sixty-five years; abolish the means test. Mr. Reid—

Mr. Reid: I hope I am not disappointed.

Mr. Shaw: Let me finish.

—Mr. Reid intimated that these improvements in the Old Age Pensions Act would be undertaken in the next session of the federal parliament which convenes on January 26.

Mr. Reid: The article the hon. member has read states what I said at that time, with the exception that I did not say it was going to be carried out. I said I fully expected that it would be.

Mr. Shaw: It does not state here that it would be carried out this session. It states the hon. member intimated that these improvements in the Old Age Pensions Act would be undertaken at the next session of the federal parliament.

Mr. Hansell: Did he state whether it would be on a non-contributory basis?

Mr. Shaw: That reference is not here, as to whether it would be contributory or non-contributory. However, knowing the hon. member as I do, I imagine he would fight for a non-contributory pension.

When I read that, I assumed that since the hon. member for New Westminster is a parliamentary assistant he would undoubtedly know more about it than other hon. members who sit about him, and that we might put more stock in this than might otherwise be the case.

Mr. Knowles: Too bad he is not a minister.

Mr. Shaw: That must have been great encouragement to old age pensioners and others who read this publication. I hope the hon. member for New Westminster will really fight to see that this becomes a reality in the present year. I know he has taken a worthy stand in the matter. May I assure him, and all other members on the government side, that they will have our support 100 per cent in that.

Earlier in the debate reference was made, I believe by the leader of the opposition (Mr.

Drew), to the fact that in recent times Liberal members have been indulging in some rather questionable practices in the matter of securing votes in by-elections. Had this been only an isolated instance I could have forgotten it; but it looks as though it is becoming the pattern for the next general election.

Before referring to one or two of those matters, however, may I point out that this failure to cut taxes last year, the building up of a tremendous surplus and now the offering of all these plums, was ably dealt with by Mr. W. D. Kearns who, according to a press report, was secretary of the Liberal Association in the constituency of Rosedale, and a Liberal candidate at the 1945 general election. He just quit the Liberals the other day, and upon that occasion said this:

> Tax reductions badly needed by the people were withheld for an election year. Now we shall see an attempt by the government to buy the people with their own money. I am against it.

That feeling has become pretty widespread in this country. I received a letter just the other day from Nova Scotia commenting upon the by-election in Digby-Annapolis-Kings. This man says:

> There is a general feeling down here that the time has come for a change of government at Ottawa. I want to assure you that I concur in that view even though I am a believer in Liberal principles.

I think possibly our Liberal friends across the way should pay heed to some of these expressions which are emanating from all quarters of the country. A moment ago I mentioned that reference had been made to certain questionable practices in connection with procuring votes and that a while ago mention was made in this house of the Liberal convention which had been held in Alberta. According to the press, all Liberals in Alberta—the whole two hundred of them—attended that convention. A minister went out there, I assume to instil some hope where hope is conspicuous by its absence; to inspire enthusiasm among those Liberals who have no cause to be enthused.

The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) was sent out there, but I think he was the wrong minister to send. He was a new minister and he had been enmeshed in the administrative complications and entanglements which always result from twentieth century Liberal policies. He was embroiled in the confusion of his surroundings, being a Liberal cabinet minister, and when he got out there he said: I cannot even remember the party which Mr. Low represents in the House of Commons. So I say he was a bad choice to send out there. He said: You know, I do not know what Social Credit is; I do not know what it stands for. He made one or two similar observations. Of course, as I said before, with his own complications and entanglements he could not be expected to take time to learn.

He went out to tell those Liberals in Alberta, those few deluded people, what they should do. He said that practically all the benefits received by the people in that province had come from the federal Liberal government. I can just imagine that as those Liberals sat there they were thinking of the iniquitous freight rate structure which drags so many dollars out of the consumer and drags so many dollars out of the producer. They must have been thinking of the iniquitous tax structure and the great burden of debt which Liberal policies have imposed on Canada, with their staggering annual payments in interest and other carrying charges.

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Shaw: The hon. member for Springfield interjects, but I say to him that at the present time he is only a political hitchhiker and is not supposed to know what his party stands for. Those people out there must have been thinking of the inadequate old age pensions and how, if it were not for the supplementary bonus of $7, the free hospitalization, the free medical, dental, optical and other services paid for by the province, some of them would actually starve to death with the basic pension which this government is pleased to make available to them.

I can imagine how the businessmen who sat in that meeting were cursing under their breaths because of the Liberal policies which have made pretty nearly every businessman in this country a civil servant without salary. They must also have been thinking of the losses sustained by the farmers of the west from time to time by virtue of Liberal government policy.

Getting back to the questionable methods to which I referred, the minister said that Alberta would get even more benefits than she was getting now if she sent representatives of a national and not a provincial party to the House of Commons. I should like the minister at his early convenience to name those additional benefits that Alberta would get if they elected more Liberals.

The inexperienced Liberal leader in the province, taking his cue from the federal cabinet minister, went a little bit further in his enthusiasm. He said that the voters should side with the party they think is going to win so they will have a friend at court.

An hon. Member: Who is the Liberal leader out there?

Mr. Shaw: Harper Prowse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Shaw: I would say to the hon. gentlemen who are applauding that Mr. Prowse is a gentleman who at the present time is wandering in the political wilderness. There is no question about that. I think it is high time that the people of the country were made aware of some of these things. I have what Mr. Prowse said somewhere, but I will give his second statement without reading it. He said that while in the past Alberta had had only two Liberal members in the House of Commons she had received a fair share of federal government moneys, and more could be expected if more Liberals were sent to the House of Commons at Ottawa.

I know that "fair" means two things. It means not good and not enough. He is not going to admit that. On the other hand, it may be that he thought we were getting as much as we deserved in the light of what other provinces were getting and in the light of the total amount the federal government had to give out. What he was actually saying was: If you in Alberta will elect more Liberals we will give you more than your share of federal moneys. That is exactly what it resolves itself into. In my opinion that becomes nothing less than bribery.

I should like to read what the Calgary Albertan had to say about the statements made at this convention. They refer to the fact that Mr. Prowse must be a politician and can be expected to take the politician's viewpoint:

> But still it was a shock to hear him make two particular points in an address to the recent Liberal convention in Calgary. One point was that the voters should side with the party they think is going to win, so they will have a "friend at court." The other was that Alberta, with only two Liberal M.P.'s at Ottawa, got a fair share of federal money, and could be expected to do much better by increasing its Liberal representation.

And then again:

> But we would like to think that federal governments would distribute available moneys among the provinces with regard only to need and other such considerations, and without regard to how those provinces voted. We would like to think that voters would vote for what they thought was the best party, not the one with the best chance of winning. We would appreciate the federal Liberal party appealing to the Alberta electorate on its record and on issues and not on "having a friend at court" and getting government grants.

The next paragraph is significant:

> Come to think of it, Alberta has been "agin" the federal government for going on to twenty-eight years. In all that time the contingent of Alberta M.P.'s has been in the opposition at Ottawa. Yet Alberta seems to be doing fairly well. Perhaps Mr. Prowse doesn't understand the people of this province.

That goes for my hon. friends opposite too. We have before us an amendment to the amendment to which I wish to refer just briefly. The first part of the amendment to the amendment calls for the orderly marketing of our natural products, and for their exchange for goods needed in Canada, and for the elimination of speculation in foodstuffs. We have no argument with that. Then they say:

> We regret further that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for national health insurance.

In connection with that, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that our conception of national health insurance is likely to be quite a different one from the conception of national health insurance held by my hon. friends of the C.C.F. In order that there may be no misunderstanding whatsoever I should like to make abundantly clear what kind of insurance we shall be voting for when we vote for the amendment to the amendment.

We have always taken the position that the health of every individual should be looked upon as one of our greatest natural resources. The healthy individual is able to make the greatest contribution to production, and to the arts and sciences. The physical well-being of every individual must, therefore, be recognized as of major concern and responsibility to the nation. During the war that concern and that responsibility were acknowledged by Canada. Our servicemen were provided with nourishing food, suitable environment and effective physical training, as well as with necessary dental, medical, optical and hospital services free of charge.

Mr. Low: By the people of Canada.

Mr. Shaw: By the Canadian taxpayers. All the money came out of taxes imposed on the people of Canada. We claim that a national health policy is absolutely necessary, and it should include all health measures, and all citizens should have access to them regardless of means.

Poverty, leading to malnutrition, unsanitary slum conditions, drudgery and mental anxiety, are direct causes of physical and mental degeneration. Economic insecurity of those who live just above the poverty line encourages a false economy. Through fear, such people starve themselves or resort to cheap remedies in place of proper health services.

Because of a rising demand on the part of the people of Canada for health services available to all, suggestions of compulsory and contributory state health insurance schemes have come from various quarters. This involves compulsion, and regimentation of doctors, nurses and patients, and the people, with higher direct taxation upon all. Such a policy is, in our opinion, undemocratic and unsound economically. Social Crediters are convinced that a national health policy must involve six things. They are:

1. Steps toward abolition of poverty through the adoption of sound economic policies which assure a basic income to provide economic security in unemployment, sickness, disability or old age, and opportunity for a decent standard of living.

2. Progress towards non-contributory national health services available to all citizens irrespective of means, without regimentation of patients, doctors or hospital authorities.

3. Adequate grants-in-aid for the construction and maintenance of hospitals for curative services, and for all measures of sickness prevention, including research.

4. Encouragement of voluntary mutual schemes of sickness insurance, supplementary to national health services, for occupational groups, communities and others.

5. The systematic introduction of the principle of payment for keeping people in good health instead of placing the medical profession in the unenviable position of benefiting only in proportion to the ill health of the nation.

6. Physical culture to be promoted as an essential aspect of the national life.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to reassert what I said earlier. We are ready to support the amendment to the amendment, but laying particular emphasis upon the statement I made that the type of national health insurance for which we shall vote is the type of national health insurance which I have just put on the record.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne affords private members of the House of Commons an opportunity to discuss a redress of grievances. There are a great many grievances in this country today. I may say that one of them comes from the main tax-paying city of the dominion, Toronto. We have not had a representative in the cabinet since 1935 whereas we used to have four or five at one time from that large centre of industry, finance and education. In my opinion that is a mistake. I have no doubt there will be a change very shortly.

The old parties are just like old soldiers. They never die. They may be recreated, and all that kind of thing. I hope the day is not far distant when the party on this side of the house may be recreated because I am one of those who believe in a national government. I am in favour of a national government for our party in every province of the dominion. In two of the provinces they have what they call a union government. One of them is in British Columbia. However, it may be that the coast will face invasion very shortly. I am going to refer to the battle of the Pacific in a few minutes. I believe we would be far better off if we had a national Conservative government there. Then we could get something done regarding national affairs because, as I see it, in the Pacific coast province the only alternative is to vote for what you might call a quasi-government on the other side of the fence.

When the late Mr. Wendell Willkie was told after the 1940 presidential election that his views were contrary to his campaign speeches he ridiculed the idea and called it an insult because he said his former statements were only campaign oratory. I notice that President Truman is not slow to follow that example. According to what I read in the papers, and in the records of congress, since his election he has followed the example of Mr. Wendell Willkie regarding the Taft-Hartley Act, wage increases, and relations between labour and management generally. His words now are contrary to his campaign speeches. At the present time in all these involved matters he just wants to act the part of an umpire instead of taking sides. Therefore I say to members of the government, and all those on the other side of the house, that they may see the mote in our eye but they do not see the beam in their own eye.

One of the matters on which I wish to say something refers to the reform of the Senate. I should like some of the frontbenchers to listen to what I am going to say. I should like the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), and all the rest of them, to listen. I should like my friends the members for York West and York South to come back here because I am going to have something to say to the Minister of Transport. As I say, I should like to have the attention of the member for York South. I think it would be far better if he would leave the Minister of Transport and come over here, because I am going to refer to the lack of steam suburban service for the Toronto district which affects his riding.

Mr. Cockeram: I shall be glad to listen.

Mr. Church: I like the members of the cabinet personally, but I say to this government that they may see the mote in the eye of those over here, but they cannot see the beam in their own eye. Talk about reform of the Senate, which has been referred to by my hon. friends to the left. On many occasions I was told in this house by the former Prime Minister that he would have a conference with the members of the other place to see if they could not be given more work. Why, it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for even a Victoria Cross holder to occupy a bench over in that other place. Some here spoke of moving the Senate over to Hull. I was not here that night. Then they spoke of moving them to the east block; and finally it was suggested in the house that they be moved to the printing bureau, which, it was said, would be a splendid place, since they would be in no danger there, with so many fire escapes on the building.

I believe the time has come when we should have some consideration for the province of Ontario. I am not one of those who try to get rich by being a member of parliament. Far from it. I think if I had stayed home altogether I would have been far better off. One of the things Canada should have learned from recent events is the tremendous popularity of the British royal family in this country. Another thing we must have noticed is the tremendous decline of the House of Commons as a result of surrendering its powers to the executive. Why that should be I do not know, but it is a fact, and unless there is a change in some of the newspapers, the radio and so on, so the people back home in our constituencies may know what is going on, we might just as well be meeting at times in secret, for all the people know of what is going on here.

The Canadian people rejoice in being subjects of His Majesty the King. As Canadians we are citizens of a free association of nations. The events last fall in Britain, including the illness of the king and the birth of a prince, made more apparent than ever the feelings of the Canadian people. And when Their Majesties visited Canada in 1939, nowhere did they get a better reception than in the province of Quebec. On her return to England the queen is reported to have said that the trip across Canada was something like a second coronation; and that was certainly due them for the good work they had performed.

I am more of a sportsman than a politician, and I want to congratulate one great citizen, Sir Donald Bradman, who was knighted by the king for his services to sport in general and to cricket in particular. I believe it was last New Year's day that a well deserved tribute was paid to that great Australian who has done so much for this old sport. Last June, July and August, when some members of this house were in England, they had an opportunity to see the Australian team defeat England. I have known him for a long time; he came to our city a few times, and I had a letter from him. He has become a household word, so much so that a prominent member of the British house, a Labour member who admires him, in speaking of the controls in force in that country, said an umpire might just as well try to show Bradman how to hold his bat as for the government to attempt some of the things it has been carrying on.

I was very glad to see that at its last convention my party advocated some measures of relief for the municipalities throughout Canada. One recommendation was that federal crown properties should pay some form of municipal tax for local services, such as fire and police protection and all the other things for which the city of Ottawa is paid half a million dollars. The provinces pay local taxes on their property, and it seems to me this government should do the same. I do not want our party to be called by any fancy prefixes or affixes. I am a Conservative first, last and all the time. I have no objection if the party wishes to add the word "Progressive" but I am too modest to call myself progressive, though I have brought before the house yearly many progressive measures. One of these was the national fuel policy, which I fathered in 1922. Another was parliamentary, constitutional, cabinet and law reform, one of the most important problems yet unsolved. Another was national flood control and irrigation, while another was oil pipe lines and petroleum development. I remember years ago when we had the floods in the Don river. The bridge collapsed and in later years we had to divert the Don. I also called attention to our three main problems of empire trade, defence and migration, and urged a cut of fifty per cent in all civilian estimates.

Today we have hundreds of millions of dollars being spent by outside boards and bodies without the authorization of this House of Commons. We never hear of the millions of dollars these people are spending over our heads, until we find it all charged up to the government. There is an old German proverb which says that saving is a greater art than spending. Saving is the essence of progress. We have an old proverb of our own, look after the pence and the pounds will look after themselves. That is still true; look after the cents and the dollars will look after themselves. Thrift is a great virtue. Who said that? Cicero. We should revive the old sense of personal responsibility in public affairs and see to it that the government does not squander our savings. We must never forget the old principle, that money must not be spent without representation, the disregard of which caused all the trouble in America which culminated in the Boston tea party. I referred to this point in the house last year, in regard to the winding up of the penny bank, which taught school children the importance of thrift.

I was very glad to see the suggestion that there should be an immediate restoration of the empire air training plan, especially in view of the statement made recently by Air Marshal Tedder in regard to Britain's position in the event of trouble. Then I believe there should be a housecleaning in the C.B.C., which has been a most mischievous institution. Nobody should have free time; everybody should pay. There are hundreds and hundreds of these employees, and some of them never had jobs before. Yet we in this House of Commons cannot find out anything about the salaries that are paid. Everyone knows the salaries paid in the House of Commons; everyone knows how much the judges are paid; yet these people are brought to Toronto from all over Canada to work for this corporation. Then think of the cheap and ridiculous nonsense that we hear from the C.B.C. board of governors. If I had my way I would dismiss the whole lot of them, with the exception of the member from Toronto, Fred Crawford, who is a very good man.

Reference has been made also to provincial rights. Look at the Sirois report, one of the most mischievous documents ever compiled. If we are to have unity in Canada we must have unity between Ontario and Quebec, the keystone provinces of confederation. Although before the second war those two provinces paid about 70 per cent of all the cash taxes, they received little or nothing in the way of expenditures. I am for provincial and municipal rights, first, last and all the time. I would apply the old Conservative doctrine, each for all and all for each, as a principle of confederation for the provinces. I believe in bonuses, subventions and subsidies, as a federal remedy to aid in part in solving all provincial wrongs. I am opposed to any more political railway rate structures, and to fastening them on the two central provinces. Ontario was the forgotten province so far as the Canadian National Railways were concerned.

For many years past I have been asking for steam suburban service like that which Montreal and every American city has. I have here in my hand timetables of the Canadian National Railways and of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the city of Montreal. In Toronto we have one train a day out to Lorne Park. If we had some support we might get something better. When I was head of the city I raised this matter, but it has not been taken up since. I introduced a bill here. We compelled the old Grand Trunk railway, which was swallowed up by the Canadian National railway, to issue commutation tickets; because it was in Ontario that the old Grand Trunk railway made all its money. I would ask hon. members to look at the service in western Ontario and in the Niagara district. I succeeded in getting commutation tickets for Oakville, Brampton and some other places. Here is a list of trains of the Canadian National Railways in the Montreal district. If some newspaper would publish them, it might do some good. I am surprised that the Toronto press do nothing about this matter. If my suggestion were followed it would relieve the whole housing situation in the Toronto district. That would follow if we had in the Toronto district the same suburban service which Montreal has—trains every fifteen minutes out to Dixie, Lakeside and all those places, as they have to Lachine, Dorval and so on. The national railways should not have had its head offices in Montreal, but in the public-ownership city of Toronto. It was in Ontario that the old Grand Trunk made their money. What did they do? The province of Ontario suffered. It was then made the C.N.R. under Sir Henry Thornton, and they spent money like water. They would have given an air service to the sun, the moon and the stars if they had only been allowed to spend the money. What it simply amounted to was that Ontario got nothing. The result is that on both railways the situation is the same. I am really surprised, because there is nothing which would have increased housing, health and other services more in a city of our size and done more for the benefit of the rising generation. We do not ask for anything just for fun. We ask that we get similar treatment, and we are not getting it from that railway at the present time.

I complained about the C.N.R. service in the Toronto district, and referred to the Canadian National railways disaster in my constituency at Riverdale and Degrassi street last June. At that time a freight train jumped the track and cattle wandered all over the district. I urged the railways to lessen the speed of trains on the viaduct. A similar accident happened a month or so afterwards at the King street subway. If a streetcar had been going past at the time, the train would have jumped over on the streetcar. Another accident of the same kind happened at the Parkdale station. There should be a new C.N.R. station at Sunnyside and north Parkdale, two of the most used stations in Canada. The accommodation at the two Parkdale stations and at the Union station for women and children and for the comfort of passengers and trainmen is a relic of the past and is becoming a nuisance as compared with rest room accommodation in Montreal, Hamilton and London. I may say that I am glad to see them get something, but it was in Ontario that the Canadian National Railways made most of its money.

Since I entered the House of Commons I have had the unanimous support of labour. In the past I have had a great deal to do with labour and have settled many strikes. When the streetcar strike took place on the old Toronto street railway, I met a great man, Mr. Gompers, president of the American federation of labour, Mr. Mahone and Mr. Fitzgerald. Together we sat down and with others settled that strike.

I may say that in conjunction with my late beloved friend, Mr. Woodsworth, when I first came to parliament I introduced a motion in favour of unemployment insurance and old age pensions. I happened to be the president of the union of Canadian municipalities when we were urging this thing in the early 1920's and before. We had hundreds of employees in the various departments in the city of Toronto, with a payroll running into millions of dollars. Some of them went to the first war and afterwards returned to their old positions in the city's service. Then we had the school board, public utilities, the harbour board, and hydro, and later on, the transportation commission, all with a large number of employees and a big payroll.

Before the present government introduced the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940, some of the municipalities in Ontario went to Queen's Park, Mr. Hepburn then being premier, and we were told that under the Municipal Act we could not legally pay our employees on retirement $12 a week, as we used to on pension for many years. It was little enough, goodness knows, but we were told we had no power to do it and that it was quite wrong. I do not want to impose any undue burden on the employer; far from it. Unemployment insurance has been a splendid thing for the country. There were certain defects in the law and they were cured last session. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) did good work on it, and the municipalities suggested some changes in the act, which he made.

Never has the House of Commons been faced with graver issues than now. At the present time we face the most serious economic disaster and a very direct military threat, as we go on pretending we have security. We also err, as does the United States, in taking Britain's supremacy of the seas for granted. There is only one path to take, and our Ottawa government will not follow it, namely, empire consolidation, which stood us so well in two long wars.

[Mr. Church.]

Why is any scheme of internationalism, however absurd, adopted by Ottawa instead of finding real security within our own family members in the dominions and crown colonies? The United Nations is heading us into a third war, and the west as yet is now no match for the east. Canada will soon learn the sham of depending on Washington's aid alone, without the aid of Britain and the empire, which protected us for four centuries.

Stalin's Russia is as dangerous to the peace of the world as was Hitler's Germany; and Russia, by waging a weaponless war, has already conquered huge areas of Europe and Asia. I find an analogy between the failure of the United States and Britain to occupy Berlin, and the failure of Hannibal to enter ancient Rome when only fifteen miles away. The next year Carthage was destroyed.

I note that 38,000 tons of rubber are being exported monthly from Malaya to Russia, while Canada and the empire get little or none. If the government is sincere, it should have sought defence and security, as we did safely and well in two long wars, jointly within our own family along with the dominions and crown colonies, when together with the mother country we had to go it alone for two and a half years. During the time that Russia was an ally of Germany the United States did not come in, in a military way, for over two years until the time of Pearl Harbor. I here and now ask the government in this debate—and I think I have a right to demand it of the government and its servants—that proper means be taken to see that our armed forces are prepared with effective plans for our defence, including home defence services, and that they be put on a war footing in case of an emergency. I refer to the home guard and all that kind of thing.

Now we should provide for our own defence. Without the aid of the dominions and the empire we have no defence. All our defences are based on the fact that in two long wars Britain had the supremacy of the seas. That was the real Monroe doctrine. That saved America and the world in two long wars. Now we shall have to see to our own defence, since Britain cannot do it, and it is going to cost hundreds of millions of dollars.

What is the issue in Berlin? As I told the house last June, the issue in Berlin is the command of the seas. The government claim that they never had an invitation. The United States did not need an invitation. Britain does not need an invitation and Australia does not need an invitation. The chief Air Marshal of Britain said that we are in great danger today. Britain is in grave danger today of an air raid in case of war.

Russia would be over Britain in a few minutes. Here we are asleep. The government are asleep. They do not realize the issue. The real issue in Berlin today is the command of the seas. If Britain is driven out, if America is driven out of there, then we are going to lose command of the seas. To whom? To Russia. I fail to see why Canada is not ready after all the urgings we have had. It looks to me now as if we are back to the days of Ethelred who was called Ethelred the Unready many long years ago. That is what Canada's defences are, unready. We have lost Britain; now, to defend ourselves, we have to make a deal with whom? With Washington. I remember when some of our friends in the house said in the first war and in the second war, "Why do we need to go to London for defence, when we can get all the defence we need in Washington"? Yet what happened? Two and a half years passed before they came in, in both wars. It was not until after Pearl Harbor that they came in in the last war. If that is all the defence we have, I fear we are going to be invaded. There is all this talk about nationalism and defence forces. A million men from the dominions went over in the first war under their own status, sovereignty and autonomy. One hundred and thirty-five thousand of these men fell in battle. They went over voluntarily. They did not go to fight for Britain. They went over to fight by her side, and what they did changed the whole history of the world. In the second war they went over in numbers ten times larger, with their own status, autonomy and sovereignty, and of their volition.

Today we talk about regional pacts. Well, there were regional pacts a hundred years ago. You know, regional pacts are just scraps of paper. In four centuries Britain had command of the seas and saved America's shores against Philip of Spain, Louis XIV and Napoleon, and twice in our generation the mother country has saved the world from slavery. Yet today there are those who ridicule her. We would have had the awful horrors of war on our own soil but for her. Last year I saw the cove where the enemy came. They came up the St. Laurence river as far as Riviere du Loup. We had to call a private meeting of the House of Commons to talk about the navy. I can say to my hon. friends from Quebec that they would have experienced the horrors of war on their own soil if the enemy had ever landed there, and hundreds of thousands of our people would have been killed or carted away. The tramping of feet would have been heard not only in the maritimes but in Ontario and Quebec and tens of thousands of people would have been carted away to work in the mines of Germany and Europe. We should not forget those who saved our soil in two long wars. I believe that the day is not far distant when something will have to be done about it.

I may say that for the first time in forty years Britain faces every possible threat of a war without a military ally of any consequence or strength and the whole continent of Europe will soon be dominated by Russia. In the first world war she had a very great friend who was then one of the most formidable of military powers, France. In the second world war France again was our friend and ally, although weaker, and after nine months she withered away. France is not what she used to be but she is friendly. In a military way she is somewhat powerless. Her economic affairs have improved somewhat. The net result is that Canada takes no part in the real issue.

The western union powers so far are more imaginary than real, and the Atlantic pact is somewhat up in the clouds and fog, although I hope it will be a success. Britain cannot join any customs union in Europe. If the western union means co-operation with European countries that have not our way of life, and are alien to Anglo-American ideas of liberty and civilization, it is time for us to clear away the Atlantic pact fog of the present time.

I notice the criticism in the Economist and other papers that the Atlantic pact will be useless without any military forces to back it up. The United States could have entered Prague, instead of halting their forces at Pilsen. That created the present Berlin situation, and possibly also this Carthaginian peace. It is time that something should be done about it.

Amidst all this, it is too bad that British leadership is not more agressive. I venture to say that if Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden were leading the government over in that country they would long ago have met Stalin and candidly discussed with him the whole world situation and would have told him that the west meant business from the start. They would have persuaded him to change his tactics because he needs capital goods from all these western places. We already know the weaknesses of the military strength of the Brussels powers, backed by the United States and the British empire. We should avoid placing arms in the hands of the German people, who might abuse them again. The Russian satellites are torn between fear of Russia and fear of Germany, and the western powers will bring on a third war if they persist in rearming Germany. It will divide the west also. The duty of the west now is to organize its military strength and to make Russia and her satellites believe that the disunity and indecision of the west are over once and for all. The west is as yet no match for the east, but if a start is made it will be better, and there is no use depending on any security from Lake Success, and such appeasement methods, which were a distinct failure in two world wars, instead of depending on our own strength from within the empire.

From the town of Yalta western statesmen have gone out of their way to demonstrate friendliness to Russia. Britain withdrew her armies, and the Americans halted at Pilsen. The result of this awful folly is now seen in the very critical situation in Berlin. Within a very few days of Japan's surrender Russia was actually invited by the Americans to declare war on Japan in order that she might participate in occupation of the Japanese empire conquered by British and American armies, and taking full advantage she at once seized and flooded Manchuria, seized the armament factories at Mukden and handed them over to the Chinese communists who have thereby been assisted in their war against the Chinese government.

The position is so serious that, unless the western allies help, it may be too late. They have provided equipment to Russia, to the point where the Chinese are likely to become communist, and will be dominated by Russia. In view of this, we should put all proper safeguards in the Atlantic pact which we will have before us shortly. Today from the Baltic to the Aegean, from the Danube to the Yellow sea, Moscow has produced a dismal picture. Each time we adopt appeasement and offer a helping hand, each time we offer appeasement to Russia, we do it at the expense of our friends, and it is interpreted by Stalin as a sign of weakness. As a consequence seven countries in Europe, together with China, have been enslaved. Other countries in Asia and throughout the world are threatened. These are the facts.

But no one is ready to do anything about it, What is the use of pretending that we have security, as we do pretend, when in fact we have not got it?

Then, I should like to refer to the Pacific, because in the Pacific ocean we used to have our protection from the United States. At the time of the first war Japan looked after the Pacific, with the result that the United States and Great Britain were able to devote their energies to the other theatre of war. However, as I pointed out in the house before the beginning of the second world war, at the time of that war the situation was quite different. We had a long coast line stretching 760 miles from Puget Sound to Queen Charlotte islands. That coast line is absolutely unprotected. What are we going to do about it, so far as Russia is concerned? She has a powerful fleet and air force at the present time. And, I can tell you this, that she may be out there quicker than you think.

The Pacific question should be an empire question. Australia is interested in the Pacific. It was shown during the air debate three or four years ago, and it has been shown in Australia and in Canada, that we have a vast interest in the Pacific. Our position there should be studied; and I hope the government will study it before another session of parliament is called.

But Canada has a regular expeditionary force on all the seven seas. We have our people — thirty ambassadors — travelling all over the world. I think the Auditor General ought to get busy on this matter, and we would have some relief; because each one of them has a first secretary, a second secretary and a third secretary. I am sure I do not know what he does; perhaps he carries a jug of ice water, or something like that.

We do know however that we have all those embassies, a fact which was ridiculed last June by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). At that time he was referring to so many of these ambassadors, and pointed out that if he were on Sparks street he would want to take the middle of the road. They all want to be at the head of the band. And we might bear in mind that the undertaker is the first man in the procession, too. These ambassadors are like drum majors who throw their drumsticks in the air and are very impressive.

All this is a mistake, this sending of amateur diplomats who learn from experience. Because that is all they are, every one of them. Some secretaries have to go along with the ministers, of course. They are always followed by their secretaries. I am not criticizing anyone's having a trip; I am always glad to see a person take a trip—but not when he is spending the country's money.

I notice my good friend the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. McCubbin) is not here this evening. I may say however that last fall I was in his constituency attending the funeral of an archbishop. I never saw such glorious country in my life as one sees in the county of Middlesex. But I can tell you this, that up there I saw no churches blown down, the way they were blown down in the old country. We read that the Right Reverend Bishop Renison had to celebrate communion in the ruins of Coventry cathedral, and hold the ceremony in the open air.

I do not wish to refer to my good friend the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. I would not object to his taking a trip. But the Auditor General should look into this expeditionary force of ours. Why, they would reach four deep from here to Lansdowne park. I notice the ministers of Health and Labour are not in their seats; but I believe they have forty or fifty fellows out on the high seas now, on their way to study hygiene, and all that sort of thing. Is it any wonder that the people are confused?

There should be a 75 per cent reduction in our expenditures. We used to run this country, at the time Sir Wilfrid Laurier came in, and Sir Charles Tupper went out, for about $36 million. But today we are away up around $4 billion. It is away up in the air—up in the clouds. I say when the figures become astronomical like that the money is being blown in such a way that nothing is gained. So I do hope something will be done about it.

At this session of parliament we as a House of Commons must concern ourselves with matters touching the very lives of our people. It is a first duty of a government to look after the peace, welfare, health, happiness and prosperity of its citizens. These are the primary considerations. We meet here surrounded by a cloud of witnesses from the constituencies, the people back home who are suffering today in this battle of life, the people who are struggling to make a living.

We should deal with the lives of the masses of the people, and the matters which concern them. We should deal with food and poor housing. This evening I said that we should have steam suburban transportation. I pointed out that taxation was too high, and that we should have national health insurance. The average elector is in need of some help in these ways.

I was in hopes that we might have some amendment to our Unemployment Insurance Act. Our labouring people could get some help in this way. Then, there should be some food subsidy, along the lines I have suggested. I hope something will be done about that too, for the low bracket wage earners.

At the present time the only sure salvation for peace, and the prevention of war, rests upon the strength of our allies. As Mr. Churchill has said, the only sure foundation for peace and the prevention of actual war rests upon strength. We owe a duty to our empire to stay strong in peace. We can be friendly only with co-operative neighbours.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Church: The empire parliamentary association has turned itself into a pan-American association, and has forgotten all about the empire. It used to be the only organization which had no politics in it. Today, however, it is full of politics from top to bottom.

We should not ask the mother country to pay the cost of that trip to the old country of the parliamentary association. That burden should not be placed on the backs of the poor British taxpayers. I should think this suggestion would commend itself to the judgment of the country.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), when speaking in this debate, moved the following amendment:

> We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for the orderly marketing of our natural products, and for their exchange for goods needed in Canada, and for the elimination of speculation in foodstuffs; We regret further that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for national health insurance.

I rise to endorse wholeheartedly that amendment to the amendment. I do so because, first, I am a firm believer in national marketing legislation and the necessity for the establishment in this country of a national marketing agency to market our primary products. I support this amendment also because I am aware of the fact that the organized farmers of this country have for some years been pressing this government to pass such legislation. I may say further that the birthplace of this type of legislation was the southern interior of British Columbia. I remember when the first committee sat to make a draft bill for the provincial legislature and I am happy to know that the draft bill presented to the cabinet by the Canadian federation of agriculture was originally drafted by the officials and delegates of the British Columbia fruit growers association. You will realize, therefore, that this legislation is of great interest to the people I have the honour to represent and to the people of Yale constituency.

I could speak at greater length on this subject but I have already spoken briefly on the matter this session. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones) dealt very fully and effectively with this matter when speaking in this debate. I know the serious position facing the tree fruit industry in British Columbia and other agricultural producers as a result of this government not listening to the argument put forward by the producers. I am speaking as one who believes that if we are going to retain or recapture the United Kingdom and European markets we cannot in the future permit the question of dollars to interfere with the exchange of our commodities.

I also support this amendment because I believe the Canadian people are looking forward to the establishment of a national health insurance scheme. I admit that the present grants in aid are a step in the right direction and will bring about some improvement in hospital and other services, but I am sure, and I believe many hon. members of this house are sure, that we will not have a worthwhile health insurance scheme until the national and provincial governments work together in co-operation with the people of Canada.

I am quite sure that the veterans of this country and their dependents are disappointed that there is no mention of veterans affairs in the speech from the throne. I am sure that those veterans who are at present living on the present scale of war veterans allowances are disappointed. I am sure the veterans organizations in this country are disappointed. I am sure the veterans who only had the opportunity to serve in England in the first war are disappointed. I am certain the imperial veterans who have resided in Canada for a long period of years are disappointed.

In addition, I am quite sure the old age pensioners of this country, who are living under increasingly difficult conditions from month to month, are disappointed, having knowledge of the large financial surplus which this government will quite likely announce, that some further remedy has not been proposed for their most unfortunate condition. I could deal at length with controls, subsidies, housing and other matters, but I am going to be brief on a few matters tonight.

I wish to take the opportunity this evening to deal with a matter of great importance to the people of the southern interior of British Columbia, a matter that they are greatly concerned about. Having criticized the speech briefly, I am pleased to note that the government will introduce an amendment to the Supreme Court Act to make the Supreme Court of Canada the court of last resort. This is something that has been advocated by this group for some years, most effectively to my personal knowledge during recent sessions of parliament by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke). I think that is a step forward in legislation in this country.

I am glad the government has indicated that it intends to introduce a bill to broaden the scope of family allowances. It sounds as though it will be all to the good and make family allowances available to a larger number of deserving people. I am also pleased to see in the address that a measure is to be introduced to provide assistance to the provinces in building a trans-Canada highway system. This announcement will be of great interest to the people of British Columbia, and to the people of the southern interior of British Columbia particularly. This is all I am going to say at this time because I hope to have something more to say on this matter at a later date.

I notice that the government has proposals for the development of navigation and power on the great lakes and in the St. Lawrence basin. I heartily support the proposals for the development of the St. Lawrence basin, but I want to take advantage of this opportunity to bring to the attention of the house the importance of the development of another great river basin in this country, of which some hon. members are unaware and of which the majority of people in Eastern Canada are totally unaware. I refer to the Canadian portion of the Columbia river basin.

The people of the Okanagan and the people of Kootenay are vitally concerned with the possible development of this vast basin. They are concerned with it because it means power for irrigation, it means power for secondary industries, it means power for agriculture, and it means power for the establishment of a large pulp industry in Kootenay West, the district which I represent.

Before proceeding to deal briefly with a review of the resources of the basin, I should like to describe the basin, and I will give the official description, which is as follows:

> The Columbia river basin is situated in the cordillera on the Pacific slope of the North American continent where its river system comprises one of the large international drainages shared by Canada and the United States. It includes approximately 259,000 square miles, between north latitudes 41 and 53 degrees and west longitudes 110 and 124 degrees. Of this vast area, some 39,700 square miles form the southeast portion of the province of British Columbia in Canada, while the 219,300 square miles in the United States include almost all of Idaho, the greater part of Oregon and Washington, western Montana and relatively small areas of western Wyoming, northwestern Utah and northeastern Nevada. The greatest width of the basin, from western Wyoming to the Pacific ocean, is 728 miles, and its maximum length, from its most northerly limit in British Columbia, to its southern boundary in northern Nevada, is 818 miles.

This vast area is capable of great development. The Canadian section of this huge triangle, about which I am going to speak briefly this evening, can be best described as starting from the junction of the Alberta and British Columbia boundaries with the international boundary, proceeding northwest along the ridge of the Rocky mountain slope to the watershed of the Canoe river which flows into the big bend of the Columbia. Then it turns southwest and follows the height of land between the Columbia divide and the Thompson divide for possibly some thirty miles on the west side of the Arrow lakes, and then, roughly speaking, proceeds southwest towards the international boundary at a point south of Princeton.

There are four great tributaries of the Columbia river which are of major concern to Canadians. They are the Okanagan, the Kootenay, the Pend-d'Oreille and the Kettle. The international character of the basin is exemplified by the course of the Columbia, Kootenay and Pend-d'Oreille rivers, and is further demonstrated by the Flat Head, Okanagan, Similkameen and numerous smaller streams which cross the international border once or more on their way to the Columbia and its tributaries.

In order to bring to the attention of the house the great resources of the basin I will review them very briefly. I may say that my figures are based on federal government reports, provincial government reports, and reports issued by various organizations and commissions. They are only approximate, but they are approximately correct. The Canadian portion of the Columbia river basin has a population of approximately 125,000 people. Of that 125,000 people approximately 42,000 are urban dwellers and 83,000 are rural or country dwellers. The power resources of the Columbia river basin in Canada amount to about 450,000 kilowatts installed at the present time. The major portion of this is the result of the developments of the West Kootenay Power and Light Company, and the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company on the lower portion of the Kootenay river where they have an installed capacity at the present time of 258,000 kilowatts. The difference between the 258,000 and 450,000 kilowatts is found in some installations on the Elk river, and on various smaller streams throughout the basin. The estimated total that can be developed on the main stem of the Columbia beyond the big bend at Revelstoke and to the international boundary is 2,900,000 kilowatts. This amount can be developed with control and regulation. The estimated potential development of electrical energy in the whole of the Canadian portion of the Columbia river basin is about 4,000,000 kilowatts. Therefore you can see the great possibilities for the development of power, and the opportunity to apply that power to vast and undeveloped natural resources.

At the present time the agricultural resources of the basin are extensive, although they are capable of immense development. There is a total of 305,400 acres under cultivation. Of that number 75,500 acres are irrigated. An additional 395,000 acres are in use as open grazing land. The value of the 8,000 farms in the basin, with the land, buildings and improvements, is over $60 million. The present annual production of fruit, dairy products, grain, livestock, poultry, seeds, hay, honey, and other farm produce, is about $35 million. There are still many thousands of acres to be irrigated, many thousands of acres to be cleared, and many thousands of acres to be drained.

Turning to forest resources, 13 per cent of the productive forest land in British Columbia is in the Canadian portion of the Columbia river basin. It is estimated there are 22 billion board feet of timber within the basin, of which amount 14 billion board feet are classified as accessible. That amount is being increased from year to year with the development of bigger logging equipment, and cheaper methods of building roads and developing communications. For some years the annual lumber cut has been over 300 million board feet per year. In addition to that there is an enormous quantity of cedar poles, piling, ties, mine timber, mine props, shingle bolts, fuel wood and Christmas trees shipped out of the basin annually.

At this point I have no hesitation in saying that one of the largest stands, and possibly the last large stand, of cedar poles on the north American continent, is to be found in the Canadian portion of the Columbia river basin. Tests by the forest products branch of the Department of Agriculture at Washington have proven that the cedar poles shipped out of the basin have the highest tensile strength of any poles shipped from Canada. That results from the fact that the trees grow in a higher climate with somewhat slower growth, and under mountainous conditions.

With respect to mineral resources, mining within the Columbia river basin portion of British Columbia has been a major industry for the past fifty years until now the average annual production of gold, silver, copper, lead, zinc, antimony, bismuth, coal, and by-products of those minerals, is well over $100 million a year. The largest non-ferrous smelter in the British commonwealth is operated at Trail by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, which also operates vast fertilizer and chemical plants.

The fish and wild life resources of the basin are plentiful. Fish are found in the rivers, lakes and streams throughout the whole of the Columbia river basin, and these are replenished by artificial rearing and stocking operations carried on by the British Columbia game commission. Fur-bearing animals are plentiful in the district with an estimated raw fur value of about $100,000. There are some 500 fur farms at the present time in British Columbia with an annual production of $750,000 a year. A great number of these fur farms are located within this basin.

The basin supplies marvellous recreational resources and opportunities. Outdoor recreational facilities in the Columbia river basin offer the largest range of sports to satisfy the most particular as to climate, scenery, altitude, transportation and accommodations. There is no comparable region in Canada that offers such opportunities for aquatic sports, hunting, fishing, camping, mountain climbing and skiing. With reference to skiing, I want to draw to the attention of the house two particularly fine community developments within that basin. The first and oldest is the ski jump at Revelstoke on Revelstoke mountain which is the result of many years of community effort on the part of the people of Revelstoke who were interested in the sport and interested in the young people of that district. Many of the world's champions have jumped on that hill, and many world records have been made as a result of the development of that hill in Revelstoke. Then we have a later development within the last two or three years on Red mountain at Rossland where they have one of the finest ski lifts in Canada, constructed at a very considerable cost. There are excellent hills, an excellent lodge, and everything that goes to make for excellent skiing facilities, opportunities for international and inter-varsity tournaments, and so on. The ski lift has been developed as a result of the community effort of the people of Rossland and the people of Trail, with excellent co-operation from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

With reference to navigation resources, we have the Columbia river, of which the Arrow lakes are an extension. You can travel from Grand Coulee to Revelstoke, a distance of over 300 miles. Year by year increasing numbers of American sportsmen and American fishermen seek the pleasure of new scenes and come up from Grand Coulee in their launches. Last summer they stopped on our beach and on the beaches of neighbours of mine, and thoroughly enjoyed themselves. Increasing numbers are making the trip as far north as Revelstoke. Then we have the steamer service of the C.P.R. on the Arrow lakes, passenger and freight, and the same on the Kootenay lakes. We have barge service on the Okanagan by the C.N.R. and C.P.R., and service also on the Slocan lakes.

Then I want to bring to the attention of this house what the constituency I represent has meant to Canada through the years. Mr. J. A. Mara, member for Yale, which at that time included East and West Kootenay, speaking in this house on April 1, 1896, had this to say:

> The Kootenay district contributes more per head to the general revenue than any other part of Canada . . .

I challenge anyone, taking into consideration the population of the district and the total production, to show that this condition does not prevail today.

Mr. Cruickshank: And that was under free enterprise.

Mr. Herridge: And also under the greatest co-operative development in the whole of Canada. I mention this to indicate the importance of the district, because in proceeding with my argument I want to show how Liberal and Conservative governments have overlooked the value of this district in the Canadian economy, and have neglected to defend the rights of the people of this district under certain treaties and obligations. We know this great basin extending into Canada from the United States can be developed to its fullest extent only through co-operation between these two countries. Before adjourning the debate for this evening I want to conclude my remarks at this point by quoting from a report of a committee of congress on the Columbia river and its tributaries, appointed in 1943 and 1944, to study the possibility of developing the American portion of the Columbia river basin. This is what the report had to say, in part:

> From the standpoint of resources the Columbia is is the mightiest stream on the North American continent; its potential almost beyond comprehension, for nature in one of her philanthropic moods fashioned the land with such perfection as is nowhere else known.

I now move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: We will continue this debate tomorrow.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 22, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of the following member, viz:

Of Renaud Chapdelaine, Esquire, for the electoral district of Nicolet-Yamaska.

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION

SATELLITE STATES OF EASTERN EUROPE—CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like at this time to answer the question asked me yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) about religious persecutions in eastern Europe.

During the past few weeks, Mr. Speaker, this house and the country as a whole have watched with deepening concern what appears to be a systematic campaign of religious persecution in all the satellite states of eastern Europe, but particularly in Hungary where within a short space of time the heads of three branches of the Christian church, the Roman Catholic, the Calvinist and the Lutheran, have either been sentenced to severe punishment or driven into exile. More recent persecutions in Bulgaria seem to be following the same pattern.

The government of Canada has already indicated in the most positive terms and in language clear beyond all possibility of mistake, its abhorrence of this systematic persecution. In a statement on New Year's day I said that the increasingly brutal persecutions of religious leaders in countries behind the iron curtain have shocked all civilized people. These views were reiterated and strengthened on February 2 by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the light of more recent developments, I now wish to reaffirm the position of the Canadian government.

Immediately after the arrest of Cardinal Mindszenty, Primate of Hungary, the Canadian government, as a signatory of the peace treaty, asked our diplomatic representatives in a number of European capitals and Washington to secure all the available information and to report any steps that might be anticipated on the part of the governments to which they were accredited. Careful study was given also to official intelligence from other sources and to press reports.

This was followed, as the house will recall from the statement made on February 2 by the Secretary of the State of External Affairs, by a communication to the Hungarian government, through the Hungarian minister in Washington, protesting strongly against a policy of repression and religious persecution which appeared to destroy religious freedom in Hungary and appeared also to violate obligations to secure the enjoyment of human rights, including freedom of religious worship, to which Hungary was pledged under the treaty of peace of 1947.

In this message, particular reference was made to the arrest not only of Cardinal Mindszenty, but also of the senior bishop of the Lutheran church in Hungary, and to the flight into exile, under force of persecution, of the senior bishop of the Calvinist church in Hungary.

It seems clear from these incidents that all religious faiths were involved and that a general attack was being launched on the fundamental freedoms of human society. Fresh emphasis was given to the repressive character of these arrests by the conditions under which the trial of Cardinal Mindszenty was conducted. It can hardly be said that these proceedings bear any resemblance to what we understand by a "fair trial". From official sources in which we have confidence, we learn, for example, the following facts about the conduct of this case.

The trial which involved seven persons and four different charges, including capital charges, was concluded in three days. No witnesses were called for the defence. The counsel for the prosecution made no attempt to establish his case but confined himself for the most part to enlarging on the political fairness of the trial. The counsel for the defence put no case for the defence and did not contest easily refutable statements made by the counsel for the prosecution; and the material evidence consisted of statements taken outside the court before the trial. It may be added that no representatives of non-communist governments were permitted to attend the trial. We are informed also that the representative of the government of Australia attempted to visit Budapest for this purpose, but though a visa was promised on six occasions, it was not forthcoming.

Meanwhile the government is continuing to seek the views of like-minded governments, signatory to the treaty, on the character and desirability of any further action that may be taken jointly or independently. It has been suggested, for example, that the treaty of peace be invoked. Unfortunately, the procedures which are immediately available under the treaty of peace all depend for their effectiveness on the co-operation of the soviet government. Since the U.S.S.R. not only supports but even encourages governments which it can influence in their hostility to religion, it is not likely to give the other signatories to the peace treaties much assistance in putting a halt to religious persecution in eastern Europe. It may be, however, that the signatories to the treaties, even without the support of the soviet union, could, through joint representation based on these provisions of these treaties, have some influence upon the governments which are responsible for these acts.

Provision is also made in the treaty for a procedure leading to the establishment of a commission of three to act in regard to any dispute arising out of the execution or interpretation of the treaty. The majority decision of this commission would be binding on the parties to the dispute.

If this procedure were used, the obstruction of the U.S.S.R. to action under it could not become effective until efforts were made to give effect to the decisions of the commission.

A further possibility that has received some public notice is that the matter be referred to the United Nations; because it would seem obvious that the spirit of repression and persecution that pervades the events under review is clearly not in keeping with the charter of the United Nations or the declaration of human rights.

In any case it is the view of the government that a state which fails to carry out its treaty obligations in letter and spirit cannot expect to be supported in its application for admission to the United Nations; and indeed might expect formally to be condemned by the world organization.

But, Mr. Speaker, in examining these or any other suggestions that may be made, the government's course will be guided by considerations that are more significant than tactics or gestures. While giving the fullest expression to our profound abhorrence of religious persecution, however it may be disguised, we shall seek to take only such action as appears to offer a reasonable prospect of promoting the principles in which we believe and at the same time of ameliorating the situation with which we are faced in the communist countries.

The events in Hungary have, as hon. members know, been followed by similar action on the part of the Bulgarian government. On February 10 that government issued its indictment of fifteen Protestant leaders in that country, charging them with espionage and other crimes.

The government has instructed the Canadian charge d'affaires in Prague to apply for visas to visit Hungary and Roumania in order that he may make inquiries on the spot and report to the government. Canada is not a signatory to the Bulgarian treaty, but, in any joint action that may be considered advisable, this country would find no difficulty in associating itself with such action. The principles of religious freedom and fundamental human rights are not confined to the articles of a peace treaty.

The clear and common sense conclusion, Mr. Speaker, is that the cases of each church, each bishop, or each group of religious leaders, are horrifying incidents in what appears to be a grand design, a calculated policy of persecution, aimed not perhaps at the immediate extermination of the Christian communions, but at their ultimate subjugation and servitude. By its nature and its dogma, Marxist communism must secure the total obedience of its subjects and cannot tolerate the free speculations of the human spirit and conscience.

A plain recital of a few only of the incidents in this process reveals the pattern of persecution which is swiftly being drawn over the unhappy Christians of these lands. We are already familiar with the fate in Hungary of leaders of three different churches; and I have mentioned the indictments on February 10 by the Bulgarian government of fifteen Protestant leaders in that country. It is noteworthy that while these clergymen, all members of the United Evangelical church in Bulgaria, were apparently arrested some months ago, no indictment was made until this late date.

In Poland some twenty-six priests have been detained and eight arrested for having read a pastoral letter from their bishop in which the anti-religious actions of government officials were severely criticized.

In Czechoslovakia towards the end of last year two members of the Greek Catholic church were tried for alleged espionage activities, and early this month a new campaign was started against the church.

In Roumania in December, 1948, the Roumanian Uniate church, a branch of the Roman Catholic church, was practically extinguished by government decree and its property confiscated.

It cannot be expected, I am sorry to say, that the tale is ended. From the Baltic to the frontiers of Greece the ceaseless pressure to impose a total communist pattern goes forward. The middle way of life, the only way broad enough to contain in peace and tolerance all creeds and all faiths, is being steadily cast aside, and nowhere is this clearer than in the realm of religious belief. There is no quick or simple solution: the problem is too vast and too many-sided. Old in essence, it is here new in form, and it has the ruthlessness of new things.

The government will continue to use whatever means are available to support every effort to assert the principles of religious and political liberty and to restore their practice.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO CHANGE HOURS OF EVENING SITTINGS TO 7.30-10.30 DURING DEBATE ON ADDRESS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the order for motions, and as arranged yesterday by the house, by unanimous consent, I ask now that consideration be given to the proposal I made yesterday calling for evening sittings from 7.30 to 10.30 during the period of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Perhaps to keep the record clear I should point out that after I offered my amendment yesterday to the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) made what I regarded as a reasonable request, namely, that the amendment stand over until today. A few minutes later, on a question of privilege, I pointed out that it was not possible to permit the amendment to stand over without forcing the holding over of the main motion, thus preventing debate yesterday on the address. With that in mind I said this, as reported at page 720 of Hansard:

> If the house will give its undertaking that we shall consider the matter tomorrow as a substantive motion, I am willing to withdraw the amendment. We can hardly let both the motion and the amendment stand over, because that would prevent the house from going on with the address today. If the house will give that assurance, I shall be glad to let this matter stand for consideration and decision by the house on a free vote at three o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Not only was that offer made as a proper gesture, both to the leader of the opposition and to the Prime Minister, but the silence of the house at that point gave unanimous consent to the procedure suggested. Therefore I ask for consideration of that matter in the form of a substantive motion, moved by myself and seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), as follows:

> That, except on Wednesdays, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair at six o'clock p.m. until seven-thirty, and shall adjourn the house at ten-thirty p.m., without question put, until consideration of the speech from the throne is disposed of.

That wording is precisely the wording I gave yesterday, with one exception. Where the words "said speech" appeared yesterday, I have put in the words "speech from the throne".

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was my understanding yesterday that it seemed to be the desire of the house to have this matter held over until today for consideration. I said yesterday that members of the government did not wish to express any views, but that they would have no objection to this experiment being made during the period of the debate on the address, if it seemed to be the desire of the house to make such an experiment.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is my duty to call the attention of the house to the fact that normally this motion would be out of order, but I believe I have to take into consideration what happened yesterday and what has just been read by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I would call the attention of hon. members to standing order 12, paragraph 107, at page 53 of Beauchesne's Third Edition. It reads:

> In all matters of doubt, the Speaker will consider attentively the opinion of members of experience, or sometimes, instead of expressing his opinion on either side, may ask instructions from the house or reserve his decision on the point in discussion, or suggest that the house may, if it think proper, dispense with the rule in a particular case. In doubtful cases, he will be largely guided by circumstances.

I believe I should put the question to the house. Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member have leave to present his motion?

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, before this motion is dealt with I wish to make one or two comments. Unfortunately I was unable to be here yesterday to take part in the debate, if one could call it a debate. This question of hours of sittings of the house is one which has engaged the attention of hon. members on all sides of the house for some considerable time.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I should first ask if hon. members are willing to give the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre leave to present his motion. If leave is granted, the hon. member for Peel may then discuss the motion.

Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member have leave to present his motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And leave having been granted:

Mr. Graydon: As I was saying, many efforts have been made by members on all sides of the house to bring about some reform with respect to the time of house sittings. I think there is general agreement that some reform is desirable and that a decision in the matter must be made.

On June 25, 1947, I made a suggestion which I think had the support of many hon. members in all parts of the house. My suggestion was that we should sit continuously from one o'clock in the afternoon until seven o'clock at night. That suggestion was thrown out toward the end of the session so that we could deal with it and with other related problems at the next session. I think some twenty-seven different suggestions were made about changing the procedure and rules of the house.

As Your Honour knows, last year we set up a small but informal committee in an effort to iron out some of the difficulties which were bothering hon. members and which should be ironed out if there was to be unanimity as to the method of carrying on the business of the house. While some of us at that time were not in agreement with the original suggestion of seven to ten o'clock instead of eight to eleven, the view seemed to prevail that if we could not get something better, we might take that suggestion as it was.

Now the suggestion of the motion before us is seven-thirty to ten-thirty.

I am still of the opinion that this house should appoint a small committee, not to deal with all the ramifications of rules and house procedure, because again the discussions would go on until the end of the session, but to deal only with this question of house sittings. I hope that that will meet with the approval of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It should not take more than a day or two. Let us do this in the proper way. The committee could then come back to the House of Commons with something which would meet with general approval.

Certainly the present hours are too long. Hon. members cannot be expected to sit here year in and year out until eleven o'clock at night, when they start their work at nine in the morning. I think we would be regarded by the public as a sensible assembly if we changed the hours so that they would be more humane and tolerable to the average member. The committee could be set up at once, and perhaps before the end of this week we could arrive at some decision. It may be a decision for seven-thirty to ten-thirty, but I am not so sure that those hours meet with general approval. I suggest the immediate appointment of such a committee.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word in this connection. Certain rules and regulations are now in effect, and there is a recommendation by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) that they be amended. We had the leader of his party (Mr. Drew) speaking for two hours and five minutes on two occasions when there is a forty minute limit on speeches. We who come from the far west and the maritimes are entitled to some consideration. If we are to amend the rules, then with all due deference I suggest that all the rules should be enforced, and that a member should not be allowed two hours and five minutes to apologize for blocking dominion-provincial agreement.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to move an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Knowles: It is now an amendment to the motion.

Mr. Lockhart: Why all this quibbling over half an hour?

Mr. Ferguson: You are squandering the public's money.

Mr. Cruickshank: I move, in amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), that the house sit from ten o'clock to one o'clock, and from three o'clock to six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but I must say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley that I cannot accept his amendment. If the hon. member will read the rules of the house he will realize that an amendment must be worded so as to delete or add certain words at the end of the main motion. Unfortunately the amendment of the hon. gentleman does not do that.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker, before we vote on the motion, I wonder if the government has anything to say on the question of setting up a committee to study this matter.

Mr. St. Laurent: The government has no objection to a committee of members being constituted to investigate and recommend what they think might better suit the convenience of hon. members. If the whips choose to discuss it and wish to have a motion brought forward, I shall be glad to consider it and put it before the house.

Mr. Knowles: That could be done while this experiment is being made.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): It is obvious that there are various ideas as to what should be done about the hours of sitting of the house. I believe a suggestion was made last session by our own group that the house sit from two until six in the afternoon, and from eight until ten in the evening. That would not reduce the number of hours of sitting, and we could get through the same amount of work as we do now. We are not pressing that at this time, I am merely citing it to illustrate what I said to begin with, that various suggestions have been made, and it seems to me they ought to be considered by a committee. I hope that the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will support the idea of having a small committee of the house set up to bring in a recommendation which would resolve the various suggestions into one that will be acceptable to the members of the house.

Mr. John T. Hackett (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I find that everybody is consulting his own convenience. While I am always ready to meet the convenience of others, it may be well for each of us to consider the propriety of engaging the House of Commons in a trial of this kind. The lives of most of us are fixed. We have habits, we have engagements, and we have appointments. To undo them for the purpose of ascertaining what effect it will have upon our digestive organs to rush through a meal, which is generally late, for the next ten days, seems to me, with great respect, out of keeping with the dignity of the house, and with the practice of this deliberative assembly. If it is thought desirable to amend the rules, let us name a committee for that purpose, and let us amend them in an orderly and accepted way.

It seems to me we are asked to adopt a method of reaching a conclusion which is devoid of the precision and finality that should be characteristic of decisions of a body of this kind. I suggest that we do not depart from parliamentary practice. For a long time members have felt that the hours of sitting are long, but the sessions are long, too. I, for one, certainly do not wish to vote for a prolongation of the session. If curtailment of the hours brings about prolongation of the session, I do not think many members will support such a suggestion. We are asked to make an experiment to determine whether or not we should meet in the evening at half past seven instead of eight. Most of us work in our rooms until the dinner hour, seven o'clock; then we dine and come back here at eight. I am totally against a change in the order of our lives for two or three weeks. I believe that if a change is to be made it should be made after discussion, and after the pleasure of the majority has been ascertained by a committee.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Cruickshank: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Once the question has been put, no member may rise. Those who are in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are against the motion will please say nay.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest a standing vote?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Those who are in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are against the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members will realize that it is the duty of the Speaker to call for the yeas and nays, and I gave as my opinion that the yeas had it. If hon. members want a recorded vote, they know the procedure that must be followed; they must rise.

And some hon. members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Knowles) which was agreed to on the following division:

MAIL CONTRACTS

AMENDMENT TO MAKE SUPPLEMENTAL PAYMENTS APPLICABLE TO RENEWAL CONTRACTS

Hon. Ernest Bertrand (Postmaster General) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Mail Contracts Supplemental Payments Act to make supplemental payments authorized under the said act applicable to renewal contracts.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

CONSTRUCTION THROUGH CERTAIN AGENCIES IN 1948

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Timmins (Parkdale): On the first day of the session, January 26, I gave notice of a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply; it appears on page iii of the Votes and Proceedings of January 26. On February 9 the question was passed as an order for return. I have never seen the return, and I ask the minister when I may have an answer to my question of January 26.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I shall be glad to look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR DOMINION-PROVINCIAL-MUNICIPAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to a statement made by the premier of British Columbia in the legislature on February 11, to the effect that the housing situation was causing him deep concern, and that he was prepared to attend a dominion-provincial-municipal conference to discuss low-rental housing projects? Will the government call such a conference, and have any steps been already taken to that end?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I have not seen the particular statement to which he refers, but I did have discussions in a general way with the premier of British Columbia when he was down here recently, and since his return I have had correspondence from him on the subject of housing.

With respect to the matter of a conference, the government is of the opinion that at the present time more progress can be made by discussing with each province or municipality its own particular problems on their merits; and as the Prime Minister said in Toronto on Saturday, the government stands ready at all times to discuss this problem with any provincial government in an effort to work out satisfactory long-term arrangements among the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion.

PROJECT IN ALBERTA—FORECLOSURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, which was asked on Friday last in his absence. In view of the foreclosure proceedings by the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company of Calgary, Alberta, against home owners who have houses under construction by the Bow River Construction Company, will the government see to it that these veterans, and some civilians, will not lose their financial equity in their property as a result of these foreclosures?

Mr. Howe: Order paper.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I understood this question was to have been placed on the order paper. I have been looking for it to appear there.

SHAUGHNESSY HOSPITAL

PAY OF WARD MAIDS AND KITCHEN HELPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. C. I. Merritt (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Why were not ward maids and kitchen helpers in Shaughnessy hospital granted the benefit of the recent civil service pay increase?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The hon. member kindly gave me notice of this question. I would say that the employees of whom he speaks are paid on the prevailing rate basis. In other words, the wages bear a direct relationship to the rate existing for that type of employee elsewhere in the particular city affected. The matter of prevailing rates, not only in Vancouver but elsewhere, throughout our institutions, is frequently under review as such rates change in the employment field. In the particular instance of Vancouver, these rates are at present under review.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INSTALLATION OF SLIDE DECTECTOR FENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say what progress has been made in the installation of slide detector fences and other safety devices on the Canadian National railway lines in British Columbia, and what are the plans for future installations?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The Canadian National Railways are installing at the present time block signals west of Kamloops, in conjunction with which they are to install three different types of slide detector fences for test purposes.

Last November the director of engineering of the board of transport commissioners made an inspection trip from Kamloops west, accompanied by members of the railway brotherhoods, and discussed other locations for the installation of slide detector fences, which will be given consideration as soon as the necessary block signals are installed and the efficiency of the slide detector fences is studied. The block signals are necessary as a first installation for the operation of slide detector fences.

I might add that, since the inspection trip referred to, I have received letters from several of the brotherhoods expressing satisfaction and appreciation at being included in the inspection party.

SUCCESSION DUTIES

INQUIRY AS TO OPENING OF OFFICE AT BARRIE, ONTARIO

On the orders of the day.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister indicate whether his department contemplates the opening of a succession duty office at Barrie, Ontario?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): We have no intention at the present time of opening any such office.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FRUIT

PLIGHT OF BERRY GROWERS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA —QUESTION AS TO POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has his attention been called to the plight of the berry growers in the Fraser valley and in the whole of British Columbia? If so, will an announcement be made of the action to be taken?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Last spring we guaranteed the cost of the barrels and packing baskets which are used in British Columbia for the packing of SO_2 berries, which is a particular variety of berry used for making jam. These berries were packed and placed in barrels. We have been attempting to find a market for them. We have found a market for part of them in Ireland. We hope to find a market for still more of them, and until we have completed our efforts in connection with the marketing of them we have nothing further to announce in the way of policy.

QUESTION RESPECTING SMALL FRUIT CROPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. Is it the policy of the government to encourage the tearing up of small fruit and other productive crops in Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government in relation to these matters is to give the fullest possible information to those who are engaged in them. Then we think we can leave it to their own good judgment to decide whether they will continue to produce one product or another. That is the general policy, and I think it applies to all products.

MICHEL LUCIEN SEIGNEUR

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENCE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. Is Michel Lucien Seigneur in Canada, and if so, where?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): My officials inform me that the man in question is in Canada, in the city of Montreal, where he has been for some two or three years. I might say further that information about this man has come to us very recently, and we are making further investigations.

[Mr. McCann.]

POTATOES

QUESTION AS TO DESTRUCTION OF PART OF 1948 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is it the intention of the government to destroy any part of the 1948 potato crop? Will the minister state government policy in regard to this commodity?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member for Assiniboia was kind enough to send me a copy of these two questions. The answer to the first question is no. The answer to the second question is as follows: The objective of the plan in effect is to encourage the sale at a reasonable price of the graded product which usually goes to market, without encouraging an effort to market what has usually been fed to livestock.

TEXTILES

INQUIRY AS TO REIMPOSITION OF TARIFFS ON IMPORTS FROM BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I apologize for not having given him notice. Have the Canadian authorities notified or intimated to the British government or the British textile officials that the tariff on British cotton or rayon goods will be reimposed in the near future?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): No.

TORONTO

REQUEST FOR STEAM SUBURBAN SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, who addressed the young men's board of trade in Toronto last week. As a member of the government will he use his good offices to try to secure for us in the Toronto district a steam suburban service?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I shall be glad to take the question as notice.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF GENERAL ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): In view of the statement reported in the press as to the announcement of the Minister of Fisheries that there is likely to be an election this fall, can the Prime Minister or any other member of the government tell us if it could not be held in June?

An hon. Member: Order paper.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

PINE FALLS, MAN.—INQUIRY AS TO CALLING FOR TENDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Will the Minister of Public Works indicate when tenders will be called for a public building at Pine Falls?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I cannot say offhand. I shall have to look up the record, and then I will inform the hon. member.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLANNING

GREBER REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister arising out of a motion for the production of certain papers connected with the national capital planning scheme. The Prime Minister said he would communicate with the chairman of the committee and would let the house know at an early day the attitude of the chairman as to the production not only of the plan of Mr. Greber but also of the recommendations of the committee.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): As promised, I did communicate with the chairman of the federal district commission. It will be their recommendation that the preliminary report of Mr. Greber be made public. I have seen, in galley form, some part of the printing, and I believe it will be a document of substantial size.

I was informed by the chairman that in spite of the recommendation that its production be expedited as much as possible, it might take five or six weeks to have it ready for tabling in the two languages. It is still being considered by the national capital planning committee, and will go from there to the federal district commission, which is to hold a meeting about the middle of March. After it is considered by the federal district commission it will be forwarded to the government. I have asked that every endeavour be made to make the delay as brief as possible.

TELEVISION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. Lockhart (Lincoln): In leading periodicals in the United States cuts are being shown of the hooking up of several hundred television stations. Will the appropriate minister be making a statement soon as to what Canada is doing in this regard?

Mr. Rowe: A royal commission.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The matter of television is being given consideration. In the near future the government will make an announcement of policy in that regard.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR EXEMPTION OF DIABETIC MEDICATIONS AND SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Will he consider exempting from income tax the cost to diabetics of insulin, needles and other supplies necessary for their treatment?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I shall give consideration to that question—along with several hundred others I have received in recent weeks.

GREECE

REQUEST FOR AID FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister, which is prompted by the statement he made this afternoon about religious persecution behind the iron curtain, and also by the grave plight of the brave people of Greece, whom some of us saw there recently. Is the government giving consideration to the sending of material aid in the form of food, bedding, lumber and clothing to Greece, to help those people who are having such a difficult time in the face of communist invasion today?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, there is no project before the government at the present time for the relief of the people of Greece. There has been no request in that respect. These matters usually go through the agency of the United Nations.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Julian H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I should like to ask a supplementary question respecting aid to Greece—

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I think you should recommend some form of amplifiers to be used by those who speak in the house, or else have hon. members who cannot hear go to a doctor and have their ears looked after.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it is possible for Canada to make a gift to Greece in recognition of the services rendered by that country to us and to the world in general. Must we rely on the recommendation of the United Nations?

Mr. Cruickshank: Let us send some margarine.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, February 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, to continue my saga of the Canadian portion of the Columbia river basin, may I point out that international problems respecting waters used within the Columbia river basin are subject to the provisions of two treaties signed between the governments of the United States, and of Great Britain on behalf of Canada. These are dated 1846 and 1909. The treaty of Washington of 1846 established the international boundary between Canada and the United States west of the Rocky mountains. Article II contains a provision with respect to navigation of the main stream of the Columbia river below the boundary of British Columbia.

I had intended to deal with certain aspects of article II of the Washington treaty, but as my time is limited I shall have to leave that for another occasion. Article IX of the boundary waters treaty of 1909 provides for the founding of the international joint commission, to be composed of Canadian and American representatives. That treaty was signed, and the commission came into being under the sponsorship of the late Theodore Roosevelt, who was then President of the United States, and under the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was then Prime Minister of Canada.

I believe most hon. members recognize the fact that the international joint commission is a venture that has borne good fruit, and has stood as a lesson to the world in common sense and good will between nations. The international joint commission established its procedure on February 2, 1912. As a result of that it is now composed of three Canadians and three Americans, with a chairman acting for each section. The respective chairmen take the chair when the commission sits in the United States or in Canada.

The Canadian members at the present time are the Hon. Allison Glen and the Hon. George Spence. There is at present one vacancy. The commission has conducted many investigations and I have read with great interest many of its findings. I attended several of its hearings and am much impressed with the work it has done.

In 1941 the United States authorities applied for approval of certain levels of water that were going to be occasioned by the building of the Grand Coulee dam. That was after the dam was built, and I intend to have something more to say about that on a later occasion. The government of the United States and the government of Canada in 1944 agreed upon a reference to the commission with regard to the Columbia river. The Prime Minister of this country tabled that reference in this house on March 9, 1944. I should like to quote the first paragraph of the reference because it deals in brief with the instructions to the commission with respect to the Columbia basin investigation. That paragraph reads:

> In order to determine whether a greater use than is now being made of the waters of the Columbia river system would be feasible and advantageous, the governments of the United States and Canada have agreed to refer the matter to the international joint commission for investigation and report pursuant to article IX of the convention concerning boundary waters between the United States and Canada, signed January 11, 1909.

Later the same day the Prime Minister made a statement concerning this reference to the commission, which was a most important reference in so far as the people of the southeastern interior of British Columbia are concerned. The Prime Minister said:

> The report of the international joint commission will not be binding on the governments concerned, but it is likely that the investigations of the commission will result in suggestions and recommendations which will be carried into effect by joint action of the two governments.

Pursuant to that reference the international Columbia river engineering board was appointed, composed of four members, two of whom represent Canada. The Canadian members are V. Meek, controller dominion water and power bureau, and F. G. Goodspeed, assistant chief engineer, public works of Canada. In addition to this board, the Columbia river engineering and the Okanagan engineering committees were appointed, the Canadian members being C. E. Webb, chief engineer, dominion water power bureau, Vancouver, and M. K. Morton, district engineer of public works, Vancouver.

Immediately after the reference was tabled a full scale investigation was ordered and is now proceeding. This includes aerial photography, geodetic surveys, topographical mapping, bathymetric surveys, reconnaissance surveys, geological and damsite investigations, hydrological studies, climatology, soil surveys, survey of forest resources, mineral resources, fisheries problems and recreational resources.

I understand that the estimated cost of this survey to Canada will be approximately $700,000. The entire investigation will disclose the water power resources which in that part of the country are not now being utilized because of a lack of effective control and agreement. After the investigation is completed it is hoped that public hearings will be held at various points throughout the area particularly concerned, so that the points of view of the people and of all interests can be heard. I may say for your information that public hearings were held in various parts of Canada prior to the actual commencement of the technical investigation in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway. Recently I read in both the United States and Canadian press of proposals which had been made in the United States with regard to the building of a crib dam on the Arrow lakes for the storage of water. We all know that these are only suggestions or proposals but many people in my constituency and in the adjoining constituency are confused because they think that something is going to develop immediately as a result of these suggestions. We all know that nothing will be done until the joint international commission has reported, and that anything done then will be the result of joint action between the United States and Canada. I have here a copy of the Congressional Record which contains a resolution presented to congress on January 24 by Senator Mitchell. In view of the fact that my time is running out I should like to place this resolution on Hansard for the information of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreeable to the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Herridge: It is from the Columbia basin commission on the United States side of the line and reads:

> Resolved by the Columbia basin commission that it hereby requests the international joint commission to direct its international board of engineers to give priority to studies and report on the storage of water in Arrow lakes, British Columbia, so that the commission may decide the amount of storage it will approve there, and if such report be favourable, that the Bonneville power administration and the United States, and the proper governmental agency of British Columbia and Canada, then proceed to negotiate for an agreement or agreements for building a storage dam at the outlet of Arrow lakes to impound 5,000,000 to 7,000,000 acre-feet of water, whereby British Columbia will receive an estimated annual revenue of $2,500,000 to $3,500,000 and the power plants at Grand Coulee dam and Bonneville will be enabled to produce an additional 500,000 to 700,000 kilowatts of prime power during the winter months, so that said dam may be built at as early a date as feasible, possibly by the winter of 1951-1952; and be it further resolved, that the commission urge the state legislature, the members of congress from Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and Montana, the governors of said states, and the president of the United States, to join in the above request to the American members of the international joint commission and the premier of British Columbia and the Prime Minister of Canada to join in the above request to the Canadian members of the international joint commission in the hope that the threatened electrical catastrophe to the Pacific northwest during the next five years may be averted, and that, instead, both the United States and Canada may have increased development and prosperity and a stronger national defence.

This resolution indicates the interest taken by Americans in proposed developments in Canada.

I have three or four suggestions to make before concluding what I have to say today. My first suggestion is in connection with the vacancy that exists on the international joint commission. In view of the fact that some of the major decisions of that commission will concern the province of British Columbia and particularly the Columbia river basin within that province, I suggest that the present vacancy be filled by the appointment of some one resident in British Columbia who is conversant with the opportunities that are presented in the development of this basin.

My second suggestion is that consideration should be given by this government to the development of the water resources in the basin under public ownership in co-operation with the government of British Columbia. I am recommending the establishment of a Canadian Columbia river basin authority, and in support of that proposal I should like to quote from the minutes of a committee of congress which sat in 1933-34 to consider this question and which reported with respect to the United States portion of the Columbia river basin as follows:

> We believe in private enterprise—in the expectancy of rewards for honest endeavour, labour, initiative and daring—in the things that have made America great. But some things are too big for private enterprise, and the Columbia river is one of these.

I trust that this suggestion will receive serious consideration. A most favourable situation exists with regard to the public development of the main stem of the Columbia because there is little private interest investment to consider in connection with the development of the potential 2,900,000 horsepower.

Up to date all the proposals in connection with the development of water storage and power have come from the United States side of the line; nothing has happened so far as our government is concerned. The United States are leading us in this direction. I have in my hand the Christian Science Monitor for January 24, 1949, which contains this headline:

Truman Orders Columbia Valley Authority Plans

That is in connection with the United States side of the line. Farmer organizations such as the Grange, trade unions and co-operative societies are all backing the establishment of a Columbia river authority, but on this side our government remains dormant. I should like to quote again from the Christian Science Monitor of February 14 which contains the following report:

It would be extremely dogmatic to assert that a river could not be developed except by a valley authority modeled after TVA. But it is irrefutable that, despite the long years of effort by our other resource development and construction agencies, and the millions of dollars of expenditures, the Tennessee is the only river that has been completely harnessed and controlled in the interests of the people.

I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that members of all parties in the house would support public ownership and public development of power in an area such as this, if they appreciated the success of T.V.A.

My third suggestion is that, after this investigation is completed, the question of the development of the Columbia river basin should be referred to the standing committee on mines, forests and waters to study and report on the use of power resources in the basin. A similar committee was established by congress to study and report to congress on the great possibilities in the United States portion of the Columbia river basin. The people of the Columbia river basin, which includes East Kootenay, West Kootenay, Yale, and a portion of the riding represented by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), are greatly concerned in the development of the basin. They are anxious to see the establishment of the pulp and paper industry. They are concerned about secondary industries; they are concerned about the development of power for irrigation in the Okanagan district.

As a result of the interest of the people of these areas, and their understanding of the importance of the question, I have received a large number of letters suggesting that it is time for the people to hold a conference which will include representatives of all types of organizations. I suggest that farm organizations, co-operative organizations, trade unions, boards of trade, women's institutes, rod and gun clubs, municipal councils, irrigation associations, and tourist camp operators should hold a conference in the near future in order to co-ordinate their ideas, and in order to be in a position to present them effectively to the commission and to the government. I suggest that it would be wise for the co-operative organizations of the area to take the lead because they represent the larger number of people. The people do not want the policies for the development of this area determined by directors of companies who reside in Montreal and New York. They want them determined by the co-operation of the federal government, the provincial government, and the people of the area. In any development financiers and industrialists, naturally enough, must first consider profits; engineers must consider kilowatts, technical details, location and structures. It is the primary duty of the members of this house to be concerned about the welfare of the people as a whole, and to see that these developments are carried on for their greater benefit, and to their advantage.

My fourth suggestion, Mr. Speaker, is that the Columbia river basin is rich in history and rich in possibilities for the taking of an excellent documentary film by the national film board. I believe if democracy is to function satisfactorily people must be involved in the administration of their own affairs. I believe further that governments of all kinds should do more to inform the people about the development of the country. Dry official reports and scanty newspaper articles are not sufficient. In my opinion all educational authorities should co-operate to present the facts concerning Canada in such a form as to stimulate interest, understanding, and pride in national, provincial, regional and local developments. I think that the national film board could make a great contribution towards arousing the interest of the youth of our country by undertaking a documentary film covering the development of the Columbia river basin. I offer that as a positive suggestion towards offsetting the forces of fascism and communism about which many people in Canada are concerned at this time, because I do not believe those forces can be overcome by verbal blasts or merely talking about them. I believe they are going to be overcome by interesting the people, and particularly the young people of the country, in the co-operative development of the resources of the nation by federal, provincial and municipal governments.

I have endeavoured in the time available to present to the house some information concerning the Canadian portion of the Columbia river basin, and I have endeavoured to advance certain suggestions. I trust that many members of the house, and the government, will give serious consideration to my proposals. In my opinion a solution cannot be found to our problems by merely emphasizing our rights, but I do believe that we can achieve great things in the development of this basin if all the interests concerned, federal, provincial, municipal, corporate, co-operative, and private, are willing to accept their full share of responsibility. What an opportunity the development of the Columbia river basin, almost unknown to the majority of the Canadian people, offers for the democratic meshing of all these interests.

The residents of the Columbia river basin do not intend to be silent spectators in the coming drama of development but understanding and active members of the cast playing their parts with purpose, and in harmony, to the benefit of all, and to the benefit of Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it will be four weeks tomorrow since the house opened, and it is almost four weeks since the address in reply to the speech from the throne was moved. I want to take your minds back to that time, and express my appreciation of the addresses made by the mover and seconder on that occasion, and also express appreciation of the very effective manner in which the new leaders who have taken their places in the house presented their opinions on that occasion.

The discussion which is before us at the present moment is based upon the amendment to the amendment which was moved by the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell). I wish to read that amendment in order to bring its context back to the memory of the members of the house. On page 95 of Hansard I find the following:

> Therefore, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) I move: "That the following words be inserted in the amendment between the word 'address' and the word 'we': We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provisions for the orderly marketing of our natural products, and for their exchange for goods needed in Canada, and for the elimination of speculation in foodstuffs.
> We regret further that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for national health insurance."

I do not intend to say anything this afternoon about the latter part of the amendment to the amendment, but I take for granted that the first part of the amendment to the amendment has to do with policies associated with the marketing of natural products, and in particular the products of the farm. For that reason it is my intention to deal with the subject for some little time in the hope that I can remove some of the misunderstandings that we appear to have with regard to our present position in relation to trade.

Six years of war have intervened between now and the time when a very important action took place which has come back into effect since the war, and which many of us appear to have forgotten. The trade of Great Britain during the century preceding the present one was built up under a policy of free trade. I do not think I am stating something which is not fully understood on all sides of the house when I say that policy was advocated by what came to be known as the leaders of liberalism in those islands. The policy of free trade was continued until 1932, and there are some reasons why it was changed at that time.

Before going on to speak of those changes, it is a matter of record that although Liberal leaders in Great Britain first advocated policies of free trade, those policies later were taken up by the leaders of the opposition party, known as the union party, and advocated as persistently and consistently by that party as by the Liberal party. But in the early twenties a group came into being in Britain who did not believe in those policies. As a result of the experiences Britain and other countries had undergone during the war through which the nations of the world had just passed, they thought a great deal more could be accomplished by controls, by agreements and by quotas than through free trade. They were able to press their arguments with such force that two elections were contested in Britain within a period of about eighteen months. One was held in late 1929 or early 1930 and the other in 1931, and after the second election the representation was such that it became necessary to form a coalition government composed of Conservatives, Labour members and Liberals. The Liberals who entered that government undertook in due course to forget the policies they had advocated for a hundred years, and agreed that for the time being some other action was required in order to build up the trade of Great Britain and balance her position as compared with that of other nations.

They did not take that action without considerable pressure, much of which came from Canada and Australia. As a matter of fact I believe four of the great dominions of the British commonwealth undertook to see to it that the policies of Great Britain were entirely changed so that we should have a very wide preference in the British market. Those who were pressing for this change made one or two appearances in Britain during the period I have mentioned, when those two elections were held; and after returning from the first visit the then Prime Minister of Canada, the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, impressed on this house the thought that there were no longer any free markets in the world. He went so far as to say that it was very difficult to find markets at all, and that it was becoming more and more difficult to trade even with one another and maintain our prosperity. As a matter of fact he said that "where there were markets thirty years before there were no markets now and that where there were markets even ten years before there were no markets now."

Not only was that said by the leader of the government of that day; it was taken up also by the then leader of the C.C.F. party, Mr. Woodsworth, who agreed with Mr. Bennett. In fact Mr. Woodsworth thought Mr. Bennett had not gone far enough, and said there were no markets to be found anywhere. Well, certain policies were built upon those ideas which prevailed not only in this country but also to some extent across the seas, and I have here the legislation passed by this house on that occasion, which by the way is still in existence. Before reading from it, however, I want to read just one sentence from an article which was prepared by Mr. Bennett, dated December 2, 1930, replying to a statement made by Mr. Thomas in Great Britain, who said the policy being advocated by Canada and Australia and some other countries was humbug. Replying to that statement Mr. Bennett said:

> I have declared on several occasions my willingness to favourably consider a quota system as a competitive method to that of tariffs for securing a preferred position for empire wheat in the United Kingdom.

Then in 1932 this house adopted legislation known as:

> An Act respecting a certain trade agreement between His Majesty's government in Canada and His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom.

Article 1 in the schedule to that act reads:

> His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom undertake that orders shall be made in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of the Import Duties Act, 1932, which will ensure the continuance after the 15th November, 1932, of entry free of duty into the United Kingdom of goods consigned from any part of the British empire and grown, produced or manufactured in Canada which by virtue of that act are now free of duty subject, however, to the reservations set forth in schedule A appended hereto.

Schedule A provides:

> As regards eggs, poultry, butter, cheese and other milk products, free entry for Canadian produce will be continued for three years certain. His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, however, reserve to themselves the right, after the expiration of three years, if they consider it necessary in the interests of the United Kingdom producer to do so, to review the basis of preference so far as relates to the articles above enumerated and, after notifying His Majesty's government in Canada either to impose a preferential duty on Canadian produce whilst maintaining preferential margins, or—

This is the important part.

> —in consultation with the Canadian government to bring such produce within any system which may be put into operation for the quantitative regulation of supplies from all sources in the United Kingdom market.

In that regard I want to call attention to the fact that in the first place the government of Canada insisted on having the free market in Great Britain for food products and some other items brought to an end, and then insisted on certain preferences for our own products in that market. In return for obtaining consideration in that market they agreed that it was quite right and proper for the British government to quota the imports coming to that market from any country in the world, including the countries of the commonwealth.

Let us examine for a moment what that meant. My first experience with that provision was in 1936. When I came to Ottawa as Minister of Agriculture I thought my main task in a federal government would be to promote the marketing of farm products, at the same time promoting their production in order that we might take advantage of the greatest possible share of the markets of the world that were available to us at that time.

I went to Britain in 1936 as part of the delegation that was going to deal with the provisions in that act. At the time when the British government was empowered by the act of 1932 to substitute quotas for tariffs as suggested by the late Mr. Bennett in 1930 and to apply them to the different countries which supplied their food, they took as the basis the quantity which we had sent into that market in 1935. They said that what Poland sent in 1935 should be the basis of consideration for that country; that what Denmark had sent in 1935 should be the basis of consideration in so far as that country was concerned; and that what Canada had sent in 1935 should likewise be the basis upon which our quantities were to be established.

If the operation had taken place exactly as planned, it would have resulted in our taking certain quantities in connection with bacon. The quantity which was discussed at great length was 160 million pounds, that being the quantity they understood we could produce because of what we produced in the preceding year. Then they said, "Why, you only sent over between six and seven thousand head of cattle in the preceding year." When we spoke of a number approximating 60,000 head, we were unable to get them to write that figure into the quota.

The same condition existed in connection with our cheese. The quantity of cheese we had been sending over was very much less than we had sent over around the beginning of the century. We had hopes of increasing our cheese production. When we went to Britain to set down the quota in connection with cheese, we were unable to obtain quantities greater than those I have been mentioning to the house. This took place in 1936. Finally, we did succeed in having the British government give us an undertaking they would not check us further until we reached 280 million pounds of bacon; that they would not check us further until we got up to approximately 60,000 head of cattle, nor would they check us further with regard to our cheese production until we had reached 60 million pounds. The British government insisted, however, upon a very definite understanding that this food would be forthcoming. It was said that since they had given away opportunities of obtaining their food in a free market at the cheapest possible price, and since Britain had only 7 per cent of her population engaged in farming, the British government must be in the position of being assured of the quantities of food that would be forthcoming from the different countries of the world. We, being a federation, were unable to give that assurance.

As a new country, we offered this argument: We said that was all very well for some of the old world countries whose farm lands were fully occupied and who were producing to the limit. We said a new country such as Canada must have an opportunity of expanding, that tying us down to quotas of that sort would not give us that opportunity. In the years between that year and the war, we were successful in increasing our production considerably and thus placing much greater quantities of meat and dairy products upon the British market than in 1935. We had almost reached a point in that connection when further checks might have been made had war not broken out, but war came.

When the war came we transferred over from a policy of quotas established by agreement from year to year between governments to a policy of entering into a bilateral agreement to deliver to Britain certain quantities of food. I submit to this house, Mr. Speaker, there is not very much difference in principle between the two. There is not very much difference between being required to go to London every year and work out the amount of our quota, and sitting down from year to year and making a bilateral agreement such as we made during the war years.

I cite these facts, Mr. Speaker, in order to place in the minds of the members of this house the fact that some people who are very critical today of quotas, and very critical of bilateral contracts, were responsible for the creation of the conditions under which we have been working from 1932 to the present. In 1940, the first year of the war, this question came up when we were in Britain. I was there representing the agricultural people of this country and insisting that we had already produced over 300 million pounds of bacon in surplus in one year. I felt we could deliver to Britain over 400 million pounds of bacon in a year. I was told by the British government we had to accept one of two things: Either we could sell Britain 380 million pounds of bacon at the same price as we obtained the year before or we could sell that country 445 million pounds of bacon for the same amount of money; in other words, at a lower price per unit. In order to keep our product in the market we sold it at the lower price which required a reduction in the price of bacon going to Britain, as I remember it, of approximately 11 shillings as compared with the price obtained the preceding year.

There is another fact I think we ought to remember at this time in connection with this matter. While our price was lower for the second year, our price for the preceding year had been higher than the United States price for hogs by from three to five cents a pound. I, as well as others, considered the British were quite justified in coming back the second year and requesting the product from Canada at a lower price in view of the fact that the cost of feed had gone down very materially because we had no market for our grain at that time. This lack of markets for grain was caused by the war.

To come back to the point I was making, the question came up as to whether we would prefer a better price for our bacon than was being offered or whether we would prefer to have a long-time agreement which would carry on for some years after the war. I suggested that, if anyone was prepared to discuss that question with us, we were prepared to discuss it. The discussion stopped right there. The next day we were told that the 1932 agreements and the quotas arranged in 1936-37—those quotas applied to the European countries and the commonwealth countries—would come back into force after the war. We would have to be prepared and the other countries would have to be prepared to meet a situation which would be created by the fact we had changed our policies in relation to trade, not only throughout the empire but throughout the world, by means of what took place between 1932 and 1936-37. It was clearly indicated we should be prepared, therefore, when the war was over, to meet a situation which had been created by the agreements made in former years.

Someone may say, but you have had a Liberal government since 1935 and you have not done away with that legislation. The question is obvious and the answer is just as obvious. There is not a free market in Britain as there was prior to 1932. There is not any free market because a protective market was forced upon the people of that country to a degree, or they were argued into it by their own leaders both in the economic field and in politics. Those new leaders convinced them of the effectiveness of new theories. Since that time, as every hon. member knows, the old Liberal idea of basing your prosperity upon trade has not held the same place in Great Britain or anywhere else that it held prior to the making of the 1932 agreements. If there have been any difficulties which have arisen as a result of the change, these difficulties no doubt have been brought about by the fact that there has been a change from free trade to preferences. The benefits of free trade cannot be re-established except by the British.

May I point out just for a moment what that means to us now? When we met to discuss the possible marketing of farm products in Great Britain from the time the turn came in the war in 1943 and 1944 down to the end, on every occasion, no matter what government was in power in Britain, the fact that was emphasized was that we were getting back nearer and nearer to the position where it would be necessary for us to come under these old arrangements which had been made previously, and therefore we had better start to govern ourselves accordingly. We did govern ourselves accordingly. We took 10,000,000 acres of land out of wheat production in this country in the early part of the war. We put that land into the production of livestock and livestock products. In the last two years of the war, and in the year immediately following the war, we put the greater part of those 10,000,000 acres back into wheat and we took the grain for human consumption rather than for the production of livestock. Therefore, we have changed over twice since the beginning of the war; first from the production of wheat into the production of livestock, and then back from the production of livestock into the production of wheat.

There are one or two questions which have been discussed in this debate, one by the new member from Nova Scotia. He comes from a constituency which is more concerned about it than any other constituency in Canada with one possible exception. I refer to the question having to do with apples. Let me take you back to the discussions which took place while this legislation was going through the house. What was the statement that was made at that time? The statement was that if you had the 10 per cent preference in the British market for Canadian apples over all other apples you would get $1 a barrel more for your apples in Nova Scotia. On that occasion the leader of the house rose in his place and pointed his finger at our grand old friend who is now in the other place—Admiral Duff. He said to him, "Are you going to vote against a piece of legislation which promises your people down in Nova Scotia $1 a barrel more for their apples and more for their fish?" I do not know what our friend said under his breath, but what he said in the house as printed in Hansard was, "It won't mean a cent to us." And when we look back at it now we wonder who was right, the man who said that by following a policy of that kind you would get $1 a barrel more for your apples or the man who said that you would not get a cent as a result of that policy. In other words, knowing him as I do know him, I would conclude that the admiral thought much farther ahead than that, and agreed that we would lose a great deal by it. Well, what did happen?

Mr. Fulton: The war came.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend says, "The war came." Well, a lot of things happened before the war came. As a matter of fact what happened over in Britain was that because of the higher price which they could obtain for apples by having the 10 per cent duty on them they planted more trees than there are in British Columbia and Nova Scotia put together. When you go to Britain now you can get apples off these trees. These trees started to produce in the middle of the war, and they are producing now. When I was over there the last time I do not recall sitting down to a single table where I could not get applesauce.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: Not a spoonful of that, Mr. Speaker, came from the Annapolis valley or the Okanagan valley.

Mr. Ferguson: It came from European countries.

Mr. Gardiner: The greater part of it came from trees which were planted in Britain itself, and these apples are grown there because of the line of policy which was followed back in the years of which I speak.

I wanted to say that much with regard to the policy itself in order to suggest to my hon. friends that it is not just as simple a thing as some people think. When we start to talk not only to European countries but to Britain about the benefits of trade they point out to us very readily that the old plans which they had followed for many years have been done away with as a result of some things which more or less had been forced upon them in the thirties, and which have continued ever since in spite of anything this government could do.

In reading the speech which was delivered the other day by the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) in support of his amendment, I was surprised to find this in it, as reported at page 93 of Hansard:

> Before the war Canada was in a happy position. We were able to sell commodities in the British market and elsewhere and to receive payment in funds that we could use in order to purchase goods in the United States or anywhere else. As we all know, the liquidation of British overseas investments during the war, and the impoverishment of other one-time customers of our country, have made it impossible for us to continue trading on this basis . . .

I have sat in this house now, Mr. Speaker, along with the leader of the C.C.F. party, for fourteen sessions, I think, and I have not listened to him in a single session without hearing him telling us about the terrible conditions we had in Canada in the thirties just before the war, and appealing to the people of this country to support the C.C.F. party and socialism in order to avoid getting back into the condition that we had in the thirties. In this speech he told us what fine conditions we had prior to the war, what a very favourable position we had. My hon. friends shake their heads. Apparently they do not fully understand the English language, and I shall read it to them again. Here is what he said:

> Before the war Canada was in a happy position. We were able to sell commodities in the British market and elsewhere and to receive payment in funds that we could use in order to purchase goods in the United States or anywhere else.

Mr. Thatcher: He was speaking about exchange.

Mr. Gardiner: We were able to get funds for the few commodities that we could sell, but we were able to sell only a fraction of what we were able to produce in surplus at that time; therefore we were all suffering because of the conditions then existing. It was not because of exchange. When you have an exchange that is favourable you can sell, somewhere in the world at some favourable price, all the commodities that you can produce; but when you cannot sell the commodities that you produce at a price which will make production possible, or the cost of production possible, then you have not favourable exchange conditions, no matter what you might think about it.

This matter of exchange is sometimes taken a little too seriously. Dollars are only a medium of exchange, and should only be utilized as a medium of exchange. When they are utilized as a medium of exchange, and your conditions are as good as they were described here, then you can sell all the commodities that you produce for the commodities you desire to get from other countries.

I wanted to say that in order to call attention to the fact that conditions back before the war were not good. We did not have the kind of markets which we had hoped to have. We were not in as good a position as we had been in during the years prior to the doing away with the conditions of a free market in Great Britain, and we were all suffering as a result of it. But in spite of that fact, because we had in power a party which believes in trade—and, I might say, up until very recently the only party in the House of Commons, the only national party in this country, that believed in trade as a means of bringing about prosperity—we did increase our trade in the late thirties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I suppose in order to convince my hon. friends I shall have to read them something from their leaders at the time. But I do not need to read it; I quoted it a few moments ago. One leader said in the house in 1935, "No free markets in the world; no markets in the world"; and the other leader gets up in the house and says that he agrees with him that that was the wisest thing he ever said in the House of Commons—that there are not any markets in the world.

Mr. Rowe: Free.

Mr. Gardiner: He said both. He said both free and otherwise.

Mr. Rowe: You are taking advantage of it.

Mr. Gardiner: We came into office in 1935, just after those two speeches were made. And what happened?

Mr. Rowe: Lost them all.

Mr. Gardiner: We increased by 50 per cent the trade of this country in the four years preceding the war. Not only did we increase it by 50 per cent, but we cut down unemployment greatly by the fact that we did bring about increased trade.

And now, as we look back over it, what do we find? We find, I say, that no country has prosperity without trade. This country was able greatly to increase its trade during the war—not in a way which was altogether helpful; nevertheless we did increase our trade, and from the economic point of view it was most helpful.

I should like to point out what happened in the period about which I have been speaking. During the war our exports rose from $929 million to $3,449 million. Our imports rose from $751 million to $1,760 million; and our trade from $1,675 million to $4,200 million.

An hon. Member: War materials.

Mr. Gardiner: What I wish to say about that, in reply to the hon. member over here who interrupted—yes, it was war materials; yes, it was farm products, increased by some 40 per cent in quantity over what they had been previously. Those war materials, those agricultural products brought a sufficient amount of wealth to this country, in the form of dollars, to permit of our being able to buy many of the things which in the years preceding the war we had not been able to buy at all—and to buy them even at increased cost.

So anxious were we to buy, and so able were we to buy, that we had to have restrictions placed upon the importation of goods into this country. We had to have restrictions placed upon what men could buy, in order that we could ship out quantities of these materials which were so necessary for the prosecution of the war.

An hon. Member: We were giving it away.

Mr. Gardiner: Let us see what happened.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You did not get rid of all your apple sauce, did you?

Mr. Gardiner: I have pointed out that we improved our trade position under a Liberal government before the war, and that we improved our trade position under a Liberal government during the war. What about the condition since the war?

Mr. Ferguson: All due to the war.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend says it is all due to the war. Our trade has leveled out in peace.

An hon. Member: You started it.

Mr. Gardiner: We did not start the war. Liberalism was brought into the world for the purpose of making war impossible. And if liberalism were established in every country of the world there would not be any war. Why would there not be? Liberalism exists for the purpose of encouraging greater and greater production of the necessities of life, and freer and freer exchange.

I say that if people could get all the food they require, all the clothing they require, and all the shelter they require without fighting for it, there would not be any war in the world. But when you find policies such as those brought into effect in 1932, the world over, when leaders of almost every nation in the world started to shout that they must provide themselves with all the necessities of life, within their own boundaries—then, of course, in those conditions, you get war. Of course you get war under a policy of national self-sufficiency. That is the antithesis of liberalism.

When this country found itself with a Liberal government in power at the beginning of the last war, we immediately went to the country. We asked this question: "Do you want a government which does not believe in war to direct its activities during war?" I remember my hon. friends sitting across the floor of the house saying, "You have a leader who has been a man of peace. He has been known as a man of peace. A man of peace cannot run a war". I was sitting back here, in a seat behind the one in which I now sit, and to my right. I rose on that occasion and said something that I shall repeat today: "Mr. Speaker, in a country like this, where we all believe in peace, the kind of leader we require in wartime, in order to lead our people as they ought to be led, is a leader who does not believe in war. And the one party in which you can get a man of that type is the Liberal party, and that man is the leader of the Liberal party".

I do not go as far, however, as some of our friends who sit on the other side of the house, in suggesting that even if war had been forced upon us we should not fight at all. Our leader said that we should get out and fight it.

Then, when the war was over, what did they do? They said, "You have had the best wartime leader this country has ever had." So, under a man who could be the best peacetime leader and the best wartime leader, things were prosperous in the country as a result of his activities.

Since the war was over, what has happened? Our trade has levelled out in peace. Our exports in 1947 were valued at $2·8 billion, or three times as much as they were in 1939. Our imports in 1947 were $2·6 billion, or a little more than three times what they were in 1939. Our total trade in 1947 was $5·4 billion, or $1·2 billion higher than it was in the middle of the war when we had all these wartime products about which the hon. member has spoken.

Mr. Ferguson: To what extent were increased prices responsible for that?

Mr. Gardiner: Increased prices would be responsible for some of it. But I think the people of this country learned back in 1930 that it was better to have a government that could keep prices up than to have one that put them down.

The other night the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) said that in the last two and a quarter years, since the wheat agreement has been signed with Great Britain, the farmers had lost $2 billion. He said that we had lost about $540 million on wheat sold to the British government. Then he went on to argue that, because of wheat prices being low, the prices of other farm commodities were low, too; and that because we had lost $540 million on wheat we had lost $2 billion on all farm products in Canada.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Since 1942.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend says it is true.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Since 1942.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend has said it is true.

Mr. Rowe: No, he did not; he said, "Since 1942."

Mr. Gardiner: We did not have a wheat agreement in 1942.

Mr. Rowe: He said 1942.

Mr. Gardiner: Our wheat agreement was made in 1946.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I do not think the minister should put words in my mouth. I said, "Since 1942." This government took over the entire control of wheat in Canada in 1943.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the minister that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Rowe: The minister was sticking closer to the facts before his time was up.

Mr. Gardiner: I stick close to the facts all the time. There is nothing harder for a Tory to take than good old Liberal facts. Let us take a look at these agricultural figures. It does not make any difference whether we take 1942, 1946 or any other year, they are better now than they ever were before. In 1926-29 under a Liberal government—

An hon. Member: Away back there?

Mr. Gardiner: I will get up to the present soon enough for some people. In 1926-29 the average gross income of farmers was $970·5 million. That was the highest average we had ever had up to that time.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Is that the gross?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. That was the highest average we ever had until we got a Liberal government back in again. In 1931-35 the average was $450 million.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Gardiner: In 1931-35 it was less than half the $970 million; it was about $450 million. In 1936-40 it was up 50 per cent on an annual average, when it reached $675 million, from the average level in the preceding five years.

Mr. Zaplitny: Is it not a fact that in 1937 under the Liberal administration there were approximately 1,000,000 people on relief?

Mr. Gardiner: I have not the exact figures for 1937 but I will call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that we had been in power only for one year.

An hon. Member: Two years.

Mr. Gardiner: We came in in October, 1935 and of course we had not got things back in quite as good shape in fourteen months as we were able to do a little later. But we did get unemployment down. In 1941-45 the average annual gross cash farm income was $1,400 million. My hon. friends will say that that was during the war, but since the war, in 1946-48, the average was $2,270 million. In other words, back in 1942 it was $1,400 million and in 1946-48 it averaged $2,270 million. In 1948 it is $2,835 million, twice what it was in 1942. Is my hon. friend the member for Souris going to say that by increasing the gross returns from farm products from $1,400 million to $2,800 million the farmer has lost by that process?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: He has been making more money than he ever made before. Let us look at the net income. The net income rose from a low of $387 million in 1938 to a high of $1,226 million in 1944 during the war and $1,742 million in 1948. Five hundred million of that was due to the fact that there have been increases in farm returns, and a greater part of the $500 million is due to the fact that we had the British-Canadian wheat agreements and made a twenty-cent payment on crops during that year which went into the pockets of many farmers at a time when they needed it more than at any other time. The remainder went into the pockets of farmers across Canada.

I do not think a policy of that kind is bad for the farmer. There is one other thing I I want to say. It is with reference to a statement made last night by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). The leader of the opposition called attention to certain figures in an effort to prove that this government is centralizing control.

An hon. Member: He did prove it.

Mr. Gardiner: My friend says "he did prove it". In that regard may I call this to your attention. I have sat here for four weeks. I rose to my feet on one previous occasion but for the remainder of the time I have been listening. In all the listening that I have been able to do I have not heard a single member of the Progressive Conservative party, and more particularly the leader of the opposition, get up on the floor of this house and quote one single Conservative in the whole history of the Dominion of Canada who ever favoured provincial rights.

Not only have they not been able to quote any member of the Conservative party who has favoured provincial rights, they have been continuously quoting leaders of the Liberal party who have favoured provincial rights. When anyone on this side of the house wanted to quote anyone who was against provincial rights he had to quote one of the leaders of the Conservative party. As a matter of fact, the leader of the opposition has not even been able to quote himself in the past.

Mr. Casselman: Contentious matters by courtesy of overtime.

Mr. Gardiner: We have given the same courtesy to everyone over there. I am taking full advantage of the courtesy, it is true.

Mr. Casselman: Time.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gardiner: Reference was made by the leader of the opposition to the agricultural legislation that is before the house. I am not going to discuss that now because I would be out of order just as the leader of the opposition was out of order in discussing it, since it is a matter already before the house. When that is being dealt with I am going to read to the house the act governing natural products marketing which the leader of the opposition passed when he was in Toronto. Every provision that we have in our act he had in the act that he passed there.

The other afternoon the leader of the opposition went on to state that in 1939 the dominion government collected $468 million in taxes, the provincial governments collected $172 million, and the municipal governments $274 million. He then went on to say:

> The dominion government collected 51·2 per cent of all taxes, provincial governments collected 18·8 per cent, and municipal governments collected 30 per cent.

Then he went on to say that that condition had changed, that the federal government is now collecting the taxes. I recall to the memory of the house the fact that when the leader of the opposition was speaking during the first part of this debate he called attention to a statement that had been made by the former Prime Minister, the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King), who had once said that the authority who spends the money ought to collect it.

An hon. Member: Correct.

Mr. Gardiner: I think that is right. The leader of the opposition went on to state that the dominion government collected $2,452 million; the provincial governments, $398 million; and the municipal governments, $346 million. Then he goes on to say that the dominion government collected 76·7 per cent of the taxes, the provincial governments collected 12·5 per cent of the taxes, and the municipal governments collected 10·8 per cent of the taxes. If he had just left it at that we might have been misled by it, but he had not yet made his argument, Mr. Speaker. The argument he wanted to make, the argument he wanted to ring in, was that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had made a statement the other day which, under the circumstances that he was quoting, was a criticism of the Minister of Finance of that day. He said that, in spite of all that had been said, instead of a lesser sum $240 million is being paid by the federal government to the provincial governments; but if you take the $240 million you will find that it is 10 per cent of all the money he was talking about that had been collected by the federal treasury. If you add the 10 per cent to the 12·5 per cent it brings you up to over 20 per cent that is being expended by the provinces. In other words, instead of collecting 18 per cent and spending 18 per cent of all the money collected they were getting over 20 per cent of all the money collected, $240 million of it being handed to them by the federal authorities.

I do not understand the argument of my hon. friend when he says that is centralizing control. That is not centralizing control.

Mr. Rowe: Centralizing taxation.

Mr. Gardiner: That is centralizing criticism. When my hon. friend stands up in the house and says that the income tax is too high—

An hon. Member: Isn't it?

Mr. Gardiner: Out in my province I know why it is too high. I used to be provincial treasurer of that province. When I was provincial treasurer we had an income tax and we collected it. The federal government had an income tax and our rate was the same as theirs. Therefore we collected the same amount of money through our income tax as they collected through theirs. What I want to say to my C.C.F. friends when they talk about the income tax being too high is that the quickest way for us to reduce what we collect is to turn back to Saskatchewan the responsibility for collecting their own income tax, and then we will only be collecting half as much. That is where a large part of the money came from with which to pay Saskatchewan's share of the $240 million that is being talked about.

Under the system that is being followed now it is true that we centralize criticism upon the federal government, but when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) gets up and says that is centralizing government in Canada, I say to him that what we are actually doing is allowing the provincial governments to spend enough money to make themselves popular and keep themselves in power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that the minister would wish to be corrected in an error he has made. What I pointed out was that if all the provinces had been taking payment they would be receiving $240 million; but neither Ontario nor Quebec, which won very satisfactory elections last year, is drawing any money from the dominion government.

Mr. Gardiner: There was not any way of my finding that out from what was said yesterday, because it is not in here. Whether he said all the provinces or whether he said seven of the provinces—

Mr. Abbott: He said seven.

Mr. Gardiner: —what he does say is that $240 million was paid out of money collected by the federal government. On that basis every argument I have used is sound, no matter whether it went to seven or to nine provinces. That is all I want to say with regard to my friends of the official opposition.

There is one further statement to which I want to call attention. It was made by the leader of the C.C.F. party. I repeat that I have been in this house for fourteen sessions, and I have heard this statement made so often that I think it should be corrected. It is to be found at page 90 of Hansard. The leader of the C.C.F. party says:

> I have lived in western Canada long enough to remember the vicious campaign which was carried on in my province in 1929, 1930 and 1935, largely in the interests of my hon. friends of the Conservative party who sit to my immediate right. I remember how people were persuaded to go into post offices to ask for bilingual money order applications, envelopes and so on, to send down to Ottawa, protesting against the printing being in both French and English.

I call attention to the fact that reference was made to the part taken in that campaign by the Conservative party of that day. What I want to say is that I was the individual who was on the other end of the campaign, and I think I know as well as anyone in the country who put the Anderson government in power. When the election was all over we had twenty-eight members; the Conservative party had twenty-four members; the Progressives had six members, and the independents had five members. At that time there was not any C.C.F. party.

An hon. Member: Thank God.

Mr. Gardiner: There was a Progressive party, in which the present leader of the C.C.F. party took a very prominent part. He was the leader of the labour group in that party, and there was a farm leader as well. It is true that he did not contest the constituency in that election, but I know better than anyone else that the morning after the election was over, one of the leaders of the Progressive party came to my office and asked me if I would accept their support in order to keep us in office, and we only needed their support. I said to them on that occasion: "We have been in power for twenty-four years. It might do us good to be out a little while. I have got tired of traveling up and down the province telling people who never have had any other kind of government"—because we had always been in power in Saskatchewan—"how good we are without anybody to compare us with". They said: "We think it would be a good thing for Saskatchewan anyway to keep the Liberal government in power rather than have a Conservative government. Have you any objection to our talking to the present leader of the C.C.F. party"? He was then the leader of the other group. I said: "No, not as far as I am concerned, but do not speak on my behalf; speak on your own". He came back inside of half an hour and said: "There is no use talking to him because he is supporting Anderson". I do not think a gentleman who has gone through that experience should get up in this house and point to the Conservatives and say that they put in the party which conducted the Ku Klux Klan campaign. I am not so sure he did not put them in, but in any case I know who went out as the result of the understanding. At that time we fought battles on behalf of minorities. The Liberal party has always fought the battles of minorities. I venture to say there is not another party in Canada that can maintain that all the way through the picture they have stood for the rights of minorities. The Liberal party is the party of provincial rights. The Liberal party is the party of minority rights. I think my hon. friend missed my remark a while ago. He cannot even quote himself, from anything said previous to a few months ago, in support of provincial rights.

Mr. Graydon: That is not what you said before.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I would not include this last month, because at every opportunity he has got up and shouted provincial rights. I am trying to tell you that your party never stood for provincial rights. The Liberal party is still the provincial rights party; and if the people of Canada repeat the mistake they made on two previous occasions and listen to that kind of appeal they will get the same results they got before, and at the end of five years we will come back again with a larger majority than ever. But the people of Canada are not going to do that. They made that mistake twice, and that is enough; and whether the election is held on the 31st day of June or at any other time it will be held, I am sure this government will come back to power.

Mr. Thatcher: I wonder if the minister would permit a question.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Thatcher: This is not meant to be facetious, but in view of the statement the minister made in the house two or three weeks ago, that when the throne speech debate came along he would make a statement to the house in regard to what he accomplished in Great Britain, I wonder if he could not say something today about the future of our markets for agricultural products, in view of these Polish and Danish agreements.

Mr. Gardiner: I could still speak on the main motion. I do not know that I will, but there will be a discussion of that question as we go along. I mentioned it today. I pointed out to this house that because of the 1932 agreement the Polish and Danish agreements still stand. Those people were given quotas under that agreement, and as soon as they can fill those quotas Britain will accept the food. We are in our present difficult position because of the 1932 agreement, which provided for quotas. Our bacon quota, as indicated at that time, was 160,000,000 pounds, and that is what is in our agreement now. Our quota at that time was about 60,000,000 pounds of cheese, and it is 50,000,000 pounds in the agreement today. If we had permitted such a quota to be written in at that time we would have had a market for about six thousand head of cattle, but we do not have cattle in the agreement at the present time. We are sending our cattle to the United States; and incidentally I point out to some of my hon. friends that we are not getting as much for our cattle now as we were before we opened that market.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. C. C. Miller (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, it is always refreshing to listen to a speech by the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). That is so particularly this session, because the two occasions on which the right hon. gentleman has made speeches have been the only occasions on which hon. members opposite have had a chance to do any drum-beating.

When the right hon. gentleman started reading from some of the statutes enacted in previous parliaments by previous governments I wondered what it was all leading up to. It seemed to me he was trying to lay the foundation for charging sins of commission or omission to some other government in order to explain away the failure of the present administration to accomplish what they had always promised they would do. He tells us that they inherited a system of quotas which to some extent handicapped them in their negotiations. Perhaps that is so. The minister tried also to suggest to this house that there was no difference between a quota arrangement and an agreement. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this house that the difference between these two arrangements is that under a quota system it is a matter of voluntary deliveries, while under an agreement of necessity there must be compulsory deliveries on the part of the farmers.

Not only did the minister do a bit of drum-beating; he also indicated that possibly in the not too distant future the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) might be called upon to cross the floor and become head of the government of this country, as happened in 1930. We all recall that in its first session the Bennett administration was condemned for all the ills which were created at that time by a world-wide financial collapse, which took place in 1929 and 1930 while the Liberal administration was in power. Apparently the government at that time was glad to let the Conservative party take over, pick up the scattered threads and shattered business and try to get the country back into shape before the Liberals again were fortunate enough to take office and, through the recuperative measures taken by the Bennett administration, enjoy some of the prosperity about which the minister has been speaking. That is not the point, however, Mr. Speaker. What alarms me is that by inference the minister today has hinted to this house and to the country that we are in the same relative position as in those disastrous years of 1929 and 1930; and I presume he is warning this house and the country that before too long this party again may be called to come to the rescue of Canada and take up the burden of office.

Before going further I should like to humbly join with other hon. members who have congratulated the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I always watch with a great deal of interest, as I am sure all hon. members do, the first efforts of an hon. member who moves or seconds the address. In this instance I believe the hon. member who seconded the address was making his maiden effort in the house and, as I have done on previous occasions, I want particularly to congratulate him. I should like to join also in the courtesies that have been extended to the new members, and to welcome them to their seats in this house. At the same time I want to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the leader of the opposition upon their elevation to places not only of great honour but also of great responsibility in connection with the affairs of this country.

In the course of my remarks I intend to refer to several items, not only one. The first item to which I want to refer is the matter of the Trans-Canada highway. I suggest there is nothing much more urgent to this country and its people than the construction of such a highway; and I am fearful lest the immediate commencement of that project may get bogged down in dealings between provinces and municipalities as to who shall pay the cost. It seems to me that for the purpose of defence alone a highway from one end of this country to the other should be a matter of great concern to this government, particularly to the Department of National Defence. I know there are certain negotiations taking place between the governments of the various provinces and this government at the present moment. It is alarming, however, to see press reports to the effect that no assurance has been given by this government to any of the provinces that the dominion government is seized with the importance of proceeding with that construction immediately.

The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. MacKinnon) has suggested that probably the dominion government would be willing to pay up to 50 per cent of the cost of the highway. We have not time to haggle about who is going to pay for this road. It has to be built, if only for the sake of the defence of this country, as I said a moment ago. Today a vast amount of army equipment is mechanized and must move across this country by roads. I suggest to the government that, when negotiations take place relative to the Trans-Canada highway, they should not be negotiations between this government and the provinces, but that this government should first establish a highways commission. The highways commission, backed by this government, would then pick the route for the Trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Martin: What about consultation with the provinces?

Mr. Miller: You could have consultation with the provinces. I would say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) that if the government proceed with the negotiations with the provinces in the manner they are now doing, instead of through a highways commission as I suggest, they will find that the province of Manitoba, for instance, may want the road to take a northern route, while the province of Saskatchewan may want a southern route. If one province wants the road in the north and another province wants it in the south, you will have a fine system of highways.

As hon. members know, whenever the government undertakes construction of a road, all the municipalities and small districts want the road to go through their part of the country. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will recall only too well the difficulty into which his Manitoba government got recently in connection with a highway coming up from the United States border to the city of Winnipeg. There was a delay of at least a year because the factions on each side of the Red river pleaded with the government to route the new highway through their respective territories. The same thing is taking place in every province in western Canada today.

Twenty-two years ago, when I was the secretary of the Portage la Prairie board of trade, plans were made to build a road from north to south through central Manitoba. It has not been built yet. I say that is what will happen to the Trans-Canada highway. Every municipality wants the road to go through its part of the country; every little town wants it to go through its thoroughfare. The city of Portage la Prairie is just as bad as the others, because we want the Trans-Canada highway to go through the city of Portage la Prairie. If this situation prevails, it will take years for the Trans-Canada highway to cross Canada. I maintain it is desperately important that construction of that highway commence immediately. The only way in which that can be accomplished is for the dominion government to establish a highways commission to choose a route for the highway.

An hon. Member: Is that not centralization and bureaucracy?

Mr. Rowe: If it is, you ought to be able to do it.

Mr. Miller: There is a right way and a wrong way of doing everything. There is a right way and a wrong way of doing what I am suggesting. You can do it by bureaucracy if you like, but the important thing at the moment is that this government make up its mind to do something.

There are other reasons why the Trans-Canada highway is important. I want to emphasize one of those reasons, and that is that there is no excuse for making Canadians who wish to cross Canada from east to west go through the United States in order to do so. As Canadians we are entitled to a Canadian road, and I maintain it is the duty of this government to see that we have it. My final reason for requesting the immediate construction of the Trans-Canada highway is that it would be of great help to the tourist industry, which brings thousands of people and thousands of United States dollars to this country.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at seven-thirty o'clock.

Mr. Miller: Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess at six o'clock I had just finished my remarks with respect to the Trans-Canada highway. It is my hope and my wish that the government will proceed with their plans to complete that highway as expeditiously as I finished my remarks.

I now wish to say something about education. I am not unmindful of the fact that under section 93 of the British North America Act education comes exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, but I wish to point out to the government a situation with has arisen in many of the school districts of this country and particularly in western Canada. Many of the school districts now find themselves faced with the problem of old-fashioned, out-of-date, unhealthy, unsafe schools at a time when not only are materials hard to get to reconstruct the schools but also the financial ability to do so is scarcely within the limits of the municipalities or the towns or cities. This was brought forcibly to my attention recently when an old school in my home city of Portage la Prairie, which was constructed in the early eighties, was condemned by the architects of the provincial government and by architects brought in by the school board to examine the edifice. It is true that it is an old school, but the problem which faces the school district of Portage la Prairie is to construct a new school, and the minimum figures given to construct a new school are in the neighbourhood of $250,000, which is a lot of money for any small city or town to obtain. It is all right to say that that is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the municipality or the province so far as the British North America Act is concerned, but the fact remains that the children who live in Portage la Prairie do need, as Canadians, a healthy and safe school. It is a necessity to which both the city and the school district must measure up. They must construct a new school at a cost of $250,000. Our city will do that, but at the same time it is going to put on real estate a burden of taxation which it is not fair to ask real estate to assume. I think the whole thing is out of date. The dominion government is quite prepared to make, and does make, grants in aid of health. I would suggest to the government that there is nothing more conducive to good health in young Canadians than a modern, healthy, proper school. I urge the government to give consideration to assisting municipalities, towns and cities throughout this country in the construction of modern up-to-date schools to replace many of the present edifices which are far from being either healthy or safe.

I wish to say a word on behalf of the old age pensioners. Almost every hon. member who rises in his place in this house says something about old age pensions. I would not feel that I had done my duty in this respect, even at the danger of repeating what other hon. members have already said, if I did not make a plea on behalf of the old age pensioners who reside in my constituency. It is common knowledge to all members of the government, as well as to all other hon. members, that these old age pensioners are in destitute circumstances and need help. If that premise is correct—and it is correct; we all know it is correct—then I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government should take steps to see that finances are so arranged that these old age pensioners would have an increase in the amount of money that is allotted to them. The initiative should come from the federal government.

May I make a plea on behalf of the crippled folks, people who, by reason of their own infirmities, are unable to make their own living. I am not raising these points just because I, in common with other hon. members, have received many letters urging me to speak on their behalf in this house. The matter has been on my mind for a long time because in my own immediate district many sad cases have brought it forcibly to my mind. These people are our forgotten citizens. They are crippled. Through no fault of their own they are unable to earn their living, and in the great scheme of social legislation which we have in this country they are entirely forgotten. I submit that the government, in fairness to itself and to these people, should give consideration to the claims of the infirm who are not entitled to family allowances and who are not old enough to get old age pensions, but nevertheless are in dire need and unable to look after themselves.

There is the perennial question of these nuisance taxes about which private members always speak in the debate on the speech from the throne. I urge that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), before he brings down his budget, give consideration to repealing these nuisance taxes. I am inclined to think that in this election year we shall find many of these nuisance taxes done away with in the budget. If that happens I shall be perfectly happy, because I do not care what is the reason for the abolition of these taxes. What I am looking for is results; and if the taxes on soft drinks, which affect an industry in my own home town, and these other nuisance taxes, are repealed, the government can take all the credit they wish in an election year so long as we get rid of these things, which are distasteful to us.

Much has been said in this debate about the cost of living. There is no hon. member who is not alive to the urgency of this problem. In the towns of my constituency—and there are many small towns and one little city in it—the people do not earn large wages. They find it difficult to make ends meet because of the increased cost of living. Time and time again in the house the Minister of Finance has boasted—and I think the word "boasted" is the correct one—that his high taxation serves the great purpose of keeping down inflation. He has been able to keep the foolish people of this country from spending their money foolishly. In that the Minister of Finance is incorrect. The people of this country do not spend their money foolishly. In the main they are just struggling to make ends meet. They are not creating any surpluses, because of the pressure of the high price of goods which are in short supply. The cost of living is mainly, or at least to a large extent, due to the fact that there is in Canada today terrifically heavy taxation, both direct and indirect. The income tax is one on which we can most easily put our finger, and it is the one which affects most of us. I can recall that when I was younger there was scarcely an election in this country in which those who were in opposition did not accuse those who were in power of taxing excessively, of waste, and so on. In later years it has not been popular to do that. The war came along and in my opinion the people got tired of hearing that. But I say that once again the question of waste and the question of taxation are uppermost in the minds of the people. In the coming election the government must and will face the criticism, at least from His Majesty's loyal opposition, of high taxation, extravagance and waste. Today the people know that that is an issue which is affecting their lives and their livelihood.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who is not in his seat just now, will recall that a few years ago the people of Manitoba rose up in holy horror and kicked out of office the government—and it was a Liberal administration—of the Hon. T. C. Norris because they were spending $5 million a year. The Minister of Justice, who was the provincial treasurer of Manitoba before he resigned to come down here and take his seat, budgeted last year for almost $35 million. That is seven to one, and that is about the ratio that prevails here. A few years before the war the dominion government budget was just about one-fifth to one-seventh what it is today. Outside of the municipal governments, one to seven or one to five is pretty well the ratio which prevails today over a few years ago. It is true that a lot of it is due to war expenditures, the high cost of living and so forth; but the fact remains that that is about the ratio of the increase all over this country, and it is becoming a burden which is economically unsound, a burden which if it is not relieved, and taxation reduced to near pre-war levels, will mean a complete collapse of our entire financial and economic system.

I believe that to keep the cost of living down we should in some way encourage production. It is easy to say that, but difficult to tell how it can be done. Nevertheless it is obvious that if we could get lots of goods, automatically the cost of those goods would come down. I believe the government should make much greater efforts than they have heretofore to see that the production of all essential lines of goods and materials in this country is materially increased.

Then comes the question of controls. That has something to do with the cost of living. The government has been trying periodically to get out from under many of the controls. I think it is only fair to say, however, that the present chaotic conditions in Canada, so far as they are domestic, are the responsibility of the government. The government is responsible for that condition.

In view of those chaotic conditions it is perhaps difficult quickly or overnight to abandon all these controls. Certainly it would be, in view of the dangerous state of housing, and so on, in the country. I repeat that to a large extent the present condition is the fault of the government. In my view it would be most dangerous, if not unwise, at the present time to take off rental controls; I should not like to see that done.

Hon. members of the C.C.F. party have made a great play in the debate in urging that we roll back the prices to the 1946 level. They recommend that with the same abandon that they would recommend that we all get together and sing Roll Out the Barrel. But if we consider what that means, we find ourselves getting into some difficulty.

So far as I am concerned, personally, I would support anything in the house that would be the means of bringing down the cost of living, or of seeing that the people who are suffering from the high cost of living would have some relief. But before supporting any such thing I would want to be at least reasonably sure that the remedy suggested is a sound one.

The C.C.F. have made no effort in the house, either in this or in any other debate during the three years I have been here, to show anything to justify their contention that we should roll back the prices to the 1946 level. What would happen? The very day we rolled back the prices to the 1946 level we would find that merchants, large and small, in this country would have terrific stocks of goods on their shelves. Those stocks would be on hand, right from the manufacturers, through the wholesalers and jobbers and down to the retailers. Surely no government, C.C.F. or any other kind—if there ever was a C.C.F. government in Canada—could say that today we are going to tell a man who has on his shelves goods worth $10,000 that tomorrow those same goods would be worth only $5,000 because we are rolling back the prices to the 1946 level, and since that time the price has gone up twice as high.

If the government took that action, without making compensation to the manufacturers, merchants and others, it would certainly ruin all the small merchants and would likely ruin most of the big ones. If the government did not say, "You have to do it without compensation", and were prepared to give compensation, then I suggest no government this country has ever known could ever finance such a colossal scheme as would be involved in giving compensation to merchants, manufacturers and wholesalers for the goods they might have on their shelves. Until that can be explained to us, I will suggest that the Canadian economy cannot stand the process which is involved in the slogan of rolling back the prices to 1946. It would cost a great many millions of dollars, and certainly much more than our economy could stand.

How could we roll back the prices to the 1946 level when our economy is so tightly tied to that of the United States? Are we going to be able to reduce the standard of living in Canada below that of the United States? I suggest our people would not stand for that for one moment. In fact, they took with only the barest of good will—if one could call it good will—the austerity program already in force in Canada today, without any further differentiation between our standard of living and that of people in the United States.

I say this, too, that if the government were to begin to control prices, or to put price controls on again and make them retroactive, or if they were put on today without being made retroactive, it would kill the initiative to produce, and we would have less goods than we ever had. That was the story when controls were on, of necessity, during the war. It meant that we had less and less goods. And, what is more, we had goods of poorer quality as time went on.

If we rolled back the prices to the 1946 level we would create in this country a wave of blackmarketing which would mean that those whom hon. members to my left, the C.C.F., dislike so much, the people with wealth, could go on the black market and get what they wanted, while those of us who are not so fortunate as to have such a good supply of this world's goods would have to take what we could get.

We would have established a black market, and would have perhaps thousands of additional government officers going around the country trying to enforce unenforceable laws. We would have increased payrolls in the dominion government, and an increased civil service, thus offsetting any advantage which, it is urged, we might have if such a course were followed.

What is more, if we were going to control prices, and roll them back to the 1946 level, I suggest that of necessity we would have to have a most rigid control of wages in this country. And I have not heard many C.C.F.'ers—I believe I did hear one of them one day—I have not heard many socialists say they would be willing to have any control of wages. Their argument is that wages are not high enough. You cannot control the prices of things unless you can control those things which go together to make the price. What would happen in the long run is simply this—

Mr. Gillis: Wages are controlled now, are they not?

Mr. Miller: What would happen in the long run is this, that we would have labour control. One thing would lead to the other. One control would make it necessary to protect somebody else, and it would lead in an unmistakable and uncontrollable chain to the complete and absolute control of our entire economy by the government of this country —which I maintain and gather is the whole wish and object of the socialist party sitting to our left.

Before taking his seat, perhaps owing to the promptings of hon. members in other parts of the house, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) waxed—

Mr. Grant: He does not need promptings.

Mr. Miller: No, he does not need much. Just wind him up, and he makes a pretty good speech. But I noticed one thing about his speech which I should like to mention. I must say he was no piker. He used an expression which was not comparable with the five cent speech about which we used to hear so much. He talked about the sum of $240 million, which, he suggested, this government was good enough to turn over to the provinces to make sure that those provincial governments might keep their people happy and enable them to stay in power. I think that is quite an admission from a minister of the crown; and it is only coincidental that most of the governments of the provinces in Canada at that time were of the Liberal persuasion.

Mr. Rowe: They paid only half of it, though.

Mr. Miller: In closing I should like to say a few words about our system of commerce. There are many people nowadays who advocate a change in our commercial system. I am one of those not particularly close to the commercial life of this country; but I believe that under the British system of trading and commerce which has grown up over the centuries we have developed perhaps one of the greatest over-all commercial systems the world has ever seen.

For over a period of many centuries we have developed that system by the process of trial and error. Trading nations and trading concerns of the world have learned, at their own expense, when they have made mistakes and then corrected those mistakes. As I say, from the days of the early queens and kings of England we have developed a sound and solid system of trading and commerce which we should not lightly throw overboard or cast aside, adopting in place of it something which has not been proved at all, which has been advocated by the socialists of this and other countries, something which may in the long run prove to be not nearly as beneficial to the community and particularly to Canadians as a whole as those who so fervently believe in it contend.

The question that we have to decide in this particular debate is one of confidence or lack of confidence in the government. I have no trouble in taking my stand with my leader and intimating to you and to the house that I intend to vote for the amendment moved by my leader.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. MacKinnon) is not in the house tonight as he is the minister responsible for immigration and I intend to deal with at least one phase of that matter. I told him I was going to speak today and I asked him in fairness to be here. However I see present the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who may be even more deeply involved in this matter than the Minister of Mines and Resources.

I have had occasion in the past to quarrel with the policy of this government in the matter of immigration, yet I want to say that most of the things to which I objected have been cleared up. But I have another deep and bitter quarrel which arises as a result of recent events whereby there have been allowed to come into Canada men who actively assisted the nazi forces during the war. They did not assist them in the sense that they were conscripted. I know that there were many reasonably innocent people who were conscripted into the nazi forces, who were given the alternative of entering those forces or being shot, but who deserted to our side at the first available opportunity.

The men about whom I am going to speak willingly supported nazism to the detriment of the allied cause. I am referring now to order in council 4233 passed on September 22, 1948.

The first man is Julien Gaudens Labedan, alias Armand Berard, French citizen of French race, aged 35 years, married, interior decorator and cabinet maker, in Canada without status and applying for legal landing. The evidence shows the alien named effected temporary entry to Canada in July, 1946 under the name of Armand Berard, using an ordre de France to facilitate his departure from that country as a political refugee.

I notice the minister has entered the chamber and I welcome his arrival.

Following the arrival of this man in Canada he accepted employment with the firm of N. G. Valiquette Limited, Montreal. He was examined by board of inquiry at Montreal in March, 1947, rejected and ordered to be deported as failing to comply with the provisions of the occupational, passport and contract labour regulations.

I stress the words "rejected and ordered to be deported" because, if newspaper accounts are true, responsible ministers of the crown have attempted to blame their own civil servants for having kept this person in Canada. I intend to deal with those statements more fully later on. This man is wanted badly by the French government. He was condemned to death and public degradation by a court of that country.

The second man whom I have on my list is:

Georges Benoit Montel, alias Gaston Ringeval, French citizen of French race, aged 49 years, married, medical doctor and surgeon by profession, in Canada without status and applying for legal landing. The evidence shows the alien named effected temporary entry to Canada in September, 1946, as a visitor under the name of Gaston Ringeval, using a passport issued in that name which he claims he obtained in France to facilitate his departure from that country as a political refugee. He was examined by board of inquiry at Montreal on February 12, 1947, rejected and ordered to be deported as failing to comply with the provisions of the continuous journey, occupational and passport regulations. The record indicates that the alien has been attached to the staff of Laval university but that he now has employment available with Sorel hospital.

I would add that this man was accused and found guilty of treason in France. It is extraordinary to know that these men who have been found guilty of treason have found a haven in this country. I know of Germans who for long years fought Hitlerism and nazism and who have been trying to join relatives in this country. But they cannot come here because they are German nationals. Apparently, however, had they been supporters of nazism they would have been welcomed by elements in this government. I know of one Ukrainian woman who cannot come to blood relatives in this country because she suffers from trachoma. This is a disease of the eyes and apparently it is considered to be contagious in Canada, but we still allow those who have the diseased minds of fascists to come and seek refuge in Canada.

The third name on my list is:

Andre Charles Emmanuel Boussat, alias Alfred Bordes, French citizen of French race, aged 45 years, medical doctor and surgeon by profession, in Canada without status and applying for legal landing. The evidence shows the alien named effected temporary entry to Canada in July, 1946, under the name of Alfred Bordes, using a passport issued in that name which he claims he obtained in France to facilitate his departure from that country as a political refugee. He was examined by board of inquiry at Montreal in April, 1947, rejected and ordered to be deported—

I stress those words.

—as failing to comply with the provisions of the continuous journey, occupational and passport regulations. The record indicates he is employed by J. Edde Limited of Montreal, importers of pharmaceutical products.

And now Jean Louis Huc. Apparently he is one of the smaller fry because he is wanted by the French authorities only on charges of interfering with national defence. Some three weeks ago I placed on the order paper a motion for the production of certain papers.

The motion was passed by the house but I still have not received those papers. Perhaps that is not a great loss for I am certain that by the time I do get them they will be so emasculated that they will be of little value.

Mr. St. Laurent: On a point of order, I ask Your Honour to request the hon. member to withdraw the statement he has made that papers ordered to be brought down to this house will be emasculated before they are produced.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his statement.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): In view of the fact that I have not received the papers I withdraw the remark. I shall bear it in mind, however. I hope the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is not going to interject.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that the hon. member has withdrawn that remark?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I said that I withdrew the remark that I made.

An hon. Member: Period.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I said it quite clearly. My charge is that apparently the government is allowing known supporters of nazism to enter and stay in Canada. I realize that there are those who will immediately cry out that in saying that I am taking the part of the communists. I refuse to keep quiet because words of mine may be deliberately misconstrued as those of a communist sympathizer. Anyone who attempts to place such a misconstruction on them is either a knave or a fool, and in all probability both. I, together with other members of my party, have opposed communists long before some members of this house even knew that they existed. The pity is that communists use the same words as do the staunchest believers in democracy, but they do so for their own ends. The pity of it is that communists fasten on to obvious wrongs and social injustices, not with a determination to correct those wrongs, but for their own purposes.

Perhaps I may be permitted to quote from a speech made by Mr. Justice Douglas of the United States Supreme Court last Friday in Los Angeles. Part of what he said is as follows:

We must restore integrity to our own political tactics by putting an end to the shameful practice of branding as a communist everyone who espouses a liberal reform or promotes a program for the underprivileged.

Of course, it may be said that the sources of my information are communist-inspired. I shall give them to the house. The sources of my information are newspaper reports, and certain discussions I have had with those who wrote those reports. The newspapers concerned are the Montreal Herald—I doubt if it is under the domination of communists—the Montreal Standard and the Vancouver Sun. These are all good examples of capitalist journals in this country. I have another authority, and an even better one. My authority is Colonel Romans Petit, who is president of the national federation of maquis. A word about the maquis might be in order. The maquis are men who gave back to France her soul during the war. They are the men who gave back to France her honour after the betrayal of Vichy. They are the men who died, not only to free France from nazi persecution, but also to enable us to live in Canada as free men and women. The men of the maquis are heroes whose names will be remembered wherever there are free men. Colonel Romans Petit has the distinction and the honour not only of being a member of the Distinguished Service Order but also of being president of the national federation of maquis, a commander of the legion of honour, and a companion of the liberation. He wrote to us in response to a communication which was sent to him by my leader, the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), after we had discussed the matter. We asked for information about Montel, Boussat, Huc and Labedan. This is the answer which we received; it has been translated. It is sent from Paris, and the date is February 16, 1949. It reads:

Replying to your letter of the 11th instant which I did not receive until today, owing to a mistake in the address, I hasten to advise you that I immediately got in touch with various persons capable of supplying you with the information you seek. With more particular reference to Doctor Montel, who was chief of the militia in Haute Savoie. I am asking one of my friends, well placed by reason of his position, to provide you with all exact documents, to communicate to you directly the main points of the charges laid against Montel.

I will add that personally in my capacity as leader of the maquis in Haute Savoie I suffered from the anti-national activity of this Frenchman, and we are happy to know that there are to be found in that great friendly country that is Canada men such as you to defend French prestige, and consequently the laws of honour.

The Bernonvilles and fellow travellers hampered all our efforts in our struggle to save the country, and for that reason we deem them unworthy of your hospitality.

Then there are these brief dossiers:

Jules Labedan, born 1/6/1913 at Gimont (Gers), domiciled at St. Gaudens, was sentenced to death at Toulouse 10/2/45 for treason.

André Boussat, born 20/10/1906 at Belves (Lot et Garonne), domiciled at Villeneuve sur Lot (Physician), was the subject of a warrant for arrest issued the 12/2/45 by the Court of Justice of Agen. He was member of militia No. G 44 2650.

Jean Louis Huc, commissioner of woods and forests, militiaman, was the subject of a warrant for arrest issued in Toulouse.

Then I found today that another fish had come into the net. I asked the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. MacKinnon) if he knew whether or not Michel Lucien Seigneur was in Canada, and the answer was: "Yes, he is here." The information I have on Seigneur is as follows:

Michel Lucien Seigneur, born 22/1/1907 in the Somme, physician, ex-inspector of the Waffen SS at Limoges—

That is, the blackshirts.

—deputy departmental chief of the militia at Poitiers, sentenced to death by the court of justice of Poitiers.

Then Colonel Romans Petit goes on:

We know that in Canada a certain opinion looks upon all resisters as communists, whereas I set store by my personal documentation; since I was in command of three very important departments, l'Ain, le Haut Jura and la Haute Savoie, there were only 15 per cent in our ranks. Personally, I was the object of very sharp attacks on the part of communists, after the liberation. It suffices to state that our testimony is influenced by no political consideration. We take our stand not merely from the viewpoint of French interests but also from the viewpoint of humanity. We cannot forget that the militiamen resorted to inhuman means towards all our people who fell into their hands.

We believe that you are in possession of a few depositions with reference to Bernonville. On behalf of all our resister comrades, I thank you, Mr. Member, and assure you of our deep consideration.

That is signed by Colonel Romans Petit, D.S.O., president of the national federation of maquis, commander of the legion of honour, companion of the liberation. There is one part which I think I might repeat and paraphrase. It is:

We take our stand not merely from the viewpoint of Canadian interests, but also from the viewpoint of humanity.

I repeat that I oppose with equal vehemence the entry of fascists and communists into Canada, but since only fascist collaborators appear to be coming here I shall devote myself to them. Yesterday I listened with some interest to the address of the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew). He spent much of his time dealing with communism, and the menace and the perils of communism. I had hoped that he might have had time to spare a word about the menace and perils of fascism, but apparently not. I assume that he is aware of what has happened. I know that the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has taken an interest in this matter, and I would have thought that perhaps he had discussed it with his chief. I do not know whether he has or not, but in any event I know that the leader of the opposition has been questioned in press conferences as to his attitude concerning de Bernonville, and perhaps others, and his answer, to the best of my belief, has been "No comment". "No comment" is not good enough comment from one who is the head of a party which has pretensions to being a national party.

I ask the hon. gentleman to make his stand amply clear before this debate is finished. I said earlier that avowed fascists were entering Canada. There was a case which came to my attention, that of one Karol Murin, who apparently came here last September. Recently he has been in Winnipeg, and while there he permitted himself to be interviewed by reporters. He bragged of the fact that he had been the secretary of Dr. Tiso. I shall remind the house who Dr. Tiso was. Dr. Tiso was the puppet dictator appointed by Hitler in Czechoslovakia who was eventually hanged for his crimes by the Benes government.

This man told the reporters that under Hitler Slovakia had had six years of independence from 1939 to 1945. I think that is a man whom the minister could well afford to investigate a little further. Now on February 8, 1949, I asked a question of the minister as to where Count Jacques de Bernonville was. He told me, and I asked a supplementary question which was:

> Is the minister aware that this man is a traitor, and that he betrayed allied soldiers to the gestapo?

There was no answer. No answer was necessary, because in his answer to my original question the minister gave me all I wanted to know, and in this case I assumed silence meant assent. The next day on a question of privilege the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) rose and stated that he was one of two counsel who had been appointed to act on behalf of de Bernonville; and he went on to say:

> . . . I strongly resent the untrue and unfounded statement made yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) . . .

As a matter of fact I had been very factual, as I shall prove later. The hon. member also went on to say he was convinced not only of de Bernonville's innocence but also of the assistance he had rendered our soldiers during the war. I think the most significant thing then was not the statement of the hon. gentleman but the applause coming from the Tory benches which greeted it. One of us is wrong. Either the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay is right or I am right, and I am prepared to leave it to the judgment of the house.

Briefly, Mr. Speaker, this is the background of de Bernonville; I shall give it in greater detail later. He was said to be instrumental in setting up in France a gestapo organization to rout out those who remained loyal to the allied cause during the German occupation. Many executions of those working for an allied victory resulted from his efforts, according to information from France. During the North African campaign de Bernonville undertook to work for the German cause there. Again he established gestapo units to gather information among the French behind Rommel's lines. After the defeat of Rommel, de Bernonville escaped to France. This time the Germans made him military commandant of the Lyons area, a post that would go only to one of the most tried and true supporters of the nazi cause. His special task was to set up a counter-resistance police to combat the French maquis. In this he was concerned particularly with identifying British and other allied officers who dropped into France by parachute to aid the resistance movement. His work resulted in the death of many of these allied soldiers, it was said. This information came out during the Toulouse trial at which de Bernonville was convicted in absentia.

This man de Bernonville came to Canada in 1946, as did all those others I have mentioned. He was ordered deported, and the order was to take effect on October 6 or October 7. Then counsel appeared for de Bernonville, one Mr. Bernard Bourdon, K.C., who secured a writ of habeas corpus. The situation now, of course, is that de Bernonville is free; and I direct the attention of hon. members to a statement by the presiding judge, which I think is somewhat out of order:

> The court ordered the count liberated immediately and said it was directing authorities at Ottawa to grant him asylum in Canada along with his family.

That is an amazing statement, and in it I think the judge went far beyond the bounds of propriety. However, to revert to Mr. Bourdon, according to the Montreal Standard of September 4 last he said:

> de Bernonville is here as a political refugee, and there can be no deportation for a political crime.

What a pity Mr. Laval did not know that some years ago. Instead of going to Spain, from whence he was returned to France, he could have come to Canada where he might have obtained refuge as a political criminal. Later on Mr. Bourdon said:

> Since I took over this case many important people have displayed an interest in it.

I am quite sure they have, but I should like to know who those important people are. How tremendously important and powerful they must be to be able to induce the government to upset the laws of Canada, to some extent, and allow in those who on many grounds are not eligible to enter this country. They must be tremendously important people. I remember last year when seven unhappy Jews were deported from this country because they had come in illegally. I spoke to the then minister about their case. I knew they had violated the law. I was afraid they might have to be deported, but I wanted to see if there were any grounds for clemency in their cases, in view of what they had suffered. The then minister said no; that if we should allow them to stay we would establish a precedent. That precedent had been established; I suppose the minister knew that all these fascists were here, but he deported those Jews who apparently had no very important friends.

On whose behalf was Mr. Bourdon acting? On behalf of de Bernonville, of course, but there is another character in the picture, a Mr. Jean Bonnel, of 4450 St. Denis street, Montreal. I am told that Mr. Bourdon was acting on his instructions. Now Mr. Bonnel is not a Canadian citizen but to the best of my knowledge is still a citizen of France. On October 16 of last year he was quoted in this way:

> Bonnel says he is one of the main sources of aid to refugees from France accused of wartime collaboration.

And about the men with whom I am going to deal he said:

> They are heroes of France. Instead of sending them to their deaths we should kiss their feet.

This seems a very odd citizen to have in our midst; but let me deal right now with this suggestion that if we returned these people we would be sending them to their deaths. The French ambassador has already disproved that in a press conference; and in addition Maurice Ribbet, batonniere of the Paris bar, while in Montreal for the meeting of the Canadian Bar Association, declared:

> They can't shoot him if he returns home. Legally he is entitled to a new trial.

So they will not be shot if they return; they will be tried again, and tried in the courts of a country which is still a democratic nation. Then Bonnel goes on to say that he is one of the main sources of aid to collaborators. I wonder if the minister is aware of this. Is it possible, I wonder, that we have an underground railway into Canada by means of which these collaborators are being smuggled into this country? I know the department cannot possibly keep watch at every point on the border, but there are some of these people in this country, and they have been smuggled in. It is time the country knew how this is done. Then Bonnel said:

> The four are not the only ones here. I could name you twenty living in Montreal. I have one working for me now. There was another here in this office this morning, a man under sentence of death with no passport at all. Nearly all the rest are here under false passports—naturally.

Then he went on:

> I will do everything to keep de Bernonville from being delivered to the present government of France, a government of cretins, assassins and bandits.

Now I think we can place this man Bonnel pretty accurately. Hon. members of this house will know how to judge those words, because there are very few of us who have not experienced the gracious hospitality of the representatives of France in Ottawa. If the minister has not done so already I hope he will make a point of investigating this man Bonnel to ascertain how he got here, what his record is and how, if what he says is true, he is bringing these people into Canada.

But I have another witness, though I am the first to admit that he is scarcely an asset to the democratic cause. I refer to Mayor Houde of Montreal, who said of de Bernonville:

> Other members of his family, themselves under arrest in France, are day by day escaping to Canada to join him, one by one at the risk of their lives.

I would be the last to place any credence in what Mayor Houde says; nevertheless where there is smoke there may be some fire. This is another matter I think the minister might investigate. Mayor Houde made these remarks in a press release:

> Twenty other refugees will be in the same tragic situation as the Count de Bernonville and will be deported also within the next few days. This iniquity should be unmasked. At the present time we are taking steps to see that this project is not executed.

I think we must admit that the steps taken have been, at least, adequate up to date. Then speaking of the deportation of de Bernonville, Mayor Houde said:

> This crying injustice—we can call it this infamy—cannot pass in silence.

Just a few more words about Mayor Houde. At one time I think he was leader of the Conservative party in Quebec. I know that at page 2402 of Hansard for 1940, Mr. R. B. Hanson of the Conservative party placed on record a statement attributed to Mayor Houde in connection with national registration, as follows:

> I do not myself believe that I am held to conform to the said law, and I have no intention of so doing, and I ask the population not to conform, knowing full well what I am doing presently and to what I expose myself.

It exposed him to a concentration camp. I can well understand how a man behind bars for hampering the war effort could feel such a close relationship for a nazi collaborationist. Obviously, birds of a feather are going to flock together.

Mr. Pouliot: What about those who collaborated with Russia?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I have no time for either of them. Had the hon. member been in his place earlier, he would have heard that. I have heard further that the same Mayor Houde may be a Conservative candidate in the next general election. I should like to be enlightened about that. I wonder if it is for that reason the leader of the Conservative party has had nothing to say about this matter? After all, is the entry of known enemies to the democratic cause into Canada a matter of political strategy, of vote-getting?

If that is so, I can imagine how fascinated the father and mother of a boy who died overseas would be to know that he perhaps died at the hands of those who are getting succour in Canada. I can imagine how intrigued the widow would be who lost her husband overseas when she realized that these men perhaps had killed her husband and are now receiving sanctuary in Canada. It may be held that those who died are not important, but to allow fascist collaborators into this country is a betrayal of the memory of those who died fighting fascism.

I am going to deal in detail with de Bernonville. The first man whose statement I am going to quote is one Maurice Nedey, who was called one of the most remarkable figures of the resistance in a citation by General Charles de Gaulle, then provisional president of France, in August, 1945. Nedey received the Croix de Guerre 1939 avec Etoile de Vermeil for his wartime activities, as well as the Medaille de la Resistance Francaise and the British King's Medal "for courage in the cause of freedom".

The citation accompanying the Croix de Guerre award said:

> Resisting from the first hour, he aided in the summer of 1943 the responsible Bureau des Operations Aeriens for the Saone et Loire.
> He carried out numerous missions, both of a liaison nature and transporting arms. Constantly in the breach, he always endeavoured to reorganize parachuting services despite the gestapo's search for him. Arrested June 20, 1944, he was cruelly tortured, but did not deliver anything to the enemy on the organization to which he belonged.
> He was one of the most remarkable figures of the resistance.

He received the King's Medal from the British government in November, 1946, from the hands of Alfred Duff-Cooper, British Ambassador to France, in a ceremony at Paris. The citation accompanying the British award said of Nedey:

> (He) was the head of a leading resistance group in the Saone et Loire department of France. He organized several successful engagements against German patrols who tried to capture the material sent. Monsieur Nedey was arrested in July, 1944—

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I believe there is an error in the date, and that it should be June.

> —and horribly tortured. He was deported . . . and was recently repatriated to France.

I should like to read a statement made under oath and certified by X. Limal, an officer of the civil courts of France at Chalon-sur-Saone, dated October 25, 1948. This is the statement:

> Nedey was arrested by Vichy police on June 20, 1944, during a secret mission from d'Allerey to Paris-l'Hopital. He was with M. Picard, liaison agent (Cote d'Or and Saone et Loire areas) for the Bureau des Operations Aeriens. The latter made good his escape.
> Nedey was picked up near Chagny by the Group Mobile de la Reserve, but tried to make a break for it. He was recaptured some time later after a wild chase through vineyards—and after having swallowed two pieces of paper containing the messages which were the object of his mission.

May I interrupt my remarks here to say that if I do not have time during the forty minutes allotted to me to put all I know upon the record, I shall speak not only on the sub-amendment but on the amendment and, if necessary, on the main motion. Here is Nedey's statement:

> After having been slapped and insulted, they brought me to the Hotel Moderne at Chalon-sur-Saone, which was headquarters of the Milice. On the night of my arrival the commander, de Bernonville, was absent. They tied my feet with electric wire, after having handcuffed me, and permitted me to lie down on the floor of the guard room. The adjutant ordered a strict surveillance.
> I remembered then that a few days earlier members of the GRM (Groupe Mobile de la Reserve) had wanted to join the maquis. While the others slept, I asked my guard to take me to the washroom and I attempted to speak to him, telling him he had taken the wrong path; that everything was over for the Vichyites and that it would be better for him to help me to escape. I guaranteed he would have nothing to fear in accompanying me.
> He told me he had two children and the reprisals would be terrible. I assured him real friends would care for them and they would want for nothing. He did not accept my proposition, but as I had confided in him I made him swear not to divulge our conversation to anyone.
> The next morning, June 21, about eight o'clock the commander, de Bernonville, arrived and his subordinates informed him of my capture. My guard of the previous night gave a report to the commander, divulging our conversation, on the grounds of attempted bribery of an official. They made me sign this document of my guilt. I could see my case was getting worse, but it was useless to deny the evidence.
> After that, they brought me to a large room at the back of the hotel and de Bernonville sat down behind his desk which was in a corner. They cleared the tables and chairs and made me strip.
> Present, in addition to de Bernonville were: the adjutant; a militiaman who had arrested me the day before; a man named Poitoux, who was killed a few days later by the maquis of St. Gengoux to atone for the tortures he had inflicted previously on many patriots; a militia lieutenant named Gelin, subsequently condemned to 20 years forced labour, and a GMR lieutenant named Delienne condemned to 10 years forced labour as a result of depositions

I made against them when I returned from Buchenwald; and a civilian whose name is unknown to me.

De Bernonville, seated behind his desk, did not sully or tire himself to torture me; he merely gave the orders and led the course of interrogation. These orders were as follows: "Question him", "make him talk", "talk", "stop", "continue", "it's to your interest to talk and tell us all", "I am in a hurry and have no time to waste". All the staff I mentioned above rivalled each other in cruelty.

(Delienne and Gelin, according to another statement by Nedey, "saved their necks" at their subsequent trials "by explaining they had only obeyed de Bernonville's orders." The latter, they said, did not tolerate any laxity on their part in the fight against the maquisards.)

They spat on me, hit me with their fists, kicked me in the stomach. I warded off the blows as much as I could but one of them lashed me with a whip across the stomach and I thought I would vomit out my guts. I dropped to the floor time after time but they immediately made me get on my feet again by kicking me in the sides.

They stood in a circle and pushed me from one to the other. I began to realize I could not stand this for long. Then I got a tremendous blow which broke my lower jaw and I spat out bits of teeth broken by the shock.

De Bernonville demanded, in effect, the whereabouts of the maquis, the names of high-ranking officers, the location of arms depots, the passwords for various parachute districts, the dates of parachutings, the location of the radio transmitter, the whereabouts of hidden British parachutists and the source of our orders.

I swore I knew nothing of these things, that the resistance organization was highly decentralized and that, to tell the truth, he had a mistaken idea of the organization of the resistance, and I could not tell him lies in order to satisfy him by swearing to things I knew nothing about.

If he had known I was in charge of the co-ordination of several maquis in our region, twelve parachuting fields, arms depots, a radio transmitter and two landing fields, I ask myself what fate would have been reserved for all the organization of our district.

Having been completely unsuccessful in the interrogation, he commanded my torturers to use electricity on me. They took a wire, which they spliced, attaching half to my handcuffs and pricking me with the other half, thus causing burns to my right arm and to the entire right side of my body and to my legs.

This process of torture was the most unbearable that I suffered during that unhappy year. It gave you the feeling of a knife turning in your breast, close to the heart. I curled up like a worm, crying out like a madman.

To keep me from moving, they passed a chair under my arm, blocking me against the wall. They gagged me to keep the noise from the neighbours. I was suffocating. For moments they would stop and prod me with questions, warning "Talk or we go on."

De Bernonville was impassive. I begged him to have pity and I recited prayers. I could stand no more and I could see my moral and physical forces diminishing. I was in utter turmoil.

In my innermost thoughts, I asked heaven for the strength not to denounce my comrades. Fortunately, I fixed this aim in mind; I didn't mind dying, provided it could be right away. I tried to stop breathing to suffocate myself, but nature was too strong. How I wanted to faint in order not to see or feel.

The adjutant took his revolver, loaded it and told me he would count to ten, promising to kill me if I didn't speak. But these threats were not carried out.

These various tortures lasted all day with three-quarters of an hour of rest at noon and ended at seven o'clock at night. Then de Bernonville made me sign an admission which I had not even read I was so exhausted.

At night, when interrogation had been completed, de Bernonville told me I was a traitor and that it was a disgrace to work for England, that I had chosen my destiny badly and that, instead of having to face a firing squad, my fate would have been more glorious in working for the marshal, for France.

He told me that the June 6 landings on the shores of Normandy had been repulsed and, according to latest news, the enemy had been thrown back into the sea.

Amongst the enemy, of course, were a great number of Canadians.

He lectured me, saying the English, through their propaganda, had lost many young men like myself, and that if I were intelligent I would confide in him and he would do something for me.

I had the strength to reply that, since he called himself a true Frenchman, he should promise me at once not to turn me over to the Germans and I would undertake only to serve my penalty from the French. He acquiesced to my request, promising he would not deliver me to the boches. They took me then to prison, lodging me in a cell on the French side with French guards.

During the first night, I was sick many times. I was swollen, the skin of my thighs was in small cubes. I was unable to sit or lie down and I began to suffer terribly from my burns.

The guard of the French jail, M. Claustre, later said he had never seen a man in worse state enter the prison. He took it on his own responsibility the next morning to send for the prison doctor and to have me removed to hospital.

I could no longer open my mouth because of the fracture. My hands were completely dead and insensible. For a time it was even thought I would go mad.

On June 22, around six o'clock in the evening, I heard a guttural voice at the door of my cell and a militiaman turned me over to the gestapo, despite the promises of de Bernonville.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I finish this sentence? That is all I ask:

The Germans took me to gestapo headquarters, where I underwent a severe questioning with blows from a thick rubber strap. I must admit this questioning (by the Germans) was easier to undergo than by the milice.

I shall continue this later.

(Translation):

Mr. P. E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, it is fortunate for hon. members who support national unity that only the members of the C.C.F. party, fellow-travellers of communists in this country, approved the speech just made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart).

Besides giving us the opportunity to hear panegyrics or interesting criticisms of the government, the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne enables us—which is more important—to express the views of our constituents. It also gives us the opportunity to make known to those who administer the business of this country the feelings and ideas of the people of our respective constituencies on current matters.

I therefore wish to state that the men and women whom I have the honour to represent in the house ask only for peace and harmony so that they may enjoy family life and work quietly at expanding and developing the immense Saguenay district; that is why they are bent on defending and promoting by every means at their disposal the great cause of peace. Since they are extremely intelligent as well as patriotic, they are fully determined not to let the country be dragged into a third war that would bring in its wake nothing but misfortune. Our working people found the last one too costly: it caused too many tears, too many sorrows. Our people want no more such murderous adventures. To put it mildly, they regret the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to the effect that Canada could not remain neutral in any future military conflict, "even though 11,999,999 Canadians out of 12 million support a policy of neutrality." They commend the motion which the general convention of the St. John the Baptist Society of Montreal passed on November 21, 1948, censuring this provoking declaration which unequivocally discloses the intentions of the present Prime Minister.

Such an aggressive verbosity is evidence that here and now, no matter what happens, the future of our youth lies on the battlefields. Such is the intention of the government, just as it is the government that allows and tolerates this intensive and nefarious propaganda which, through the complicity of its supporters and newspapers, infiltrates into every home to cloud the minds and convince people that some day, perhaps very soon, we will again have to pick up our weapons in defence of Christianity and freedom.

The following is part of an article published on October 18, 1948, in Le Soleil, mouthpiece of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, under the headline "War Psychosis":

> We shudder to believe it, but already the dreadful threat of a third world war is taking shape. It must be admitted that the large American news agencies, main source of news for the world press, carry a heavy responsibility. By their morbid inclination towards exaggeration and the sensational, they have undoubtedly contributed to a war psychosis. Like all large dailies, Le Soleil relies on those big agencies for its news. It could not undertake to suppress harmful news nor, by itself, deprive them of the importance they are credited with elsewhere. However, it can call upon its readers to try to distinguish between fact and fiction, between reality and exaggeration, whenever they read about conflicts, crises, disputes and threats . . . One must not sink into the stupor of indifference. On the contrary, clear-mindedness is essential.
> If the United States and the U.S.S.R. are bent upon plunging the world into another hecatomb, there is nothing Canada can do to prevent them. The least we can do is to insist that our public men refrain from any provocative statement, from any utterance that might throw fuel upon the flames of discord. And if the world is to be set ablaze once again, then Canada must at least take part in the new massacre only within the limits of absolute necessity, dictated by considerations of national honour and national interests. On the other hand...

(Text):

In one of the last issues of New Liberty magazine I read:

> We are asked to believe that the Russians are always wrong, the Americans invariably right. We are asked, in fact, to stop thinking and to react only with our emotions. Objective reporting on the world struggle has become nonexistent in the free press of the west as it is in the controlled newspapers of the soviet union. By such devices we have been conditioned for war with Russia which millions of North Americans now regard as inevitable.

(Translation):

These soviet atheists and their bolshevik dictator, unblemished allies of the western democracies in their crusade against hitlerism, have suddenly become our enemies. This strange reversal of opinion prompted Le Devoir to write:

> In 1942, it was a crime to scoff at the Russians; today, it is a civic virtue to hate them. In 1942, Stalin was a great man; today, he is ambitious and unscrupulous. In 1942, Russian soldiers were fighting to free enslaved peoples; today, they are enslaving the peoples they have freed. In 1942, Mr. St. Laurent was prosecuting those who refused to collaborate with the Russians; today, he has those who co-operate with them sentenced to a penitentiary term.

What a tragi-comedy, what a shame and what an amazing lack of foresight on the part of those political leaders whose duty it was to foresee events and to govern accordingly. How naive and guileless they revealed themselves to be!

Today, in an effort to correct the unforgivable blunders committed during the past ten years, we are compelled to rearm. This year again, we will spend more hundreds of millions to equip our soldiers, our airmen and our sailors. We will pay with money the cost of this armaments race until the time comes when we will have to settle with the blood of our young men the warlike escapades of our leaders.

Let us therefore try to see clearly, and not imitate the toad who wanted to make itself as large as the ox. Let us keep a "sense of proportion", as Le Soleil writes in its October the 13th issue. It goes on to say:

> The Financial Post forecasts appropriations of more than half a billion dollars for defence purposes in the next fiscal year. It would not object if this huge credit were to be properly used, that is for the modernization of the country's defences. It is too much to expect from a government in which certain ministers talk nonsense, in Ottawa as well as in Paris. The Soleil points out the difference in tone between the latest utterances of a Mackenzie King and those of a Lionel Chevrier. The prime minister spoke of conciliation and peace, but instead of following that example, his colleague launched into a bellicose harangue against a country already made as the common foe. This comparison suffices to justify the opposition which is aroused by the vain bravado policy espoused by certain ministers. To calm their warlike ardour, the chief mouthpiece of financiers and businessmen in Ontario points out that Canada is quite unable to defend herself alone, that her role is to furnish foodstuffs and manufactured products to the defenders of democracy, and that the immobilization of her manpower in the army, navy and air force reduces her agricultural and industrial potential. It concludes that such a policy is detrimental to the aim sought, since it may hinder the capitalist cause. If British and American forces, with the co-operation of European democracies, cannot check the russo-communist alliance, our small army, our small navy and our 300 airplanes, will certainly not tip the scale on their side. The experience of the last war compels us to warn Canadian electors of the wastefulness in which a war administration would indulge at Ottawa. They would make all our resources available to the Anglo-American alliance, until the day of victory when the country would face difficulties tenfold those of today. If financiers feel the game rather dangerous, what will the heads of our families think?

In my opinion our political leaders, who dream of another slaughter, would think twice if we only applied to them the treatment suggested by the American minister to Portugal at the time of the attack on Pearl Harbor. Here is what he said to an American correspondent:

(Text):

The air is certainly full of tall talk from capitals all over the world. My guess is that if government leaders everywhere all knew that, in case of war, they would immediately lose their jobs, their power, their exciting living, the cheers of the people and the spotlight and three square meals a day, break off from everything, no more speeches or bows, leave home like drafted, ordinary folks and disappear and roll around namelessly in the mud, they would somehow, far enough in advance, work so hard to avoid war and insure peace that there would be no more wars.

(Translation):

For the good of humanity as a whole, the law of love of neighbour should prevail over the law of might; charity should replace hatred. As Saint-Exupéry wrote in Wind, Sand and Stars:

We are fellow-passengers on one and the same planet, a crew on one and the same ship. And if civilizations must clash in the furtherance of new developments, it is shameful that they should devour one another.

The united nations organization is powerless to guarantee peace and security in this world. It has become, in the eyes of those who follow its deliberations, an arena for virulent speeches, for inconsiderate challenges mouthed by politicians who seek to destroy one another.

The hon. Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs reminded us recently of this fact:

That body remains quite unable to provide the means by which any country can ensure its security.

And, as Mr. Churchill said last October:

(Text):

The assembly of the United Nations which we fondly hoped would be the majestic centre of world security . . . has been reduced to a mere cockpit in which the representatives of mighty nations and ancient states hurl reproaches, taunts and recriminations at one another to . . . prepare . . . for what seems to be a remorselessly approaching third world war . . .

(Translation):

That is not a surprising result, when one can see the representatives of the world's great powers attempt to settle problems which are beyond them without recourse to Him who inspires and guides the steps of each and every one of us, God, master of the universe. It is painful for Christians to read that:

(Text):

Meeting in Paris last week to draft a declaration on human rights, members of the U.N. social, humanitarian and cultural committee decided that it would be best to leave God out of Article I. After objections from the U.S.S.R. (as well as from Britain, China and India), Brazil withdrew its proposal to include the statement that "all human beings were created in the image and likeness of God."

(Translation):

What a disappointing and contemptible attitude on the part of delegates whose mission it is to establish the foundations of a just and lasting peace in accordance with principles of divine law. This fundamental error, this outrage of the creature against his Creator leaves one full of the gravest misgivings.

(Text):

It must be remembered that a man's ultimate security lies in his faith, in God and in himself, and if we substitute for that faith a dependence upon some outside human agency, the result is not an increase in security but a loss.

(Translation):

Great hopes had also been set on those provisions of the Dumbarton proposals which related to the preservation of peace and security.

Here is what Mr. Fernand Dehousse, professor at the university of Liège, and a Belgian delegate at the San Francisco conference has to say in this connection:

The whole working of the plan is dependent on the voting system in the security council, that is to say on the dreadful question of the veto. From that standpoint someone has said, ironically but not without justification, that the great powers would most likely often reach an agreement if it came to applying the sanctions to others, but that they would reserve the right to avoid them individually. In short, a single vote, be it cast by England, the United States, the U.S.S.R., China or France, can bring about the collapse of the whole machinery. The only wars prevented, the only aggressions repressed would, in the last analysis, be those of small states. On the other hand, the great powers would retain complete freedom. As can be seen, the Dumbarton plan has some value only inasmuch as the co-operation between the great powers can continue after the war, just as it has been maintained during the hostilities. Then peace would be assured. But if the great powers no longer agree, we may expect the worst happenings, the worst catastrophes.

Such is, Mr. Speaker, the predicament in which we find ourselves. Our foreign policy which until now has been patterned on that of London now seems to copy that of Washington. Perhaps should I say it is dictated by Washington. From the way our leaders behave, you would think we were born to be forever in the tow of someone.

When, to appear as important as our powerful neighbour, neutrality is claimed to be impossible, is it not forgetting that history has proven this a fallacy? What of the examples, in the last war, of such countries as Ireland, Portugal, Spain and Switzerland? The august words from the sermon on the mount "Blessed are the peacemakers" should be carved on the entrance of all legislative buildings in the world.

We do not want any more wars, nor do we want to be buried again under taxes as we have been before and after the war of 1939. It is too great a burden for the poor, the lowly, the mass of the people. They are tired of handing over part of their pay check to these gentlemen in Ottawa. They are weary of the endless fuss and forms inflicted on them by dominion government civil servants.

The Department of National Revenue has behaved and still behaves revoltingly toward the taxpayers of the country. Worthy fathers are deprived of the very part of their earnings they require to educate their children, to supply them with medical care, to build a house and buy all the commodities essential to anyone's happiness. In my constituency, the salaries of some workers have been iniquitously garnisheed. Employers, merchants, small grocers are, if at all possible, stripped of their smallest profits while goods are squandered. The people are living in a reign of terror. They are wondering whether tomorrow National Revenue inspectors will not invade their homes to relieve them of the few dollars they have left.

I submit that when the state levies such heavy taxes on the small incomes and savings of its subjects, it is laying hands on something that does not belong to it. The income tax act is anti-social, criminal both in origin and purpose. It is with such measures that unrest is created among the people, that elections are lost and that socialist and communist propaganda is fostered. To those responsible for Canada's destinies, I wish to say: Some day, you will have to account for your administration. Take care, for if ever our economic system is overthrown by a revolutionary movement on account of your accumulated mistakes, you will be among the first who will have to answer at the bar.

When taxes are too heavy, they have disastrous effects on savings. Now, as savings are absolutely necessary to make up the capital which fosters trade and industry, it follows that if they are discouraged, the original source of all undertakings is dangerously dried up. As His Holiness Pope Pius XII said to the members of the international congress of public finance:

For the sake of human conscience, do not destroy morals from the top. Refrain from legislation which, in spite of its brilliant technique, offends and hurts the people's appreciation of equity and inequity, or take small account of its vital strength, its rightful desire to reap the fruits of its own labour, its concern for domestic security, all of which considerations should come first and not last in the mind of the legislator.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was amazed the other day when those who disagree with him on centralization stated that the federal government is making the most of circumstances, and creates them if necessary in order to seize provincial rights as well as revenues. If it is prepared to forgo rent control, to leave to someone else a problem it has created but failed to solve, if the government is that careful not to encroach upon the powers given to the provinces by our constitution, why then, rather than announce in the speech from the throne the setting-up of a royal commission to look into the activities of certain bodies related to certain aspects of our national life, radio broadcasting for example, does it not withdraw from that field?

With the setting up of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission in 1932, the central government entered the field of education, which was explicitly allotted to the provinces. Through the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, they monopolize the waves, they secure the air, the better to drown the private radio stations.

In the report of the special committee instituted to inquire into the setting up of a Canadian broadcasting system, it is said that the evidence has confirmed the opinion of the committee as to "the great importance and advantages of an appropriate and well regulated broadcasting system for the whole of Canada as an instrument of education, guidance, religious and ordinary teaching, etc." And further on: "Our committee recommends moreover the establishment of a certain number of stations of 100 watts or less, operating on divided channels, located where it will be necessary for: (c) the needs of education." If the government are sincere when they protest that they are not centralists, then let them return to the provinces the rights of which they have deprived them. Let them refrain from violating, at every opportunity, the clauses of the British North America Act and let them mind what is exclusively their business.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I would like to add to my contribution to this debate, for the benefit of all concerned and with all due respect for my friends the newspapermen, a denial of the rumour which has been circulating from time to time in certain newspapers to the effect that I am about to change my political affiliations. Elected as an Independent, I shall remain so as long as it will please my electors, the very nice people of Chicoutimi.

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, when I rise to speak in this house and see you discharging your duties in a manner so dignified, a whole world of memories come to my mind. It is a pleasure to see the young pupil of the Séminaire de Québec, sprightly then as now, whom I met later as member for St. Mary in the legislature and who today so tactfully presides over our meetings.

Some hon. Members: Hear! Hear!

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the speech the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) has just delivered. I shall not attempt to dissect it although, as a physician, I should be prompted to do so. Rather have I chosen to dwell only on a single point of the speech from the throne, that relating to the national health plan initiated last year by the government and which is receiving support in all the provinces. Coming on top of provincial legislation, it is a plan which, to the great benefit of our people, has made possible the facilities now available in Canada in this field.

I shall deal with only one paragraph of the speech from the throne, because I wish to confine my remarks to the government's action in making certain sums available to the provinces for the conservation of national health. I wish to single out a special aspect of that general health program, and draw it to the attention of the house, the press and the public at large. The problem, whose importance federal and provincial authorities cannot fail to appreciate, must be solved fully and at once. Untiring and detailed efforts should be made to solve the problem, regardless of political advantages or disadvantages which might result, taking into account only the common welfare, in the conservation of our human resources.

In this respect my remarks will evince these same feelings and I hope that the house will keep that in mind to the end of my speech.

Think of all the politicians of every rank and political creed who have used human resources to foster their personal interests and those of their party. How many have failed and forgotten their promises!

The true politician prefers action to speech-making.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): In a talk he gave before the Montreal rotary club on February 8 last, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) tackled the problem of mental hygiene with determination; he suited the action to the word.

The statistical picture he drew of the heavy toll which mental deficiency or nervous disturbances levy on mankind ought to make all our people think twice. If we add to this the incalculable risks resulting from background and heredity, we must admit that for those who are free from political worries and realize what a heavy responsibility rests upon them as well as upon our leaders, it becomes an imperative duty to solve this problem.

Here are some of the figures supplied by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his talk before the Montreal rotary club on February 8.

In the course of a lifetime, one person out of ten suffers from emotional trouble of some sort; moreover, one out of ten needs hospitalization or psychiatric treatment.

The various degrees of mental illness range from mere emotional trouble to complete dis ruption of the intellectual faculty. Considered from this angle, mental and nervous diseases produce more sick people than cancer, poliomyelitis and tuberculosis. There are in the hospitals giving treatment for these diseases just as many patients as there are patients being treated elsewhere for any other illness, except tuberculosis. We have had as many as 50,000 people suffering from mental or nervous diseases in the hospitals of this country. During the five years following 1930, the number of such cases increased in Canada by 26 per cent.

Was this due to the depression? I cannot say for I did not carry my investigation far enough to say so definitely, but in any event, this increase occurred during the depression. However, during the five years that followed, the increase was reduced by one half and, from 1940 to 1946, it came down to 9 per cent, which is 2 per cent more than the general increase in population. A rather dismal picture, as you can readily see.

In clinics and in dispensaries where the public is admitted physicians report that four out of ten patients suffer from emotional or nervous disturbances.

It must not be forgotten—and it is here that the problem becomes most acute—that along with the generally recognized forms of mental ailments, there are the related problems of juvenile delinquency, drug addiction, chronic alcoholism, pathological disregard of law, suicide and divorce. Anybody who has any knowledge of these problems at all will recognize that this list reveals a serious condition in the emotional syndrome and perversion of the social sense.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that I frequently quote from the discussion by the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare. I must say that even though he is no doctor, he displays uncommon knowledge of the present situation and moves with amazing ease through the maze of statistics and tables that show the mental nervous ailments in this country. He is to be congratulated most warmly on this account.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): We have seen that mental ailments follow an alternately ascending and descending cycle. It is therefore easy to realize that a campaign, a crusade, against mental diseases is imperative in order to prevent the ascending cycle which is bound to reappear, should we not have a well planned policy or should we not be sufficiently aware of our responsibilities. The cost of operation of our mental hospitals is over $26 million a year; that is twice what it was in 1930. There are in Canada 43 such institutions with a capacity of from 300 to 6,000 patients.

The health policy prepared by the federal government on May 14, 1948 is a highly Canadian gesture. The grants to the provinces will, I hope, give a stimulus to the general health protection campaign which has already been launched. May I express the hope—and I call the minister's attention to this matter—that these grants will be put to good use without any thought of political expediency or political favours.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I, with many others, would be very disappointed if Canadians were forced to realize that their money is being used to protect the political advantages of one party or other, as has too often been the case in the enforcement of certain social statutes whose costs are partly paid by the dominion government and partly by the provincial governments. I have heard much talk in this house about abolishing the means test. Do not worry about it. In my province, it often disappears automatically, depending on the political colour.

However, I must pay a tribute to Mr. Forest, the chairman of the old age pensions commission in Quebec who, every time I sought to have a wrong righted, showed himself quite willing to make the necessary investigation and remedy the wrongs done by an over-zealous inspector. But I do not wish to wander too far away from the purpose I had in mind at the start. I note in the minister's lecture, from which I am drawing freely, that this year my province is to receive at least $1,140,000 as subsidies for the preservation of mental health. Subsidies for the building of hospitals have already been approved by the federal minister of health, thus making 2,400 new beds available to the public without forgetting that other projects for an additional 3,000 beds are now being considered.

I have here a list, supplied to me by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, showing the subsidies that will be given to the province of Quebec.

First, a subsidy for the building of hospitals has been granted to the Mont Providence medical-pedagogical institute, at Rivière des Prairies. That project relates to the building of a 1,269-bed hospital for children suffering from curable mental diseases. Under this project, the dominion subsidy would amount to $1,498,277.20.

There is another subsidy for mental hygiene. Two projects connected with the Quebec mental hygiene subsidy are now in the minister's office. One of them concerns the Psychological Institute of Three Rivers.

I may also mention subsidies for the fight against tuberculosis. On February 14, 1949, the following projects had been approved for the province of Quebec.

Project No. 1: Establishment of a new laboratory at the new St. Joseph de Montréal sanatorium. Amount provided, $50,630.

Projects Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5: Each of these projects relates to the purchase of a mobile diagnosis clinic for the purpose of making X-ray examinations in various constituencies.

I have the right to appreciate the advantages and the efficiency of this proposition because, as a doctor, I know that if it is worthwhile to build large hospitals to care for mental and tuberculosis cases, it is above all necessary to give to preventive medicine all the required attention. Indeed if we forget about prevention in the treatment of these diseases, whether mental or nervous, whether of tubercular, arthritic or other origin, sanatoriums must of necessity be provided, because cases increase rapidly.

As to the B.C.G. vaccine against tuberculosis, I understand that often doctors do not take an innovation for granted. You probably remember the fight which took place when Pasteur put on the market his anti-rabic serum and when Dr. Roux introduced his antidiphtheric serum.

I know that many doctors have perhaps not paid the required attention to the B.C.G. vaccine but I believe the people appreciate this vaccine and that vaccination, as far as prevention is concerned, will bring relief to babies who, some day, will grow up and thus be protected against tuberculosis.

I also congratulate the hon. minister for providing grants that will allow doctors to carry on research work on B.C.G. vaccination.

Project 9 provides a grant for the purchase of scientific apparatus for the Sacred Heart hospital of Cartierville. The project, amounting to $57,636.80, was approved on January 10th.

There is another project similar to that of the Gaspe sanatorium for which the government is to provide a grant of $94,788.03.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I must underline the fact that the hon. minister will have to pay particular attention to the spending of those grants of the federal government to the provinces.

Although I do not wish to impute ill intent to any of the provincial governments, I feel my misgivings are not altogether groundless for I know from experience that too often while federal grants for the building of provincial hospitals were indeed used for that purpose, at the same time they served the interests of friends of the government who were awarded contracts without tenders being called.

I read in Le Soleil of February 10th of this year that streptomycin is to be distributed free in the Quebec sanatoriums.

I congratulate the minister. Foremost tuberculosis specialists recognize that although not a cure-all streptomycin is yet the most efficacious drug for the treatment of tuberculosis. I have seen patients at the Mont Joli sanatorium whose recovery has amazed great specialists, including Drs. Couillard and Herman Gauthier.

I congratulate the minister who has made streptomycin available free of charge and I hope that it will be used advisedly.

I now come to a critical point, Mr. Speaker. I spoke a moment ago of mental hygiene and of prevention. As far as the prevention of mental diseases is concerned, I must say that all provincial authorities and temperance societies—I need not mention them by name because they are known to hon. members—will have to launch a very active campaign to stem the tide of alcoholism, which spreads night and day in the province of Quebec, to the full knowledge of the attorney general of the province.

I am dealing with a moral rather than a political matter.

I am not doing so to discredit my province, to sling mud in her face, as some of our opponents will claim after having heard or read my speech, but because I know that human assets are endangered and that mental diseases, nervous disturbances and those ailments due to heredity and atavism will keep on increasing if we continue to keep a portion of our people in a state of drunkenness, as is done at the present time in my province.

It is startling to read, in the report of the Sacred Heart leagues of Montreal, how many liquor stores, grills, restaurants and hotels operate with so-called permits that carry no number, or else, in the name of that famous tolerance to which some people in Quebec are so partial, they serve liquor to all and sundry. I have traveled all over my province long enough to see with my own eyes beer and hard liquor served to children of 13, 14, 15 and 16 years of age. As proof of my assertions, I refer the house to the report of the Sacred Heart leagues. Their campaign, however, has not been carried far enough; they ought to pursue their patriotic efforts, even in the face of retaliation. I urge our own Cercle Lacordaire and the Cercle Jeanne-d'Arc as well as the St. John the Baptist Society and all other influential groups to put an end to this infamous tolerance shown intoxicating liquor in my province. I even maintain, Mr. Speaker, that alcoholism can, more than any other evil, spread the havoc caused among our people by mental deficiency and nervous disturbances.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): In support of this contention I will quote some eminently qualified authorities. Here is what a French specialist says: You will note that I am not quoting a Canadian one since I have no wish of being accused of choosing the best in order to plead the case of our young people.

Dr. Monin, who was secretary of the comity of hygiene, in France—this goes back to pre-1900 days—says this:

> The truest word ever uttered on this subject remains perhaps that of Bucknill: "The drunkard drinks because he is insane. He is insane because he drinks."

Dr. Monin adds:

> Alcohol is a major factor in criminality. The investigations carried out by Mr. Yvernès show that the first principle violated by the drunk man is the respect of officials. Then come insults to policemen, destruction of trees, plants, fences, gross indecency, assault and battery, seditious cries, conditional threats, manslaughter through criminal negligence, arson . . .
>
> A tenth of all murders result from bar-room brawls. Of one hundred divorces granted in Denmark twenty-four are granted on grounds of drunkenness (Magnus Hüss).

Dr. Monin says further on:

> In the corner of each brain, used to say Moreau (of Tours), madness lies dormant; the main thing is not to bring it to life.

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

And to show you, Mr. Speaker, that alcohol is a powerful destroying agent, it affects even the bees. As a matter of fact, the bees that feed on a plant on which a few drops of alcohol have been poured become indolent, lazy and, as we say today, go on a sit-down strike and stop producing honey. I tell you all this to show the damage alcohol can cause even to animals. Mr. Speaker, I have given numerous testimonials of experts of renown on the damage caused by alcohol. The research of eminent physiologists all show—and this is for those who claim that alcohol is a necessary stimulant—that even the purest alcohol cannot be a useful source of strength, for it is extremely injurious to the protoplasma. It therefore diminishes and exhausts productivity, despite misleading appearance of exhilaration, and the disappearance of fatigue, which might lead one to believe that new strength is achieved. Alcohol thus promptly consumes our reserve energy and lowers our physical and mental activity. Therefore, to repeat the words of Koppe "to use alcohol is to abuse of it". It soon ends by dulling the intellect of the one who is weak enough to be attracted by its deadly mirage.

And now, bearing in mind the grants that the minister of national health is about to give my province for the building of hospitals, especially those for persons suffering from mental or nervous disorders, I ask him how can such grants be expected to serve a useful purpose, if people continue to dull the minds of our population, especially of our youth?

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I have no political aim in speaking thus. But as a doctor I would ask everybody—to use a term often used here—to rise as one man, to arouse public opinion and to order the authorities in my province to stop showing such a lack of seriousness which would surely end by the population of my province being thrown into an unavoidable state of mental weakness.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Of course it is preferable that the sale of spirituous liquors be controlled if liquor stores are absolutely necessary, but it should not be made a political question for the purpose of swelling electoral funds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): And if there is an occasion when the manpower question should be discussed, it is surely when the danger of alcohol with regard to mental and nervous diseases, to say nothing of tuberculosis, is being pointed out. Indeed, many eminent British physicians have shown that, in the case of tavern frequenters, the larger number of tuberculosis victims were among the waiters rather than among the patrons, because, as everyone knows, those places are often quite contaminated through the lack of cleanliness.

More can be said, Mr. Speaker. I have mentioned tolerance, which I have called "accursed tolerance". As a matter of fact, there are "flying bars", not to say "rolling bars". That, in my opinion, is going rather far in generalizing the sale of liquor among young people. I have not seen that myself, but it has been observed by Father Arsenault of St. Camille, who wrote to l'Action Catholique on May 17, 1948, a letter in which he mentions the "rolling bars" which are seen everywhere.

I want it to be understood that I am speaking not as the member for Portneuf, but as a physician anxious to protect our manpower, the Canadian youth and the people at large against those who are not thoughtful enough to be conscious of their responsibility.

It will surely be said that I am flinging mud at my province, that I am throwing discredit on it, but it should not be forgotten that Quebec is not the only province which consumes alcoholic beverages. Ontario also is consuming some. As a matter of fact, I have here figures from the Toronto Daily Star of June 26, 1947, where one can read the following headlines: Third of Canada Booze Down Ontario Throats.

I will give you comparative figures for the provinces of Ontario and Quebec: "Spirits", the strongest spirits—

An hon. Member: And often the best—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): The spirits which are sought in the bottom of a bottle and evaporate so rapidly. I quote:

Ontario, 2,661,034 gallons; Quebec, 2,014,039 gallons.

Mr. Gagnon: Well, the situation is better in Quebec.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): The cost of this liquor in Ontario was $58,471,888, and in Quebec, $46,268,384. All this to poison our youth and that of Ontario.

Mr. Lalonde: It is worse than war.

Mr. Langlois: Yes, and they talk about taxes.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Yes, and they talk about taxes. I could give you, for wine and beer, figures which are very similar in both provinces.

(Text):

The other day the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) spoke about prejudices having been stirred up in the by-election in Nicolet-Yamaska. I have always thought that the stirring up of prejudices in any election works both ways. For the benefit of my English colleagues, I shall cite an example. Do you know what those who do not favour the Prime Minister's policies are saying in order to get the favour of the public? During the by-election in Nicolet-Yamaska one man spoke at Gentilly in broad English accents in order to mock the Prime Minister. Do you know why? Because in Quebec they are trying to depreciate the Prime Minister by making the population believe he is English through and through. It works both ways.

Mr. Graydon: Do not blame me; he is part Irish.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): We have been accused of furthering prejudices. Every time the Prime Minister's name is mentioned, it is pronounced "Louis Stephen St. Laurent". The purpose of this is to make the people believe he is more English than French.

I have the shorthand notes of a speech in which the speaker said that Mr. St. Laurent was no more a French-Canadian than the leader of the opposition. It was admitted he was a great lawyer in good standing. It was said he was earning over $60,000 a year before coming to this house. Your friends said that. They said he was born of an English mother; that he was born in an English county and educated in English institutions. It was said that he graduated from McGill. Your friends said those things during the course of the Nicolet-Yamaska by-election. They were trying to depreciate the Prime Minister and make the population believe he is too much of an Englishman to be supported by French-Canadians in Quebec.

My last word, Mr. Speaker, is a word of warning to everyone in this house who wants to say a few words about communism. I would especially ask the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), who made a good speech on communism yesterday, and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), to remember that what they said is not in line with what the attorney general of Quebec wishes, because the other day he gave a warning to the press. He asked the press not to speak of communism because they were giving communists too much publicity. He would rather have the chance to put a padlock on some communist school or place of propaganda every time there is a general election or by-election. That is what the padlock law is used for in Quebec. There are still many communist schools in Quebec. They still exist in Quebec in spite of the padlock law. The padlock law should not be used as a means of political advantage for anybody.

If we want to stop communism let us know something about it. I was in the house in 1937 and I made a speech on communism. I spoke about the organization of communist cells and I saw many hon. members with broad smiles on their faces twelve years ago because I was afraid of communism. The danger that was near at that time is now here. We will not combat communism with a padlock law which is used only for political purposes. We do not combat communism in that way. It is not economic conditions which give birth to communism. It is because our economic and philosophical programs have forgotten something, namely, that man is made in the image of God, his creator. They have used man as an economic tool, forgetting his intellect, his soul and his heart. That is the trouble with our generation. If you want to know more I ask you to read the book "Communism and Conscience of the West" by Monsignor Sheen, and the "Philosophy of Religion" by the same author. If you read those books you will find many clear explanations of what is the trouble with our civilization. Let us not throw stones at each other about communism. Let us not state that communism has spread during the Liberal administration in our country. Communism is not due to any economic condition. It is used as an occasion to spread communism. The source of communism is religious. They have replaced Christianity itself with the communist religion. They have replaced the apostle with the pictures of Stalin, Molotov and all the others. They have tried to put inside the soul, the heart and the mind of the Russians that very communist religion. Believe me, it will not last forever. As Monsignor Sheen said, some day religion will come back to earth and communism will disappear. But if we want communism to disappear, let us first know something about it. Let us go back to the right way. Let us not try to throw stones at each other. Let us try to enact laws which will prevent communism from having any part in the administration of our economic and social life. That is the only way to stop it.

Mr. N. J. M. Lockhart (Lincoln): I shall not comment particularly on the remarks made in English by the last speaker, although I followed them with considerable interest. The matter with which he dealt is an important one, and it behooves all of us to attempt to learn something more of the situation as it exists in Canada.

I shall endeavour to avoid repetition as much as possible and attempt to make my few remarks a reflection of the opinions and sentiments which are expressed by the persons who live within the riding I represent, the riding of Lincoln. I feel that that is the honest endeavour of practically all hon. members. Sometimes prejudices arise, but for the most part that is the honest intention of most hon. members who speak on the address.

First I wish to say that I associate myself with every word uttered by my leader on this subject that was covered in the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. My leader outlined to this house in as clear terms as it could possibly be outlined the menace that communism is to this country. He outlined its origin, dating back a long time, and the unjust and unfair practices which are being followed to try to stamp out our way of life.

In my own district some of the larger and more influential unions had become dominated, as is true in many other places, by persons holding communistic views. I am glad to say that in my own area one by one the larger union groups are gradually throwing off the domination which has been so prevalent in the last three or four years. That is true in other areas too. I can truthfully say that in the larger union groups in my district employer and employee are now sitting down and discussing their problems with a fuller understanding than was ever accomplished during the time when those communistically inclined were in charge of these union groups. Having said that much about this influence that is rampant throughout the country, the influence of an ideology which is ruining the greater part of Europe, I should like now to turn to a more specific reflection of the views held by my own people respecting subjects which come closer to us.

My people are asking when there may be relief from taxes such as the gas tax—and I am referring to fuel gas—the tax on electricity, on radio, on telephones, the 25 per cent luxury tax which is so unfair when applied against young couples who are starting out in life together. Then, we have the travel tax which has caused considerable comment in my area. Many people have spoken to me about it. That was an effort during the war to raise revenue and, at the same time, to curtail travel. We have a travel bureau here in Ottawa which is spending large sums of money trying to induce people to travel while, at the same time, we have this large tax imposed upon travel, having the effect of curtailing it, as it was curtailed during the years of war.

It seems to me that this is most inconsistent, and it is certainly viewed in that way by many people in my constituency who have spoken to me in the matter. Then we come down to the heavy income tax schedules. As must have been expected, reference is often made to the odd billion or more of surplus floating around in the hands of the government; and it is considered that at this time it is most unfair to take that amount of money away from the people.

Only a week or two ago one point in particular was brought forcibly to my attention. I refer to it at this time because in it there is reference to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) who, I am sorry to say, is not in his seat. A few days ago I was in conversation with a chap who is in the permanent air force, and he proceeded to lodge some of his complaints, and to give his reasons for them. I should think it would be most interesting if the Minister of National Defence at this time when, if all reports are true, enlistments are not very encouraging, could have listened to the story told to me by this younger brother in a family which has a most enviable military record in the service of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

The young man told me that, as I recall it, at the airport in Ottawa his group were addressed not long ago by the Minister of National Defence. I was told by the young man the minister had said that he was doing his best to do away with the income tax as it affected young men in the permanent air force.

Following that speech the young man returned to his home and, while there, told of the minister's address to the permanent force. In that same home were two other brothers who had served overseas with distinction. One of them had been shot down, although fortunately he had escaped serious injury. Those two brothers who had served in the Royal Canadian Air Force proceeded to place before their younger brother the true picture, and to tell him what he might expect.

If the minister continues to promote enlistments among those younger men who are becoming eligible for enlistment, men who may have older brothers who have had experience in the forces, he will find that his problem is a difficult one. The younger brother told me that his brothers had told him what they had been told overseas with respect to housing—that every man was to have a job and a house to live in when he got home. The younger brother told me however that one of his older brothers was still without a home, despite the fact that he had been slightly injured overseas. A pension of $12.50 had been awarded him. He was boarded six times within a year and a half, at the conclusion of which his pension had been reduced to $2.50.

That is the sort of thing these young men are talking about; and I say the minister must cure some of the evils before he can expect to get the response for which he is hoping in respect of enlistments in the permanent forces.

At the same time I was told that one of the brothers had served nearly five years in a heavy artillery unit of the army. The claim is now made that he is not pensionable, owing to the discovery by some medical doctors of what is alleged to be a pre-enlistment condition. This ex-soldier is faced with the necessity of having to fight for his rights to obtain some type of pension.

These are the things which the younger men, those who would be eligible for enlistment, are complaining about. They have learned a good deal from their older brothers who have had experience. Then, I am asked about the setting up of the committee on veterans affairs. These veterans cannot understand why the government does not recognize the many problems which should be considered at this time. I should hope the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) would give some opportunity for a general review of the many problems connected with veterans affairs.

Then finally, Mr. Speaker, we come to the question of housing. It was almost pathetic to hear what this young man had to say in that regard. He spoke of a soldier boy with one child who had tried to get one of the wartime houses.

I called upon what is now the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at least a dozen times on behalf of a chap who is living in one room with one child up on the third story. I do not blame the local administrator, because he is just a chief clerk who is doing the best he can. He told me that he could not give that man a house unless he had at least two children. It seems too bad that a young man with only one child cannot be provided with one of these wartime houses when he was told overseas in most emphatic terms that the housing problem would be taken care of for him when he got home.

In this particular case I told the young man to go down to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to get one of the one hundred and two houses that had been built on what we call the Westchester avenue cut. He took my advice and made application for a house, but he could not get one because he is a pieceworker and was not considered to have employment of a permanent nature. These houses are rented at $42 per month, but before he could get one he would have to be engaged in the category of employment that would make him practically an annual asset. I could not believe it, but I checked and found that it was practically true.

I submit that the government is not doing its duty to the returned man. Aside from the inconsistencies that have developed in pension rights and the like, the first duty of the government is to provide them with homes.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is developing something in the constituency of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to which I strongly object. A couple of weeks ago I saw a development that has been started outside of Niagara Falls, at a point which seemed to me to be miles from civilization. I would say that about one hundred houses have been erected all cut from the one die; there is not a particle of difference in any one of them. They are small homes on forty-foot lots. Apparently Central Mortgage is still adhering to the forty-foot lot.

The roadways are made up of a few loads of stone scattered over the mud. I saw a mother with one child of two holding her hand and another baby in a go-cart having to take a most circuitous route in order to get to the main road. She had to walk three-quarters of a mile at least. I say that that kind of thing is not good enough for our returned men. I hope the Minister of Labour will check this up and I shall be glad to give him all the information I have.

It is time that something was done that would have a better influence for good among the men who fought for us during the past war. If the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) would listen to some of these stories—I am sure many hon. members have heard similar stories—he would understand why his enlistment program has not reached the point that many of us thought it would.

I come now to another matter which I should like to impress upon the government. The other day an hon. member referred to unemployment in Vancouver. Our socialist friends to the left were complaining bitterly about the many thousands of unemployed. There is one thing I should like to lay definitely on the doorstep of the government. I know just what transpired. During the war people were coaxed, and I say that advisedly, to leave small villages and rural areas to move into urban centres in order to produce munitions. Houses were built for them. In my own city some six or seven hundred so-called wartime houses were erected.

When the war ended those people refused to move back to the farm. The result is that we are short of butter, bacon and cheese and we hear the agitation for margarine. The wheel goes around and around. The government has fallen down in this matter. If it could induce people to move into the larger centres like Vancouver, Hamilton, Toronto and Montreal and provide them with housing, it is the government's responsibility when they have control of everything else to see that those people move back to the environment from which they came. That may be a broad statement to make, but the municipalities should not be imposed upon without some consideration and help.

It is not fair to try to coax masses of people into urban centres and then leave them there to be a direct responsibility of the municipalities. I strongly condemn the government for its failure in this respect. We are bringing in people with an agricultural turn of mind to go onto these vacant farms. There are many vacant houses out in the wide open spaces. Even in my own thickly populated area there are many houses available on the back concessions. These places are being occupied by displaced persons and other people who have been brought in.

I asked a question today about television, but I had a brush-off. That may be all right, as we are used to it, but I want to say a word more about this matter. Somebody has said that unemployment is growing. I am not so sure it is not, but I notice that the United States government is laying a cable to link fourteen major cities from New York to St. Louis in a television network. I read in this publication that there are more than 300 applications. As a matter of fact, it says that perhaps 400 are pending. There is a very interesting picture in one of the magazines. An enthusiastic purveyor of ice cream, soft drinks, sandwiches, candy, and so forth, has installed a television hook-up right in his place of business. The picture shows upwards of seventy-five children sitting in an orderly fashion drinking soft drinks, Coca-Cola, and drinks of that kind, others eating ice cream cones, and all apparently watching the television pictures that are being thrown on the screen. The man was interviewed as to why he did this, and he said that he was convinced that we have to do something to keep the children off the streets.

I suggest that, if the country to the south of us is going after television in a big way, it is time for the government to make some announcement and let the people know whether we are or are not interested in this most enticing development, perhaps one of the greatest that this country has ever seen. I am told that at the present time there are 16,000 receiving sets being made per week in the United States. I have talked to radio men in my own home city, and they say that they are cancelling orders for radios simply because they think the public are beginning to feel that television is just about to break. They do not want to buy machines that may become obsolete in a very short time.

I mention this matter to the government because it is a common topic among many people, and I say it is high time that the government paid a little more attention to it. I can assure the government that it is a very moot question in my own particular area because we are close to the border. There are many views that one might express, but I said at the outset that I was attempting to reflect in a small way some of the things that appear to be worrying people in my own constituency. My people say that while they put up with controls without much protest during the war, four years afterwards they find that there is a great army of snoopers, as my leader called them, and that is what a lot of them are. They feel that it is about time something was done to curtail that type of thing, and to reduce the cost of government, especially when we have floating around in the hands of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), as I said before, an odd billion or more which has been taken from the people unjustly. In attempting to show some reason why their circumstances are not just as they ought to be, I have pointed out that they are given the brush-off by controllers, by men in high places not responsible to parliament. I say it is high time that the government assumed their responsibility to a greater extent than they have.

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I must confess that I intend to discuss a number of subjects in view of the latitude given to hon. members in this debate. I intend to discuss matters pertaining particularly to my own constituency and, as a matter of fact, to the people of Canada as a whole. The speech from the throne was disappointing in many ways, at least to me. One way in which it is disappointing is the fact that no mention was made of irrigation. Not one word was said about supplying water on our western plains.

I have spoken in every debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne since I have been in the house, and I offer no apology for again devoting my time to a further discussion of the possibilities of irrigation for southeastern Alberta. The development or irrigation perhaps means more to the city of Medicine Hat than to any other community in Canada.

I must congratulate the mover of the address, the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown). When he finished his speech I felt that I knew Essex West, and that I knew Windsor. Some members may think that it is bad taste to always discuss the problems of one's own constituency, but until those problems are solved I think that we are forced to do so. While I shall not attempt to duplicate what the hon. member for Essex West said, I shall certainly do the best I can to give the members of the house a few details about my constituency. Speaking of irrigation, I must mention at the outset that in my constituency we have some irrigation projects and we have areas which it is impossible to irrigate. First of all I want to mention the Taber area south and west of Medicine Hat. It is one of the best areas in western Canada, and the farmers specialize in the growing of sugar beets and many other field crops. A new factory is being built at Taber which will take care of the production in that district by 1950. They go in for diversified farming, raising stock and feeding them on the pulp from the sugar beets. In driving through the district surrounding Medicine Hat, and on west, one cannot help noticing the difference in the climate as soon as you get to an irrigation district. The air is entirely different; you think you are in a different climate.

Then we have the eastern irrigation district at Brooks, the largest in Canada, where they have 170,000 acres under irrigation. That is "where water works wonders." I think that is a wonderful slogan, and it certainly is true. They do not have a sugar beet factory in that area but go in for the raising of many other crops. Just to mention a few, they raise canning crops, field vegetables, root crops, vegetable seeds, tree and small fruits, field crops and many others. I might also mention that the Canadian championship for barley was won by Mr. Thomas E. Brown, who comes from Cassils. Many other records also could be mentioned coming from the eastern irrigation district, but I need not take time to do so. In passing, however, I think I should mention the pheasant shooting in that area. The Brooks area without a doubt is one of the finest pheasant-hunting districts in Canada. Sportsmen come all the way from eastern Canada to shoot pheasants there.

As you go further west you come to the western irrigation district at Strathmore, which comes down to Cluny and Gleichen, another prosperous area through which it is a pleasure to drive. That was especially so last summer, when they had wonderful crops in that district, just showing what irrigation can do for a country. The rainfall seems to become more abundant as water is spread over the land and more trees are planted.
