The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house having returned to the Commons chamber:

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The first concern of government in world affairs is to ensure peace and security. To this end, Canada continues to support the principles of the united nations charter. Our foreign policy is based on the realities and dangers of the existing situation. One of these is the communist menace. Until the united nations are able to provide an adequate guarantee of peace and security, peace-loving nations will also be obliged to seek security by combining their strength. The North Atlantic nations, including Canada, are negotiating a security pact. The treaty when concluded will be laid before you for approval. The North Atlantic treaty will supplement the treaty of mutual guarantee signed by the western European nations at Brussels last year. Such regional arrangements are provided for in the united nations charter.

Despite unsettled conditions and the disruptive activities of international communism, the nations of western Europe are making progress toward recovery. Aid from North America is contributing substantially to the restoration of economic activity, thereby increasing their ability to resist internal and external aggression.

At home we have been blessed with good crops. Industrial expansion is taking place at an unprecedented rate. There have been few differences between employers and employees leading to stoppages in work. Inflationary pressures are less pronounced. Employment is at higher levels than ever before. In striking contrast with communist countries, the free economy of our country is demonstrating its ability to provide for all a high standard of living, social justice and individual freedom. It is the view of my ministers that a steady advance toward the goal of social justice for all is an effective safeguard against the influence of subversive doctrines.

The people of Newfoundland, by a majority vote in a referendum, expressed their desire to enter confederation. The precise terms of union were subsequently negotiated with an authorized delegation from Newfoundland. You will be asked without delay to approve the agreement, signed on December 11, and to make provision for the entry of Newfoundland as a province of Canada on March 31. I am confident the union will be of mutual advantage to Newfoundland and Canada.

Amendments to the Supreme Court Act to make the Supreme Court of Canada the court of last resort for Canada will be submitted for your consideration.

You will be asked to approve, subject to the approval of the United States authorities, the agreement concluded in 1941 for the development of navigation and power in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin.

You will be asked to make the further legislative provision necessary to implement the agreements for the sale of agricultural products to the United Kingdom.

With a view to assisting in the restoration of world trade, so vital to general security and our own prosperity, Canada participated in formulating the charter for the international trade organization and the general agreement on tariffs and trade, which will be submitted for your approval. Within the next few months Canada will engage in further negotiations with thirteen other countries to broaden the scope of the tariff concessions which we obtained at Geneva in 1947. The government will continue to press vigorously for the lowering of tariff and other barriers and, as quickly as possible, the expansion of trade on a multilateral basis.

Meanwhile the government is seeking to remove specific obstacles to the continued sales of Canadian products in our traditional export markets, and to that end is co-operating closely with the nations concerned in the implementation of the European recovery program.

The continuing committee established by the governments of Canada and the United Kingdom to review the progress of trade between the two countries is presently meeting in London.

In the interests of both domestic and foreign trade, legislation will be introduced with the object of promoting extensive and adequately safeguarded use of the national trade mark "Canada Standard" associated with goods which conform to prescribed standards, and of requiring proper labelling of goods to prevent deception of the public.

Improvement in our United States dollar position has resulted in the removal of certain restrictions imposed in November, 1947. Further restrictions will be removed as the position improves. So long as trading and financial conditions remain unstable, a degree of control over foreign exchange will be required. You will, accordingly, be asked to extend the Foreign Exchange Control Act for a further period.

The report of the royal commission on prices will be laid before you as soon as it has been submitted to the government.

Your approval will also be sought for legislation to continue in force steel control and a limited number of price controls, including control over the rental of housing accommodation.

You will be asked to make legislative provision for governmental assistance by loan to the producers of basic steel for the purpose of increasing production.

The governments of the provinces have been advised that the federal government is prepared to discontinue rent control in any province in which the government expresses the desire to assume the jurisdiction.

The provision of housing has received and continues to receive close attention. More new housing units were provided during the last calendar year than ever before.

Your approval will be sought for the establishment of a department of reconstruction and development to continue the functions now vested in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, including the ministerial responsibility for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

A measure for assistance in the provision of a transcontinental highway will also be laid before you.

A royal commission has been appointed to inquire into and report upon all questions of economic policy within the jurisdiction of parliament arising out of the operation and maintenance of national transportation. Together with the findings of the investigation by the board of transport commissioners, the report of the royal commission should furnish parliament and the government with the basis for a sound transportation policy.

The national health program, inaugurated by the government last year, is receiving co-operation from all the provinces. In supplementing provincial health measures, the program has already made a contribution to the health facilities of Canada and will thereby bring increasing benefit to our people.

A bill will be introduced to broaden the scope of the Family Allowances Act, as a further instalment of the policy of the government to provide a national standard of social security and human welfare designed to assure the greatest possible measure of social justice for all Canadians.

The organization of the armed forces to provide for unification and co-ordination has been pressed forward. Steady progress has been made in the recruitment and training of officers and men of the active and reserve forces, so that the navy, army and air force may be in a position to meet the defence needs of Canada as these may change from time to time.

Conditions of service in the armed forces are being further improved, and as rapidly as the results of research can be adequately tested, additional equipment is being made available. Amendments to existing legislation with respect to the armed forces will be recommended for your consideration.

Other measures to which your attention will be directed include bills respecting forest conservation, overseas telecommunications, the control and regulation of interprovincial and international pipe lines, and assistance for the Canadian shipbuilding industry. Your approval will be sought for measures to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

It is the view of my ministers that there should be an examination of the activities of agencies of the federal government relating to radio, films, television, the encouragement of arts and sciences, research, the preservation of our national records, a national library, museums, exhibitions, relations in these fields with international organizations, and activities generally which are designed to enrich our national life, and to increase our own consciousness of our national heritage and knowledge of Canada abroad. For this purpose, the government intends at an early date to establish a royal commission.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to make the customary provision for essential services.

Prosperous conditions now prevailing are being reflected in the buoyant level of national revenues; a condition to which due consideration is being given by my ministers in the preparation of forthcoming budgetary proposals.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The birth of a son to Their Royal Highnesses Princess Elizabeth and the Duke of Edinburgh has been the occasion of widespread rejoicing. Happiness over the birth of the Royal Prince has been tempered by regret over the indisposition of His Majesty the King. The people of Canada hope and pray for the complete recovery of the King's health.

Since the close of your last session, Mr. Mackenzie King has retired as Prime Minister. I feel it is the hope of all Canadians that Mr. King will be spared, over a long period and with less exacting responsibilities, to continue his distinguished and devoted service to Canada and the free world.

May Divine Providence bless your deliberations.

THE MINISTRY

RETIREMENT OF MR. MACKENZIE KING AS PRIME MINISTER—PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this opening day of the fifth session of the twentieth parliament is one of rather more than usual significance. Since the last session of parliament, the right hon. the member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) has retired as Prime Minister of Canada. For over twenty-one years he was the king's first minister in Ottawa. For a longer period than any other man he has been the elected head of a free people. For twenty-nine years he was the leader of one of our great national political parties, a party which, under his leadership, constantly remained national both in its policies and in its membership. Before that, Mr. King was successively a distinguished member of the Canadian civil service, a member of parliament, and, in the ministry of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Canada's first minister of labour.

The record of his public service to Canada, to the British commonwealth and to the free world is indeed an enviable one. He has played an unrivalled part in the forward march of Canada since the very beginning of this century. I think all will agree that his services make him one of the great Canadians of all time. The right hon. gentleman has been closely associated with so many matters of consequence to our country and to the world that it would take a good long book to set out his record of achievements. Nevertheless for just a moment I should like to mention three or four highlights of this remarkable career.

When we in Canada think of labour relations or the settlement of industrial disputes, we are reminded of the large part played by Mr. King in the drafting of the first labour legislation in Canada. In the field of social security his efforts will not be forgotten. Virtually every measure of social legislation on the federal statute books was put there under his leadership. During the grim years of war Mr. King was at the head of the government of a country whose war effort was magnificent. In war and peace he strove to bring the Canadian people to work together in unity; and while he was Prime Minister, Canada can be said to have reached full nationhood. Mr. King's life has been devoted to public affairs. He has spent his days and years in the promotion of peace and good will in domestic and in international relations. I think all hon. members will agree that there is no higher calling, no calling more worthy of the encomiums of a man's fellow citizens.

Now because of the hon. gentleman's many years of service and because of the stresses and strains brought about by the war he has felt it necessary to retire from the leadership of his party and the office of Prime Minister. We know it cannot but be distressing to Mr. King to give up so active a life. On the other hand I am sure his new freedom and relaxation will give him considerable enjoyment. While we regret that Mr. King will be taking a less active part in public affairs, I think all hon. members of the house will be glad that he is still with us in this company of the elected representatives of the Canadian people. I feel I am expressing the feelings not only of the members of this party but of members on all sides of the house and of Canadians everywhere when I say to the right hon. gentleman that we wish him health and happiness. We hope he will be spared to continue, under less arduous conditions, his many years of distinguished and devoted service to Canada and to the free world.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to repeat in French what I have just said in English about the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King); however, I do wish to state that in speaking those words in English I am none the less expressing the sincere feelings of hon. members whose mother tongue is French.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, since the end of last session there have been the following changes in the ministry:

On September 10 I resigned the portfolio of Secretary of State for External Affairs, and on the same date Hon. L. B. Pearson was appointed to that department. On November 15 Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King resigned as Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council of Canada. I resigned as Minister of Justice and was appointed to the office of President of the Privy Council of Canada. Right Hon. C. D. Howe resigned as Minister of Reconstruction and Supply on November 15, 1948, and on the same date Hon. Robert H. Winters was appointed to that portfolio. On the same date Hon. Stuart S. Garson was appointed to the Department of Justice.

I now table the relevant orders in council passed in connection with those appointments.

There have been some changes also in the posts of parliamentary assistants. On November 15 Mr. W. E. Harris resigned as parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and on the same date was appointed parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council. Mr. McIlraith, member for Ottawa West, resigned as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, retaining the post of parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Mr. Robert H. Winters, as he then was, resigned as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport. On January 19 Mr. Hugues Lapointe, the hon. member for Lotbiniere, resigned as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, and on the same date was appointed parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On January 19 Mr. J. A. Blanchette was appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, as was also Mr. L. E. Baker, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare. On the same date Mr. James Sinclair, the member for Vancouver North, was appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. On January 25 Mr. Ralph Maybank, the member for Winnipeg South Centre, resigned as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and was appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Mines and Resources. Mr. Thomas Reid, member for New Westminster, resigned as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Revenue and was appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I now table the orders in council relevant to the appointments I have just mentioned.

CHANGES IN MEMBERSHIP

RETIREMENT OF MR. BRACKEN AS LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION—WELCOME TO NEW MEMBERS —THE LATE LUCIEN DUBOIS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Since the last session of parliament there have been changes not only on this side of the house but some rather important changes on the other side as well. We were all chagrined to learn some months ago that the health of the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken) had become impaired and that he had decided it was necessary to relinquish the arduous duties of leader of the opposition, and what were perhaps for him the still more arduous duties of leader of his party. The hon. member has had a long and distinguished career in public life. Unless I am mistaken as to the exact details, he was for twenty years premier of Manitoba before being selected as leader of the party which under his leadership chose to call itself the Progressive Conservative party. Already he had made great contributions to the agricultural life of western Canada, and thereby to the welfare of the whole of Canada.

I am sure it will not surprise him if I say here today that when he accepted the leadership of the Conservative party many of us who knew of and admired his previous career had some misgivings about the company in which he was going to find himself.

Mr. Graydon: Page Mike Pearson.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, of course, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is still young, but I think he believes he finds himself in pretty good company; and it so happens that a great many people in this country share the same belief.

Obviously the hon. member for Neepawa had some slight misgivings himself, because at that time we understood he had insisted upon the members of that party calling themselves Progressive Conservatives; but in spite of their willingness to call themselves anything he chose, we felt he would be tackling a hopeless task if he were to attempt to make them over into the kind of broad-visioned, common-man Progressive he had shown himself to be during the years of his administration in the province of Manitoba. The fact that he has found it could not be done does not detract in the slightest degree from our admiration of his venturesome courage.

Tributes to Members

During the time the hon. gentleman has been in this house he has discharged his task faithfully and in the best traditions of parliament. Naturally those on this side have differed with him on a good many things, but there has been no acrimony. Our relations with him have always been most cordial. We admire him for what he has done; we regret that his health has become impaired, and we sincerely hope that it will be rapidly restored. We cannot be expected to wish him success at the polls at the next election, but we do wish him good health and happiness in the future.

Now may I extend most cordial greetings to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew) upon having entered this chamber. I think it fair to say that most members of the house welcome him here today, and we congratulate him upon the confidence his party has placed in him.

The position of leader of the opposition is a very high and honourable one. It requires a rare combination of qualities, a knowledge of public affairs and the ability to criticize firmly and boldly on proper occasions, but also the ability to discriminate between proper occasions and times when mere wordy outpourings would be anything but constructive. It also requires an acquaintance with parliamentary procedure and the desire to co-operate in the conduct of public affairs.

The hon. member for Carleton has great natural endowments, and he has had the training and experience necessary to provide one with a proper grasp of public affairs. I am sure that he and I will, on many occasions, disagree. We shall probably, however, be able to co-operate in maintaining and upholding the constitutional traditions and customs of parliament which experience has shown to be the best safeguards of truly democratic institutions.

I also wish to say a word of welcome to the other hon. members who have been presented this day to the Speaker. I am sure they will find that in joining this company they have entered into a field in which there is an opportunity to be of real service to Canada and Canadians, perhaps not only to the Canada and Canadians of our generation but also to the Canada and Canadians of generations to come.

(Translation):

I take pleasure in welcoming two new French-speaking Liberal members, Mr. W. A. Boucher, representing Rosthern, and Mr. Leopold Demers, member for Laval-Two Mountains.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

(Text):

Mr. St. Laurent: It is a pleasure to welcome the new member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan). He was not the choice of our party, but as we are a democratic people, we are pleased to congratulate him on his recent victory. As a lawyer and a public-spirited citizen, he will make a contribution that will be of value to all Canadians.

(Translation):

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Boucher's long experience in public affairs as well as in business marks him out as the logical successor to Mr. Tucker, now the Liberal leader in Saskatchewan.

As for the member for Laval-Two Mountains, we are all proud and happy to see him here among us as a colleague in this house. Mr. Demers is a prominent business man and agronomist whose knowledge will mean further help to us in solving the many problems that face parliament at every session. Now at the opening of each session, while rejoicing over happy events, we must also recall some occasions of bereavement. Since the last session of parliament we lost a fellow member in Mr. Lucien Dubois, member for Nicolet-Yamaska, who, you will recall, had been in poor health for some years. Mr. Dubois was born at Gentilly in the province of Quebec fifty-five years ago. Though a farmer, he took an interest in municipal matters and was for several years secretary of the municipality of Gentilly. He was also secretary of the school board in the same community. He was particularly concerned with social problems. In fact he was a bachelor and followed, I believe, the example of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King). He took as active an interest in social matters as those of us who have large families. Mr. Dubois was associated with the Historical Society of Montreal and the French-Canadian Genealogical Society. He sat in this house for eighteen years, having first been elected in 1930. The services which he rendered to his country during all those years, by his contribution to the debates of the house, are well known to all.

Lastly, he was a modest man, but as a member he attended the sittings of the house as regularly as his ailing health permitted. I know that in expressing our deepest sympathy to Mr. Dubois' father, brothers and sisters, I give voice to the feelings of every hon. member.

(Text):

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising for the first time as a member of this house, may I pick up the remarks of the right hon. the Prime Minister where he left off and join in the expression of regret at the untimely death of Mr. Dubois. One of the members of our party, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), who knew him personally, will make some remarks in regard to him. I can only say, from the conversations I have had with those who knew him well, that he was highly regarded by all the members of the house, and that we share in the deep feeling of regret at his untimely loss.

I wish sincerely to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on his assumption of the high and responsible office to which he has been called. In the conduct of the affairs of government during the time that he has that responsibility I extend to him my best wishes for his good health and for the strength to carry on the arduous duties which fall to his lot. I wish also to thank him for the remarks he made about my own entry into this house. This is, of course, a different arena to that in which I have been for some time past. I thank the Prime Minister for his advice as to the duties of a leader of the opposition. There is one thing, however, that perhaps might be borne in mind, namely, that the rules of the provincial legislature and those of the House of Commons are quite similar, and that I had some years' experience as leader of the opposition in the Ontario legislature. Perhaps because of that fact, together with the fact that I saw changes take place, I have not the same feeling of permanence that may occupy the minds of some people. However, I know that the general summary of the responsibilities of the leader of the opposition was well put forward, in spite of the fact that the Prime Minister had not had the opportunity of sharing my experience. I hope that I shall be able to conduct myself in this office along the lines that have been suggested.

I wish to join in the felicitations which have been extended to the new members who have entered this house today, as I have. I wish to join in the remarks that have been made about the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. King) in regard to his return to good health. I know that I share with everyone here the feeling of satisfaction at seeing him present and in good health today, and I hope that condition continues. To each of the new members who have assumed their responsibilities, some of them almost as recently as I myself, I can only say that I wish them well in the tasks they have undertaken. In the conduct of the affairs of parliament under our system, it will be my duty to co-operate on such occasions as co-operation is indicated, and, on those occasions on which it is not indicated, to put forward before the house the point of view which would seem to me to advance the best interests of the country.

Naturally I wish to express particular pleasure at the entry into the house today of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan). He is a great addition to the House of Commons. The marked confidence displayed by those who know him well in his constituency where the vote was taken was a great personal tribute, a recognition of his abilities, and I think it sufficiently indicates what may be expected of him here in the House of Commons.

Before I close these brief remarks may I say that I wish to pay great tribute to my friend the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken) and to express the satisfaction I feel in the knowledge that he will be sitting here beside me in the house so that I may have the advantage not only of his friendship and advice but of his long years of training which have been referred to by the Prime Minister in his opening remarks. Mr. Bracken served his province extremely well for the longest period that any premier has occupied that office in any province of Canada.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: If I am wrong, I shall be happy to be corrected.

An hon. Member: Murray of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Drew: I am informed that there was an exception in earlier years in Nova Scotia, where there are great traditions of good government. I am happy to be informed of that fact, but it in no way lessens the great period of responsibility and good service which stands to the credit of the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken) before he entered this house.

From my understanding of the procedure in the assembly in which I have sat, which procedure I believe is similar to that here, it is not appropriate to make a political speech on the opening day and I do not intend to do so in any way. I simply wish to say that, in assuming the high office he occupied, his whole record in everything he has done indicates that he filled it with a sense of dignity, and with eminence.

I wish again to express to the Prime Minister my appreciation of his welcome to me here, and to express the hope that in the high office for which I have been chosen I may advance the interests of this house and of the country.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Like the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by expressing on behalf of the party with which I am associated a tribute to the late Mr. Dubois. We found him to be a kindly gentleman whom we liked and admired. The house is poorer because he has left us. I would also join with the Prime Minister in the tribute which he paid to the former Prime Minister of Canada and to say that we too rejoice to see him here today. We hope that he may be spared many years in which to enjoy health, strength and vigour and in which, if I may suggest it once again, to write those memoirs of his long experience as leader of the government of Canada.

I also want to congratulate the Prime Minister upon his accession to office. Those of us who have been associated with him in various activities over the last few years admire his ability. We trust his integrity. As one who was associated with him at two international conferences I wish to say that while I disagree with some policies and principles of the party that he now leads, and shall disagree on occasion with the measures proposed by the government, I believe that the Liberal party of Canada, in choosing the right hon. gentleman as its leader and in elevating him to the office of Prime Minister, not only did something for the country but honoured itself.

I want also to welcome the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I believe that in the twelve years that I have been here the hon. gentleman is the seventh leader of the party and the sixth leader of the opposition. All of them with whom we have been associated in this house have won our esteem and respect for their courtesy, their ability and their integrity, and I hope and I trust that the hon. gentleman who has taken his place here today will have the same kindly feeling from us that his predecessors had.

I also wish to join with those who have paid a tribute to the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken). The hon. gentleman served western Canada for many years. We knew him there as one of the leaders of the old Progressive movement, a movement which was organized by the farmers in a time of stress. He held high office in his province before he came to this house. I can assure him of this, that as far as this party with which I am associated is concerned, we have the most kindly feeling for him, and we hope that he will be spared a good many years in health and strength.

To all the other hon. gentlemen who have been promoted to various positions, to those who have come among us today and who occupy positions of trust and of responsibility, both in the cabinet and as assistants to the ministers, we say welcome and we wish them well.

Tributes to Members

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this fifth session of the twentieth parliament will be productive of beneficial legislation and great good for our own country and that we may indeed make a contribution to world peace and concord.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): It is not my intention nor desire to multiply words, but I do want to associate myself and the group which I represent with the expressions of congratulations to all of those hon. members who have been promoted to the high offices that they now occupy on the other side. To the new members who have come into the house we express our welcome and our sincere desire that they have the finest possible experience here. May they feel when their work is finished in this house that they have been able to make a contribution to the welfare of this great dominion.

I wish to associate myself with the tribute by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King). I too wish him long life, happiness and health. I could not help noting, Mr. Speaker, that on this first day of this new session the hon. member has chosen to come down into this section of the house, a good section. The next step up from little Chicago would be over here, and on the basis of the hon. member for Glengarry's speech in Prince Albert in 1935 I would expect that the next move would be right into the Social Credit ranks.

I compliment the Prime Minister on his elevation to the high office that he now occupies, and I assure him that our best wishes go out to him in his efforts to conduct the business of this house and of this country.

We also wish to join in expressing to the leader of the opposition welcome to this house. We hope that our relationships with him, and with all new members who have come into the house, will be as pleasant as our relationships were with his predecessor. I have always had the pleasantest personal relationships, and also relationships in this house, with the former leader, and I want to join with the other speakers in expressing my hope that the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken) will continue in his improved good health and will enjoy long life and happiness.

In conclusion may I join with all those who have expressed their regret at the passing of Mr. Dubois. It is always a matter of regret when any one of our members passes away suddenly. We miss them. Our sympathy goes out to the bereaved ones and to all the members of the Liberal party who have lost a faithful colleague.

(Translation):

Mr. John T. Hackett (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party I would like to say a few words of regret on the occasion of the death of a friend and a colleague in the person of Mr. Dubois. Mr. Dubois represented a very prominent constituency, an almost historical constituency, a constituency which sent here men like Gaudet Méthot, and even one of your most illustrious predecessors, the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, for years a Speaker of this house. He too represented the Nicolet-Yamaska constituency. That constituency also numbered among its representatives a man of the highest abilities, the lamented and brilliant Paul-Émile Lamarche, who also died young, and one of the most eminent magistrates, one whose fame has spread abroad, Mr. Justice Trahan.

Mr. Dubois was first elected to the House of Commons nearly twenty years ago, at the same time I was. We did not belong to the same party but we shared the same interests. He represented an agricultural population and was particularly interested in the dairy industry. We thus became friends, as the electoral district which I represent has similar interests. He had a quite remarkable personality; he was meek and had qualities which enabled him to get elected in spite of the efforts of the two old recognized parties in this country. Unless I am mistaken, in the last general election he ran as an Independent candidate, as he did in the general election of 1940, and the loyalty of his friends and the services he had rendered to his electors assured his victory on several occasions. May I therefore lay a wreath on his recently-closed grave, a wreath scented with remembrances of loyalty, friendship, sincerity and modesty. Mr. Dubois was a farmer and, as was said, more than a farmer; he was an author, a historian and he dedicated himself to the relief of social distress.

I, therefore, wish to extend to his family, his friends and his electors whom he has served so generously, the tribute of his Conservative colleagues in this house.

(Text):

I will just add this one word in English before taking my seat. The late Mr. Dubois is deeply mourned by his Conservative colleagues. In his fidelity to all the charities of life, great and small, there was in this house no more complete, no more cultivated, no more Christian gentleman than the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska, whose passing we regret.

RESIGNATION OF CLERK ASSISTANT AND APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CLERK ASSISTANT

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR PRECEDENCE OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS —DEBATE ON ADMISSION OF NEWFOUNDLAND INTO CONFEDERATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move, seconded by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe):

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Thursday next, and that this order have precedence over all business except the introduction of bills and government notices of motions on Thursday and Friday, January 27 and 28, 1949.

I had intended at the same time to move for an order of the house on the subject of business of the house next week, but I have been informed by some hon. members that that arrangement had not yet appealed to them as being the best that could be made, that there might have to be a debate on a motion of that kind, and that it would better suit their convenience if the debate did not take place until Friday. So, instead of combining that with the motion I now put before the house, I would simply give notice of a motion to be made on Friday with respect to procedure for next week and following days.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as this motion is not in the usual form, I think it would be very helpful to hon. members if the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would explain the effect of the motion, and what he suggests should be done tomorrow under that motion.

Mr. St. Laurent: The motion is not in the usual form, inasmuch as it does not extend to the whole of the time during which the address of His Excellency the Governor General and addresses in reply may be under debate in the house. But it does provide, in the usual form, that tomorrow and Friday the speech from the throne be considered. The procedure on adoption of the motion would be that the address would be moved and seconded tomorrow. Then I would assume that, in accordance with traditional practice, Your Honour would recognize first the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), that I should follow him, that he would then recognize the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and following the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the hon. member for—

Mr. Graydon: No; you did not do that before.

Mr. St. Laurent: —the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). After those hon. members have been heard, then the debate would continue in such order as might be arranged by the Whips, in the usual manner.

I had intended at this time to move that afterwards, from Monday, January 31, until and including Friday, February 11, matters having to do with the entry of Newfoundland into confederation should have precedence over other matters. But I was told by some hon. members that that did not appeal to them as being the proper procedure, that there would be debate on a motion of that kind, and that it would be preferable not to have the debate which would be expected this afternoon in view of the fact that other engagements had been made. I am therefore giving notice that I will make that motion on Friday. The purpose of the motion will be that on and from January 31 until Friday, February 11, the matters dealing with the entry of Newfoundland shall have precedence. However I am not making that motion at the present time; I am putting a notice on the order paper.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do think that hon. members should recognize the effect of the motion in the form in which it is presented. In the form in which it is presented the debate on the speech from the throne will have precedence only for Thursday and Friday, and to carry forward the debate under the usual terms or following the usual procedure would require another motion, were it not for the fact that the Prime Minister has indicated that he intends to introduce a motion which would have the effect of postponing the debate on the speech from the throne.

I do not think it would be appropriate for me to make any comments on this motion in relation to the motion of which notice has been given. Nevertheless the effect of this motion is such that it would be unwise to ignore the position in which the debate on the speech from the throne is left unless the second motion is carried by the house.

While the Prime Minister may assume that he will be able to persuade a sufficient number of hon. members to produce that result by their votes, such assumption should not blind hon. members to the fact that if this motion as it now stands is carried nothing will have been done to provide for the continued debate on the speech from the throne after Friday.

I suggest that not only is this motion contrary to any motion that has been introduced in this house since confederation; it is a motion which if carried in its present form presupposes the ability of the government to carry a subsequent motion by the acceptance by members of one party of the decision of the Prime Minister without any regard to another motion. The continuance of this debate rests entirely upon that assumption, which, it seems to me, is not consistent with our parliamentary practice.

I urge the Prime Minister seriously to consider the withdrawal at this point of the motion and the substitution, which he can easily make, of the ordinary motion to the effect that the debate continue to have precedence. Then if the subsequent motion gains the support of this house the effect will be the carrying forward of the debate anyway. Such a motion would not in any way be subject to the disabilities that this motion contains.

I should like to point out that I as well as other hon. members of the house are under some handicap in debating a motion such as this because it deals with the address of His Majesty's representative. It is customary, and I believe the record will show that it has always been the practice, that the motion provide that the debate have precedence over all other government business. On those rare occasions when a subsequent motion was moved which had the effect of postponing the debate it related to the debate in the customary form and provided for the carrying forward of that debate without any such limitations as are now laid down. I again ask the Prime Minister to take this into consideration.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). This motion, being worded as it is, does exactly what he says it does: it limits the debate to two days. It seems to me that if we pass this motion we shall be limiting ourselves to Thursday and Friday. Without notice of another motion we might find ourselves in a difficult position if the proposal of the government should not carry on Friday. In a democratic institution we have always the right to presuppose that hon. members may not always vote in accordance with the wishes of the government.

I join the leader of the opposition in suggesting that the wording of the motion be changed. We can deal with the situation as it arises on Friday, when the other motion which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has foreshadowed can be discussed and, if the house sees fit, passed.

Mr. St. Laurent: I cannot accede to the request made by the leader of the opposition and by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) because that would be asking the house to make an order and expecting the house to reverse that order on Friday. I moved my motion in this form because I had been told by hon. members that there would be a debate upon any motion made in an attempt to postpone the debate on the address. If that were so I thought it would be preferable to have it made on Friday. I am quite prepared to agree to that.

I am prepared to state here that I am making no other assumption than the assumption that this motion provides for the order of business for two days and that a motion will have to be made on Friday for the order of business subsequent to that. If the order on Friday is not made in the terms of the motion of which I have given notice, I can move another motion for that order of business. This is merely to determine that we can go on tomorrow and Friday with the debate on the address.

Mr. Rowe: By unanimous consent.

Mr. St. Laurent: No, not by unanimous consent but by virtue of the motion I am now putting before the house. If hon. members wish to have a debate this afternoon I am quite prepared to have it. I even suggested that we should have it. However, I was told that that would not meet their convenience because other arrangements had been made for the rest of the day. It was necessary to make some provision for tomorrow and Friday.

On Friday I will move that the debate on the address be not given precedence during those days, but that precedence be given to the measure with respect to Newfoundland. We do not mean to adopt any dictatorial attitude.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. St. Laurent: Hon. members can say "Oh, oh" all they like, but that is the fact. I know the intent of our desires just as well as hon. members who are saying "Oh, oh". I wish to meet in the greatest degree possible the convenience of all hon. members in the house. I do not want to start a debate today on the reasons for proceeding immediately with the Newfoundland measure; that will come on Friday. If we cannot arrange something that appears to be satisfactory to the majority of the members of the house, we will arrange something else. There is no intention of getting a snap decision of the house, but I do not think it would be appropriate for me to ask the house to make one order today and then come back on Friday and ask it to vary that order.

Mr. Drew: I have asked the Prime Minister to reconsider this, but since he has not done so I would point out that this motion does not produce the effect which he has indicated to the house. He says that this would have the effect of carrying on the debate; that unless there was another motion we would go on with the debate.

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh, no, I did not say that.

Mr. Drew: That was the impression I gained.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sorry I did not express myself sufficiently clearly. I said that if we could not arrange to go on with the Newfoundland matter we would make some other arrangement for using the time of the house from Monday onward. I quite realize that some provision will have to be made on Friday for the business of the house during the days of next week and following.

Mr. Drew: I should like to continue what I was pointing out. The practice I have suggested is the accepted practice and Hansard will show clearly that the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the last occasion, when he as Prime Minister presented a motion of a similar character, presented the motion that has always been presented to deal with the speech from the throne and give it precedence. On the very occasion when he did that he indicated that he would be introducing another motion which would have the effect of postponing the debate on a certain day. Therefore there is no inconsistency in presenting the usual motion to give precedence to the debate, and to give on Friday, as the Prime Minister now has, notice of a motion, to be debated then, which, if carried by the house, would have the effect of postponing the debate.

This motion is not in the form in which a motion for debate on the speech from the throne has been put forward traditionally in this house. My understanding of the rule is that such a motion requires unanimous consent, or forty-eight hours' notice. I indicate to you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not consent to proceeding with this motion in its present form. I want to make quite sure that no suggestion can be made that we are blocking the debate on the speech from the throne. Therefore, if the Prime Minister will now introduce the motion that has been used regularly since confederation, we will support it and give unanimous consent.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Prime Minister indicated that one of his aims was to avoid a debate on procedure today, but it must be apparent to him that he has made the very move which is likely to produce a prolonged debate. Yet I suggest it is still possible to avoid a procedural debate today if he will accept the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leader of this group. All he has to do is to withdraw the motion he has made and make the motion that has been made on almost every occasion, namely, that the debate on the address begin tomorrow and have precedence until it is concluded. As the leader of the opposition has said, he can then give notice that on Friday it is his intention to move a motion to the effect that notwithstanding the order of January 26 such and such shall be the case. I would point out that not only was this done in that manner last year, but in many sessions the debate on the address has proceeded for a considerable period of time and has then been interrupted by a subsequent motion. I would suggest that the Prime Minister should make the usual motion. If he will accept that suggestion he will avoid a debate today.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the hon. member is making a mistake. The motion that was made was that the debate on the address have precedence for one day and that on the following Monday measures arising out of the emergency legislation—

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, that was interpreted to go on and on, indefinitely.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, but the motion that was made was not that the debate on the address have precedence until concluded. It was that it have precedence only over the Monday following the opening of parliament, and that thereafter legislation having to do with the restrictions announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) be dealt with. They were dealt with until adjournment and we did not resume the debate until the 28th of January. The motion that was made was as follows:

> That the debate on the address in reply to the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be the first order of business on Monday, December 8th instant, and that this order be followed by government notices of motion and government orders notwithstanding anything in standing order 15.

I had a motion in that form, and I was asked not to bring it forward today because it would give rise to a debate which it was not desirable to have at this time. It is precisely those who asked me to avoid precipitating a debate about it who now say that they cannot accept this motion because it does not provide that the debate on the address will have precedence until it is concluded. I am not in a position to make that kind of motion. If that kind of motion were made it would be an order of the house, and I could not properly ask to have it reconsidered.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to labour the matter, but I do wish to point out again to the Prime Minister that his predecessor in office, who was very careful about procedure, followed precisely this course. He introduced a motion which gave precedence to the debate on the address and indicated that he was going to introduce the other motion. That has been the practice. I repeat that there is a suggestion before the Prime Minister which would solve any problem of procedure and leave it open to him to deal with the other motion. I should like to refer to standing order 45, which seems clear enough:

> Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address . . .

And so on.

Unless that is done I submit that the house cannot proceed with the debate. We wish the motion to be put in the usual form to place the debate on the speech from the throne before this house. We will support that motion if it is prepared in the usual way but in the present form it places a definite limitation upon the debate. I cannot give consent to it and I ask you to rule that this motion cannot be debated today.

Mr. St. Laurent: In order to avoid debate I am quite prepared to withdraw the motion and to trust that it will be the desire of hon. members tomorrow that we proceed with the debate on the address. There will not have been any order of the house made, but I trust it will be the wish of the house tomorrow under the standing orders that we proceed to consider the speech from the throne. I do not want to ask the house to make any order that any hon. member might feel went beyond what I said was intended. If there is any feeling that an order on this motion will have any other effect than to provide that we deal with the address tomorrow and Friday, and that we decide on Friday what we will do next, I do not wish to press it against opposition. I do not think it is the kind of motion which requires notice, but perhaps tomorrow we shall be able to consider the speech from the throne without having had any order made.

Mr. Rowe: Following the government's desires rather than parliamentary rules.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think the hon. member is justified in making that remark. Does he really consider that he is?

Mr. Rowe: I think he is.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think he is. If there is objection to this motion being made today I am quite prepared to withdraw it and to abide by the standing orders of the house.

Mr. Drew: So that there may be no misunderstanding, I was dealing with a motion in a certain form. The Prime Minister has indicated his willingness to withdraw that motion. We come now to another point. There can be no objection to proceeding with the debate in the usual way in so far as the mover and seconder are concerned, but I am unaware of any precedent for the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister following immediately afterwards under such circumstances as we have here. I do not think that should be suggested. The speech from the throne has only been presented today. The debate is on that speech, and it is customary to afford the leader of the opposition an opportunity to examine it so that his remarks will deal with it. I want to make that observation now that the Prime Minister has withdrawn the motion. I make the observation as to my views of the procedure on the debate merely for the purpose of avoiding any misunderstanding tomorrow.

Motion withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow the first order of business, I hope, will be a motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.43 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 27, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

PRESS REPORT OF REMARKS OF MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER CENTRE

Mr. James Sinclair (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, at this opening moment of the first business day of parliament I rise on a question of privilege affecting the good name and the honour of every member of this house except one. On the front page of the Vancouver News-Herald of July 26, 1948, appeared the following headline:

C.C.F.'er classes M.P.'s as "bunch of crooks".

The article reads as follows:

The Canadian people have been sending "a bunch of crooks" to parliament, Rodney Young, C.C.F. member for Vancouver Centre, told a C.C.F. open forum here Sunday. "And I will not take that statement back," he added.

Commenting on the "anti-labour" and "reactionary" attitude of Liberal and Progressive Conservative members of the Commons, Mr. Young said in a report on the last session, "I am burned up by the nonsense some of these people utter. The workers would be unholy mad if they knew what was going on in parliament."

The Canadian people were coming to believe they must send men of the producing classes, not lawyers, to parliament. The government had been "stunned" by the election of three C.C.F. members in recent by-elections.

Mr. Young, who spoke five times in five days while at Ottawa, assured his friends that he would "really go after those guys" at the next session.

I was amazed that any member should make such a statement, especially a member who had been here only ten days. I thought it another case of a loose tongue outrunning good judgment, and expected a retraction the following day, or at least the usual weak defence that he had been misquoted or misunderstood. When no such retraction appeared, as the member for the adjacent riding I felt it my duty, in fairness to my colleagues in the House of Commons, to follow up the matter. I went to the News-Herald and asked the editor whether, while it was still fresh in his mind, I might speak to the reporter who had covered the meeting. The reporter gave me this statement:

I had already written the story of the meeting before I went there, basing it on a prepared report by Denny Kristiansen, C.C.F. publicity man. When I got there, I found that Young spoke mostly on other things, so I had to write another story of the meeting and refer to the former one as an "interview." I find in my notes that he said the people had "been hiring a bunch of crooks in parliament." Writing the report, my mind was not sure about the word "hiring," so I made it "sending," but did not put it in quotation marks. He added that he would not take it back. If he were in the House of Commons, he said, it would be ruled out of order as unparliamentary, but he could use the expression there at the meeting and he would stand by it.

However, I found that I had no need to get such a statement, because the three Vancouver papers immediately took exception to the statement and defended our good name. This provoked the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Young) to the writing of a letter to the News-Herald in which he repeated this charge and added other charges. I now wish to refer to that letter. The heading in the newspaper is as follows:

"A bunch of crooks"—M.P.'s called loafers, too.

I quote the first two paragraphs of the letter:

In view of the editorial appearing in the August 3 issue of the News-Herald I should be greatly obliged if you extend me the courtesy of publishing my reply.

Speaking at a public meeting on the evening of Sunday, July 25, I made the following statements—

Here is an interesting thing. Nine days after he made an ad lib speech he is able to explain in detail exactly what he said. I will not read the exact words, but he calls us incompetent, lazy and flagrantly neglectful of our duties. Further on in the letter he repeats his charge about crooks, in these words:

"I have said that I regard certain members of parliament as 'crooks'; I do not consider this term too harsh; I will not be afraid to use the language of the people. You can rely on me; I shall get after those 'guys' good and plenty, when I get back to the next session."

Then the letter goes on:

The news item in your journal stressed my use of the term "crook." Since it was a news item and not a commentary, I had no quarrel with the reporter, who was doing a job. The editorial was a statement of opinion in which you deprecated my general attitude and terminology. I do not agree with you on these points, and will have no hesitation in facing my fellow members at the next session of parliament should some of them feel that the cap fits.

In public life, Mr. Speaker, all of us are accustomed to slanderous attacks from crackpots, made in ignorance, and from communists with the intention of trying to break down our parliamentary institution. We generally ignore these statements. When such charges are made by a member of parliament, speaking as such at a public meeting, we cannot ignore them.

I now challenge the member for Vancouver Centre to stand up here before his peers and name specifically the members who, he charges, are crooks; to prove his charges, and, if he fails in those charges, to follow the British tradition and resign his seat. If he does not do that, I propose to move, seconded by the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt), that when the standing committee on privileges and elections is formed the hon. member for Vancouver Centre be called before that committee, and the committee can decide whether he is a fit and proper person to sit in this company of honest and honourable men.

Mr. Rodney Young (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the impassioned speech of my hon. friend across the way; and as I said in my letter to the News-Herald, from which he has quoted only in part, if any of my fellow members felt that the cap fitted I should be happy to have them wear it. I did not expect that the hon. member concerned would consider the cap fitted him, but apparently he does.

Mr. Sinclair: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Young: I am going to read—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot permit the hon. member to carry on a debate on this question. I will give him the opportunity, as I think would be the desire of the house, to explain what he has done, but I do not think he should proceed to make a speech on a question of privilege.

Mr. Sinclair: On my question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has just asserted that the cap fits me, that I am a crook. I ask him to withdraw that statement now; and if he does not care to withdraw it now I shall certainly see that it is withdrawn after this session is over.

Mr. Young: I said "if".

Mr. Speaker: Presenting reports by standing and select committees.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Sinclair: I asked the hon. member to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Since the words complained of by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) were spoken outside the house, the Speaker has no power to request the hon. gentleman to withdraw; but if he wishes to take advantage of this opportunity to withdraw what he has said, I have no doubt hon. members will be pleased.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Sinclair: I am still asking the hon. member to withdraw the insinuation that the cap fitted me. I drew to the attention of the house his allegation that we were all crooks —including the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), for that matter, since he did not say it was just the members of other parties. Again I ask, in my own case, that the hon. member meet this challenge, failing which we will move that he be brought before the committee on privileges and elections to defend himself. However, I still ask him to withdraw at this moment the insinuation against myself personally.

Mr. Young: May I be permitted to read my reply in full?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I have already said, the attention of the house has been drawn to what was said outside the house. I would suggest that the hon. member for Vancouver North follow the procedure he mentioned a few moments ago and wait until the committee on privileges and elections is set up.

Mr. Sinclair: It is not the letter I am complaining of now; it is the language the hon. member used about me this afternoon in this house.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member be kind enough to repeat the words pronounced in the house this afternoon which he would like to have withdrawn?

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member implied that the cap of a crook fitted me, since I was the one who took exception to his comment that if some hon. members felt that the cap fitted them they could bring the matter up in the House of Commons. That is the point I am raising at the moment, and I ask that the insinuation be withdrawn now because it was made in this house.

Mr. Young: If I have said anything in this house today which reflects upon the hon. member, I am perfectly willing to withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Do I understand, then, that the hon. member withdraws what he has said?

Mr. Young: Today.

THE PRIME MINISTER

INVITATION OF PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES TO VISIT WASHINGTON ON FEBRUARY 12

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I hope it will be of interest to hon. members to learn that the President of the United States announced today that he has invited me to visit Washington on February 12, 1949, and that I had accepted his invitation. The United States ambassador called on me yesterday morning to extend the invitation. I told Mr. Steinhardt I would naturally be pleased to accept it.

The President was kind enough to indicate that he would like to renew our acquaintance and to discuss the matters which are of common interest to our two countries as neighbours, and also the world situation as it affects our two countries.

Everyone knows that the friendly personal relations between the late President Roosevelt and our Prime Minister were of inestimable advantage to this continent and to the world. President Truman has expressed the desire, which I fully share, to maintain these friendly personal relations between the leaders of the governments of our two countries. Hon. members will recall that President Truman visited Ottawa in June, 1947, at the invitation of my predecessor, and that his visit was both pleasant and beneficial.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I table herewith, in English and in French, the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada, and answers to the questions raised by the Newfoundland delegation when it was here discussing these terms of union.

Also the orders in council passed since prorogation of the last session of parliament with respect to the transfer of duties; orders in council of August 17, 1948, November 5, 1948, two of November 15, 1948, and December 8, 1948.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I desire to lay on the table the annual report of the Department of National Revenue for the year ended March 31, 1948, in English and in French.

I also wish to report that, with reference to the export of petroleum and pulpwood, no orders or regulations have been issued under the export of petroleum and pulpwood regulations established under chapter 63 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, since the last return made to parliament.

With reference to the Canada-United Kingdom income tax agreement, no orders or regulations have been issued under chapter 38 of the Statutes of 1946, being the Canada-United Kingdom income tax agreement.

With reference to the Canada-United Kingdom succession duty agreement, no regulations or orders have been issued under chapter 39 of the statutes of 1946, being the Canada-United Kingdom succession duty agreement section.

With reference to the Canada-United States tax convention, no orders or regulations have been issued under the convention relating to succession duties, enacted as chapter 31 of the statutes of 1934, since these were tabled in the house on March 20, 1946.

(For complete list of reports and papers tabled, see Votes and Proceedings, No. 2, January 27, 1949.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): If I may have the unanimous consent of the house to do so, I should like at this time to move:

That William Henry Golding, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Huron-Perth, be appointed deputy chairman of committees of the whole house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: I thought the manner in which the hon. member performed his duties as deputy chairman of committees of the whole in previous sessions would assure me of the unanimous consent for which I have asked. I therefore move, seconded by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the foregoing motion.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yesterday the discussion with regard to the procedure for today was concluded as follows, as reported in Hansard at page 12:

Mr. St. Laurent: In order to avoid debate I am quite prepared to withdraw the motion and to trust that it will be the desire of hon. members tomorrow that we proceed with the debate on the address.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said:

So that there may be no misunderstanding, I was dealing with a motion in a certain form. The Prime Minister has indicated his willingness to withdraw that motion. We come now to another point. There can be no objection to proceeding with the debate in the usual way in so far as the mover and seconder are concerned, but I am unaware of any precedent for the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister following immediately afterwards under such circumstances as we have here. I do not think that should be suggested. The speech from the throne has only been presented today. The debate is on that speech, and it is customary to afford the leader of the opposition an opportunity to examine it so that his remarks will deal with it. I want to make that observation now that the Prime Minister has withdrawn the motion. I make the observation as to my views of the procedure on the debate merely for the purpose of avoiding any misunderstanding tomorrow.

On the assumption that the foregoing represented the feeling of the house generally, I now move that we proceed forthwith to consider the speech delivered yesterday by His Excellency to both houses of parliament. I understand that it is in order to make this kind of motion to apply to the proceedings of today only, but I would have no objection to its applying to the proceedings of the house until otherwise ordered by the house, if it is the desire of hon. members that the motion be in that form. I have it in the two alternative forms:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration forthwith.

Or:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration forthwith and that this order have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills and government notices of motions until otherwise ordered by the house.

I am informed that as to the more complete motion, the technical objection can be raised that forty-eight hours' notice has not been given. If that objection is taken, I suggest the first form, which would provide for the speech being dealt with today. As to the observation of the leader of the opposition that since the speech was delivered only yesterday it would be unusual to require him to deal with it today, if he still feels that way about it, and wishes, after the mover and the seconder have been heard, to move the adjournment of the debate, we on this side of the house would raise no objection.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): The proposal which has just been made by the Prime Minister is, I think, in accord with the suggestion I made at the conclusion of my remarks yesterday. While I am unable, of course, to indicate unanimous consent except in so far as I may be able to do so for the members of the party which I lead, I am quite prepared to consent to proceeding with the debate if the second motion which has been read is introduced; it is in accordance with the established practice. I do so on the understanding which has been indicated by the Prime Minister, that at the conclusion of the speech of the seconder I move adjournment of the debate in the usual way.

Mr. Coldwell: I think that is quite satisfactory, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Low: That will be satisfactory to our group.

Mr. St. Laurent: I move, seconded by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe):

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration forthwith and that this order have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills and government notices of motions until otherwise ordered by the house.

Mr. Drew: Just to clarify the record on this point, Mr. Speaker, I have noted something which I think should be explained to the house before we proceed with the debate. I received my copy of Votes and Proceedings earlier in the day, and I find that the same copy is still on the desks of most of the members. A few minutes ago a new copy of Votes and Proceedings for yesterday was tabled. It includes two additional items which were not in the first printed copies distributed to the members this morning. The second of the additional items is a notice of motion by the Prime Minister. It reads as follows:

That on and after Monday, January 31, 1949, and every sitting day thereafter until and including Friday, February 11, 1949, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills.

On inquiry I found that the copy which contains the motion I have just read is not yet on the desks of most hon. members. I think it would clarify the procedure if we could be told why one copy of Votes and Proceedings was delivered and then a subsequent copy delivered which contains a new and very important motion.

Mr. Speaker: I must say to the hon. gentleman that I shall look into the matter.

Mr. St. Laurent: I can give an answer to the leader of the opposition right away. As I announced in the house yesterday afternoon, I gave notice of this motion, which is the last item on the Votes and Proceedings that the hon. gentleman has just read, and when I got the first issue of Votes and Proceedings this morning I was surprised to find it was not there. I communicated with the Clerk of the House, who verified the fact that he had it, but through some omission it had not gone to the printer. He told me that it was not the first time that there had been an oversight of this kind, and that he would see that the printer had the Votes and Proceedings completed in time for the sitting this afternoon.

I think I might take this opportunity to say that I have had representations from hon. members on both sides of the house, who, in spite of their realization of the urgency of proceeding with the Newfoundland terms of union so that we may have them dealt with by this parliament and subsequently by the parliament of the United Kingdom before March 31, feel they would like to have all next week devoted to the debate on the address. When this motion is called tomorrow, if I can have the consent of the house to do so, I shall substitute for the dates that are mentioned the corresponding dates one week later.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. D. F. BROWN (ESSEX WEST) AND SECONDED BY MR. LEOPOLD DEMERS (LAVAL-TWO MOUNTAINS)

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): In rising to propose a resolution of appreciation to His Excellency, the Governor General of Canada, for his gracious speech addressed to both houses of parliament, the people of the constituency of Essex West, which I have the pleasure to represent in this house, are honoured and privileged to join with Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific in our tribute of loyalty and affection to His Majesty, George VI, our king, and his gracious consort, Queen Elizabeth. We do this, not with a feeling of subservience or subordination, but with the dignity of fidelity and allegiance.

We recognize and admire the attitude of sincerity which Their Majesties attach to their high office, their kindliness to the problems affecting their millions of subjects, their thoughtfulness of those afflicted, and the standard they have set for the world in their domestic lives by the grace, gentility and simplicity of their home living.

Canadians in all walks of life have learned with rejoicing of His Majesty's recent recovery from a serious physical disorder, and have breathed a prayer of thanksgiving for his restoration to health and strength. We humbly express to him our sympathy in the discomfort and suffering which he has endured, but are consoled by the promise that "the darkest hour precedes the dawn".

The British commonwealth of nations for many years has looked, hopefully and expectantly, for word of an heir to the throne. On November 14, 1948, this long awaited promise was fulfilled in the birth of "wee Bonnie Prince Charlie" to Her Royal Highness Princess Elizabeth and the Duke of Edinburgh. To the parents of the baby, christened Charles Philip Arthur George of Edinburgh, we extend our sincere congratulations. To the baby, all Canada extends its hope and prayer for a lifetime of health for himself, happiness with his family, and success in his relationship with his loyal subjects.

The year just passed has brought many changes in our national life and personalities. The Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, who had held office longer than any other prime minister in the British empire, retired from his post as Prime Minister and leader of the Liberal party. Mr. King's dynamic leadership of the House of Commons, his unbounded energy in upholding that which he thought best for his country, and his unfailing courtesy, thoughtfulness and kindness, will always be an inspiration to the members of this house.

A man of peace, who abhorred war, he led Canada victoriously through the bitter storm and strife of conflict into the calm harbour of peace and prosperity, with distinction to himself and with honour to his country. His career of self-sacrificing service will be a beacon light to the youth of Canada for generations yet unborn. His followers will remember his uncanny insight and perspicacity; the opposition will remember him for his vigour and tenacity; but the little people of Canada will remember him as their friend and champion. History will be very kind to William Lyon Mackenzie King.

During the past year the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken) found it necessary to retire as leader of the official opposition. During his term the hon. member endeared himself to all members of this house, regardless of party affiliations, by his warmth of friendliness, his vigour of opposition in the house, and his courtesy and affability outside the house. We wish him well.

On the turning of the pages of the history of this house, we are now proud to have as our leader one who is truly a Canadian of distinction—Right Hon. Louis Stephen St. Laurent. Mr. St. Laurent, having heard the clear call of duty, has rejected personal placid interests to accept the highest post of service to his country—that of Prime Minister. In this arduous position he will have every opportunity of displaying to the fullest extent his widely known powers of conciliation and sagacity. We on this side of the house are privileged to serve under his benevolent direction and admonition. May Canada continue to prosper and expand in stature among the nations of the world during his term of office.

It has been said that a government is as strong as its opposition. We are also welcoming a new leader of the official opposition, who comes to this chamber with many years of experience as premier of my own province, the province of Ontario. He has shown much energy and aggressiveness in his public career. We trust that his leadership of the opposition will be vigorous and constructive.

On the 11th day of December, 1948, an agreement was entered into by the Dominion of Canada having the effect of bringing into the confederation of the Dominion of Canada the province of Newfoundland, thus uniting in legislative matters two branches of the British commonwealth of nations, living side by side and having similar hopes and ideals. The people of my constituency join with all Canada in extending a warm and cordial welcome to Newfoundland, the tenth province of the Canadian family of provinces.

The agreement for union of Newfoundland has not come about without having to hurdle many obstacles; but with two groups of people, such as Canada and Newfoundland, with the same customs, principles, and aspirations, the union would seem to be natural.

Upon referendum submitted to the people of Newfoundland, the desire to enter into confederation with Canada was expressed. Subsequently representatives of Canada and Newfoundland met and determined the arrangements for the union, which upon approval of the parliament of Canada will come into effect on the 31st day of March next.

Canada and Newfoundland have much in common for a union. Both have the same heritage in freedom of action, speech and religion. Both have the same political traditions. Both have grown to maturity side by side, and each has been able to observe the progress of the other. Both have realized that in a fast-moving world they need one another for their common defence. Both see that the greatest good, by way of special reforms and security, can come to the ordinary citizen in both places only if united we stand. We believe we can offer to Newfoundland much in the way of trade, but we need also what Newfoundland has to contribute. Newfoundland has lumber and pulpwood; it has fish and sea foods. It has vast deposits of iron ore and other metals. But, more than anything else, we welcome the people of Newfoundland. We realize they are a proud people, of rugged nature, strong and industrious, anxious to take their full share of responsibility, and that they expect their full share of the gains. We Canadians are proud to become associated with them.

We will undoubtedly encounter differences of opinion from time to time; but, having visited each of the nine existing provinces of Canada, I have observed that, while governments may often disagree, the common people of our dominion have the same high goal always before them—that of peace, industry, integrity, and security.

It is in this spirit of partnership that we extend our welcome to the tenth province of the Dominion of Canada, the province of Newfoundland.

My constituency, that of Essex West, borders on the Detroit river for approximately fifteen miles. Discussions on the St. Lawrence waterway development are therefore of vital interest to us, as they should be to all other parts of Canada.

By our methods of production we in Canada do not depend upon domestic markets. We are a trading nation. We export to the four corners of the world. In fact I believe we export about one-third of all the goods we produce. This probably would be much higher in my own constituency. We are therefore most anxious to devise ways and means by which, wherever and whenever possible, we can reduce the cost of the goods we produce and at the same time maintain our high level of living. One of the items which contribute to the increased price of our goods in competition with other goods of a similar nature on the world market is that of transportation of our goods to the consumer in the distant land.

Canada has access to 2,400 miles of waterways from Fort William to the Atlantic ocean. This great waterway, for the most part, is of deep navigable water with a height of 600 feet of falling energy. This waterway is similar to a series of saucepans with the spout of one dropping into the pan below, but with the spout of the final saucepan corroded with rocks, timber, and fear—fear of debt and disaster.

Time passes on. When Jacques Cartier sailed up the St. Lawrence to claim the wilderness for France, little did he realize what he was starting—for this was the first link in the chain of events which has led to the struggle to obtain a free outlet to the sea —a freedom from the bonds of nature. Champlain, La Salle and all the great explorers have seen the need for this direct water route from the sea to that great inland empire of Canada. And now it is hoped the final removal of the impediment of the ages will be realized.

Since the days of the early settlers in Canada, wheelbarrows have become bulldozers; the old buckboard has become the sleek sedan; the magic lantern, the television set. The sailing vessel has become the modern oil burner. And the steamships have grown from the impressive length of 250 feet and a capacity of 2,000 tons to the ships of today with a length of 600 feet and capacity of 20,000 tons. Ships of this latter class pass along the border of my constituency unnoticed every few minutes of the day for eight or nine months of the year.

According to the United States Department of Commerce, seventy-one per cent of the ocean-going vessels of the principal maritime nations of the world operate on a draft of twenty-five feet or less. Thus ships in Canada's huge export and import business, ships coming from distant ports, are blocked upon reaching the rapids of the St. Lawrence river with its canals and locks constructed to a depth of only fourteen feet.

Travelling eastward, as the ships move from Fort William to the sea carrying Canada's consumable gold, pulpwood, or minerals, a drop of approximately twenty feet is encountered at Sault Ste. Marie. At lake St. Clair and the Detroit river there is a further fall of about eight feet, and channels have been deepened and are kept open during the navigation season. At Niagara Falls is the highest fall. Locks of 800 feet with depths of thirty feet provide adequate clearance. But as the boats reach the St. Lawrence river, the fourteen-foot locks are encountered and the load must be stored and reshipped.

Having deepened the channel at Welland, and having spent many millions of dollars on deepening the St. Lawrence channel below Montreal, there remains but one major obstacle to the seaway route—the bottleneck of the St. Lawrence rapids. The length of this obstruction is 183 miles; of this, 115 miles is international territory. It has about forty-seven miles of canals and twenty-two locks; but the navigable depth is still fourteen feet. It surely must be conceived as national policy that this should be enlarged to a depth of thirty feet; otherwise the millions spent above and below could not be utilized to the fullest.

True, the cost of the St. Lawrence waterways would be heavy; but can we afford not to make the expenditure? If we are going to earn money, we must spend money to create the machinery to earn it. We have spent huge sums to fight and win a war. We can and will spend comparably smaller amounts to win a peace. Time will be required; but, if the project is desirable, we have all the time necessary to bring the idea into fruition. The late President Roosevelt had an answer for those who were opposing the idea of the seaway project, when he said:

> Opponents of the seaway project have pointed out that it takes four years to build this seaway.
> They know, but fail to mention, that it takes at least that long to build a battleship. They also know that this project will cost the United States less than three battleships, and that the power project will be entirely self-liquidating.

The development of this seaway would be a beacon light to the war-weary people of the world, who would view it as the shining example of how free men and free nations co-operate to attain a common end. It would be an enduring example of the ability of two great nations not only to live side by side peacefully, but also to develop harmoniously their natural resources. The co-operative development of a great foreign trade route by our two countries for the purpose of sharing the benefits of new commerce would be a landmark in the history of international relations.

This project will give the industries of Windsor, and all the ports of the great lakes, the cheapest and shortest access to vast new markets for the automobiles, chemicals, pharmaceuticals, and other things which we produce. No transfer of cargo would be necessary through this cheap method of transportation. We must also realize that Windsor and all other inland ports are 500 miles closer, through the St. Lawrence, to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and to the great ports of Liverpool, London, Antwerp, and Hamburg. It is a little shorter to the Mediterranean countries, and to the middle east through the Suez canal.

Since the turn of the last century, the very life and national existence of Canada, and our sister country, the United States of America, have depended on our ability to build ships at the greatest speed, at least fast enough to provide food and materials for our fighting forces and those of our allies in foreign lands. Had the seaway been open, we could have done much better by far. Ships could have been constructed at many inland shipyards.

Let it be remembered that Windsor and Detroit were ranked as America's No. 1 arsenal, followed closely by Toronto and Hamilton. Cruisers, destroyers, and ten-ton merchant ships could be constructed in sheltered great lakes harbours far from threat of invasion, and loaded there with foodstuffs, munitions, and materials of war. Convoys could be assembled in the waters of the St. Lawrence.

In days when this idea was immature, men thought of this project as concerning only ships, wheat, ore, and harbours. But today, to the housewife in her kitchen and the workman in his factory, this seaway project means light, heat and power. It means comfort, speed, energy, and economy. Then, too, in an ever-increasing number of homes, the kitchen clock is run by electricity, and we do not hold with this "stoppage" of time.

In this project there is a fall of about 85 feet and it is estimated that there is a latent 2,200,000 horsepower of electrical energy. This will in no way conflict with the necessity of erecting steam plants in various parts of Canada to supplement the generation of electrical power. Hydro development will take care of all base loads of power, but the emergency of peak loads must be taken care of by steam generation at strategic points throughout the country. I strongly recommend, Mr. Speaker, that this project be proceeded with without delay.

The year 1948 was good to Canada. In that year the highest peacetime levels of production and external trade were achieved, and the levels of income and employment were the highest on record. Our dependence for our domestic prosperity on our foreign trade was, however, apparent. Today Canada stands third among the nations of the world as an industrial and trading nation.

In spite of chaotic world conditions as a result of the war, the government of this country has succeeded in getting for Canadian industry the large volume of raw products and capital goods required to keep industrial plants operating as fully and efficiently as possible. The consumer has also been able to obtain the steady supply of utility and luxury goods required by our high standard of living, the availability of which has all too often been taken for granted.

Confidence in Canadian institutions is reflected by the investment boom Canada has enjoyed during the past year. The vast iron ore resources of Quebec and Labrador, the uranium deposits in our northwest territories, and the new oil fields of Alberta, indicate that the discovery and development of our natural resources and new raw materials are continuing. Canada can look forward with optimism to developments that are now in their infancy.

Canada is a trading nation. It has many new products to offer the world. We also want to buy more freely in world markets, for the high standard of living and the increased diversity and complexity of our industry demand the best that the world has to offer.

With Canada's rapid industrial growth has come an increased stature among the peoples and nations of this globe. As is always the case with the ascent of power, there has come an enlarged degree of responsibility which must be assumed. We have earnestly devoted ourselves to this moral obligation. Canada has accepted the fact that it is in our national interest to contribute, whenever and wherever possible, to the lifting of the burden and the healing of the wounds of a war-ridden world by helping such countries to help themselves, both physically and morally.

The individual Canadian—that is, Canada on a per capita basis—has done more than any individual in any other country of the world in giving material support and financial aid to the peoples of devastated countries. True, it has been the government of the day which has made all necessary inquiries, which has carried on the negotiations and made the commitments. But it is to the Canadian people that the credit must go, for they have discerned the need; they have entrusted the mandate and have given loyal support to the aid given. Much more has to be done before the pinnacle of peace will have been reached, but in the ascent Canada can look back with modesty and humility to the assistance she has given pilgrims in the upward climb.

The advent of the year 1949 finds Canada strong and resolute, looking forward confidently and expectantly to the difficult problems which confront us, secure in the knowledge that we are sufficiently armed with the sling of enthusiasm and a pouch loaded with the pebbles of vigour, humility, and proficiency to do battle with and slay any Goliath of intimidation that may oppose us.

We in Canada have been able to profit by the experience of our United States brothers in legislating in a retaliatory manner as the result of a wave of labour strikes. It is, I believe, clear by now that, generally speaking, Canadian workers want to join unions, and do so of their own free will; that, generally speaking, the rank and file dictate the acts of their leaders and back them up. Canadian labour does not like communist machinations any more than do other Canadians. The Minister of Labour should therefore be encouraged and assisted in establishing the best possible conditions conducive to labour and management settling their own differences and reaching their own agreements.

It may be that this can be accomplished simply by refraining from too much legislation; or by making certain that what legal regulation is necessary does not needlessly disrupt long-established practices which both labour and industry have come to accept as being of assistance in maintaining a harmonious and orderly relationship. It is, however, essential that the law continue to protect labour's right to organize, and that the workers be not coerced by employers or minority groups in choosing representatives to speak for them in collective bargaining negotiations.

The labouring man does not want to harm his neighbour or disrupt the orderly operations of his community. He does, however, want to live modestly and peaceably; to be able to care for his family respectably and securely; and to enjoy himself moderately and inoffensively. He has no ideas of world domination, but merely seeks the respect and fellowship of his fellow Canadians. The role of the government, therefore, is not that of policeman intervening in a private quarrel, but merely that of the guardian of the nation's vital needs, acting in the same manner as it does when flood or hurricane strikes, to see that the essential goods or services supplied at the time of the strike shall not be denied our fellow Canadians while an agreement is being found.

A business estimated to bring in a revenue of over $200 million in a year is obviously worth protecting, and encouraging in every conceivable way. The tourist business not only brings in huge amounts of money, but it can be the means whereby every individual in Canada may have his part in creating good will for our country, binding the countries of the world in bonds of peace, and blotting out the scourge of pestilence and war.

Canada has taken some action on conservation, but much more can be done. We have felt that our resources were so vast and our population so small that we could not possibly run out of anything. But in many areas the forests are dwindling and our game, to some extent, is being depleted. One has to have a very intimate knowledge of any accessible locality to be able to procure his limit of fish or ducks. We should therefore be on guard so that our resources of game and fish do not become depleted and our game animals become exhausted, for these have a strong inducement for our tourists.

In this regard the late Jack Miner, during his lifetime, and since his passing the Jack Miner Foundation operated by his sons, have done a remarkable job in conserving wild life in the Dominion of Canada, and, at the same time, publicizing Canada all over the North and South American continents by the method of attaching to the legs of the wild game making landings on the Miner farm, near Kingsville, Ontario, a metal band on which is impressed a comforting message.

Encouragement will, I am sure, be given to the various departments of government having control of large dredging operations to see that the unwanted material dredged from the bottom of the lake or river, when deepening is necessary, is not heaped in unsightly piles along the shore, changing places of beauty into eyesores. Admittedly this is an expensive operation, but is worth the cost in the long run if the natural attraction of the country can be preserved.

Great pains should be taken in this industry to see that high standards are maintained for all public and private services. Hospitable treatment, coupled with spotlessly clean accommodation and wholesome meals prepared with care and attention, will not only make satisfied customers but produce valuable dollars. Here the province of Quebec has an edge over most parts of Canada, for, in that province, great care is taken to serve attractive meals. We should not forget that a dollar in this industry is as valuable in our exchange problem as a dollar's worth of goods exported.

Canada has an abundance of natural beauty, reaching from the rolling countryside of Prince Edward Island, with its red soil, over which roads wind among gleaming white houses and barns against a background of verdant pines with streaks of silver birch, to the mighty trees and pageantry of flowers of Vancouver island. Those who have had the opportunity of visiting the different parts of our country will bring to mind the lavish hospitality and kindness of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, from the Annapolis valley to the Miramichi and St. John river valleys; the vivacious habitants of Quebec; the festive playgrounds of Ontario; the capacious horizon of the prairies, and the softness of the Alberta foothills at the feet of the exalted mountains of British Columbia.

It is difficult in all the vast expanse of Canada to pick out for particular mention, from the infinite array of pleasure grounds in Canada, any one particular locality, but I think it is appropriate to mention the work of the national parks branch of the Department of Mines and Resources. I feel it should be commended for its work all across Canada. The national park at Point Pelee in the constituency of South Essex, adjoining my own constituency, probably has more visitors in any given season than any comparable national park in Canada. It is unique in that the native wild life and plants vary in species more than in any other park we have. It is also the most southerly part of the mainland of Canada. One cannot resist, either, mention of the Jasper national park and lodge in Alberta, dignified in its unaffected simplicity, posed in the magnificence of its distant snow-capped mountains, reflected in the inirritable composure of its emerald lake.

Most motoring tourists prefer to stop in camps. In the United States there are hundreds of modern motels and cabins, equipped with private baths, and especially built to catch the motor tourist. The use of a little planning, a few trees and clipped hedges, comfortable beds and restful rooms will pay high dividends. The motels in and around the city of Victoria, British Columbia, can be pointed to with pride in the beauty of their architecture, the neatness of their surroundings, and the propriety of their accommodation. It is to be hoped that this form of accommodation will be introduced and expanded throughout other parts of Canada.

We welcome tourists to our country and urge all Canada to put forth its hand of cordiality and hospitality.

This country has worked incessantly for peace; yet we will not be found napping in the event of any uprising in any part of the world. Much has been done in a material way to safeguard the Canadian people. We have, perhaps, gone further in unification of our armed services than any other country.

We have a surplus of a great many strategical materials of which only a relatively small number would be in short supply. Consideration, however, must be given to the question of expanding our steel-making capacity. Active steps also have been taken to familiarize the armed forces with the battle techniques of both the British and the United States armed forces. We also are committed to the course of building a navy as befits our world position, and of equipping our air force with the implements which are called for by the times in which we live.

Windsor, being largely industrial and with the reputation of having put the British army on wheels during the last conflict, occupies a strategic point in the Dominion of Canada. H.M.C.S. Hunter is located there, housing the naval reserve unit, the sea cadets and allied activities. We also have an armoury, built many years ago as a home for the Essex Scottish regiment, which, in these latter days, served with such sacred distinction at Dieppe and subsequently in the European theatre of war. To meet the needs of the mechanical age there has also grown up in our area another unit known as the 30th Reconnaissance battalion, largely because of the considerable number of mechanical technicians in that area. During the last war this unit served with pre-eminent honour to our country in North Africa, Italy and the central European theatre. Since there were no quarters wherein to mobilize or train, arrangements were made for this unit to use the armouries already occupied by the Essex Scottish regiment. By keeping the unselfish goal of national service always before them, these two units have worked and prepared side by side in a phenomenal manner. It is to be hoped that, within the not too distant future, ways and means may be found for a new structure ample enough to meet the needs of both units of the active forces and to permit their expansion, as is befitting their importance.

War is not inevitable. Canada neither seeks it nor shuns it. We, however, are going to be prepared to defend ourselves to the limit. While we must take every step possible in a material way by expanding our navy, by training our soldiers, and by building up our navy and air force, yet there is another defence that we must consider. This defence must begin with the individual, with the family in the home.

In the final analysis, we spend huge sums for the protection of the individual. But this protection is superimposed on the individual from outside his consciousness, while much self-protection can be achieved by the individual.

The breeding ground for subversive activities is ignorance and misunderstanding, and this applies to our governmental system and the various departments of government. The Post Office Department has realized that the public should be kept fully informed, and has appointed public relations officers to many leading offices across Canada. These officers have done a most remarkable job in disseminating information concerning all their activities, and have enlisted public support for their requests. Would it not be well for all branches of government to have trained public relations officers assigned to all main offices? Surely in an atmosphere of understanding, industry and co-operation, communism cannot breathe.

People everywhere, under the surface of custom, are fundamentally much alike. Some are good, some are indifferent, and the great majority are in the middle, just as in any family. It is our duty to stand side by side, strengthening and guiding those who are weak or would be misled.

The world is like a family into whose membership all sorts of strange people have been suddenly and permanently introduced. We must, therefore, try to discover the virtues in the members of our family and to enlist their loyalty.

The one great shining hope is that practical necessity may bring to practical application the truth, which every great moralist through the ages has preached in futility, that "men are brothers". What if one of the family does insist on sowing his solitary patch of wild oats? Let us maintain the family, and when the prodigal returns, as he usually does, he will find a warm welcome.

We are indeed more than pleased to observe with what enthusiasm and ability the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) has assumed his new duties, which had formerly been so ably administered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The 275,000 houses which have been built in Canada in the last four years have probably set a record for any similar period. Of this number, approximately 100,000 have been built directly by crown companies or with government financial assistance.

In 1948 there were about 83,000 units completed, of which about 9,000 were government rental units. This year, we are informed the minister has set a higher goal and hopes to complete 11,000 rental units, which is about 2,000 more than last year.

This is good news to the many veterans and civilians in my constituency, as I am sure it is to many other constituencies in which there are people living in most unsatisfactory accommodation.

Since the success of such federal building projects depends so much on provincial and municipal co-operation, we feel sure that continued assistance will be accorded the minister in this field.

The constituency which I represent, Mr. Speaker, is appreciative of the invitation which the Prime Minister has extended to me to move the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The constituency of Essex West is an urban constituency, comprising the former city of Windsor, as it was constituted prior to amalgamation, the contiguous former town of Sandwich, and the suburban township of Sandwich West. It also includes the towns of La Salle and Ojibway.

Windsor's geographical position has a peculiar interest in that it is the only Canadian city which is directly south of a part of the United States. It is connected with the neighbouring metropolis of Detroit, Michigan, by tunnels, bridge and car ferries. Thirty-five years ago the city of Windsor was a quiet city of about 16,000 people, but today it has a population of approximately 125,000. Two small Indian villages were the first beginnings of the border settlements. They were at the terminus of Indian trails which crossed Essex county and terminated at the narrowest point of the river, the most convenient crossing place.

What the Indians recognized as a strategic point was also realized by the first white visitors. In 1701 the French first arrived at this point, and this French settlement grew gradually until 1763, when the English first entered the settlement. Since then these two races have grown side by side. The coming of the British settlers into the Detroit river area was the beginning of the cosmopolitan atmosphere of that district.

Windsor, being located on the international boundary line, has naturally developed into a cosmopolitan centre, part American and part Canadian. It has offered many advantages for the location of industries from the United States in that it is the Canadian city closest to most of the main offices of the mid-west centres. It has quick and efficient transportation lines by rail, water and air, which has allowed the executive and the technician to cross back and forth expeditiously.

As a focal point for transportation, Windsor is the open end of the bottleneck of western Ontario which juts southwardly into the United States. It is located on the most heavily laden inland waterway in the world, the Detroit river, with a channel depth of about forty feet, carrying an average of about 81 million tons of freight annually. This is more freight than is carried by the Panama and Suez canals combined.

Manufacturing in Windsor has the international flavour, its basis being American plants, located across the border, supplying the Canadian and British empire markets. The industry of Windsor plays a magnificent role in Canada, based largely on the automobile trade. It also has the largest concentration of pharmaceutical industries in the British empire, as well as its large salt and chemical plants. Windsor is also the home of the Windsor Daily Star, which is widely read throughout Canada, and is most favourably known in this house, and for many given periods has been the most quoted daily newspaper in Canada. There, too, we have radio station CKLW, which is the voice of Canada to millions of Americans.

May I through you, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the constituency of Essex West, extend to the right hon. the Prime Minister a most cordial invitation to visit at an early date our part of the country, the sun parlour of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak in French but I regret my inability to do so.

(Text):

I have the honour and privilege of moving, seconded by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Demers):

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Viscount Alexander of Tunis, Governor General and Commander in Chief of the Dominion of Canada.

May it Please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

(Translation):

Mr. Leopold Demers (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I was deeply moved yesterday when I came into this house for the first time. May I be allowed to share my joy and happiness with the constituents of Laval-Two Mountains who placed their confidence in me on December 20 last. I also wish to thank the Prime Minister for the very great honour which he bestowed upon me in asking me to second this motion.

An analysis of the Liberal victory in Laval-Two Mountains clearly shows that it was due to three specific factors: first, the eager wish of the people of that constituency to give the Liberal party, of which I have the honour of being a member, a living token of their gratitude; the skill of the Hon. Joseph Jean who recently became Liberal leader in the province of Quebec; finally, and more particularly, Mr. Speaker, the prestige, the exceptional qualities of a great Canadian, the Liberal leader and Prime Minister of our country, the Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear!

Mr. Demers: The long awaited news of a royal birth, that of Prince Charles of Edinburgh, over which the whole Christian world rejoiced, came last November.

Reverence for the great family that has ruled the British people for many long years with such dignity filled the hearts of all who are devoted to the family tradition. We cannot cease to marvel that the royal family boasts four living generations in this, the twentieth century, when so many thrones, unsteadied by the troublesome events of our day, have toppled over.

It seems that the Almighty has preserved to this throne the power with which it was endowed from above because those who exercise it know their duty as sovereigns and carry it out worthily.

To Their Majesties the King and Queen, to their children, to the new-born Prince, health and long life.

Canada, Mr. Speaker, has been fortunate in being served, governed and administered by men of faith and fortitude, and today we are envied the world over. No country has had more humble beginnings, and yet Cartier, his work well done, uttered the words which are still sung today: "Nothing is so beautiful as one's native land." Gazing over the results of fifteen years of government and looking back at the road he had traveled, Laurier exclaimed: "The twentieth century shall be Canada's century." We have not yet reached the year 1950 and already the twentieth century is Canada's century. In 1908, when Mr. Mackenzie King was first elected to parliament, one half of our present population was still unborn. We had but just recently ceased being a colony. The first impetus had been given by Laurier, but nearly everything remained to be done. Mr. Mackenzie King did it, and did it well.

Mr. Martin: Hear, hear!

Mr. Demers: Through his tenacity and perseverance, we have acquired such highly-prized assets as political freedom, social security and national sovereignty. He has placed our country on the map of the world. His love of humanity has inspired a whole program of social legislation which arouses the admiration of strangers and ensures the happiness of Canadians.

I do not wish to anticipate the judgment of history but, when time has passed over the memory of political conflict, of those injustices and calumnies which have been his lot and which he has supported with such patience, I am sure that history, in its finest pages, will reckon him a man of destiny. Time, no respecter of fine things, has unfortunately not spared him. It was with great misgivings that, last fall, every true Canadian learned, from Mr. Mackenzie King's own mouth, that he was about to transfer to someone else's shoulders the weighty mantle of honours. It was then that from every part of the country came Canadians, not only to choose a new political chieftain for a party proud of its past, in which it finds inspiration for the future, proud of a name it has never changed, proud of a flag it has never abandoned and which it will keep for those days of victory which should not be long in coming, but in order to choose a chief for our government.

All these Liberal Canadians were aware of their responsibilities. They knew the hour was grave, that Canada had to keep marching gloriously toward its destinies, that we had to choose a prime minister who would carry on the work which was so well begun.

A man whose worth is already recognized the world over was chosen as leader: he is the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. His talents, his experience, his patriotism and his great Canadian spirit had already won the confidence and respect of his fellow citizens.

In order to guarantee to the Canadian people the liberty, security and unity which they need so much, in order to allow our country to play its part in the national as well as in the international field; in order to destroy the universal enemy who seeks to spread everywhere his diabolical philosophy, communism, that heresy of the century which the history of the world will consider as the greatest humiliation to the human mind, could we have found a better man than Mr. St. Laurent? Immediately on his coming, we note a widening of our horizons and Newfoundland becomes our tenth province, thus completing this country and consolidating its boundaries; in order to protect themselves against Russian imperialism, the Christian nations concur in Mr. St. Laurent's views and undertake to enter into an agreement called the Atlantic pact, thus forming the greatest co-operative peace movement the world has ever seen. He has been successful in convincing other nations that the intelligent organization of an equitable and lasting peace is far less costly than war. That peace policy, Mr. Speaker, is nothing but the response of Christian people to the appeals of Christian conscience. I do not doubt that if the message directed to the whole world by Pope Pius XII on Christmas day were heeded, the clouds of uneasiness which hang over us would soon vanish.

The splendid speech we heard yesterday from His Excellency, the King's representative, includes also the announcement of measures designed to secure more sovereignty for our country and more happiness and peace for her citizens.

The abolition of appeals to the privy council is indeed a giant stride towards a more complete autonomy. The highest court before which any Canadian may appear to get justice shall be right here in Canada. The maintaining of rent control by the federal government, if the provinces want to elude their responsibilities, is another measure ensuring greater security to our people and especially to our working class. Farmers, who are the foundation of our national life, also get special attention from the government so that they may continue to be happy citizens, loving their farms, their province and their country, and playing nobly the providential part with which they have been entrusted.

All those measures contained in the speech from the throne and upon which I shall not dwell, knowing full well that all hon. members of this house will have an opportunity to discuss them in their smallest details, clearly show the government's earnest wish to promote the best interests of the Canadian people.

The leader of the government needs the good will of all in order to carry on his work of pacification and lead this country towards a better future. Whatever may be our origin or creed, we owe a duty to our country. For my part, I may say that I am proud to be a French Canadian, I am proud of my religious and political leaders because I know what a generous part they have taken in the building up of this country. I also know that the same applies to my English-speaking fellow citizens; they are proud of their religious and political leaders who have achieved so much for the cause of freedom, not only in Canada but throughout the world.

Together we have rights and privileges, protected and guaranteed by constitution and statute.

If Canada is to be a better and bigger country tomorrow, its two great component races must keep on living in harmony, understanding and mutual respect.

(Text):

In closing I should like to say a few words to my English-speaking Canadian friends, to tell them that I am proud and happy to be here today. I am proud to be a Canadian; I am proud of my leaders, both in church and in politics, because I am aware of the contribution they have made to our country.

I know, too, that English-speaking Canadians have every right to feel the same about their leaders, who have been the champions of liberty throughout Canada and the world. All of us should be thankful for our respective rights and privileges, which are protected by our constitution and our laws. Tomorrow, if we desire to have a more prosperous Canada, these two groups, the English and French speaking Canadians, along with minorities, have only to continue to live and work in harmony, good understanding and mutual respect.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I thank you heartily for the indulgence and generosity with which you have listened to me.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

On motion of Mr. Drew the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow there will be some formalities with respect to some of the resolutions appearing in today's Votes and Proceedings so that they may be advanced one stage. Then we will proceed with the debate on the address. As to the motion in Votes and Proceedings, if I may have unanimous consent I will ask that it be modified by changing the dates to the corresponding dates one week later.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 28, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

AUDIBILITY OF DEBATE—QUESTION OF USE OF PUBLIC ADDRESS SYSTEM

Mr. Maxime Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I rise on a question of privilege. I believe it is the privilege, or rather I should say the right, of every member sitting in this chamber to be able to hear the speeches delivered in this house. Unfortunately those who sit in this corner and those who are sitting in the corner opposite cannot do so; and I may add without fear of contradiction that at least fifty per cent of the members of this house are unable to hear most of the speeches made in this chamber. As a result they are unable to understand not only the speeches but the conversations, which take place at the opening of almost every sitting, between the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition, and this means that we must wait until the next morning to read in the newspapers or in Hansard what took place the previous day.

Many times the attention of the former leader of the house was called to this condition, but to no avail. Now that we have a new leader of the government I would ask him to consider this matter very seriously. I have no doubt that it will be easy to convince him, for no later than yesterday, when the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown), began to deliver his speech, the Prime Minister left his seat and came to this corner in order that he might follow what was being said. I hope some action will be taken in the very near future.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right; the acoustics of this chamber are bad, though they are not worse than they have been for the thirty years this chamber has been in use. Yesterday, as the hon. member has just recalled, I did move from my seat to the other corner of the house in order that I might enjoy the magnificent addresses being made on the motion to present an address to His Excellency in reply to the speech from the throne. The acoustics are no better in this part of the house than they are in the other corners, and when speeches are being made from the far corner it is just as difficult for those of us who habitually sit here to follow them closely as it is for my friends in those sections of the house to follow closely what is being said at this end.

This unfortunate circumstance has been long known to all members of the house. I am sure it has not escaped your attention, Mr. Speaker, for, if I am not mistaken, over the last three years you have investigated systems designed to improve the acoustics in legislative chambers in other countries. My understanding is that you have not so far found in use anywhere a system which was sufficiently appropriate to justify your recommending it to the members of this house. I hope that before long it will be possible for you to find somewhere a system which you will feel justified in recommending to your colleagues in this chamber to improve the situation in regard to acoustics.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as a newcomer here and as one who—

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Drew: As a newcomer here and as one whose voice is not ordinarily regarded as unduly weak, I must confess I have noticed some difficulty in hearing the speakers in this chamber. As the member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) was bringing this matter to the attention of the house, I had great difficulty in hearing what he was saying. I do feel it is not necessary to explore very extensively the possibilities of solving this problem because it has been solved, and effectively solved, in the chamber of deputies in Paris and in the legislative assembly in Rome where there is, in fact, loud speaker equipment between every two desks by means of which a loud speaker can be installed when anyone is speaking.

There would be no practical difficulty of any kind in installing a small microphone, which would not be unduly expensive, between every desk in this chamber so that every member, everyone in the gallery, and perhaps most important, every member of the press gallery would be able to hear what was said.

Mr. Speaker: It is not the practice of the speaker to enter into a debate—

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Speaker: —and it is not my intention to do so. As the Right Hon. the Prime Minister has already said hon. members may be assured that representations have been made to me in this regard by members of the house, members of the press gallery and visitors to this house. I would be very pleased if a system could be found which would give satisfaction. I think it is my duty, though, to call the attention of the hon. leader of the opposition to the fact that one of the difficulties in adopting the method used in the French house or the Italian house or even in the congress of the United States is the fact that in most of these places the members speak from a rostrum. This means only one microphone need be connected to the loud speaker.

Here, the problem is quite different, but the hon. members may be assured that they have all my sympathy. The Speaker experiences considerable difficulty in hearing what is going on in the house. I will do everything possible to give you satisfaction, though I consider it my duty not to recommend an expensive installation which would not give satisfaction. You may depend upon it, however, that I will do my very best, in consultation with the proper officials, to make a recommendation satisfactory to all hon. members as soon as possible.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps you will permit me to say a word in view of the fact that you have referred to what I have said. In the French and Italian chambers the ministers speak from the rostrum, but the members speak from their seats. I believe that system would work here.

SUPREME COURT ACT

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS—ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Garson: This bill comprises a number of amendments the purpose of which is to clarify existing sections in the act; they involve no change in principle. There is, however, one notable change, and that is the proposal to abolish appeals from the Supreme Court of Canada to the privy council.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT—ORGANIZATIONS ADVOCATING OVERTHROW OF CONSTITUTED AUTHORITY

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Criminal Code (illegal organizations) and the Canadian Citizenship Act (loss of Canadian citizenship).

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Speaker, in explanation may I say that a new item has been added to this bill, which is well known to the hon. members of this house. Article 98A of the Criminal Code has been amended as follows:

(1) It shall be unlawful for any person:

(a) to attempt in any manner to establish in Canada a totalitarian dictatorship the direction and control of which is to be vested in, or exercised by or under the domination or control of, any foreign government, foreign organization, or foreign individual;

(b) to perform or attempt to perform any act with intent to facilitate or aid in bringing about the establishment in Canada of such a totalitarian dictatorship;

(c) actively to participate in the management, direction, or supervision of any movement to establish in Canada such a totalitarian dictatorship;

(d) actively to participate in the management, direction, or supervision of any movement to facilitate or aid in bringing about the establishment in Canada of such a totalitarian dictatorship;

(e) to conspire to do anything unlawful by this subsection.

I want to add one remark, Mr. Speaker, and it is this. If the C.C.F., as I hope, is in no way connected with communism—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. LaCroix: —the members of that party will surely not make lengthy speeches on this bill, as they did last year, but will allow it to reach a vote.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL FLAG

PROVISION FOR FLAG TO BE DECLARED THE NATIONAL FLAG OF CANADA

Mr. Roland Beaudry (St. James) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, respecting a national flag for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Beaudry: The purpose of the bill is to provide for a national flag for Canada. The description of the flag is appended in a schedule to the bill. I hope that within a few days I shall have the privilege of distributing to the members of this house a facsimile of this flag.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NEWFOUNDLAND

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS ACT

EXTENSION OF OPERATION FOR A PERIOD OF ONE YEAR

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Agricultural Products Act to extend the operation of the act for a period of one year.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FISH INSPECTION ACT

FISH AND FISH CONTAINERS—MARINE PLANTS —EXPORT AND IMPORT REGULATIONS

Hon. Robert W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure for the purpose of regulating the export and import of fish and fish containers and the export of marine plants, and the appointment of inspectors and other officers and employees required for the proper administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Proposed Legislation

TRANSITIONAL MEASURES ACT, 1947

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works, for the Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS— MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7, TO FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday, January 31, 1949, and every sitting day thereafter until and including Friday, February 11, 1949, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills.

He said: In referring to this motion yesterday I stated that if I had the consent of the house I would ask that there be substituted, for the dates January 31 and February 11, respectively, the dates February 7 and February 18. On referring to the rules, however, I find that the regular way to handle the matter is not by amending my own motion but by presenting it in its present form and leaving it to some other hon. member to propose the proper amendment, if he sees fit to do so.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I move:

That the motion be amended by replacing in the first line thereof the words "January 31" by the words "February 7," and by replacing in the second line thereof the words "February 11" by the words "February 18".

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, before any remarks are made in connection with this motion, I think the house should have some indication of the reasons why there is any cause to consider it at the present time. I would point out that yesterday afternoon the Prime Minister said that in any event it was the intention of the government to proceed during the coming week with the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. For that reason there is no evidence of any necessity for the consideration of this motion this afternoon. Certainly nothing has been put before the house which would suggest any reason for supporting such a motion.

Mr. St. Laurent: The reason for making the motion is to determine now that on February 7 we may proceed with the resolutions and legislation necessary to implement the agreement for the union of Newfoundland with Canada. It is an express term of that agreement for union that it will come into force and bring about the union if there is assented to, by His Majesty, a bill of the parliament of the United Kingdom confirming legislation passed by this parliament and by the government of Newfoundland ratifying the terms of that agreement. That procedure requires that there be in this house first of all a resolution, the one that was mentioned first under the heading "government notices of motions" today. That resolution is necessary before any bill can be introduced, because a bill to confirm the agreement will impose charges upon the consolidated revenue fund. Then the bill itself must run the gauntlet of the usual stages of procedure in this house and in the other place before it can become the law of the land. It is felt that it would be undesirable to have the matter dealt with at all by the parliament of the United Kingdom until the parliament of Canada has expressed the views of the people of Canada with respect to the union. Before the parliament of the United Kingdom will attempt to deal with the matter at all, in order to comply with the terms of the statute of Westminster there will be required a joint address of this house and of the senate asking His Majesty to lay before the parliament of the United Kingdom a bill embodying the proper legislation.

When I was over in London some months ago I had some discussion on this subject with members of the government of the United Kingdom, and I was told that they would like to have not less than three weeks to deal with the legislation in their houses of parliament after the proceedings had been completed here. It is therefore urgent, I think, that we reach this matter and ascertain, at as early a date as possible, the views of the parliament of Canada upon the terms of union that were signed last December. It was for that reason that, when I announced to the gentlemen of the press the date that was fixed for the session, I explained to them that we were calling parliament together on a Wednesday instead of a Thursday, as had been done in several previous years, so that there might be a couple of days of debate on the address before we asked parliament to suspend the debate and deal with the matters concerning Newfoundland, as it had been our intention to ask parliament to do at the time specified in the motion as printed on the order paper.

When notice of this motion was given I found that there were many members of parliament on both sides of the house who felt that it was not necessary to commence on January 31 in order to have the Newfoundland proceedings properly dealt with in time, and that they wished to have at least another full week of debate on the address before adjourning it.

It is my view that we do generally make better progress in dealing with the substantive business of parliament if we do not have too many disputes over matters of procedure, and I would take it for granted that we would be probably just as far advanced with the Newfoundland matter after a week or two if we met the wishes of hon. members who wish to have an additional week to debate the address.

The reason for bringing the motion forward is to have it fixed, that we will start on this matter on February 7, and to inform the law officers of the United Kingdom of this change, which we hope will not necessarily mean that we shall be delaying them in putting before them, if parliament approves of the agreement, the required material so that it can be dealt with in orderly fashion in the United Kingdom parliament.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I assure the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and hon. members that on any procedural matters that will facilitate the business of this house he will find the full concurrence of myself as leader of the opposition and those associated with me; but that concurrence does not extend to the point of departing from well established practices, for which departure no substantial reason can be offered. The reasons now presented by the Prime Minister offer no justification whatever for presenting this motion today. I would point out that throughout the whole record of the House of Commons, not only in this chamber but in other chambers in early buildings since confederation, in the majority of occasions on which the debate on the speech from the throne has proceeded without interruption it has actually been completed within the time which would elapse between now and next Friday.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Drew: Some hon. members, of course, are basing their views on recent experience, which is not traditionally the experience of this house, if they examine the record.

[Interruption.]

I do not wonder that hon. members at the other end of the chamber have difficulty in hearing the debate when it seems so difficult for some hon. members to keep their own thoughts inaudible.

The motion that is before the house at the present time is one which has the effect of terminating the debate on the address before anyone in the house knows whether in fact it will still be going on next Friday. It is a very easy matter to examine the record of Hansard and to ascertain that postponing the debate and then reviving it, and thereby bringing back the subject matter that was under consideration, inevitably prolongs the whole debate. But there are other reasons why this motion should not be accepted by hon. members without a great deal more explanation than has been offered. The date on which agreement was called for between the parliament of Canada and the representatives of Newfoundland, described in the agreement as the government of Newfoundland, was March 31. That date was decided on before the government had fixed the date of the session. If there was any reason to believe that additional time was needed it would have been very easy to have fixed an earlier date for the opening of the session so that the debate on the speech from the throne could have proceeded in an orderly way to its customary termination without interruption, such as is now suggested.

It is difficult to imagine what the urgency is which suggests that it is necessary to have this bill considered a week from Monday, particularly when more than two months will still elapse between the date on which agreement is required and today. After all, there is no reason to suggest that any extended delay will be involved in presenting the views of this house to Westminster, because it is inconceivable that the government of Canada has not already presented all the facts to the government of the United Kingdom other than the appropriate indication of such decision as may be reached by this parliament. That being so, the time that is suggested as being necessary for these proceedings seems to bear no relationship whatever to any reasonable requirements to deal with this matter in the ordinary way.

There is of course another and very much more cogent reason why this motion should not be accepted by hon. members. The rules of this house are not different from the rules of any other house. Please do not think for one moment that I am unaware of the tactics that can be employed in delaying the consideration of a debate on the speech from the throne, because if it is delayed the government finds an opportunity to introduce a number of extraneous subject matters which in their opinion will divert public attention from the inadequacy of the statements in the speech from the throne and from the weaknesses in the position of the government. I am certainly convinced that this is the reason the adjournment is sought, rather than the reason that has been suggested in the house today. It will of course be very convenient if the striking omissions from the speech from the throne are supplemented by appropriate statements from day to day by various ministers who will make those bright promises which the minister of reconstruction does not think are as useful as they once were.

But these can go on from day to day in the intervening period. And of course it would appear that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) holds a similar view. These can go on indefinitely—and this is nothing new. I think the hon. members of this house not only on the opposition side but on the government side should seek to have an explanation on the one hand in regard to certain statements, which are extremely vague, in the speech from the throne and—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: I will debate it on the appropriate occasion.

An hon. Member: Speak to the motion.

Mr. Howe: Are you speaking on the speech from the throne?

Mr. Cruickshank: I thought you knew the rules.

Mr. Drew: I think it is very obvious that a number of motions can be padded out with various statements that can be introduced on the one hand by presentation to the house, and on the other hand by those interesting pieces of information which appear in the press throughout Canada, without any names attached to them, stating that the press is authoritatively informed from someone very close to the minister that such and such a thing is going to be done.

There is of course a still further reason, and one which, it seems to me, is very difficult for some hon. members opposite to dispute: that is, that the debate on the speech from the throne is no mere formality, as some people seem to suggest from time to time. It is in fact the most important debate in many cases which will take place in any legislative assembly. Because, under the practice established here, as in every other parliament or legislature within the commonwealth, the debate on the speech from the throne offers an opportunity to the house to say by its vote whether the government still commands the confidence of the House of Commons. It may be a comfortable assumption on the part of the government that they can look at the list of members and count every vote according to the places where they seat themselves in the house. But if any house of commons or legislative assembly reduces itself to a position where individual discretion, intelligence and conscience mean nothing, then there might just as well be no recorded vote at all, and the vote might just as well be taken from the printed sheet.

The fact is that members of this House of Commons and other legislative bodies in the country have demonstrated that measure of independence which is the hallmark of free parliaments. There is no reason on this or any other occasion to assume that merely because of the tag on which a member was elected he is simply to become a servile digit to be named by the leader of his group, without any respect for his own conscience, when some subject is before the house.

The practice is very well established, and on this occasion I think it would be well if I were to place before the house the opinion of a member whose virtues have been loudly extolled by a number of hon. members opposite as one who understands the real meaning of parliament, and of this parliament particularly. I would quote the words of the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King). It is true that we have not always agreed on every subject; but in this instance surely I can offer to hon. members opposite no better advice than that of the man for whom they have shown such unreserved respect in these past few days and for whose opinion they have the highest regard.

Therefore I should like to read what the right hon. member for Glengarry said in 1921, as it is reported at page 151, volume I of Hansard for that year. These words, it seems to me, set forth the very core of the consideration that should be in our minds. I shall quote his words, and these will be his words until I have indicated that the quotation is ended:

> We take the position that without the confidence of this house and of the country they are not entitled to introduce a bill or to spend a dollar; and unless my right hon. friend can show us some precedent for adjourning the debate on a motion of want of confidence in the government to take up another matter, we would be justified I think in adhering to the position which we have taken from the outset, namely that the government lacks the confidence of the country, and therefore is not entitled to proceed with any legislation.

There the quotation ends.

The mere fact that the want of confidence motion has not yet been moved varies in no way the effectiveness of this statement—because the only reason there is no want of confidence motion before the house is that this motion has been introduced before the debate has been resumed. The view put forth there by the right hon. gentleman is one in which I think all hon. members might well concur; because if for any reason members in the house do not support the government, then the government may well have committed itself to a course with which it had no right to proceed, unless that confidence has once been established.

There may of course be varying reasons. We would simply not recognize reality if we were to say that there could be no occasion upon which some emergency situation might arise where a motion of this kind might be called for, if the debate were to be unreasonably protracted. But no such situation arises now. The debate is going on next week, by decision of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his colleagues. That being so, until there is any indication whatever that an emergency actually presents itself, and the debate is in fact proceeding next Friday, there is no reason whatever to support the motion. It should be opposed in principle in any event. But even without that, the motion is wholly unnecessary, and therefore it is opposed.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, when the proposal was first made that the debate should be interrupted from today, my colleagues felt the request was one we could not approve. The government, however, has compromised to this extent, that next week the debate on the address will continue, and that at the end of next week we shall take up the matter of union with Newfoundland.

I think it is unfortunate that this debate must be interrupted, but my experience in the twelve years I have been here is that normally the debate on the address lasts anywhere from three to six weeks. I realize that there is great urgency in connection with the Newfoundland agreement, but that urgency arises because of a situation not in our own country or in our own parliament but in the British parliament. May I say that that is the reason why we shall support the amended resolution that has been introduced this afternoon. At the moment the British house is engaged in many important matters dealing not only with their own grave domestic situation but with the international situation as well. I think we owe it to them, if they require at least three weeks to deal with this matter, to see that they have ample time in which to consider this agreement, which according to newspaper reports will be opposed by some members of the opposition in the British House of Commons.

While we dislike these interruptions of the debate on the address, on this occasion we think that the government has a better reason for asking for an interruption than it has had on any other occasion I can remember. When we first saw the request made by the government we felt, particularly in view of the experience of last year, that we should hesitate and consider carefully whether we should consent to such an interruption. From time to time, however, it is necessary that those of us who are in opposition should view matters of government convenience, particularly when they involve courtesy to another parliament, in a broad way. I repeat that we have decided to support this amended resolution.

I would remind hon. members that many weeks ago, in the autumn, we asked that parliament be called to deal with matters of urgency, and of course this has become one of the matters that could have been dealt with had parliament been called before Christmas or earlier this month. This is the criticism I make of the government at the moment—that the session should have been called earlier. But it was not called earlier, and we are now faced with the necessity of giving consideration to union with Newfoundland. After all, this is a most important event in the history of this country—the addition of a new province, something which was contemplated by the fathers of confederation as long ago as 1867 and, in relation to what will be the tenth province, is about to be consummated in 1949.

I say again that we dislike interruptions to the debate on the address. We believe that this interruption could have been avoided by calling parliament earlier. But since parliament was not called, since the union of Newfoundland with Canada is an important matter which should be dealt with, and since we should give the British parliament ample time in which to deal with it and to plan its work, we will support the amended resolution.

Mr. Roland Beaudry (St. James): Following the words of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar I should like to ask the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew) if he suggested earlier that parliament should have been convened sooner, for instance at a time when it was impossible for the leader of the opposition to have a seat in this house?

Mr. Graydon: The hon. member did not make history with that remark.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the explanation of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and to the arguments advanced by the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell). I agree with the hon. member that everything should be done to enable consideration at the earliest possible day of the resolution with regard to the admission of Newfoundland into confederation. With him I agree also that that event will represent a step forward in the completion of the destiny of this dominion. In that regard I am in agreement with him; but he failed to answer the argument advanced, and the government has as yet not answered the argument of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), that first and foremost the government of this country must have the confidence of the House of Commons.

This resolution carries out an old plan; there is nothing new about it. Parliament could have been called three weeks ago, if not before, and this matter could have been determined.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I cannot hear the interruptions, so I shall not say anything in reply. It was most interesting to hear the interrupters on the other side of the house when my leader said that the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne might be determined within a week. They ridiculed that statement; they jeered.

An hon. Member: Certainly they did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. says that it will take anywhere from three to six weeks to complete that debate. Having regard to the fact that an election is not too far away, I have no doubt that this debate will take a considerable time. If so, the responsibility rests upon the Prime Minister for failing to call parliament together early enough to have this matter determined.

Mr. McIlraith: Even without a leader of the opposition?

Mr. Graydon: You will get plenty of him before you are through.

Mr. Diefenbaker: During the days of the war we in the opposition co-operated with the government at all times.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In relation to anything having to do with our war effort, the words of the hon. member for Carleton were to that effect. During the war there were invasions of the rights of a free parliament, but we of the opposition intend to be assured that they shall not be continued in the days of peace. More than anything else the people of this country are asking that parliament be restored to the prestige that it enjoyed in the years prior to the war. They are asking that parliament shall not continue in living stagnation while government by bureaucracy continues in this country. They are asking to have restored the right of the people's representatives to preserve the rights of the people and to represent all the people in this country. I congratulate my right hon. friend upon becoming Prime Minister, but I say to him that his duty as the leader of this government, with the reshuffling of the cards that has taken place and the addition of certain members to the cabinet, is to demand at the first opportunity a vote of confidence, thus giving to hon. members the opportunity to determine the question once and for all.

I do not want to be over-critical—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said over-critical; but I do say to my right hon. friend that in the last couple of days the government has shown an uncertainty, a lack of unity, and a failure to realize in what direction it is going except in the direction of an election. We have the right to know whether my right hon. friend and those associated with him have the confidence of this house. The people want the members of this parliament to have an opportunity to let the government know that its taxation policy is wrong, that its income tax is unjust. When I say this I speak for the farmers. The government says it has the confidence of the people. The farmers want an opportunity of having their lack of confidence in this government placed before this house, because that lack of confidence extends from one end of the country to the other.

My hon. leader says members of parliament are not mere digits to be pushed about, to be directed. Not since the end of the war was there a finer declaration of the principles of parliament and what it stands for than was contained in the words of my hon. leader this afternoon when he pointed out that, regardless of our position, we in this house have a responsibility which can be discharged only when each of us individually votes on the question of confidence or non-confidence in the government. I say to my right hon. friend that he should give the members of this house an opportunity of saying to him and to those associated with him—and I should think they would want it—whether this house has any confidence in them, before they proceed with notices of motions and resolutions calling for the expenditure of millions of dollars. On one occasion the right hon. member for Carleton expressed similar views.

Some hon. Members: Glengarry.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Glengarry has been represented so often by leaders of the opposition and prime ministers that it is easy to understand the mistake I just made. I say, sir, that the house should be given the opportunity of declaring whether or not it has confidence in this government. My right hon. friend should not translate into the days of peace the conduct of parliament in the days of war, which all too often was contrary to the highest principles of constitutional government. We on this side intend to do our utmost to see that the invasions of parliamentary rights, which were pathways in the days of war, do not become permanent highways of peace.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am glad hon. members opposite are beginning to show some evidence of awakening from their normal lethargy, and I trust that this degree of awakening will extend also to the rights of this house which are placed in jeopardy by the motion now under debate. It would be a happy day indeed if we could see on the part of hon. members to your right, Mr. Speaker, some degree of concern for constitutional practices and the preservation of the rights and responsibilities of a free parliament.

Let no one underestimate the importance of the subject now under discussion. It is not a mere question of procedure for today or procedure for Monday. What is at issue here goes far deeper than that. It is procedure measured in terms of the duties and responsibilities of the executive branch of government to this house. Is the government supreme? If so, it matters little what happens here, and certainly the motion should pass. If, however, the house is supreme, then it is the house that should determine the order in which business shall be taken up; and above all things, before this government is permitted to lay any business before the house, it must establish, in the recognized constitutional manner, that it possesses the confidence of the house. Under conditions now obtaining in this house and this country the government has no right to lay before this chamber one item of government business calling for a decision without having established that it does possess the confidence of the house.

Consider exactly what it means if this motion is adopted. In the first place, it means the government has asserted that the time of this house must be rationed. It means that the government asserts its right to sidetrack the important debate on the address in favour of a measure it proposes to introduce. It means also, in effect, that the government does not owe a primary responsibility to the house. It is time this house, out of self-respect, out of a sense of responsibility for the maintenance of its constitutional position in the interests of freedom in this country, asserted its right to determine the kind of government that should occupy the seats of office; and that can be determined under present circumstances only by a vote in this house which will show the confidence hon. members are prepared to extend to or withhold from the government.

At no time in the life of this parliament was it more important that the debate on the address should proceed without interruption until it was established whether or not the government held the confidence of the house. Hon. members opposite seem to forget that, technically at least, there has been a change of government with the change of prime ministers, that there has been a change in portfolios, though in most cases the same ministers were reappointed. It is in that sense a different government; and it has not established in any particular that it possesses the confidence of the house.

Perhaps I should not have been amazed, but I must confess to some degree of surprise that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) should have submitted so weakly this afternoon in the face of the government's steam roller. That is evidence of an altogether too friendly association between Liberal members and the C.C.F. party in this house. If that is to be an example of the way in which that group is to function in opposition, then I suggest it come out in its true colours and proclaim itself as simply a wing of the government party. If we are to have a continuation of that attitude the criticism of government policy we may expect from the C.C.F. party during this session will be a very friendly, mild and ladylike kind of criticism.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there has been an attempt on the other side to ridicule the importance of this debate. The reason is perfectly obvious, Mr. Speaker. The fact of the matter is that the debate on the address gives the members of the opposition, yes, and such other private members of the house as choose to assert their freedom and responsibility as members of the house, an opportunity to stand in their places and criticize the government on its past record, on its policy, on the contents of the speech from the throne, and on the omissions from it. Not only is this a duty; it is a responsibility which every member of the house must exercise according to his rights if he would do his duty by those whom he represents.

Necessarily, any government characterized by such flaws in its record affords very great opportunity for criticism. If this debate is not throttled, or sidetracked by the government steam roller, there will be plenty of criticism of the government in this chamber during the course of this debate. Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that a government which has shown itself so impatient of criticism would desire in this way to throttle criticism? That is precisely the issue which is before the house today. Shall criticism have a free voice in a free parliament? It is that issue that will be determined in the vote on this resolution today.

This resolution means precisely what it says. It signifies that the government is not prepared to permit parliament, in the ordinary way, to proceed in freedom to express criticism of government policy. The reason becomes all the more obvious in the light of what has been said of late—supposedly emanating from government circles or sources close to the government, and referred to by my esteemed leader— about the possibility of a general election. What could better suit the purposes of a government, such as the one in office today, than, on the eve of an election, to throttle criticism in this house, and this at a time when much criticism is being heard from the people of this country. That is the measure of the government's sense of responsibility to those to whom it owes responsibility, that, at this above all times, it should seek to stifle criticism.

In this house the day before yesterday, Mr. Speaker, we went through a form which is followed on the opening day in every parliament which stems from the mother of parliaments. In the measure which has been traditionally introduced respecting the administration of the oaths of office, the house asserts its right to proceed with business of its choosing without first having to take up the program laid down before it in the speech from the throne. Is that an empty formality? Is it simply a reminder that in days gone by a free parliament found itself at odds with a monarch?

It goes a good deal further than that, Mr. Speaker. It amounts to the assertion, if this house has the courage to assert what it should, of the right of the house to proceed with its business in the proper way. In this instance no business can be taken up, if that constitutional position is to be preserved, until the government has established that it possesses the confidence of the house.

The same old mentality dominates this government as dominated the one which it succeeded last fall. There is the same old complex; the same old bureaucratic approach to all of these problems; the same contempt for parliament; the same irresponsibility in its attitude towards the elected representatives of the people in this house. If this is a new government, Mr. Speaker, it has learned its constitutional practice from the government which preceded it, and that was a poor way to learn sound constitutional practice. It was a very good way to learn oligarchic practice.

If this is a new government, it is not yet a reformed government, since it has the same old mentality that imposed taxation by radio and in many ways heaped contempt upon parliament.

Let me turn for a moment to a high authority, to no less a person than the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). Concerning this government and its attitude to such matters, he spoke words from which hon. members opposite would do well to profit. I will quote, Mr. Speaker, from a speech of the hon. and esteemed member for Quebec South, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of August 9, 1948. It happens that this speech was delivered before the national convention of the Liberal party. In reviewing some of the things to which I have alluded, the bureaucratic complex of this government and its tyrannical and irresponsible attitude towards the House of Commons, he said this:

> Without the existence of an almost all-powerful bureaucracy, it is unlikely that we would have had budget by radio, restraint of trade by embargoes and prohibitions, bungling of freight rates, and a snarling of interprovincial relations.

Let me say again, Mr. Speaker, that is just what this government has attempted to do.

He says further:

> But to me loss of individual freedom through irresponsible bureaucracy is too high a price to pay even for security.

I ask hon. members of all parties of this house to weigh well the memorable words uttered by the member for Quebec South on that occasion, when he said:

> Since the beginning of this convention there have been hints that from high places from now on all would be well; that things would be different in the future; that we would mend our ways. The pride that could flout a parliamentary caucus or a house of commons quailed before a national convention. But tonight the delegates will be gone, the old pride will return.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, the old pride has returned. We have proof of it in this government resolution today.

The old plea of urgency has, of course, been trotted out. I think we have had enough in what the Prime Minister has said to completely disprove this allegation of urgency with respect to the Newfoundland measure.

Where is the sense in the government seriously saying it is imperative that the throne speech debate should not be permitted to proceed—it would probably last two or three weeks—because there would not be time to pass this Newfoundland legislation? Why could not the house have been called two weeks ago? No reason has been given—no reason whatever.

But the Prime Minister was not satisfied with that. When we met here on Wednesday there was tremendous urgency about this Newfoundland business. It was so urgent that it had to be proceeded with on Monday next. The most this government was prepared to permit, by way of rationed time in this chamber to speak in this debate, was Thursday and Friday. Two days to air the grievances of a nation in a parliament in which the new government has not yet proven it possesses the confidence of the house! Two whole days for the assertion of the rights of democracy in this House of Commons before the government steam roller begins to put legislation before the house and sidetrack other forms of discussion!

Suddenly, Mr. Speaker, that urgency began to fade somewhat in view of the snarl into which the government had gotten itself by its attempt to dictate to the house. The Prime Minister then decided that the house might have another week to discuss it. Today he says, and I recall his words, that we would be as far ahead after a week or two of debate on the speech from the throne. Then, why confine the debate on the address to one week if we would be as far ahead after a week or two?

The way in which democracy is functioning in free parliaments and legislatures the world over today is being watched by many people as the race narrows down between the true democratic way of life and the communist totalitarian method. There never was a time when it was so much the duty of members of a free parliament to assert the rights of all its members, if they would value their freedom and the constitutional processes they were elected not only to carry out but to defend.

What would be your attitude, Mr. Speaker, if you were one of those detestable communists, after seeing what was being attempted by the government in this House of Commons today, after hearing the talk about the rights of parliament, about parliament being a place where the grievances of the people are being aired, and where criticism can be leveled at the government without fear of individual retaliation, and then government comes along and decides that it will ration freedom of speech in this chamber? What would be your attitude, Mr. Speaker, if you were a communist? You would say, Is that not a fine sample of democracy? You would say, If that is democracy, then, after all, what is the fundamental difference between it and the totalitarian method?

This is no way for any government to expedite the business of the session. If they want to do that, let them first give this house a free opportunity to express an opinion as to whether or not they possess its confidence.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I think it has become apparent that we are not getting anywhere. If we have just a little bit of time in which to think this whole matter over, I believe we shall be able to come to a decision much more amicably than we perhaps would today. For that reason I am asking leave to adjourn this debate.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there a seconder to the motion?

Mr. Cruickshank: Grey North.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn is not before the house.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I submit to you and to the other members of the house that a serious question is raised by this debate, and I trust that you will bear with me for a few minutes while I try to analyse it in what I hope will be a nonpartisan way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Abbott: That would be hard for you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Green: I realize that at times we all must show certain partisanship in this house, but I meant what I said when I indicated that I planned to try to analyze this question in an unbiased way. The question is whether or not the members of the government are taking the right attitude towards the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Let me direct the minds of hon. members back to the announcements made in the press about this session. In Vancouver I read that the speech from the throne would be considered for only a day or two and that we would then go on to discuss this proposed union with Newfoundland. In other words, the Prime Minister and the cabinet from the start have had the idea that this throne speech debate would last for a matter of only a few hours and then would be adjourned, or in effect would be pushed aside and used as a filler between other items of government business. The result must inevitably be that the debate on the speech from the throne will be of little use to the members of this house or to the country.

We saw this same attitude taken at the opening of the last session. Back in December 1947 we were all surprised to learn, again from the press, that the house was to be called into session a few days before Christmas, and that the reason it was being called was to deal with the Geneva trade treaties. I may be wrong in that, but I think that was the main reason given for calling the house in December. Mention may also have been made of the austerity program. In any event, I came east then believing that the main reason for calling that session was to consider the Geneva treaties. When we came here we were met with exactly the same plan that is being attempted at this session. The speech from the throne was to be dealt with for a day or two, and then we were to go on with this emergency business. As it turned out, the debate on the Geneva treaties lasted for two days, and then was adjourned until after Christmas, when it was again adjourned. The treaties were sent to a committee and the committee made a report, but the house never dealt with it or with the treaties; they have not been approved to this day. They are to come up again at this present session. On that former occasion the same attitude that is being taken today was taken by the cabinet towards parliament and towards the debate on the speech from the throne.

I submit that there are some serious objections to that attitude; in fact, there are grave dangers in the government of Canada adopting that attitude. First of all, the Prime Minister and his colleagues have placed far too little importance on this throne speech debate, which can only mean that they place far too little importance on parliament itself, on the private members of this house, whether they be in the opposition or on the government side, and on the people represented in this house by the private members. The keystone of our democratic system of government is parliament, not the cabinet. Parliament is composed of men and women entrusted by their constituencies with the responsibility of leading the nation. Under our system the leadership of this nation should not come from the cabinet; in the final analysis it should come from parliament. The cabinet is only the executive of parliament.

At the opening of each session the private members gather here from all over Canada, fresh from contacts with the people. They know the problems that are worrying the people and the action that the people want to have taken by parliament. We who come here as private members are certainly much closer to the people than any member of the cabinet can possibly be. He is here in Ottawa practically all the time; he has many other things to do and cannot be in such close touch with the people as a private member.

If the debate on the speech from the throne is held immediately after the opening of parliament it gives the private members a chance to bring the views of their constituents directly to the attention of the cabinet. That is important, because it can, or it should, influence the legislation that will be brought down by the cabinet. Hon. members in this way also bring these views to the attention of their fellow members and of the Canadian people.

Some of these matters are of the utmost urgency. Let me give the house an example of the matters which are of great concern to us on the west coast at the present time. One is the position of our merchant marine and of our shipbuilding industry. Our merchant navy is fading away. It is like the old soldiers, Mr. Speaker. You remember the old saying that old soldiers never die, they simply fade away. That is what is happening to our merchant marine. It was built up during the war in a remarkable way. We trained a great many seamen who took their full part as the fourth arm of the service. In our shipyards we built a great many ships. We did a wonderful job. We developed a highly skilled personnel and in fact established a remarkably good Canadian merchant marine.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind hon. members that the debate is with respect to procedure in the House of Commons. I doubt whether it is in order to debate any other questions at length.

Mr. Green: My basis for mentioning this subject, Mr. Speaker, is the urgency of that particular problem.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I did not stop the hon. member when he mentioned the subject, but I doubt whether he is entitled to discuss the subject matter more fully at this time.

Mr. Green: I shall simply repeat my statement that the Canadian merchant marine and the merchant navy men are fading away, and that something must be done about it and done quickly.

Another urgent matter which I shall mention is that in my city at least there are a great many employable unemployed piling up on the different social agencies. I think the dominion has accepted the responsibility for such unemployed as distinguished from the unemployable. Just before I came east I was called in to attend a meeting of the Vancouver community chest and council, and some of the key social workers in the city emphasized the very serious problem which is rapidly developing.

Many of these unemployed are young veterans. Something will have to be done very quickly about that problem either by the Department of Labour or by the Department of National Health and Welfare or perhaps by both. There again is an urgent matter which I should have had the opportunity of discussing fully on the address in reply to the speech from the throne without having to wait perhaps for three or four weeks and then speaking when the house will not listen, when nobody is interested in the throne speech debate.

I know exactly what will happen after the debate on the speech from the throne is adjourned next Friday. It will be brought up again on Mondays and Fridays, and all hon. members from Ontario, or from parts of Ontario adjacent to Ottawa, and all hon. members from those parts of Quebec adjacent to Ottawa will be away for the week-end looking after their respective businesses. There will be a few exceptions. The poor old members from the far east and far west will be here debating the throne speech. That is exactly what is going to happen to the speech from the throne. It is not good enough.

I repeat that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his colleagues are underestimating the value of the throne speech debate. In a country of such great distances and of such divergent activities and varied outlooks as Canada, it is of the utmost importance for us to have a chance at the beginning of each session to discuss these various problems, and the debate on the address gives us that opportunity.

The effect of the plan proposed by the cabinet will be to make the debate a farce and to belittle the private member, both here in the house and in his constituency. That is most unfortunate at a time when our democratic system of government is under attack both from within and from without.

There is another serious objection to the proposal of the government, and it is this. It continues an attitude in the cabinet—and I regret very much having to say this—which amounts to contempt for the place of parliament in governing the nation. In any event, it shows clearly that the government attaches very little importance to parliament. There is a reason for that. I do not think the members of the cabinet have that outlook maliciously. Only three of the members of the present cabinet held office before the war. The majority, including the Prime Minister, have known only the wartime system of governing the country, which can be fairly described as government by order in council. Their training in governing Canada has been by wartime methods. I am afraid that wartime powers have spoiled them and that is why they so lightly override parliament. They must remember—and it is here, in the House of Commons, that they should be told—that, like the private members, they are the servants of the Canadian people and not their masters. They are not the masters of the private members either.

They would do well to remember the attitude of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill toward the British House of Commons during the war years. I remember how impressed I was to read time after time of his attitude toward the house. He would come before the House of Commons in Great Britain in a most terribly distressing time and say, in effect, "I am glad to be able to come to the House of Commons and tell you my troubles, and from the feeling that you are with me, that you are trying to help me, I get great strength to carry on in these difficult times." I think our former Prime Minister, the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) had much that same attitude.

Mr. Mitchell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Mitchell: How long did they permit a debate on the speech from the throne to continue in Great Britain when Winston Churchill was Prime Minister?

Mr. Green: Well—

Mr. Mitchell: Two days.

Mr. Green: I shall come to that. That is my third point.

Mr. Graydon: You don't see any Churchills over there.

Mr. Green: The Right Hon. Winston Churchill has always been a House of Commons man, and a little bit of that same sort of attitude would be very helpful to the ministers of the present Canadian cabinet.

With regard to the question of the Minister of Labour, what happened in wartime is entirely different from what should happen in peacetime. And that is exactly my point, that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and his colleagues still act as if we were at war.

Mr. Mitchell: It happens in peacetime too. Just read the history of the debates on the speech from the throne.

Mr. Graydon: Go back and read it; that is your trouble.

Mr. Mitchell: It happened this year.

Mr. Green: One reason we are in this trouble today is that there has been no—

Mr. Howe: What trouble?

Mr. Green: Does the minister wish to say something?

Mr. Howe: I just said, "What trouble?"

Mr. Green: Get up and say it, then.

Mr. Howe: I would like to ask my hon. friend what trouble he is referring to.

Mr. Green: What is that?

Mr. Howe: You spoke of trouble; what trouble?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver South has the floor.

Mr. Green: The minister of—I forget—I think it is now the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), was one of the three who were here before the war. He should know better; yet he is probably the one whose attitude toward parliament is most subject to criticism.

One reason we are facing this unpleasant situation today is that we are trying to carry on business in an age of television under a set of rules drawn up in the days of the hurdy-gurdy. I have been here since 1935, and I know there has been no revision of the rules in those fourteen years. For that I must say I blame the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King). I think he did not keep up with the times. Quite often committees were set up to revise the rules, and suggestions were made for such revision; but nothing happened. I do hope that at this session we will have another committee to revise the rules, and that when the revisions are recommended something will be done about them. Otherwise we are going to have trouble just as we are having today, and we will have it session after session.

I urge in conclusion that—have you something to say, too?

Mr. Gardiner: Not until you are through.

Mr. Green: I do urge that the government be not too strict in having the debate on the address in reply cut off a week from today. Do not close the door to finishing that debate before going on with other business. If the present attitude is continued there will be in the end only one result, and that will be a new government.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I desire to express my disapproval of the motion proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and amended by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) which would set aside to some future and distant date the discussion on the speech from the throne.

I endorse what has been said, that this government, in a democracy, should have a vote of confidence before they proceed with other measures as they now intend to do. Our first duty in the House of Commons is not to the government. Surely in a free democracy such as this our first duty is to the people who sent us here, people who have many problems confronting them at this time.

I know that in the prairies, from whence I come, they have plenty of worries. The agricultural producers of this country have many worries as a result of controls and embargoes, practically all by orders in council.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must ask hon. members to discuss the motion, and not to discuss other problems.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, they have many problems worrying them today. I shall not discuss them in detail except to say that they lost in the neighbourhood of $2,000 million because of controls and embargoes. Then, there are other matters which are not satisfactory. I have in mind the United Kingdom-Canada wheat deal, in its present form. I could list many other items about which the people on the prairies are worried today.

As the elected representatives of the people, and as private members of the House of Commons, we should be given an opportunity to discuss those matters on behalf of the people. I cannot agree that there is the urgency set forth this afternoon by the Prime Minister, and endorsed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F.

I well remember that at the last session of parliament we were here on December 5, 1947, chiefly to discuss the urgency of the Geneva agreement. The house prorogued on the last day of June, 1948, leaving that matter entirely in the air. It has yet to be dealt with.

The government was elected about four years ago—in June of 1945. This is the fifth session of the twentieth parliament, and surely at a time such as this the government should be willing to have discussions of the problems confronting the people of Canada and to give private members the opportunity to do so, instead of throttling discussions as they are attempting to do today.

Many hon. members have serious problems to discuss on behalf of their constituents; and under this motion the members from various parts of the country would not have an opportunity for a long time to come to discuss those matters. Only the other day a minister of the crown made, in my part of the country, statements concerning government business and individuals which cannot be repeated and substantiated in the House of Commons. By this motion we would be denied the opportunity of bringing up that very important matter, one which has an important bearing on the dominion and the provinces, and upon individuals in the House of Commons.

Surely at this time the Prime Minister does not intend to be a party to that sort of thing in a free democracy such as we are supposed to have in Canada today. It ill behooves the government at this time, in the fifth session of a parliament, to offer such a motion. I should hope that it would be withdrawn and that the government would give serious consideration to these very important problems confronting the people of Canada today. Many who will be making their plans for the coming season of production are greatly concerned, and they would like an opportunity for discussion of their future possibilities. This motion would nullify that opportunity for a long time to come. It is not in keeping with the best interests of the country. I voice my disapproval of the motion proposed by the Prime Minister and amended by the Minister of Agriculture, and I do so in the interests of the common people of this country.

Mr. John T. Hackett (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a particularly bellicose frame of mind this afternoon. I should, however, like to discuss one or two aspects of this motion. Nothing clings to a man with more tenacity than a bad habit. During the war, parliament cultivated habits of disrespect for rules of parliament, habits which were justified by the national peril then existing. Since that time we have seen frequent recurrences of departures from the rules.

The rules of the house are not just arbitrary enactments; they have grown out of experience. This is not the time to trace any of them back to their origin. But it will be found that in most instances they can be traced to some successful effort to escape from tyranny, and from the abuses of dictatorship.

Parliament exists for the purpose of tempering lust for power, whether that power be vested in an individual or in a group. With great respect to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), I do not consider that the gentlemen opposite constitute a new government. I see a few new faces in old places, and a few old faces in new places. But after all, they constitute the same government; they have the same policy, and, I fear, the same bad habits. There has been some change in leadership, and this would be a good time to escape from the follies of the past.

One of the disabilities that has been visited on this assembly as a result of the war is the abuse of emergencies. The government hatches an emergency every ten minutes. Every time there is a difficulty it is overcome by providing an emergency. I am not prone to criticize, but seriously, is there anything urgent or emergent before this house today? The fact that the motion, if carried, will not go into effect until ten days hence is an answer to that question. Ten days hence there may be no reason to introduce this motion.

I submit that there is nothing urgent or emergent about the motion. I suggest that it be withdrawn and that we proceed in the usual fashion prescribed by rules that make for order, that make for discipline, and that make for freedom. If there is anything that tends more than anything else to throw power into the hands of the administration and those who are associated with them, it is disrespect for and departure from the long-established traditions and rules of this house. If we lightly depart from them, as unfortunately was the custom in the last three years following the war, we shall see confusion, and loss of dignity in this house and lack of respect for it, which I fear is already apparent.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to take part in this filibuster. This motion was introduced and spoken to by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who gave his reasons for it. It was spoken to by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), who gave his reasons why he considered it was not necessary. It was spoken to by the leader of my party (Mr. Coldwell), who I believe very clearly put our case as to why we are supporting it. I cannot understand all this talk about the danger to order, about the danger to democracy, and all the other dangers that have been mentioned. Surely this is a question of orderly procedure in parliament, and whether we agree with it or not is a matter to be decided by the vote of parliament.

I think every hon. member, I suppose at least every hon. member on this side of the house, regrets that the government has felt it necessary to postpone the debate on the speech from the throne, or rather to postpone it if it is not finished by the end of next week. That is a longer time than the government suggested at first, and that in itself is one of the hallmarks of democratic procedure. There has been a compromise between the two extremes. If the government did not get all they expected to get or wished to get in the first instance, the opposition got at least some of what it wanted.

We will have a whole week to discuss questions which affect our own constituencies and I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and other hon. members that there are important questions that will have to be aired in this house. But I believe that the sooner we get this issue finished with the quicker we can come to questions that are important. If the question of Newfoundland is not important, we can come to questions that are.

I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver South who said that democracy was under attack. I cannot conceive of anything that can bring democracy more into disrepute than futile discussions in the House of Commons.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Gardiner) which was agreed to on the following division:

SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS

COST OF LIVING BONUS OR OTHER SUPPLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of repeated representations, and the widespread support which their request has received, is the government considering the granting of a cost of living bonus or other supplement to superannuated civil servants?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend asked me a similar question shortly before the last session of parliament prorogued. I gave him an answer at that time, but I do not recall its exact terms. I referred him, however, to a press statement I made last January, announcing certain increases in the salaries of civil servants, in which I dealt with this question of pensions to superannuated civil servants. This is what I said:

> These pensions in essence are a special form of savings and are not related to the cost of living. Other Canadians do their own saving in various forms without help from their employers in this particular way, and most of such savings are normally held in the form of bonds, bank deposits, mortgages, annuities and other securities whose value is fixed in terms of money, just as superannuation pensions are. While it is recognized that superannuated civil servants encounter difficulties during periods of rising costs, these are similar to the difficulties faced by other retired persons living on pensions, annuities or other savings, and the government does not consider that it would be fair or proper in these circumstances to single out its former employees for special assistance.

So far as I am aware the government's view in the matter has not changed.

STRAIT OF CANSO

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF BOARD OF ENGINEERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of conflicting press dispatches appearing in local newspapers within the last couple of days with regard to the engineering commission appointed to inquire into the feasibility of the Canso project and related matters. One report states that the bridge might be proceeded with immediately; another states that the commission's report is still under study, and yet another states that the commission's report will likely be released from Kingston on Monday. As the Minister of Transport is the responsible minister, can he make a statement clarifying the whole situation?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I am afraid I cannot make a full statement such as my hon. friend would wish me to make. I can, however, say to him that the board of engineers which has been established to study the Canso project have not yet made a report. They have had a conversation with me in which they indicated that they have studied several forms of transportation across the strait, namely, a causeway, a bridge, a tunnel, and the present facilities with improvements. It was also suggested by them that in relation to one of those projects, as to which they could come to no conclusion, that of a bridge, they would require additional data. They have indicated to me that they will make a report as to the cost of obtaining the additional data, which would entail the laying of a test pier in the strait. When I have that report I shall bring it to the attention of the government so that it can be dealt with quickly.

POTATOES

REFUSAL OF PERMITS FOR EXPORT TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has his department been asked by Washington to refuse the issue of further export permits for potatoes consigned to a certain United States potato importer?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer to that question is yes. The request from Washington was received after the permit referred to by my hon. friend had been issued. Upon investigation it was then found that the boat had already been loaded and that financial commitments had been made both to the growers and to the transport companies. The matter was referred to Washington, and it was agreed that it was too late to stop this particular shipment. At Washington's request, no further permits for seed potatoes will be issued to the United States firm in question. This ban has been placed upon the particular importer until further notice.

WHEAT

PARTICIPATION PAYMENTS FOR 1945-46 CROP YEAR AND SINCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when the wheat growers of the prairie provinces may expect a further supplementary payment on the wheat delivered during the 1945-46 crop year and since. I might say that it was intimated recently in the west by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that this payment would be made.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The date and the amount of the payment are matters which have not been definitely determined. It is usual to make the payment some time before seeding begins.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Before June?

Mr. Howe: The probability is that the usual practice will be followed this year, although no decision has been reached as yet.

CHINA

EVACUATION OF CANADIAN CITIZENS —H.M.C.S. "CRESCENT"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the statement made by him today that H.M.C.S. Crescent has proceeded to far eastern waters, can he indicate the number of Canadian citizens who may need to be evacuated?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I cannot give any number because there has been no indication from the Canadians there. The total number of Canadians in China is about eight hundred, but they are not all in the area concerned. A considerable number of those in the area affected have indicated their desire to stay. It is, therefore, not possible to give the number of those who might wish to be evacuated should the necessity arise.

Mr. Pearkes: If I may, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether there is any reason why H.M.C.S. Crescent has proceeded or is proceeding to far eastern waters?

Mr. Claxton: The ship is going on a cruise to the far east, and if there should be a need of coming to the assistance of any Canadians, it will be available to give that assistance.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRIES AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEES

Veterans Affairs

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. Bentley (Swift Current): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Since I did not give him notice of it, I shall not expect an answer today if he does not feel like giving it. Has the minister given consideration to the setting up of a special committee on veterans affairs during this session?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I have not received notice of this question, but the answer to it is that the minister and the government have given consideration to the matter, and it has been decided not to recommend the setting up of a committee this session.

Income Tax—Farmers

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. The western agricultural conference recommended that a committee of the House of Commons be set up for the purpose of studying the question of income tax as it affects the farmer, with a view to removing the present anomalies and injustices. Will the government give consideration to the setting up of that committee?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I think that question should be directed to the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Very well. I direct it to the proper place.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Consideration has not been given to the matter, but it will be.

Radio Broadcasting

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is it the intention of the government to take steps to set up a special committee of the house at this session on radio broadcasting?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The matter has not been given consideration. When it has been considered, an announcement will be made.

HOUSING

PROTECTION OF VETERAN'S EQUITY IN CASE OF ILLNESS, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, or to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, whichever minister is able to give the answer. I brought this question before the house on February 25, 1948. My question is this: Has the government, or any agency of the government, worked out ways and means by which the veteran buying a house under any of the government plans will not, in case of illness, low wages or work stoppage, lose any reasonable equity that he may have in the house?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Careful consideration is given to all these matters, but no specific answer to the question can be given at this time.

Mr. Fraser: Will the minister consider it and give an answer as soon as possible? The veterans are much concerned about the matter.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REPORT AS TO REMOVAL OF OPERATING HEADQUARTERS FROM WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce? In view of disturbing reports concerning the removal from Winnipeg of Trans-Canada Air Lines operating headquarters, will the minister make a definite statement as to the policy of the government and Trans-Canada Air Lines in connection with this matter? How many persons are being moved? What departments and personnel will remain at Winnipeg?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is obviously a question which refers to the internal management of the Trans-Canada Air Lines. Allocation of staff is a matter for the management of the air lines; it is not determined by the government. This is not the type of question which is usually answered on the floor of the house.

Winnipeg is the operating headquarters of the domestic lines of Trans-Canada Air Lines. Montreal is the operating headquarters of the Atlantic lines of Trans-Canada Air Lines. There is a movement of staff between the two, as and when required by the management. The government receives no notice of any such transfer of employees.

SAM CARR

INQUIRY AS TO DEPORTATION OR EXTRADITION PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Will he bring the house up to date on the Sam Carr case? Are we to have deportation or extradition proceedings? What charges are awaiting in this matter?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): My information is that we have not yet received official intimation that deportation proceedings will be taken. We have already said that in the absence of deportation proceedings we will take extradition proceedings. We expect, however, an official statement on deportation.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Extradition on what charges?

Mr. Garson: On the charges that are outstanding against Sam Carr under the warrants for his arrest which have been extant since the matter first came up, and which are, as I recall, first, conspiracy under the Official Secrets Act; second, the giving of false information to get a passport, and third, forging of an application for a passport.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, January 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the house in this debate I think my first words should be words of sympathy to the hon. the Speaker of the Senate in the tragic loss of his wife, which has just been announced today. Like many others here, I had the privilege of being received by her as recently as Wednesday, and I do wish personally to convey to Dr. King my very deep sympathy, which I feel sure is shared by every hon. member.

I should like first of all to pay my tribute to the mover and seconder for the adresses which introduced this debate, and to join with them in some of the things that were said in regard to the necessity for advancing the development of this country. I particularly wish to join my own wishes to the hope that was expressed yesterday that every possible step will be taken to expedite the development of the St. Lawrence river in every way that it can be done.

I also want to mention the fact that all of us here have a feeling of satisfaction in the birth not long ago of a future heir to the throne, and the knowledge that the much beloved princess, the daughter of the king and queen of England, is herself so well, and that this young prince gives every evidence of being worthy to take his place in the line of succession to the throne.

In coming to the speech from the throne itself, I must say that since this is the first speech from the throne that I have read since becoming a member of the house, it does seem to me to leave a great deal to the imagination and a great deal to determine by future discussion. One of the things which certainly every hon. member, and every Canadian from one end of Canada to the other, is anxious to know is what the intention of the government really is in regard to the taxation being imposed, far above the actual requirements of this country at the present time.

I notice that in the press reports of the speech from the throne it was suggested that the indication contained in the speech followed somewhat the same line as the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) before an assembly outside the House of Commons within the past few days, and that it also indicated the possibility of an early election. It was suggested that it indicated a cut in taxation. I think that hon. members will want to know a good deal more of the actual intention of the Minister of Finance before they can come to that conclusion, because the paragraph covering that subject reads as follows:

> Prosperous conditions now prevailing are being reflected in the buoyant level of national revenues; a condition to which due consideration is being given by my ministers in the preparation of forthcoming budgetary proposals.

On past occasions buoyant revenues have been given consideration by the ministers, and they have used those buoyant revenues for the purpose of overtaxing the people of Canada to a point where, even with high levels of earnings, any savings are extremely difficult. I hope the consideration now being given by ministers to buoyant revenues will lead them to another conclusion, in spite of the repeated arguments made publicly by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that under some theory of cyclical budgeting he should tax the people as heavily as possible while we have buoyant finances. I express the hope that we shall have from him some indication that he has abandoned that strange theory of public financing, and that such consideration will lead to a reduction in taxes, which the people from one end of Canada to the other are demanding—and rightly demanding.

Most of the other points in the speech from the throne will be dealt with in a way which will probably lead to further information. However, there is one paragraph to which I should like to refer before passing to the main theme of my remarks.

Royal commissions have a very useful and very important function, if they are given terms of reference which clearly define their responsibilities, and if they are given a task which can be performed in a way that will lead to some useful results. There is reference in the speech from the throne to a royal commission to deal with transportation, which at the present time is being used mainly for the purpose of diverting public attention from the fact that this government has failed to deal effectively in any way with the problem of freight rates, something which should be dealt with by the government with the information now available instead of setting up a further inquiry into this very subject.

But I should think that the royal commission—which would be a royal commission never to be forgotten, if proceeded with in the form suggested—is the royal commission which, it is stated, is to be set up. That royal commission is described in the speech from the throne as follows:

> It is the view of my ministers, that there should be an examination of the activities of agencies of the federal government relating to radio, films, television, the encouragement of arts and sciences, research, the preservation of our national records, a national library, museums, exhibitions, relations in these fields with international organizations, and activities generally which are designed to enrich our national life, and to increase our own consciousness of our national heritage and knowledge of Canada abroad. For this purpose, the government intends at an early date to establish a royal commission.

Mr. Rowe: The Twentieth Century club.

Mr. Drew: I would express the hope now, in these first remarks in the debate, that if any such commission is set up—which will certainly be a commission to arouse criticism of all royal commissions, because of the vagueness, uncertainty and lack of any limitation of its scope—there is no thought that the setting up of that commission will be given as a reason for not dealing with any of the subjects mentioned in the terms suggested by this paragraph in the speech from the throne.

Just take as an example the fact that this commission is to deal with television. This afternoon it was suggested that we had progressed in Canada from the early primitive stages to the days of television. I do hope hon. members in the house will realize that in Canada we have not advanced to the stage of television, and that at the present time we are being prevented from reaching that advanced stage by an arbitrary denial of the rights of those people who are prepared to provide television in this country, without the treasury of Canada being committed to the expenditure of one cent for this new service. I should like also to suggest that the full possibilities of this commission be fully recognized before the terms are drafted.

Then it contains the words "the encouragement of arts and sciences". That in itself, without some limitation, would cover a very wide field.

"Research"—that, too, covers the broadest possible field, because it would include research into every conceivable type of activity we now have.

"The preservation of our national records, a national library"—these may well be subjects for consideration by somebody.

"Museums"—well, they are set up by national, provincial and municipal organizations, as well as by private organizations. The limitation on that would be very difficult indeed.

"Exhibitions"—I wonder what the purpose of that could be. Are we going to have inquiries into the conduct of county fairs and of agricultural exhibitions across the country? Are we to have inquiries into various activities of that kind?

Then, above all, let us imagine the wide possibilities of examining into "activities generally which are designed to enrich our national life." If there is one activity designed to enrich our national life, it is education; and although I recognize that this government constantly forgets it, the fact is that under the constitution the provinces of Canada were given certain designated powers. One of those exclusive powers covered education, which, in my opinion, is the most important way of enriching our national life.

I am not going to go into all the other possibilities. There are much younger members in the House of Commons than I am, but I doubt if any one of them would still be alive, when this commission finally completed its inquiries, if it were to really carry out all the possibilities contained in this paragraph.

Mr. Rowe: It would tide them over until after the election.

Mr. Drew: That, of course, is the inescapable suggestion when, coincident with the announcement by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) at a friendly gathering on Tuesday night that an election might not be very far away, we have this omnibus reference to a royal commission. I am expressing the hope now that before attempting to do this it will be recognized how absurd the results would be. Also I do hope there will be no suggestion at any time in the present session that the setting up of such a royal commission will limit the discussion here of any subject coming before it, because there are very few subjects which would be discussed here which could not in some way be brought under the wide umbrella of these terms of reference.

I find no positive statement as to the advancement of the national health program. Certainly I had hoped that there would be some positive statement in regard to that subject in view of the fact that at a very late date the dominion government did advance with the early steps of inquiry into the broad basis of the health requirements of this country so that other health programs could be proceeded with. Actually, from beginning to end, this statement by the government of its intentions during the present session is marked by the absence of any positive evidence as to the things that it intends to do, in the field either of health or of social security, in the reduction of taxation or in meeting the very urgent problem of housing that exists in this country at the present time.

There is a very clear and very important omission. There is no reference in the speech from the throne to the possibility of any further meetings with the provincial governments of this country to work out a system of co-operation between those governments and, above all, to define the constitutional relationships of those governments within our federal system. The speech from the throne starts with a very simple and proper statement of the situation with regard to external affairs. It says:

> The first concern of government in world affairs is to ensure peace and security. To this end, Canada continues to support the principles of the united nations charter.

It then goes on to discuss foreign policy. No one will disagree with the fact that the first concern of this and every other government and every other parliamentary body is to do everything humanly possible to preserve peace and to protect the people in the country which it serves. But there is another matter of almost as great importance, the constitution itself. Without an understandable constitution, an enforceable constitution, it is difficult for any nation to continue its course as a united nation. The constitution is in fact the framework upon which the national structure is built.

Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stated that he had been invited to visit the President of the United States. I feel sure that every hon. member in this house will welcome the fact that the Prime Minister is going to have personal discussions on important subjects with the head of that great and friendly nation with which we are so closely associated. I hope it will be remembered that in the United States particular emphasis in public life is placed upon the constitution. As the Prime Minister, in the early stages of his responsibilities, is going to establish contact with the President of the United States, I hope he will keep in mind the oath which the president takes when he assumes office. It is a simple oath which reads:

> I do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States.

I for one do not feel that Canadians should follow the pattern of any other country except where they find that that may be useful. However, I think it would be well for us to recognize the importance which is given in the United States to the constitution as the foundation of all their governmental responsibility. It is noticeable that the oath taken by the governor of every state in the United States when he is sworn in contains a similar provision, that to the best of his ability he will defend the constitution of his state and the constitution of the United States.

I believe the time has come when it is essential that the head of the government in Canada and all members of the government should have some feeling of responsibility for preserving the constitution of this country. This has been one of the great strengths of the democracy with which we are so closely associated. Our constitution is threatened today by a carefully planned effort to deny the provincial governments the opportunity to carry on their own affairs with the freedom and discretion which comes from independent taxing sources which will make them free to determine the things that they can do.

For that reason I propose to devote the remainder of my remarks to the necessity of a return in this country to the true principles of the federal system and to the recognition of the fact that national unity in Canada became possible under that federal system and that national unity can be continued only if that federal system is respected in fact as well as in name.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was referring to the constitutional position and to the steps this government has taken to centralize authority under the dominion government. I propose now to discuss the broad constitutional problem, with particular reference to what have been generally described as dominion-provincial relations.

Until a very few weeks ago my responsibilities lay in another field. Consequently I neither had the opportunity nor was it particularly my duty to deal with statements that might be made in other parts of Canada about what had taken place at the dominion-provincial conference, or about the present situation in regard to that gathering. The reason I feel I should deal with this subject in this speech, during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, is that this is the first opportunity I have had in the House of Commons to correct some extraordinary statements that have been made about what did take place at that conference, and to place on record the sequence of events which led up to the adjournment of the conference in May, 1946, and to say why today I feel it is so necessary that this conference be reconvened if we are not to increase the constitutional confusion already existing in Canada.

This is no new subject. It has been a matter of concern to thoughtful Canadians for many years, and in 1937 this government, under the previous Prime Minister, appointed a royal commission for the purpose of inquiring into the whole broad field of dominion-provincial relations, to make recommendations as to the way in which our federal structure could be best improved and the way the combined resources of Canada could be best put to the use of all our people, so that every part of Canada might benefit from the combined wealth and prosperity of the whole country. I have seen statements reported in the press coming from supposedly responsible people to the effect that it was very unfortunate that the premiers of Ontario and Quebec had prevented agreement at the dominion-provincial conference. Merely as an example of the many statements of that kind coming from presumably responsible sources I would quote these words:

> It is calamitous for Canada that the Ontario and Quebec governments could not have continued with those of the other seven provinces in the negotiation of a compromise of the small area of disagreement which still remains between the seven provinces and the dominion.

Similar statements have been made in different parts of Canada; that the premier of Quebec and I, while premier of Ontario, had prevented agreement. Let me say without reservation that any such statement is utterly false and wholly unrelated to the truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I am making these remarks, of course, for those who are capable of understanding them. As far as my position as premier of Ontario at that time was concerned, I was quite able to deal with that subject within the legislature where my responsibilities then lay; but I do feel that in the interests of an understanding of this vitally important subject it is just as well that the record be put straight and that some of this false and vicious propaganda, designed to create prejudice and misunderstanding as between different parts of Canada, be corrected right now on my entry into this house.

The constitution is not something to be treated as merely a scrap of paper. We have seen very convincing evidence of the importance of a working and workable constitution in a great many countries throughout the world in the past few years. It is significant that when France, one of the homes of real democracy, was freed after the invasion of Normandy and the German armies were driven out, the first thing that was done, even before any attempt was made to set up a government, was to draft a constitution which would be acceptable to the people and would, in their belief, continue the freedom which had been restored to them. Hon. members will recall that the first step was the calling of a constituent assembly, whose purpose was the drafting of a constitution, which was then submitted to the people for approval or otherwise. And as will be also recalled, the first draft was refused, while the second was accepted.

I merely mention this to indicate that we have ample evidence before us that the constitution of any country is a vital feature of good government and of the preservation of the democratic structure at a time when democracy and freedom are the most precious things in the temporal sphere of man's activities.

For many long years it has been apparent that substantial changes were necessary to bring to its full efficiency and vigour the combined system of national government we describe as confederation. To a slight extent the first world war, but to a far greater extent the economic difficulties that followed, and then the second world war, emphasized the need for adjustments and for closer and more effective co-operation. It was out of that understanding of the need for an examination of our constitution that the royal commission was appointed in 1937 and that the subsequent discussions took place. Not for the purpose of emphasizing my participation in any of these events, but simply because it happens that I did have a fairly active part in them, I believe it is important to put on record some of the details of the earlier stages prior to the dominion-provincial conference which met in August of 1945.

Upon the presentation of the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission, a dominion-provincial conference was called but it did not produce very decisive, practical results. That was prior to the time I was premier of Ontario. Time passed and I was called upon to assume office in August, 1943. At that time I emphasized the need for a continuance of these discussions.

In November and December of 1943, I had occasion to go to England. On my return I found reported in the press a number of statements by members of the dominion cabinet indicating the intention of the dominion government to introduce legislation dealing with matters which were obviously within the provincial field. At that time I was concerned about the fact that if this were done it might cause unnecessary confusion and might prevent the possibility of a harmonious working out of some of these practical problems.

For that reason, immediately on my return I wrote to the Prime Minister of Canada and I think this letter, in itself, is a fairly effective answer to those uninformed propagandists who attempt to create the impression that I was a reluctant attendant at the meetings here and not greatly interested in the advancement of dominion-provincial relations.

This is the letter I wrote on January 6, 1944, to the then Prime Minister of Canada. It reads as follows:

Dear Mr. King:

Since returning to my office I have had the opportunity to read a number of speeches made by dominion cabinet ministers, referring to plans that are being made for post-war employment and reconstruction. I find that in most cases they refer to fields of activity which would ordinarily be under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial governments.

I need not say we are most anxious to co-operate in every practical measure which will assure effective post-war planning and the prompt rehabilitation of the members of our armed forces. I believe it is extremely important, however, where it will be necessary to obtain agreement of the provincial governments in regard to the joint occupation of fields of legislation ordinarily under their exclusive jurisdiction, there should be previous discussion so that any measures introduced will be on a basis agreed upon in advance.

At present there are agreements in regard to health and education awaiting adjustment between the dominion and provincial governments. I believe that it is very difficult to deal with these or with any other similar agreements until we have reached some understanding in regard to the present and future constitutional relationship of the various governments.

I would therefore urge that a dominion-provincial conference be called at the earliest possible date to consider the broad question of post-war planning and reconstruction. Not only is this necessary for the purpose of determining the basis upon which the dominion and the provincial governments will co-operate, but it is also necessary for the purpose of considering the subject of taxation in relation to these measures.

I believe it is of the utmost importance that such a conference be held before any measures are introduced, either in the dominion parliament or the provincial legislatures, which call for ultimate agreement between the dominion and the provincial governments. We will be prepared to send representatives to a conference of this nature at such time as will be convenient to you, but I do urge that the conference be held at the earliest possible date.

That letter was signed by myself.

I mentioned that letter for this reason. The Prime Minister of Canada at that time evidently thought sufficiently well of the general review of the situation which I put forward that he submitted a copy to the premier of every other province and asked whether, in their opinion, this suggested a satisfactory basis for a dominion-provincial conference. It is a matter of record that each of the provincial premiers indicated this would be a satisfactory starting point for such a conference.

I need not mention any of the intervening discussions which took place, but a conference did convene in Ottawa on August 6, 1945. At that time the dominion government placed before the conference a number of proposals in regard to taxation, health, social security and public investment. I wish to emphasize this. All the governments attending that conference accepted the proposals as the basis of discussion and indicated their approval of the general principles set forth. It was then decided it would be best to discuss the subjects in closed sessions, and in order to assist these discussions a co-ordinating committee was set up to bring together the combined knowledge and effectiveness of the governments in dealing with these subjects.

Again, simply as a matter of record, may I point out that the co-ordinating committee of representatives of every government, dominion and provincial, was set up on my motion as premier of Ontario, with the unanimous consent of those attending the conference. It then proceeded to discuss the broad fields of proposals which had been put forward. In a very short time it became apparent that there was a great deal of statistical information not yet available which was essential for the practical consideration of these proposals.

On my motion as premier of Ontario a dominion-provincial economic committee was set up, constituted of the economic experts from each of the governments for the purpose of examining the combined economic picture with which we were called upon to deal. As a result of these inquiries which were carried on in August, in November and again in January, it became apparent to all the governments that much still remained to be done before it would be possible to interpret, in exact figures and financial terms, the health, social security and public investment proposals which were then under consideration.

Various changes were suggested by the different governments, all of which were given consideration. In my official capacity I emphasized one particular point at that time, that, from 1867 on, there had been no attempt by official representatives of the governments to examine the possibility of a general readjustment of our whole taxation system. One of the proposals that I put forward, and I am now quoting from my statement presented as to our position, was as follows:

Immediately after the ratification of the new agreement steps would be taken by the co-ordinating committee, with the assistance of the economic committee and such other expert assistance as might be deemed advisable, to conduct a thorough examination of the whole Canadian tax structure for the purpose of establishing a new and revised system of taxation which would leave clearly defined and clearly divided taxing powers to the dominion and provincial governments, under a system which would impose the least onerous burden upon the individual taxpayer.

It seems to me that was a sound and practical suggestion. Then on the subject of health insurance I also urged that we should all accept in principle the proposals put forward, and then, when we had the economic and statistical figures that we required, we should proceed to deal with them with the advantage of this continuing dominion-provincial co-ordinating committee and the dominion-provincial economic committee. I might quote what was in my presentation to the conference:

> The Ontario government expresses its belief that the highest possible measure of co-operation should be established between the dominion and provincial governments in the development of their resources and the maintenance of all types of production. It approves the idea of holding back public construction and public investment during the period when private investment and private production can provide the opportunities for employment which assure gainful occupation to all our people.

Then I went on and further urged the need for a dominion-provincial conference at least once a year, but expressed our own belief that it would be advisable to have a conference at least every six months to bring these governments together. I proposed that in our case we would then set up permanent provincial offices in Ottawa, and that there be a permanent secretariat here serving all the provincial governments, so that this combined team of governments could work continuously together as one functional organization in their field of common legislative and administrative responsibility.

I have seen some statements, which were just as remarkable as the others to which I have referred, to the effect that Ontario refused to share its favourable financial position with other provinces. That statement, I might say, is absolutely false. Fortunately, there was a Hansard record of those proceedings and it is there to show that as premier of Ontario at all times I asked, or insisted:

> . . . that the special advantages enjoyed by the province of Ontario through the location here of head offices of large national organizations be recognized and that a plan be devised whereby the taxes paid by such national organizations be distributed to all provinces on the basis of the actual business done in those provinces and not in relation to the mere fact that the head office happened to be in the province of Ontario.

What is more, in our submissions to the conference we urged the very thing to which the Rowell-Sirois report had attached such great importance, something that the dominion government had not urged, and in fact refused to consider at the conference. We urged the setting up of a national adjustment fund, which was a key point in the Rowell-Sirois recommendations. We not only urged the setting up of a national adjustment fund but we urged that this fund be set up on a level much higher than that which had been suggested only a few years earlier in the Rowell-Sirois report. In order that I may not simply generalize but may refer to my exact words, I should like to quote from what I said to the conference which was meeting on May 1, 1946, and I shall be quoting from the Hansard record until I indicate that the quotation has ended.

Mr. St. Laurent: Would the hon. member mind indicating the page?

Mr. Drew: I shall be happy to furnish the Prime Minister with it because I am reading from an extract from it. It is the Hansard record of May 1, and I shall be happy to give him the exact page.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have the record here, and I should like to follow it.

Mr. Drew: I shall be glad to give the exact page. The quotation is as follows:

> Ontario believes in the system of fiscal aid to those provinces which from time to time require special assistance because of the fact that their economy is not so widely or so flexibly based that through their own free taxing powers they can meet the difficulties which arise.

What I said then and what I repeat now is that, while we suggested one form of administration of this national adjustment fund, we were not married to that proposal—I believe those were the exact words I used—and that we would accept any system of administration of a national adjustment fund which was acceptable to this conference. We shall not within the term of any agreement we now sign be drawing upon that fund to which, naturally, we shall contribute very heavily.

Then I went on, after certain words which intervened, as follows:

> I stated the principle to which we adhere, that we are accepting the principle of fiscal aid in a fund administered on a basis acceptable to those provinces which will be dealing with it; and we are prepared to agree to whatever may by mutual consent here be regarded as an adequate sum for administration in that national adjustment fund.

In the face of those words on the record, hon. members can perhaps understand my surprise when I read from time to time some of these rather extraordinary allegations, that I, as premier of Ontario, was unwilling to share with the other provinces of Canada such advantages as Ontario might possess.

Then also, as to the suggestion made by those who should know better,—and of course, I am referring particularly to some of those who were there—may I recall that in the Hansard record the very last words I addressed to the conference the day it adjourned, on the motion of the dominion government, were as follows:

> I want to remind the conference that I have made it quite clear all along that nothing we have put forward is "take it or leave it."

Those were the broad general details, and that was the spirit of the proposals that

I put forward in my official capacity at that time. I was also extremely surprised to find the suggestion made that we had in any way made the continuance of the conference difficult, because those who have not taken the trouble to do so—and it is obvious that a great many hon. members have not—should read the record of those proceedings. If they do they will find that when the various proposals had been put forward, and the various criticisms had been directed to certain features of the dominion proposals and alternative suggestions had been made, the Minister of Finance at that time, who was at the conference, then said it would be necessary for the dominion government to examine all the proposals before it, that it would need more time, and therefore moved the adjournment of the conference sine die.

The interesting thing is that it was the premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Macdonald, who said, just before the motion was put:

> I take it that Mr. Ilsley is not suggesting that there will not be another conference.

And, in the absence of anything to suggest the contrary, we all accepted the motion in the belief that we would be meeting again; and there was no reason to suppose for a moment that we would not be meeting again, because the stated purpose of the adjournment was to consider the various proposals which had been put forward.

It was therefore with very considerable surprise, and I may say indignation, that I learned on June 27, 1946, that the Minister of Finance had placed financial proposals before the House of Commons without notifying any provincial premier, except of course those closely associated with him, that there was any thought of the conference not proceeding as had been intended. At that time, without any relationship to the other subjects we were discussing and the constitutional problems which are vital, and which must be solved if we are to have a workable form of government under our federal system today, those proposals were put forward as a statement of what the provinces could get if they gave up their major taxing powers. No conference, no discussion, but here is what you get. It is not for me to say what anyone else should do in that respect, but the explanation that was given is one that is worth repeating in putting the record clear.

In explaining why they were following this course the Minister of Finance at that time made a statement on the matter, as reported at page 2908 of Hansard:

> Ontario, it is true, did offer a proposal which was an alternative to the dominion proposals, but it was not until the closing hours of the conference that the financial implications of that proposal were revealed. These involved so large a net increase in total cost to the dominion as to put the proposal beyond the possibility of responsible consideration.

That was the explanation. The truth is that by the steady process of attrition, and by the steady demands of one province after another, most of the things that the Ontario government proposed at that time were actually done bit by bit. The government weakened in order to appease its friends. I do not suppose that any hon. members have forgotten that when the terms with British Columbia were announced there was an immediate and very vigorous outburst by the premier of New Brunswick, who indicated that he regarded this as an extremely unfair deal for New Brunswick, and then of course New Brunswick had to get similarly fair treatment; and so it has gone on by a steady process of putting a little more into the ante to sweeten it for all those who have to try to explain to their own constituents just why they accepted these agreements.

The fact is that there had been a very narrow field of difference between the governments at the time the meeting adjourned. The real barrier which existed was not a barrier on the basis of the money involved. The barrier was the determination of the dominion government to acquire centralized financial power through the proposed agreements, upon terms which would have made all provincial governments mere annuitants depending upon the dominion treasury. No other explanation is possible.

An examination of our proposals—and I hope that some of those who have been making such loose statements will really take the time to examine them before making some of the statements they do make—will show that in many ways the dominion government would have been much better off in accepting the proposals then put forward by Ontario and other provinces; and the people of Canada would have been much better off because the proposals put forward by the provinces would have ended the double taxation which the dominion government insisted upon retaining at that time. Some of these double taxes have since been reduced. It was quite interesting to see that what seemed to be quite irresponsible to the Minister of Finance in June, 1946, became the height of responsibility at some later date, at a time when some provincial governments were not finding the results too satisfactory.

To read many of the statements that have been made, one would think that the only objections which had been presented to the proposals put forward by the dominion government, or the only counter proposals, were those put forward by the government of Ontario. In the search for information, which I hope will be pursued following these remarks, I suggest that, in reading the record, careful attention be paid to what was said by Premier Macdonald of Nova Scotia, who in the clearest and most cogent terms criticized this attempt to centralize power, and pointed out the fundamental and historic danger to a federal system of substituting annual subsidized payments to a provincial government in return for their own independent taxing power upon which their legislative independence must depend. The fact is that some very useful proposals were put forward by other premiers. An extremely clear, useful and powerful argument in regard to independent taxing powers, and the ability of the provincial governments to carry out their function in clearly defined fields, was put forward by Premier Manning of Alberta. I must confess that I have not been able to quite understand why it was that such a determined effort was made to make it appear that only Ontario and Quebec had failed to agree with these proposals.

Those two governments did not sign the tax terms—remember, the tax agreements related to this conference. They did not sign the arbitrary tax terms put forward in June of 1946, because they were able to carry on their own financial affairs. And the time will come when the people of Canada generally will have reason for considerable satisfaction that there were two provinces which were able to hold out, so that complete centralization of financial power did not get into the hands of the dominion government.

I have noticed that one of the less informed members who have spoken on this subject made the statement not long ago that as premier of Ontario I had no concern with principle in connection with this until after the conference, that it was only a question of the amount of money we got. To him particularly I would urge a little reading. But I think that, taking the generous view, it was a lack of knowledge of what occurred that led to such a remark.

I think I should clearly indicate what some of the basic principles were which were being asserted by myself as premier of Ontario at that time and by the premier of Quebec, and by the premier of Nova Scotia, and by the premier of Alberta, and by others who were attending that conference. I think you will find a very high measure of unanimity in the general views we expressed.

There was very clear evidence of a belief that under the federal system, which divides the fields of legislative and administrative responsibility between the dominion and provincial governments, the establishment of an effective functional relationship is probably more important than anything else, and that one of the really effective steps toward the solution of our constitutional difficulties is to create the simple mechanism that will bring the governments together in continuing co-operation, through some form of permanent secretariat, and the regular meetings of representatives who meet with the knowledge of what the general responsibilities of the governments are.

However, admittedly, that is a detail of operation. The main point with which we were concerned was that there must be no doubt about regular conferences, if we were to make use of all the combined powers we had in bringing about a solution of our constitutional difficulties. One of the things that was emphasized, and probably emphasized more strongly by Mr. Macdonald than by anybody else, was that unless some such meetings took place, and started then, the agreements that were described as temporary must inevitably become permanent agreements—because when the time came for the present agreement to terminate no solution would have been found for the problem; and it would simply be a case of going ahead, following the same course and adjusting the amounts.

It would mean that the provinces would be giving up effectively the main taxation fields made available to them under the British North America Act without the assurance of any other exclusive fields of taxation, within which their taxing powers could be exercised with any degree of independence for the purpose of raising those revenues necessary to carry out their many and increasingly complex responsibilities.

To enter into any agreement such as that suggested, no matter how attractive it might have appeared at the time, without the assurances which were asked, would simply have meant that the provinces would have established by agreement their permanent dependence upon a system of subsidies which has wrecked every federal system in the history of the world after a relatively short period of time, once it has been put into effect.

I have seen it argued that we were inconsistent in asserting these principles—and may I remind at least one hon. member opposite that it was principles we were asserting. In relation to these principles it was pointed out, however, that Ontario was prepared to sign a transitional or temporary agreement, because we knew that we had not a solution then— so long as there was an unqualified and enforceable undertaking that we would meet right away to examine our whole tax structure and prepare for a new and really satisfactory tax agreement at the termination of the temporary one, under which our constitutional problems would be solved, and under which we might have a better taxing method, for the advantage of all the people of Canada.

That weaknesses have developed in this federal system of ours, no one can deny. Those weaknesses in the British North America Act are the result of the great changes in the conditions in this country, the scale of our activities, and the scale of our production. The fundamental weakness lies in the fact that the provinces were given the right to raise revenues only by direct taxation for the purpose of carrying out their exclusive responsibilities, while the dominion government was given the power to raise taxation in any way.

That never created any problem until 1917 when, for the first time, the dominion government, in order to raise the revenue necessary to carry on the very heavy responsibilities of the war in those days, went into the income tax field. At that time, recognizing the practice which had been so clearly established since 1867, Sir Thomas White, then Minister of Finance, gave the assurance that they would vacate that field as soon as possible.

Time went on, and greater invasions of those fields took place. But it was not until the early part of the second world war that the great and substantial change in the financial relationship took place which really presents the critical basis of the problem at the present time. At that time the dominion government proposed to the provincial governments that they should give up their great progressive fields of taxation of personal income tax and corporation taxes for the duration of the war, in return for annual payments, so that the dominion government, with all the necessary centralization of authority, might also have what they regarded as centralized financial authority related to it.

At that time I was leader of the opposition in the Ontario legislature, and I agreed wholeheartedly with the premier of Ontario in the acceptance of that proposal. But might I remind hon. members that at the time the provincial governments gave up their great fields of taxation, which had been the basis of their economic and financial independence since confederation, they did it upon the firm and unqualified and very emphatic assurance of the Minister of Finance that the taxing power would be restored to the provinces at the end of the first fiscal year following the termination of hostilities, and that their taxing powers would be diminished in no way by their acceptance of this proposal, which was for the purpose of meeting the emergencies of war.

In examining the situation today, in considering the necessity of early discussion of this whole subject, it is essential that it be remembered that the provinces gave up their taxing powers on that consideration. That undertaking was not only a verbal undertaking, it was not only one that was put in the form of a letter, it was actually given the sanction of a legislative promise by being included in the statute which approved the tax agreements themselves.

Let me make it quite clear that I did not suggest then, and I do not suggest now, that any particular tax should be made available to one government or another. What I do say is that a position has been reached where it is absolutely essential that the whole problem of taxation by all governments, dominion, provincial and municipal, be carefully examined so that the most efficient system possible may be devised. I said at the conference, and I say now, that I was not wedded to the allocation of one particular tax or another. I say, and in this I am simply echoing what has been said by the premiers of most of the provinces, that if the federal system is going to work and the local authority of the provincial governments preserved there must be real taxing powers available to those governments. If they are dependent upon subsidies for a substantial part of their revenue, their legislative and administrative independence will be illusory, because at every point where they seek to do something they must try to find out how much they are going to get from the government that is going to supply the necessary money.

I realize that there are those who believe that it would be a good thing if we had only the one government in Canada. No one need deny the right of anyone to hold that view. It is a perfectly natural question for anyone to ask whether one central government might not be more efficient than a dominion government with provincial governments dealing with local affairs. There are people who state that, and then there are people who state publicly that they believe in the federal system but who nevertheless are challenging all the lessons of history and following a course which if pursued is bound to destroy the federal system.

It is not mere accident that every nation with a land area one-third the size of Canada or more has adopted the federal system. That system is the only workable one for great land areas. The United States, Australia and other large countries have all found that to be the only workable system. But there are other reasons why we should be extremely careful not to weaken the federal structure in any way but rather to strengthen it and to give to the provincial governments that measure of independent authority in dealing with their local affairs which is the only way in which they can do the tremendously important job that they have to do.

There is a great background to this whole question. Canada had experimented with a single government. In 1841 the Act of Union provided for a single government, not only for what is now Quebec and Ontario but for the other provinces to the east as well. Actually those other provinces never came into that union and consequently Ontario and Quebec carried forward that experiment in unitary government from 1841 to 1867. One of the compelling reasons for the adoption of the federal system in 1867 was that even with all the efforts that were made to make that system work it was found that there were reasons why this country could not carry on under a single system of government. Therefore we followed the course which seemed to provide the greatest assurance of national strength in the central government with the retention by the provincial governments of those local rights and conditions without the preservation of which this country could not have become one great united nation.

Then there was another very important consideration. Those who discussed the federal system here in Canada had before them evidence of what had occurred in the United States, and in their thinking they were greatly affected by what had taken place there. It is quite clear from the discussions that they gave great attention to the exchanges which had occurred between those brilliant and highly trained men who had drafted the constitution of the United States more than 75 years earlier.

Because we as a nation followed the United States to a considerable extent in the drafting of our constitution, it is well for us to remember that another very important reason for adopting the federal system was that it provided checks and balances between the two levels of government which seemed best designed to prevent over-centralization of power at any time in the hands of the central government. Going back to the discussions which took place in the United States at the time of the drafting of their constitution, and using the word that is still used very frequently in relation to it, they were seeking to prevent the usurpation of power at any time within the framework of the democratic structure.

So that it may not be suggested that I am merely making this statement here in the House of Commons and expressing a different opinion to that which I have held at any other time, may I quote from a statement I made in the Ontario house which is recorded in the Ontario Hansard of April 1, 1947. I do this in order to explain what I gave to the Ontario legislature as one of the reasons why it was essential that we respect in all its integrity the concept of the federal system which was laid down in 1867. I am quoting from the Hansard of the Ontario legislature of April 1, 1947, as follows:

> In examining the effect of such proposals upon national unity, it would be well for all of us to consider their effect upon the province of Quebec.
> There are good reasons why the province of Quebec attaches special importance to the provisions of the British North America Act and is less likely to accept substantial changes which are made without the consent of that province and without adequate compensating protection, if any of their established rights are to be diminished. With good reason Quebec looks to the British North America Act as their guarantee of their own civil law, of their customs, of their language and religion.
> It would be well for all of us to keep in mind the reasons why those special rights were assured to the province of Quebec in 1867. The provisions of the British North America Act merely carried forward undertakings which were first given at the time of the capture of Quebec in 1759. Those undertakings were given statutory form in the Quebec Act of 1774 and repeated in the Constitutional Act of 1791.
> It is not for anyone living in any other part of Canada today to question the wisdom of that decision. There can be little doubt that if those rights had not been granted the people of Quebec would have seen no good reason for not joining the other North American provinces which seceded and formed the United States, after the Revolutionary War which began in 1775.
> Nor is it likely that the soldiers of Quebec would have fought so gallantly and so successfully in the defence of British North America in the war of 1812-14 if the Constitutional Act had not reassured them of those rights in 1791, and in doing so gave them a good reason for remaining loyal to the British crown.
> In view of the fact that those rights have been undisturbed for nearly two hundred years, there is no reason why the province of Quebec should accept any agreement which would have the effect of weakening their provincial government, and by centralizing financial power in the central government present the very real possibility of the establishment of a unitary government, in fact if not in name.
> If these deductions are correct, then those provinces which hope to maintain national unity will follow a course which it is possible for Quebec to follow as well. But, Mr. Speaker, in emphasizing the special reasons why Quebec would resist agreements which would weaken the federal structure and lead to centralization, I wish to leave no impression that it is Quebec alone which would be unwilling to lose control of its own local affairs. The people of Ontario are very properly jealous of their great traditions and I do not believe that they would be willing to hand over the control within their province of their local customs, their administration of justice, and their own long-established educational system.

I have read that quotation at length because I believe it is something it is necessary to bear in mind today, since there is a firm conviction that those local rights and traditions which mean so much to the continuing unity of Canada are being threatened by the course which is being followed by the dominion government, and its repeated refusal to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference.

I am not forgetting it has been said that there is no threat of centralization in the course being followed by the dominion government. The evidence, however, is quite to the contrary. Centralization becomes a reality the moment the provincial governments place themselves in a position where they are not free to exercise their own discretion as to how they do their business, and are not able to finance their own affairs. History must not become our master, but history is a very useful guide. We can best judge the effect of this subsidy system by examining what has been said by those who should know something about it. One of the historic facts which cannot be escaped is that any attempt to centralize authority and make the local governments dependent upon the central government or vice versa —and there have been both tendencies—has always ended in the ruin of the federal system which tried it. That started well over two thousand years ago with the breakdown of the first federation, the Achaean league. There is plenty of evidence of what happens when centralization or dependence of this kind takes place.

I know it has been said over and over again that there was no intention of keeping these tax fields. It will be remembered that the Minister of Finance of that time gave his solemn undertaking that the provinces would have returned these great fields of the income and corporation taxes. Never mind whether some alternative can now be devised; that was the undertaking; and until an alternative is devised by consultation that undertaking should be fulfilled, and it is not being fulfilled. I find the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) made a statement on January 27, 1947, which indicated quite clearly that he has no thought of ever returning these tax fields to the provinces. He said:

> Why not divide the tax fields between the dominion and the provinces and let each raise all its own revenue? The chief objection to following any such plan is based on the inequality existing between the wealth of the various provinces. I doubt if any partition of the tax field could be agreed upon which would be equitable, efficient and adequate for all governments under the great complexity of conditions and needs that exist today.

That statement is in direct opposition to the undertaking of the previous Minister of Finance, who gave his assurance at the time the provinces gave up these taxing powers.

Then may I go back to the early ideas of confederation. George Brown emphasized this very point, that they were going to give the provinces taxing powers. These were his words:

> No longer shall we have to complain that one section pays cash while the other spends it. Hereafter they who pay will spend, and those who spend more than they ought will bear the brunt.

That is a simple, blunt statement by one of the early leaders in this country. Another great Liberal leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, made this very clear statement:

> It is a completely false principle that one government should impose taxes and another government spend the revenue therefrom. This will always lead to extravagance.

Then he went further; and I emphasize that these are not my words, but the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier describing the very type of subsidy payment that has now been forced upon certain of the provinces of Canada:

> Too often this increase of subsidy—

And that is just what we have seen.

> —has been nothing on the part of the federal government other than the payment of a note in return for political treachery.

If anyone does not like those words it is too late to criticize the author, but please let me remind him that they are the words of a great leader of the Liberal party who held strong views about the preservation of the federal system. Then I would like to read the words of another leader of the Liberal party whose views have been accepted widely in the statements that have been made. This is what he said in this House of Commons in 1930, in discussing this very idea of subsidy payments:

> When on a previous occasion we were discussing this matter of grants from one treasury to another, I said I thought it was an unsound principle; in fact I think I used the expression that it was a vicious principle to have one body to raise the taxes and another body spend the people's moneys thus raised.

Now, that is the second time today I have agreed with the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King), and agreed completely, as to the soundness of the position taken in regard to the dangers of subsidies of this kind instead of giving effective taxing powers to the governments which have to carry on their business.

Today we have a situation in which we are no nearer solution of our constitutional problems than we were several years ago. The acceptance of these arbitrary terms put forward in the House of Commons in June, 1946, did not advance the solution of our constitutional problems or bring about agreement on health, social security and other measures under discussion at that conference. As a matter of fact, they may only hinder it, unless there is, in fact, some early solution of these difficulties.

This problem is not confined to our own country. This is a problem faced by all countries with a federal system, because in every country those who had a taste of concentrated power always felt that taste lingering in their mouths, and the flavour in some way affected their thinking. It happened in the United States after the war of 1812-14. Students of the history of that country will recall that the very same idea of a centralized taxing power was offered there as an efficient solution of their difficulties, much the same as we have seen here. It has been tried over and over again in different countries. Woodrow Wilson gave this warning in one of his discussions of governmental problems. I quote his words:

> The history of liberty is the history of limitation of governmental power, not the increase of it. When we resist concentration of power, we are resisting the powers of death, because the concentration of power is what always precedes the destruction of human liberty.

Then, just to bring the last expert witness forward, I should like to quote the words of that great democrat, and I use that word with both the capital and the small "d", Franklin Roosevelt. In discussing this tendency of centralizing power under similar devices developing in the United States, he used these words:

> To bring about government by oligarchy, masquerading as democracy, it is fundamentally essential that practically all authority and control be centralized in one federal government . . . the individual sovereignty of our states must first be destroyed.

The strength of this country has been built upon the combined strength of all the governments. The great developments that have taken place in the nine provinces across Canada have very largely been the result of the wise and intimate guidance of the provincial governments in each of those provinces. Canada has good reason to be proud of the enormous expansion of its productive capacity during these past years, particularly during the years of war, to meet the crisis this country then faced. Let it never be suggested for one moment that the dominion government was responsible for the whole of that great development. Remember that in every province the roads which carried the heavy movements of food, munitions and production of all kinds, were roads put there by the provincial governments. The resources which were used were resources brought to their development and made available under the wise and sensible administration of these same provincial governments.

The thing which gave our workmen as high a degree of skill as that shown by the workmen of any country in the world was the educational system in each of those provinces with which the dominion government has nothing to do at all. Going right across the field you will find the ground had been laid for this great expansion. Please do not let anyone following me suggest that I am for a moment seeking to leave the impression that the vast industrial development was not in a great many cases carried out under the direction of the dominion government. The military production and the adoption of plans were also under the direction of the dominion government, but the ground work was there. The work which was done when these broad plans were laid was, very largely, the work of these provincial governments, which in peace and war, since confederation, have been close to the people. For that very reason the provincial governments were able to bring to the highest point of efficiency the efforts of the people from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Certain changes have taken place since the conference adjourned on May 3, 1946, at the instance of the dominion government. The present Prime Minister of Canada asserted the proposition that this parliament has the power, by majority decision, to change our constitution. His own words were:

> The central power does not need to go back to the provinces in order to say what Canada shall be in the future.

At first glance that seems rather plausible. You have seen suggestions about the provinces assuming great measures of power and feeling they had to be consulted about this and that. The provinces came together to form a nation on the clear understanding there was a constitution which protected their rights and preserved their traditions and their laws. It is not for this parliament to change that constitution without consulting those provinces. Never mind whether anyone might think a sufficiently cogent argument could be put forward in any court to uphold that proposition. There is more than a legal decision involved in this; there is the unity of Canada. There will be a very real threat to the unity of this country if there is any doubt about the fact our constitution is not something which does, in fact, preserve those rights which were regarded as so important in 1867.

No country could possibly carry forward as a great nation without an understandable and workable constitution. Right now neither the dominion nor the provincial governments know where the border line is between many of their responsibilities. We see evidence of that in much of the legislation that is under consideration here. Some of the legislation that has been suggested is definitely in the field of provincial authority. Those are the things that are going to cause difficulty. All this difficulty could be avoided by bringing these governments together in a conventional relationship such as has been suggested.

I emphasize this point again. This conference came to an end in May of 1946 by the decision of the dominion government, and it has not met since, for one reason and one reason alone, namely, the refusal of the dominion government to convene it. The record is clear. I for one have on frequent occasions urged the reconvening of that conference. I have written not only to the previous Prime Minister but to the present Prime Minister, while he was acting in that capacity, urging the reconvening of the conference; and I am not the only provincial premier who did so during the intervening years. But may I emphasize that there are those, whose views cannot under any circumstances be said to have a political flavour opposed to this government, who take that stand. For that reason may I just quote the words of Hon. Angus Macdonald spoken in the Nova Scotia legislature on May 12, 1947. I shall quote fairly briefly, but the passage shows exactly what the position was, in the words of that able public servant. These are his words:

> There are important matters yet to be settled, constitutional and economic. In the constitutional field, there remains the whole problem of a revision of the constitution in the light of the experience of eighty years and in the light of Canada's identity as a federal state. This revision can only be made at a general conference between the dominion and the provinces, and such a conference ought not to be long delayed. Indeed, it should be held without any delay.

Then he made certain detailed observations, and I quote again:

> For a proper settlement of the constitutional and economic questions that still remain, we in Nova Scotia shall continue to press. Let it not be thought for a moment here or elsewhere, that by simply increasing the subsidies to this province as is done under these proposals, Ottawa has rid itself of listening to just provincial demands and claims. Anybody who holds that view is sadly mistaken. In the words of a great Scottish warrior, "They have not seen the last of my bonnets and me."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I am still quoting Hon. Angus Macdonald:

> Thus far the dominion government has steadily refused to reconvene a general conference. I do not think it can long continue in this position. I believe that public opinion alone, if nothing else, will bring about the holding of a general conference on these important matters, even though one of the parties is reluctant to agree to such a meeting.

That is a general summary of the situation. Everything I have said is borne out by the record. In the face of that record, I can only say that anyone who suggests that the premier of Ontario of that time, or the premier of Quebec, in any way prevented the reconvening of the conference, is challenging the record and is stating what is directly contrary to the truth.

This concentration of power which has been achieved is already producing highly unsatisfactory results, because the dominion authorities were able to get the exclusive field of personal income taxes. And they did that; because, when the governments of Ontario and Quebec refused to accept those arbitrary terms, they did not impose income taxes. By the invasion of other fields, particularly the succession duty field, which, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance at that time, was supposed to be left clear, this government through its Minister of Finance during the current fiscal year is overtaxing the people of Canada to the extent of at least $600 million. That is what they do with the measure of centralization they have now achieved. I hesitate to think what they would do if they had been able to achieve that full measure of centralization which they were seeking and failed to realize only because the provincial premiers recognized the sound basis of the federal system.

This federal structure was intended to create checks and balances. It was intended to create checks on too great centralized taxing powers. It was intended to prevent the over-centralization of authority of any kind. Let us all remember what was done in order to carry that structure into effect. Following what was done in the United States, those who drafted our excellent constitution in the months prior to July, 1867, left with the provinces the exclusive jurisdiction over those personal affairs which largely determine the kind of life our people live from day to day.

The result is that under that federal constitution civil rights, property rights, the administration of justice, which establishes those rights through our courts, the municipal laws, the supervision of municipal affairs, which has so great an effect on the life of every one of us, and education, which determines the whole destiny and character of a nation, were all left exclusively with the provinces. That was done mainly with the idea that, so long as they retained their authority, there could be no usurpation of power by a central government at any time if, temporarily at least, power were assumed by those who believe in centralized power. It is just as important to preserve protecting provisions of that kind as it is to create them.

If the full protection of those measures is to be retained, then, under a new and revised system of taxation which will be to the advantage of all Canadians, the provincial and municipal governments must have, under their laws, adequate independent taxing powers in order to be able to carry out their heavy responsibilities to the people whom they serve. The preservation of those particular rights and functions was never more important than it is today, when all over the world freedom is being threatened and centralized power is in so many lands destroying the democratic system in which we believe.

There are other reasons why this over-centralization of power has consequences that cannot be ignored. I think we are all indebted to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) for an unusually frank statement he handed to the press last Tuesday. I think it will bear quotation because it must be one of the frankest admissions made by any minister of the crown since confederation. These were his words in a statement handed to the press on Tuesday afternoon:

> Getting votes is obviously not a matter of hand-outs or tumbling over ourselves to outsocialize the socialists. The recent by-election in Digby-Annapolis-Kings highlighted the point. More was done for this constituency by way of direct financial beneficence than probably any other constituency in Canada, and you know what happened.

Mr. Rowe: One honest politician.

Mr. Drew: We knew it was happening but we did not expect a frank statement by a minister of the crown that they were trying to buy the constituency with public money and failed.

Mr. Rowe: They could not sell their apples and they were paid $4 a tree.

Mr. Drew: This admission, over-frank or naive, or just slightly exuberant, whichever it was, cannot be passed over too lightly. It is as frank an admission as I have ever seen of the fact that this government has been using the additional financial powers it had acquired in the hope that it would affect votes in the constituencies where the money was spent.

Mr. Sinclair: Cocktail bars in High Park.

Mr. Drew: I am going to be able to give you further evidence of the inclination of this government if you will be patient for a moment; but I do want to say this. The minister of reconstruction was right to this extent: that the fine people of Digby-Annapolis-Kings were not to be bought by beneficences, to use his term, and that they sent to this House of Commons a man worthy of the great traditions of that constituency, a man who will represent them well. It was because of his character, his integrity and his ability that he is here today in spite of what was done.

[Mr. Drew.]

But to those who seem to regard this as a rather humorous incident—and I would think that ministers of the crown might not so regard it—I would point out that this is not an isolated example of the same attitude. It can be said for the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply that he has not shown the experience, either in government or in public statements, that is possessed by the other ministers who do something somewhat similar. The other minister is the minister who has in his hands the control of this enormous concentration of money. Let me read a report from the Halifax Herald of January 6 of this year. I am quite prepared to admit that this outdoes the minister of reconstruction. Until I indicate that the quotation is ended I am quoting from the Halifax Herald:

> Kentville, January 5. Finance Minister Douglas C. Abbott has replied to a resolution passed at the eighty-fifth annual convention, Nova Scotia fruit growers' association, here last month, in which an appreciation to the federal government for its financial assistance to the Annapolis valley apple industry, was voiced in a letter read by the secretary at the first meeting of the new directorate.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Let me read the last part of the quotation, which is as follows:

> Mr. Abbott, in acknowledging receipt of the resolution, said he was very glad to know of the expression of appreciation, but regretted this appreciation had not "taken the form of a larger vote for the government in the recent by-election."

Mr. Black (Yukon): The chickens are coming home.

Mr. Rowe: They are not politicians, they are statesmen.

Mr. Drew: It is not possible that there were ever two more completely frank admissions. To use that gracious word employed by the minister of reconstruction, the Minister of Finance had conferred his beneficences upon Digby-Annapolis-Kings and regretted that the beneficences made possible by the money of the people of Canada had not been duly recognized by voting for the Liberal candidate in the by-election in Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. Sinclair: Is frankness so rare in Ontario?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You had better take it, Jimmie.

Mr. Sinclair: He is surprised that we are frank. Frankness surprises your leader. We are not surprised.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Graydon: Stick to the C.C.F., Jimmie.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sinclair: We are not surprised that frankness surprises him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind all hon. members that their remarks must be directed to the Speaker.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member who has just spoken has said that we have no reason to be surprised at the frankness, and we have none, because this is the pattern of this government which is using this money power in this way.

Mr. Sinclair: On a point of privilege, since the leader of the opposition used my words I will say I was not surprised that he was surprised at frankness. Everybody in the house knows that frankness is quite unknown to the leader of the opposition.

An hon. Member: They certainly fell for that one.

Mr. Drew: By its refusal to reconvene this conference to which I have referred, the dominion government is not only threatening national unity, but making impossible any solution of our constitutional problems. For that reason this government should not receive the support of hon. members of this House of Commons in the course it is following. By the admission to which I have referred, and by the added admission just made, it is obvious that neither this house nor the people of Canada have any right to have confidence in the government.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon):

That the following words be added to the said address:

"We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers do not possess the confidence of this house."

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), in which he expressed his deep sympathy with the Speaker of the other place in the terrible bereavement which has so suddenly overtaken him. I can assure him that all hon. members in the house have experienced a feeling of shock and surprise that the charming lady who so graciously received us on Wednesday afternoon has now passed away.

I should like to extend sincere congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is a great pleasure to have such good reason to compliment both of them upon the excellence of the speeches they made in the house yesterday. I feel sure we are all of the opinion that they acquitted themselves with personal credit, and thereby brought distinction upon the constituents who elected them to this House of Commons.

The mover of the address in reply (Mr. Brown) is not a newcomer to the house. He has been a member throughout the life of this parliament, and for three years has been the chairman of the committee on Indian affairs. In that capacity he has won both the admiration and the respect of all those who took any part in the valuable work performed by that committee. He has shown like competence and diligence in all his activities in relation to the business of the house. I hope it will not be thought amiss that I should say that he has set a fine example in the way he has sought to serve in the House of Commons the interests not only of his constituents but of the country and the Canadian people as a whole.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne is a new member, only recently elected to represent the riding of Laval-Two Mountains.

We are very pleased to have him with us on this side of the house and, after listening to the splendid speech he made yesterday, we realize that his support will be most valuable to this side of the house.

Before his election, he already had a fine reputation because of his public services as an agronomist in the Montreal district. He is an expert on agricultural problems and I am sure he has especially set his heart on working for the interests of the farmers.

In his first appearance in this house, he has shown fluency and cleverness to a degree which is seldom attained by a newcomer.

The electors of Laval-Two Mountains, I am sure, are still prouder today than on election night of the fortunate choice they have made in the person of this member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

(Text):

I should like also to extend a word of congratulation to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) upon the very interesting address to which we have listened. Of course, he will not expect me to allow this debate to be diverted into the channel he has seen fit to choose, rather than to have it deal with the subject matter of the question now before the house. The matter before the house is an address to His Excellency the Governor General, thanking him for the speech he has addressed to the two houses of parliament, setting out for them the purposes for which this fifth session of the twentieth parliament has been called.

I think we owe some measure of attention to the speech he pronounced, and that it is only proper that that measure of attention should be accorded to it. Of course, that does not mean that I am not going to have anything to say about what the leader of the opposition, in the course of this debate, has taken so long to say. But before coming to that, I believe I would be sticking rather more closely to the traditions of the house if I were to deal with some of the matters dealt with in the speech from the throne.

Before doing that, however, I want to say to the leader of the opposition that there are many of the things he said in his speech concerning dominion-provincial relations, and concerning the constitution of Canada, and its principles, with which I am in entire agreement. And if there was any hope anywhere that an issue could be created upon that, then I am sorry that we shall have to disappoint those who may have entertained such hopes.

The speech which His Excellency has addressed to the houses of parliament states that the first concern of government in world affairs is to ensure peace and security. The leader of the opposition has agreed that that should be the first concern of government. But it is rather surprising that he found it sufficient to devote but one or two short phrases to that aspect of the great problem of peace in the world and security for Canada. At other times and places he has stated the position of his party, and I assume that he did not consider it necessary to enlarge upon it in the course of his address on this occasion. I find reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of January 12 that he had stated the night before in Winnipeg, with regard to the North Atlantic defence pact, that his party was on record as favouring an association of western powers for the preservation of peace.

That is quite true, because I referred back to the resolutions adopted at the convention where the hon. gentleman was chosen leader of his party. I found this resolution:

Western defensive union. In the present crisis Canada should give its strongest support to the concept of the establishment of a western defensive union of nations.

I took the trouble to look up those resolutions because it was not so very long ago that the leader of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec made statements that were quite the opposite of this resolution. Le Devoir of November 13, 1948, had very substantial headlines reading:

"M. St-Laurent n'a pas le droit d'engager le pays à l'avance."

That translates:

Mr. St. Laurent has no right to commit the country in advance.

The report then goes on to state:

Au cours d'une conférence de presse, hier après-midi, dans les bureaux du quartier général du parti progressiste-conservateur, le leader provincial de ce parti, Me Yvan Sabourin, C.R., a qualifié de malheureuses les récentes déclarations de M. Louis St-Laurent, futur premier ministre du Canada, au sujet de "l'impossible neutralité" de notre pays, advenant une troisième guerre mondiale.

A free translation of that would be:

In the course of a press conference yesterday afternoon in the offices of the general headquarters of the Progressive Conservative party the provincial leader of that party, Mr. Ivan Sabourin, K.C., described as unfortunate the recent declarations of Mr. Louis St. Laurent, the future Prime Minister of Canada, concerning the impossibility of maintaining the neutrality of our country in the event of a third world war.

The press conference reporter then went on to state:

M. Sabourin a soutenu que le Canada peut fort bien rester neutre advenant un conflit armé entre la Russie et les États-Unis; il a cité l'exemple des États-Unis qui sont demeurés neutres pendant une période assez prolongée, lors des deux dernières guerres mondiales.

Then the reporter quotes:

"Il est fort possible", a-t-il ajouté, "que si la guerre éclatait entre la Russie et les États-Unis, le Canada puisse demeurer neutre, et suivre ainsi ses meilleurs intérêts. Si les États-Unis ont pu demeurer neutres, lors des dernières guerres mondiales, pourquoi le Canada ne le pourrait-il pas au cas d'une troisième guerre? Il n'y a qu'à renverser les rôles", a dit M. Sabourin.

Perhaps I may translate that as follows:

Mr. Sabourin contended that Canada might very well remain neutral in the case of armed conflict between Russia and the United States. He cited the example of the United States, which had remained neutral for quite a long period at the time of the two last world wars.

"It is quite possible," he added, "that if war broke out between Russia and the United States Canada might remain neutral and thus best serve its interests. If the United States were able to remain neutral at the time of the last two world wars, why could not Canada do the same in the next, third, world war? It would only be required to reverse the roles."

We are naturally concerned to know the real attitude of the Progressive Conservative party in that regard. I hope that when I read the two short phrases of the leader of the opposition about this great question of the peace of the world and the security of Canada I shall find some enlightenment there. I hope that they are clear enough to let the people of Nicolet-Yamaska know before February 7 where that party stands. There is to be a by-election in that constituency and according to reports in the same paper, Le Devoir, there is a gentleman there who has been nominated as the Progressive Conservative candidate.

Mr. Graydon: Is this all on the speech from the throne?

Mr. St. Laurent: It all has to do with the attitude to be taken by the Canadian people on this primordial question of peace and security for the world. The recent issue of January 27 of this paper states:

Fait à remarquer: on ne trouve dans l'organisation du candidat conservateur à peu près personne de l'organisation centrale conservatrice. C'est une élimination presque complète.

M. Yvan Sabourin, leader provincial du parti, a apparu dans le comté avant le choix du candidat. Depuis, il n'y a pas remis les pieds. On nous assure qu'il n'y viendra pas d'ici la fin de la lutte.

Un organisateur de l'Union nationale...

The Union Nationale is the name borne by a party which is probably known to some of my hon. friends.

Mr. Drew: And which trimmed you down.

Mr. St. Laurent: To continue:

Un organisateur de l'Union nationale affirme que cela se fait "par ordre". Il ajoute qu'on ne veut "personne d'Ottawa. On ne veut pas les avoir dans les jambes. Pour eux, la meilleure manière de nous aider, c'est de ne pas venir nous nuire."

That could be translated as follows:

A remarkable fact is that we found no one in the organization of the Conservative candidate from the central Conservative organization. It is a complete elimination. Mr. Ivan Sabourin, the provincial leader of the party, appeared in the county before the choice of candidate was made. Since then he has not come back and we are assured that he will not come back between now and the end of the campaign. One of the organizers of the Union Nationale asserts that this is done by order. He says, "We do not want any one from Ottawa. We do not want to have to carry them on our backs. As far as they are concerned, the best way they can help us is not to come down here to cause us trouble."

That does create in the minds of some a feeling of some uncertainty as to just where the Progressive Conservative party in various parts of the country stands on this matter of a defensive pact for the western nations, which was referred to in the resolution passed by the convention. By the way, so there may be no mistake in identity I believe this Mr. Ivan Sabourin was either the proposer or the seconder of the candidature of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) at the Progressive Conservative convention. I am sure that fact accredits him to a certain extent, and does give some people who see these various statements occasion to be a little disturbed as to the real situation.

Mr. Graydon: Particularly in Nicolet.

Mr. St. Laurent: Particularly in Nicolet; because the article goes on:

C'est, nous affirme une personnalité locale du parti, un test case. S'il réussit, on essayera de procéder de la même manière aux élections générales.

It, asserts an important personage of the locality, is a test case, and if that succeeds they will try the same thing at the general election. The Liberal party does not need any test case. Its attitude is right out in the open, and it is the same whether it be in Nicolet, in Toronto or in Winnipeg.

We really do want peace, and I believe the people of Canada really want peace. I think it was because the people of Canada really wanted peace that this parliament approved with such unanimity the signing by Canada of the charter of the united nations in 1945. We took the provisions of that charter seriously; we believed them to mean what the words written into the charter express. We felt that if it were implemented in the spirit in which it was written it would be a real instrument to give us the sense of security we required to proceed in the path our destiny seems to have set for us. We agreed with the statement in the purposes—

All members shall settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered.

We felt that article 24 was something which would permit this charter to be fully implemented:

In order to ensure prompt and effective action by the united nations, its members confer on the security council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and agree that in carrying out its duties under this responsibility the security council acts on their behalf.

And we accepted the provisions of article 25:

The members of the united nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the security council in accordance with the present charter.

We attached much importance to the provisions of article 43, designed to provide the security council with the strength required to make any recalcitrant conform with its proper decisions for the maintenance of peace:

1. All members of the united nations, in order to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security, undertake to make available to the security council, on its call and in accordance with a special agreement or agreements, armed forces, assistance, and facilities, including rights of passage, necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

2. Such agreement or agreements shall govern the numbers and types of forces, their degree of readiness and general location and the nature of facilities and assistance to be provided.

3. The agreement or agreements shall be negotiated as soon as possible on the initiative of the security council. They shall be concluded between the security council and members or between the security council and groups of members and shall be subject to ratification by the signatory states in accordance with their respective constitutional processes.

We also relied upon the terms of articles 44 and 45. I need not take time at this moment to read them, but they provided the method by which the security council would proceed to exercise its primary responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security throughout the world. But in spite of our reliance we collaborated with the other members to insert into the charter articles 51 and 52:

51. Nothing in the present charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a member of the united nations, until the security council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security . . .

52. Nothing in the present charter precludes the existence of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided that such arrangements or agencies and their activities are consistent with the purposes and principles of the united nations.

Of course, all hon. members know what has been happening in the security council. At the meeting of the general assembly in October, 1946, speaking for the Canadian delegation I said:

We are particularly concerned that the security council and the military staff committee have so far failed to make substantial progress towards a conclusion of the special agreements with individual members required to implement articles 43 and those following of the charter and thus make force and other facilities available to the security council. We are all of us bound under the charter to refrain from using armed forces except as provided by the charter.

Then a little further down:

Canada, therefore, urges that the security council and the military staff committee go ahead with all possible speed in the constructive work of negotiating the special agreements and of organizing the military and economic measures of enforcement.

We were concerned at that time that the charter, heralded with such applause throughout the world, was not being completed in its organs and put into position to carry out the purposes and give effect to the principles of this potentially great instrument for the peace and security of the world. The next year again, speaking for the Canadian delegation at the meeting of the general assembly, I called attention to these facts in these words:

But the security council, founded on what is called the unanimity of its permanent members, has done little to strengthen the hopes of those who saw in it the keystone of the structure of peace. It has done much to deepen the fears of those who felt that, with the veto, it could not operate effectively in an international atmosphere of fear and suspicion, where pride is allowed to take precedence over peace and power over reason.

This veto privilege, attacked and defended with equal vigour, if it continues to be abused, may well destroy the united nations, because it will destroy all confidence in the ability of the security council to act internationally, to act effectively, and to act in time.

There is no point in deceiving ourselves. Our peoples cannot be expected to accept, indefinitely and without alteration, voting procedures and practices which, in the name of unanimity, underline disunity; and which reduce agreement to a lowest common denominator of action that in practice often means inaction.

Further down I read:

The fact remains, however, that these problems—

—the problems arising out of disputes and situations—

—must be solved and that procedures and practices which obstruct such solutions must be changed. This can be done by the voluntary abandonment of these practices; by agreed conventions or understandings which will regulate them; or, if necessary, by amendments to the charter. We must hope that no member of the security council will flout clearly expressed world opinion by obstinately preventing change and thus become responsible for prejudicing, and possibly destroying, the organization which is now man's greatest hope for the future.

Nations, in their search for peace and co-operation, will not and cannot accept indefinitely and unaltered a council which was set up to ensure their security, and which so many feel has become frozen in futility, and divided by dissension. If forced they may seek greater safety in an association of democratic and peace-loving states willing to accept more specific international obligations in return for greater national security.

Such associations, if consistent with the principles and purposes of the charter, can be formed within the united nations. It is to be hoped such a development will not be necessary. If it is unnecessary it will be undesirable. If, however, it is made necessary, it will take place.

I think it has been made necessary, and it is taking place. It is taking place not as the best solution for the problems of the world—the best solution would be the proper implementation of this world-wide charter signed at San Francisco. Unless and until those who signed that world-wide charter are prepared to respect their solemn obligations, the pledged sanction of their states which accompanied their signature, we have got to be content with something not quite as good, but which was foreseen in those articles of the charter which I have read.

The charter sets up the rule of law to be observed internationally as, in civilized countries, we expect the rule of law to be observed by our fellow citizens. This North Atlantic pact and the development of the Brussels pact also, sets up the undertaking of the signatories to avoid resorting to force or the threat of force in connection with possible disputes that may arise between them, and to apply the rule of law to such situations or such threats to the peace of the world as may arise.

There are quite a large number of the western democracies of Europe; there is the United States and there is Canada, who, we believe, are willing to put their signatures to a regional pact undertaking to have the rule of law observed between themselves as well as to unite their strength in the hope that their united strength will be sufficient to deter any aggressor who might otherwise feel disposed to repudiate the solemn undertaking he signed at San Francisco.

There is no use deceiving ourselves or mincing words. We know that the people of the North American continent, that the people of the democracies of western Europe, fear there may be an aggression from this great power which was allied with us in the last war but which professes an ideology that would necessarily exclude the civilization under which our institutions have been established. We fear that those totalitarians who direct that great mass of human beings might attempt, by force, to impose their ideology upon the rest of the world. But we believe they are realistic, and we believe that, if we can negotiate with them from strength, they will be apt to feel there would be considerable risk in starting any war. We believe they will not start any war they are not confident they can win.

We believe that those we mentioned as the likely signatories of this North Atlantic pact have the potential strength, manpower, industrial know-how, material, the courage and desire to remain free men which would make it very doubtful that any aggressor could overcome them. We are forming or hope to form the alliance not for the purpose of having to fight together—of course we will if it is imposed upon us, but it is not for that purpose. Primarily, it is being formed for the purpose of doing that for which the charter of the united nations was signed at San Francisco in 1945.

It seems to me that any free man in any of our countries should have no greater hesitation in having his country become a party to that North Atlantic security pact than he had in having his country become a signatory to the San Francisco charter.

Now, that is the matter in the international field which His Excellency says, in the speech from the throne, is the first concern of his government. The second paragraph reports that, in spite of the unsettled and disruptive activities of international communism, the nations of western Europe are making progress towards recovery, and that North America is contributing substantially to the restoration of economic activity, thereby increasing their own power to resist aggression, either within or from outside. I think that is a statement which needs no development here. We all know that has been happening, and we know how effective it has been. From the elections that were held in Italy, we know what a partial restoration of economic activity in that country was able to do in repelling aggression from within.

It is said that an offensive for peace is now being pushed by the eastern powers. This has been mentioned by the communist leader in Italy as well as by the communist leader in France. If it is anything but a sham, those leaders have a wonderful opportunity, as Mr. Lippmann pointed out in an article which I think was in yesterday's newspaper, of demonstrating their sincerity. If they will instruct their fellows to help rather than resist the restoration of economic activity in their respective countries, then we may be able to believe that this peace offensive is more than a sham, and that it is the expression of some desire by the rulers of these totalitarian states to put an end to this enervating cold war that has been having such serious effects throughout the world.

At home the situation is one that the speech comments upon as being a cause for rejoicing and satisfaction. Just let me put three or four sets of figures on record in that connection. We say that the economy of the country is buoyant. Last year the gross national production, according to the best available statistics, was $15,500,000,000 as compared with something of the order of $5 billion or $6 billion in the years which preceded the war. The present estimates for 1949 are $16,550,000,000. The salaries, wages and supplementary labour income for 1948, or the amounts distributed to wage earners and salary earners, totalled $7,135,000,000. The estimate for 1949 is $7,810,000,000. The number employed in 1948 in civilian employments was 4,890,000 and, in the armed forces, 35,000. The estimate for 1949 is 4,966,000 in civilian employments and 42,000 in the armed forces. Those are figures which are significant of the activity which is prevailing in this country and they are, I think, a justification for the further statement that progress towards social justice for all in any country is an effective safeguard against the effect and influence of subversive doctrines.

The next matter dealt with in the speech from the throne is the union between Newfoundland and Canada. I think all hon. members in this house look upon that as an achievement, not an achievement of mine or of any one of our colleagues, but rather an achievement of the Canadian people in bringing about a situation where the people of Newfoundland desire to become associated with us as one nation. It is a matter which should be consummated by March 31. This afternoon I indicated what were the steps which must be completed before the union could become effective, and what would happen if those steps were not completed by March 31. I think there are quite a number of people in Canada and perhaps quite a number who are not yet Canadians but who, under this arrangement, will become Canadians, who will have noted the attitude of the various parties in this house this afternoon upon this question of the union of Newfoundland with Canada.

It was suggested that, if there was any reason why any more time were required than would be available until March 31, after the discussion on the speech from the throne of all the various matters that were referred to by the hon. gentlemen who addressed you this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, and the other matters which you or the Deputy Speaker, who sat in your chair, found it would not be in order to discuss at this time, parliament should have been called together earlier.

I would remind hon. members that the terms of union which have been tabled and which will be submitted to this house for its consideration—and, if it sees fit, for its approval—were not arrived at in one or two days. Long and protracted negotiations took place in order to settle those terms. Those terms had been preceded by a fairly full proposal arrived at after months of deliberation last year. After the proposal had been approved by a majority vote of the people of Newfoundland in a referendum, the precise terms were under discussion here for upwards of two months, and the terms were not finally signed until December 11. I was the chairman of the Canadian committee that had to do with the negotiations with the representatives from Newfoundland; and I regarded the completion of that undertaking as something of consequence to the people of Canada, yes, and possibly of consequence to the people of the world. I felt that, so long as there was any hope that we could get that agreement into shape to have it for submission at this fifth session of the twentieth parliament, it was worth while working at it. We worked at it until December 11, and on that date we put our signatures to the document, subject of course to ratification by parliament.

After December 11 it would have been rather difficult, and not very convenient for the members of this house, if an attempt had been made to get them down here before Christmas. They might have arrived two or three days before Christmas; but I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that there are very many of them who would have felt at all kindly towards a government that brought them down here at that time.

Mr. Graydon: The government did it last year.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has been here for some time. He knows that parliament is not called to meet the day after the proclamation is issued. He knows that a reasonable time must elapse between the issuing of the proclamation and the meeting of the house. Between December 11 and Christmas there were just fourteen days, or two weeks; and it would not have been possible to bring hon. gentlemen down here at that time. While the negotiations were going on, the attention of many members of the cabinet was devoted almost exclusively to the discussion of these terms of union.

Mr. Fraser: To election work.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the hon. member should try to be a little bit more serious in the interruptions he sees fit to make.

Mr. Fraser: I know they were in my riding.

Mr. St. Laurent: We are discussing a matter which has concerned the Canadian people ever since confederation was mooted more than eighty-one years ago, and it has now reached the stage where it will be the responsibility of the hon. member who is making these interruptions, among others, to say whether it should be completed or not. It is my responsibility. I will not shirk it, and I will not blush for the way in which I discharged it, in recommending to my colleagues the date for the opening of parliament. I submit that the course I followed was a reasonable one, and I am quite prepared at any time to leave it to the public of Canada to determine whether or not it was reasonable under those circumstances.

Mr. Graydon: Whistling in the dark.

Mr. St. Laurent: The next paragraph in the speech from the throne deals with amendments to the Supreme Court Act to make the Supreme Court of Canada the court of last resort for Canadians.

There have been suggestions that this is something which constitutes a threat to the autonomy or liberty of the provincial governments. I had a compilation made of what has been happening in that regard for the last ten years. I asked for ten years but I got it for eleven. It is given from the year 1938 to 1948 both inclusive, and, unless my counting is wrong, that is eleven years. There were fifty-five cases in which appeals were asserted, or sought to be asserted, from judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada. In one case the appeal was withdrawn. In five the appeals were allowed. In forty-nine cases the appeals were dismissed and the judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada were affirmed. In no one of the five cases in which the appeals were allowed was there any constitutional issue between the dominion and the provinces. That is the record for the last eleven years in these fifty-five times when Canadians went over to London to demonstrate that we in Canada were not able to settle our own affairs at home.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Has he the figures for the appeals direct from the provincial courts to the privy council? Many of the appeals from British Columbia go right from the court of appeal to the privy council.

Mr. St. Laurent: I know. I have long deplored this apparent tendency of the litigants of British Columbia to take their disputes to the privy council instead of taking them to the supreme court at Ottawa, but I did not go into that because that did not appear to me to have any bearing upon this fear that what we were proposing was something that was going to be a menace to the autonomy or the prerogatives of the provincial governments.

Mr. Drew: I just want to put the record straight. It has nothing to do with the merits of the proposition that is being discussed. I am interested in the statement that there were no constitutional issues involved, in view of the fact that I have a vivid recollection of the Canada Temperance Act appeal being decided within a very recent period.

Mr. St. Laurent: I said that in the five cases where the appeals were successful there were no constitutional issues between the dominion and the provinces. In all cases where there were constitutional questions between the dominion and any of the provinces the judgments of the supreme court were affirmed as rendered here in Canada.

The next paragraph of His Excellency's speech has to do with navigation and power of the great lakes-St. Lawrence basin, and I am very glad to know that the leader of the opposition is in full agreement with our policy to press forward for that as speedily as results can be hoped for. Here I wish to compliment the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) on his modesty when he was speaking of the results of this development with respect to the Canadian economy. He spoke of there being a drop of 85 feet which would be capable, in addition to its benefits to navigation, of producing 2,200,000 horsepower, to be divided one-half to our United States neighbours and the other half to the good people of the province of Ontario. That is quite true, but it is only a part of the truth. That drop of 85 feet is the drop in the international section; but the complete drop from lake Superior to the port of Montreal is something over 550 feet, and the horsepower involved in the project to develop this basin for navigation and power purposes is of the order of something like five million.

There has already been developed in the Soulanges section by the Beauharnois power company, now controlled by the Quebec hydro, 750,000 horsepower, which has been at work for a number of years, and there is in process of development there an additional 500,000 horsepower, which will be ready at a very early date, making the power for the Quebec hydro from that development a million and a quarter, which can be increased by using over that head in the Soulanges section some of the water that is now being used less efficiently in existing plants. That will be done some day, so that the Beauharnois project will then be turning out two million horsepower.

At the time the project was considered, and even at the time the agreement of 1941 was entered into with the United States government, subject to ratification by congress and by this parliament, the Lachine section was looked upon as offering too costly a proposition for economic development.

Just about a year ago a commission was set up by the federal government to inquire again into the possibilities of developing the Lachine section. In October last the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) distributed the report obtained from that commission which was presided over by Mr. Henry and composed of Dr. T. H. Hogg, Mr. Arthur Surveyer, Mr. Guy Lindsay and Mr. C. W. West. In this report they came to the conclusion that there is 1,200,000 horsepower which can be developed just below the Victoria bridge in the city of Montreal at capital costs a little higher than the costs of the capital installations in the other section of the St. Lawrence, but that, in view of the fact that it will not be necessary to have huge transformers to step up or step down this power, and it will not be necessary to have transmission lines to make it available to consumers, and there will be no losses in transmission, the cost of that power to the consumer will not be any higher than the cost of the power from the international section to the consumer of Ontario. So that here we have in this project, in addition to the navigation facilities, the opportunity of there being made available to the industries of these two central provinces of Canada something over three million horsepower.

The leader of the opposition knows better than I do that the increasing demand for power in his province is at the rate of one hundred thousand horsepower a year, and that, without the one hundred thousand horsepower a year, the development which is now proceeding in his province could not proceed at the same pace. So that we have good reason, whether we be of his province or of my province, to see in this prospective development an earnest of the great continued industrial development in our respective provinces. I hope that the attempt being made in the congress of the United States at this time to have the agreement of 1941 approved will turn out to be successful.

I think it is only fair for us to say that if we cannot at this time get implementation of this agreement for the double-barreled purpose of navigation and power, the value of the power is so great that we shall have to give very serious consideration to going ahead and developing it on the power side alone—which would be amply justified, I think, by the economic benefits which could be derived from the power alone.

The next paragraph deals with the legislative provisions necessary to implement agreements for the sale of agricultural products to the United Kingdom. One hon. member this afternoon was most anxious that there be an opportunity to discuss problems of the agriculturists in the western provinces. He was, I am sure, happy to note, if he did note it, that the first step for the presentation of this legislation to the Canadian parliament was taken this very afternoon. I shall not enter into the details of it; and I am not sure that if the hon. member were to read the views of Sir John A. Macdonald on the proper scope of a debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne he would not come to the conclusion that he had better wait until this legislation is before parliament to discuss the matters to which he was referring this afternoon.

With respect to the international trade agreement, the charter for the international trade organization, and the efforts being made by the government, its commissioners and staffs abroad to remove specific obstacles to the sale of our goods in our traditional markets, I shall not say anything at this time, beyond pointing out the fact that there is a continuing committee which was established by the governments of the United Kingdom and Canada, when Sir Stafford Cripps was here in the autumn, to supervise the trend of trade between our two countries. This committee is at this very moment sitting in London, the meeting having been convened there on January 25.

At this time I would say that I believe there are things in our relations with our good friends of the United Kingdom which are more important than the specific terms of any one of these special agreements. I think they mean to treat us fairly, and I think it is very important that we treat them fairly. There have been some reports of actions taken by us and of actions taken by them which have left an unfortunate impression as to the genuine desire existing on both sides to have as full and as cordial trading relations with each other as possible. I believe the continuing committee will be able to achieve for us in that field, as well as in the field of the actual shillings and pence or dollars and cents involved, very beneficial results.

We have found ourselves in pretty tight corners more than once in world affairs. We have been proud to stand shoulder to shoulder, and we have been successful because we were standing shoulder to shoulder. In spite of our best hopes for the future of the world, mankind being what it is we cannot be sure that in the future there will not be other tight corners for us to stand in. I think it is most important that we conserve, with respect to each other, the feeling that we deal fairly with each other, that we are pretty good people with whom to have collaboration, and that it would be most unfortunate if, as the result of reports they get of what is going on elsewhere, our people were to come to the conclusion that we were being let down by the people of the United Kingdom.

I do not think we are. Under very difficult circumstances I think they are doing their best, and this matter of the balance of payments and dollar shortage is something which is real. So far as we were concerned, we knew it was real just a little over a year ago. We had to take measures which were distasteful to us and distasteful to the Canadian people. But at that time we planned a course which has succeeded. Perhaps we have been fortunate; but things have turned out as we planned them. And over the period which has elapsed since the putting into force of our restrictions, our reserves of United States dollars have doubled. We felt it was necessary to the economic security of this country to have them doubled.

We must realize that those having the responsibility for the economic security of other countries are entitled to take the measures which appear to them inevitable to attain that degree of security their people expect from them.

Something has been said about the fact that during the war the urgency of the danger made it necessary for the federal government to encroach upon the field normally reserved to the provincial authorities. This is so. We had to do it, to a large degree, as a consequence of the necessity of warding off the danger which threatened our very existence. That was recognized by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I wish to pay him that tribute. He made no complaint about what we did under the War Measures Act, even though it did invade the field which normally was within the jurisdiction of the government of which he was the head.

Since the war ceased, we have been trying to get out of the fields we had thus entered, and we have been doing it at a rate which not so long ago a great many members in this house were charging had been too rapid. At the present time we have a few small controls which it appears necessary to maintain, unless they are exercised by some other authority.

There is steel control. Steel control, in my view, does not require the existence of a war emergency for its justification in the hands of the federal authority, if in fact steel is a material in short supply. The defence of Canada is a matter of federal jurisdiction at all times; the defence of Canada requires watchfulness and preparation at all times. Steel is an indispensable material for the proper organization and maintenance of those forces which it is the responsibility of the central government to keep in existence. Anything that is necessary incidentally to the exercise of federal jurisdiction can be done by federal authority; and if it is necessarily incidental to the proper equipping of our armed forces to have a certain proportion of the steel in short supply in Canada, then from my reading of the constitution and my reading of the decisions under the constitution we are, I believe, justified in maintaining that control.

We do not like to maintain any kind of control any longer than it appears to us to be absolutely indispensable. At the same time we come before parliament asking parliament to continue the legislation under which we can exercise this control over steel. We come to the Canadian parliament and say, "Authorize us to make an agreement with the producers of steel to increase their productive capacity so that this short supply situation which justifies the existence of the control may be done away with."

There have been charges about the centralizing tendencies of this government, but I would invite hon. members of any opposition to cite a single instance, since the end of the war, where the central authority has attempted to go beyond the limits prescribed by the constitution. It is all very well to make broad assertions, but the whole tendency of this government since the cessation of active fighting has been to withdraw from those fields where during the war it had to invade the ordinary jurisdiction of the provinces.

With respect to the control of domestic rental housing, in October last the federal government wrote to every provincial premier saying we felt that we would have to ask parliament to continue for a further period the legislative authority to exercise this control, but that if they chose to resume their jurisdiction, whether they maintained the controls or not, which was their own business, we would immediately withdraw.

What has been the situation with regard to that? I fear that if controls over domestic rentals were withdrawn at this time it would create a pretty chaotic situation in a great many large industrial centres of Canada. We have been building a lot of housing. Since the end of the war, I believe, 278,000 units have been erected. There were more erected last year than in any previous year in the history of Canada. But our economic prosperity, whether there be any inflationary elements in it or not, is increasing the demand for housing a lot faster than materials and manpower can provide the houses.

Although very large numbers are built each year, the net increase in family units in Canada keeps just a little bit ahead of the central mortgage and housing corporation and the others who are engaged in providing housing units. The result is that at the present time rental housing is still at a premium. Human nature being what it is, I fear that if there were no control, or if the control were immediately lifted, a great many Canadians would be exploited as a consequence of the shortage of housing. It is clearly something which is normally within provincial jurisdiction. But we put on the controls and I do not think we would be discharging our duty as humanitarian Canadians to the Canadian public if we took them off without those who normally have jurisdiction assuming the responsibility of either maintaining them or removing them in their respective localities.

What has been the result? The administration of controls is not a comfortable or easy thing. It does not bring in any revenue and it does not bring in very much glory. Those who have had to do with it have not had very much satisfaction in that respect. The premiers of the provinces realize what the situation is. They realize that we have caught hold of a lion's tail and we do not want to let go until somebody else grabs it. They say that they are not going to grab it.

Therefore it happens that we are going to have to ask parliament to extend for a further period our right, our privilege, of exercising this control over the rental of domestic housing.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, January 31, 1949

THE LATE NORMAN JAQUES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that in common with all the other members of this house you were shocked to learn this morning of the death of Mr. Norman Jaques, member for the electoral district of Wetaskiwin. We knew that some years ago Mr. Jaques had suffered from a serious coronary attack, but he seemed to have made a complete recovery. From his appearance in the house last week, one would have judged he was enjoying his usual good health. I understand he had a slight coronary disturbance on Thursday evening, but afterwards had been resting rather comfortably. But a further attack developed in the early hours of this morning, and it proved to be fatal.

Mr. Jaques was first elected to this house at the general election of 1935, and was re-elected at both general elections in 1940 and 1945. Those of us who were here during those years know that he was constant in his attendance in the house and took an active interest in its proceedings and in the proceedings of many of its important committees. On many matters he held strong views which most of us did not share, but no one could doubt his sincerity or his earnest desire to be of service to his fellow Canadians in the advocacy of those views. In his relations with other members of the house he was always most courteous. I am sure he will be remembered as an earnest, painstaking and courtly gentleman who served his constituents and his fellow citizens with zeal and devotion.

I wish to express to the members of the Social Credit group our deep sympathy. I am sure I shall also be expressing the wish of members in all parts of this house when I ask you, sir, to convey to Mrs. Jaques and to her two daughters, the assurance of our sincere condolence in their bereavement.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the words of sympathy uttered by the Prime Minister in regard to the untimely death of Mr. Jaques. I did not have the opportunity of knowing Mr. Jaques, but I join with the Prime Minister in extending deep sympathy to Mr. Jaques' family and to those who were so closely associated with him in this house. I concur in the suggestion that a message be conveyed to Mrs. Jaques and her daughters in the terms expressed by the Prime Minister.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May we join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in expressing our sympathy to Mrs. Jaques and her two daughters in their sudden bereavement. We often disagreed fundamentally, and sometimes violently, with the late member for Wetaskiwin. None the less we do know that the views he expressed in this house were held sincerely and arose from deep conviction, and for this we respected him, as we respect any member who speaks from sincerity and conviction. We therefore join in expressing to the Social Credit group, as well as to the widow and family, our sympathy in the sudden loss they have all sustained.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, there can be no more striking evidence of the integrity of the members of this house than the sincere and earnest tributes that are paid to an hon. member who has passed away, in spite of the fact that those expressing them may have held strongly divergent views. I wish to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and with the leaders of the other two parties in expressing our sincere regret at the passing of our friend and colleague, Mr. Jaques.

We were shocked to learn of his passing at an early hour this morning. Mr. Jaques arrived in the city last week to attend the present session of parliament, apparently in very good health. He was in this chamber on Thursday, and no one at that time had the remotest thought that that would be his last day in this house.

On Thursday evening, as the Prime Minister has already stated, Mr. Jaques suffered a slight coronary seizure, which at that time was not considered to be unduly serious. There seemed to be good reason to expect an early recovery, but a more serious and intense seizure, which occurred at two o'clock this morning, within a period of ten or fifteen minutes proved fatal.

Mr. Jaques was born in England. He came to Canada when he was twenty-one years old and took up farming in central Alberta, where he lived for the remainder of his life. He was always a reformer. For that reason, when Major C. H. Douglas of Scotland first issued his economic analysis Mr. Jaques was attracted to the new philosophy and at once became a keen student, not only of economics but of world affairs. He pioneered in the organization of the Social Credit movement of the world.

As has already been attested by those who have spoken, my colleague was a man of deep convictions. His determination was unshakable. These qualities, together with a high degree of personal courage, often drove him into vigorous debate as well as into strong denunciation of what he firmly believed to be social injustices or real threats to the peace and happiness of the people of the world. In spite of the fact that much personal criticism was directed to him, often amounting almost to character assassination, he stuck to his convictions, and to the very end continued in what he thought was his duty to humanity.

I found Mr. Jaques honest, sincere, humble, and ready to learn, in spite of his rock-like stubbornness when he thought he was right. There was in him in rare measure, I also found, a deep love for his fellow men and a respect for their individual rights. In my duties as leader of the Social Credit movement, I found Mr. Jaques loyal and always ready to carry the battle forward.

Almost six years ago in his home in Alberta he suffered a coronary occlusion which resulted in his being confined to bed for several months. He knew that his health was seriously impaired as a result of that seizure. But in spite of that knowledge, his conviction and his concern about the steady deterioration of world affairs drove him like a goad, with the result that he remained active all through these years. No doubt the strain of that activity contributed to his death.

We, his colleagues in the Social Credit movement, mourn his passing. We have lost in him a devoted advocate and a warm personal friend. Our deep sympathy goes out to Mrs. Jaques and her two daughters, in the loss of husband and father, and to all bereaved friends and relatives. I am sure Mrs. Jaques would want me to thank all those who have so generously tendered their condolences and expressions of sympathy. This I do.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): As a member of the party to which I have the honour to belong, and coming from the province in which Norman Jaques so long made his home, I am anxious to join in the tributes paid to him on the occasion of his sudden death. We who were best acquainted with him always knew that he was serious, even when in advocating a principle he stood alone. Then, more than ever, we admired his courage in that advocacy.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, two remarks that were made to me rather casually within the last hour or so I thought might express fairly well the general opinion of those who knew Mr. Jaques. One member of the opposition, although not a member of the Social Credit group, said to me "Too bad about Mr. Jaques. He was the very soul of integrity". A few minutes later one of the messengers who knew Mr. Jaques met me in one of the corridors and said, "I am sorry about Mr. Jaques; he was such a nice, quiet man."

Mr. Jaques was always a diligent, industrious worker and student. He wrote great numbers of letters; wherever there was a hint of an opening he sent one to a newspaper, a periodical or an individual. He read widely and voraciously. He spoke at a public meeting whenever an invitation came from anywhere on the American continent. He therefore became well informed and full of understanding. He was an able speaker and writer.

He was honest in the extreme.

He was a man of resolute courage. With his heart attack, which has already been referred to, I need not deal at all. For a good many years I have feared that we might lose Mr. Jaques as we now finally have lost him.

After his illness Mr. Jaques put himself under severe self-discipline in order to do the work he felt he should do in this house. He strove in every way he knew to recover his health; but he kept fighting on. Many a time I have sat by his side in this house while he spoke, holding his chair that he might support himself against its arm, and fearful that at any moment he might collapse in the chamber. In debate he was greatly handicapped. His voice did not carry well. His fine English, gentlemanly habits rendered it foreign to his impulses that he should engage in wordy battles. Despite those handicaps he persevered and drove home his message, frequently at the risk of his life.

He was loyal to his leader. Throughout the ten trying years during which I was charged with the responsibility of leading the Social Credit group in this house, Mr. Jaques stood steadily behind me. He often wrestled with me long and sternly over points of political strategy, or concerning certain forms of the practical application of the fundamental principles of social credit; but when the need was greatest, he was with me. Since the hon.

member for Peace River (Mr. Low) assumed the leadership, Mr. Jaques has been just as loyal to him.

Mr. Jaques was loyal to principle. He regarded the founder of social credit, Major C. H. Douglas, as a sort of inspired prophet heralding across the world the vital doctrines of a new gospel of freedom and security from want and fear; a prophet calling the peoples, particularly the Anglo-Saxon peoples, to repentance from their unpardonable sins of selfishness, ignorance and blindness: calling them to awaken, to realize how rich are the material gifts with which their God has endowed them; how greatly, through the Anglo-Saxons, all families of the earth could be temporally blessed, and how fearful will be the responsibility upon the Anglo-Saxons if they fail.

Mr. Jaques always gave me the impression that he looked upon himself as being called as a sort of apostle of the new economics of abundance and equitable distribution. If he did so, then he magnified that calling ably and well.

In the midst of the battle he has fallen. The torch he so bravely held aloft must still be borne forward. Never in human history has the need been more urgent for enlightenment concerning the principles of social credit for which he stood. Social credit's quarrel with the foe must be carried deeper and deeper into the ranks of the opposition. Mr. Jaques has gone to his rest. But others must carry on.

His wife and children will be able to endure their bereavement the better knowing that throughout his life the husband and father did his full share so well.

MINES AND RESOURCES

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT FOR 1947

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the annual report of the Department of Mines and Resources for the year 1947 was not received until after the close of the last session. I am therefore tabling it now.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

PREFERENCE TO COMPETITORS SPEAKING BOTH LANGUAGES

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Civil Service Act (examinations).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Arsenault: This bill provides an amendment to section 29 of the Civil Service Act by adding the following subsection:

(3) In preparing the list mentioned in subsections one and two of this section, the commission shall, for appointments to positions in the province of Quebec, give preference to the competitors who have, by the examination, been shown to be capable of speaking and writing correctly the French language and who have been shown at the same time to have a working knowledge of the English language, and shall for appointments to positions in the other provinces give preference to the competitors who have, by the examination, been shown to be capable of speaking and writing correctly the English language and who have been shown at the same time to have a working knowledge of the French language.

The reason for this amendment is to promote the learning of both official languages of our country, by Canadians of both English and French extraction, especially among those who seek positions in the civil service. Therefore this bill, if enacted into law, would be a contribution to better understanding between French and English speaking Canadians, and a means of promoting national unity.

Mr. Church: That is contrary to the British North America Act, is it not?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF "CANADA" FOR "DOMINION OF CANADA" ETC.

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend an act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Arsenault: This bill provides an amendment to subsection 1 of section 5 of the act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada, adopted at the last session of parliament. The change proposed consists in the addition thereto of the following words:

. . . and whenever in the said statutes or acts, or amendments thereto, the expression "Dominion of Canada" is used, there shall be substituted therefor the expression "Canada" and whenever the word "Dominion" is used, there shall be substituted therefor the word "Canada" or "Canadian" or "federal", respectively, or such other adequate word as the context requires.

The reason for this amendment is obvious. In view of the actual constitutional position, Canada, like the other countries of the commonwealth of nations, has ceased to be a dominion and is now a sovereign state. Therefore, since Canada has become an autonomous and sovereign state, the word "dominion" as applied to Canada has lost its original meaning.

Moreover, the use of the word "dominion" as applied to Canada gives a false impression as to the present constitutional position of our country, because it denies recognition of the autonomous status of Canada and implies the idea of subordination of Canada to another country.

Therefore the word "dominion" should be eliminated from our statutes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TARIFF BOARD

QUESTION AS TO APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Timmins (Parkdale): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Why is the tariff board not fully constituted at this time so that it may function as a board? When may we expect the necessary additional appointments to be made to the board so that it can function?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I had better answer the question, since the tariff board is under my jurisdiction. I hope it will be possible to reconstitute the full board in the near future. The matter is being given active consideration.

COMBINES

WESTERN CANADA BREAD BAKING INDUSTRY—GOLDENBERG REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Probe (Regina City): Will the Minister of Justice be kind enough to inform the house what steps have been taken by him to follow up the charges contained in the Goldenberg report on the bread baking industry of western Canada, that there appears to be a price-fixing combine in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): On its publication the report of the special commissioner appointed under the Combines Investigation Act was referred immediately by us to the attorneys general of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, to see if they would be prepared to, or wished to, exercise their provincial rights and prosecute. They indicated that inasmuch as several provinces were involved they would prefer to have the dominion government assume the responsibility for the prosecution. Therefore counsel was immediately appointed with instructions to review the report and the evidence and to advise me on the course of action he considered justified. I am now awaiting the advice of counsel.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Who is he?

Mr. Garson: Mr. C. S. Blanchard, K.C., of Alberta.

[Mr. Arsenault.]

PUBLIC SERVICE

PREVAILING RATES EMPLOYEES—SICK LEAVE, HOLIDAYS AND OVERTIME PAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): I should like to direct two questions to the Minister of Finance. Has any decision been reached with reference to the recent submission made on behalf of prevailing rates employees about sick leave, holidays and overtime pay? Will the government give the part-time and full-time House of Commons temporaries and prevailing rates employees and public works employees an increase in pay similar to that allowed the temporaries and permanent civil servants?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): In reply to the first question, the matter is still under consideration. As to the second question, of which I received notice just before coming into the house, I have not yet had time to verify this, but I believe the matter is under the jurisdiction of the internal economy commission. I shall look into the matter and make sure that that is so.

SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS

COST OF LIVING BONUS OR OTHER SUPPLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the reported promise made by the minister, in Victoria, to take up with his colleagues in the government the plight of superannuated civil servants, can the minister say what progress he has made in securing reconsideration of their request for a cost of living bonus or other supplement?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): I would refer the hon. member to page 42 of Hansard for the present session, where the Minister of Finance answered this question the other day. I am greatly concerned, as are all hon. members, about people whose fixed standard of income places them on a substandard level.

Mr. Knowles: Substandard is the right word, all right. May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance? Is the minister aware of the fact that some private corporations—and at least one provincial government, namely, Saskatchewan—are paying a cost of living bonus to their superannuated employees?

Mr. Abbott: I am not aware of the fact, Mr. Speaker. It may well be true.

Mr. Speaker: I do not see any urgency in the question. It is of the kind which should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles: It is extremely urgent to the people affected.

CRIMINAL CODE

COMMISSION TO CARRY OUT REVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Toward the end of the last session the then minister of justice said that a committee or commission would be set up for the purpose of revising the criminal code. Has that committee or commission been set up? Who are the members that have been appointed to it?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The answer is, Mr. Speaker, that the commission has been set up. The commissioners are Chief Justice Martin, of Saskatchewan; Mr. Justice Fauteux, of Quebec, and Mr. F. P. Varcoe, K.C., deputy minister of justice. The legal committee assisting the commissioners are Mr. J. J. Robinette, K.C., Toronto; Mr. Fernand Choquette, K.C., Quebec; Mr. H. J. Wilson, K.C., deputy attorney general for Alberta; Mr. Joseph Sedgwick, K.C., of Toronto; Mr. Robert Forsyth, K.C., one of the officials of the Department of Justice, and possibly a member to be appointed from the maritime provinces. In addition the commission will have available the services of Mr. Arthur G. Slaght, K.C. as consulting counsel.

EDUCATION

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL GRANTS IN AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. In view of the urgent need of financial assistance for education generally and teacher training in particular, is the government considering federal grants in aid to the provinces for education?

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): The hon. member probably knows as well as I do that, constitutionally, education comes under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. It is true that we have agreements with various provinces providing for assistance in vocational education. The government is not considering entering the field of teacher training or general education in any of the provinces. In the light of what we have heard so far this session I think my hon. friend will understand the implication of what I have just said.

FLAX

FLOOR PRICE FOR CROP YEARS 1949 AND 1950

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Does the government intend to maintain a floor price on flax for the crop years 1949 and 1950? If so, when will the policy be announced? Farmers are now making arrangements for the purchase of their seed requirements.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that hon. members be very careful to observe the rules of the house. They know perfectly well that a question of the kind which should not be asked on the orders of the day should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Coldwell: May I respectfully suggest that the farmers are now buying their flax for seeding purposes in the spring, or are making arrangements for it? There is urgency in the question.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I have no objection to answering the question. The matter of a floor price for flax is under consideration. But I may say that any farmer who is in doubt about purchasing seed for the next crop should bear in mind that flax is in surplus supply in every producing country of the world, and the prospects for flax today are not favourable.

FOX FARMING

REQUEST FOR ABOLITION OF SALES AND EXCISE TAX ON SILVER FOX FURS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Has the minister received from the Canadian National Silver Fox Breeders Association a submission asking for the abolition of the sales and excise tax on silver fox furs?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Yes, I have received such a submission.

FREIGHT RATES

REPRESENTATION OF ONTARIO BEFORE TRIBUNALS OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Was the province of Ontario represented in the freight rates inquiry last year, and is it represented in the present appeal?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): My recollection is that they were not last year, and that they are not this year.

Mr. Cruickshank: I did not think they would help British Columbia and the west.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR COMPLETION OF PROJECT IN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to ask a question of the minister of reconstruction. What steps are being taken to see to it that houses which are being constructed by the Bow River Construction Company of Calgary, under the authority of the National Housing Act, are completed immediately?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I shall have to take the hon. member's question as notice. In the first place, I did not hear the question, and in the second place, I shall answer when I see it.

Mr. Johnston: I should be only too pleased to repeat it.

Some hon. Members: Order.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

QUESTION AS TO INCREASED GRANTS FOR UNMARRIED STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodney Young (Vancouver Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has the minister under consideration any measure to effect an increase in the basic training grant to single student veterans in training under the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Some hon. Members: Put it on the order paper.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The house will recall that last spring an increase was authorized in the amount designed to assist student veterans to maintain their dependents. Since that time I have kept under study the whole matter of university training for single and married veterans, and as a result I do not propose to recommend an increase in the basic rate at this time.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

POSTAL SERVICE

AIR MAIL—REGULATIONS AS TO FIRST-CLASS MATTER—USE OF FRANK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General, in view of the fact that there is widespread confusion as to the practical application of regulations governing the air transport of first-class mail. Will the minister at an early day make some clarification of the existing regulations, and at the same time indicate the status of letters sent post-free to members of parliament, and letters dispatched by members of parliament bearing the House of Commons frank?

Hon. Ernest Bertrand (Postmaster General): I shall take the hon. member's question as notice, because it is a lengthy one. A full answer will be given within a few days.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, January 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned on Friday evening I had just made the assertion that while the federal government had expressed its willingness to ask for legislation allowing it to withdraw from the field of rental control in any province where the government and legislature chose to assume legislation in that respect, whether it proposed to continue controls or not, I think it is only fair that I should refer to the correspondence in that respect, and that after doing so I should table such correspondence so that it may be available in complete form to members of the House of Commons who might wish to refer to it.

On October 23 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) wrote to the premiers of the nine provinces. Eight of these letters were written in English, and one in French to the premier of Quebec. The letter in English to the eight provinces is as follows:

In a press statement yesterday with regard to rent control, I announced that the federal government intended to ask parliament for power to extend rental control for a further twelve months beyond March 31, 1949.

I went on to say—

Then the minister quotes the statement he had made the day before. His letter continues:

At the same time the federal government is prepared to vacate the field at any time after March 31, 1949, to any province which may decide to undertake rent control. Normally, rent control would come under provincial jurisdiction and is peculiarly suitable for provincial or local administration because of the immovable nature of real property. The federal government is anxious not to stand in the way of any province which believes that rent control can be better undertaken and administered locally.

The constitutionality of continuing federal rent control has already been questioned and is now before the courts. The federal government does not wish to do anything to prevent any province from making provisions to deal with the situation that would arise should continuing federal rent control be held invalid and is prepared not only to make available to any province the records, information and experience of the federal rental administration with all available staff, but also, subject to parliamentary approval, to pay the cost of any provincial rental administration for one year.

This announcement of policy is being made at this time so that any provincial government which wishes to do so will have sufficient time to prepare legislation for presentation to its legislature before March 31, 1949.

I am writing to you at this time to say that if your government should decide to introduce provincial legislation relating to rent control, the federal government will be prepared to vacate the field at any time after March 31, 1949, to put at your disposal the records, information and experience of the federal rent administration with all available staff and, if parliament approves, to pay the costs of your provincial rent administration for one year.

May I add that the rentals administrator of the wartime prices and trade board has been instructed to make himself available to you for consultation in connection with provincial legislation relating to rent control.

On November 6 the premier of British Columbia acknowledged receipt of that letter and wrote in the following terms:

This is to acknowledge receipt of your letter of October 23 with reference to rental control.

I may say that the province has not considered as yet the advisability of entering the rental control field.

I would like to take this opportunity of thanking you for advising me of the federal government's stand in this regard as well as for their co-operation should British Columbia decide to introduce rental control measures.

With kindest personal regards . . .

On January 13 the Minister of Finance wrote the premier of British Columbia a letter which I shall read and which I shall refer to as having been written in similar terms to the other premiers. This reads:

On November 6 last you acknowledged my letter of October 23 regarding the extension of rent control, and said that the province of British Columbia has not considered as yet the advisability of entering the rental control field.

The federal government is now making plans for the forthcoming session of parliament, during the early stages of which action must be taken to extend federal rent control if it is not to lapse after March 31, 1949. As soon as possible, therefore, I would like to know if your government has decided to request that federal rent control be discontinued in your province after that date.

May I repeat my assurances that the federal government is anxious not to stand in the way of any province which believes that rent control can be better undertaken and administered locally.

To that letter the premier of British Columbia replied on January 18 as follows:

I have for acknowledgment your letter of January 13 and note what you have to say regarding rent control.

First, I may state that it is not the intention of the province of British Columbia to enter this field, as it is felt that it is one which rightfully belongs to the federal government. I feel that perhaps your officials are better able to advise you as to the need for rent control, since they have been dealing with this matter for so long. Consequently it is not the intention of the government at this time either to introduce rent control legislation or to make any representations in regard to this project.

Yours faithfully,

Byron I. Johnson,
Premier.

A similar letter to that of the letter of October 23 was written to the premier of Alberta. He replied on November 3 that a further study would be given to it, but, no reply having been received, a letter similar to the one I have just read was dispatched to him on January 13. On January 18 he replied as follows:

Dear Mr. Abbott:

I have for reply your letter of January 13 in further reference to the offer of your government to the provinces to assume control of rentals.

Since my letter of November 3, this matter has been considered in detail and I now am in a position to notify you that the government of Alberta does not propose to enter into the control of rentals.

Yours very truly,

Ernest Manning,
Premier.

Similar letters were addressed to the premier of Saskatchewan. The first one was acknowledged by the premier's secretary in his absence, and the second one of January 13 has not yet been answered. Similar letters were addressed to the premier of Manitoba, but they have not yet been answered.

Similar letters were addressed to the premier of Nova Scotia, and so far they have remained unanswered.

The premier of Prince Edward Island acknowledged the first letter on October 29, and on January 17 he replied to the letter of January 13 in the following terms:

Dear Mr. Abbott:

Thank you for your letter of January 13 regarding continuance of rent controls.

The government of Prince Edward Island does not believe that rent control can be better undertaken and administered locally, and consequently will not request that federal rent control be discontinued in this province after that date.

Yours very truly,

J. Walter Jones,
Premier.

Premier McNair of New Brunswick acknowledged receipt of the first letter on November 1, stating he would advise in due course what decision was arrived at. He did so on January 11, which was before the date on which these other letters were dispatched to the other premiers. His letter was in the following form:

Dear Mr. Abbott:

With further reference to your letter of October 23 regarding rental control, I wish to advise that I have now had an opportunity to discuss the matter to some extent with my colleagues.

It was drawn to their attention that, as set out in your letter, the federal government intends to ask parliament for power to extend this control for a further period of twelve months from March 31 next.

It is our feeling that this extension may adequately meet the situation in this province. At any rate there is no present disposition on our part to enter this field. Should there be any change of attitude in this regard I shall advise you accordingly.

Yours sincerely,

John B. McNair.

The correspondence with the premier of Quebec was quite lengthy. It was carried on in French, and it will be tabled and made available for all those who care to see it in that language. There was an acknowledgment of the letter of October 23 on October 29, and then on November 3 Premier Duplessis wrote to the Minister of Finance as follows:

Mr. Minister:

Pursuant to the reply which I sent you on October 29, I communicated today to my colleagues, at a meeting of the executive council of the province, your letter of October 23 regarding rent control. It would seem necessary for us to obtain more precise details and explanations.

The federal government, you say, proposes "asking parliament for power to continue the rental control for a further period of twelve months after March 31, 1949."

Evidently, the definite terms of this legislation will not be known until after it has been adopted by parliament and sanctioned by His Excellency the Governor General, but do you not think it would be reasonable under the circumstances that we should know the federal government's plans in this connection? Incontestably it is impossible to make a decision on legislation when we do not even know the previous legislative plans.

You declare in your letter that "the constitutionality of continuing federal rent control has already been questioned and is now before the courts." Tradition and a recognized practice make it impossible to discuss cases which are before the courts, and it would not be suitable or advisable at the present time to express our opinion in the matter of the constitutionality of federal rent control. However, it is evident that the final verdict of the courts on this matter could change completely the present picture.

You write that "the federal government is prepared to vacate this field at any time after March 31, 1949, for any province which may decide to undertake rent control," and you add subsequently:

"I am writing now to inform you that if your government decides to introduce provincial legislative measures, the federal government will be ready to vacate this field any time after March 31, 1949."

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Does this mean that after March 31, 1949, you will definitely recognize the right and power of the province to establish, or not establish, as the provincial authorities judge best, a provincial control on rentals? In other words, after March 31, 1949, will the federal government give the province exclusive power in these matters?

It is always a pleasure for us to co-operate with the federal authorities for the well-being and prosperity of the people, in conformity with the Canadian constitution.

Kind regards.

M. Duplessis.

The Minister of Finance sent him quite a full and reassuring letter reading as follows:

I wish to thank you for your letter of November 3, and particularly for your offer of co-operation. You suggest that it would be helpful for you to know the federal government's plan for extension of rental control beyond March 31, 1949. The present intention is to ask parliament to extend the existing powers for another year, although you will understand, I am sure, that before the legislation is introduced it may be necessary to make changes which cannot be foreseen at this time. I should perhaps explain that under existing powers the government is authorized to make regulations from time to time as to the level of maximum rentals, eviction control, and so forth.

As I said in my announcement and in my letter to you, the government does intend, however, to ask parliament for authority to withdraw rental control in any province which decides to introduce its own legislation in this field.

In your letter you ask: "Does this mean that after March 31, 1949, you will definitely recognize the right and power of the province to establish, or not establish, as provincial authorities judge best, a provincial control on rentals? In other words, after March 31, 1949, will the federal government give the province exclusive power in these matters?"

The government's policy, as announced, is that if after March 31, 1949, under the proposed extension of rent control, any provincial government formally requests that federal rental control be withdrawn in that province, the federal government will announce that it has received such a request and proceed to withdraw its controls at a date to be fixed by the provincial government in the light of the legislative plans of the province. The responsibility for rental control in that province will then rest with the provincial government and legislature.

A letter, substantially along the lines of the one I read, was dispatched on January 13 to the other premiers, because there had been no response to this one. I will not attempt to summarize the answer of Mr. Duplessis of the 21st January but will proceed to give hon. members its text.

Your letter of January 13 was communicated to me today. The attitude of the present government of Quebec towards federal control of rentals is well known. If you will re-read my letter to you of November 3 last and your reply of November 12 last, you will find that the necessary explanation and particulars were not supplied.

As the federal government intends laying before the Ottawa parliament a new bill on the subject, I would ask you kindly to send me a copy of this new federal bill. You will undoubtedly admit that this problem involves a state of affairs, a situation and facts which must necessarily be taken into account.

Up to the present time we have not construed that as an offer to take over responsibility for rent control in the province of Quebec.

A similar letter was dispatched to the premier of Ontario, the hon. gentleman who succeeded my hon. friend not very long ago. Even before I saw this correspondence, I expected that the answer would be clear-cut in view of the clear, direct and businesslike statement the leader of the opposition and I had the pleasure of listening to from the premier of Ontario on Wednesday last. The letter from the premier of Ontario reads:

> The government of the province of Ontario feels that rental control should be carried on by your government at present, and when the year 1950 comes we can decide if we have to do anything further.

That letter was marked "confidential". On the 13th of January the Minister of Finance wrote as follows:

> On October 23 you acknowledged my letter of October 23 relating to the continuance of rent control, and on December 2 informed me that your government feels that rental control should be carried on by the federal government at present. When parliament assembles at the end of this month it may be necessary to table the correspondence with the provinces in connection with rent control, and I assume there will be no objection on your part to tabling your letter to me of December 2, even though it is marked "confidential."

Mr. Kennedy answered on the 19th of January:

> Further to your letter of January 13 relating to the continuation of rental control, it will be quite in order to table my letter of December 2.

I do not think anyone can have any doubt about the position and desires of the present government of Ontario in respect of this terrible invasion we have been practising on the jurisdiction of the provinces.

I might mention, in passing, another example of the apparent reluctance of provincial administrations to tackle problems that appear to be a bit embarrassing to some, the fact that there has not been much done about oleomargarine since the supreme court rendered its judgment saying that was a matter of provincial jurisdiction. These are two concrete cases. It is all very well to make broad statements about the centralizing tendencies of the federal government, but I said on Friday, and I repeat, that I invite any hon. member to point to a single case where there has been an invasion of provincial jurisdiction since the cessation of hostilities. Since that time we have been using our best endeavours to withdraw from those fields we had to enter for the security of the state during the period of the war.

The correspondence about rent control is merely one concrete example of what we have attempted to do. Hon. members will have noticed that in the correspondence we even go so far as to say that, if the provinces wish to take on the administration of rent control, subject to the approval of parliament we will pay their expenses for doing so during the whole year. Therefore the only reason we are continuing is their recognition that it is not yet time to put an end to this measure which became necessary during the war, and that it will serve the national interest better to have the administration continue as it has proceeded in the past.

Some might say that our so-called austerity program of the month of November, 1947, impinged upon the ordinary rights of Canadians to trade. Of course it did, but it did not impinge upon provincial jurisdiction. That is a matter of external trade; that is a matter of the balance of external payments, which is at all times within the exclusive jurisdiction of this parliament and of this government.

In his address the leader of the opposition, dealing with the paragraph of the speech from the throne which announced the setting up of a royal commission to examine into certain activities of our national life which have to do with the other side of life than the strictly material one, indicated that he thought there might be some suggestion of impinging on provincial jurisdiction. The leader of the opposition referred to some of the language of this paragraph, saying that there were no restrictions, that it covered very broad fields. If the hon. member had read the paragraph carefully, he would see that all the subsequent language is governed by the first part.

> It is the view of my ministers that there should be an examination of the activities of agencies of the federal government relating to—

It is proposed to have an examination made of the activities of agencies of the federal government relating to radio, films, television, and so forth. It is restricted to the activities of federal agencies—activities which are of concern to the Canadian nation. The reason for wishing to have a study of that kind made is one which, I think, should appeal to almost every Canadian.

We have here the finest country in the world. There is no country in the world which has a better population than the Canadian population. We are not sufficiently conscious, ourselves, of the great privilege of being citizens of this Canadian nation and having as our land this great territory of Canada. In the economic, materialistic field, we have been doing fairly well; but man liveth not by bread alone. There is another side to human life that is quite as important as the dollars and cents resulting from trade. Upon that side of the normal activities of civilized, Christian human beings, sufficient attention has not been focused nationwide. I think it will be an advantage to have an examination made of all the agencies which are spending some of the money of the Canadian public in these efforts, to determine whether they are doing it in the right way and whether enough of it is being done.

In this land of ours we have a standard of living higher than anywhere else in the world, save perhaps in the United States. We have not only a high standard of living, but we have all these other advantages. I shall never forget a speech to which I listened in Quebec on a late summer afternoon in 1929, delivered at a meeting of the Canadian Bar Association by Sir Robert Borden. I cannot hope to bring into this chamber the booming tones that sounded through the hall of the Chateau Frontenac when that speech was delivered, but I would call it to the attention of hon. members. They will find it in the proceedings of the Canadian Bar Association, 1929, volume 14, at page 177.

At the risk of not being able to reproduce the tense interest that prevailed, I shall read two or three paragraphs.

> It is unfortunate that in other provinces there is not a fuller and more general acquaintance with the early history of Quebec which is significant, not only in its importance to our country, but in its dramatic interest.
> Recall the year 1635. The first governor of Quebec lies on his deathbed in this city which he had founded twenty-seven years before. During his long and arduous career Champlain had seen his little colony almost annihilated by the winter of 1609, and possessed by the English from 1629 to 1632. Perhaps in the closing hours he thinks of his effort and of his career as a failure and little realizes the strength of the foundation which he has laid or the stately structure that is to arise thereon. For the design and achievement of Champlain had unexpected significance. The foundation of Quebec led to the occupation of the St. Lawrence valley which with Acadia would otherwise have been colonized from New England and New York and swept into revolution or separation. Champlain began to hold it for the Canada of today. In this sense Canadians owe to him their heritage although, in the infinite complexity of future forces and tendencies, then altogether undiscernible, his paramount purpose of creating for France a western empire was wholly overborne in the final event.
> Across the ocean in the same year, 1635, a great Englishman speaks to his fellow parishioners in the church of Kimble Magna near Oxford. He bids them consider whether they shall obey the King's decree for the payment of "ship money." A facsimile of the record of that meeting hangs on a pillar in the parish church. It records unanimous denial of the King's right and refusal to obey the King's decree; even the officials, the constables and assessors, join in the refusal inspired by John Hampden's courage and patriotism. The question then raised was finally settled when the supremacy of the people through their representatives in parliament was for ever affirmed. Upon that determination rest our liberties. Shall not Canadians look back with thankful memory to John Hampden, pioneer of our freedom, and with grateful recognition to Samuel Champlain, pioneer and founder of our heritage?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Our history is probably not sufficiently well-known to all of us in this great country of ours. We must not only be concerned with the past, great as that story might be, in creating and developing national unity. The Gazette is not always of the opinion that the future can mean so much. I was rather amused to notice that in its editorial of the 14th of January, the Gazette had this to say—

Mr. Coldwell: The Montreal Gazette?

Mr. St. Laurent: The Montreal Gazette.

> In offering French Canadians, as other Canadians, a progressive conservatism, the party under Mr. George Drew is not offering something new.

I suppose the Gazette ought to know, but we on this side of the house feel that, as time goes on, it is necessary to offer something new and progressive to the people of Canada. We think the time has come when it is advisable to ask the people of Canada to look around and see for themselves what their privileges are; to conceive in their own hearts and minds a greater pride in the privileges which are accorded to them as citizens of this country.

Radio is the first matter mentioned about which there is to be this examination of the activities of the federal government. Canadian radio has proven to be a valuable agency for the furthering and developing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Graydon: It has been in the past.

Mr. St. Laurent: If these gentlemen still wish to think of the past, that is all right; but I want to talk a little bit about the present and the future. Canadian radio has been an important instrument in furthering among us knowledge of our own advantages.

Mr. Graydon: Oh, oh.

Mr. St. Laurent: Does the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) feel that it is so ridiculous to find that we have advantages in living in this country of Canada? I am sure there are people in his own constituency who do not consider that it is ridiculous.

Mr. Graydon: There are other advantages.

Mr. Fraser: Advantages to the Liberal party.

Mr. St. Laurent: A week ago Saturday I had the privilege of seeing two or three of the films—I am getting a little bit ahead of myself, I find. I always do that when I enter into a discussion with the hon. member for Peel.

It may be that radio has not done enough. It may be that the way in which radio is organized is not the best possible way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: To those who say "hear, hear", may I point out that publicly-owned radio system was organized and carried on under a bill which was presented in this house by a government led by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. In a moment I shall have occasion to refer to some of the language he used when he introduced that last bill. But because it comes from the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett it does not mean that it is perfect; not by any means. It is susceptible of being improved. I think it is advisable at this time to have the situation looked into, and to get expert opinion and advice as to whether or not it should be improved and how it should be done.

Complaints have been made about the fact that those administering the publicly-owned system have at the same time control over those who are operating privately-owned systems. That may or may not be a valid criticism. We do not have the directors of the Canadian National Railways performing the functions of the board of transport commissioners, nor do we have the directors of Trans-Canada Air Lines performing the functions of the air transport board. It may be that the governors of the C.B.C. should not, at the same time, be the ones to operate the publicly-owned system and to make regulations for the others.

An hon. Member: You are right.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is a matter which can be given serious consideration.

Mr. Coldwell: There is a difference. The air is a public utility.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes; there is that difference. Here there are monopolistic features resulting from the allocation to the various broadcasting stations of frequencies or wave lengths which, once they have been allocated, cannot be used by anybody else.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right.

Mr. St. Laurent: But there is ground for serious examination of the contention that there should be two authorities, one to carry out the actual broadcasting work of the publicly-owned system and another to regulate all broadcasting. I have no set views of my own upon the subject, but I think it is a matter that is worthy of being considered.

Then we have our national film board. A week ago Saturday I saw one short film with which I was greatly impressed. There are more ways than one in which to enlighten and influence public opinion in a country. I saw a film which had to do with the enterprises of the Koerner sawmills firm in British Columbia. These are gentlemen who were engaged in the lumber industry in Czechoslovakia and Poland before Hitler conquered Czechoslovakia. In March, 1939, they acquired a lumber mill in New Westminster. Leon J. Koerner brought out to Canada his brothers and five employees who had experience in European methods of handling lumber. In July, 1939, he had forty-five men on his payroll. At the present time there are over three thousand on the payroll of that firm. The firm handles chiefly hemlock which, prior to their advent, was regarded as an inferior species of lumber. Through methods brought with them and introduced here, what is known as Alaska pine has become one of the species of lumber widely used in the trade all over the world.

When I was out in British Columbia some months ago I visited their mill and, by seeing it, was made to realize how great a contribution these new immigrants had made to the economy of British Columbia and to the Canadian nation. Although I had seen the yard and the magnificent arrangements made for taking care of the comfort and well-being of their employees, I had not seen it as I saw it at the national film board in ten minutes. The picture shows the start from the stumps of these huge hemlock trees in the forest, and follows the process as they were brought down to the mill and treated. There are in Canada people who have from time to time expressed divergent views as to the propriety or impropriety of bringing in immigrants. If we had a few more of these films, which would allow our people to see what some of these immigrants bring with them, and the contribution they make to the development of our natural resources, I think the film board would be performing for the Canadian nation a most valuable service.

In his interesting speech on Friday night the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), as reported at page 48 of Hansard, said that private interests were being arbitrarily prevented from providing television in this country without any cost to the public exchequer. Television is a matter which must necessarily develop into a monopolistic enterprise. The frequencies which can be used for broadcasting these pictures are not numerous, and those allocated to Canada are restricted in number. The installation of facilities for broadcasting pictures is extremely costly; and if private interests venture the capital required to broadcast in certain localities they will require to have these frequencies allocated to them and their investment will have created for them a vested interest therein. Is that situation desirable for this Canadian nation?

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. St. Laurent: When the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett introduced his bill on radio broadcasting, as reported at page 3035 of Hansard of 1932, he said this:

> First of all, this country must be assured of complete Canadian control of broadcasting from Canadian sources, free from foreign interference or influence. Without such control radio broadcasting can never become a great agency for the communication of matters of national concern and for the diffusion of national thought and ideals, and without such control it can never be the agency by which national consciousness may be fostered and sustained and national unity still further strengthened. Other and alternative systems may meet the requirements of other countries, and in any case it is not my purpose to comment unfavourably upon those systems, but it seems to me clear that in Canada the system we can most profitably employ is one which, in operation and control, responds most directly to the popular will and the national need.

What was true with respect to radio seems to me, with the slight knowledge I have of the subject, to be equally applicable to television, and it would be a mistake for us to embark upon any plan which would take from the public these frequencies which are allocated to Canada for the public.

It may be that the installation of television is costly; it may be that its range is not very wide, that it will be difficult to provide it for the outlying districts of Canada. But I do not think that these frequencies, allocated to the Canadian public, should be lightly turned over to private ownership and exploitation unless we come to the conclusion that there is no better way in which the Canadian public can be provided with this new form of entertainment and education.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said, but you are asking this commission to do so much that it is going to take a long time, and there may be in this house men young enough to see the results of its investigation and to hear its recommendations. I do not think it is going to take so long. We are setting up this commission and we intend it to be a commission of achievement, and not a mere Hope commission. In the meantime it does not mean that nothing can be done in these fields that are to be examined. I can assure the leader of the opposition that at the present time active consideration is being given by the government to a proposal to set up television immediately in some places, under such conditions as will not determine what the permanent and long-range policy will necessarily have to be.

Mr. Drew: Is the Prime Minister referring now to the United States broadcasts that can be received by Canadians who are close enough to receive them?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I am not referring now to the United States broadcasts that can be received by Canadians who are close enough to receive them. I know that that is so, and I know from my own experience that there are United States broadcasts which are received. However, that does not prevent the operation of a publicly-owned broadcasting system in Canada. I do not think we shall ever have to come to the point where we shall have a curtain through which information from outside cannot penetrate. I do not think that is a situation that is desired by any of us here. Many of us welcome the waves that come from the United States radio broadcasters, but at times we prefer to listen to what is being broadcast from our own publicly-owned system. The same should be true of television.

This paragraph in the speech from the throne also proposes to have examined the activities of the federal government in the encouragement of arts and sciences. I think that is something with which most of the Canadian public are in sympathy. But how far should it go? There are certain forms of encouragement, certain forms of art, and certain scientific developments, which are of interest to the whole nation and which are of national importance. There are others which are not of national importance. It is worth while to have that matter examined, and the recommendations made which will be of guidance to us over the next few years, and which my hon. friend, if he ever comes over on this side, may find of value in dealing with the applications for encouragement which he will be receiving, as we have received them from time to time.

The next matter dealt with is research. Research cannot be a matter of local and private concern within the provinces. How many times have we had interesting debates in this house upon cancer research. Cancer research cannot even be provincial; it cannot even be national; it is world-wide, and the encouragement of research of that kind is something that is of interest to every nation. Who would deny that our own agricultural economy has profited immensely from the research conducted under the establishments within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner)? Who will deny that our national research council has provided means of separating, or of extracting, metals from base ores that have made of immense value some of the resources of our country, and which for a great many years, and before these processes were devised, were making no contribution to our economy?

Mr. Green: Will the Prime Minister permit a question? Do these activities include the activities of the atomic energy control board?

Mr. St. Laurent: The terms of reference have not yet been drafted. I would imagine that the activities of the atomic energy control board are such that it would not be possible, for security reasons, to make them the object of an investigation of a royal commission which normally operates in public.

The paragraph goes on to speak of the activities which enrich the national life. Every session parliament is called upon to vote a certain number of grants for a certain number of enterprises, and the requests continue to be made. I read with some amusement a short while ago that an application would be made for a very substantial grant to encourage athletics in Canada. We already have expended some public money for the encouragement of athletics. The Royal Canadian Air Force hockey team attended the last Olympic games, and by their performance abroad did increase the knowledge of Canada and of Canadians. Two or three times this House of Commons unanimously applauded the great success which had crowned the efforts of Barbara Ann Scott at the Olympic games. Requests are coming in now for a contribution to enable a team of Canadian athletes to attend the British commonwealth games which are to be held in New Zealand next year. Are these activities of national interest, and should they be fostered? That is a matter about which there may be some divergence of views; but there is no doubt that these achievements of Canadians, in whatever field they be, those of Barbara Ann Scott, those of the Royal Canadian Air Force hockey team, those of the Winnipeg ballet, the "Tin Flute" of Gabrielle Roy, which is to be made into a motion picture, or the hundredth performance of Fridolin's "Tit Coq" in Montreal on Saturday night, all enhance our consciousness of our own place, not only on the material side of life, but in the other things which contribute so much and which are so necessary for a proper, human, civilized method of living.

Then we shall have examined also the manner in which information about Canada is spread abroad. Of course no one will gainsay that the method which spread the most information about Canada, and which placed Canada on the highest possible pinnacle, is to be found in the services of our armed forces during the last two world wars. There is, I am sure, nothing that has contributed so much to making the rest of the world conscious of the rise of this new nation in the north as the performance of our armed services during those wars. But I hope there will never be any other occasion when that form of making Canadians known abroad will have to be resorted to.

Another large contribution to the high level of Canada abroad is what has been done by our Department of External Affairs, and by the character and performance of our delegates to these international meetings.

But there are other forms as well. Hon. members applauded the interesting passage about tourist activities, in the speech delivered by the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) in moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The film made here on the opening day of parliament in this very year will be shown in hundreds, perhaps thousands, of theatres across Canada, and in tens of thousands of theatres throughout the United States. And although I have not seen it, and while I participated in the opening ceremonies, I would be surprised if the pictures of those ceremonies did not compare favourably with pictures of like ceremonies in any other country of the world.

I was astounded to find the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) apparently attempting to ridicule the proposal to have a royal commission examine these activities and report to the Canadian government, and through the Canadian government to the Canadian parliament and people, upon ways and means of fostering these undertakings. If the hon. member had been here in previous years, he would have heard many interesting speeches upon the desirability of there being a national library for Canada. He would have heard interesting speeches upon the desirability of giving some encouragement to drama leagues and to the establishment of a national theatre in Canada. I believe he will find that throughout Canada, in all parts of the country, there are many people who are interested in that aspect of human life.

I now come to that part of the speech of the hon. member—

Mr. Graydon: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. St. Laurent: Certainly.

Mr. Graydon: I am sure a number of hon. members in various sections of the house would like to know whether or not the setting up of this royal commission will prevent parliamentary committees dealing with the question of radios, films and television during this session of the House of Commons.

Mr. St. Laurent: I would think not. I would think there might very well be a desire, on the part of hon. members to whom proposals were made to make a decision about this or that, to get the information that is going to be made available to them through the royal commission. But I do not think there would be any technical objection to debating any of these matters, or even to proposing any measure which any hon. member might think it proper to propose, provided of course it was within the rules of the house, and otherwise, in a form which would make it acceptable.

Mr. Graydon: That was not my question. Does the right hon. gentleman know whether, for instance,—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

An hon. Member: Who is leading over there?

Mr. Graydon: —whether or not the broadcasting corporation special committee of the house would be set up this session? Because otherwise there would be concurrent investigations on the same matter.

Mr. St. Laurent: With respect to that committee, I have a note here that there was an attempt to set it up, but that the minister in charge found there was no one who wanted it.

Mr. Graydon: This session?

Mr. St. Laurent: And it was partly because of that that we felt it would be well to have the matter inquired into by a commission.

Mr. Fulton: You are speaking of the past?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, I am speaking of the past—but of the very recent past. It was an answer given by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), the minister who speaks in parliament for the broadcasting corporation; and it was to the effect that there had been no desire to have the committee meet. I have a reference to it somewhere among my notes. However, at the moment I will not stop to look it up, but I will get it for the hon. member and complete my answer at a later time.

Proceeding with the notes I have here, I come to that part of his speech where the leader of the opposition was a bit critical of what he called that strange theory of public financing whereby there is part of the national income that is used to pay off debts incurred by this country during a period of war. These are his words as they appear at page 45 of Hansard:

> I hope the consideration now being given by ministers to buoyant revenues will lead them to another conclusion, in spite of the repeated arguments made publicly by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that under some theory of cyclical budgeting he should tax the people as heavily as possible while we have buoyant finances. I express the hope that we shall have from him some indication that he has abandoned that strange theory of public financing . . .

Well, I do not know whether it should be called cyclical budgeting, or anything else. But I think it has been the experience everywhere that, when the situation was such that you had money that you did not have to spend, it was a good and prudent thing to use it to pay off your debts—if you had any. I once heard the Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley, who was then minister of finance, refer to this form of budgeting as being one which had pretty strong Biblical justification because, as he pointed out, that was the system upon which Joseph, when he was Pharaoh's minister of finance, budgeted for the lean years which were to follow—the bad ones.

Mr. Low: Not with money, though.

Mr. St. Laurent: With goods.

Mr. Low: With goods, yes.

Mr. St. Laurent: Before anyone makes light of the concept of the insignificance of money in human affairs, let me say that we on this side of the house consider that money is a symbol, but a symbol of something that is real. And when at the end of the war there was a total unmatured funded debt of $16,887 million those symbols meant a very considerable burden for the Canadian people to carry in interest and amortization charges.

Mr. Low: Not necessarily.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have here the latest figures available, those of December 31, 1948, which show that the unmatured funded debt on that date was $15,926 million, a drop of something over $950 million since December 31, 1945; and that the United States currency and gold reserves have increased from a low of $461 million to a figure of $998 million on December 31, 1948. I believe most of us in the Canadian nation are happy that there has been this improvement in the nation's financial position of something of the order of a billion and a half dollars in that three-year period.

There is no doubt that the whole Canadian economy is very buoyant at the present time and I think there are many who feel that it is prudent during this period of buoyancy to make provision as Joseph did for the time when there may not be the same buoyancy. Some of us do not forget the fable of de La Fontaine in these words:

> La cigale, ayant chanté tout l'été,
> Se trouva fort dépourvue
> Quand la bise fut venue.

I have a translation of that here as follows:

> A grasshopper gay
> Sang the summer away,
> And found herself poor
> With the winter's first roar.

I think the conduct of the ant might be preferable in some ways. There should not be too great a disregard of what prudence has shown to be wise throughout the centuries of experience. Most of the newspapers favourable to my hon. friend have interpreted a paragraph in the speech from the throne as forecasting some reduction in taxation. They are entitled to whatever enjoyment they can get out of that interpretation, but of course they are going to have to keep on guessing until the budget is brought down, when they will see just what the situation will be. I can assure them that the budget is not going to be delayed. Just as soon as we can get through with the matters which at this session have to be dealt with by a given date, the budget will be ready for submission.

Mr. Drew: Does that mean that the budget will be presented before the conclusion of the debate on the speech from the throne?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think what I said is open to any construction of that kind. If it was, I apologize to the house for having spoken in such an inane fashion, because I had no intention of conveying that idea.

Mr. Cruickshank: You are not in the minor league now.

Mr. St. Laurent: There was another statement by the leader of the opposition which I am sure occasioned some surprise. He made the assertion that there was nothing to be found in the speech from the throne about a health program or about social security. The announcement was made in the speech from the throne that, with respect to the health program announced last year, there has been most helpful co-operation from all the provinces. The health program announced last year was a five-year program. The results there show that, when we have meetings with the provinces that are not full-dress performances of the premiers, their ministers and associates, we do get effective co-operation and collaboration to the benefit of the general Canadian public. The hon. member will find in the announcement made by my predecessor, who was then Prime Minister, that this health program was intended to cover a period of five years. Of course, should the country be so unfortunate as not to have us here after five years, I do not know what would happen. But we have announced what we would do.

Mr. Cruickshank: Do not worry about that.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the hon. member is probably right and that the public is entitled to expect that it is going to be carried out. The leader of the opposition said that there was no mention of social security, but the speech from the throne contains a paragraph which states:

> A bill will be introduced to broaden the scope of the Family Allowances Act, as a further instalment of the policy of the government to provide a national standard of social security and human welfare designed to assure the greatest possible measure of social justice for all Canadians.

Perhaps my hon. friend does not consider that the family allowances project, that act and its administration, is a social security measure. When it was introduced the hon. member was reported in the Globe and Mail of August 3, 1944, to have said:

> This bill is an outrageous bribe offered to the people of Quebec immediately before an election on which Mr. King's last chance of political survival depends.

In another speech over the radio on August 9, 1944, from a written text the hon. member said:

> But I assure you that the government of Ontario intends to do everything within its power to make sure that this iniquitous bill does not go into effect.

It did go into effect and everything within the power of the government of Ontario was unable to prevent it. Everything within the power of anybody else was unable to prevent the Canadian public receiving the benefits of this great measure. So much so that, when my hon. friend's partisans gathered here in Ottawa on September 30 and October 1 and 2 to exalt him to the position which he so graciously occupies at the present time, they declared unanimously by a resolution that family allowances will be placed on a uniform basis per child regardless of the number of children in the family.

Whether the hon. gentleman regards that as a measure of social security, all those who chose him to be their leader and for whom he speaks here put that resolution under the heading, "Resolution No. 13—Social Security". I hope this is really a change of heart and not merely a change of face on the part of the hon. gentleman.

I think I have disposed of a lot of the odds and ends which had been dealt with by my hon. friend.

I come now to that part of his speech which, since he pronounced it, some newspapers have said was an attempt to set the platform for the next general election. I have the newspaper clipping here. I do not mean to be disrespectful, but I am going to use the words that are used in the headline:

> Drew sets platform for election Provincial rights to be chief issue in coming battle
> By devoting two hours of his two and a quarter hour speech on Friday to provincial rights, Progressive Conservative leader, George Drew, left little doubt that this is the issue on which his party will make its election bid. With an eye cocked at Quebec, Drew painted a picture of a federal octopus whose tentacles sought to tug away the powers of the provinces and tear apart the constitution.

I hope the hon. member does not think for a moment that he is the only one who has an eye cocked on Quebec. There are others as well, but those on this side of the house have an eye cocked on the whole country from one ocean to the other. They feel that, if it be true that the hon. gentleman has an eye cocked on Quebec, it is pretty apt to be true there are many in Quebec who have an eye cocked on him. Though my experience has not been very long, it has been long enough to enable me to say to the hon. gentleman that Quebec usually likes to have its facts pretty straight.

That compels me to deal with a matter which the hon. gentleman dealt with in that part of his speech which is reported at page 56 of Hansard. The hon. gentleman had this to say:

> The present Prime Minister of Canada asserted the proposition that this parliament has the power, by majority decision, to change our constitution. His own words were: "The central power does not need to go back to the provinces in order to say what Canada shall be in the future."

The words attributed to me by the hon. leader of the opposition are correctly taken from a speech I made in this house in 1946 on the redistribution bill. They are to be found at page 2618 of Hansard of that year. If the hon. gentleman found these words himself in that debate it must be that he read the debate. If he did, there are many people in Quebec who are going to feel that using them as he did on Friday night amounts to very substantial distortion. If he did not find them himself where they occurred in the debate, but took them from an aide who picked them out for him, there are many in Quebec who are going to feel that before using material from such an aide he should be sure that it does not constitute a very substantial distortion.

Mr. Drew: I took the Prime Minister to say the words were correct.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not saying the words were not correct. I say that if the hon. gentleman picked them out himself, having read the whole debate, the fact of picking them out and using them as he did amounts to a very substantial distortion. I do not think he or any other member of this house would want to be guilty of such a thing intentionally. If, on the other hand, they were supplied to him with the assurance that they were correct in their context, the one who supplied them to him, having picked them out of their context to be used in the way in which they were used here, should not be trusted to get for my hon. friend facts that he may wish to use in his campaign in Quebec.

There had been a debate in this house on the Canadian constitution, and on the methods that might be taken to amend it. I did not make that constitution. I take it as it is. I was asked questions as to my opinion about its meaning, and I said what I believed to be the effect of the constitution as it is. Whenever I am compelled to give an answer as to what I believe the constitution to be, the answer I give will be a truthful answer, no matter who may wish to misquote it or to misrepresent it. What I said in that debate is quite clear. I said that there were certain matters which had been confided to the parliament of Canada, and certain others which had been confided to the provincial legislatures. I said, with respect to the first, that it was not necessary to go back to the members of the legislatures or to the governments of the provinces to determine what could be done about them, but that the people of the provinces spoke on these matters through the representatives they elected to this parliament. I added that, with respect to the matters which were confided by the constitution to the provincial legislatures, it would be quite impossible for this parliament to do anything about them without the consent of those having the responsibility. Although those words of mine were not used at the same sitting of the house, they are to be found a few pages prior to the citation which was used by the leader of the opposition. That citation was taken from page 2618 of Hansard of 1946.

At page 2609 of Hansard of 1946 the late lamented Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Bridges, participating in the debate, cited, in the following words, the stand I had taken:

> That brings us to the question as to whether or not the provinces should be consulted before we pass this particular resolution. That question has come up before and no doubt will come up again as long as the present system of amendment exists. I am going to repeat what our able Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent)—

—I am not responsible for the compliment.

> —said on May 28, when moving the resolution, since it is a statement with which I am in complete accord.

He quoted the following statement:

> The provinces, that is to say, the people of the provinces, are all represented in this parliament, and for the purposes of such matters as are confined to the jurisdiction of this parliament it is by those representatives here that the people of the provinces speak. There are other matters given by the act to the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures and the provincial governments; with respect to any of those it is my view that it would not be possible to deal with them without consent of those to whose jurisdiction they have been confided.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Prime Minister, was it not in the same speech that you dealt with the subject of language and the right of this parliament to deprive any group in this country of a particular language, if it was felt that should be done?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not sorry the hon. gentleman brought that up because I had a note to refer to it. It is a matter upon which many, many of the hon. member's own friends have been guilty of the most serious distortion, both in his province and in my own.

My whole point was that the central government did not derive its existence nor get its powers from those who had made the agreement which preceded confederation, and did not have to consult those who had made the agreement about the way in which the federal authority should exercise that part of the jurisdiction which had been confined to it. We are not responsible to the provincial governments for the way in which we exercise the powers given to the federal parliament by the constitution. We are responsible directly to the people of the provinces who elect us to represent them in this house.

Now, as to amendments, I had made the clear distinction that, on those matters which were within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, it did not have to consult the provincial governments nor the members of the provincial legislatures. It had to be responsible to the inhabitants of the provinces who elected representatives to speak for them in this house. With respect to all matters given by the constitution to the provincial governments, nothing this house could do could take anything away from them. We have no jurisdiction over what has been assigned exclusively to the provinces. We cannot ask that what is not within our jurisdiction be changed. We have jurisdiction over the matters assigned to us and we can ask that the manner of dealing with those matters be changed, provided we remember our responsibilities to the men and women who elected us to this house and who did not elect us to this house through Mr. Duplessis or any other provincial premier.

When the question was put to me as to how it might be possible to have the constitution amended in that respect, as provided for in article 133, I answered according to my construction of the constitution. I gave a truthful answer. I said that, in so far as the use of the French language in this house was concerned, it was something which could be dealt with in this house since the provinces were not given exclusive jurisdiction over it. I was speaking of the theoretical power to do a thing.

Provincial legislatures have the power to do anything with respect to property and civil rights. They have the power to take my property and say it belongs to Mr. so and so, but they do not do it. At page 56 of Hansard the hon. leader of the opposition said this:

> There is more than a legal decision involved in this; there is the unity of Canada.

What I said was not in exactly the same language, but was to very much the same effect. In effect, I said there should be the power to do it but, in fact, it was quite impossible to conceive that it could ever be done.

I wish to quote the language I used, which will be found on page 2621 of Hansard, 1946:

> There are persons and nations who reach a high estate in the affairs of men, and the high estate they reach imposes upon them high obligations. There was no obligation on the Tribune Festus to say to King Agrippa that he could not deliver Paul to the Jews when they requested that he be put to death. It occurs to one, however, that they also had reached a high estate, which imposes a corresponding obligation. I copied out of the bible on the table of this house, from the Acts, the quite natural statement of Festus:
> "It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have licence to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him."

Further down I read:

> It is not the manner of those who have themselves had, and whose ancestors have had, the formation that comes from that long history which has brought us to this point in the civilization of mankind, to do things which the conscience of humanity at large would regard as dishonourable; and the conscience at large would frown upon an assemblage in this house that attempted to take from me and from those of my race the right to speak the language I learned in my infancy as one of the official languages in which the deliberations of this house may be carried on.

There have been so many attempts to use that statement both in the province of my hon. friend and in my own province, as an indication that I had said the French language could be abolished by any majority of the House of Commons; and those doing so are resorting to method which I hope no one on this side of the house will ever have to resort to.

I said that in Quebec they like to get their facts straight. They know these are the facts. They know what my attachment is to the language of my father and they probably also know my attachment to the language which I learned from my mother. If my hon. friend pays attention to the headlines and articles which are appearing in the newspapers, many of which are inclined to be friendly to my hon. friend at the present time, he will see what regard is being paid to the manner in which I am showing in this house, and in my public conduct, the attachment I have to the two languages which are the official languages of this house.

The hon. gentleman referred to the official report of debates of the house in which he formerly sat, dated April 1, 1947.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The Prime Minister will need to get a new filing system.

Mr. St. Laurent: The field covered by the leader of the opposition was so considerable that it would require a filing system in order to have available all the material necessary with which to set straight some of the assertions that were made here and that cannot and will not be allowed to go unchallenged.

I have here the Ontario Hansard for the date in question and I find therein a preview of the speech that was delivered here on Friday by the hon. gentleman. If anyone is interested, I would invite him to put the two texts side by side. The other one was a speech made on April 1, 1947; the one of which we had the benefit in this house was of January 28, 1949. In one passage of his speech my hon. friend stated that he wanted to make it quite clear that he was not changing; and in fact in the speech of January 28, 1949, there has not been much change from the one of April 1, 1947.

In the 1947 speech I found a great deal with which I agreed. I entirely agree with the tribute the hon. gentleman pays to the splendid work which had been done by those responsible for provincial administrations in the fields which were within their jurisdiction.

I agree with him that this work was a most valuable contribution as the groundwork upon which was built the splendid war effort we were able to put forth during the years from 1939 to 1945. I admit that we used the highways. I remember that many claims came to us from time to time because we were using them to such an extent that it was felt that we should make some contribution to having them maintained and repaired. I also agree with the tributes he pays to the teachers who were in charge of the education of our Canadian citizenry during those years. It is certainly because of the magnificent job they did that the men and women of Canada were able to put forth the magnificent effort—in the armed services, in the industrial plants, in the mines, in the forest and in the field—which made our contribution what it was during the war. But that is not all I found in this Hansard of April 1, 1947. In two or three places I found references to the matter I have in mind, but I will cite this paragraph at page 709:

> Let us face the full implication of the position of the dominion government. They assert that we have no binding constitution. They claim the right to change our laws relating to language, to education, and even to civil rights, the control of property and the administration of justice.

I say that statement is one that, in every line, in every word and in every letter of each word, is absolutely false. I challenge any man in this house to bring forth one iota of evidence which can be invoked to support a statement of that kind.

The hon. member's principal complaint is that this government or the one that preceded it has not seen fit to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference. Let me say that I spent a good deal of time at all the meetings of this dominion-provincial conference which met in 1945 and 1946. On one occasion I had to fly back from the united nations meeting in London in order to be here for those deliberations, and I am convinced by the lack of results that my time was wasted. I am convinced that conferences of that kind, when there are elections in the offing, are stalemated from the start. There is no genuine desire at any of these conferences to deal with the various matters on their merits; and they were not dealt with on their merits. Since then on many occasions we have had meetings with representatives of the provincial governments, meetings with officials, and meetings even on the ministerial level, and have done things that have been for the benefit of the whole community. But when we have these full-dress provincial conferences, such attitudes are taken—and I will not say it is all on one side; there may be just as great fault on our side as on the other—that it is quite impossible to expect anyone who has his eye cocked on elections to do anything about the merits of the matter under discussion.

Mr. Drew: I might perhaps ask for information. What election was in the offing at that time?

Mr. St. Laurent: There was the election which has since taken place in Ontario.

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. St. Laurent: There was the election which has since taken place in Quebec, and it practically centred on the attitude of the Hon. Mr. Duplessis in this dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Drew: Three years afterwards.

An hon. Member: Politics all the time.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, three years afterwards. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman thinks that elections are prepared merely in the two weeks that precede the date of polling.

Mr. Drew: I do not think the Prime Minister's are.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is not the way in which we on this side of the house have regarded the problem; and I do not think that hon. gentlemen sitting around my hon. friend have regarded what was done in those last days as being effective. The opinion that has been gradually mellowing in the minds of the electors is the thing that counts, and not the speeches that are made over the radio in the last few days that precede polling.

Today the leader of the Progressive Conservative party wants changes. He says that over the years substantial changes have taken place and that something should be done to give effect to those changes. The position taken, however, by the premier of Quebec is that he does not want any change, that he will not have any change made, and that he is there to see that no change is made. The change that the hon. gentleman wants at this time is a change to enlarge provincial autonomy and independence and to prevent the usurpation of power by the central authority. The hon. gentleman perhaps gave an indication that his conscience was troubling him a little bit in taking that stand, because he was at pains to say, as reported at page 54 of Hansard:

So that it may not be suggested that I am merely making this statement here in the House of Commons and expressing a different opinion to that which I have held at any other time, may I quote from a statement I made in the Ontario house which is recorded in the Ontario Hansard of April 1, 1947.

That is the one to which I have referred. I do not know whether there is any reason why there should be any anxiety on the part of my hon. friend in that regard. Of course, he is here the leader of the opposition; and we on this side of the house seem to have too much power to suit him. But what was the situation when he was the leader of the opposition in the other house?

Mr. Knowles: He is not there yet.

Mr. St. Laurent: No; when he was the leader of the opposition in the Ontario legislature. On the day on which he found it necessary to differ from his leader there, the gentleman who is now the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), he issued a statement which was reported in the Globe and Mail, and in which he is reported to have said:

We have strayed a long way from the path laid down by the fathers of confederation. The strong central government, which the provinces sought to create, is hamstrung by petty politics. All the constitutional difficulties which now prevent the adoption of effective and urgently necessary social legislation can be overcome without waiting for amendments to the British North America Act, if there is any sincere attempt at co-operation.

Mr. Graydon: That sounds pretty good so far.

Mr. St. Laurent: Would my hon. friend like to have some more of it? I am quite willing to oblige. He continued:

The provinces created the dominion. The dominion did not create the provinces. If we are to have strong government, capable of meeting suddenly changing conditions, the provinces must take the first step. They united to form the dominion of Canada. It was their intention that there should be one strong government capable of dealing promptly with all problems of a national character. It was their own wish that the provincial governments should deal only with problems of a purely local nature.

Mr. Drew: That is right.

Mr. St. Laurent: That was September 8, 1937. On January 26, 1939, there is a report from Fort William, a demand that Premier Hepburn go to the country without delay to settle the issue of national unity. The report further quotes a brief prepared by Premier Hepburn and presented to the Rowell commission on dominion-provincial relations on behalf of Ontario. The Conservative leader said Mr. Hepburn had laid down the principle—that "the provinces must remain independent and autonomous."

The quotation continues and attributes the following to the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew):

"That is one of the most remarkable utterances ever made by any premier within the dominion," Colonel Drew declared. "This province must remain independent of what? That sentence in Ontario's considered brief to the Rowell commission does not mean anything unless Premier Hepburn has the idea that Ontario should become a separate nation. The people of Ontario never gave him a mandate to set this province up as a separate nation. He has been usurping his authority ever since he made that submission . . . "My own stand" he stated, "is that in all matters of national import there should be one strong government legislating for the people of Canada in their common interest. As leader of the Conservative party one of my main ambitions is to lead this province back to the plan of confederation and to give the other provinces a lead and an example in that. Mr. Hepburn advocates an independent Ontario. I prefer to stand, as a Canadian, for a united Canada . . . I shall go to the country clearly on the stand that Ontario is Canadian, one province in a united Canada within the British empire. I advocate the strengthening of national ties and divesting the province of every conflicting authority not necessary for provincial purposes."

That sounds like pretty strong language, but it compares quite favourably with the language that had been used in a radio broadcast just four days before that, on January 22, 1939, by a gentleman whose name is Mr. George McCullagh, and who has something to do, if I am not mistaken, with a newspaper published in Toronto called the Globe and Mail; and, if my information is not incorrect, it is a newspaper which quite frequently presumes to tell men in public life just how they should carry out their responsibilities. This is a portion of it:

The greatest service the premier of Ontario could do for Canada, and something which would carry his name into history as a public benefactor, would be for him to state publicly what we all know; that our provincial governments are political misfits, that they are unnecessary duplications, luxuries we cannot afford, and endless causes of disunity. If the premier of Ontario would state this, and pledge himself to help end the provincial burden, he would carry us a long way towards solvency and the solution we seek.

Mr. Drew: That was not the premier of Ontario.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not sure that this did not make some impression even at that time on the leader of the opposition, because the Halifax Herald of April 25, 1941, reports him as having addressed the commercial club of Halifax the day before. The report reads as follows:

> Describing Canada's "over government" as the "most colossal and incompetent system in the world" Colonel Drew said, "I defy anyone that has any personal contact with our system of government in Canada to say that it is not impeding us from doing many things that should be done to increase Canada's strength in her war effort." Colonel Drew related what he termed some of the disadvantages of the present system, recounting duplication of services and other features he said were detrimental to efficient national administration.

Then, this is in quotation marks:

> "What we need greatly is to look at government from a business viewpoint", he said, paralleling methods that a private business with a head office and nine branches would employ to promote more efficiency.
> Preservation of a nation's integrity must come from a strong centralization feeling, Colonel Drew continued.
> Canada's main problem was its decentralized governmental system, and the speaker declared, solution of that problem would insure continuance of the national structure.

These are the attitudes that were expressed by the hon. gentleman when the powers or the jurisdictions he was attacking were being exercised by somebody he was opposing. But just as soon as he ceased to be opposed and was being imposed we find him preaching the other doctrine, that what is necessary is that there be nine strong autonomous independent provinces. That change in the picture he sees, according to the point from which he is looking at it, is something which, in Quebec, is going to make people ask him what his attitude really would be toward provincial autonomy if ever the country was so imprudent as to put him in charge of the affairs of a federal government. I had intended to cite more material; but really, Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. St. Laurent: For the advantage of those who may have been impressed by the hon. gentleman's statement that the fathers of confederation had attempted to copy or model the Canadian constitution on that of the United States, I would invite their attention to a speech of Sir John A. Macdonald. He was a gentleman who for a time enjoyed quite a high repute in Conservative circles.

At page 33 of the Debates on Confederation of the Provinces of British North America he is reported to have said, about the American constitution:

> Ever since the union was formed the difficulty of what is called "state rights" has existed, and this had much to do in bringing on the present unhappy war in the United States. They commenced, in fact, at the wrong end. They declared by their constitution that each state was a sovereignty in itself, and that all the powers incident to a sovereignty belonged to each state, except those powers which, by the constitution, were conferred upon the general government and congress. Here we have adopted a different system. We have strengthened the general government. We have given the general legislature all the great subjects of legislation. We have conferred on them, not only specifically and in detail all the powers which are incident to sovereignty, but we have expressly declared that all subjects of general interest not distinctly and exclusively conferred upon the local governments and local legislatures shall be conferred upon the general government and legislature.

That is the original picture; and it is from that picture that the hon. gentleman was quite right in saying we have strayed a long way, from the path laid down by the fathers of confederation.

I think you know that the history of the Liberal party, in its regard for the true rights of the provinces, for the proper construction of jurisdiction assigned to them by the constitution, and for providing them with the means for using the rights they have under the constitution, is such that if my hon. friend were to take the advice given by these newspaper men, that this matter of provincial rights be his platform for the next election, he would, after it was all over, want to get some other advisers.

Anyone who listened to the broadcasts from the Progressive Conservative convention, and anyone who has noticed the party propaganda since that time, could hardly fail to be struck by the fact that the main appeal of the party seems to be directed to the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. St. Laurent: Most people would agree that it is a good thing for Canada to have our national political parties take into account the feelings of all sections of the country, and to frame their policies so that they will have substantial strength in all sections of the country; but it is a long time since the Conservative party has made any attempt to do that. And I am inclined to think that that may be one reason for its lack of success with its strategies.

Of course there was a strategy which worked once in 1911. But the motto of the province of Quebec is "je me souviens"—I remember. The people of Quebec are apt to remember what occurred in 1911. And if they do they will not be very much impressed by this procedure of making one appeal in one language in one part of the country and a quite different appeal in another language in other parts of the country. It was the Bourbons, was it not, who never learned anything?

Mr. Drew: You should know.

Mr. St. Laurent: And when one sees by the newspapers that former members of the Bloc Populaire are speaking for my hon. friend's candidate in Nicolet-Yamaska, one wonders. One wonders whether—

Mr. Graydon: What about the communists in North Grey?

Mr. St. Laurent: —it is going to be tried again. I am rather proud of the fact that the Liberal party has never had to resort to that strategy.

Mr. Graydon: Oh yes it did.

Mr. St. Laurent: We have always—

Mr. Graydon: North Grey they did.

Mr. St. Laurent: We have always had one party and one appeal—

Mr. Graydon: North Grey.

Mr. St. Laurent: If the hon. member wishes to complete my speech, I will give him the floor. But I think, really, that the gentlemen over here would prefer it if I were to complete it.

Mr. Graydon: You are much more good-natured than you let on now.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sure my hon. friend and I have never been otherwise than good-natured in any exchanges we have had either on the floor of the house or outside the house.

We have always been able to put forward the same policy and to make the same appeal in both languages. There has never been a Liberal government since confederation which has not recognized at all times in its ranks the principle upon which this nation was really founded, the principle of the partnership of the two races. Our party is the only one which has been able to have leaders from both races; and our party has always practised the precept of unity—which is desired I think by most Canadians.

In the attempt to make provincial rights an issue for the next election, I doubt if my hon. friend will meet with very much success. Because, as I have said, there are many parts of the country where it will be felt that it is this party which has always stood for the real and practical rights of the provinces.

We also stand for national unity, unity based upon the fundamental equality of all Canadians, whatever their race or wherever their province. I believe, and those who sit around me here believe, that the people of Canada wish to see the provincial governments free and able to discharge to the full the responsibilities entrusted to them by the constitution; but that the people of Canada wish also to see the government of the nation recognize and discharge to the full all the responsibilities in its domain. That has always been the Liberal position and it will continue to be the position of this government. I believe that when we convince the people of Canada that it is to be the position of this government the great majority will be satisfied with that position.

Since I referred to the correspondence with the premiers of the provinces in connection with rent control, letters have been received from the premier of Saskatchewan and the premier of Manitoba which I think it would be only fair to have in the same issue of Hansard. The letter from the premier of Saskatchewan is dated January 28 and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Abbott:

Thank you very much for your letter of January 13, in which you ask for the governments' view on the occupation by the federal government of the field of rental control. The government of Saskatchewan is desirous that the dominion government continue to exercise its jurisdiction in this field and to extend the legislation relating to rental control for at least another year. In view of the fact that these matters have national implications, we feel that they can best be dealt with on a federal basis.

Trusting that this information will be of assistance to you in drafting appropriate measures, I remain,

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas.

The letter from the premier of Manitoba is also dated January 28, 1949, and is as follows:

My dear Mr. Abbott:

Re: Matter of rent control.

I received your letter herein dated 14th instant.

I have referred to our file. It contains the letter dated October 23, 1948 from yourself to Honourable Mr. Garson, K.C., the then premier of Manitoba.

I note that the speech from the throne read at the opening of your parliament on Wednesday, 26th instant, forecasts the extension of rent control under legislation of the parliament of Canada.

I have conferred with my colleagues and we have carefully gone over the whole situation. We are of the unanimous opinion that, as matters stand at present, the whole subject of rent control should be left for the exclusive consideration, attention, et cetera, of the Dominion of Canada authorities.

I take it that this letter furnishes you with what is desired herein.

Thanking you and with kindest regards.

Yours very truly,

Douglas Campbell.

Those letters had just been received and I did not have them before me when I came into the house.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, as I believe that many hon. members want to participate in this debate I think every available minute should be used. As the speeches which we have already had were rather long I propose to fill up the time between now and six o'clock and not ask you to call the recess now.

I had not intended to get into this discussion on dominion-provincial relations. As a matter of fact this party for some years has held the view that the considerations which caused the government to set up a royal commission to look into dominion-provincial relations, and the report which was presented to this parliament subsequently, warranted the utmost thought on the part of the people of Canada through their elected representatives, in regard to general dominion-provincial relations and the rights, prerogatives, and new obligations that should be assumed by the legislatures or by this parliament.

Ever since the conference broke down we have been urging that it should be reconvened and some solution found in order that, in the difficult days which may lie ahead when we are not riding on a wave of great prosperity and full employment, the powers of the various governments shall be so decided that there will be no question as to where responsibility lies.

I have listened with some misgivings, yet with perhaps some pleasure, to the contest between the government and the official opposition, apparently in an attempt to catch the eye of the province of Quebec. This party believes that whatever is done in this country should be done with an eye to all provinces, not just with an eye to any single province. In days gone by the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario, the English-speaking people and the French-speaking people, have been pitted one against the other by political parties. I have lived in western Canada long enough to remember the vicious campaign which was carried on in my province in 1929, 1930 and 1935, largely in the interests of my hon. friends of the Conservative party who sit to my immediate right.

I remember how people were persuaded to go into post offices to ask for bilingual money order applications, envelopes and so on to send down to Ottawa protesting against the printing being in both French and English. I remember those occurrences and I am glad that we are not likely to see that sort of thing again. I would like to believe that today there is a desire on the part of all parties in this house to bring about some national unity.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). After he had finished speaking I did a little research work, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) apparently had done. I found many of the statements that the right hon. gentleman placed before the house this afternoon. I suppose that the Lieutenant Colonel George Drew that I read about in the newspapers in the years prior to 1940 is the same gentleman who occupies a seat in this house as the leader of the opposition; but when I read the statements that were published in those days and heard the speech that was made on Friday I questioned myself as to whether this was the same person. I intend to quote from a period a little earlier than did the Prime Minister. I have in my hand a copy of a report of a speech made by the leader of the opposition. I do not intend to use a phrase or a sentence or a paragraph taken out of its context, which has been done by my hon. friend; I am going to read the whole of an article which appeared in the Toronto Globe of November 10, 1936, the four-star metropolitan edition, page thirteen. So there will be no mistake about it, it appeared on the first page of the second section, columns five and six. The article is headed and reads:

Costly Inefficiency in Government Seen

Must be eliminated to avert fascism in Canada warns Colonel Drew

Canada must eliminate the costly inefficiency of ten governments doing, in most cases, the job of one, or else sink in the rising tide of fascism, Lieutenant Colonel George A. Drew predicted at the board of trade club last evening.

"A democratic government must be efficient to survive," he warned.

"There is a growing doubt, especially among our youth, that we can go on supporting this ridiculous overlapping of government.

"Surely something must be 'rotten in Denmark' when twenty cabinet ministers can control 45,000,000 people in Britain and we need over one hundred to direct the affairs of less than a quarter of that population," Colonel Drew declared.

"This tremendous overhead and duplication of government is the fault of no one party. But we must decide now whether we are to have nine nations or one."

With warnings of expanding fascism in Quebec and evidence everywhere of a breakdown of confidence in democratic government, where inefficient, Colonel Drew explained that this same lack of faith had been the root of fascism in Italy and nazism in Germany.

Expressing firm confidence in the principles of democratic government, Colonel Drew thought that Canada could well afford to tear a leaf or two from the fascist book.

I have read the whole report from page 13 of the Globe of that date. The number 13 sometimes is somewhat significant.

Mr. Graydon: It is going to be your lucky number, too.

Mr. Coldwell: That is all very well, but I want to say this to my hon. friend. All these boasts of what is going to happen do not mean anything to me. All I have been interested in is to see that this party, and indeed this parliament, serve the best interests of our people, and where deception is practised let it be exposed.

Mr. Graydon: Whoop it up, boys.

Mr. Coldwell: My hon. friends like to shout "Get together with the Liberals," but I want to say that we are not getting together with any other political party.

Mr. Graydon: There are some others wanting to get together with you.

Mr. Coldwell: We have policies, we have principles, and we do not propose to sell our policies or principles down the river in any province in Canada, even to those who stand for the overthrow of the institutions of the country in which we live, whether they wish to overthrow them by violent means or whether they wish to undermine component parts of this great nation in order to obtain a temporary victory in any political fight. I wanted to make these comments, Mr. Speaker, on a matter to which, when I prepared my notes, I did not intend to refer at all.

There is one other thing I want to do before I sit down. I listened this afternoon with considerable misgiving to what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said about radio. I hope the royal commission which is to be set up will have an absolutely free hand to inquire into all matters pertaining to radio, including, I would hope, both public and private radio. I would hope that the words of the Prime Minister this afternoon about the authority vested in the present broadcasting corporation will in no way be taken by the royal commission as either an opinion of the government or a direction. The Prime Minister shakes his head, indicating that he did not intend it that way. I am glad to know that.

I am glad that the Prime Minister referred this afternoon to the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, and his part in the setting up of the radio commission, the broadcasting corporation, and the national radio system we now have in Canada. I suggest to my hon. friends on the right that they read the speeches of the leader of the Conservative party at that time, and see what he had to say. There was unanimity on all sides of the house that this great utility, the air, which belongs to the people of Canada, should not be alienated for private profit, private gain and private monopoly, because, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, every air wave that is alienated to a private radio station gives that radio station a monopoly of that air wave. It is granting a monopoly, and I say we should safeguard the rights of the Canadian people.

May I say that I regret exceedingly that in the last few years we have seen the broadcasting corporation recede step by step from its original position. We have seen radio stations owned by private interests getting more and more power until today there are private broadcasting stations having as much as 50,000 watts, something that was never intended when the radio bill was placed before the house. In order to sum up what I have to say I want to remind the house that on May 11, 1933, when there had been some criticism of the radio bill from the Liberal side of the house, Mr. Bennett said, at page 4891 of Hansard of May 11, 1933:

> I confess that I felt somewhat distressed this afternoon to find all the opposition coming from my hon. friends across the gangway. I cannot think that that is in the interests of this great national undertaking.

The Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, then sitting opposite Mr. Bennett, interrupted and said, "hear, hear." The Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe and the leaders of the Liberal party in those days were as keenly in favour of preserving for the people of Canada the air waves, this great public utility, as was the Prime Minister of that day who led the gentlemen who are now following a new leader, and apparently a new policy in this regard. After the interruption by Mr. Lapointe, Mr. Bennett said:

> No words that I can use would exaggerate what I conceive to be the importance of this matter in relation to the body politic. I look upon it as one of the foremost means of education that the world has ever known, and I believe we must not permit it to be destroyed either by political differences or by the insidious efforts of private interests to destroy public ownership of this utility.

I say to you there has been not only an insidious campaign but also a public and flagrant campaign to undermine and destroy this great public utility.

In the minute that remains to me I should like to pay a tribute to the broadcasting corporation of this country. I know of no other broadcasting organization in the world, with resources so little, doing the kind of job that our radio corporation and its employees are doing today in Canada. As a habitual listener to the radio, when I have the opportunity, I say that if you place Stage 49 with its drama, the Wednesday evening programs of the C.B.C., apart altogether from the numerous forums, talks on educational and other topics, the splendid school broadcasts, the kindergarten of the air, and all the rest, side by side with what is done by private broadcasting companies with far greater facilities, and great masses of wealth behind them, you will find nothing better anywhere in radio that I know of than what has been done by the corporation in Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, before the house rose this evening, in the course of my remarks I had intended to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion we are now discussing, but I overlooked it. On behalf of my colleagues as well as myself, I am now extending congratulations to the mover and seconder for the manner in which they performed that important duty.

I wish to look for a few minutes at the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker. I think the speech from the throne is, in many respects, very disappointing. It is disappointing to those of us who had hoped that steps would be taken at this session to protect the economy of our country and the health of our people, and to relieve the burden of high prices as well as the lack of housing with which the country is afflicted.

May I say, at once, we agree that the first care of any government at this time should be to ensure peace and security. Many years ago a great British statesman said, if you would understand the foreign policy of a country, you must first of all give some attention to or study of its domestic policies. In the main, that is what I propose to do this evening, although my time being limited, I shall be able to deal with only two of the main items in the speech from the throne.

We agree that we must base our external policy upon the united nations. We must do everything in our power to co-operate with other countries in the preservation of peace throughout the world. We realize that advantage must be taken of the united nations organs which have been set up to deal with economic, cultural, and humanitarian problems and to make provision for regional security pacts, whenever it is in our country's interest so to do. I believe it is very important that the people of Canada know where the various political parties stand in relation to these important matters. The government has stated its policy. The Progressive Conservatives are apparently divided because of the statements that have been made in the province of Quebec by the president of the Progressive Conservative organization in that province.

Tonight, I wish to place before the house the statement on international policy and the proposed North Atlantic agreement which was adopted this week end by our national council representing people elected by our national convention and the various provincial organizations from every province in Canada. It reads as follows:

> The national convention of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation last August expressed its full support of the European recovery program, and welcomed the western union among the United Kingdom, France and the low countries which had been cemented by the Treaty of Brussels. The C.C.F. is glad to note that the economic recovery of Europe is proceeding encouragingly in spite of communist led opposition and sabotage.
> The C.C.F. is convinced that mere military alliances cannot guarantee peace. Economic recovery must continue to be the primary objective. This is why the C.C.F. welcomed the Brussels Treaty. In addition to providing for mutual assistance against aggression in Europe and for joint defence arrangements, the treaty gives priority to economic considerations. It binds the parties to fortify and preserve personal freedom and political liberties, to strengthen their economic and cultural ties and to create in western Europe a firm basis for economic recovery. It sets up the machinery for these purposes. Provisions are also made for the admission of other nations with similar ideals. The treaty has been registered with the united nations, and is in no way contrary to the charter which specifically provides for regional co-operation and defence.
> The failure to achieve disarmament and world security through the united nations, and events in Czechoslovakia, Berlin and elsewhere, have increased tension throughout the world. The military staffs committee and the commissions on armaments and on atomic energy of the united nations have all found it impossible to reach agreement on basic objectives. There is thus no existing guarantee of protection against aggressive war, and the very economic recovery of western Europe is threatened by fear and insecurity. The proposal has therefore been made that western union be strengthened by a north atlantic pact which would include at least the United States and Canada.
> The C.C.F. believes that Canada should support and join such a north atlantic security pact. Efforts must be continued to build the world security system called for in the united nations charter. But until such security is achieved, a regional pact, in line with the provisions of the charter, will increase the degree of mutual aid and assistance among the western democracies. Through a broader co-operation of defence policies, it will reduce the strain upon the European economies which all military programs involve. It will thus tend to ensure the eventual success of the present efforts to restore to western Europe a full measure of economic independence.
> The C.C.F., however, insists that such a pact should be based upon the broad principles so clearly stated in the Brussels treaty. It must provide for the fullest possible economic co-operation, aim at a high standard of living and increasing democracy in all participating countries, and thus give the western world the dynamic democratic leadership which is the only real answer to communism.
> Like the Brussels treaty, any such atlantic pact must be registered with the united nations and remain open to other members of the united nations on the same terms, so that it may grow as far as possible into a general security pact. All plans and commitments under it must be supplementary to the primary objective of economic reconstruction. The consultative machinery under the pact should provide Canada and every other signatory with a full and equal voice in the determination of policy.
> The probable cost of the military and other commitments to this pact make more urgent than ever the immediate introduction of the C.C.F. policy to place the burden of taxation on those best able to bear it. It also emphasizes the need for measures of control over industry and production, which would allow for the effective planning and use of our resources to meet all our obligations and at the same time to develop a higher standard of living and social security for all our people. The C.C.F. affirms again that the best defence against communism and all forms of totalitarianism rests not on military might but on social justice.

I wish to repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this is a statement very similar to the one which I proposed to make myself had I spoken last Friday and had this meeting not been held this week end. It is a statement approved by the national council of our nation-wide organization.

I wish now to turn to another problem, because I believe it is of paramount importance to our country at the present time. The problem with which I wish to deal is the difficulty we are finding in marketing so many of our products; that problem is both pressing and real. During the war we were impressed with the growing interdependence of the nations for the general welfare of all the peoples of the world. The economic and social council which was established as a principal organ of the united nations was a recognition of this fundamental fact. There can be no guarantee of peace and prosperity as long as peoples are underfed, underclad and underhoused.

It is in the interests of Canada to do all in her power to support every effort to deal with the distribution of agricultural products and foodstuffs, beyond our borders as well as within the borders of our own country, where that distribution is, at times, far from satisfactory. Canada produces a vast surplus of wheat, fruit and all other food commodities.

Up to now, because of world conditions, there has been a demand for everything that we could produce. The trouble with many of us is, I think, that the European recovery program is obscuring the real danger to our Canadian economy. The plain fact is that the Canadian standards of living at the present time and the prosperity of our people—more particularly perhaps of our agricultural people—are dependent now upon the expenditures approved not by ourselves but by the United States in the form of gifts and loans, amounting up to the present time to over five billion United States dollars.

We have already experienced the effect of some of the stipulations which surround this vast expenditure. Advantageous to us, of course, is the provision that in order to mitigate the effects of shortages in the United States for the American people, some of the ECA funds may be spent outside the borders of our great neighbour. But on the other hand we find that other provisions work in the opposite direction. I believe that some $750 million will be spent in Canada during the current fiscal year. But a provision to which I have already referred, which is having a serious effect already on Canada, is the one that says that if any agricultural product is not fully needed in the United States and is, in the view of the United States government, a surplus commodity, then ECA appropriations cannot be used for the purchase of that commodity outside of the United States. Already one of our agricultural products, namely, flax—about which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) this afternoon gave what I thought was a warning to our producers in Canada, of which they should take notice—has been adversely affected by that provision. Should the United States, in the next year and in the years following, reap a substantial wheat harvest, if the plan continues, then ECA dollars could not be used by Great Britain for the purchase of Canadian wheat unless some other arrangement were made.

The speech from the throne disappoints us because it is silent on this important matter of marketing. For many years our organized farmers have been asking for orderly marketing; and it would seem to me that at this session this house should be giving a great deal of consideration to the establishment of a national marketing agency for our primary products, and particularly for our farm products, which will enable us to deal intelligently with the developing situation.

At the moment we find difficulty in the marketing of British Columbia fruits, Nova Scotia apples, and so on. I believe that at the present time the small fruits that were going to Britain — the raspberries and strawberries of the 1947 crop—are still largely in British Columbia; and what is developing in regard to apples, fruits, salmon and so on, may develop, if we are not careful and prepared, in relation to that great product upon which so large a proportion of the agricultural section of Canada depends, namely wheat. Indeed, apart from all that I have said, if a world wheat agreement cannot be reached, our prairie farmers in the future may face a grave situation.

For a good many years we have believed that our trading relationships should be conducted by import and export boards; and since the war this opinion has been greatly strengthened by what has been going on in other parts of the world, and by the economic difficulties which have arisen between nations in their trading relationships that are more and more determined by the ability to make direct exchanges of commodities; in other words, to barter goods for goods. We may deplore that kind of trading relationship in the world, but it is a fact that that kind of relationship is coming more and more into evidence all across the world.

Before the war Canada was in a happy position. We were able to sell commodities in the British market and elsewhere and to receive payment in funds that we could use in order to purchase goods in the United States or anywhere else. As we all know, the liquidation of British overseas investments during the war, and the impoverishment of other one-time customers of our country, have made it impossible for us to continue trading on this basis, because there are no longer overseas investments to provide Great Britain with the necessary dollars, or indeed capital equipment, so largely destroyed during the war, in some of the other countries, in order for them to produce the goods they need to pay for the goods that we could send to them. Hence it is of fundamental importance that we should have the machinery not only to market but to trade effectively with those who are prepared to trade with us.

I do not propose tonight, because the time is not available, to go into all the ramifications of this particular condition. Suffice it to say that the lack, on the part of our customers, of a currency which we can accept and use, together with the industrial poverty of large sections of the world, particularly of Europe itself, is endangering the future of our whole agricultural economy.

Then too, going hand in hand with this situation, is the substantial recovery that has been made in the agricultural areas of Europe, so that today European countries are offering the United Kingdom the opportunity of obtaining some cereals, fruit, eggs, bacon, meat, dairy products and so on where she can pay either in sterling or by a direct exchange of goods for the foodstuffs she requires. As well as the advances in the agricultural output in Europe, we must bear in mind that the United States today, according to the statisticians in that country, is geared to produce 1,300 million bushels of wheat in a normally good year. Of that vast quantity of wheat that can be produced in the United States, not much more than one-half can be consumed in that country.

I am bringing these matters to the attention of the house because of the implications for our own country and the necessity of adopting intelligent marketing plans for all our products, particularly for wheat and other cereals upon which such a large proportion of our agriculturalists rely for their prosperity. Although I am speaking of cereals at the moment, I am not overlooking the other agricultural products. I have used wheat just as an example of what may happen to the other agricultural products in our country. May I say here that, if we are to market intelligently, we must end speculation in the marketing of foods.

The time has surely come, and I hope the government will endeavour to secure the co-operation of the western provinces, to close forever the Winnipeg grain exchange. I am quite sure that when we make this request, as we have done over and over again for many years, we are voicing the opinion held by a majority of our prairie farmers. So we not only urge that the wheat board be made the sole marketing agency for wheat and flax; we ask that all coarse grains as well be marketed under a board, which at the moment we call the wheat board, or in any event under a single marketing agency.

While there is disappointment at the price of wheat for the next crop year under the British agreement, a disappointment that it was not set at more than $2 a bushel, if when the time comes to make the final adjustment it is impossible for the British, because of their trading relationships, their financial position, or for other monetary considerations, to make up the amount the farmers feel they should receive, as I said when the British wheat agreement was before this house in August of 1946, we believe we should make it up out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada. That is what we have asked for; and I remind the house that, speaking on that agreement, I used these words:

> If the costs of production and of living continue to rise, a compensatory adjustment should be made out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

I remember that at the time the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said some $200 million had been provided for other farm products, and that he saw no reason why the matter of compensation should not be considered in this connection if the necessity arose. Let me add that farm costs have gone up. If we take the index of 100 in September, 1945, as the basis, by September of 1948 the general price index in this country—and I am using the figures of the bureau of statistics—had risen to 133, while wages had risen to 127. Farm living costs—and the costs of production have gone up more, I think, on account of increases in the cost of machinery, oil, distillate and so on—had gone up to 138, so the condition we feared has I think come about.

I also want to say something about the health plan which has been mentioned. Such a plan was incorporated in the Liberal platform of 1919. As long ago as March, 1928, a committee was established to consider the matter. More recently again, in 1943, a committee reported to this house recommending a health insurance plan. Proposals were laid before the dominion-provincial conference. Some financial considerations had to be gone into more thoroughly, but there was a general belief that something of this sort should be done. The plan so much talked of by the government at the moment is not a plan at all. It is simply an appropriation which will run out, and which has to be used during the current year. In my opinion this is insufficient at the present time. Our people need a plan adopted by this house, with appropriate legislation to ensure that it will be a continuing plan. The government has made a number of grants; for example, a grant for a health survey, and grants for other projects in the provinces. The principal defect in the whole scheme for the year 1948-49 is that the planning and execution must be undertaken at the same time, which in many provinces is an impossibility. It will be interesting to see just how much of this appropriation has been spent by the provinces up to the present time, or what allotment has been made to them, so that we may know precisely what this has amounted to during the current year. As I have said, the outline which was given to the house compels the provinces to discover their requirements and at the same time put their projects or schemes into operation. Therefore the one cancels the other, and it seems to me the plan is self-defeating.

The other great defect, because it is a discriminatory provision, is that a province must maintain its expenditures in any of these fields at their present levels, and use additional federal funds for new projects. This certainly penalizes any provinces which accepted in good faith the proposals of the dominion at the dominion-provincial conference in 1945. That is what happened, at least, in the province with which I am most familiar, Saskatchewan. There the government used its own financial resources to the very limit, in the belief that the dominion grant would meet half the costs. Instead of that, this province must continue these heavy expenditures without further aid in order to qualify for any portion of the proposed grants. In other words, as I have said, it penalizes the provinces which took seriously the 1945 proposals of the dominion government. I think it will be agreed that the Saskatchewan government did a remarkable job in connection with hospitalization, almost doubling the number of hospital beds in the province in the last four years, either by expanding the larger hospitals or by building new rural hospitals, of which there are a number.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) I move:

That the following words be inserted in the amendment between the word "address" and the word "we":

We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for the orderly marketing of our natural products, and for their exchange for goods needed in Canada, and for the elimination of speculation in foodstuffs:

We regret further that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for national health insurance;

Therefore . . .

Then the amendment moved by my friends of the Progressive Conservative opposition will follow.

Now, if I may conclude with regard to the health plan, the speech from the throne merely expresses satisfaction that the government is receiving co-operation from the provinces. That is not good enough. Our people need a nation-wide health service. If any measure of social security should receive the sympathetic and favourable consideration of the house at this time I think it is a dominion-wide health plan. I often wonder how people with very low incomes having serious sickness, particularly if that sickness is prolonged, can possibly give the care that is needed to those whom they love. So I say this session of parliament should not end without the government bringing before the house legislation for a comprehensive national health plan.

There are other measures, of course, which I should have liked to discuss tonight had my time permitted, such as the question of adequate housing, the return of beneficial controls and subsidies in order to maintain a reasonable level of prices and of living. These are essential matters which should be dealt with this session. The problem of housing remains unsatisfactory, as I have said. I believe the government is going to continue rent control for a further period, which from the correspondence read this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) I understand to be another year. That is not enough. We need a subsidized housing plan so that people with small incomes may enjoy decent and adequate housing. Indeed, under the charter of the united nations, though of course in signing it we were not committed in the sense that we sometimes use that word, nevertheless when we signed that charter we were obligated to bring about social security and other needed reforms for which our people have been asking for so many years.

So, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I want to say that this party in parliament will co-operate with the government or the official opposition or the Social Credit party in the house in endeavouring to bring about a better deal for the great masses of the people in this country.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my opening words should be those of sincere congratulation to the mover and seconder of the address in reply for the splendid contribution they made in initiating this debate. I believe there are many things, particularly in the speech of the mover, with which I could agree.

I am hoping that his recommendation with regard to the St. Lawrence seaway is acted upon fully and at as early a date as possible by the government. It is interesting to me that the first important item dealt with in His Excellency's speech, and also dealt with in the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), was that of peace. We are all interested in peace. We are all very much concerned about the world situation, which does not hold out too much hope for peace. I think I can safely say that we all want peace, but some of us spend our time trying to dig out and remove the causes of war and unrest while others spend their energies treating symptoms and not causes.

The Prime Minister dwelt at some length on the efforts which his government and that headed by the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) made to achieve peace. He set out at length in his review what had been done to sponsor a world organization, the united nations, and how this government had remained loyal in support of that organization.

He also mentioned the new Atlantic pact. I wish to say right here that we of the Social Credit organization favour the Atlantic pact, and support it. But we do think that during this session either the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), my genial friend who is sitting so close to us, should enlighten the Canadian people about the cost to them of this Atlantic pact. I think the people are entitled to know what it is going to involve, and just how much it is going to cost.

I think, sir, that in the united nations we have had the cart which this government gave us. Now it looks as if they have come to the horse. It is quite clear that they have lost faith in the united nations assembly and in the security council, lost faith in the ability of the united nations to achieve the objective which they were so sure was going to be reached through the united nations, and that was world peace.

I think the suggestion today of the Atlantic pact indicates the government's loss of faith; and we would like to draw the attention of the house to the warning which we gave the house when the charter was before it for ratification back in October of 1945. At that time I thought I made it abundantly clear that while the Social Credit movement was anxious to support any form of international co-operation which promised peace and security to the people of the world, we did feel that such proposals as were put forward should be scrutinized with great care, and that the real authors of the schemes should be known.

I think at that time I said something like this, that the real authors of the San Francisco charter, the men who actually drafted it, were evidently so anxious to obscure any of its dangerous and anti-democratic features behind a smokescreen of platitudes and humanitarian phraseology that they overreached themselves. At that time I continued in this way, as anyone who reads my speech of October 18, 1945, will see:

> I have already shown that the profession of purpose set forth in the preamble of the charter bears no relation to the sinister purpose which one uncovers in the proposed organization itself.

And, if you will recall, I did say at the time that my real criticism of the whole business was that the expression of high humanitarian purpose and lofty ideals contained in the preamble were completely negatived and set at nought by the details of the organization outlined in the body of the charter; and in no way could the details of the proposed organization be sustained in the high principles so ably set forth in the preamble.

> The organization—

I pointed out at that time—

> —embodies features which are flagrant violations of the most precious principles of democracy and of human justice. It is not only unworkable but, I submit, highly dangerous. By no stretch of the imagination could it in its present form possibly serve the cause of peace and human progress.

That was not to say that we had no faith whatever in any attempt to achieve international peace. But we did call in question the authorship and weaknesses of the charter. I wish to make just as clear as I possibly can, and in a very few minutes, why it was we took that position at that time, and why it was we advocated that the government scrutinize most carefully the whole proposal and measure it in relationship to the personalities who drafted the charter.

We were not any too happy about it, because we had been watching the changing international scene, and we saw congregated at Dumbarton Oaks and again at San Francisco a number of the wretches who had rendered unworkable the league of nations; they had their fingers in the pie again. It was they who were taking a prominent part in the drafting of the San Francisco charter. And when this assembly was asked to examine and to ratify that charter there was not a single other member in the House of Commons who rose to call in question that very feature, which I outlined clearly on that occasion.

That was the reason, the main reason, why we felt there was little chance of its succeeding. I should like to refer to something else, just by way of justification of the stand we took, and by way of explanation of what I wish to say tonight. At that time I said this:

> Suppose that a nation came into conflict with another on an issue which divided the Big Five members of the security council, or to put it in this way, the five permanent members of the security council, a thing which is quite possible, bent as these nations seem to be on continuing the old game of power politics; and hell-bent as they are to vie with each other for world industrial, commercial and influential supremacy. For example, suppose that a communist government in Bulgaria threatened to take armed action against a democratic government in, let us say, Greece. Any proposed action by the security council could and probably would be vetoed by Soviet Russia. Would Great Britain and the United States remain passive in such a case? If they did, or if they did not, either way, that would be the end of the united nations organization for world peace. That, actually, is but one of hundreds of situations likely to arise that could bring the members of the security council into conflict among themselves, and then we would have another global conflict instead of a localized affair.

I ask hon. members to keep in mind that that was uttered in 1945, not many months after the end of the war, at a time when there were so many idealistic frothings about the wonderful thing for the world the organization was going to do. The very thing that I mentioned as a possible example did happen, and right there was marked the end of the possible effectiveness of the united nations organization in achieving world peace.

I maintain that what we are doing now in the setting up of the Atlantic pact ought to have been done in 1945 or as soon after the war as we possibly could get at it. But the Liberal government put the cart before the horse. During the years that have elapsed since that time the world situation has deteriorated quite considerably. Communism has spread until it encompasses almost half the globe and threatens the other half. I say to you that by some concerted action at that time, such as the Atlantic pact, action based on reality, we possibly could have prevented the serious deterioration that has taken place in the past four years.

I mention this because I want you to draw a lesson from it. The main criticism that I have of this government is that they are always in a tremendous hurry when they are on the wrong road but have rocks tied to their feet when by some chance or other they happen to be on the right road. Unfortunately I find that they are unwilling to take a second look at proposals that are made in good faith and sincerity by people who have been following the course of events and who come forward in an honest manner to make such suggestions. We Social Crediters have tried to do that. We have made suggestions in all good faith. We have tried to show that we would co-operate in anything that they wished to do that would be for the benefit of humanity.

I am afraid that this government is too ready to follow policies such as were illustrated when I was in Scotland this last autumn. I was talking to an old Scotsman out on the moors. He said, "You know, Mr. Low, it is not so many years ago when my father and I were crossing the moors. We saw a very peculiar animal. We went closer to it and as we walked around and examined it we saw that it looked like a pig. But it was a little different. My father said to me, 'Is that not a peculiar pig?' Just then a voice came from the direction of the pig saying, 'I am not so peculiar.' My father could hardly believe his ears, but it was the pig speaking. The pig said, 'I am the sole survivor of the Gadarene swine. You know the story? We Gadarene swine were peacefully feeding one day, when a peculiar spirit got into us. Somehow or other we got it into our heads that we should run for the sea, and we headed that way just as hard as we could go. As we were all about to jump in, I decided that while that might be a good short-range policy, it had no future. I dug my feet in and I did not go into the sea. The rest of my companions did, and all were drowned. That is what happened. I am the sole survivor.' The Scotsman said, 'I am certainly sorry for you, Mr. Swine.' The swine replied, 'Do not feel sorry for me, at least I am alive.' "

I think that is exactly the position the government is taking on many of these things. They think it is enough to be alive, to have survived, to have stayed in power. I say that it is not enough to survive, it is not enough to be alive. There are things much more important than that. The welfare of the people of Canada is the most important concern of any government.

I would like the government to take a look at the whole present world situation to see, in the light of what I am going to say now, if they cannot find in it the hand of some power that seems to be directing world affairs toward a most uncertain end in line with the policy of the Gadarene swine.

I had the privilege of visiting Germany through the courtesy of the empire parliamentary association. I saw the efforts that were being made to re-establish that country. I had the privilege to visit Berlin and I saw the air lift that is being so magnificently carried on by the R.C.A.F.—

An hon. Member: R.C.A.F.?

Mr. Low: —the R.A.F. and the American air force, not the R.C.A.F.

An hon. Member: Where were the R.C.A.F.?

Mr. Low: They were conspicuous by their absence. A magnificent effort was being made. The combined air forces were bringing in to the people of Berlin four thousand tons of foodstuffs and other materials every day. That is at that time, but I believe they are carrying more today.

After seeing Berlin I said to myself, "Who in his right senses would have arranged the division of this country among world powers in such a way as to set up Berlin as an island in the middle of Russian territory with no corridor leading up to the city?" Then I heard somebody answer, "Well, we had to show our confidence and trust in our friend Russia." I say that when that arrangement was made to establish Berlin as an island in the middle of Russian territory with no corridor by land or water the people who made that agreement were well aware of the fact that you could not trust Russia. Russia had already given evidence that she could not be trusted.

Was it stupidity? I do not believe it was stupidity. Let us look a little further. When in Berlin, I saw the terrible destruction that had been visited upon the city. There was hardly a building that had not been more or less destroyed. But deep inside British territory I saw a beautiful building untouched by war, and when I asked the guide what it was he said that it was Goebbels' radioplast. When we went up to it we found it was guarded by a detachment of Russian soldiers. That plant was in the hands of the Russians and they were using Goebbels' high-powered radio transmission machinery to send out their vicious and lying propaganda over the whole of Europe.

I ask you, "How did the plant—situated a mile and a half inside British territory, get into the hands of communists? Was it the result of stupidity, or was it malevolence or perfidy of the highest order?" That is something that ought to be determined. Another thing I saw inside British territory was a huge Russian victory memorial which was guarded day and night by Russian soldiers.

Who allowed that to happen? Then I want to know who is responsible for the dismantling and scrapping debacle in the Ruhr valley. The new minister of external affairs (Mr. Pearson) ought to be informing himself about that business. I visited the Ruhr valley. I found, for example, that the C.C.G. government—that is, the military government in conformity with the Potsdam agreement—had set parties to work dismantling some of the big German steel and manufacturing plants. They were those that were classed as potential war dangers. In dismantling those plants the engineers were very careful to see to it that the parts were labelled so they could be re-erected easily. I discovered that one of these very large steel plants, full of very important and expensive machinery, had been allocated to Yugoslavia, to be sent behind the iron curtain!

The plant I mention constituted a danger while it was in Germany because they said it might be used for war purposes, but of course it would not constitute a danger behind the iron curtain, and so it was being allocated to Yugoslavia. Mr. Speaker, that sort of thing does not just happen, not by any means. When I asked about it the answer I got from the young man who was in charge of the dismantling operation was, "Yugoslavia helped win the war, didn't she?"

Down in the Ruhr valley I was told there were 50 million tons of surplus scrap iron left in Germany and to be left there according to the Potsdam and other agreements. No serious effort was then being made to get the scrap out of Germany, who does not need it. Nor was there any effort being made to get a fair portion of it into the hands of Great Britain, who has been starving for scrap iron, and who had made such a magnificent effort and spent almost her all in helping to win this war to save the world for democracy. I say that the agreement by which that scrap iron was to remain in Germany was a stupid agreement. There is nothing under heaven that could stop the Russians from reaching the Rhine and that scrap, if they ever take it into their heads to start moving towards the Ruhr. And they certainly would not hesitate to throw the scrap back at us if they got possession of it. I should like to know who it was who arranged the agreements by which the piles of German scrap become a potential danger to the democracies.

In my inquiries as I went through Germany I was told that all of these strange things came about as a result of the Yalta and the Potsdam agreements. But, you say, the framers of those agreements were no fools! When I began to carry my inquiries a little further I found, for example, that men of questionable character and integrity in high places were at the elbow of those men who, on behalf of the allied nations, made the Yalta and Potsdam agreements. I will tell you about one of them. Just recently in New York a man by the name of Alger Hiss—that may bring memories back to some people—was indicted by a grand jury on a charge arising out of certain vital information which leaked out of the United States to Soviet Russia during the war. At the present time, Mr. Speaker, Alger Hiss is the head of the Carnegie foundation for world peace. He was formerly a member of the state department of the United States. Significantly, as a prominent member in the state department, he helped to organize the Yalta and Dumbarton Oaks conferences, and acted as secretary-general of the united nations conference at San Francisco, which built the charter and established the basis for UNO. But he has been named as a prominent member of the underground communist party of the United States.

All along this man has been right at the elbows of the men who were responsible for making these atrocious agreements such as Yalta and Potsdam. He was probably an adviser to the men who made the agreements with respect to the scrap, with respect to dismantling, with respect to the division of Germany, and with respect to a good many other things. With such men wielding power, is there any wonder UNO is a miserable failure? Who knows how many of such perfidious civil servants there have been in the government of the United States, the government of Canada, and various other governments, lending their support to Russia while posing as patriots? Who knows but that the influence of such men was responsible for keeping Great Britain and the United States out of Berlin and letting the Russians go in six weeks ahead of them? In that six weeks, while the Russians were there in sole possession, they divested the city of everything of value, filched it away into Russia, and then set about the most degrading and bestial treatment of the people of Berlin that one can imagine.

It is that sort of thing which makes me feel that this Liberal government should be calling into question and bringing under careful scrutiny some of the institutions they hold up as examples of international co-operation. Some of these organizations were founded not on the high, humanitarian principles expressed in the preamble of the charter of the united nations, but upon the desires of hidden minds and the works of hidden hands.

I think perhaps the impression that one gets more strongly than any other from reading the speech from the throne is that the Liberal party is utterly bankrupt of sound ideas of how to deal with and solve the fundamental problems that face Canada and the world. One sees in the actions of this government, in the speeches made by its members, and in the speech from the throne, plenty of superficial attempts to treat symptoms; but honest efforts to dig right down to the foundation of things, to find the basic causes, and to remove or remedy them are completely foreign to present Liberal desire or inclination. Let me cite an example, and I suggest there are plenty of such examples.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was recently in Great Britain where he gave an admirable speech before the board of trade in London, if I remember correctly. He criticized, and quite rightly, the currency situation which prevents the hungry people of Great Britain and other sterling countries from buying the abundant food products of Canadian farms, as a result of which, he warned, Canadian farmers will probably have great trouble in selling some of their 1949 crops. That means there will be unsaleable surpluses of food materials.

Just a day or two ago Mr. Hannam, the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, had this to say at Saskatoon:

> I feel keenly that we are coming dangerously close to the point where we move from an era of shortages into an era of surpluses. Canada could be the first nation to be faced with embarrassing surpluses in the face of crying need in other parts of the world.

The people of this country want to know what the Liberal party is doing about that currency problem, which is nothing more or less than a crazy war between those who are determined that the dollar shall dominate the world, and those who are desperately attempting to hold on to the last vestige of pound-sterling imperialism. Behind the scenes, the financial racketeers and big shots are having an enjoyable time about it all while they continue to pull the strings which cause blind governments to dance to their tune. I tell you it is not the government that suffers; it is the people, and that is the important thing. It was not long ago that this Liberal government, grossly misled by the international hysteria that has been sweeping the world, and encouraged by other members and parties of this house, with the exception of the Social Crediters, plunged recklessly into the Bretton Woods agreement, and held that up as their proposal for the solution of the world's currency war.

I challenge anyone on the Liberal side to stand up on this floor today and defend Bretton Woods or say that he believes the situation complained of by the Minister of Agriculture can be cured by using the Bretton Woods agreement. What else have the Liberals to offer as a means of getting at the real root of this whole trouble to correct it so that Canadian producers can sell what they produce and enjoy freedom from fear?

Here is another example. I was interested in reading in the press of January 25 a report of a speech which the new Minister of Reconstruction and Supply delivered in the city of Toronto. After speaking of conditions in 1949 the minister had this to say about 1950. I take the liberty of quoting from his speech, and I hope the report is a faithful one:

> With respect to 1950, the outlook is much more uncertain but I would not be surprised if private investment activity would, in the years beyond 1949, begin to slide to a lower level. It is in the years after 1949 that public investment may have to play a more important part.
> Part of it is my responsibility and I shall act accordingly, but a lot will depend upon what provincial governments and municipalities can do in their domain as well as the co-operation we receive from industries, both capital and labour.

The minister continued by expressing the hope that the various governments, provincial and federal, would help him provide a billion-dollar cushion against depression. Evidently, this billion-dollar cushion will be for the purpose of providing full employment and the various governments in Canada will have to be ready to spend this amount of money under what the Liberal party likes to call a "public investment" program. What does all this indicate? I think I should take a minute or two to analyse the minister's suggestion and to illustrate what I mean when I say the Liberals are adept at treating symptoms but are never ready to get down to basic causes.

External markets for Canadian goods have begun to show signs of tapering off during recent months. Britain's agricultural production is improving. Last autumn I visited Germany and was amazed at that country's recovery, both agriculturally and industrially. This year Germany had excellent crops, so the food situation there has greatly improved. It is fully expected that basic steel production in Germany will be back to an adequate peacetime level by 1950. European aid under the Marshall plan will terminate sooner or later, at which time United States money will not be taking up so much of our Canadian agricultural production. The effect of the Marshall plan is to make the countries of Europe self-supporting. Sooner or later, they are bound to come into competition with Canada.

It is patently clear that when substantial gifts of Canadian goods, together with the long-term credit sales of them to other countries, no longer take off the top layer of our production, we will soon face a condition of very large unsaleable surpluses in Canada. Unless something worth while is done about it, that situation will come about. The backlog of pent-up wartime savings of the people is fast disappearing. In fact, thousands of Canadians have already seen those savings disappear as a result of high costs and unreasonable taxes, which have themselves contributed to high prices. The government has itself contributed materially to these high prices. Therefore, we cannot depend on these pent-up wartime savings to keep up effective demand in Canada.

One already hears reports that men of forty-five and fifty are being told they are too old for certain jobs. This situation is bound to intensify as the months pass, for we are constantly making improvements in machinery and processes that reduce the need for manpower even though we maintain high production. Above all, our mechanized industry fails to distribute purchasing power amongst consumers to enable them to buy the entire output of the factories, fields, and mines. Machines produce but they do not eat. This thesis is being admitted as a fact by many prominent thinkers and economists today.

The council of economic advisers to the government of the United States recently presented to the President what has been described as a calm, temperate 140-page study of the economic situation in that country. The council members, all prominent economists, show themselves to be wholly committed to the idea of a balanced economy. According to them, the trick is to give the consumers enough buying power to purchase the goods they produce. They declare that consumer income, though it has increased relatively in the past ten years, is still far from adequate in relation to the other component parts of the economy.

As less and less of our Canadian production is drained off in gifts or for purposes of re-armament for outright war, this economic fact which I have just stated comes into full play. Unsaleable surpluses begin to pile up on the shelves of retailers, in the elevators, and on the farms. Retailers cancel orders to wholesalers whose warehouses bulge with materials they cannot move; hence, they cancel orders from manufacturers. When factories have no orders wheels stop turning, and unemployment begins to appear. With unemployment, salaries and wages decline; confidence dwindles; bread lines appear; business stagnates and depression is on us with all its tragic circumstances.

Faced with those facts, what do the Liberals do? They begin to advocate and develop plans for government spending which they call "public investment". That is the billion-dollar cushion upon which my hon. friend sits. The idea the Liberals put forward is for the federal government to centralize more power; to tax or borrow and spend the income to establish a policy of full employment. This policy carries with it a threat of destitution or starvation as the alternative. The result is a scramble for employment, much of which is devoted to making useless things in one place and trying to sell them in another; to digging holes or cutting down hills with shovels and wheelbarrows while marvellous machines, worth many thousands of dollars and capable of doing the job better and cheaper, stand idly by, rusting away for lack of use. When this stupid policy fails, the Liberal party will doubtless increase the bureaucracy. They will put many more of the unemployed in the armed forces to get ready for the war that will be inevitable if world affairs are allowed to deteriorate any further.

I quite realize that the minister of reconstruction's billion-dollar cushion could yield some desirable results. Canada is in desperate need of the houses which could be built with a lot of this money, but the point I wish to emphasize is that, like every other so-called remedy for our economic ills put forward by the Liberals, this one will have the ultimate effect of depriving most individuals of more of their freedom. It will consolidate more and more power in the hands of fewer chosen individuals. Let us have the houses, certainly, but let us have them without going further into pawn to the merchants of debt through heavy additions to our present burden of taxation or debt. One cannot be blamed for drawing the conclusion that many of these remedies, as they are called, are not intended to work for very long. When parties and governments continue to treat symptoms in this way, instead of getting at the causes, one can hardly be blamed for concluding that they are merely acting as the dupes of those whose first objective is to centralize power.

This so-called public investment palliative is as old as the hills and has never succeeded in doing what its sponsors claim it can do. It does not solve the fundamental cause of business recession. Lest the hon. Minister of Reconstruction and Supply think I am his enemy, let me hasten to congratulate him on the energetic way in which he has tackled the affairs of his department. I suggest, though, that at an appropriate time he should lead out in this house in a debate on the billion-dollar cushion proposal which he has made in public.

Before I leave this particular item, I should like to challenge the government to tell this house during this debate exactly how it proposes to deal with the problem of surpluses as they begin to appear in the Canadian economy. If my memory serves me right, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) indicated last year his belief that it would require a big program of foreign investment to take care of it. I wonder what he meant. By that, did he mean that Canadian production will join American money in scanning the horizon for something useful to do with itself? I should like him to answer that question when he takes part in this or some other debate.

We of the social credit movement believe that these surpluses of Canadian production should be used to improve the standard of living of the Canadian people and, as far as they will go, to provide them with social security. Moreover, we do not hesitate to explain exactly by what technique those surpluses can be distributed to the Canadian people so that they will not be wasted. I wish to take just one moment to do that, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Speaker: With the unanimous consent of the house, the hon. member may continue.

Mr. Low: I will not delay the house for any great length of time, but I should just like to say this. I have already said that we are not at all afraid to place before the world exactly by what means we propose to put these unsaleable surpluses of goods into the hands of the Canadian people so that they can use them. Social credit, in its financial aspects, is the use of the national credit for the benefit of all members of society in the nation, not just a few members. The use of that national credit means that debt-free, interest-free money should be made available to the extent that it is required for the effective and proper distribution of all of the goods or things produced in the nation.

To bring this about, the first step required is to set up a national currency and credit commission to prepare and present to parliament an annual balance sheet, and to assess the relation between what the nation grows, makes and imports, on the one hand, and what it uses up and exports, on the other hand. If, in any year or period, the total production in our country, plus our imports, is found to exceed the total consumption so that unsaleable surpluses begin to appear, an appropriate amount of new money will be authorized and spent into circulation in one or both of two forms. The first of these forms is a national dividend to be distributed to every man, woman and child in the nation, which will provide for them some security and at least a modicum of freedom which will make it impossible for others to enslave them; this dividend to be provided through debt-free, interest-free money by the use of the national credit through the national currency and credit commission.

The second way would be a retail price discount on the things people buy, for which the retailer will be compensated with purchasing power provided by the issuance of debt-free, interest-free money through the national currency and credit commission. This constitutes the financial reform proposals for social credit. In its fundamentals it has been tried and found successful. I would point out that the dominion treasury right now creates, and spends into circulation, interest-free, about ten per cent of the new purchasing power that we use, without borrowing or taxing it away from the people. If they can create and spend directly into circulation that proportion of our new purchasing power requirements, then I say there is no logical reason under the sun why a currency and credit commission should not, with a similar technique, put enough purchasing power into the hands of consumers to balance consumption with production so that embarrassing surpluses of goods need not appear.

People who champion what is loosely called the democratic way of life continue to protest their adherence to the idea that the teachings of Christ and the love of Almighty God bring democracy to its truest realization. Many of them insist that they believe in the sanctity of the human person and in individual freedom. Those who are associated with the social credit movement insist that human freedom and the highest ideals of democracy cannot be realized as long as people generally, or any section of our population, are the victims of economic pressure that results from man-made policies. We in the social credit movement insist that, in this age of plentiful production, the greatest single factor that can contribute to the release of people from economic pressures resulting from man-made policies is a reform of our monetary system whereby debt-free, interest-free money will be spent, not lent, into circulation by the national currency and credit commission to the extent that it is required, and only to that extent, for the efficient and proper distribution of all of the things Canadians produce.

In dealing with the so-called surpluses I have mentioned, I think it would probably be necessary to supplement the financial technique that I have outlined with regional conversion, processing and storage facilities, by government; and most certainly with international trade on a balanced two-way-street basis. We have already advocated the setting up of a world pool of food and other products to which the various nations of the world can bring their real surpluses; and when they have brought their real surpluses there, they can take back with them goods that they need and do not produce, to an equal value. We say that when that is done, and that when the nations have put their own houses in order, when they have removed social injustice, and have extended to the people, regardless of race, colour or creed, a full measure of social justice with freedom, then and then only shall we be able to achieve world peace.

Mr. Manross: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) this question. Does he know that on the most important debate in the house, when he was speaking, there were present twenty-three Liberal members and four cabinet ministers? That is the real importance they attach to this debate.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. Low: I did not know that because I was concentrating on making my speech. But I am sure the people of the country will like to know that fact.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my word of welcome to those new members who have been elected to this house since last session. I should also like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

On Friday evening and this afternoon I listened most attentively to the laborious efforts of the Prime Minister for some three and three-quarter hours—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Is that not right?

I listened to his lengthy address in which he discussed the speech from the throne and many other matters. We had a good deal of ancient history and many quotations. As I have only forty minutes, I wish to deal first of all with what appears to be a controversial subject in the province from which I come, as I think it probably is in some other provinces. I wish to refer to an article appearing in the Winnipeg Tribune of December 4, headed Killarney, and reading in part as follows:

> J. C. Davis, past president of the Manitoba Liberal Progressive Association told the meeting it was in the interests of voters of Souris constituency possibly more than any other constituency in the province, to work for the election of a Liberal member.
> The sitting member, he said, was a supporter of conservative leader Drew, who was in opposition to the implementation of the dominion-provincial agreement. This placed Col. J. A. Ross (P.C. Souris) in a similar position in direct antithesis to the rights of the prairie provinces.

No one took that very seriously at that time, but on January 12, the Winnipeg Free Press had this headline: "Ross, McDowell, Thorvaldson Denounced in Garson Address". In the Winnipeg Tribune of the same date appeared this heavy black headline: "Garson Attacks Souris M.P. over Tax Deal". In fact there is a good deal of detail in all three daily newspapers of that date. The Tribune goes on to say:

> Justice Minister Stuart Garson Tuesday accused Colonel Arthur Ross, Progressive Conservative M.P. for Souris, of "stabbing in the back" the tax agreement between the dominion and Manitoba.
> Speaking to the Manitoba Liberal-Progressive convention at the Fort Garry hotel, Mr. Garson charged Colonel Ross of "outrageous and impudent falsehood," in saying that the agreement was a "bad deal for the provinces" and in alleging that Mr. King had "scuttled" the dominion-provincial conference.
> Mr. Garson attributed these remarks to Colonel Ross at the Progressive Conservative convention in Ottawa last October, when he nominated George Drew for national leader of the party.

Then he goes on to point out that Mr. Drew had blocked a just deal, and said:

"If Colonel Ross . . . proposes to be an enemy of his province, the sooner he stops posing as a friend, the better.

It is a most singular coincidence that all the criticisms of the Manitoba government's position (on the tax agreements) have come from John McDowell and G. S. Thorvaldson, and from Colonel Ross."

Then I skip quite a bit, because the newspaper carried a detailed account of the hon. gentleman's speech, and I believe it was also carried over the C.B.C. that night, or at least the main portions of it. In another column the newspaper report goes on:

"An examination of this sessional paper and the text of Colonel Ross' speech shows that he has made a wholly improper use of these figures," Mr. Garson said, "and even his speech by itself shows that he does not know what he is talking about."

Mr. Sinnott: What has that to do with the speech from the throne?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Just as much as the speech of the Prime Minister I listened to for two or three hours this afternoon.

Mr. Garson said that in his speech Colonel Ross stated the figures he quoted were for the first four years operation of the dominion-provincial tax rentals agreement ending March 31, 1948.

"This does not make sense," Mr. Garson said, "as the dominion-provincial agreement commenced April 1, 1947, and concludes March 31, 1952, so that by the date named by Colonel Ross the agreement had been in operation not four years but only one year.

Well, this afternoon I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) admit with some heat that words attributed to him were true but that he did not mean what they said because they had been taken out of their context and given the wrong meaning. That being so, I want to say that this is a gross misrepresentation, because I did not use those words and did not discuss any question of four years. I am going to have to quote the complete nomination speech I made, in order to keep the record straight. On January 15 of this year I wrote a reply to this statement by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) which I sent to several weekly newspapers as well as the three daily newspapers in Winnipeg. In it I said:

Dear Editor:

If you will permit me the use of space in your valuable newspaper, I should like to make some reference to a controversial subject.

At a Liberal provincial convention held in Winnipeg, January 11, 1949, as reported in the daily press of January 12, Justice Minister Garson, ex-premier of Manitoba, delivered a slashing attack, with respect to dominion-provincial agreement, on Mr. McDowell, Mr. Thorvaldson and myself. Stating "that the question which the electors of Souris have a right to ask Colonel Ross, is whether he should support the efforts of the Manitoba government, or whether he should pull chestnuts out of the fire for Colonel Drew."

Mr. Garson charged that Colonel Ross in discussing the taxation agreement, when nominating Colonel Drew as Conservative leader, had been guilty of some grave misstatements of facts. May I say that all the facts and figures used by me at that time were taken from government records, and that at the first opportunity, in the approaching session of parliament, for the benefit of the electors of Souris, and of Manitoba, I will, with the justice minister, Mr. Garson, sitting opposite me, deal with the matter of dominion-provincial conference on tax agreements, and other matters, and quoting from Hansard proceedings, prove as to who has been falsifying the records.

Mr. Thorvaldson informs me that he has never, to date, discussed in public the present dominion-provincial tax agreement.

At the last annual Manitoba municipal convention, I did oppose Mr. Garson's proposal to place an added tax burden on land by way of dividing extra old age pension payments municipally and provincially, a matter which is rightfully a federal obligation, and the convention voted down his proposal approximately 650 to 7.

Keeping in mind a speech delivered by Mr. J. C. Davis, past president of Manitoba Liberal association, in Killarney on December 2, this is apparently all deliberate, cheap and false political propaganda developed by Winnipeg Free Press, Mr. Garson and others. Remember that Mr. Drew was premier of Ontario since August 1943, and Mr. Garson was premier of Manitoba since January 1943, and compare, during those years of increasing national revenue, what each provincial government has done, and is doing, by way of provincial payments for education, hospitalization, old age pensions and human welfare.

Thanking you for printing this and the detailed copy of my nomination speech of last October 1 which I enclose herewith.

Yours faithfully,

J. Arthur Ross.

I now quote the nomination speech, referred to in my letter:

Fellow Canadians—It is my privilege and honour to propose the name of a great Canadian, a man of great physical and mental strength, a person of charm, culture and dignity, one who was himself wounded on the field of battle—a personal friend with whom I have worked in the past on behalf of war veterans and their dependents—a journalist who has written several important articles on military matters.

He was chairman at the conference of defence associations in 1935 which was responsible for the reorganization of Canadian military forces.

In case of international difficulties he has the ability and vision to co-operate with the great nation to the south of us. He is recognized by many people as a North American Churchill.

He has won three provincial elections in succession. In his cabinet he has chosen young men of exceptional ability and vision. He has developed a highly efficient governmental system along business lines—has given the province the most progressive and advanced legislation of any province within Canada.

With respect to education—his government contributes at least 50 per cent of the cost, and in some cases as high as 90 per cent; thus relieving the municipalities of great financial outlays and with great improvement to the entire educational structure. Health services have been trebled. Capital grants to hospitals, depending on the type of hospital, are as high as $2,000 per bed.

Resources have been developed on a scale never before attempted, federally or provincially.

Farmers are permitted to conduct their business with a minimum of government interference as possible. As a result, the present number of rural seats now held by his government is greater than has been held by any government in the history of the province, and those many rural M.L.A.'s were all elected by the common people of the land.

He insisted that the dominion-provincial conference must continue when Prime Minister Mackenzie King scuttled the meeting. He has repeatedly asked Prime Minister King to reconvene the conference but without success.

According to the sessional paper from the Department of Finance, under date of April 26, 1948, for the first full year's operation of the dominion-provincial tax rental agreements ending March 31, 1948—

British Columbia gave to the dominion taxing field $144 million (round figures) and received $20 million—seven to one.

Alberta gave $47 million and received $13 million—three and one-half to one.

Saskatchewan gave $33 million and received $13 million—two and one-half to one.

Manitoba, my own province, gave $64 million and received $12 million—five to one.

New Brunswick gave $23 million and received $7 million—three to one.

Nova Scotia gave $29 million and received $10 million—three to one.

Prince Edward Island gave $2 million and received $1½ million.

As a result of the dominion-provincial taxing agreement, British Columbia found it necessary to impose provincial sales tax, while Ontario was showing a surplus of $25 million. On the basis of these figures this has not been a good deal for the provinces.

I followed every minute of the conference proceedings and according to the record of May 3, 1946, when the dominion government was standing rigidly by a take-it-or-leave-it line of its own Mr. Drew said "Ontario's attitude is not one of 'take our offer or leave it'." Later on, Mr. Drew said—"Decide how long it will take to revise your position in the light of the clearly stated position of the provinces, then call us together to consider a transitional tax agreement."

At another point in the conference he said—"The concern of each of us is to find the highest possible standard of life for every Canadian." He then went on to say—"Our proposals are made in the belief that they should be equally acceptable in every part of Canada and are in no instance put forward with the thought of giving any special advantage to those who live in the province of Ontario." "Ontario has said, and said very emphatically, that it recognizes certain advantages it possesses and that it is not only willing, it is insistent upon combining with the other provinces of Canada to share any advantages it possesses."

Premier Angus Macdonald of Nova Scotia suggested that the conference adjourn to meet at a later date.

The then Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), moved that it adjourn sine die and Prime Minister King, who was chairman, promptly put the question and declared it carried.

On many occasions since Mr. Drew and Mr. Macdonald have urged that the conference be reconvened. The dominion government has never done so.

This is not a time for sectionalism. We must have a united Canada and the federal state must be preserved.

I believe that the leadership in progressive legislation for Ontario during the past few years can, to a large extent, be duplicated across Canada by the leadership and vision of this man.

He is one of the greatest Conservatives of the day. Conservatism means "loyalty to persons," that is, loyalty to human brotherhood, loyalty to the proposition that the dignity of man and his happiness are more precious things than the power or the dignity of a state.

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

Canada now requires greater leadership. This man, with a national and international reputation has proven his administrative and leadership ability. Canada must have Drew as leader.

Friends, for your most earnest and serious consideration I place in nomination for the leadership of the Progressive Conservative party of Canada, the name of my friend and comrade, George Drew.

I ask the house to compare that detail with the reported speech of the Minister of Justice Mr. Garson) in those three daily papers. I have before me the dominion and provincial submissions and the plenary conference discussions in 1945 and 1946. Let me first of all refer to page 113 of the dominion tax proposals, where it states:

The dominion government proposes that after the war the provincial governments should by agreement forgo the imposition of personal income taxes, corporation taxes and succession duties, leaving the dominion government the full and exclusive access to these revenue sources. The dominion government further proposes that as a condition of such agreement the dominion should substantially expand its present payments to the provincial governments under an arrangement which would ensure stable revenues and provide for their growth in proportion to increases in population and per capita national production.

And then at page 129, the Manitoba government presentation is as follows:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Premier of Manitoba): Mr. Chairman and fellow provincial premiers and delegates, like the premier of New Brunswick, I want to say that I am in agreement with the statesmanlike utterances made by the premiers of Ontario and Quebec with regard to the necessity of a non-partisan approach to this problem of the value of discussing in committee the proposals which have been brought out at the plenary sessions of the conference. However, I differ from them in one respect. I have not understood from the course of events during the past eight years that we were to come here merely to consider dominion proposals. We understood, rightly or wrongly that we were being invited to present proposals of our own. The proposals which I intend to make this afternoon are not in any sense counter-proposals. They are proposals that were prepared before we had any idea as to what the dominion proposals were going to be.

And then at page 323, again quoting the premier of Manitoba (Mr. Garson):

There should be one system of national old age pensions.

The dominion proposals regarding old age pensions envisage a dual system of administration. One system would be administered and paid for by the dominion government itself, providing pensions of $30 per month beginning at age 70 without means test. The other would provide payment of old age assistance for ages 65 to 69, subject to a means test and would be administered and paid for by the provinces and municipalities, with the dominion contributing one-half of the cost. The Manitoba government contends that the dominion government, having recognized its responsibility for the payment of old age pensions without means test to persons of 70 years and upwards, should provide old age pensions without means test below 70 as well. We contend that for two old age pension systems to be operating at the same time, one administered wholly by the dominion government without means test, and the other administered by the municipalities and provinces subject to a means test, would surely create friction and misunderstanding, and would require, at large expense, duplicate administrative machinery in both the federal and provincial fields. In our view it is much preferable to have one system administered and paid for by the federal government, even although this may involve adjustments in other fields.

Then, at page 391 the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is reported to have said:

The main purpose of the dominion-provincial conference (1945) is to place the dominion and the provincial governments in the best possible position to use their combined powers for the most effective advancement of the welfare of the people of Canada and the strength of one national economy.

And further down on the page:

These principles are stated at the outset so that it may be clearly understood that our proposals are made in the belief that they should be equally acceptable in every part of Canada and are in no instance put forward with the thought of giving any special advantage to those who live in Ontario.

And again at page 394 the leader of the opposition said:

I am very glad to see in the statement read by the Prime Minister of Canada this morning that the suggestion is made that the co-ordinating committee should continue to sit at least once every six months. As may be recalled, that was the suggestion of the province of Ontario. I am not boasting of that fact, it is a simple matter of record. It is also a matter of record that the motion to set up the co-ordinating committee was a motion of the province of Ontario. Therefore the combined results of these discussions which are now showing form in these suggestions, which do bring us close together, have come from contributions made by all the representatives of all the governments. I say most emphatically that everyone sitting around this table has contributed some substantial part to the advancement of these proceedings to this point.

And again at page 397, the leader of the opposition:

The Ontario government is still of the opinion that the proposals put forward in its printed brief, and submitted to this conference, do offer a satisfactory basis for a temporary agreement, combining the full legislative, administrative and taxing powers of the dominion and the provincial governments in such a way as to produce the best results for all the people of Canada.

And again at page 425, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) said:

Now, sir, the Manitoba government is fully in favour of concluding an agreement based upon the dominion's proposals, modified in the manner I have suggested, not because they meet the views of the Manitoba government in every particular, but because of the two alternative courses of action to which our choice now is limited. In our judgment the conclusion of such an agreement would be a much better choice both for Canada and for Manitoba.

And then at page 509 the premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Macdonald,—and this is a reference which no one has ever read in the Winnipeg Free Press—

Let me ask you, Mr. Chairman, and the delegates here, whether they represent the dominion government or the provinces, let me ask anyone who is within sound of my voice, let me ask that greater body to which we as public servants are all accountable, the citizens of our provinces, or of Canada, let me ask any of those people whether they think that it is a fair or honourable or dignified position in which to place the provinces in this dominion. Provincial autonomy will be gone. Provincial independence will vanish. Provincial dignity will disappear. Provincial governments will become mere annuitants of Ottawa. Provincial public life—and I do not think these words are too strong—will be debased and degraded. I cannot think that such a state of affairs is desired by the representatives of the government of Canada here today, my one-time colleagues. I am sure that they have no wish or desire to see such a state of affairs come to pass in this country, nor can I believe that such a state of affairs is desired by the people of this country.

And then Mr. Manning, at page 535—and I have not read this in the Winnipeg Free Press, either:

Mr. Manning: Mr. Prime Minister and gentlemen, this is an occasion which obviously calls for plain speaking and a frank expression of our reaction to the address delivered this morning by the Minister of Finance. Mr. Ilsley's comprehensive address might well have been reduced to one simple word of two letters: No! For that reason his statement conveyed much more than just an unsatisfactory negative answer to the considered opinions expressed around this conference table by the provincial premiers. It conveyed an attitude of uncompromising rigidity on the part of the dominion government that is indefensible in the light of the circumstances as they are.

Then Mr. Manning is reported again on page 538 as follows:

Now, Mr. Prime Minister, I cite these facts not in a spirit of bitterness, but rather for the sole purpose of emphasizing the attitude of uncompromising rigidity which the dominion government has adopted in this matter.

And again:

I am forced to say this after listening to the reply of the Minister of Finance to the submissions of the provincial premiers that, if this conference fails, and I sincerely hope that even yet it will not fail—but if this conference fails, the responsibility for its failure will rest squarely on the doorstep of the dominion government and will be due to the attitude of uncompromising rigidity expressed on behalf of the government by the Minister of Finance this morning.

Then as to the apparent reason for the real charge made by the Minister of Justice I should like to quote Mr. Ilsley from page 624, the final page, as follows:

As the Prime Minister reminds me, I must proceed at once with the preparation of the budget. It is not possible for me to wait until an agreement is reached, and I will have to prepare the budget in the light of the fact that no agreement has been reached. In the meantime my suggestion is that we should adjourn sine die, and that the government take into consideration the points of view that have been expressed here today, and then arrive at a decision as to the procedure to follow and the position to take.

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, I take it that Mr. Ilsley is not suggesting that there will not be another conference. The premier of Quebec who is not here said he would come back at any time.

I would hope that the representatives of the dominion government here stand in the same position, and are prepared to try it.

Mr. Mackenzie King: Gentlemen, it has been moved that the conference adjourn sine die. All those in favour of the motion will please say "aye."

Some premiers: Aye.

I was sitting in the gallery and had watched the little whispering campaign between the then Prime Minister and Mr. Ilsley before he rose. I do not think I am wrong when I say that the Prime Minister scuttled the conference and it certainly has not been called since. Let me go on to deal with the charges made by the former premier of Manitoba. I happened to attend a municipal gathering last fall and I listened to a discourse by a very able gentleman, the Hon. William Morton, municipal commissioner. In his address to the delegates attending the forty-fifth annual meeting of the union of Manitoba municipalities Mr. Morton outlined the reasons why their taxes had had to be raised and he reviewed the financial position of the municipalities and referred to the financial assistance which they had received as a result of the dominion-provincial agreement in 1947 amounting to some $2,750,000. He went on to refer to their revenue deficits of nearly $3,000,000 and he stated that the municipalities were some $3,000,000 poorer in realizable assets than they were at the beginning of 1945. At that time he had the figures only up to the fall of 1948 and for 1947. He stated that only 73 municipalities had operated on a cash basis in 1947, the lowest in the past twelve years. Actually there was an operating cash loss of over $600,000.

That speech certainly was not in keeping with the story the premier had left with them. I was rather surprised to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) make the following statement on Friday evening. I intend to quote the whole paragraph so that he cannot accuse me of doing what he has accused others of doing. He said, as reported at page 60 of Hansard:

Before doing that, however, I want to say to the leader of the opposition that there are many of the things he said in his speech concerning dominion-provincial relations, and concerning the constitution of Canada, and its principles, with which I am in entire agreement. And if there was any hope anywhere that an issue could be created upon that, then I am sorry that we shall have to disappoint those who may have entertained such hopes.

I sincerely trust that the new Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Winnipeg Free Press will give as much publicity to the statement of the Prime Minister as they have given on many other occasions to different phases of the dominion-provincial agreement, some of which were not in keeping with the printed record.

I said also at that municipal convention that the former premier of Manitoba and his government had agreed to a much less advantageous deal than they now have with the province of Manitoba. I said that they could thank Premier McNair of New Brunswick, who had bettered the arrangement for his province on the basis of what had been given to British Columbia.

The Minister of Justice took advantage of every opportunity to pose in Manitoba as an expert on dominion-provincial taxation matters, but we certainly owe thanks to Premier McNair of New Brunswick for the present deal we have. I should like the municipal officials of Manitoba to compare the particular submissions made to the conference in 1946 with the old age pension proposals that he made to them during the fall of 1948 when he offered to split an increase up to an additional $10, thus adding another tax burden to real estate and making the municipal officials responsible for administration.

Of course he did not tell them that he was leaving the premiership of Manitoba and going to Ottawa. The old age pensioners throughout this country certainly require more than the allowance they are now getting in order to live. There is no argument anywhere about that. I remember during the last session of parliament the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) placed on the record an editorial from the Vancouver Sun. This will be found on page 4307 of Hansard. The editorial was headed, "Hello Sucker!" and went on to show what British Columbia was getting from the dominion government.

I think everyone knows that the Vancouver Sun is not a friend of the official opposition. If, as this editorial in this Liberal paper in Vancouver says, British Columbia has been sucker No. 1, Manitoba qualifies as sucker No. 2 under the arrangement.

It will be remembered that the Minister of Justice nominated the right hon. Prime Minister for leadership last summer. That was his prerogative. But according to newspaper reports he is very resentful of the fact that I, a humble member from Manitoba, should have nominated the present leader of the opposition as leader of the Progressive Conservative party. I am one, among many, who is quite sure that he will be Prime Minister once the public have an opportunity at the polls. I think this is sufficient for that subject. I think the Hansard record of the conference will show what happened then.

I should like to refer to the first press report of the Minister of Justice's campaign in Marquette. It is rather odd considering that he was only a few days away from his position as head of the coalition government of Manitoba. The article reads:

It was possible, he admitted, to foresee the defeat of the party at the next general election but it was not possible to see any other party being capable of forming a government. The only alternative would be some sort of weak nondescript coalition.

I am sure that his colleagues whom he had left a few days ago in Winnipeg appreciated that statement. Here is another report headed "Garson Outlines Liberal Policies" and reading:

The lifting of the embargo on cattle shipments to the United States had meant, in the few short months since it had occurred, that $65 million worth of cattle and meat products has gone across the border.

"Think what this means in terms of income business for western Canada," Mr. Garson said.

"Can any sensible person believe that another government more than likely composed of a coalition could equal or better this record," he continued.

It is rather odd, you know, that he never reminded his electors that this same Canadian government had imposed controls and embargoes in 1942 and the following years up to date which have cost the agricultural producers of the prairie provinces in the neighbourhood of $2,000 million. He neglected to remind them that it is the same government.

In that respect I want to refer again to the Searle index of December 1, 1948, with reference to the British-Canadian wheat agreement.

Between now and December 31 prices have to be set for the sale of Canadian wheat to Great Britain, all according to a clause contained in the British-Canadian wheat agreement. As we have frequently shown in these columns, the losses for the first two years on the wheat supplied to Britain amounted to $352 million. There was a further loss of $170 million on the wheat farmers supplied for Canadian domestic consumption.

A clause in the agreement says as follows:

"In determining the prices for these two crop years, 1948-49 and 1949-50, the United Kingdom government will have regard to any difference between the prices paid under this agreement in 1946-47 and 1947-48 crop years and the world prices for wheat in the 1946-47 and 1947-48 crop years."

This paragraph has been explained by those who support the agreement to mean that in the third and fourth year Britain would add such an additional price to the world price as would recompense our farmers for the losses they may have sustained during the first two years. We were assured our farmers would lose nothing by the agreement.

The price for the third year was set at $2. But far from making up for any losses sustained during the first two years, this price of $2 merely added further to the losses, because for the first three months, namely August, September and October of this third year, the average price for Canadian Class 2 wheat set by the wheat board, and sold on world markets, and which is therefore the world price for Canadian wheat, has been $2.38, making a further loss for these three months on wheat supplied to Britain of $33 million so far, and it will most probably be more by August 1 next, the end of this crop year. The price for the fourth year of the agreement, then, to make up for these gigantic losses, would have to be over $5 a bushel.

I recollect that the minister was asked his opinion on that matter also, but as I read his answer even at this late date he is still giving the matter consideration. I have contended at every session that this is altogether too great a contribution to ask one class of people in Canada to make for the consumers of Great Britain and of Canada.

There was some discussion this afternoon about communism in this country. It is rather strange that in all the newspapers of the country in the year 1945 the Labour Progressive people, who were recognized as the communists, were asking their followers to support the Liberals in the pending election. I well remember the advertising, particularly that in the Grey North election. Now they have switched their allegiance and they are asking their followers to support the C.C.F.

Mr. Knowles: They have changed their line again.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is my latest information. Then we have the peculiar coincidence that whenever the government seems to be getting into a jam in the House of Commons, the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) brings in his group to support the government, although professing to stand for their own principles.

Mr. Knowles: Nonsense.

Mr. Graydon: That is not quite nonsense.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I should like to warn the people of this country that it can happen in this Canada of ours, and that they should not take things for granted. It can very easily happen. To have a real working democracy we must have free enterprise on the one side of the scale balanced by human welfare on the other. Then we will have a real democracy. I will have much more to say on agricultural matters, old age pensions, veterans' allowances, and veterans' problems when the opportunity presents itself.

Mr. L. J. Raymond (Wright): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it has ever been a very comfortable situation for a backbencher to be the first one on this side of the house to rise in his seat after the leaders of the different political groups have spoken. Perhaps I might take advantage of the situation to compliment the distinguished members who have spoken prior to myself, and in some way to pay tribute to their speeches. Limiting myself to the leaders of the political groups in this house, although I think none of them are here at the present time, I wish to say that a good speech is nothing new when the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) or the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has the floor. Although I do not share their opinions, I wish to say that I have always listened to them with great interest since I came to this house in 1945.

The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is a newcomer here. I confess he was more or less a curiosity to me. I think it would be unfair not to say that he delivered his speech well, and also that I listened to him with great interest. It is not for me at the present time to appraise the contents of his speech and to comment on it, since that has been done, and quite thoroughly, by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) last Friday and this afternoon in one of the best speeches I have ever heard here or elsewhere.

In a humble way I wish to congratulate the right hon. the Prime Minister on his most excellent speech, a speech which made me proud to serve the good cause under so great a Canadian, just as I was proud to serve such a cause before under the leadership of another great Canadian, the right hon. the member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King), for whom I have always had and still have great respect and admiration. The words uttered by the right hon. the Prime Minister in his speech last Friday have made a deep impression upon the Canadian people, and those he uttered this afternoon will undoubtedly make a great impression on them also, but perhaps none more than those relating to the problem of peace which is dominant today in this country and elsewhere in the world.

I do not think that I have been singled out particularly by certain persons and organizations to be sent communications demanding that, as a member of parliament, I request that this house declare itself neutral with regard to war, and further that I commit myself concerning such neutrality.

As it is quite unlikely, Mr. Speaker, I shall have another opportunity to put myself on record in this regard, I now wish to set out clearly my personal feelings concerning the participation of Canada in any future war.

Before doing so, however, it is a pleasure for me to join with those who have spoken before me in complimenting the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on the splendid manner in which they carried out their allotted task. I have worked with the mover of the address for three years in the Indian affairs committee, of which he was the chairman. I have learned to know him as a courteous, hard-working gentleman. The excellence of his speech, therefore, did not surprise me.

In his maiden effort, the seconder of the address gave promise of becoming an acquisition to this house. I congratulate him on his election and wish him well in his future career among us.

I should like to take this opportunity of expressing my regret upon learning of the death of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I wish it clearly understood it is not my intention to move that the parliament of Canada adopt neutrality as a guiding principle in any future war. I believe I am right when I say that all Canadians desire peace, and desire it sincerely. They do not agree among themselves on the best means of securing real peace in the world today.

In sober truth I feel that we should have the utmost hope in the final success of the united nations organization. Until that organization achieves its objective and succeeds in settling international disputes in a peaceful way, we must depend upon and embark upon urgent measures to ensure peace. In Canada, as well as in the rest of the world, the desire for peace seems to have misled some persons. Frightened by the mere thought of war and its horrible consequences to them and others, they have been led to believe that neutrality is the safeguard of the interests of this country.

In the event of the United States having to defend itself against attack by soviet Russia—may God forbid such a thing—those supporters of neutrality for Canada seem to believe that none of their interests will be endangered. They believe that merely an expression of their desire to isolate themselves will enable them to escape from this gigantic conflict. For them, Mr. Speaker, the matter at issue between the United States and soviet Russia seems to be purely one of economic order; nothing else is at stake. The United States and soviet Russia, according to them, are two international gangsters fighting for the economic supremacy of the world. It is their belief that we can let them fight and, even if soviet Russia wins, Canada will not be in any worse position.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, those Canadians are wrong. True, the western democracies on one side, especially the United States, and soviet Russia and her satellites on the other side, are economic rivals. There is nothing very surprising about that, because there is nothing perfect on earth. In the life of nations as well as in that of individuals, good and evil are mixed. Purity of purpose is sometimes absent from the one as it is from the other. Whatever intentions the leaders of those two groups of nations may have, whatever they may think or say, I have no doubt whatever there is something else at stake than mere economic supremacy. I believe there is something more at stake than the capitalist system of the western democracies with all its defects and imperfections.

Mr. Speaker, what did the Russians say to the Poles, the Roumanians, the Yugoslavs, Hungarians and Czechoslovaks to rally them to their cause? The Russians tried to make these people believe that the defects and imperfections of the capitalist system and of the democratic regime were the only things at stake. According to the Russian story, the aim was to free these people from what the Russians called American imperialism and an out-dated democratic regime. The communists of Poland, Hungary, Roumania, Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia succeeded in reaching their goal. They had to fight against the so-called American imperialism. They did and they won. These communists had to destroy what they called an obsolete democratic regime. They did and again they succeeded.

The important point, Mr. Speaker, is this: with what have they replaced it? They have established an atheistic and materialistic dictatorship which denies the rights of the human person and of religion. Today, the communists attack the fundamental freedoms of the human person and the church of Christ. In those countries, by all the means at their disposal, they seek to abolish religion; to take over schools and to make the human being a materialistic part of an omnipotent and oppressive state.

The recent arrest of His Eminence Cardinal Mindszenty, primate of Hungary, by the government at Budapest, is a striking demonstration of what I have just said. The cause of this prince of the church is the cause of human rights for millions of persons living behind the iron curtain. Cardinal Mindszenty was arrested because he dared to defend the rights of the human person and the right of religion. The Hungarian communists are making tremendous efforts to make the world believe he is a traitor. This Christian hero had the courage to defend such rights; that was his only guilt.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to put on record my personal protest, the protest of my constituents, and, I trust, the protest of the Canadian people, against the crime of which the government of Hungary is guilty.

What is taking place behind the iron curtain proves that, independently of the official intentions of the governments, there is in the dispute between soviet Russia and the western democracies something else at stake than the so-called American imperialism and the defects of the western democratic system. This something else is the fundamental freedoms of the human person, those of the church, and the rights of God.

May I remark here that at the last general election in Italy the Italian people, despite the appeals of the communists, against the so-called American imperialism and the defects of western democracy, would have had the same fate as those in Czechoslovakia and other countries and would today be behind the iron curtain had they not realized that what was really at stake was the fundamental freedoms of man and the rights of the church and of God. Let us not be mistaken, Mr. Speaker; the fate which the countries behind the iron curtain have suffered, one after the other, is a prefiguration, if I may use that word, of what will happen to France if ever the communists succeed in assuming power there. It is also the same fate to which the United States, Canada, Belgium, England, Holland, Scandinavia, Spain and Portugal will have to submit if ever Russia opens war against the United States and if the western democracies lose.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to find that the majority of Canadians understand the true meaning of the conflict between soviet Russia and the western democracies. It is unfortunate however that a small number of Canadians, through misunderstanding of the facts, play into the hands of the communists. They apparently fail to understand that in the present disagreement the common heritage of humanity itself is at stake.

The attitude of this minority is further complicated by the fact that, inspired by false humanitarian ideals, it proclaims the immorality of all wars, because of the complexion of modern warfare. Displaying an inconsistency which I fail to understand, some of these people, although claiming all wars to be immoral in character, stand prepared, or so they claim, to defend their country should it be attacked. If modern warfare is immoral, I do not see how those people can take up arms to defend their country, should it be attacked, because even then the end does not justify the means. If they consider that modern warfare is immoral in character, they cannot do what they believe is immoral, even in the defence of their country.

Another section of the same group is more logical in its errors. From the false premise that modern warfare is immoral, they contend that under no circumstances can we resort to war. They make no distinction between aggressive and purely defensive warfare. According to them, in the last analysis, all modern wars are aggressive in character and, as such, both immoral and unjust.

The results of such an attitude, Mr. Speaker, are obvious:

Should a nation obviously be the victim of unfair aggression, those who claim that all modern warfare is immoral would not even lift a finger to defend it.

If their country is drawn into war, a goodly number of them will inevitably become conscientious objectors.

Moreover, should an aggressor launch an unfair attack against their own land, some of them will even refuse to fight for it, just like this individual who told me, only a few days ago, that if the Russians wage war on Canada, one might as well let them set up a government in Ottawa: that is treasonable language.

In this respect, Canadians should read and, might I add, ponder the wonderful address delivered on Christmas Eve by His Holiness Pope Pius XII on Christianity's determination to maintain peace. There is no higher authority in the world than that. This address outlines the right attitude of Christians on the problem of peace.

While on the subject of His Holiness the Pope, may I remind the house that, for three years or more, several members of this house have asked the government to appoint a representative or an ambassador to the Vatican. May I, in this connection, insist upon such an appointment and hope it will materialize one day or another, and as soon as possible.

His Holiness censures those who believe in the ancient Roman saying: si vis pacem, para bellum, but also condemns the advocates of peace at any price or those whose actions will surely lead to war, unbeknownst to them.

The Pope draws a distinction between a war of aggression and a purely defensive war; the former, he rightfully condemns.

> Any war of aggression, says he, is a sin, a crime, an outrage against the majesty of God and the Designer of creation.

He recognizes, however, that a purely defensive war may become a necessity and an obligation.

> A nation threatened with unjust aggression or which has already fallen victim to such an aggression cannot passively remain indifferent, if it is to think and act as it must.

Further on he adds:

> . . . in order to determine, in the final analysis, whether it is normally permitted or even, in certain real circumstances, binding (as long as there exists a strong probability of success) to repulse an aggressor by force of arms, there is little use in considering only the tragedies and ills resulting from war or in attempting to determine, by close analysis, whether it is advantageous to intervene.
> There is however one thing that is certain. The obligation to keep peace is a divine command whose aim is the protection of the goods of mankind, inasmuch as these are gifts of the Creator. Among these some are of such importance to society that it is perfectly legitimate to defend them against unjust aggression.

These words, Mr. Speaker, seem to constitute a condemnation of those in our midst who hold that any modern war is immoral and of those who pretend that if Russia were to attack Canada, it would be just as well to allow the Russians to set up a government at Ottawa.

Furthermore a nation is not only compelled to defend itself when unjustly attacked, but it has a duty towards another nation unjustly attacked.

> . . . and all the more, said the Pope, should the interdependence of the family of nations forbid others to act as mere spectators in neutral apathy. Who could ever estimate the extent of the wrong done in the past by such indifference to a war of aggression, which is entirely foreign to the Christian spirit.

Referring to the possessions which one must defend against unjust aggression, he added further on:

> Their defence is even compulsory for the community of nations whose duty it is not to abandon a nation being attacked.

According to His Holiness, such indifference only serves to strengthen and encourage the perpetrators and fomenters of aggression while it compels the numerous nations which are left to themselves to ever increase their armaments. . .

> Such a view, under a disguise which is hedonistic and utilitarian, as well as materialistic in its source, continues His Holiness, is erroneous through not being founded on a strict general obligation. It brings about conditions which enhance the disillusion resulting from that sterile compromise; the attempt of everyone to save himself at the expense of others, which in each case is a guarantee of success for the aggressor.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, that is a condemnation of those who, in this country, in advocating neutrality at all costs, thus reject, in practice, the principle and the obligations of international solidarity in the case of a nation unjustly attacked. It is also what I deem to be a condemnation of those who, in attempting to save themselves at the expense of others, ensure the success of an aggressor. It is moreover a condemnation of those who, in Canada, believe that their country has towards the international community no duty but that of protecting its own territory in case of invasion.

The Pope also says, with reference to the obligation which the community of nations has not to abandon an unjustly attacked nation:

> The certainty that such a duty will be fulfilled will serve to discourage an aggressor, and thus war can be avoided, or should the worse happen, its sufferings will at least be lessened.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we find there what is, to my mind, the condemnation of those who, in our midst, reject the very principle of a collective defence pact against a war of aggression or who wrongly claim that they will thereby better succeed in avoiding any conflict and in serving the cause of true peace.

My only wish, Mr. Speaker, is that the few foregoing considerations will open the eyes of some Canadians who are led astray by false ideologies. As much as anyone else, I am all for peace, for peace based on right and Christian justice. I am in favour of it for myself, for all those who are dear to me, for all Canadians and for the whole world, but in order to obtain it, one must first have a clear notion of the duties of nations and of the nature of the present conflict which divides soviet Russia and the western democracies. This is why, most humbly perhaps but most sincerely, I wanted to set forth these considerations at the very beginning of the present session.

(Text):

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) undertook to compliment the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, so it is not necessary for me to do so.

Sitting here listening to this debate I thought the tone set by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) was rather unfortunate, and that it was also unfortunate that most of the time thus far has been spent in discussing this matter of dominion-provincial relations, who broke it down, who was responsible for it, and so on, something which I think has been settled in the public mind for some considerable time. We have been hearing that kind of debate when we should have been discussing the forecast of legislation, or the lack of it, contained in the throne speech.

I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) arguing with the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who only a short time ago led a coalition government in Manitoba. I could not understand why a Conservative in this house should argue with his former premier, who had his arms around the Conservative party in Manitoba for a considerable time. I must have a private conversation with the hon. member to find out just how that came about. It must be a private war; certainly it cannot be a political war, judging by the marriage that has been in effect there for a considerable period.

It has been suggested by hon. members to my right that the C.C.F. is just another adjunct of the Liberal party. What the Conservatives cannot understand is that the C.C.F. is a free party. If the Tories are right—though they never are—we can vote for them. When we think the Liberals are right, we can vote for them. Now I want to take just about five minutes of the time of this house to prove that, as far as the Conservative and Liberal parties are concerned, fundamentally there is no difference. They both stand for the same thing. They both believe in the system of free enterprise.

Mr. Graydon: So does Tom Bentley.

Mr. Gillis: They quibble about matters such as dominion-provincial relations; but let me remind the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) of just a few points of agreement between those two parties which I have noticed in this house since the termination of the war. During the war, controls were set up, materials were allocated, and the economy was partially planned. Let us see how many points the Conservatives and Liberals have in common. The first break in the planning of the economy was the increase in basic steel, farm machinery and so forth. The C.C.F. alone fought that increase in this house; the Conservatives and Liberals agreed to it. That was the first break in the economy which started off the inflationary spiral. That was free enterprise, and you wanted to get it back. Then you took off the price ceilings and charged what the traffic would bear. Both Conservatives and Liberals agreed that the ceilings should come off prices, that the law of supply and demand should regulate the economy. Then they agreed on the removal of subsidies; free enterprise again. Both Liberals and Conservatives agreed that subsidies should be taken off. The C.C.F. stood here alone—

Mr. Graydon: No; the communists were with you.

Mr. Gillis: —and argued for the maintenance of that planning of our economy, the use of subsidies and the control of prices in order to protect the Canadian people. So you see there is no disagreement between those who believe in the system of free enterprise, because those are the mechanics of free enterprise. Then the offices of the wartime prices and trade board were to be closed. We protested. We pleaded with the minister to maintain those offices across the country, because in them he had very good machinery he could use if prices began to get out of hand. Our friends to my right demanded that they be closed. They said, "Close these offices. They are staffed with bureaucrats; they are wrecking the country. We want Canada Packers to have the right to wreck it." So these offices were closed; again we had agreement between the government and the Conservative party.

Then there was the matter of the excess profits tax. We figured that tax should be maintained and that the revenue should be used to establish an over-all social security plan for this country; that the money should be plowed back in order to relieve misery, and used to hold down prices by means of subsidies on essential commodities. But our friends over here demanded that the excess profits tax be removed; the government acquiesced, and off it came.

In the matter of freight rates the same thing applied; both parties agreed that freight rates should be increased. I am just showing some of the points on which hon. gentlemen to my right have been absolutely in agreement with the government. Of course that is understandable; it is all free enterprise, so why the sham battle on dominion-provincial relations? In the increased freight rates the Canadian public take it on the chin; but again those are the mechanics of free enterprise, so away she goes. Commercial rents were doubled; no protest from the Conservative party there. Then they said, "Put oats and barley back on the grain exchange." Back they went on the grain exchange—the mechanics of free enterprise again. The two old machines believe in that system; and still they try to kid the people that there is really a fight between them.

Mr. Graydon: Just like you and the communists.

Mr. Gillis: Capital investment is uncontrolled; monopolies are unchecked. There was an 11-cent per pound increase in butter, with Canada Packers holding butter in storage. That was proven to the prices committee—and I did not hear anyone on this side of the house to my right, or anyone on that side, protesting against it. The protest came from the C.C.F.

So if the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) would examine the record tomorrow he would find that fundamentally there is absolutely no disagreement between himself and the Liberal party—absolutely none. He believes in the freest of free enterprise. He took off every control which protected the Canadian people—and I am saying this tonight only because of some of the statements made from that corner of the house to the effect that the C.C.F. is just part of the Liberal party.

All these controls I have mentioned we have sought to maintain, for the protection of the Canadian people; yet both the government and the Progressive Conservative party agreed they should come off.

With that brief digression I shall return to a discussion of the speech from the throne. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) presented an amendment to the house, and in that amendment suggested orderly marketing, stating that the government should set up machinery by way of import-export boards to market our commodities not only internally but externally.

While he was offering his amendment and making his argument in support of it, I was thinking particularly about our export trade, and our shipments overseas. I was thinking about the grave mistake we made in scrapping the merchant marine we had built up during the war. Today it is practically scrapped.

Canada exports about one-third of her total production. If there is any nation in the world which should maintain a strong and powerful merchant marine, then surely it is the Dominion of Canada. As we develop we are going to export more.

I have before me some figures which, because they surprise me, I shall put on the record. These figures come from the Canadian shipbuilding and ship repair association. I noticed in the speech from the throne a paragraph stating that the government is going to give assistance to the shipbuilding industry to build more ships. What I cannot understand is why we did not keep the ships we built during the war, and why we allowed crews consisting of thousands of men from the prairies and from the woods who trained themselves during the war as seamen—and very excellent seamen—to drift out of the industry we had built up. As I say, these figures surprised me. Our sea-borne exports in 1947 aggregated 18,001,435 tons. Of this amount Canadian ships carried only 19·9 per cent of the total, while the United Kingdom ships carried 43·5 per cent, United States ships carried 21 per cent and ships of other registry 15·6 per cent.

Canadian sea-borne imports in 1947 aggregated 9,836,283 tons, of which Canadian ships carried only 27·9 per cent, United States ships 45·9 per cent, United Kingdom ships 7·3 per cent and ships of other registry 18·9 per cent.

These figures are somewhat revealing. Just merchant seamen. They asked me to enter a before coming to this session I had a meeting in my section of the country with a group of protest with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier)—which I have already done—against the fact that Canadian shipowners were selling their ships either to Great Britain or to Greece, that Canadian seamen were being beached, and that these ships were not only taking our overseas trade from us but were also operating from port to port along the Canadian coast, thereby depriving us of our coastal trade.

That group told me that ships belonging to Dosco and another company were being sold, and that at least a thousand seamen living in that part of the country would be beached within the next two months because those boats were being sold, would be flying another flag and taking our coastal trade. Let me say that is something that is not allowed by any other country.

Great Britain has a section in her shipping act which prohibits such a procedure. No foreign ship is allowed to ply from port to port in the United Kingdom. The United States also has in its shipping act a provision which prohibits that kind of thing over there. We should have an amendment to our act which would prevent ships of foreign registry taking the coastal trade from us.

Mr. Hackett: Does it not contain that provision?

Mr. Gillis: No, it does not.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Can you name a foreign ship in Canadian waters trading between two Canadian ports?

Mr. Gillis: I can name a dozen.

Mr. Hackett: Has the hon. member looked up the statute recently?

Mr. Gillis: I was talking with the minister only a couple of days ago. I have in my office a brief provided by the Canadian seamen's union, which does a thorough research job on the shipping act. Their suggestion is that the act should be amended in the respect I have indicated. They say that when these ships are sold our own crews are taken off, that either Greek or British crews are put aboard, and that actually today they are running from port to port on the Canadian coast.

Mr. Hackett: Do they change registry?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Howe: They are not allowed to change registry.

Mr. Gillis: They are changing registry; and the reason for it is that the wage rates paid by the Canadian companies are much higher than those paid by the Greek and British companies. Therefore it is to the advantage of the Canadian company taking a commodity from Sydney to Montreal, for instance, to sell the boat, get a lower wage rate, ship in that way and cheapen the ship. That is becoming a serious condition.

Mr. Howe: I think my hon. friend is mistaken in his facts. In the first place, the ships were sold under the proviso that they could not be sailed without the Canadian flag; and if they do not carry the Canadian flag or the British flag they are not allowed to operate in the coastwise trade.

Mr. Gillis: I am not disputing what the minister says as to the intention; but that is not what is happening. The Minister of Transport is now checking the matter, because I discussed it with him since the session opened.

In addition to that, a bad situation is developing in that industry. I am suggesting that this country should build a merchant marine, and we should endeavour to keep the services of those men who were trained during the war to operate our ships not only along our coasts but on the seas. Because we should be concerned, not only about our coastal trade, but about taking that one-third of production which we export and hauling it in Canadian bottoms. Our imports should be coming back in our own ships.

I have placed these figures on the record; and if the minister thinks that in my presentation of the situation with respect to our coastal trade I am in error, then I would suggest that he talk with the Minister of Transport, and that he read the brief sent in by the Canadian seamen's union.

I have talked with the boys who are actually affected. In one instance they were taking a ship from Sydney to Halifax and passing it over to another crew. Those boys were going on the beach, themselves, and the crew taking over was not a Canadian crew.

Then, in the speech from the throne there is a suggestion of assistance to the steel industry on a fifty-fifty basis, for the purpose of expanding that industry. According to the statement by the minister, the companies have been asked to submit their plans and to take advantage of this offer, but that the only request received has been from the Steel Company of Canada. There is a statement in the press to that effect. I hope Dosco will take advantage of it because in my opinion that basic steel plant could be expanded considerably. I was just wondering if anything has been done about it.

For a few minutes I should like to focus the attention of the minister on this matter of expanding industry. In doing this I think some regard should be had for the whole country instead of attempting to concentrate industry in one particular province. I have here the Financial Post of October 9, 1948, which gives details of the industrial expansion in Ontario from the beginning of the war up to the date of that issue.

The expansion of industry in Ontario has been something terrific. Recently we heard about a power shortage in this province and everyone was blamed for it. In my opinion the industrial set-up in the province was expanded beyond the ability to supply it with power. There had been wrong planning in the allocation of industry in that province. The province simply did not have the power necessary to take care of the expansion in the industrial set-up.

I am going to give particulars of the step-up in production that has occurred in certain towns. In greater Toronto the population is up 9·3 per cent; production is up 142 per cent and employment is up by 72 per cent.

Mr. MacNicol: Over what years?

Mr. Gillis: Over 1939. Fort William: population is 32,000, up five per cent; production up 236 per cent; employment up 279 per cent. Windsor: population up 13 per cent; production up 129 per cent; employment up 63 per cent.

Mr. Howe: Give us Halifax.

Mr. Gillis: It is not here. Hamilton: population up 12 per cent; production up 130 per cent; employment up 60 per cent. They have the particulars here for 70 different cities in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Howe: The largest increase of all was in Halifax.

Mr. Gillis: I have not those figures here. Ottawa: population up 14 per cent; production up 76 per cent; employment up 33 per cent. I am not going to read all the figures into the record because I imagine hon. members have read them. If you are going to spend more government money or more money belonging to the taxpayers for the purpose of expanding industry in this country, I submit, what I have submitted time and time before, that first a survey should be made of our national resources and the possibilities of marketing our products. All these things should be gone into. If that had been done prior to the step-up indicated in Ontario by the Financial Post, I do not think there would have been a power shortage.

You can concentrate your population and your industrial set-up in one centre of the country just so long as your resources last. The time is coming when the east and west will not continue to supply the centre with raw materials and continue to live as the poorer relations by the sea. For example, the plant at Sydney is a basic steel plant producing about one-third of Canada's basic steel. I understand that under the steel control set-up today Dosco is not allowed to process its steel or to ship overseas. All that it can do under that control is to market its steel in Quebec and Ontario. In my opinion that is planning the wrong way.

[Mr. Gillis.]

I contend that the whole set-up down there was designed for the overseas trade. That is the natural market. As long as there is a steel shortage and we are faced with present conditions you can get away with the kind of thing you are doing, but it certainly is not making for prosperity in the maritimes. There are many resources down there that could be exploited. We should have a cement industry because all the ingredients are there and there is a terrific shortage right across the country. A tin plate industry should be established at Sydney and the steel that is made there should be processed and sold in the overseas market. I do not say that that can be done overnight, but there should be some planning in that direction. If you are going to lend money for shipbuilding you should not forget that there are in Nova Scotia yards that can turn out ships.

I suggest to the minister that this centralization of industry in one province, if continued, will wreck the country in 25 or 30 years. We should try to use the people and resources right across the country. It is wrong to have industrial concentration in central Canada and merely import people from the east and the west to operate that industry when they are needed, and when they are not needed send them back from whence they came.

There is another thought I want to leave with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) although it is not mentioned in the speech from the throne. Last session of the house we passed a national labour code. That is national in name but it is not national in actual fact. We had a very sensible committee working last year on this code and they wrote into it the voluntary revocable check-off provision. Every province in Canada with the exception of Ontario has a provincial labour code containing a check-off provision. None of the provinces can accept the national labour code as it is without that check-off provision, because it would mean a long step backward. They have not that provision by law in the province of Ontario and none of the other provinces will relinquish that right.

The committee on industrial relations should be set up and should endeavour again to have the check-off provision written into the national labour code. It was done before, but unfortunately, when it came to the house, a private member moved that it be removed and that motion passed. We now have on our hands something that no province except Ontario can use. That province has already accepted it, but the other provinces have no check-off by law.

There is another matter I was rather surprised to see was not mentioned in the speech from the throne. If there is one thing this country requires, it is a national fuel policy. The extent to which we depend upon the United States for fuel is deplorable. We are not making any attempt to develop our own resources, even in a slow way. As I have pointed out on other occasions, coal is the largest single importation into this country. Something like $147 million was spent for United States coal last year, and that represents a lot of United States dollars.

There is a capable coal board with jurisdiction over the province but it does not appear to be doing very much about developing these resources, either in the east or in the west. The fuel industry in Nova Scotia is shrinking rather than expanding. It is entering a period of retrenchment. You cannot attempt any more mechanization in an industry that is as highly mechanized at the present time as it can be.

Mr. MacNicol: They could use the new machines they are using down in the southern United States.

Mr. Gillis: Not in these collieries. You have a completely different operation. In the United States they are not six miles out under the Atlantic ocean. They have not got the roof pressure that there is in the Nova Scotia mines. They do not have to install timbers so closely. They are trying those machines now in Nova Scotia. I was underground a couple of months ago and had a look at them. I wish them luck, but I know that eventually they will have to take that equipment out because it is not suitable for the type of mining you have in Nova Scotia. Nevertheless they are trying to do something.

I say that the government itself, through the national coal board, should sit down with union leaders across the country, with representatives of the industry itself, and attempt for the first time to map out a fuel policy for Canada involving zoning of markets, development of new areas, and freeing of Canada from domination from across the border. It often amazes me to hear people talk about war with the United States. They would not have to go to war with us. All they would have to do would be to cut off our fuel in winter and we would freeze to death. It would close every industry in the country. That is all they would have to do, because we are dependent on them to that extent.

I mention this now because I want to provoke the thoughts of the minister who is responsible for the supervision of that board, so that he may get the board busy and be able to announce to the house before parliament adjourns some kind of policy for the marketing of our coal, and the development of our own resources. Then at some time in the future we will be as free as it is possible to be from our dependence on the United States at this particular time.

There is another matter I want to leave with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). I see he is not in his seat, but I noticed his deputy in the gallery a few moments ago. During the discussion on the national labour code we suggested to the minister at that time that there were certain industries in Canada that should be designated as national industries. For example, there is the packing-house industry. That organization extends from coast to coast, and is the same organization in every province in Canada. If the packing-house industry were designated a national organization and brought under the national labour code, then in the event of a dispute in that industry the federal government would have some jurisdiction in handling the matter. That was not done last session, with the result that after the adjournment of the house there were difficulties in the packing-house industry, and certain problems presented themselves. Every province in Canada handled the matter separately. No one could get together with them. We had a lot of trouble which could have been avoided. It would be a very simple matter to put that into the national labour code. I think the coal industry, the steel industry and the packing-house industry should be designated as national industries. I believe a council should be set up representative of the industry concerned, of the union, and of the Department of Labour. That council could meet from time to time with departmental officials to iron out the difficulties of the industry and avoid running head-on into the troubles that we have run into from time to time in these basic industries.

I see a time, probably in the not far distant future, when it may be the plan of certain people in this country to sabotage industry, to bring on strikes. With the decentralized machinery we have today for the handling of such matters, the federal government will be powerless to intervene in that kind of dispute. I think we should head off any development of that sort. It is coming; make no mistake about that. The way to head it off is by designating the basic industries as national organizations, and bringing them under the national labour code. Councils should be set up similar to what you have in the building industry, where there is very little difficulty. Those councils, consisting of representatives of industry and labour, should meet with departmental officials to iron out difficulties as they develop from time to time instead of allowing them to grow on a national scale when they become very difficult to handle.

I leave that thought with the Minister of Labour, and I suggest that as early as possible he should set up again the industrial relations committee for the purpose of discussing these two questions, firstly the check-off, and secondly the matter of these national industries. Then we will be able to get legislation of a type which will avoid trouble and friction in the future. I am going to say a few words on the matter of employment. As indicated by the Financial Post, there is a terrific increase in employment in Ontario towns.

On motion of Mr. Gillis the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: What is the business tomorrow?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We will continue this debate.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 1, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

NORTH ATLANTIC SECURITY PACT

PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT OF MR. W. E. HARRIS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the statement of the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister, reported by the press as follows—

"War with Russia may be an outcome of the signing of the north Atlantic security pact . . ."

Mr. Harris, parliamentary assistant to Prime Minister St. Laurent foresaw the possibility of war when the pact is signed in about three months' time.

"If the Russians feel they must make war, it will come at that time," he said.

—and the duty of the government to place before this house immediately all the facts and circumstances upon which this statement was based.

Mr. Speaker: I would call the attention of the mover of this motion to paragraph 3 of standing order 31, which reads as follows:

He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has leave of the house.

Hon. members know that the reason we have a standing order making it possible to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance is to take care of a situation in which the business already on the order paper does not give to hon. members any opportunity to discuss such a matter. In this house the practice has always been that during the debate on the speech from the throne hon. members have an opportunity to discuss practically any matter they may wish to discuss. Moreover, there is already before the house not only the motion to thank His Excellency the Governor General for his message, but an amendment and a subamendment. Since, therefore, it is possible for hon. members to discuss this particular question during the course of the address in reply, I believe it is my duty not to put before the house the motion made by the leader of the opposition, and to ask the house to proceed with the business which is already before it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I realize that the ruling is not debatable. I would point out, however, that we have no knowledge of when the vote will be taken on the motion for an address in reply. For that reason, with respect, I appeal your ruling.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been the practice in the house that there shall be no appeal from the opinion expressed by the Speaker under paragraph 3 of standing order 31. It is not a ruling the Speaker is required to indicate whether he thinks the motion is in order and whether the matter which it is proposed to discuss is one of urgent public importance. The practice, as I say, has been that there is no appeal from that expression of opinion. Moreover, the Atlantic pact is referred to in the speech from the throne. It is a matter which can be discussed in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. If the hon. gentleman who has made the motion fears that he may not have the opportunity of discussing it because he has already addressed the house in the debate, I would remind him that he has not yet spoken on the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and therefore is not precluded from again entering the debate. The subamendment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was moved after the leader of the opposition spoke on the main motion; therefore he can be heard at any time the subamendment is under discussion.

I have not seen the statement which the leader of the opposition has handed to Mr. Speaker. I heard it read. Apparently it refers to some statement made outside the house by a member of the house with respect to the Atlantic pact. I do not know that that is a matter which it would be in order to discuss in the house. But if an hon. member has expressed outside the house opinions which do not coincide with those held by others in the house, there will be full opportunity for expression of their opinions in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

North Atlantic Security Pact

Mr. Drew: Since the Prime Minister has explained the circumstances at some length, may I say that the matter under consideration is not the Atlantic pact, but rather a statement by his parliamentary assistant, to the effect that war with Russia may come within three months. The parliamentary assistant has pointed out that the most important consideration in the mind of the government is the problem of external affairs. If there may be war with Russia in three months' time, nothing should take precedence over the placing before this house of the information upon which that statement is based.

(Translation):

Mr. Maxime Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to discuss the merits of the motion brought forward by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). However, the Prime Minister stated a few moments ago that there was no appeal from the Speaker's decision in such a case. I do not know that any one of the standing orders prescribes that there is no appeal from a decision given by the Speaker. In the past, the Speaker decided to rule out certain motions which were perhaps not unlike this one, but it has always been recognized that parliament makes its own rules, and not the Speaker. The latter may interpret the rules but it behooves the members of this house to maintain or overthrow the decision. Now, when the Speaker gives a decision and decides afterwards that there is no appeal from his decision, it is up to parliament to decide itself whether the Speaker has given a good decision or otherwise in stating that there was no appeal from his first decision. In the past, we have been placed in similar circumstances and I, for one, would not like that to occur again.

(Text):

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Is it not a fact that already some of the parties to this pact have been making secret arrangements with Russia outside the pact? It looks to me as if it is a lot of moonshine. It binds Canada for fifty years; it gets us nowhere. It gives us no security whatever at a time when Russia is conducting a cold weaponless war and has already captured a large part of Asia and Europe and other parts of the world. This pact is all pact and no security.

Mr. Drew: May I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that in Beauchesne's parliamentary rules and forms, third edition, 1943, at page 747, the following appears—at that time Mr. Black was Speaker:

> The Speaker's refusal to permit an appeal from his decision that it is not urgent to adjourn the house for the purpose of discussing an urgent matter of public importance being appealed from was confirmed by the house.
> Mr. Ralston, from his place in the house, asked leave, under standing order 31, to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and stated the subject to be . . .

If hon. members wish me to read the content, I shall; if not, I will proceed:

> Mr. Speaker ruled that the statement was not in order and that the matter was not one of urgent public importance, and moreover that there was no appeal from his decision.
> Mr. Ralston appealed from the Speaker's refusal to permit an appeal from his decision.
> And the question being put by Mr. Speaker: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained; it was decided in the affirmative.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this clearly establishes the precedent that the ruling is subject to the test of a vote of the house.

Mr. St. Laurent: I agree with the leader of the opposition that if the Speaker rules that there is no appeal from the opinion he expresses, that is a ruling from which there can be an appeal. There is no appeal on the substantive opinion expressed by the Speaker that the matter is not in order and is not urgent. It is a roundabout way to get an appeal on what does become a ruling, if the Speaker rules that there is no appeal from the opinion he expresses.

Mr. Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): C'est exact.

Mr. St. Laurent: But he has not so ruled yet.

Mr. Drew: So that there may be no confusion in the matter, may I point out that my remarks were directed to the fact that this was not the practice. I would now ask you, sir, to make a ruling on the first point, so that it may then be dealt with in the customary way. The Prime Minister agrees that it can be done.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I have always taken the view that a ruling of Mr. Speaker sustained by the house in a previous parliament should not be binding on a succeeding parliament. Therefore I agree with the point made by the Prime Minister. But the substance of the motion moved by the hon. gentleman who leads the official opposition is such that we have to decide whether it is a matter of urgent public importance or not. While the statement of the parliamentary assistant is one which should be questioned, there is ample opportunity in the debate on the address to discuss it fully. Therefore it is not a matter of urgent public importance in the sense in which the word "urgency" is used in the rules of the house.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): The leader of the C.C.F. will be prevented from speaking on this subject of war until after his amendment to the motion for an address in reply is disposed of.

Mr. Coldwell: While I do not like the decision made by a previous Speaker disallowing an appeal from his ruling that a matter then before him was not of urgent public importance, in this instance there is no question of urgency; therefore I believe the Speaker's ruling should be supported.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal from the Speaker's decision, Mr. Drew having moved the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing the following matter:

A statement of the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister, reported by the press as follows: "War with Russia may be an outcome of the signing of the North Atlantic pact."

I decided that there was no urgency for the discussion, as the matter referred to was included in the speech from the throne now under debate.

From this decision, Mr. Drew appealed.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS

THE PRIME MINISTER—EXPRESSIONS OF CONGRATULATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called may I personally—and I am sure I speak on behalf of all those who are associated with me in this house—extend my very best wishes to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the occasion of the anniversary of his birthday. I was not sure at first whether the bowl of roses on the desk before him was a birthday tribute or was simply a collection in one bowl of the many roses we saw on an earlier occasion. But on looking up the Parliamentary Guide I found that this is the Prime Minister's birthday, and I desire to wish him many happy returns of the day.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May we also join in those congratulations?

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): This group also joins in the expressions of congratulation.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I sincerely thank the leader of the opposition and all the other members of this house for their cordial good wishes.

NAILS

PRESS REPORT AS TO SHORTAGE OF SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Newspaper reports, the accuracy of which I have checked, indicate that nails are in short supply.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fraser: I am glad that hon. members see the point. Nails are in short supply even for the winter demand. What does the department intend to do to speed up production for summer and fall work?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): May I say that my hon. friend's complaint is the first I have heard about the nail situation for some months. Production has improved considerably, and so far as I know, distribution is fairly adequate in relation to requirements.

Mr. Fraser: Production was up 8,000 tons last year.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fraser: This is important.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a supplementary question to ask, I suggest that he put it without any comment.

Mr. Fraser: I would ask the minister if he has had his ear to the ground. Evidently he has not, otherwise he would know that nails are in short supply. I shall send him the newspaper which makes that statement.

IMMIGRATION

GERMAN NATIONALS WITH RELATIVES IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources. Has the government given recent consideration to relaxing the immigration laws in order to admit to this country German nationals who have relatives in Canada?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): Towards the close of the last session I was asked the same question, and I gave a somewhat extended reply. All I can say at the moment is that so far no other decision has been arrived at. Frankly, the majority of the applications of German nationals for entry into Canada that have come before me in the last few months have been from Germans who fought in the enemy forces against Canada and our allies. We believe that there are many people anxious to come to Canada who have a greater priority than persons such as those to whom I have just referred. Nevertheless, the question is before us, and will be dealt with just as soon as circumstances warrant.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

OFFICER IN COMMAND AT MINGAN, QUE., AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Is a United States air force officer in command of the airport at Mingan in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I shall be glad to look into that. I had no notice of the question.

Mr. Julian H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): May I address a question to the Minister of National Defence? At this time has anybody in Canada, other than the minister himself, the power to appoint a United States officer as commanding officer of any depot of any arm of the Canadian forces?

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, if it were considered desirable in the interests of our common defence that that course be taken, it could be taken.

PRICES

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to ask the government this question: When may we expect the report of the Curtis commission on the high cost of living? All they seem to know about the high cost of living is in relation to what they consume themselves. It seems to me that all these commissions are a waste of money.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): If the hon. member will read the speech from the throne he will find the answer to his question.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the royal commission on prices submitted a report to the government? If so, when will it be tabled in the house?

Mr. St. Laurent: The chairman of the royal commission has written me that the report is in the printer's hands, and that he is urging the printer to get it out as soon as possible. As soon as it has been submitted to the government, it will be brought to the attention of the house.

FISHERY REGULATIONS

SEIZURE OF U.S. FISHING VESSEL "ARAHO"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries of which I gave him notice this morning. Has the United States fishing vessel Araho been released from seizure? If so, was any deposit made by the owner of such vessel?

Mr. J. W. MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): In the absence of the Minister of Fisheries, I will reply to the question of my hon. friend. As to the first part of the question—has the United States fishing vessel Araho been released from seizure—the answer is yes. As to the second part of the question—if so, has any deposit been made by the owner of such vessel—the answer is no.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR COMPLETION OF PROJECT IN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply if he is prepared at this time to answer the question I asked him yesterday concerning housing in Calgary.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I have not the information, but as soon as I have it I will answer the question.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

QUESTION AS TO SITE FOR PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION IN CHARLOTTETOWN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I have a question I should like to ask, of which I have given notice to the Minister of Public Works. Has the Department of Public Works selected a definite site for the proposed dominion building at Charlottetown?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The answer is yes. The location is in the block bounded by Richmond, Pownal, Sydney and Queen streets. There are twenty-one different properties, and expropriation proceedings have been authorized and are proceeding.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO DISALLOWANCE OF P.E.I. TRADE UNION ACT (1948)

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Nearly a year ago a delegation representing two major labour organizations in Canada waited on the then minister of justice and asked that the government disallow the Trade Union Act (1948) passed by the legislature of Prince Edward Island. Can the minister tell the house whether the government intends to take action to that end?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The hon. gentleman was good enough to give me notice of this question—but, as it happens, not quite sufficient notice, because it came to me about ten minutes ago. Nothing has transpired in connection with this matter in the Department of Justice since I became minister. I have made some rapid inquiries, but I would prefer to have the matter come down in the form of a return, or speak to it after I have ascertained the position from the other departments concerned.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, January 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, last evening when the house adjourned I had about concluded what I have to say. There is one point I want to clarify. During the course of my speech I raised some objection to the scrapping of our merchant marine. I made particular reference to the fact that as we were selling ships to other governments, other seamen were displacing Canadian seamen in the coastal trade. At that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and myself had a difference of opinion as to whether or not that could be done. I made the assertion that it was being done.

Since last night I have looked at the act, and I find it is even worse than I thought it was. The fact of the matter is that the Canada Shipping Act gives absolutely no protection to Canadian seamen in the coastal trade or otherwise. It is just the reverse. It makes provision whereby British crews can displace our own seamen without any regard for Canadian ships plying the coastal trade. The Canada Shipping Act is chapter 44 of the Statutes of Canada, 1934. I should like to refer to subsection 1 of section 663 thereof, which reads:

> No goods shall be transported by water or by land and water, from one place in Canada to another place in Canada, either directly or by way of a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation in any ship other than a British ship.

Not only does that not offer any protection whatsoever for our own seamen, but it makes provision for British ships to ply in the coastal trade. That is exactly what I was complaining about last night. Our own ships are being sold and are now under British registry. Our crews will deliver a ship at some port and they are then displaced by either British or Greek crews. That was my information.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt the hon. member? The position he was taking last night was that a foreign ship could operate in the coastal trade of Canada. The position he takes now is somewhat different. A foreign ship cannot operate in the coastal trade.

Mr. Gillis: I am taking exactly the same position I took last night. I am talking about building up a Canadian merchant marine. Last night I pointed out that one-third of Canada's production was exported; and if there is any country in the world that should maintain a merchant marine, it is this country. I am objecting to ships of British, Greek or any other registry plying our coastal waters, operating from port to port, displacing an industry we built up during the war. That was the objection I made last night. At that time I suggested an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act. I pointed out that Britain protects her own coastal trade. No ship, Canadian, Australian, New Zealand or any other, can engage in that trade.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry, but that is not the position; Canadian ships can operate in the coastal trade of Britain.

Mr. Gillis: You cannot. I am telling you that I discussed this matter only recently with merchant seamen who have been in Britain from time to time, and they have pointed out that in Britain you are prohibited from taking a cargo from port to port. The same thing applies in the United States. That is not the position in Canada. Instead of protecting our own seamen, the Canada Shipping Act makes provision for handing over the coastal trade of this country to ships of British registry. The information given me before I came to this session was that not only British crews were displacing Canadian seamen, but that the same thing was being done by ships of Greek registry.

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Gillis: In my opinion, a British ship is a foreign ship, absolutely. Whether or not the minister knows it, that information came from men actually engaged in the industry, who complained to me only a couple of months ago.

I still suggest that our shipping act leaves much to be desired in the way of protection for Canadian seamen even in our own export trade; and I strongly urge the minister to bring in some amendments to the Canada Shipping Act before the conclusion of this session. I should like also to leave with the minister responsible for the construction of ships the thought that we should develop in this country a Canadian shipping policy. We talk about making Canada a great nation, an industrial nation, and so on; but having in mind the fact that we are an exporting nation I think one of the first things we must do is see to it that we have ships that will carry our goods to the four corners of the world and bring back anything it is necessary for us to import. I believe the policy we are following is wrong. We followed it after the first war; we repeated it after the last war. We built up an industry and trained personnel, but as soon as the emergency of war was over we scrapped that industry, which would have meant so much to this country, and sent back to the woods, the fields and the farms from whence they came the personnel we had gone to a great deal of trouble to train.

Last night in my discussion I left with various departments several problems I thought should be handled immediately. I am going to mention them again so that they may be on the record.

First I suggested the development of a shipping policy for Canada and the building up of an adequate merchant marine. Then I pointed out to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) the fact that the speech from the throne mentions assistance in the expansion of industry. I pointed to the great concentration of industry in this central province, and put on record some figures to support my statements. I suggest now that if you are going to assist further in the expansion of industry in this country you should give some thought to the decentralization of what you have now in the province of Ontario, because the power simply is not here to handle any further requirements. Industry in this province has been overdeveloped to such an extent that we had blackouts this winter. So I believe some regard should be given to leveling up our whole economy by spreading whatever future expansion there is over the east and west, depending upon the resources available. I believe the concentration of industry in the central part of Canada is absolutely wrong.

Then I suggested a national fuel policy, something which is long overdue. I believe the national coal board is quite capable of working out something along that line, and there are members of this house who could help. I definitely believe we should get down to business and not only zone our own markets and arrange for the marketing of our own coal, but proceed with the further development of our own resources.

I suggested to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), who was not in his seat last night, that the national labour code should be opened up again. I believe that check-off provision should be corrected, and that the committee on industrial relations should be convened to deal with that matter. As long as that code remains as it is, without that check-off provision, at least eight provinces of Canada cannot accept it, because it would be a backward step in relation to the provincial codes already in existence. Therefore I believe that change should be made.

I also suggested that certain key industries in the country should be designated as national industries. One such industry is the meat packing houses from coast to coast. You all know the difficulties we got into last year because of divided jurisdiction. You could not get all the provincial premiers together and the federal government could not step in. As a result serious injury was done, not only to the industry itself but to the consuming public right across the country. I suggested steel as another industry that is basic to our whole economy. Fuel is another. I believe those three industries should be brought under the jurisdiction of the federal government. I believe that councils in industry made up of labour, management and the government, should meet from time to time for the purpose of ironing out the everyday problems of these three industries. Last night I suggested that the time may come when certain organizations in this country will have a policy aimed at sabotage and the bringing about of strikes. If that should happen, with the set-up we have today the federal government would be powerless to step in and do anything about it.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that I am a little over my time so I must conclude. I seriously suggest that the matters I have just mentioned be gone into, and finally I would urge upon the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) that he have a look at our shipping act, because there is nothing in it to protect the merchant marine in Canada as a Canadian industry. The fact of the matter is that it makes provision for British ships to come in and take over our coastal trade.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate—

Mr. Caouette: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to know if all members of this house have the same rights. Last night my name followed the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), and I was supposed to follow him. Today I find that three names are ahead of mine. I should like to know how the mistake occurred, if we all have the same rights; or if we do not, I should like to know it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I saw the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) when he rose; therefore it is my duty to call upon him now.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I wish first of all to extend my best wishes and congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). They have a difficult task before them. Perhaps because we are so close to current events we do not attach as much importance as we might to the role they have to play in Canadian affairs. I wish also to extend my best wishes to the new members who have come into this house, and who in due time will play their part in the affairs of this assembly.

I was glad to see in the speech from the throne a reference to the beginning of a national library. I recall that I mentioned this matter on a previous occasion, and I am glad the ministry has seen fit to make a start on it. It may not be a massive building of stone and mortar, but it can be an institution of learning for all Canadians.

I wish to say a word or two about national defence. I do not mean to say that I am any great authority on national defence, but there are some angles of the subject which I think we should examine fairly closely. What I have to say has no bearing whatever on the motion to adjourn the house this afternoon to discuss a matter of that kind. Possibly that emergency was in Nicolet-Yamaska and not in the House of Commons.

I have in my hand a clipping taken from a statement made by Benjamin Franklin in 1777. As I read it I was struck by the similarity of conditions existing then and now and the applicability to the present of the words he then used. This is the quotation:

> All Europe is on our side of the question as far as applause and good wishes can carry them. Those who live under arbitrary power do nevertheless approve of liberty and wish for it; they almost despair of recovering it in Europe; 'tis a common observation here, that our cause is the cause of all mankind, and that we are fighting for their liberty in defending our own.

How true that is today.

I have three observations to make about national defence. One is to ask for preparedness. The price of preparedness is not too great if it will avert wars. One of the things that helped to bring on two other world wars was the fact that our enemies thought we were weak. Another was "too little and too late." I am wondering if that phrase does not apply to our own conditions and those of our friends even today.

I wish to say a word about co-operation and understanding between the military and the civilian. I happened to visit Brigadier Sparling in London, Ontario. He is in charge of militia affairs there. He was inviting the civilians and the military to get together to see what the army, navy and air force business is all about. I think we might have a better appreciation of what the military are trying to do if we would do just that.

I wish to say a word or two in support of the flying clubs across the dominion. It is often through these flying clubs that many young men of ability are attracted to the air force, which is one of the great wings of our defence forces. At the moment, support of the flying clubs is meagre, and I think the Department of National Defence should pay a little more attention to the work that these flying clubs are trying to do throughout Canada.

I was glad to see in the speech from the throne mention of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. The cost may be great, but we seem to have millions of dollars to spend abroad, which we shall never have returned to us, and possibly we had better spend some of that money at home in developing our own country. After all, the building of the Welland canal many years ago helped to develop this country. Why would not the St. Lawrence seaway and power project be another great step forward for this nation?

While I am speaking about the seaway and the power project I should like to say a word or two about hydro, although probably there are some in the house who are greater authorities on the subject than I am. I am now considering hydro as part of the scheme of national defence; it is from that point of view that I approach this problem. If we are attacked, we must try to imagine what places are most likely to be attacked, thinking more particularly of the North American continent than of Canada alone. One of those places would be the Windsor-Detroit area, because of the vast industries that are located there for the manufacture of motor equipment of all kinds. Another would possibly be Sarnia, where our rubber plant is located, and Port Huron. Another would be Buffalo, Niagara Falls, Ontario, with its power development, and another the Hamilton-Toronto area.

I have here a couple of quotations or newspaper clippings that I wish to use. They speak of the building of auxiliary steam plants in those areas for the production of electric power. This would seem to me to be a foolish move. We hear a great deal about decentralization and how vulnerable might be the concentration of power in certain areas. Without beating about the bush, I say that in my estimation the place at which to build the steam plant is Port Stanley, Ontario, midway between the Windsor-Detroit area and the Buffalo-Niagara Falls area. It is close to the supply of steam coal, has a harbour, and is close to the Westminster power transformers and transmitters, which have recently been built. Power could be transmitted east, west or north without difficulty. Should a breakdown occur on any of the other power lines, this plant could be used to advantage in every direction. I seriously urge all those who have anything to do with considering plans of this kind that they consider also the aspect of national defence as well as some of the other aspects.

I now wish to refer to these clippings. One is from the London Free Press. It is an editorial discussing the St. Lawrence development and other plans. It says:

> Ontario can now go ahead with its plans for the construction of steam plants—and should waste no time.

Another editorial quotes the annual report of the dominion Department of Mines and Resources on hydroelectric progress in Canada during the year 1948, and goes on to say:

> These various developments and a steam-electric plant at Windsor with an ultimate capacity of 322,000 horsepower—

—are planned. Then further on it says:

> The federal department's report states that in addition to the building of the plants mentioned, the Ontario hydro is considering the building of a major steam-electric plant in the Toronto-Hamilton area . . .

I feel that this is an opportune time to have the matter looked into with a view to its application to national defence.

I want to deal for a moment or two with our present economic and monetary position.

Prior to the two world wars Britain was able to finance world trade. She had investments abroad; she had a merchant navy which transported raw materials from the various countries of the world to her shores where she processed them and exported them abroad. Through these investments she was able to finance world trade. That day has gone. Whether or not it will return, I am not in a position to say. In the period since those two wars no one nation has actually been able to take up the task that was laid down by Britain. Consequently we hear of dislocations in trade and a scarcity of dollars. We find our markets slipping from our grasp.

I shall use two or three quotations to emphasize my point. After all, money is a medium of trade. What we require today is a more flexible medium of trade than we now possess. Trade is stagnating because of the lack of a flexible monetary system. We would all benefit if we had a flexible monetary system. I would suggest that these bright boys in the various departments of finance of the world look into this question. Do not leave it until it is too late and we have a collapse.

The first quotation I shall use is taken from the London Free Press of October 1, 1948. It is taken from remarks made by Morris Sayre, president of the Corn Products Manufacturing Company. He said:

Along with trade barriers, Mr. Sayre indicates that one of the obstacles to world recovery and international prosperity is the unstable condition of most of the world's currencies. "For such stabilization," he declares, "it is necessary that there be some currency of unquestionable stability which can serve as a point of reference. Only the United States is today in a position to provide such a currency.

"The United States, then, should accept—as the world's greatest creditor nation—the responsibility for establishing free convertibility of United States dollars into gold."

The next quotation is also an editorial from the London Free Press. This paper was dealing with the bacon contract which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) mentioned on January 5, 1949.

The muddle underscores the iniquity of the whole artificial pyramid permitted to rise and to obstruct the movement of foodstuffs from Canada—and from other producer states—to those suffering from shortages or from actual want. It underlines the need, as agriculture minister Gardiner pointed out a week or two ago, for a new basis, a new approach to the whole problem of marketing.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said in Boston, as reported in the London Free Press of November 18:

"Too often we find that the tariff structure of your country makes it difficult, often impossible, for our goods to flow into the United States market. At times this is due to the nature of your customs administration rather than to the tariff itself, although generally your tariff is much more protective than ours."

Canada could supply manufactured and processed goods at a competitive price.

"We hope you will make it possible for us to sell them. We hope you will be prepared to import on a much larger scale. If we cannot expand our exports to you, we will have to achieve a better balance by curtailing our expenditures for your goods, services and tourist trade. It would mean less business for both of us."

These quotations emphasize what I have tried to say, that this lack of flexibility of currency is throttling world trade.

Some time ago nearly all the newspapers of Canada carried the story of an agreement that was entered into between this country—I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) signed the agreement—the United States and the United Kingdom. It was heralded as a step in the right direction. That step was the signing of an agreement to standardize the threads on nuts and bolts and other parts that are used in our military machines. If they were able to do that, it would seem to me that they ought to be able to standardize a currency that would be acceptable to these three countries and possibly to the other western democracies of Europe.

We hear that Newfoundland is coming into the Canadian confederation. We are not going to be poorer, neither is Newfoundland going to be poorer, because of that. We can use their money and they can use ours. We are going to buy their goods and we are going to sell them goods. The same thing applies to the other nine provinces. I cannot see any reason why we cannot do the same thing with other countries. While I am dealing with this Newfoundland question I should say that every Canadian welcomes the completion of confederation. We hope that we shall become better acquainted with our neighbours, and that we shall mutually benefit from this union.

Last session reference was made to the need for haste in getting certain governmental business before the house, and I shall refer to it again. The speech from the throne was somewhat curtailed at that time and it was not as effective as it might have been. This week the same thing has occurred. I might mention that for eighty years we have been hoping that Newfoundland would come into confederation. It is now to be rushed in, in a week. There did not seem to be any haste for a long time, but all of a sudden it is a hasty matter.

We were summoned here a year ago to discuss the Geneva trade agreements, and after a long session they are still to be discussed. Therefore that haste was apparently just a joke.

Another thing that is worrying many Canadians is government by royal commissions. We had a royal commission on prices; nothing was done about the high cost of living, but it got a problem off the government's doorstep. The government got rid of it for the time being. That may be a way to get rid of problems, but it does not solve them. The difficulty and the blame are still on the doorstep of the government. We have a commission on freight rates, but we also have the board of transport commissioners. It seems to me that they should not be afraid to go ahead and do the work for which they were established. The government should not pass over its duties in that way. After all, what is a government for, if not to carry on the business of the country? And the question of freight rates is the business of the country.

In the speech from the throne we notice that we are to have a commission which will cover everything from the cradle to the grave, and it will probably last until we are all in the grave. That seems to me to be another attempt to get rid of responsibility. Yet we come here and talk about such trivial things as the government chooses to worry us with.

I notice that they very kindly offer to return rental control to the provinces. If they wish on them a dead horse, the provinces will have to pay for the funeral.

I am pleased to extend congratulations to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) upon his appointment; it has proved to be a popular choice. We wish him well in the task ahead of him. It is a difficult one; and at this time I would point out to him, and to other hon. members opposite, some of the problems our people back home are worried about.

We hear a good deal from our friends to the left about the meaning of subsidized housing. All that subsidized housing means is that every farmer in Canada will not only pay for his own house but help pay for somebody else's.

I have another quotation from the London Free Press which I should like to place on record—and it may be that hon. members will form the impression that this is a pretty good newspaper. This is the report of a meeting of city council of June 30, 1948, when the mayor of that city used these words:

> We have had several housing schemes in London—and they were schemes all right . . . That's all federal government building has been—one experiment after another, and the people are the guinea pigs.
> They have a lot of high-paid help working on these schemes down at Ottawa and they have to keep those birds working . . .
> The private contractor doesn't ask for anything. He goes out and builds a house and pays his taxes and is a good citizen of London. Some of these other fellows aren't; they are just fly-by-nights, and they are not interested in London.
> The city contractor builds cheaper than a government contractor, and when he is finished you have a more desirable house.

I hope the new Minister of Reconstruction and Supply will take that into consideration.

Nothing was said in the speech from the throne about the creation of more consumer goods. So far as I could see, there was no reference whatever to labour. I did notice something about forest conservation, and that brings up an important problem, because we realize that in this country our forests produce an enormous amount of wealth. Much has been said but little has been done about that matter. The forests in western Ontario are rapidly diminishing.

In the setting up of income tax provisions for the future, allowance should be made for farmers who are prepared to set aside certain areas of their land for the development of wood lots. Hon. members will realize, as I do, that any farmer who will set aside a tenth or some other fraction of his acreage will not in his lifetime reap any great benefit from so doing. He will be dead and gone; but the generations following him will reap the benefits of his foresight. For these reasons I say that provision should be made in the income tax regulations to take care of planning of this kind. If the government were to do the same type of work on the same land, someone would be paid for it; but it expects the farmer to do this work for nothing.

I do not happen to be a lawyer, and for that reason what I shall say about the law must be limited. However, the changes made last year in the Criminal Code will be costly to the counties in Ontario. I refer to the amendment permitting trial by jury of petty offences. Costs will be extensively increased.

This is what Judge Ian MacRae said to county council in London, Ontario, respecting this matter:

> Wednesday night council heard Judge Ian MacRae outline the changes in the code, which would give persons charged with theft, false pretences, receiving and retaining stolen goods under a value of $25, assault (including assault occasioning bodily harm and common assault), obstructing a police officer, keeping a disorderly house and betting offences, the privilege to elect trial by judge and jury, or by a county judge only.

He pointed out that if those so charged were allowed to elect trial by jury, it would slow up procedure and delay justice.

Nothing is causing greater worry to the people of Canada today than the matter of taxation; therefore I shall take a moment or two to discuss this important problem.

I have before me a further quotation from the words of Benjamin Franklin, which, I suggest, we might well take to heart. He said back in 1758, a long time ago:

> Friends and neighbours, the taxes are indeed very heavy, and if those laid on by the government were the only ones we had to pay, we might more easily discharge them; but we have many others, and much more grievous to some of us. We are taxed twice as much by our idleness, three times as much by our pride, and four times as much by our folly; and from these taxes the commissioners cannot ease or deliver us.

I read the other day in a newspaper article that while Canadians pay $40 per person for alcoholic beverages they pay only $22 per person for milk. Probably the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) can do something about that.

In the field of taxation the man who is thrifty and hardworking is penalized. We penalize the worker and reward the shirker. Try to get away from that if you can.

We know of many nuisance taxes. In one small village in my constituency, a radio inspector created considerable disturbance, and I am sure the few dollars he picked up were more than lost in the cost of administration. In my view, radio licences should be abolished, as should be also the taxes on soft drinks and candy used to such a large extent by children. Surely we could remove these nuisance taxes.

In my view a curb should be placed on the procedure of forecasting budget proposals. We now see this practised to the extent that it appears in the speech from the throne. I hold in my hand a clipping from a much-quoted newspaper which points out that at Petrolia, Ontario, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture went out on a limb in his predictions of what the budget was going to contain.

Mr. Graydon: Not another one, surely.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I shall read a part of what he said:

A "sunshine" budget for Canadians in 1949, and in particular for the rural communities was forecast here today by Robert McCubbin, M.P. for Middlesex West and parliamentary assistant to Minister of Agriculture J. G. Gardiner. . . . "I realize there have been some hard feelings about income tax," said Mr. McCubbin, "but there is no need to fear. There is going to be some redress given to those in the lower income brackets."

For three years I have been asking for that very thing. If the Minister of Finance had come to me three years ago I would have told him what to do. It would have been done three years ago instead of waiting until there was an election. Some have said that this is an election year, but as far as I can see this is just a deathbed repentance on the part of the government opposite.

Just how serious is this matter of taxation? The government now taxes thirty cents out of every dollar the worker earns—nearly one-third. No wonder the worker does not have enough money to buy butter, milk, bread and some of the other necessities of life. No wonder he is complaining about high prices. The fact is that they are not as high as they seem, because nowhere in the world will so little labour buy so much food as right here. But that is just an indication that the farmer is not getting all he should.

A good deal has been said about the simplification of the income tax form, but the one I got did not seem to be any simpler than the previous ones. They are all simple when you have the answer.

When the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) moved the address in reply he stated that there should be more publicity men in the government. I suppose they are needed to bring out the good qualities of the government. They certainly will need a lot of them, even though there are hundreds employed already grinding out government propaganda. One of the most recent examples was in connection with family allowance cheques. This came out last week with a cancellation mark on the envelope reading "Recreation pays dividends".

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Martin: That depends on the point of view.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I think the name of the department of immigration should be changed to "department of frustration". This is an example of bureaucracy in reverse. For three years I have been trying to get permission for a family to come from Europe. There was a farm and a house all ready for them, but it took three years. I notice from the papers that a large number of displaced persons were brought into Manitoba under order in council. There was not even decent housing for these people. Blanket orders in council are being passed to admit nearly everybody under the sun. I do not know of any department that is so discouraging to work with or from which you get so few results as the department of immigration.

Agriculture is in a serious condition today. During the war years, glowing pictures were painted of what the government would do for the farmer when difficult times came along. He was told that he would be protected, but the story now is a little different. It does not take any great ability to sell scarce goods for less money than they are worth, and that is what has been done since the war began.

The reference to the by-election in Digby-Annapolis-Kings the other day was a good illustration of just how disappointing this can be. The government spent money down there with no results. We gave food to Europe with no results. They do not appreciate what was done for them. We have lost those markets. I feel rather sorry for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. Gardiner: Don't feel sorry for me; feel sorry for yourself. We will be around when you are gone.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): That is what you think.

Mr. Harkness: Are you going to starve us out of the farming business?

Mr. Gardiner: You made enough out of your hogs.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The gamble has been lost. If ever there was a gamble in food, it was the action taken by this government. It is not so bad to gamble, but it is bad to lose. What has happened in connection with the contracts for foods that have been consummated? Two thousand million dollars lost. Our farmers are worried. For a few minutes I should like to refer to the position in which the Canadian farmer finds himself.

Who has these contracts now? Poland has one for $600 million, and other iron-curtain countries have other contracts. By the way, we could use some of the steel that is being sent to iron-curtain countries. We could exchange wheat, poultry products and other things for that steel. What about these pacts with the U.S.S.R.? I should like to quote an article which appeared this morning in the Ottawa Journal, as follows:

> Secretary-General Harry Pollitt of the British communist party said here today that soviet exports would be "an important factor in bringing down exorbitant American and Canadian prices for wheat."
> Addressing a meeting, he said the world "may get a surprise shortly at the amount of wheat the soviet union could put into the wheat pool."

Would socialist Britain like to destroy the free economy of Canada and the United States? If so, will the failure to buy our products help to bring that about? What about this myth of stability in connection with cheese, butter, flax, soybeans, wheat and white beans? The farmers of southwestern Ontario are worried about markets for their special crops and I should like to say a word or two about white beans.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): I would remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): If I may be allowed to conclude, I shall be very brief.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): By unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The bean marketing organization has a quantity of beans. A market was found in Australia for between 50,000 and 75,000 bushels of Canadian beans. The money was available and the price satisfactory, but the socialist Australian government refused an import permit. They decide, as they do in all other countries, what they think is good or bad for their people. The Australian people lost the opportunity to obtain these beans, and Canadian farmers are stuck with beans they would like to sell. That is an indication of what is going on in the world when a government can decide what they think people ought to have.

While the minister and his assistants were abroad seeking more contracts for Canadian food products, the Supreme Court of Canada kicked the Canadian farmers on the shins over the Dairy Industry Act. I would suggest that the supreme court take a look at some of the laws this government has passed in the last few years. I do not believe any of them would stand the acid test. One instance is that of the jeweler in Pembroke who was fined for not collecting money for the government when he was not being paid to do so.

Mr. Sinclair: Did the Tories not have a resolution on margarine at their national convention? You agreed with the supreme court.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Roland Beaudry (St. James): Mr. Speaker, the other day the official opposition expressed some surprise at the frankness with which we speak on this side of the house. Today, even at the risk of again jolting the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), I am going to speak my frank opinion on one or two topics. First, I will be frank with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). When the time has come to deal with minor matters I will resume with the member for Carleton (Mr. Drew) the discussion on frankness which he opened the other day with the member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), and which I understand was more or less kept alive by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) yesterday afternoon.

Let us tackle important matters first. I should like to be candid and frank with the Minister of Finance, and I am very appreciative of the fact that he is in the house now. I do not like his income tax policy, and my constituents do not like it either, which makes it unanimous in my constituency. I did not like it last year; I did not like it two years ago, and I told him so in the house. I am glad to be able to say that my words bore fruit because last year the Minister of Finance found it advisable to grant certain measures of relief which I had advocated for those Canadians getting along in years.

This afternoon I should like to offer another suggestion, and I do so purposely at this stage of the session. I suggest that the minister give full implementation to this suggestion in his coming budget. It springs in part from optimism, but it is about time that we on this side of the house were optimistic. One look across the aisle surely justifies it. We were told to expect world beaters, but we have come up against nothing but almost obsolete prize ring technique. We are sold Gorgeous George, and all we find is a new hair-do. We are told about the big apple from Carleton, so different from the Neepawa brand, but all we find is the same pippin next to the same Peel.

It is time we on this side of the house were optimistic in money matters. Three years' official pessimism has brought us a total surplus of almost $2 billion. I do not think we run any great risk of being tagged as spendthrifts if we should err slightly through optimism. During the last three years our ministers of finance have demonstrated that surpluses are an excellent commodity. But that has not made them any more digestible to the Canadian stomach. Today I should like to suggest that a change of diet is definitely indicated, and that, of all social legislation, advanced as we are in that field, thanks to this government, perhaps none would be more to the point than that which would recognize the sometimes overlooked rights of the present as against the future.

No legislation would bring more clearly to the people of Canada the almost phenomenal achievements of this government in the field of financial administration than such legislation as would substantially decrease the burden of the Canadian taxpayer in the face of our present commitments, both for social purposes and perhaps for the defence of our country. I have enough faith in the skill of our administration to warrant, in the year 1949, the introduction of substantial tax reductions, and when I say substantial I mean substantial. More concretely, I am about to advocate that in the next budget the Minister of Finance be prepared to decrease the total individual income levy by slightly less than 50 per cent in the over-all amount.

Here may I say this. Three years ago the Minister of Finance and his experts missed the mark—to their advantage, mind you, and to the advantage of the people of Canada—by some $300 million. Two years ago they overshot it by almost $700 million, and in the year now ending it seems fairly safe to foresee that our surplus will equal the previous one, if it does not exceed it. There is little consolation in that for those on the opposite side of the house who would like to tell the country that they can do a better job of Canadian economics. We sometimes overlook the fact that this has been achieved in spite of most considerable tax reductions since the end of the war. While we grumble we forget to look at the facts, but it is a fact that for those who constitute the largest single group of taxpayers, by marital status and income brackets, the group of single taxpayers earning between one and two thousand dollars a year, the average tax, which in 1945 amounted to approximately $215, was successively brought down in 1946 to $165, to $127 in 1947, and in 1948 to approximately $100. It is $100 in 1948 for the taxpayer who paid $215 in 1945. That is quite a reduction, but he still pays $100.

I stated at the outset that I should like to urge the Minister of Finance to continue his policy of decreased income taxation for the individual by bringing down a budget which this year would levy approximately half of what has been levied in the last few years. I well appreciate that this seems a drastic departure from his carefully considered decreases of the past, but I am also thinking of Canadians throughout the country who feel more and more that this country was not built in a day, and that it does not necessarily follow that because one generation incurred the expenditure of war that same generation must also bear the brunt of its cost.

The current method of computing the net taxable revenue of Canadians has been in use since the introduction of income tax for war purposes in 1917. During the intervening years various rates of taxation have been enforced, and various scales of deductions have been set to establish the net taxable income. These deductions, however, have constantly been uniform for all categories of taxpayers regardless of their income and their responsibilities towards dependents. They have failed to take into consideration certain vital factors which have become more obvious than ever in recent years. The only departure from the general rule happened in the years 1942 and 1943, when the exemption for dependents was granted on the amount of tax payable instead of from the gross amount of the taxable income, as is again the rule.

At all times this process has failed to recognize the actual basic needs of each taxpayer translated into dollar values on a day-to-day basis. Nor have we allowed for the fluctuation in the dollar value, computed on the basis of the cost of living and its corollary, the scale of wages and salaries; nor have we established a difference in the actual needs of each taxpayer and his dependents in relation to the taxpayer's income. In recent years this omission has brought about further hardship to the taxpayer because of its failure to recognize the very swift changes in the cost of living and the swift modifications in the wage scale, with the result that to a large extent wage increases have been nullified by the operation of the income tax assessments.

Since earning power and earned revenue have shown a tendency to move with the cost of living, in recent years at least, and more so in the lower brackets, it follows that the arbitrary, inflexible exemptions tend to penalize the taxpayer during periods of high wages and high cost of living. Furthermore it has been shown that under these conditions the present method of taxation has had the effect of discouraging increased production in terms of man-hours. Since the elaborate plans of the present government for the industrial expansion of Canada find their most valuable adjunct in the resources of labour, it is in the interests of this country as a whole that the income tax structure should not deter the wage earner from increasing production.

I am fully aware that no perfect method can be devised to provide each category of taxpayer with a full measure of equal justice. The application of two principles I am about to advocate, however, would have some immediate results. The first would be that of recognizing and effectively dealing with the fluctuating dollar value in terms of wage rates and purchasing power. In the second place they would provide for the difference in the obligations of various categories of taxpayers by income brackets, in keeping with their income.

So I would advocate—and I bring them to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott)—two principles. First, that an earned income exemption be added to the basic exemption granted each taxpayer according to his marital status, and that in this case it be an amount equal to 20 per cent of the taxpayer's earned income, with a maximum deduction of $1,500 for a single taxpayer and $2,000 for a married taxpayer; in other words that this exemption on earned income should apply to a maximum of $7,500 earned income in the case of a single man or woman and $10,000 in the case of a married taxpayer.

Second, that the dependent exemption, now set at $100 or $300 depending upon the reception or non-reception of the family allowance, be discarded; and that the dependent allowance be set at 10 per cent of the taxpayer's earned income for the first three dependents and 5 per cent of that same income for each dependent above three, again with the limitation of $10,000 upon earned income.

May I take this opportunity to quote to the minister some results which would be brought about by the application of this principle, based upon the rate of taxation for 1947-48. In the case of a married man earning $1,500 and paying in 1947 some $83 and a somewhat but not considerably smaller amount in 1948, the extension of this principle would involve the payment by that taxpayer of $6 in 1949. It would also imply, by the operation of both the dependent and earned income allowances, that in practice no single wage earner receiving less than $960 would be taxable, and that no wage earner with marital status earning less than $1,960 would be taxable. It would also mean, going a little higher in the scale, that a married man with one dependent would be taxed $17.50 on yearly earnings of $2,300; a married man with two children would be taxed $3 when he reached an income of $2,550, and a married man with three children would not be taxable until his earnings reached $3,000.

I appreciate that the application of this principle may not deal a full and equal measure of justice to certain taxpayers, but in my opinion it provides a great deal more than is provided now by the system under which we have been operating since 1917; and there are instances of this. The operation of the exemptions, set at $100 or $300, means that in what you might call the comfortable middle class bracket, each taxpayer gains from the state an actual amount of $20 for each child he has to feed, clothe, bring up and educate. It is true that we brought in the family allowance legislation in 1945 in order to help each Canadian family bring up, clothe and educate its children; but it is also true that to a considerable extent the operation of our income tax legislation has foiled the purpose of the family allowance provisions, at any rate in those brackets over the $4,000 mark.

I would point out that the growth of Canada in essence is based upon the growth of our families. I believe the Minister of Finance should find it, not only possible, but easy, to grant the application of my first principle, because while it may be new in Canada it is not new elsewhere. It has been applied in many other countries for a great many years, notably in Great Britain. And I think it would follow that if the application of the first principle is sound for Canada, the application of the second principle, which is based on the theory of aiding the growth of Canadian families, should also be found very easily justifiable.

There will be other opportunities to discuss this point at greater length. I am introducing it today, however, in order that the minister may give it full consideration; and before concluding on this topic I should like to bring two or three points to his attention. Applying the income tax legislation in this fashion would immediately mean, that on the basis of the Department of National Revenue statistics for 1947 we would immediately lop off from the taxation rolls of this country the names of 724,025 taxpayers. I also contend that since, in all categories or in all brackets under $3,000, the amount of collectible taxes would be extremely low, we could also eliminate the necessity of weekly payroll deductions and thereby eliminate not only the inconvenience but the expenditure which it brings both to the Department of National Revenue and to every Canadian employer. I do not need to add that the operation of this plan would create a much more rational difference between taxpayers according to their incomes and their responsibilities. The minister may argue that this application would lop off too much revenue. We shall get into that subject when we discuss the budget. But let me say here that the extension of the 1948 figures, and those of 1947 for that matter, based on this application, proves to us that under the same scale of taxation as that used in 1948 our national revenue would still be quite sufficient to provide us with a surplus.

I should like to resume the discussion on frankness which the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew) opened up the other day. I am sorry to see that he has not seen fit to remain in the chamber, although I told him at the outset that I should like to discuss frankness with him.

Mr. Graydon: No aspersions, please. The leader of the opposition has been called out on urgent business, and I do not want any aspersions made with regard to his motives. The hon. member hardly does himself justice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Beaudry: May I point out that the leader of the opposition went to some pains on the first day of the session to stress his knowledge of the rules. His statement seems to have been highly restrictive. There is one rule which he apparently does not know; and it puts his frankness at a small disadvantage: That of not being believed.

There is one rule which is paramount in this country. It is a rule that has been rigidly followed by the one who was Prime Minister of Canada for over twenty-one years, and by the one under whom I now have the honour of serving this country. This rule is this: Throughout the breadth of this land, whether it be in British Columbia or in the maritimes, in Quebec or in Ontario, it is considered good form to translate one's thoughts and one's statements literally; to show no divergence of thought or of expression according to the setting. And to be recognized as a man of political honesty in whom Canadians can place their faith, one's sequence of statements should at least dovetail. This is a rule which has been followed in the house by most hon. members who for years have striven to achieve and attain Canadian solidarity. It might be well for the leader of the opposition to acquaint himself with that rule. It would be too late to serve his party's purposes, but he will at least be in step with the rest of the country, even if only in the rear ranks.

My constituents, and those of a great many other members of this house, were not a little amazed last week when they heard of the leader of the opposition entering into a discussion on frankness. They are aware that he has recently become the official prize profferer of the pro-cons and that, as such, he has let it be known that he and his followers would revise the family allowance upwards. When they read this, my constituents were amazed that the hon. member would discuss frankness, because they think of him, they remember him, they know him, as the man who in 1944 stated, and I quote the Globe and Mail for August 10, 1944—

Mr. MacNicol: That is a good paper.

Mr. Beaudry: It is good enough for this purpose.

Mr. Sinclair: Accurate reporting.

Mr. Beaudry: The quotation is as follows:

> "But I assure you", said Premier Drew, "that the government of Ontario intends to do everything within its power to make sure that this iniquitous bill does not go into effect. It is not this bill alone, but the whole principle involved which we intend to resist."

Perhaps the hon. leader of the opposition is as well read as he claims to be well travelled and well informed in the customs and mores of the various parts of our planet, in which case he will have no difficulty in recognizing the following quotation:

"Men live by potatoes. . ."

The quotation is from Lin Yutang, from a book which is appropriately entitled "Between Tears and Laughter." It follows a chapter entitled "Government by music" which, for our purpose, we would change to "Government by glamour."

An hon. Member: What about yourself?

Mr. Graydon: We have it already, with the present government.

Mr. Beaudry: The hon. member may peddle his potatoes from province to province. He may extol their merits and tell us how good they are for us. But there is one thing that he cannot do. He cannot force us to like them. And when Canadians do not like something, they have their own way of showing their dislike. Our potato peddlers will find that out very shortly.

Mr. Graydon: The hon. member and the communists are together on that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Peel cannot take it.

Mr. Graydon: Oh yes, he can. It is easy to take.

Mr. Beaudry: I wish to quote from a radio broadcast of August 10, 1944.

An hon. Member: Oh, come up to date.

Mr. Beaudry: I will. Too soon for you. The quotation is as follows:

> Mr. Drew termed the family allowance bill an "obvious bribe" and said "there was every reason why this measure should meet with approval in Quebec where there was a very important election approaching."
> The premier asked: "Are we going to permit one isolationist province to dominate the destiny of a divided Canada? I hope that each one of you will answer with a resounding 'no' which will be heard in every part of the province of Quebec."

Is that the basis on which the leader of the opposition would establish his provincial-federal relations? If it is, he may find some slight disturbances on the benches behind him. What will the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Heon), and the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) say to their constituents? Will they explain to them that their leader's attitude in the matter of federal-provincial relations is that Ontario or British Columbia or the maritimes should not each take its share of federal responsibilities if it entails Quebec participation in benefits?

And what applies to Quebec and Ontario can apply just as well to British Columbia and New Brunswick, to the prairies and the maritimes. Or will they tell their constituents that their duty to them—and that is their first duty—cannot abide their leader's peculiar philosophy? Or will they, in the interests of their party, sacrifice what vestiges of pride are left among those sitting opposite us and urge them to follow him who had naught but contempt for them in 1944? It matters little what attitude they take. Those potatoes are not palatable in Canada.

"An iniquitous bill," according to the 1944 version. "Family allowances should be increased," according to the 1949 version. Frankness! That is the type of frankness which brings melancholy tears to some but to most only a derisive smile. Frankness—with whom? Surely not with himself, unless the hon. member would plead that he has not attained sufficient maturity of judgment to pass on the merits of a question at the outset, and that in all things this country may expect from him that his positive opinion today may become his negative opinion tomorrow. Frankness with whom? Surely not with the people of Canada, unless the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) would plead that his original judgment had been erroneous. But can the people of Canada accept the plea of error in a matter that is vital to every family in Canada, and from a man who would seek to lead the people of Canada?

To lead this country into error has been the fate of his party in the past. We recall the 1930 bombast and the 1935 repercussions; but at least in those days error was not a premise but an unfortunate conclusion. Today, however, error becomes a premise, for the leader of the opposition, wooing votes, has to answer two counts before the opinion of Canada: extreme fallibility or extreme disregard for frankness; because either the hon. member for Carleton expressed in 1944 some views which he has completely reversed in 1949, a fact which would betray a strange immaturity of thought and judgment in one who would be presented to us as an oracle; or without having changed his 1944 views, "I shall never allow this iniquitous bill to pass", he becomes what he might term candidly frank in expressing the opposite thought. But that type of candid frankness smacks too much of something else to induce the people of this country to follow him in the path of unadulterated truth.

A gentleman outside this house whose command of the English language is much superior to mine said to me one day, "I am utterly but not unalterably opposed." That is one explanation the leader of the opposition might give Canada. But let me say this.

Mr. Graydon: Do not let him get under your skin in that way.

Mr. Beaudry: It will be lost upon all those people throughout Canada upon whom the subleties of the English language are sometimes lost, and the fully bilingual ones will find it extremely difficult to reconcile the siren's voice, in French, with the original English version. I will assure the hon. members who are sitting with and behind the leader of the opposition that they will be given excellent cause to realize the reason for the motto of the province of Quebec "Je me souviens"—I remember.

Mr. Graydon: That is what you said last July.

Mr. Beaudry: The cause of frankness which the hon. member and his cohorts served so well in 1944 will be served again in the next election. The suit of armour of that valiant knight of frankness gapes a little bit at the seams and discloses just a speck of the electoral singlet which it covers. Canadians from all parts of Canada, and Canadians from Quebec, side by side with Canadians from the other eight provinces, will judge that pure unadulterated expression of sentiment shone forth a great deal more clearly in the provincial era than it does in the federal arena.

This country has a way of expressing itself, and he will be condemned because he withdrew in 1944 what he drew in 1949, because he proffers now, in the interest of a lost cause, what he scoffed at five years ago. He will be condemned because he has shown conclusively to this country that either his judgment or veracity is not above reproach. I am not imputing motives, nor am I questioning the veracity of the hon. gentleman. He can establish both his veracity and the soundness of his motives. All he has to do is to tell the people of Canada, in this house, that he was right in 1944 and that he spoke his opinion frankly, and that he is right in 1949 and that he is still speaking his opinion frankly. No one will question his word, but many will doubt his wisdom and his ability to see much farther than his press notices.

Perhaps I should remind hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house that when this country looks for a leader it expects to find in him not only frankness and wisdom and farsightedness—

Mr. Graydon: That was all threshed out in Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. Beaudry: Yes! That explains why we sit on this side of the house and why the hon. gentlemen led by the versatile member for Carleton still sit on the other side in spite of that impressive curtain raiser.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, that curtain raiser reminded me somewhat of the old days of vaudeville when the curtain raiser was inevitably devoted to the acrobats. The featured stars waited until they were sure that they would not be dazzled by the footlights. But they were the ones who brought the house down. The hon. member's acrobatic handlers of the twenty-four sheets might well keep that in mind.

When the hon. member's wisdom or foresight is questioned, perhaps the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) would constitute himself the explanatory ambassador. Last September he professed to have a great deal of familiarity with my constituents' desires for both veracity and sagacity.

Or shall it be found preferable to have an uxorious explanation.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who has put up quite a case for the rights of man, might not like that. It might, in fact, bring tears to his eyes, with or without benefit of photographer.

Let me put their minds at rest.

Neither Catherine the Great, nor Ivan the Terrible, nor the consort of Catherine, have much influence on our schools of thought in this country. Canadian thinking is uncluttered by side issues. In Quebec, as in Ontario, we deal with facts more than with explanations. And there are so many facts to the credit of this side of the house and there will be many explications boiteuses coming from the other side.

The best we can expect is that Canada will charitably comment that the hon. member for Carleton is quite a jokesmith, which will no doubt add to his acrobatic lustre.

This should bring some balm to Neepawa, and it should encourage Eglinton and Lake Centre to hope that the flowers that bloom in September are not necessarily perennials.

Since the well-travelled member for Carleton claims to know something of the customs and mores of Rome, as was evinced earlier this session, may I suggest to him that when he rises again to uphold his motion of non-confidence he add a preface to it: Ave Caesar, morituri te salutamus!

Since his versatility does not extend to languages, may I offer him a translation.

(Translation):

Mr. Prime Minister, we the Conservatives, who are about to disappear through a lack of frankness or of judgment, bow to you.

(Text):

Mr. William Irvine (Cariboo): I can at least agree with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat in one particular thing that he said. I think perhaps I shall hardly have as much faith in it as he seems to have. He said that Canadians deal with facts. I hope they do, and in that hope there are one or two or more facts that I want to bring before this assembly, and which I hope will filter through to the country at large. The first fact is that we have in Canada a number of great monopolies and great cartels.

Next, these great cartels and monopolies are detrimental to the best interests of the common people of this country. The next fact is that these cartels not only challenge the liberties and freedom of the common man in his economic life, but also challenge democratic government. The next fact is that in the speech from the throne there is nothing about this great evil which, to my mind, is the most challenging of all the evils in Canada today.

I have no doubt the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is a "great evil"; he has been challenged. But this great monopoly has not been challenged either by the government or by the leader of the opposition. A monopoly is a large business or industrial concern controlled privately by a few, and which has the power, regardless of how that power may have been acquired, to fix the prices of goods in accordance with profit motives, the power also to restrict production as an excuse for keeping the prices of goods at high levels. Thus, through their economic power, they exert undue influence both on the domestic economy and the foreign policy of the nation.

Are there such monopolies in this country? I scarcely need stop to prove that. I would refer back for a moment to the report of the Stevens commission of some years ago, in which it was clearly demonstrated that not only did we have at that time in Canada great monopolies, but that they were very active.

Since that time several investigations have been made. I refer in particular to the McGregor report, a copy of which I hold in my hand, and which clearly shows that there are in this country large monopolies. I need hardly refer to the fact that certain industries in this country have been challenged recently in that respect. The dental supplies industry, for example, and the bread-producing industry were both regarded as being subject to court procedure; but so far as I know no proceedings have yet been taken against either of them. However the monopolies are there; of that there can be no question.

If one asks how they got there, the reply would be, as is shown in Mr. McGregor's report, that they came through a perfectly natural process of private enterprise competition, where in the early stages competition was rife, keen and honest, and at such time prices were kept down because of the competition. Gradually however the weaker ones were weeded out; and eventually only the more astute, and the more able and cunning were left. They proceeded from that point to amalgamate or to merge into great monopolies, or to take some other form of getting together.

As a matter of fact, here are some of the practices of cartels, showing how they get together. As is pointed out at page 62 of the McGregor report, there are agreements in the fixing of prices, agreements to allocate territorial markets, agreements for the restriction of production, agreements for the restriction of exports, agreements for the restriction of productive capacity, agreements to restrict the exploitations of inventions, agreements not to supply or to deal with non-cartel members, agreements providing for differential prices, agreements not registered in accordance with the plan for international registration.

So it can be seen that they come about in a perfectly natural way. Some of our monopolies are real mergers operated under one management. Others are monopolies by agreement—and agreements which are most difficult to call in evidence when they are found to have violated the laws of Canada. These agreements are invariably silent; they are not signed and made public. For these reasons they cannot be used in evidence. But usually they are most effective, because it turns out that the same price is charged for the same commodity all across Canada at the same time.

Then there are other kinds of monopolies, one of which is known as natural monopolies. Some monopolies are very large—they might be called the mastodons of the industrial period. These are known as international cartels, and here are some of the typical ones: Farben and General Electric, in Germany; du Pont in the United States; Vickers-Armstrong, Unilever and Imperial Chemical Industries in Great Britain; International Nickel, Aluminum Company of Canada and Canadian Industries Limited in Canada.

I am not trying to give all the names, but have sought only to give typical Canadian, British, American and German international cartels. There are others which are still at a national level. Some of these will remain at that level, while eventually others will graduate into the international field. Among these might be mentioned the Bell Telephone Company, Imperial Oil Company, Imperial Tobacco Company, General Electric, the steel companies, farm implement companies, packing plants and banks. These are all monopolies in Canada.

A monopoly, sir, is the fullest development of the capitalistic system. It is the flower of private enterprise advocated not only by the government but also by the official opposition and the Social Credit party to my left. It is from this flower of private enterprise that the working bees gather the honey to feed the drones of big business, and keep them sweet.

I am protesting against monopolies in this country, in the first place because through the concentration of economic power, without responsibility for public policy, a monopoly is the greatest of all threats to freedom and democracy. Monopoly limits the economic freedom of the working people, of the farmers, of the small business people generally.

That is done in this way. Let us notice what happens when their basic industries of a monopolistic character like steel raise prices. As soon as they do that, being basic industries, they start a rise in the price of every commodity which the ordinary man needs for his living. By raising the price of steel they raise the price of bread, they raise the price of clothing, they raise the price of furniture, they raise the price of nousing, they raise the price of everything that the working man or the farmer or the small business man of this country requires for his life.

What is perhaps as bad is that while they raise these prices they are not recognized as the ones who have done it. They are behind, not the iron curtain but the great silken curtain of industrial and free private enterprise hypocrisy. They are so far behind that the common man does not see them there, so he quite often blames the local merchant for putting up the price of this or that, whereas it was really put up by the basic industry that had authority and power over the government to fix its prices as they pleased in order to maintain its high rate of profit.

By this concentrated economic power they are able to foist economic tragedy upon the nation at any time they like. They have done it time and time again. They are the invisible and irresponsible dictators of price; they are the invisible and irresponsible dictators of the amount of real income which shall pass to the wage earners and farmers of this country; they are the irresponsible dictators of the economic standard of living. Every increase in the price of commodities produced by these great monopolies is reflected in the wage that the worker receives and the price the farmer receives for his products. The result is that as prices are forced up by these monopolies the income of labour and of our farmers is correspondingly forced down.

By their wrecking of the economy from time to time they precipitate unemployment at intervals in our history. Great unemployment actually plunges millions of people from the verge of poverty to the very dungeon of want and despair. In this connection I should like to quote from a speech once made by the Right Hon. Herbert Morrison. He was dealing with the state and industry and was showing that, even when vast privately controlled concentrations of economic power are efficient in their economic conduct, they constitute a political menace. I quote:

> They have within their grasp powers over fields of public well-being and public policy far greater in practice than parliament itself wields in the great majority of its legislation. They can determine the form of our technical development. They can by that means determine the pattern of the national working life and the level of the national livelihood. They can control to a great extent the distribution of purchasing power among classes and groups. They are free, like independent empires, to declare war with other empires at home or abroad, to make peace with them, to make treaties, to enter into alliances. All these things, in ways not obvious to ordinary men at ordinary times, go down to the very roots of national life and our place in the world. Organizations in a position to wield such power, whatever their present motives or the current ideals of those responsible for their policy, present democracy with its greatest problem . . . None of them should be left indefinitely outside the effective grasp of public policy.

I should like now to refer to one of our own supporters of monopoly in this country. This is a Canadian banker. I notice that recently when the great bankers and industrialists gather around to tell the country of the profits they made last year they try to obscure those profits by making an attack on the C.C.F. and on socialism. Such as Mr. MacMillan, who, when announcing a profit of $8,500,000 in British Columbia, had to cover up by making an attack on socialism as though it had been socialism that had pilfered the forests of British Columbia and handed them to a private corporation.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): They did not build the pulp mill in British Columbia, either.

Mr. Irvine: No, they would not do that. He is going to encourage the working classes of that province by investing another $8,500,000 and skinning off another crop. He thinks that because he has taken that position his party ought to be elected and he should be permitted to carry on the good work.

The banker to whom I wish to refer made a similar speech. This was at an annual meeting. They had announced their profits and so forth. Now he turns on the C.C.F. He meant what he said to be an attack on the C.C.F. but apparently he was suffering, momentarily at least, from an attack of mental strabismus. In plain language that means "cock-eyed." Although what he said was meant to be a bullet aimed at the C.C.F., he was so cock-eyed that he hit himself and it went through his head apparently without stopping, or hitting anything. Shall I name him? He is the general manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia. I quote:

> Mr. Enman went on to say that the political danger of nationalization overshadowed all others. There is no doubt that government ownership of the banks would place tremendous power at the disposal of the political party which happened to be in office. The fact of enormous power would be there—

I want to pause there for a moment. The fact of that enormous power is there. The fact of that enormous power is recognized and admitted by one of the men who has that power. He knows what he is talking about when he says that the fact of power is there. Let us see what those powers are. He goes on to describe them:

> —power to withhold credit—

I will add there, "As was done through the hungry thirties."

power to interfere with the privacy of personal affairs, power to bring political opponents into line or even to ruin them, power enough indeed to undermine the democratic system and to perpetuate the political control of the party in power. The temptation to use such power would be great, and sooner or later it would be used.

He should know. He did not stop to tell us how greatly he had been tempted to use it, or how often he had used it. He felt it was all right while it was in his hands, but if that power should ever pass into the hands of responsible representatives of the people that would be a tragedy to the banker. He goes on:

It is surely up to the advocates of nationalization to explain just how it is proposed to use such a great concentration of power and, most important of all, how the rights of citizens would be protected in its use and from its abuse.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): They would not be.

Mr. Irvine: I agree with the gentleman who wrote these words, that it is up to anyone to explain that who proposes to take that power. I am waiting for him now to explain how he has used that power, whether he has ever used or abused it. I can tell him how he has abused it. We had an investigation into banking some years ago. The records are still available for anyone to examine. We know how they abused that power. It is no wonder that this gentleman, and the institution which he represents and all similar institutions, should be firing their shots of vengeance and hatred at the C.C.F.

There are today a great many people in Canada who are afraid of communism. This government has been taking, and properly so, careful steps to see that those who are communists shall not in any way whatsoever betray to other foreign countries the rights of this country. Everybody commends that. But nothing is said or done about the vast investments of foreign countries in great monopolies in Canada, countries whose policies may be diametrically opposed to the policies of our country. I notice, according to the report of Mr. McGregor, that is one of the characteristics of cartels and monopolies. They carry on in the dark, behind the scenes, in a little economic empire of their own within the domestic economy, doing what they please, sometimes violating the announced policies of the government in power.

I oppose this in the next place because it interferes with the economic and political liberties of the people of this country. If I had the time to do so I would say much more about how they interfere with our political liberty, how their vast concentration of economic power gives them almost enough influence to write the political policies of this nation. I think it is safe to say that to a large extent they do that, no matter which of the two great parties happens to be in power. I am opposed to it because it stands in the way of planning the national economy.

Of course, I know that to talk about that here will be considered very foolish because private enterprise stands for a planless economy. Both the hon. gentlemen to my immediate right, who are in the official opposition, and the government, stand as the champions of a planless economy. They accept the classical economist's washed-out theory of automatic adjustments. Inferentially they ask men and women with their families to trust their lives to the caprice of a system which they admit they neither can control nor want to control. Whether you may be the beneficiary of a boom or the victim of a slump, in either case you are at the mercy of blind economic forces which private enterprise neither can control nor wants to control. An admission of that sort is, to my mind, the gravest materialistic and deterministic type of admission. It is an admission that we are incompetent to control our economic environment.

Let me briefly go through the cycle of the self-correcting classical economist's theory. This is the cycle which has been inscribed by history on our economic lives. We first have to bring a boom to end a slump, and then we bring a slump to end a boom. When we find a slump all around us and we are in a depression, then capital expenditures are increased. At times they are assisted, and sometimes properly so, by the public treasury. These are attempts to increase purchasing power among the consuming public. Prices begin to rise, but without control they not only begin to rise but keep on rising, and by and by we have a boom in prices. When that happens, wages start out to chase prices but never catch up. Because they never catch up, real demand begins to slacken; and, as real demand slackens, drastic deflation sets in. There appears a great slump in the market. There are bankruptcies, particularly in those industries and businesses which are overcapitalized. Unemployment grows, wages drop, and depression touches the bottom.

I cannot stop to describe what these economic facts do to human beings. I do not have time to describe the human misery and suffering which are involved in those cycles of ten to twenty year periods, but that cycle of stupidity, of wealth destruction, of human misery, has been completed eighteen times in 150 years. Now we are rigging up for the next one. It is gradually approaching. I do not know to what depths that depression will reach, but we are in the process. That is the pattern of automatic economic controls of free, private enterprise. They work, of course; they always work. But the chief thing they work is havoc; and we find stupidity and wanton inflation ultimately corrected by unemployment, want and bankruptcy. If that is what you want, then you have it now. Of course I am not quoting all the evils of the system; I am just giving a few.

But more and more people, not only in this country but throughout the world, are refusing to submit to this hit-or-miss economic philosophy. They are beginning to demand that basic industries must be made responsive to the public they exist to serve. I hold, Mr. Speaker, that it is reasonable, that it is proper, that it is ethical, that it is humane and practical that the natural resources of this country, with all the technical achievements of the centuries, should be used in the public interest. That will not happen by accident; it will not come about merely by wishing it. If that is to happen then monopoly and its automatic control will have to yield to public ownership and a planned objective for the nation.

If it be true that monopolies are here; if it be true that their practices are inimical to social security and democratic government; if it be true—and it is true—that both the government and the official opposition disagree with the view that monopolies should be publicly owned and controlled, then let me ask what is the proposal of either the government or the opposition in respect to this cancer that is eating at the heart of the nation? What proposals have been made? There have been none in four years. The first practice followed by the government in respect to monopolies is to ignore them, to think they are not there. They are never mentioned in the speech from the throne. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) never even referred to them. The next thing is to "Canute" them, as the former Prime Minister, now the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King), did last year when he said the prices committee should not have power to do anything about these fellows who might have been charging too much, that it would be only necessary to point it out in public and they would become so ashamed they would go home and lower prices. Well, of course they did not, so that is what I call "Canute-ing" them. They say, "Go back, big tide, and become a nice, gentle little ripple." But tides do not obey.

The next way is to pass legislation, such as the anti-trust laws of the United States of America and the Combines Investigation Act in Canada. These are not only worthless; they are bad legislation. They are worthless because monopoly has grown perhaps faster since the legislation was passed. It never was greater in the United States than it is now; it was never greater in Canada than it is now; yet these pieces of legislation have been in operation, supposedly doing their best. I say it is bad legislation because it is not effective. It is not effective in the sense that you cannot prevent monopolists from making agreements unless you can prove they have done so, and they can make agreements without your being able to prove it. But when you have proven the agreement was made you have still another stickler: what is a fair and reasonable profit? That is a gateway big enough for all the monopolies in Canada to walk through any time they please.

It is also bad legislation because if it were effective it would mean that we were turning back the wheels of progress, trying to divide up these great cartels and monopolies which have been developed—by whom? They have been developed by the most successful free private enterprisers of the nation; and they have developed in that way because they were found to be economical. Trying to force them to divide into innumerable small groups and fight it all out again would be ridiculous. In any case it would simply mean that history would have to repeat itself and the monopolies would have to develop all over again. So we have to face the fact that something must be done about them. We have to handle the monopolies in such a way as to save for the nation all the advantages and all the economies which in the process of industrial development have been revealed to exist in mass production and centralized effort.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, since last Wednesday I have listened to the various speeches and discussions which have taken place in this chamber. I have noticed that the new saviour of the world, the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), is anxious and determined to follow the rules of this house. He does not care who pays for useless discussions as long as his name is placed in Hansard and in the press. Since the re-election of Maurice Duplessis in Quebec, it is no exaggeration to say that the hon. leader of the opposition has been presented to the people of that province as a kind of new world's heavyweight champion. If you listen to a radio blue speech, you will become convinced that our Lord Jesus Christ is nobody compared to the great new leader.

If you read the papers in Quebec, you will find large advertisements paid for by the Conservative organization, stating that Mr. Drew is an up-to-date man, that he is the only capable man, that he is the only man that Canada needs. In other words, he is a second world's saviour. All this propaganda may please and convince the hon. gentleman's own friends, but I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in the province of Quebec it has no importance at all. As was well said yesterday by the Prime Minister, the province of Quebec has an emblem which says, "Je me souviens" meaning "I remember". We in the province of Quebec remember the day when the leader of the opposition accused Quebec of not making a total war effort and not sharing responsibilities during the last war. We also remember the hon. gentleman's opposition to what he called baby bonuses for the province of Quebec. I say that the Conservative party has no chance in the world of succeeding in the province of Quebec.

An hon. Member: How about the hon. member's party?

Mr. Caouette: And I do not think for one moment that he has a single chance in the other provinces of Canada. Following the speech by the leader of the opposition we heard a good political speech—I should say it was a true pre-election speech—from the Prime Minister. This speech by the leader of the government was similar to the speech from the throne. It was an empty speech, an exhibition of words and phrases without meaning. Let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada are waiting for something else than nice speeches and nice words written in the press. The Prime Minister accused the opposition of presenting one policy in Quebec and another in the other provinces of Canada. He said that the Liberal party has always been truthful to the whole dominion of Canada. This statement is completely false. I want the Liberal party to know that Quebec has an emblem which says "Je me souviens", meaning "I remember".

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): What about social credit in Quebec?

Mr. Caouette: My hon. friend does not even know what he is talking about. For twenty-five years the Liberal party has kept in power by its opposition to wars and conscription. For twenty-five years promises have been made to Quebec to the effect that never under a Liberal administration would we participate in a war or in conscription. We will never participate in a European war, claimed all the Liberals during these twenty-five years. Today we remember all that, and by no stretch of the imagination can we say that the Liberals are a bit better than the Conservatives. The two parties are exactly the same. Both are financed from and by the same sources.

An hon. Member: We have not a hat.

Mr. Caouette: Both parties were created by finance to divide the people of Canada. Let us amuse the people of Canada with political parties while finance will take full control of the nation's life. Here is the emblem of all political parties.

I also listened to the speech made by the leader of the C.C.F. party. It is always the same old song: free enterprise is no good; we should socialize this and that; the government should have absolute control over all the human beings in this country of ours. Thanks to free enterprise, Mr. Speaker, in this country we have produced, comparatively speaking, more than has been produced in any other country in the world. Having reached such a great capacity for production, thanks to free enterprise, the problem of today is not one of production. We have production, and we have at our disposal everything required to produce more. This problem was solved several years ago. The problem of today is nothing more or less than that of distribution. Let us distribute to the people the goods of our country.

An hon. Member: What about dividends?

Mr. Caouette: Yesterday we heard from the Prime Minister that money is only a sign representing reality. Social Crediters are so convinced of the truth of that statement that they have asked the government for twenty years—

An hon Member: Where are they?

Mr Caouette: If my hon friend will permit me to tell him where they are, I will say that they are actually with the corpse of Norman Jaques, who died yesterday morning; and I do not think they are to blame for that. Social Crediters are so convinced of the truth of that statement to which I referred that they have asked the government for twenty years to create as many signs as the Canadian people create production. For years and years Social Crediters have been asking the government to use the Bank of Canada for the creation of new currency and credit.

Mr. Beaudry: Are there no printing presses in Val d'Or?

Mr. Caouette: My hon. friend does not even know what "bank" means or what "money" means. He knows what money is, but he does not understand what is meant by money created in favour of the people.

Mr. Beaudry: Nature was not kind enough to me.

Mr. Caouette: Let us go on a debt-free money system. Let us develop this country for the benefit of the Canadian people and not for the gangsters of the present financial set-up. Then and only then will we have peace, social justice, and security with freedom for each and every Canadian. The leader of the Social Credit group has given us a clear picture of this in the speech he made yesterday. I hope it will bear fruit.

Coming to the speech from the throne, may I say we are all agreed that the first concern of government in world affairs is to ensure peace and security; but to ensure peace and security in the world the first concern of government is to ensure peace and security to all the citizens of our country first. Let us give an example to the whole world by establishing peace and security with freedom in Canada. Let us solve the distribution problem in this country. The only way by which we can solve the problem is by the distribution of a national dividend which Social Crediters have been advocating for many years. Let us follow and apply in Canada and in the world social credit philosophy and I assure you; Mr. Speaker, that then we shall ensure peace and security not only in Canada but also in the world.

Mr. Beaudry: Will the hon. member permit me a question? Is the hon. member willing to admit that our administration has been so sound that we are in a position to offer dividends as he suggests? We are quite willing to admit it.

Mr. Caouette: My hon. friend is a charming friend but I think his question is only silly. Let him ask his administration to apply what the former Prime Minister, the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) told a great meeting in Alberta in 1935, and then apply it today. It has never been done. I shall speak about it in a minute.

Mr. Beaudry: Yes, but it does not answer my question.

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member's question does not require an answer because it is a silly question, and I do not answer silly questions.

In the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, I read the following statement:

> Prosperous conditions now prevailing are being reflected in the buoyant level of national revenues; a condition to which due consideration is being given by my ministers in the preparation of forthcoming budgetary proposals.

Where is there prosperity in Canada today?

Mr. Beaudry: Right here.

Mr. Caouette: Yes, you are right; right here in the House of Commons but nowhere else in Canada. Unemployed men are counted in the thousands and thousands all across Canada. There is a shortage of houses. There is actually starvation in Canada in many places, in big cities, for instance, and we are told that we have prosperity in our country. Who is responsible for such statements?

I know that we have prosperity in this House of Commons. I know that the financiers of this country have prosperity, and I know that several thousands of Canadians have no prosperity at all. Our old Canadians have a funny prosperity with a $30-a-month pension. Our cripples also have a strange prosperity with no pension at all. The great majority of Canadians earning less than $2,000 a year also have a funny prosperity, besides paying taxes on their low incomes. The government should not laugh in the people's faces in that way. The government and all hon. members know that we can have prosperity in Canada but we have not got it at this time. Let us go ahead and ensure it to all our population.

I shall continue in French to make some remarks about the program which I received last week from my constituents in Pontiac.

(Translation):

I am glad to take part in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In order to give adequate expression to the thoughts and the will of the electors of the constituency of Pontiac whom I have the honour of representing in this house—

Mr. Beaudry: For the last year.

Mr. Caouette: I shall be here for several years more, during which time the hon. member who has just interrupted me will not be sitting in this house. To show him conclusively that he will not be here after the next election, I would point out to him that in his speech he dwelt upon the income tax and various other taxes levied by the government; yet ever since he has been a member of this house, he has voted with the government, thus declaring himself in favour of maintaining those taxes.

His electors will remember that—

Mr. Beaudry: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and on a question of privilege, I should like to say that under standing order 31, the hon. member cannot be allowed to anticipate—

An hon. Member: A visionary and a prophet!

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, that is what I heard on coming through the riding represented by my hon. friend.

I received recently copies of resolutions passed at the meeting of the Pontiac County Union of Electors, held in the city of Rouyn:

Whereas democracy, while offering advantages to the people, first imposes responsibilities, such as keeping an eye on public affairs, studying the problems related thereto and submitting to legislators the required solutions.

The officers of the Rouyn-Noranda Union of Electors, gathered in regular meeting this twentieth day of January, 1949, beg you to take the opportunity offered by the coming session to ask for:

1. The setting-up of a crucifix in the House of Commons.

In view of the fact that Canada claims to be a Christian nation, we believe that there will be and that there is no objection to the placing of a crucifix in this house. We should not be ashamed to proclaim our belief, even in this house.

2. The appointment of an ambassador to the Vatican.

A few days ago, on the orders of the day, I asked the reasons for our failure to appoint an ambassador to the Vatican. We have ambassadors to various countries throughout the world, and while many other nations are represented at the Holy See, in Rome, Canada which claims to be a Christian nation has no envoy there. We ask that an ambassador be appointed to the Vatican.

3. Vigorous protests against the arrest of Cardinal Mindszenty.

Once again, we shall probably be told that Canada should not interfere with the domestic affairs of another country. When the question arose of declaring war to safeguard the very existence of that fine country named Poland, never was it said in Canada that we should not intervene in the domestic problems of foreign countries. Well, I believe that the government is now bound to protest most strongly against the arrest of the primate of Hungary.

4. That the government put a stop to its present policy of mass immigration.

Mr. Speaker, in the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this house, there have come, for many months, hundreds and hundreds of immigrants labelled "D.P.'s from Europe".

In many of our mines, these immigrants have replaced French-Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Name them.

Mr. Caouette: We will name them in due course.

Mr. Beaudry: Were they brought in by force or in answer to requests from companies?

Mr. Caouette: They have been requested by the companies. That is why I placed the question on the order paper. Let us put a stop to mass immigration, which aims to replace our Canadian people. I believe mass immigration is being carried on here and there in Canada and in many places. Canadians are faced with an untenable situation and unbearable conditions.

I read in La Terre de chez nous of November 24, an article headed thus:

To be confirmed or denied: In some countries, when danger threatens, and there are brawls, riots or a state of emergency, martial law is proclaimed. Has Canada reached that stage? Are army officials and their friends so alarmed by persistent rumours of war that they find it necessary to use force to compel Canadian youths to enlist. Such appears to be the view expressed by an editorial in the Front Ouvrier, of Montreal. In 1939-40, hosts of volunteers were secured in Canada by means of service-pay offered the weary, hungry, unemployed. Are men being thrown out of work in order to repeat the process? But here is more from the newspaper I mentioned: "Young men are being driven into the army. An item from the Eastern Townships states that in four days 125 young men were let out in Asbestos; 60 on the first day; 40 the next day; 20 and 5 on the third and fourth days respectively.

In Mégantic, 250 young men were laid off during a very short time.

We are told that in Sherbrooke, young men were being refused employment in October. There too, it seems, young men are being advised to enlist.

After reporting those facts, the Front Ouvrier deems it should conclude that war propaganda is anything but unrelated to the dismissals mentioned. That statement is so serious that the federal authorities should deny it. . . or confirm it. True, to confirm it it has but to remain silent. The item, the first part of which I have already quoted, concludes as follows:

"One can readily see that some sort of war propaganda is responsible for all this. There is no question of war yet in parliament, but our young men are already compelled to live on a war footing.

This year alone, the government is spending $280 million on war. Enough to see 70,000 young men through university each year, together with a $60 monthly allowance. With that much money we could build a half-million dollar technical school in every constituency in Canada; 125,000 young boys and girls could learn a trade and even receive enough money to live comfortably.

Our young people have the right to object to being disposed of without the people's representatives being asked first to express their views on the matter.

Some sort of disguised conscription is still in effect in Canada, in the province of Quebec and more particularly in the constituency I have the honour of representing.

Mr. Speaker, we shall protest against mass immigration of young and older people as long as all Canadians living in Canada do not enjoy security and until freedom and social justice are guaranteed one and all.

That the Canadian government re-establish all veterans in civilian life as quickly as possible while fully respecting the freedom of choice of everyone concerned.

I need not insist further. Obviously the government knows that in Canada thousands of veterans have not yet been able to re-establish themselves permanently and have not received the help they had a right to expect from federal authorities in Ottawa.

That the Canadian government put an end at once to every form of disguised conscription and agree never to resort to such a course in either peacetime or wartime.

We do not want conscription under any form whatsoever; let the authorities resort to persuasion.

7. "That the government increase family allowances and do away with decreasing rates."

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caouette: I noted with pleasure that the speech from the throne mentioned family allowances. Apparently the decreasing rates are to be abolished during the present session. That is not enough; we should also increase the allowances for each and every child in this country.

8. "That the government increase old age pensions and lower the age limit."

We ask for a $60 monthly pension at the age of sixty. That would be only fair to our older citizens. It is also fully in keeping with Christian principles to ask for a better pension, a $60 monthly pension, payable at the age of sixty.

9. "That the government carry out the monetary reform advocated by the Social Credit party and distribute to each and every one a dividend commensurate with the vast economic possibilities of our country."

This year I take the liberty of again drawing the attention of the house to what Canada's former prime minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said in 1935:

"When a nation has no longer control over its money and its credit, it matters little who makes the laws in that country. When usury is introduced in the administration it can ruin any country. Until the government regains control over money and credit and until such control is recognized as its most evident and sacred responsibility, it is useless to speak of democracy and of the sovereignty of parliament."

That sentence was spoken during a public address delivered by the former prime minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in 1935. Since then, the government have never done anything to comply with the principles they uttered, to recover that most sacred responsibility of controlling money and credit and regain the privilege conceded to Canadian financiers and bankers.

Mr. Speaker, let us render unto parliament its sovereignty, and thus recognize the principle put forth by the then prime minister regarding "its most evident and sacred responsibility" to control money and credit, we would then have but little difficulty in applying the social credit technique, the economic theory advocated here since 1935 by Social Credit supporters all over the country.

10. "That the government immediately abolish taxation on incomes of less than $3,000 per annum."

This is what we advocated last year, and for the last three years. In fact, we want all incomes under $3,000 per annum to be tax free. That is why I repeat this year to all members of the house that we, members of this house, should be allowed income tax exemption on $3,500 if married and up to $2,750 if single. And if such exemptions are good for us, they should be no less so for our constituents. I feel it only fair and reasonable that all Canadians earning less than $3,000 a year should not have to pay any income tax.

11. "That the Post Office Department give us immediate house to house delivery in the towns of Rouyn and Noranda, and rural delivery in the outlying districts of the constituency."

This request has been before the federal authorities for three years now. Are they awaiting the next election to promise house to house delivery in the twin towns of Rouyn and Noranda?

An hon. Member: You have to know the ropes for that.

Mr. Caouette: Perhaps, and that is precisely the attitude of all Liberals. They would have the good people of Val d'Or believe that the Liberal party gives freely, handsomely, while it stops at electoral promises. It is now being suggested to the people of Val d'Or that, thanks to Liberal patronage, to the plodding endeavours of patronage holders, a post office is to be built in Val d'Or. It is even being claimed that the post office was obtained by the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. David Gourd). What sort of honesty is that, Mr. Speaker?—spending public funds on Liberal propaganda in this country.

Social Crediters, Conservatives and Liberals alike pay taxes in every part of Canada. Whenever we claim anything for the people, invariably some Liberal member or even a Liberal minister comes up and states that it is he who donates such and such a thing—

An hon. Member: Go tell that to Duplessis.

Mr. Caouette: In Pontiac county, we do not need other members to look after matters of interest to that county. As for claiming that the member for Chapleau has secured anything for Pontiac, he should first begin by obtaining things for the constituency of Chapleau, because people are asking for some in his own constituency and nothing is being done.

I have here a letter from Senneterre, in the constituency of Chapleau—

Mr. Gour (Russell): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Caouette:

Friday, January 14, 1949, will long be remembered by the people of Senneterre—

Mr. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, may I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Caouette: Go ahead, don't be shy.

Mr. Gour (Russell): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Chapleau is able to obtain much for his own constituency and for the neighbouring constituency, it is only because he creditably represents them. Furthermore, when he speaks in the house, he does it intelligently and not as the hon. member has just done.

Mr. Caouette: I understand that the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Gour) is rather touchy. He recently advised the electors of Russell to make joint representations in connection with oleomargarine, asking them to bring pressure to bear upon Mr. Duplessis, but apparently he is not ready to bring similar pressure to bear upon the dominion government. However, let the hon. member set his mind at rest; I have no intention—

Mr. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, it was Mr. Kennedy—

Mr. Caouette: I have no lesson to take from the hon. member for Russell; rather, he is the one who needs lessons. For a long time he has not succeeded in—

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members realize that it is the duty of the Speaker to preserve decorum and dignity in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member who has the floor to help the Speaker maintain that decorum and dignity in addressing himself to the chair and not to the other members of this house. As regards the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Gour) and others, I wish to point out to them the fact that when a member has the floor, no one may interrupt him without his consent.

Mr. Gour (Russell): I observed that rule.

Mr. Caouette: I will accede to your request with pleasure and thus uphold the dignity of this house.

On January 14 of this year, the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Gourd) spoke at a meeting held at Senneterre, in his constituency. His electors had asked him to look into the matter of electricity for their parish, to get them a new post office and, finally to obtain an Indian school. According to the report which I got from Senneterre, the hon. member for Chapleau answered that he could do absolutely nothing. To have a post office, he said, you need at least $10,000 revenue whereas Senneterre only produces $7,500. As for the Indian school, he advised them to see their parish priest and the diocesan authorities. He declared himself unable to do anything at all about electricity. The report adds:

The hon. member for Chapleau is very kind to the cities of Pontiac county, but very "mean" to his own constituents. He goes so far as to say "a member of parliament has to be a diplomat," a remark he underscores with a loud guffaw. He even goes further and says haughtily that he does not need to be a member of parliament to make a living.

Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I listened to the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Raymond) talking about peace and happiness, war, conscription . . .

Mr. Gagnon: That was yesterday.

Mr. Caouette: I beg your pardon; it was indeed yesterday. He was saying that Canada could not remain neutral, and so on. He criticized newspapers that advocate neutrality, as well as Canadian citizens who disapprove of war and conscription and want Canada to stay neutral.

It is not a question of Canada staying neutral if the country is attacked. Of course Canadians, in Quebec or in any other province, will not hesitate to defend themselves if Canada should be attacked. But that does not warrant the promoting of wars in the world or the issuing of war propaganda and we are surely not justified in taking advantage of that fact to have the Canadian electors believe that war is inevitable.

I wish to point out that during the last world war, Ireland—which is located close to England—remained neutral and Ireland was not flouted by the world for that reason. In fact, it has now secured its republic status and regained its complete independence. Today, Ireland is given the same treatment as Canada, England and the United States. Ireland is absolutely independent and the day Canada secures its independence many thorns will be removed from our fingers and our feet, and we shall have regained the liberty to which we are entitled.

Mr. Speaker, peace and happiness cannot be obtained through war. When we are told that our nation must defend itself if attacked, we understand this and need not be told repeatedly. His Holiness Pope Pius XII never said: "If we want peace, prepare for war" but, "If you want peace, prepare for peace." If you organize war, you will have war. Whatsoever a man sows, that shall he also reap. When we sow potatoes, we surely do not reap green peas.

Mr. Speaker, we, the Union of Electors of the province of Quebec, are in favour of neutrality. We are against war propaganda and against conscription in all its forms, whether disguised or open. If it is claimed that the war aims are valid or logical, we should have the necessary proof, and in that event we shall immediately recognize the logic of a declaration of war.

If the Union of Electors is against war in the province of Quebec, if it is against conscription and in favour of neutrality it is because it has at heart the best interests of the whole Canadian people. Peace and happiness are not brought about by slaughter. The world will not secure them if the nations fight each other, as happened in the last world war, or if Christian forces are arrayed one against the other for the safeguarding of peace.

Mr. Speaker, such rumours of conscription and war which are going around throughout Canada should stop as soon as possible and the talk should rather be about the establishment of an equitable and enduring peace. It should be about the establishment of social justice and the guaranteeing to all citizens the security and freedom to which they are entitled, through the application of the principles of the great social credit doctrine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

(Text):

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks this evening I must confess that I propose to deal with a hodgepodge of subjects, some five in number. They will be atomic energy, veterans affairs, the need for a Canadian policy in the Pacific, the need for clarification of the government's steel policy, and the Canadian merchant marine and our shipbuilding industry. You will realize that they are not subjects which are connected, but the reason I bring them up this evening is that I hope the government will take action on each one of these questions before the session is very much older. I fear that if there is delay in placing them before the house there may be no action forthcoming from the government during the earlier days of the session. In other words, there is an element of urgency about all these questions.

First of all may I deal with atomic energy. In the session of 1946 the House of Commons passed an act which set up the atomic energy control board. Hon. members will recall that very wide powers were given to that board. They will also recall that a great deal of money has been voted for the work of the board, and a great deal of money is to be voted each year. Furthermore it is well for us to remember that atomic energy may be of the utmost importance in the national life of Canada, in the development of our nation. It may be the greatest factor in the development of Canada in the years that lie ahead.

When the bill was brought in in 1946 I suggested to the minister, who is now the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), that there should be set up in Canada a watchdog committee which would keep in touch with the activities of the atomic energy control board. That stand was approved by the leaders of the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties. At the time the minister made a statement, which is to be found at page 2401 of Hansard of 1946, and reads as follows:

> I dare say that, as developments proceed, it may be desirable to have committees, and perhaps a standing committee of this house on problems of atomic energy may be warranted; I do not think that is so at the moment. We should obtain more experience in the work of atomic energy before a standing committee is established.

That was the minister's position in 1946. At that time we pointed out to him that in the United States, where they had set up a similar board known as the atomic energy commission, they had also provided for three watchdog committees. One of those committees is known as a general advisory committee, and has in its membership very distinguished scientists and manufacturers. The second committee is a military liaison committee, and has some of the leading men from the various forces of the United States. The third is a congressional joint committee on atomic energy.

I have in my hand the United States government manual for 1948. If hon. members care to look at this manual they will find, beginning at page 334, a description of the set-up in the United States. At page 336 we find this statement concerning the functions of the congressional committee.

> The congressional joint committee on atomic energy, composed of nine members of the Senate and nine members of the House of Representatives—

By the way, that committee includes such outstanding senators as Senator Vandenberg, Senator Bricker, and Senator Tom Connally.

> —makes continuing studies of the activities of the atomic energy commission and of problems relating to the development, use, and control of atomic energy. The commission keeps the joint committee fully and currently informed on the activities of the commission.

Last year I again suggested to the minister the time had come to set up a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on this question of atomic energy. At that time he was a little more kindly disposed towards the suggestion. On June 19, at page 5531 of Hansard, he said:

> —but if the house at the next session wished to appoint a committee on atomic energy and bring experts before that committee to discuss these matters it might be appropriate to do so.

Then he went on to say he would give serious consideration to the suggestion during the interval between the two sessions. I suggest to the minister this evening, Mr. Speaker, that at this present session there should be set up such a joint committee. Just this morning we find on the front page of the Montreal Gazette an article from Washington headed "More powerful A-bombs reported by United States atom energy commission." Then it goes on to outline the report that has been made by Mr. David Lilienthal, the chairman of their atomic energy commission. I think his remarks are very much worth while. He is quoted as saying at a press conference that—> —the present report represents a "turning point" towards the increased release of information because, he says, secrecy carried to extremes "could actually blacken out democracy."

In Canada's dealings with atomic energy we are in that danger. We are in the position that no one in this house except the minister knows anything at all about the development of atomic energy in this country or what possibilities there may be in the development of that energy for the people of this nation. That, I submit, is a thoroughly bad thing in a country where we have democratic government. Some responsibility should be placed upon parliament with regard to this question. So I do appeal to the minister tonight to set up such a committee during the present session. I think the matter could be dealt with in a non-partisan way, and the results would be very beneficial not only to the house but also to the country at large.

Mr. Howe: Would the hon. gentleman like me to say a word in reply now? The government would have no objection to such a committee. I must confess that the only hon. member who has discussed the matter and indicated an interest in it is my hon. friend.

Mr. Green: No; the leaders of the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties.

Mr. Howe: I dare say there is more interest than has been disclosed here; but I have discussed the matter with those responsible for the operation, and we all think it would be very desirable to have more information about Canada's work on atomic energy available to hon. members. So I shall be glad to co-operate with opposition parties in working out a committee.

Mr. Green: Thank you very much. I only hope I may have equally good luck with my four other suggestions.

The second subject I wish to bring before the house this evening is veterans affairs. That matter has not rated one word in the speech from the throne. Hon. members may read through that long throne speech and they will not find one word concerning veterans affairs; yet the fighting has been over for only about three years. Then, to make the situation worse, on Friday last the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) was asked in the house whether a special committee would be set up this session, and his reply was:

> —the minister and the government have given consideration to the matter, and it has been decided not to recommend the setting up of a committee this session.

This means that no legislation dealing with veterans affairs is in contemplation, which means in turn that the only opportunity to discuss veterans affairs will be on the estimates of that department. And if the same practice is followed this session that has been followed in other sessions, those estimates will be brought down a day or two before the house prorogues next June or July or August, and there will be no opportunity to deal adequately with the questions which mean so much to the veterans. In other words, if the minister's decision is final this session of 1949 holds very little hope for the veterans of Canada.

May I point out that much new veterans legislation was placed on the statute books within the last two or three years, and that many of the problems affecting the veterans are still unsolved. Rehabilitation is still going on, and some new difficulties are cropping up in that connection. There are also difficulties in connection with the Veterans Land Act and many other phases of rehabilitation and with the fair treatment of the men who saved this country just a few years ago. Actually, Mr. Speaker, the veterans of Canada are the men who should get first consideration in this house. Their problems should be given priority; yet here we have not a word said about them and no committee to be set up, which I am afraid means that nothing is to be done.

Take, for example, the war veterans' allowances. Some increases were granted last year; but I may tell the minister that as far as British Columbia is concerned, and I judge also as far as veterans organizations right across Canada are concerned, there is the utmost dissatisfaction with the increases provided last year and the strongest possible demand for further increases. Take the married men in receipt of the burnt-out pension. They were given an increase of only $10 last session, the same as the single men. The whole allowance is on such a basis that it does not meet the needs of the veterans, and certainly something should be done about it at this session. Another very bad feature is the fact that the imperials cannot establish eligibility for the war veterans allowance; and the men who served in Great Britain during the first war are in the same position.

Another serious situation arises from the fact that the benefit of the doubt clause is not yet being interpreted to give the soldier the benefit to which this parliament said he was entitled. There was an amendment last year, but I have seen a decision by the pension commission just within the last week—in fact I received word since coming to Ottawa—which simply does not give the veteran the benefit of the doubt, and I believe something must be done to remedy that situation. Another serious question is the practice of ruling that men are suffering from a pre-enlistment condition. It seems that if any trace can be found of some illness suffered by a man before enlistment, that is dragged out and used to establish that he is suffering from a pre-enlistment condition. In this connection also I have run across some unfair decisions; and sooner or later we must get legislation which will provide that where a man was taken into the service as fit, passed his examinations, and then was discharged as unfit after service, the state must show that such deterioration was not due to service, and failing that must give the man a pension. I might give many more instances, but I shall mention only the men of the merchant navy. They are still the forgotten men of the last war. In my judgment they are getting a dirty, shabby deal under the present legislation, and amendments to the veterans legislation should be made to provide that men of the merchant navy will be fairly treated.

I mention these different problems simply to support my demand that a special parliamentary committee be set up at this session. Such a committee would have a great effect. It would hear representations from the soldier organizations; and by the way those representations are always worth while, always carefully worked out and well presented. I think such a committee would have the effect of bringing about the enactment of beneficial legislation. Those who served on the special committee last year will remember that the government changed its mind twice about the amount by which pensions should be increased. We had the first statement by the Prime Minister in December of 1947. Then there was a change. I hold in my hand a sheet which was distributed by the Minister of Veterans Affairs in the special committee on April 18, 1948, which contains this paragraph:

> Regarding disability pensions, the government cannot see its way clear at this session of parliament to go further than their present proposal, which is now before you.

This was the second proposal.

> This proposal represents an increase . . .

And so on. The minister nearly got away with that; the committee nearly accepted that proposal and went on to deal with other questions, but fortunately it did not do so. As a result of the activities of that committee the government came out on May 11—I have in my hand the press clipping of May 11—with a third increase; and as the reporter said:

> It was the third time this session that the government announced an upward revision in the pension scale and possibly the first time in Canadian parliamentary history that a government has changed its mind that often in one session.

The change was made only because of the pressure brought to bear by the special committee on veterans affairs, and I submit to the minister that it will be a tragedy if a special committee is not set up during the present session.

The third subject has to do with the new Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I hope he also will accept my suggestion. It is that there is a need for a Canadian policy in the Pacific at the present time. Nobody knows our policy with regard to what is going on around that ocean. The government are extremely busy about the Atlantic pact. I sometimes think they are so busy looking south to Washington to see what the Americans want done that they have not time to look out west to see what is going on in the Pacific. But the happenings around the Pacific ocean are of the utmost concern to the people of British Columbia who live on the Pacific slope; and Canada as a nation is vitally interested in what is going on around that ocean. At this moment there is an urgency about these questions, for at least two reasons and probably for many more. First of all, on January 14 we had a press dispatch from Ottawa and Washington printed in one of the Vancouver papers. The heading reads as follows, "Pacific countries to join vast bloc." Then it goes on to say that there is to be a history-making, southern hemisphere security alliance between British commonwealth countries, and it lists the United Kingdom, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand and possibly India, Pakistan, Ceylon and Malaya. The article also says:

> Announcement of the new alliance, it is thought, will be timed just before the signing of the north Atlantic alliance, scheduled for early February.

If there is any truth in this article, there is urgency about this question. The article goes on to say that Canada will give the pact its blessing but that she is not greatly interested in joining. The article also says:

> Politically, it is felt an attempt to organize the commonwealth as a defensible unit might be disturbing to both the United States and the western union.

I would point out to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that Canada has the closest of ties with Australia and New Zealand in particular, and with South Africa. We have not only ties of trade, but we have planes flying into Vancouver only three or four days out of Australia. We now have the passenger ship service to Australia resumed. We are greatly interested in what goes on in those sister dominions. We had young Australian airmen going through Vancouver when they came here to train under the British commonwealth air training plan. There is a close tie between the Pacific coast of Canada and the British nations out in the Pacific. What is happening is that trade is falling off. I have here in my hand Foreign Trade, a publication of the Department of Trade and Commerce, for January 29. It points out that there has been a marked decline in Canadian trade with Australia and New Zealand. We are just drifting apart. If a regional pact is to be set up for the Pacific, I urge that Canada should become a full partner in that pact. We have our dead lying over there in Hong Kong. We have taken a most active part in the Pacific in the days that are gone, and we must not turn our backs on the Pacific at this time.

There is another reason why we in Canada need a Pacific policy, namely, the happenings in China and Japan. Canada is a member of the Far Eastern Commission. I was greatly interested to read the statement made by James F. Byrnes, secretary of state in the United States, when he outlined to the members of the Far Eastern Commission back in 1946 just what its functions were. I do not suppose that half a dozen members in this house tonight realize that Canada is a member of that commission. Here is what Mr. Byrnes said that commission should do:

> "Peace in the Pacific," he said, "is an essential cornerstone to a stable world structure. The guidance of Japan to a position of peaceful association with other nations is therefore a task of major responsibility. That responsibility now belongs to you of the Far Eastern Commission."

And Canada is one of the members of that commission. Perhaps the present Secretary of State for External Affairs was our representative when this speech was made. The quotation continues:

> "The terms of reference agreed to last December in Moscow placed the final and ultimate responsibility for formulating the policies and principles upon which the peace and security of the Pacific may well be based, in your hands."

Things are not going so well in the Pacific. There is serious trouble in China. In the last edition of "U.S. News and World Report," January 28, 1949, I was interested to see an article entitled, "Why U.S. is failing in Asia". It goes on to point out that the United States is getting into grave trouble in the east because of the policy she is following in Japan. The article says:

> Hostility toward the U.S. has intensified throughout Asia during the last year or so because of the trend of American policy in Japan. Chinese of all factions fear Japan is being restored to war-making strength by the U.S. The correspondent, in one week, heard this fear expressed by a premier, a business man, a labour leader, a newspaper man and a banker. All feel that the attempt to build a strong Japan in a chaotic Orient is tending to preserve the power of the "old gang" that plotted and ran the war.

Further on the article continues:

> Most Asiatics appreciate America's concern regarding Russia. What worries them is a growing suspicion that the U.S., in a desire to convert Japan into a bulwark against Russia, is neglecting the democratization of the former enemy. They are convinced that Japan, while it may emerge strong, quite probably will not be democratic.

The Department of External Affairs of Canada should have some views on this question, and the House of Commons is entitled to know those views. I ask for an announcement of policy by the minister. I remind him that the Pacific may be far more dangerous than the Atlantic for Canada in the years that lie ahead.

I am sorry I have lost the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). This really concerns him. The fourth subject is this. I submit that there is need for a clarification of the government's policy on steel. When we got the Abbott austerity program in December 1947 we all quickly found that one of the main reasons for our United States dollar troubles was the fact that we imported so much iron and steel from that country.

Mr. Abbott: Among other things.

Mr. Green: I have it here, if the minister wishes to see it. I have a long advertisement, put in the paper under his authority, which listed, as the four main commodities which caused that shortage, coal, oil, cotton and steel. Quite evidently the government is alarmed over the shortage of steel. It is dealt with in the speech from the throne. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) also dealt with it in his speech. I understand that the United States authorities have cut off a proportion of our imports. According to the Prime Minister, in addition to that, the government's defence plans have greatly increased the demands for steel. He gave the great shortage of steel as the reason for wishing to continue steel control.

The speech from the throne did not give any details of the steel plan, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave a statement to the press which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of January 28, just last Friday. The heading reads as follows:

"Ottawa to share fifty-fifty steel plant assistance" Howe tells parliament.

The minister did not tell parliament. He told the press.

Mr. Abbott: That is the Gazette.

Mr. Green: The minister thinks the Gazette is always wrong, does he?

Mr. Abbott: Well, not always.

Mr. Green: There is a subheading which reads as follows: "Sky is the limit." The article refers to three companies, the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation of Sydney, Nova Scotia, the Algoma Steel Corporation of Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, and the Steel Company of Canada at Hamilton, Ontario. He apparently told the press that there would be no ceilings placed on the government's loan to the steel industry. He is quoted as having said:

We will go as far as the companies are prepared to go.

Mr. Howe: May I explain? I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but he said several times that I talked to the press. I did not talk to the press. I talked to two or three labour men who came here from Sydney to discuss the matter with me, and they talked to the press.

Mr. Green: My complaint is that the minister should have talked to parliament. This was an important statement, and it should have been given to parliament. However, we shall pass that over for the time being.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that there is no reference in this statement to the production of steel in any other part of Canada. We are much interested in this question on the west coast. I would point out to hon. members what has been happening there with regard to the production of steel. At the present time this government is allowing 50,000 tons of iron ore to be shipped out of British Columbia to Wenatchee, Washington, to be made into steel, and that has been done against the wishes of the provincial government. Furthermore, permission was given to ship large quantities of coal, including coking coal from British Columbia to Japan. In addition the government has been paying a subsidy of $10 a ton on scrap metal shipped from British Columbia to the plants in eastern Canada. That scrap could be used in British Columbia. In that province we now have an electric furnace, and by the way, I hope the minister will not be upset by the statements of a shortage of electric power in British Columbia. According to an article in the Gazette this morning, it is caused by the lack of rain. The minister is an expert on whom to blame for lack of rain.

Mr. Howe: It is not caused by a lack of installed capacity.

Mr. Green: Perhaps he can tell us who caused the lack of rain in British Columbia.

Mr. Casselman: George Drew, of course.

Mr. Howe: I can tell you who caused the lack of installed capacity in Ontario.

Mr. Green: On the west coast, we now have a rolling mill, equipped with an electric furnace, capable of producing a thousand tons of pig iron per month from this scrap metal. Between the requirements of that plant and of the foundries, I believe that all the scrap metal produced in British Columbia could be used there without being shipped across the country several thousand miles at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada. In addition, iron ore could be obtained in British Columbia with which to operate an electric smelter. There are iron ore deposits at Quinsam Lake on Vancouver island; it is from these deposits that 50,000 tons are to be shipped to Wenatchee. Other deposits are at Zeballos on Vancouver island, on Texada island, which is near Powell River, and there is a very large deposit of iron ore in the tailings from the mill of the great Sullivan mine at Kimberley. I suggest to the minister that British Columbia could make low-grade steel. I do not think that that fact can be questioned.

I am told that the cost of setting up an electric furnace would be about $2,500,000, and that it would produce 100 tons of pig iron a day or about 30,000 tons a year. Therefore a steel industry could be established on the west coast at the present time. Everybody is in favour of it. Labour is calling for it and so are the business interests. There is a market there for the product. There has been a huge industrial development in the west coast province. The area of the lower mainland of British Columbia is now the second largest industrial district in Canada, the first being the district between Montreal and Windsor.

The British Columbia government has on the statute books legislation under which it can pay $3 a ton for pig iron produced from British Columbia ore up to a total of $2,000,000. The field there is ready for the establishment of a steel industry which could serve British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan with exports from the Pacific coast. It would cut down the demands for United States exchange. There is no reason why the people of western Canada should have to pay to have their steel hauled across Canada. I have no doubt that the railways and the eastern steel companies are not very keen to see a steel industry established on the coast; however, they should not be allowed to influence the decision.

There is also the fact that there is great value in scattering steel plants across the country. Just a week or so ago we had the report of a statement by Mr. H. J. Carmichael, chairman of the Canadian industrial defence board, to the effect that Canada was planning to put plants underground. If we can put plants underground we certainly are able to spread out key industries such as these steel plants.

In the United States they have quite large steel industries on the west coast. I hold in my hand an article published in the Evening Citizen of November 26, 1948. It shows a production in Washington state of 347,000 tons of raw steel a year; Oregon, 66,000; California, over 2,000,000; Utah, over 1,000,000, and Colorado over 1,000,000. So that in the United States they have spread out their steel industries to the west coast.

[Mr. Green.]

Leadership is needed by the government. It has steel control, and nothing can be done unless it gives the lead. I submit the west coast is entitled to a fair proportion of this $50 million to be spent to increase production of basic steel. I ask for a statement from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) with regard to plans for the commencement of a steel industry on the west coast, and also with respect to a national steel policy.

For example, have we any commitments to the United States concerning iron ore to be mined in Ungava or Labrador, or is that ore to be smelted in Canada? The house should know what the government has in mind with respect to that ore. Then, how long does the government anticipate this heavy demand for steel will continue? Another question is as to whether the government intends to support other commodities necessary for the manufacture of steel—and I am referring to coal, limestone and other materials entering into the manufacture of this important product. Are they to be included in its plans for the increase in our production of basic steel?

Then, I suggest we are entitled to know the attitude of the present producers of steel. Apparently there have been doubts in the minds of some of them as to whether they will accept the government's plan. So much for steel.

My final important question is the position of the Canadian merchant marine and our shipbuilding industry. Mention was made of this yesterday and today by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who always voices words of wisdom on that subject—as he does on many other subjects.

May I point out that throughout Canadians have been a maritime race. That was true of the settlers on the St. Lawrence, and it has been true of the men who have sailed the great lakes for generations. It is true of course of the eastern maritime provinces, where at one time we had the finest shipbuilding industry in the world. In the old days of wooden ships they led the whole world not only in the building of ships but also in sailing them. The same is true of the west coast. Our shipping must always be of importance to us, not only for the reasons I have stated but also because of the large part played by export trade in our national life.

During the last war we developed great skill both on the seas and in the shipyards, with the result that at the end of the war we had considerable shipping. I have here a report of the Canadian maritime commission for the period ending March 31, 1948, which shows that by 1947 we had a merchant fleet of 153 ships totalling 983,000 gross tons; and a further 80 ships totalling about 560,000 gross tons were on charter to the United Kingdom. It also shows that we had 17 large shipyards and 16,000 men working in those yards.

This commission was set up in 1947 to advise the government on shipping and shipbuilding. Some of us pointed out at that time that the act should have included a statement of policy by the government on those two questions, just as the legislation in the United States does. There we find, right in the act setting up the commission, the policy of the government with respect to shipbuilding and shipping. But Canada did not do that. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) brought in one of his usual frame-work bills, with just enough to hold it together, and no details. I think he was quite wrong in not announcing a policy.

Mr. Howe: The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not bring in a bill at all; the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) brought it in.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Transport may have brought it in; but the Minister of Trade and Commerce was the father of the bill, and he put it through—just as he has fathered in this house so many other things from many departments.

In 1949 we find ourselves in a position where many of the ships are being sold. As recently as the month of January of this year a dispatch in a west coast paper stated, "B.C. ships sold for $3 million."

Mr. Howe: Who sold the ships?

Mr. Green: It reports that five of the lake ships have been sold to foreign flags.

Mr. Howe: Who sold them?

Mr. Green: The reason given for the sale of these ships is that they are not able to compete with ships of faster speeds. That is the picture of what is going on. We pointed out many years ago that Canada should be building some of these faster cargo freighters, but at that time he laughed and scoffed at the idea. He said that these slow boats were good enough, that we shipped principally grain, lumber and bulk products, and that we did not need faster ships.

Now the shipping companies who got the Canadian merchant marine after the war are selling their ships because they are too slow, and because we need modern cargo vessels.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Green: I allowed the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make a statement in the middle of my speech.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Green: I shall be only about five minutes more, if I might be permitted to conclude what I have to say on this subject. Shipyards are becoming idle. In Vancouver, I believe, the numbers employed in shipyards have fallen from a total of something more than 25,000 during the war, to only 750. Seamen are losing their jobs.

After the few remarks I made in the house on Friday about merchant shipping, I received an air mail letter from a father in Vancouver whose boy has served five years in the Canadian merchant marine. That boy has a splendid record of service, and is taking a course in navigation at the present time. A letter from him to his father, dated at Baltimore, January 20, contains this paragraph:

> We sure got a lot of depressing news here. The Canadian companies are selling their ships, and no more jobs. There is a ship with the Canadian flag at the next dock, she has English officers and an Indian crew, the pay and conditions are deplorable. I think myself there will not be one Canadian crew in one year; so I am getting out, and going to New Zealand.

Time is precious in this matter; yet the government has no policy. I suggest that without further delay a construction program is needed. Modern dry vessels and modern tankers should be built. Canada has built them for other governments in the last year or two, but not one has been built by Canada for use in the Canadian merchant marine.

I suggest that 50 per cent or more of our exports should be carried in Canadian bottoms; that there should be a stipulation that annual overhaul of Canadian ships must be done in Canadian yards. We were told on the coast about Canadian ships having their annual overhaul in Japanese yards. With that sort of thing going on we can never build a Canadian merchant marine. There should be restrictions in connection with our coastal trade, and it may be necessary to have some provision for government subsidies.

Furthermore fair treatment must be given to Canadian merchant seamen. I said earlier in my remarks what I thought about the treatment meted out to Canadian merchant seamen who served during the war. We will never build up a merchant marine until we treat the merchant seamen right. For example, at this moment there is no labour representative on the Canadian maritime commission, although we were told there would be one.

Suppose we should have this war about which the government seems to be worrying so much. Then the merchant marine will once more be of the utmost importance.

Just to sum up on this question I say that a definite policy is needed, and needed quickly.

Those are the five subjects which I place before the government for consideration. I have nothing further to say, but I do hope that each one of these subjects, apart from the one upon which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has yielded or acted already, will be given consideration quickly by the government.

Mr. W. E. Harris (Parliamentary Assistant to the Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the incorrect impression that might be created as to what I said at Brantford ten days ago, I should like to make it clear that, far from suggesting that war might come, I stressed the fact that the signing of the Atlantic pact would be the most effective step that Canada could take to protect herself against aggressors and to ensure the peace of the world. I expressed the opinion that the signing might take place within the next three months. I said that I did not believe that we would have war, nor did I suggest that I had any knowledge about the matter other than what is generally known. I did say that the agreement of the nations which would be evidenced by the signing of the pact would place such a preponderant strength on the side of peace that it was highly unlikely that any aggressor, including Russia, would try to make war after the signing. I emphasized that the pact was essential for the peace of the world and for the protection of Canada, and that its signing might even mark the beginning of better relations with Russia.

Mr. Drew: I take it that the hon. member was incorrectly quoted.

Mr. Chevrier: The leader of the opposition has no right to ask questions.

Mr. Drew: I have every right. When did the minister start to run this house?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not running the house; I am simply telling you what the rules are.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I have made my statement and I think it is quite clear to everyone, including the leader of the opposition.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Brown) and the seconder (Mr. Demers) of the address, and also to add my personal welcome to the new members who have taken their seats at this session, especially to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). We who live in Ontario realize that during the period the leader of the opposition was premier of Ontario, from 1943 until his resignation a short time ago, Ontario was given more progressive and advanced legislation than any other province in the dominion. During his regime as premier of Ontario great progress and advancement was made in the realm of education, health, road construction, agricultural services, labour relations, conservation of natural resources and social services. In fact, Ontario today enjoys the most outstanding social services of all Canada, despite the ballyhoo to the contrary by the prophets from the province of Saskatchewan.

I was interested in the reply given by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who asked if it was the intention to set up a committee in regard to income tax as it affected farmers, with a view to removing the injustices presently imposed on farmers. The minister replied that he was only going to consider the matter, but I hope in the near future he will set up this committee.

I can state frankly that as far as farmers in my section of Ontario are concerned they are up in arms over the payment of income tax. They have protested against the campaign now being carried on by the minister's department. Speaking in this house in the debate in 1947 I suggested to the minister that the then activities of his department with regard to the imposition and collection of income tax on and from farmers would lead to a serious reduction in the production of cheese and other dairy products in Ontario. The result has been that in the county of Hastings, the largest cheese producing county in the province, seven or eight factories have closed already and a number of others will not open for the 1949 season. The production of cheese throughout Canada has shown a serious decline. In the brief presented by the Canadian federation of agriculture to the royal commission on prices on December 14 there is the following comment with regard to the production of cheese:

> The production of cheese showed a sharp downward trend from 1921 to 1934 (-3·6 per cent a year) and a strong upward trend (4·7 per cent a year) from 1935 to 1945. Production has since declined very sharply and in 1948 will be 28 per cent below 1947 and the lowest in 50 years.

In plain language, the average farmer is saying that he has no intention of milking cows for this government. The number of dairy cattle in eastern Canada has declined sharply and is still declining at a rapid rate. The brief submitted by the Canadian federation of agriculture sums up the whole situation for the farmer in a few brief paragraphs which I should like to quote. I quote from page two as follows:

> Today the farmers of Canada are worried about the future. They see a price structure in Canada which has risen to the highest levels in 100 years. They were told that price control during the war would prevent a repetition of world war I inflation and thereby avoid the disastrous deflation which followed. Now it is becoming clearly evident that price control, effective as it was in the war years, resulted in postponing the evil day of inflation.

Generally speaking, we believe the great rise in prices of recent years is not due to the action of any one specific group or institution. We do not believe that the whole cause of the great rise can be laid at the door of exorbitant profits in business, or the high wages of labour, or an increase in the middleman's margin or the operation of speculators and certainly not on the doorstep of the farmer.

And then from page nine there is a paragraph headed, "Long period of cheap food", which reads:

The cold facts are, and they can stand to be emphasized before this committee, food prices were cheap relative to wage rates from 1931 to 1939 because prices for farm products were below the cost of production. The consumers' cost of food was being subsidized by the farmers for at least eight years before the war.

The concluding paragraphs in the brief are as follows:

We have shown that urban consumers have made great gains over the past 50 years in their food purchasing power per hour of work. Hourly wage rates in September of this year could buy about 60 per cent more food than they could in 1913, or 68 per cent more than in 1920, another year of inflation. It can still buy almost as much as in 1939, which was a year of cheap food compared with wage rates.

The farmer does not begrudge the gains of urban groups, provided the gains are not made at the food producers' expense, and provided these gains are in line with increases in productivity. The farmer had a strong suspicion that urban wage rates were seriously out of line with food prices and the prices for farm products from 1930 to 1939.

The facts as presented in this brief bear out this contention. This disparity was hidden during the war and early post-war period by special government action. We are not criticizing this action in this presentation. But the fact remains, and again it needs to be emphasized, that consumers in general became used to a relatively cheap food situation which could not endure under normal free market conditions. When consumers have to bear the full cost of production of farm products it is only natural that it should be quite a jolt to them.

The farmers reject absolutely any suggestion that the position of agriculture, labour or consumers can be fairly measured today by any reference to 1939 or 1935-39. Those were years of agricultural depression and years of above normal food purchasing power for consumers.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that there is absolutely no comparison between the hours that the farmer must work to earn $5 and the hours that a member of a labour union must work to earn $5. Yet in the computation of income tax both are taxed on the same basis. As has been mentioned so often before in this house, the farmer has always felt a grievance because he has never been allowed anything by way of deduction for the work that his wife and other members of his family perform on the farm. If the farmer sells pulp, wood products, sand or gravel, he must show the proceeds in his income tax return, but it appears to me that once the sand and gravel are gone there will not be a second crop. The same thing applies in a lesser degree to pulp and wood products. If the farmer sells a whole woodlot it is a capital gain, but if he should take off ten per cent each year for a period of ten years he is taxed.

I should also like to mention to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) that the item in the farmer's income tax return whereby he is taxed for produce raised and consumed on the farm is most irritating to the farmer. Why the minister and his department insist that this item be continued is rather difficult to understand. Another irritation to the farmer in regard to income tax is the question of bookkeeping, and also the question of the deduction of income tax as far as hired help are concerned. The forms are still complicated despite the assurance we received from the minister last year that the 1947 form was to be a simplified one. Before this session opened I read in the press that we were to have another new form which is going to be so simple that anyone can fill it out, and no taxpayer will ever again have to consult an accountant or a lawyer. All I can say to the minister is that I hope the 1948 return will be an improvement over the form he produced in 1947.

Income tax rates are still most excessive. Many veterans have used their re-establishment credits, together with borrowed moneys, to go into business. The veteran is taxed on his earnings or income from the day he starts his operation. Today he finds himself in the position where he must repay with interest the money he borrowed. He must pay a heavy income tax. In many cases it will be years before the veteran is re-established.

Women working in cities find themselves in the position where they have an exemption of $750, a figure which today will not cover the cost of board, laundry and carfare, the bare essentials. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the general rate of income tax should be reduced, that the exemption for a married man should be at least $2,500, and for a single person $1,250, together with an increase in the allowance for children and other dependents. The allowance of $300 for children over sixteen years of age, attending school or college, is almost absurd. I would ask any hon. member who has a boy or girl over sixteen years of age attending school or college how far that will go toward clothing and educating that child. We find that a wife is allowed an exemption of $750 and a single person the same. It has always been hard for me to reconcile why a wife should be allowed an exemption of $750 when, for a child going to school, and probably costing his parents more, the father is allowed an exemption of only $300.

I should like to commend the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) for bringing to the attention of this house the statements made by the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Young). It appears to me strange that any member of parliament, who must at least have the respect and the confidence of his own electors to be elected to parliament, should make such slanderous statements, which, taken in a literal way, include every member of this house, including the members of his own socialist party. To me these tactics have a decided similarity to those adopted by the communists, a smear campaign to smear persons in positions of responsibility in a democracy, a tendency intended to discredit and destroy the confidence of the public in their elected representatives. The technique is well recognized as a part of a communistic program before they move in to take over a country. I have noticed in the press on various occasions how bitterly the socialists complain when anyone attacks their communistic policies, and how they adopt a holier-than-thou attitude when anyone attempts to compare their philosophy with that of Karl Marx. I for one sincerely hope that the hon. member for Vancouver North will persist in his announced intention to have the member appear before the committee on privileges and elections.

In a past session, Mr. Speaker, I brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) the activities of the wartime prices and trade board in the county of Hastings. The village in which I reside has always been greatly honoured with very special attention from these official snoopers from the wartime prices and trade board. I am happy to report that their activities still continue. In some cases, in my opinion, they have been almost vicious. When one considers the persons who are prosecuted or persecuted, whichever way you wish to put it, one is forced to wonder and question at times whether or not there is a slight political tinge to the whole manner in which these prosecutions are carried out.

The board issues so many orders, regulations and directions that the average grocer is unable to keep up with the flood. According to a food bulletin issued by the board in November, 1948, there were in effect on the 15th November, 1948, fifty-two orders relating to the food trade. Of those fifty-two orders no less than thirty-nine were passed between the first of January, 1948, and the 15th November, 1948. The great majority of these orders were issued by the administrator. Once they are issued they have the force of law without ever passing through this house, which, after all, is at least supposed to approve and pass the laws to which Canadians are subject. The original order setting up the wartime prices and trade board, P.C. 8528, granted very wide powers to the board. In fact the very first words of this order in council are.

—the wartime prices and trade board regulations were made and established to provide safeguards under war conditions—

I say to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that it might be very interesting for his department to give a ruling as to whether or not the war emergency still exists. This original order also provides that the agents and servants of the board have the right at all times to enter upon any premises and inspect and remove books, documents or records of any nature. It further provides that all orders and regulations are effective merely after publication in the Canada Gazette, and also that servants and agents of the board are granted complete immunity for any act they may perform under these regulations. All this seems to me hardly consistent with recognized legal procedure in Canada. It sounds more like something we might expect under a gestapo order. These orders are simply mailed to the merchants, and it makes no difference whether or not they receive them, because they are bound by all the orders and regulations.

I should like to point out, as I have on previous occasions, what happens when these people descend upon your village. A short time ago I had occasion to defend a grocer who was charged with several violations of the regulations. The official snooper from this board called at a store, where he discovered several slight infractions. For instance, he found that oranges were selling for 30 cents a dozen whereas the ceiling price was 29 cents, a matter of one-twelfth of a cent on each orange. He found grapefruit selling at four for 25 cents instead of four for 24 cents, and canned fruit at a fraction of a cent over the ceiling. The investigator demanded the invoices covering these items, though it is always difficult for a grocer or anyone else to pick out an invoice and be certain that it covers the identical article on the shelf. In any event the investigator took the invoices away with him, but before leaving he obtained a statement from the grocer, without telling the grocer he was not obliged to sign it and, what was more serious, without telling the grocer that this statement would be used in court at a later date. This was not one of the printed forms used by the board; it was a statement written out entirely by the investigator.

In due time the grocer was charged and the matter came before the court. I appeared for the grocer and asked the magistrate for an adjournment because I did not have the invoices. I also asked the magistrate to request the solicitor for the board to supply me with copies of the invoices; but the solicitor, who soon acquired all the arrogance this board has always possessed, said he was not obliged to furnish me with anything. Thereupon I wrote to the board at Ottawa, explaining the action of their solicitor, and the board replied advising me that they had instructed their solicitor to furnish me with the required copies.

It was also interesting to note that before the case came to court the solicitor for the board called on the grocer with a prepared paper which he asked him to sign, in which he would be pleading guilty. It has always seemed to me, Mr. Speaker, that any Canadian citizen must be presumed innocent until he is found guilty in a proper court of law, and that every citizen is entitled to his day in court. When the case came before the magistrate the investigator, with the assistance of his solicitor, attempted to file the statement he had obtained from the grocer. I objected to its admission, pointing out the well-known rules of evidence concerning the admission of any statement signed by an accused. The magistrate refused to admit the statement; and I was amazed to hear the investigator for the board say under oath that it was the practice of the board to obtain these statements while conducting their investigations and file them later during court proceedings.

It was also interesting to hear the investigator admit under oath that in the great majority of the stores he investigated he found some slight infractions of the regulations. He admitted that in my village he found such slight infractions in a number of stores, but that in very few cases prosecutions followed. As a lawyer I cannot follow the reasoning which dictates that in one village where there are ten merchants, all guilty of some slight infractions of the regulations, only one should be prosecuted, or persecuted, as you wish. Tactics such as these do not encourage respect for this law or these regulations, nor do they inspire any confidence in the manner this board enforces these price ceiling regulations.

As the final act in this peculiar case I was advised, on authority I would not question in the slightest degree, that two days after the case was heard the solicitor for the prosecution received instructions from the board at Ottawa to press for a fine of at least $100. These instructions had not been issued before the date the case was originally slated to be heard, and I can only assume that the board, with its usual autocratic methods, felt that any backbencher member of parliament who dared question or protest against any act of the board should be punished, and the only way he could be punished was to penalize his client. Fortunately, however, the case had been disposed of already, and the magistrate in his wisdom found the charges so trifling that the fine was merely nominal.

It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that there were many unusual features to this case, which however I presume must be the usual procedure. First we had the investigator taking away the invoices so that any solicitor who might be acting for the accused could not prepare his defence. Then he obtained a statement, contrary to all the recognized rules of practice. Then the solicitor for the board refused to furnish copies of the invoices. Then there was the action of that same solicitor in attempting to have the accused plead guilty. Finally there was the action of the board, after discovering that an opposition member of parliament was acting as solicitor for the grocer, in issuing instructions to insist upon a heavy fine. I notice that a committee has been set up to revise the criminal code, and as a sideline it might well devote its energies to improving and bringing up to date the procedure followed by the wartime prices and trade board in filing and carrying out prosecutions.

I would suggest to the minister that in all future prosecutions by this board, especially in my own village—which no doubt now will be persecuted more than ever—the well established and defined legal procedure be followed. It is very difficult for me to approve the attitude of this board in deciding who, among a large number of merchants all of whom may be guilty of some slight infractions, should be the victim, who should be persecuted. I would not even suggest that some slight political bias might enter into such a decision; yet I find that in my district, at least, those who have been prosecuted by this board are individuals who are and always have been opposed to this government.

I should like to concur in the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) about veterans affairs. I regret that the minister has decided not to set up the veterans affairs committee at this session, because I am sure he has received many complaints regarding veterans allowances, including a brief from the legion. These allowances at the present time are inadequate and I for one hope that the minister will reconsider his decision and yet decide to set up the veterans affairs committee during this session, if only to deal with allowances under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

The Address—Mr. L. Dionne

Mr. Ludger Dionne (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, many hon. members have already spoken in this debate on the speech from the throne, and no doubt many others will take part in it. It is not my intention to elaborate on its text. In taking part in the debate, I do so with the intention of exposing a situation which, to my mind, is not in the interests of the Canadian taxpayers and which is detrimental to the practical and economical administration of the Canadian government.

This afternoon I had the privilege of hearing my colleague, the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Beaudry), suggest a reduction of the income tax by 50 per cent. I think we can go further than that. We have on our statute books provision for a special sales tax of 8 per cent on a good many manufactured articles. This tax brings to the Canadian treasury a sum varying between $350 million and $400 million per annum. This tax costs the Canadian taxpayers thirty cents for every dollar of processed raw material. Yet it yields to the treasury only eight cents. The difference of twenty-two cents goes into profit of the various intermediaries, according to their various stages in the distribution ladder. This fact is easily verified. The instance I am taking is that of cotton goods, a requisite in every household in Canada including my constituency. Let us look at the tax and profit history of a shirt. When selling $100 worth of shirt fabrics, the textile manufacturer must charge 8 per cent sales tax. This material is then billed at $108 as cost price to the shirt manufacturer. The shirt manufacturer doubles this amount for making the shirt ready for marketing. He thus bills at $216 these goods converted into shirts. The wholesaler adds a profit of 25 per cent to his cost of $216—namely, $54—which brings his sales price to $270. The retail merchant who pays $270 for the goods adds his profit of 50 per cent or $135 which, added to his cost of $270, brings the retail price to $405, which is the price the consumer must pay for these goods.

If there were no sales tax of 8 per cent collected at the source, the same scale of markup would work out as follows. The textile manufacturer would invoice his goods at $100, the shirt manufacturer would bill his shirts at $200. The wholesaler would bill the same goods at $250 and the retailer would make his retail price $375. In other words, the $8 which the government has collected at the manufacturer's shipping department now costs the consumer $30, the difference between $405, which is the retail price with the 8 per cent sales tax, and $375, which would be the retail price after allowing the same margins of profit but without the original sales tax. This means that the consumer has, through the operation of the sales tax, paid $30 for what will bring $8 to the treasury. By the simple process of applying its 8 per cent sales tax at a different level of distribution, the government of this country could obtain the following results: not interfere with the margin of profit or the markup of any of the intermediaries of manufacturing or distribution; not modify the retail purchase price of any article of consumption, but increase its revenue by three and three-quarter times, and thereby eliminate the need of personal income tax to the extent of over one billion dollars a year.

The sales tax of 8 per cent at the source is yielding to the government a revenue of $400 million, in round figures. If the government collected $30 on the same goods instead of $8, they would get an approximate revenue of over one billion dollars, and nobody would be any worse off. Some hon. members may think it will create a problem to the government to collect the sales tax of 8 per cent on the retail level. This problem can be easily solved by compelling the retailers to put a stamp on the shirt. This stamp would represent 8 per cent of the retail price of the shirt.

I hope the government will listen favourably to this suggestion, because I cannot understand why they would any longer permit over one billion dollars to escape from the treasury and go into the cash of intermediaries who do not need it. With this huge sum of over one billion dollars the government could probably vacate the income tax field entirely.

How many times have I previously asked the government for income tax relief in favour of Canadian taxpayers. I will not repeat all I have said in previous years with regard to the income tax and the raising of the exemptions. Everyone here knows my views. This year I should like to add this. In the past I urged higher exemptions for the lower brackets. This year I am urging that all brackets can be almost fully exempted and by means which will represent no added burden to the taxpayers, either as taxpayers or as consumers.

I know that some people stick to the idea that the income tax is on our statute books until the end of humanity. They argue that it is the fairest form of taxation, owing to the fact that the higher the earnings of the individual the higher the taxes. The same reasoning applies to the sales tax. When a wealthy man buys a suit of clothes costing $100 he will pay $8 tax. When the poor man buys a suit of clothes costing $25 he will pay $2 tax. That is the favourite argument. Let me tell you that no matter how just in theory the income tax may appear to some people, it can never be entirely fair in its application, and we cannot be deaf to the protests against it. Some provincial governments collect hundreds of millions of dollars through indirect taxes. You never hear very much criticism of it.

Let us take a package of cigarettes on which there is probably a tax of twenty cents. You never hear anybody complaining about the price of thirty-eight cents at which it is sold on the market. Why? Because the buyer pays for it in cash at the counter. If this package of cigarettes were sold at fifteen cents, and at the end of the year the government tried to collect $60 from the smoker who had bought 300 packages of cigarettes in the course of a year, you would probably hear the same recriminations as you do about the income tax. Why should the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) insist upon the income tax which displeases every Canadian citizen, and which in the case of the farmer particularly makes the laying of each egg, and the picking of each carrot, a bookkeeping operation?

Like every other hon. member of this house, I have been sent here by my constituents to serve to the best of my ability and in their interests. This duty impels me to suggest that the income tax legislation can be repealed, and at no cost either to my constituents or to the rest of the country. In suggesting the means I am only doing my duty and that which the responsibility my electors have placed upon my shoulders forces me to do.

I trust the minister and his officers will give more than glancing consideration to my suggestions. I stand ready to uphold that the welfare of each Canadian justifies it, and I can assure the minister that my constituents, by themselves, are sufficient reason why I should not cease my efforts in the field of taxation. If we can find other ways and means to tax our population without provoking their feelings, I think it is our duty to do so.

The income tax system is obsolete. As long as it applied to business firms exclusively, where reliable auditors had to sign income tax returns, the government had some reason to enforce it, because it could be taken for granted that most of the income tax returns were exact. But now that it applies to almost everybody it would be rather too optimistic to expect the same result. Consequently, when a law cannot be enforced with justice and fairness to all it must be discarded and replaced by some other more practical system. The system I advocate would eliminate the need for income tax and would not add to the burden of the consumer by one iota. It would, however, tell him exactly where his money goes. I believe that the Canadian citizen is big enough to take that with equanimity.

Mrs. Gladys Strum (Qu'Appelle): I wish to take this opportunity, in this our national health week, to discuss the nation's health and in particular the biggest health and treatment problem today challenging our medical men, and one for which we have not yet made any direct provision. I refer to that terrible cause of pain and heartbreak, the nation's number one crippler, arthritis. Twenty years ago tuberculosis stood in a position similar in many respects to that which arthritis holds today. Twenty years ago tuberculosis was little understood. It was greatly feared. There were few treatment centres, and these were so costly as to place them beyond the means of the average family. At that time the death rate from tuberculosis was 84·5 per 100,000 persons. There was not a single province which had free treatment for tuberculosis in any of its forms. Nor was there a province which had a ratio of three beds per annual death, the rate which is now considered to be the necessary ratio. While it was known that the best way to fight tuberculosis was through the use of X-ray, as far as the population as a whole was concerned such a thing was quite out of the question because the cost of X-ray at that time was prohibitive.

In 1926 the anti-tuberculosis league was formed, and it organized its first Christmas seal drive. In that first sale of seals they raised $91,312.75, and in the twenty-three years since that time we have seen a complete transformation in the field of tuberculosis treatment. There are now large and well equipped sanatoria in every province. Twenty years after the inception of the first Christmas seal drive the fund reached the million dollar mark, which was more than ten times as much money for preventive work as the initial drive had yielded. All over Canada this money is now used to conduct mass X-ray services for the early detection of tuberculosis infection.

Most of the nine provinces now offer free treatment for tuberculosis, and several of the provinces have attained the target ratio of three beds per annual death. The death rate has been reduced from 84·5 to 45·9 as the average rate for all of Canada. This rate varies, of course, from province to province, depending upon the length of time the tuberculosis program has been in operation there.

It is notable that those provinces which first undertook to pay the cost of treatment, and so relieve the patient of the burden of expensive care, have made the most rapid gains in reducing the death rate. These provinces, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Ontario, all show high average sanatoria populations, compared with the average number of deaths, while provinces with high death rates had smaller sanatoria accommodation. That is to say, Saskatchewan, which was the first province in Canada to institute the free tuberculosis treatment and subsequently establish a world record for treatment and cure, has now the lowest death rate; and I am happy to say now that we have more beds available than patients needing treatment. In spite of the slight increase due to the war years we have for the first time in our sanatoria empty beds waiting for patients, instead of patients waiting for beds.

Perhaps the most important difference between arthritis and tuberculosis is that tuberculosis, if untreated, means the death of its victims in a relatively short space of time. Arthritis, while being a crippler, is not a quick killer. Perhaps if it were it would have been taken seriously long ago. Perhaps because rheumatism symptoms are fairly widespread and are often confused with muscular strains and stresses we have accepted this burden of pain and suffering without question, and have permitted the disability to go untreated and unchallenged.

But how important is arthritis as a disease? We are happy to have now the results of the most recent attempt to determine the incidence of arthritis in Canada. The survey of November 1947 undertaken by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics at the request of the Department of National Health and Welfare is now before us. Again comparing arthritis with tuberculosis, while there are in Canada 30,000 people suffering from tuberculosis, according to the government survey, in November 1947 there were an estimated 652,000 people, or almost 22 times as many suffering from arthritis as from tuberculosis. This is a comparison worth noting.

The number of arthritic sufferers is more than the total afflicted with heart disease, cancer, tuberculosis and diabetes combined. Yet in Canada there is only one hospital for civilians, equipped for the specialized treatment of civilian arthritis. It is the hospital at Banff, and this hospital can treat only seventy-five patients, who must pay the cost of their own treatment.

I visited this hospital last summer. I was greatly impressed with the provision made there by the nursing sisters of the order of St. Martha. I was impressed with the story the patients told me of the relief they had had from pain, and of restored mobility of limbs through the use of various treatments and surgery. I was impressed beyond anything I had expected; and I could see that, if we could only establish treatment centres where we could get experience in treating large numbers of people to build up a history of cases and to train personnel, the picture for arthritis would be far from hopeless.

Mr. Martin: Perhaps the hon. member would permit me one observation. I am sure she would like to know that, under the new national health plan, funds have been placed at the disposal of the government of British Columbia to do that very thing.

Mrs. Strum: I am glad to hear that, and I shall still ask that it be done for all the provinces.

The November survey carried out by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has some very interesting facts about arthritis in particular. It reveals that 25 per cent of the persons with arthritis have had no medical advice or treatment whatever. The menace to Canada of this untreated disease represents the greatest single loss to industry. It represents approximately 20 per cent of persons suffering unemployment through illness. That is, 19·8 per cent of all persons laid off because of illness are laid off because of arthritis, according to our own bureau of statistics. This represents 22·5 per cent of all the time lost, because of the extended nature of the disease and the time during which people are out of industry and employment. The loss of days by both male and female employees represents the staggering total of 1,650,300 days during the period of the month of October for Canadian labour, or the equivalent of 5,501 years of 300 working days per year.

The Department of National Health and Welfare in its annual report of 1948 states:

> Canada has today 4,800,000 gainfully employed persons. The sickness rate of this vital section of our population is estimated to be nine days per annum, and represents a loss of over $500,000,000 to the national income.

The cost of arthritis might be represented as 22·6 per cent or almost one-quarter of this staggering sum.

While this Canadian survey gives us a very valuable chart as to the prevalence of this painful and disabling malady, it does not recommend any program to alleviate or check its ravages. We are fortunate however in having a report suggesting such a program. I refer to the report by Lord Horder, and the plan for national action which he sets forth here. This report is the result of four years of research by the empire rheumatism council. This council conducted a campaign inquiring into the causes and best means of treatment of rheumatic diseases. It states:

> From laboratory and clinical research, from observations of the work of various treatment centres at home, from a close examination by representatives of the empire rheumatism council into the methods of many of the rheumatic hospitals and clinics in Europe and in the United States, there has been gathered knowledge sufficient to suggest a plan of treatment on a national scale and of some measure of prevention. The purpose of this document is to outline the plan and its medical and administrative aspects to show that it is possible of application without incurring vast expense and that its application would result in a reduction in the ravages of rheumatic diseases—such rheumatic diseases including rheumatism and arthritic cases.

The estimated number of cases in the United Kingdom and Wales is set at over a million, and it is estimated that in Scotland alone there were 344,872 new cases yearly. In addition to the economic loss—the loss of days, the loss of wages and the loss of production—referring to the toll of pain the report states:

> The toll of pain can be calculated on the assumption that almost every patient suffers, since pain is a characteristic symptom of most forms of the disease—pain so great in severe cases that medical practitioners sometimes have experience of patients praying for death as a release. The toll of disablement may be assessed from the fact that the basis of inclusion in the national health insurance figures quoted was incapacity to work on account of rheumatic disease.

I might add here that arthritic patients have told me that when they were first seized with the rheumatoid type of pain they were afraid they would die; later on they were afraid they would not. And as they became progressively worse and became chair cases, and in many cases blind, their condition was extremely sad and hopeless.

The report gives the findings of its investigations, and the evidence obtained thereby in relation to all aspects of the problem. This report, which I would recommend to all members, goes very fully into a classification of types in relation to causes, and stresses the need for the special training of physicians so that they may properly diagnose and classify the various types of arthritis, and recommend proper treatment.

It discusses glandular disturbances, physical injury and occupational causes which may be at the root of infection. It was found that some occupations seemed to provide conditions favourable to arthritis. The November survey by the bureau of statistics seems to bear this out. The women of Canada will be interested to learn that the largest single group comprises those keeping house, 41 per cent of the total arthritic population consisting of mothers or housewives charged with the great responsibility of holding the nation's homes together.

Agriculture, housewives, fishing, trapping and logging head the list of occupations in which the highest rates occur. Level of family incomes is also a factor of the greatest importance. The family income determines whether or not there will be enough of the protective foods; and in investigations carried on in England it was found that children coming from poor homes had three times as much rheumatic infection as children derived from the same class but living in well-managed children's institutions and homes.

Any nation-wide attack on arthritis must include an attack on poverty because bad housing and inadequate diet are factors contributing to the incidence of rheumatic infections and have a bearing on the general health level and resistance of the people.

Climate also was investigated. I think we are all interested in this because we have the impression that if we could only go south, if we could only get to a warm climate or some place like Arizona or Australia, all the symptoms of rheumatism and arthritis might disappear. So climate was investigated in this empire association attack on arthritis. It was found that climate had very little to do with the incidence of arthritis. They investigated coastal and mountainous regions and hot, dry, arid climates like Arizona and Australia, but it was found that in every country there were the same problems and that there were large numbers of people afflicted in varying degrees by this universal crippler, arthritis.

This investigation of hot climates has suggested that the problem is not one of geography but is related more to industrial and occupational groupings. With regard to the treatment of rheumatic diseases—I do not think we can emphasize this too strongly—the report states:

> It must be repeated that much of this sacrifice of human well-being is unavoidable; that there is no refuge in the excuse that, since medical knowledge of causes and of the most efficacious treatments is incomplete, nothing can be done. In the majority of cases a great deal can be done. Even if there were no hope of gaining further knowledge by research—which, emphatically, is not the case—yet the national application of present methods of cure and alleviation would lift much of the burden of rheumatic disease from the community.

The importance of early treatment has been emphasized by a Swedish authority who charted the percentage of cures in relation to the stage at which treatment was undertaken. He states that the results of the first year of treatment resulted in 79 per cent validity; after two years this diminished to 56 per cent and at three years it had dropped to 50 per cent. He defined "validity" as the restoration of the ability to work normally or diminished according to the period which had elapsed before the specialized treatment was taken.

What can we do in Canada to check this painful and crippling malady and to cut down heart disease which results from the unchecked course of rheumatic diseases? We can begin this year by appropriating a part of the budget surplus for assistance to the provinces in launching an all-out drive on arthritis. Our greatest contribution to the health and well-being of the Canadian people can be made in this field because this is the greatest crippler we have, taking a toll much greater than the combined total for heart disease, cancer, tuberculosis and diabetes. I urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) that it be included as a specific category for which grants in aid will be made to the provinces.

Mr. Martin: It is now included.

Mrs. Strum: Is advantage being taken of it?

Mr. Martin: By some of the provinces.

Mrs. Strum: I suggest that the grant include all victims in homes, offices and factories. I would suggest also that the terms on which the grants are made to the provinces be different from those of the other grants and more easily met.

Mr. Martin: There is no condition at all in the general public health grant. There is no magical requirement and the provinces are at liberty to use it.

Mrs. Strum: I am not talking about the general public health grant.

Mr. Martin: That is where it comes.

Mrs. Strum: I am asking the minister to set it out as a separate category. In the speech by the former Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) an outline was given of the bases upon which the grants would be made, and one category was general public health services. That would cover all public health projects, but that is not good enough for the nation's greatest crippler. Then there are tuberculosis control, mental health, venereal disease control, crippled children, professional training, public health research, control of cancer and hospital construction. All of those things have certain conditions attached.

Mr. Martin: There are no conditions except in the case of the cancer control and hospital construction.

Mrs. Strum: The confusion as between the minister and myself lies in the fact that I do not consider that the general public health grant should include arthritis. I consider that arthritis is too important and too damaging to leave it to the option of the provinces. If British Columbia is applying the public health grant to arthritis, that is an admirable thing, but it still will not leave enough money for arthritis and it does not constitute a nation-wide program on arthritis.

The conditions in connection with grants for tuberculosis control are set out in the proposals of the government of Canada. There are two categories of grant, one being conditioned on the prevalence of tuberculosis. That is, the more T.B. you have, the bigger grant you receive.

Mr. Martin: On the incidence of death.

Mrs. Strum: That means that provinces that have already invested large sums of money in sanatoria and to help out their people will now be confronted with a diminishing grant, while the provinces that have not undertaken to do much will be given greater help. There is some justice in that, as I think we must acknowledge the principle of the greater need in health; but I would hope that we could take arthritis out of the general public health grant and treat it the same as we treat tuberculosis, cancer, crippled children, venereal disease and mental health. This is the most important; its total incidence is greater than the combined totals of the diseases I mentioned.

It merits a separate category and even a more generous grant than is given in the case of the diseases mentioned in the statement made on May 14, 1948, by the former Prime Minister. We cannot afford to leave this to the option of the provinces. We cannot afford to impose on the provinces that have already extended themselves so far. There are some provinces that have made outstanding contributions to Canada, indeed to the world. I am thinking of our Dr. Ferguson, who many years ago established free treatment for tuberculosis and conducted a campaign that led to an eventual world record in the treatment of this disease. He did great service to mankind generally.

Mr. Martin: That was at Qu'Appelle.

Mrs. Strum: The work now being done in the field of cancer by the Saskatchewan government is considerable. The late Dr. Allan Blair established a program which is costing us really more than we can afford. Yet our expenditures are not diminished by these grants, because we must match the federal government expenditures. That makes it very difficult for us to expand our program of health services. It will make it impossible to extend it to any new disease or to any new category.

If we are going to make an all-out attack on arthritis we cannot limit the number to be treated. It will have to be like T.B. We will have to give treatment for perhaps months and years. It is not something like an appendix operation or a tonsil removal.

We cannot think in terms of cost either, but there will be many cases of preventive treatment that will result eventually in a great saving because we will prevent this crippling process which removes so many people from the field of active production and makes them a charge on the community, on the municipality, or on the province. Therefore I would urge the government and the minister to take arthritis on its own merits and treat it even more generously than these other diseases have been treated. I would urge them not to leave it to the voluntary association which is now talking about arthritis but which has no funds for research.

Mr. Martin: Oh, yes, it has.

Mrs. Strum: A mere fleabite.

Mr. Martin: They wrote to me only last week that they cannot use the funds which the federal government and the provinces together have put at their disposal this year.

Mrs. Strum: The reason they cannot is that there are no centres where the funds can be applied. We were able to go so far with T.B. because we had treatment centres where we could apply the grants for research. While we were treating T.B. patients, wiping out sources of infection and saving lives, we were building up research information which has been of inestimable value to the world. Therefore I would say that research funds will not be any good until we have centres to bring together victims of arthritis, and to bring together doctors with specialized training in arthritis. We can do that only by giving the money to the provinces, because we all recognize that health is a provincial matter, that the provinces will have to institute and undertake the program, but that the very nature of the expenditures makes that impossible until the federal government kicks through with a lot more money than it has given in any of these other diseases.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to extend sincere congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, particularly since those two hon. gentlemen are members of the "Little Chicago" group. My remarks in this debate will be a description of the conditions I encountered during my trip overseas last autumn as a delegate to the commonwealth parliamentary association. I regret that perhaps some of my remarks may not coincide with remarks that have been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). However, they will be a description of conditions exactly as I saw them during my visit to Europe for a period of two months.

We were privileged to be in England, and particularly in the city of London, for quite some time. We spent several days at the meetings of the commonwealth parliamentary association, and then had a few days to go and do whatever we wished. I had the privilege of meeting members of the government of Great Britain, discussing with them problems that had arisen in Canada, and endeavouring to find some solution whereby they might be remedied. I was particularly interested in trade between Canada and Great Britain.

When I left Canada for overseas I had the idea that when I returned I might be able to tell the people of the county where I live the complete story as to why Canada today does not appear to be receiving the amount of benefit from British trade that it should receive. In my discussion with members of the British government I found that for quite some time the trade had been tunnelled through a one-way street, and apparently it must continue in that one direction for a considerable time in the future. When we consider that this country must have trade in both directions in order to survive, that was a very discouraging condition to encounter. To my regret I also found that some of the members of the government of Great Britain were very much opposed to the Havana agreement, which had been discussed for some time, and apparently was then practically in final form.

I have here some literature which came to me in London. It is distributed by the "Empire Industries Association and British Empire League." That organization is independent of any political party, but in looking over the literature I find that in the list of officials there appear the names of seven members of parliament. That would indicate that the members of parliament were taking the same stand in this regard. I should like to read a few of the remarks contained in this pamphlet.

> The mutual aid agreement, under article 7, demanded "The elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce." The American interpretation of this phrase is the destruction of Imperial preference.

I believe I have made myself clear in this house as to my ideas on trade. I believe in freer trade. I have committed myself on various occasions on the floor of this house, and I am still of the same opinion. Trade is the very lifeblood of this country. In order for us to survive, when we produce much more than we can consume ourselves, we must trade with other countries. I believe that the freer the movement of that trade between all peace-loving countries the greater the prosperity in Canada. In no way would I wish to interfere with trade with any country wanting to trade with us on an equal basis. The pamphlet goes on to say with reference to the Havana charter:

> This will disintegrate the Empire and isolate each member of it. Not one of the dominions, not even Great Britain, can stand alone in competition for world trade, and must be undersold by mass production in America and by the goods of low-wage countries.

There is one problem I found there that I fail to understand, and it has never been fully explained to me. I do not understand why Great Britain is trading with countries whose produce is produced by slave labour. They are trading with some of those countries in preference to Canada. I realize that they may buy more cheaply in those countries than they can buy in Canada, but today, with world conditions as they are, I feel that after the wonderful contribution Canada has made to Great Britain we should at least have a preference over those countries. Another passage of this pamphlet reads:

Preference is to be eliminated and empire markets handed over to foreigners.

That expression pretty much designates the United States of America as a foreign country; and I wonder just how some members of the British parliament must feel when they read literature of that character. In view of their contribution during the last war I believe the United States deserves something better than to be called a foreign country, and I think they would be perfectly justified in expecting something more than that. I am reminded of the plant in Birmingham where Austin cars are manufactured. When we were overseas, much of the steel in that plant came from the United States. That steel was shipped to Britain under ERP; the cars were manufactured and shipped back to the United States, where they were sold in competition with cars manufactured in that country. I believe the United States has gone a long way in helping Britain get back on her feet, and I believe they deserve more credit than they are receiving at the present time.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I was greatly amazed to find that salmon canned in Russia was being sold in England while Canadian canned salmon was being held in warehouses on the Pacific coast. You will remember that in this country in wartime salmon was in very short supply. We shut off the export of raw and canned salmon to all other countries in order that the greatest possible quantities might be shipped to Britain. Today I believe the canners of British Columbia are greatly worried over the large amount of canned salmon they have on hand, with no markets. I also discovered that England was shipping tin plate to Russia in exchange for other commodities. So I believe it would be difficult for Britain to explain why she should be dealing with countries that produce by means of forced labour in preference to trading with countries that have tried in every way to deal squarely with her.

Mr. Young: They have no dollars.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): My hon. friend says they have no dollars. In reply let me say that we have had a dollar problem in our own country, brought about to a large extent by the fact that we have given and loaned materials to Britain which we might have sold elsewhere for the dollars we lack today. That is my personal opinion. I was very much discouraged to discover that apparently we in this country have little chance of benefiting from the British market for some time to come. When it is remembered that this country, with a population of twelve or thirteen million, has contributed in loans and gifts to Britain over five billion dollars, one might be justified in the hope that first consideration should be given this country, but that is not being done at the present time. I know other delegates who discussed these matters with members of the British government left Britain with the same feeling.

As I said before, and I want to emphasize for just a moment, trade that passes through a one-way street can never be successful; and this one-way trade has been going on for some years. I believe the time has come when this country must find some other place to do business. Perhaps we will have to go further afield and find other markets; but there is a limit to just how far a country of twelve or thirteen million people can go in the way of gifts and loans, with nothing in return.

On motion of Mr. Stuart (Charlotte) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: We will continue this debate tomorrow.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 2, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

OFFICER IN COMMAND AT MINGAN, QUE., AIRPORT

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) asked me a question about Mingan, and I should like to answer it now.

Mingan is an emergency landing field on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. It was built in 1941 by United States forces with the consent of the Canadian authorities for use in case of need by aircraft on flights from the United States, primarily on ferry operations. This field was included in the facilities built by the United States for which the United States was reimbursed in 1946. The field is used infrequently and almost exclusively as an emergency or alternative landing field by United States transport aircraft, supplying United States personnel. For this reason, by arrangement with the Canadian authorities the field has been under the care of a small detachment of United States personnel. It is understood that similar arrangements exist in other countries, including the United Kingdom.

The establishment at Mingan falls within the central air command, at the head of which is Air Vice Marshal Middleton.

Similar arrangements are still in effect at Chimo on Ungava bay, and Frobisher on Baffin island.

There are also, by arrangement, small detachments of Canadian personnel in the United States under the immediate command of Canadian officers.

These arrangements are in full accordance with the joint defence arrangements announced on February 12, 1947.

If and when the circumstances requiring the use of these United States planes should change, and if it should be decided to continue the operation of Mingan, that operation would be taken over by us. Arrangements looking to this have been under consideration.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

LIMITATION OF ELECTION EXPENSES—PUBLICITY TO CAMPAIGN FUND CONTRIBUTIONS AND EXPENDITURES

Hon. C. G. Power (Quebec South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7 to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, (election expenses).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Power: During the session of 1939 a committee of this house was set up to deal with electoral matters. Its third report consisted of a draft bill to amend sections 62 and 63 of the Dominion Elections Act. The bill which is being presented today is an exact copy of that draft bill. May I say that after some consideration the report was adopted by the house in 1939.

The aim of the bill is to limit political expenditures at the constituency level, and to give wide publicity to contributions to campaign funds and to expenditures from campaign funds.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PROVISION FOR SINGLE TRANSFERABLE VOTE

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to amend the Dominion Elections Act (single transferable vote).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, this amendment to the Dominion Elections Act is designed to permit the voter to indicate his order of preference when there are more than two candidates in an election. The bill is modeled closely upon a bill introduced in the house in 1924 and in 1925 by the then minister of justice, the late Ernest Lapointe.

A majority of seats now and in the future are likely to be contested by more than two candidates. The single transferable vote has been used in Manitoba and Alberta with considerable satisfaction for many years.

By the simple procedure of marking the ballot with figures instead of the blunderbuss X, the elector is permitted to exercise his or her franchise to the full, and the constituency is assured of a member of parliament who goes to Ottawa with a clear and unassailable mandate from a majority of the voters.

Mr. MacNicol: It does no such thing.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

PORTRAYAL OF CRIMES BY PICTURES IN MAGAZINES, ETC., TENDING TO INDUCE VIOLENCE

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, to amend the Criminal Code (portrayal of crimes).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, this bill is designed to amend the Criminal Code to cover magazines and periodicals commonly called crime comics, the publication of which is at the present time legal, but which, it is widely felt, tend to the lowering of morals and to inducing the commission of crimes by juveniles.

Section 207 of the Criminal Code provides, upon indictment, a penalty of two years for anyone who portrays obscene literature, obscene objects or drugs. The purpose is to amend the act by adding a fourth category which would cover the crime comics. Then if anyone distributes or sells such magazines, within the definition of the act, he will have committed an offence and will be subject to the penalty set out for the three categories I have mentioned.

Mr. Cruickshank: That will work against your political propaganda.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

ARREST IN HUNGARY—PROTEST OF ARCHBISHOP VACHON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. O. Bertrand (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On December 29 last an Ottawa newspaper, Le Droit, made public the text of a telegram addressed by His Excellency Archbishop Vachon to the Prime Minister urging the Canadian government to protest to the government of Hungary against the arrest of Cardinal Mindszenty. Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs let the house know whether any action has been taken by the government in this connection?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question, and I am now in a position to reply. I hope my reply will be acceptable as an answer to a question put on the order paper by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Caouette).

The arrest of Cardinal Mindszenty, announced by the Hungarian government on the 27th of December, has caused deep concern to all free and democratic nations. The Canadian government strongly condemns and deplores this further case of religious persecution by the communist government of Hungary, as it would any case of religious persecution in any country.

In a broadcast on New Year's day, the Prime Minister stated:

> Providence will not abandon men of good will. We are fortunate to be living in a land where religion is respected by all, and the religious authorities have the fullest freedom. We are all apt to take such freedom for granted.
> But the increasingly brutal persecutions of religious leaders in countries behind the iron curtain have shocked all civilized people.
> Such examples remind us how precious is the personal and religious freedom which is our birthright.

The day after the news of Cardinal Mindszenty's arrest was received, Canada, as a signatory of the treaty of peace with Hungary, took immediate steps to secure all the available information on the matter, with a view to taking any action under the peace treaty which might be effective in halting religious persecution in Hungary.

The value of a joint declaration with other signatories of the treaty of peace protesting the action of the Hungarian government in arresting Cardinal Mindszenty was examined. It was found, however, that such joint action was not possible, and indeed might have had an effect contrary to that which was desired.

In the circumstances, and acting for itself, the government, having no diplomatic representative in Budapest, instructed our ambassador in Washington to communicate with the Hungarian minister there as follows:

> The Canadian government has learned that the head of the Catholic church in Hungary, Cardinal Mindszenty, has been arrested on charges of treason, espionage and illegal currency transactions, which, on the basis of the evidence submitted and in the light of Cardinal Mindszenty's previous record as a Hungarian patriot and fighter against oppression and tyranny, do not command respect.

That is diplomatic language for, "We don't believe them." The note goes on to say:

> The Canadian government has also learned that the Senior Bishop of the Lutheran church in Hungary was arrested in September last on charges similar to those leveled at Cardinal Mindszenty and was sentenced to two years in prison; and that the Senior Bishop of the Calvinist church has been forced by persecution to flee from Hungary to Switzerland.
> The Canadian government, therefore, wishes strongly to protest against a policy which, on the basis of information which we possess, appears designed to destroy religious freedom in Hungary, and calls attention to the article of the peace treaty with Hungary, to which Canada is a party, and which provides that:

"Hungary shall take all measures necessary to secure to all persons under Hungarian jurisdiction, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion, the enjoyment of human rights and of the fundamental freedoms, including freedom of expression, of press and publication, of religious worship, of political opinion, and of public meeting."

The Canadian ambassador delivered this protest to the Hungarian minister, who undertook to communicate it to his government. That is how the matter now stands.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last evening I was speaking with regard to the conditions I had encountered during my visit overseas last August. For a short time today I should like to carry on and describe as best I can the conditions I found in Greece during the short visit I made to that country.

You will all remember that in October, 1940, that country was invaded by the Italians. The Greek people put up a gallant fight and drove the Italians back into Albania. Then their country was invaded by the Germans, who held the country under their control for about four years.

During the German occupation bridges, rolling stock, engines and everything connected with their railroads were destroyed, stolen or taken out of the country in some manner or other. The ports of the country were greatly damaged by the Germans, Italians and Albanians and after the country had been occupied by the Germans great damage was done by the British and United States air forces. Seventy-five per cent of the shipping of the country was lost, including freighters and passenger ships.

Seven thousand villages were burned and destroyed. The forests of the entire country were cut down for fuel or to be exported to Germany and other countries. Even the olive trees were cut down for that purpose. All the cattle, horses and farm machinery were stolen while the Germans occupied the country. During the occupation by the Germans and the Italians thousands of Greek men, women and children died of starvation, tuberculosis or from other causes. There is today very little equipment in the country to take care of their sick.

Greece is a country of 7,500,000 population. Today 700,000 are refugees who have been driven from their homes. They are without a place to live in or without food to eat. Fourteen thousand children have been stolen by the guerrillas and are being taught communism. During my short stay there I saw in northern Greece thousands of people living in United States army tents without food, without clothing and without fuel. I remember seeing those people boiling chestnuts in nothing but water until they were soft enough to eat. Outside of a little bread they had no food at all. In one square mile I saw more starvation, suffering and grief than I saw in all the rest of Europe.

Clothing, bedding, shoes, food, particularly food for children, are all badly needed today. Building materials are greatly needed, particularly roofing materials. Many people could have some sort of shelter if they only had a roof that would keep out the weather. When I see the large surplus of potatoes in my own province of New Brunswick, when I realize the great production of canned fish on both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts, when I know that farm products are in plentiful supply in Canada today, I wonder if we as Canadians and Christians cannot give some support to these people, who are directly fighting communism, if we could not share with them some of the wealth we have in this country of ours.

In my estimation the people of Greece are not fighting for Greece alone. They are blocking the gateway to the Mediterranean. They are the only barrier between communistic Russia and the Mediterranean and there is little doubt in my mind that Russia would like to have a hold in the Mediterranean, particularly close to the Suez canal. These people are blocking that gateway and, as I have said, they are living under horrible conditions.

If you could visit there you would realize that conditions are such that the country is ripe for communism. If you can get people hungry enough, if they are without shelter, without food, without clothing, you soon get them into a state where they will adopt any ideology. This is particularly dangerous since the communists are so active today in that country.

I have a high regard for those people. During my stay I had the privilege of meeting the King and Queen, who I believe are the only inspiration these people have today, the only encouragement they have to carry on. They are putting up a gallant battle against great difficulties. I think this country should help these unfortunate people to a greater extent than we are doing.

I am convinced that if the members of this House of Commons could see the conditions that exist in that country they would not hesitate for a minute to do everything in their power to help in every way they could. There were other Canadians and other members of the House of Commons in that delegation. I hope that those members will take part in this debate and substantiate the statements I have made as to conditions there.

We are blessed with plenty in this country, and I make one more appeal to the members of this House of Commons and to the people of Canada. Let us as a united country do everything we can to support these gallant people, who today are doing everything in their power to defend themselves and also, in my estimation, defending the people of this country at the same time.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to take part in this debate but for the fact that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) devoted nearly the whole of a two and a half hour speech to a presentation of his views on dominion-provincial relations, views which I regret to say I cannot but regard as being palpably incorrect and ill-informed in many important respects. We on this side of the house would be derelict in our duty if we allowed those views to go uncorrected. The leader of the opposition, for example, said:

> Let me say without reservation that any such statement—

That is, any such statement that Premier Duplessis of Quebec and the premier of Ontario had prevented agreement at the dominion-provincial conference.

> —is utterly false and wholly unrelated to the truth.

I join issue with that statement of the hon. gentleman. I say that no two persons contributed more than those two premiers to the failure of the 1945-46 conference to reach an agreement.

I not only say this but, sir, with your permission I now propose to prove it. While I thus join issue with the hon. gentleman, I wish to compliment him upon having been overwhelmingly eloquent and convincing when dealing at great length with those matters which no one disputes. Surely we all agree, for example, that for Canada a federal state is much superior to a unitary state, and indeed is the only possible state for this country. I think we agree likewise with my hon. friend's statement that—

> For many long years it has been apparent that substantial changes were necessary to bring to its full efficiency and vigour the combined system of national government we describe as confederation.

Who, may I ask, in this assembly would not do everything to preserve and protect the Canadian federal system and constitution under which it operates? I myself am in favour of the greatest possible measure of effective provincial autonomy. Indeed, my interest in dominion-provincial relations, when I served under the present hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken), was motivated, as his was at that time and I am sure is today, by a desire to make real and effective the provincial rights of my province, which, because of a lack of provincial revenues, were in many important respects wholly illusory.

Likewise, I am opposed to centralization of power in a dominion government as it was centralized under the Bennett government. This was not because Prime Minister Bennett desired that it should be centralized, but because under the conditions of that time several provinces lacked the revenues to exercise their provincial rights, and therefore had to go to Ottawa and submit to Ottawa's conditions, mostly reasonable, in order to secure from the Bennett government dominion funds with which to exercise their provincial rights. This is not provincial autonomy. It is provincial subjection to dominion control, and it exists under the financial plan of confederation.

I also believe in the protection of the rights of the minority for the most excellent reason that the population of my province is one of the most conspicuous minorities in the Dominion of Canada, and is likely always to remain so.

In all of these points of agreement between us, however, I refuse to take second place to my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). Indeed, sir, I claim a prior place to him because while I, during the whole of my public life both in provincial politics and in federal politics, have always held these views, he is a more recent convert to them, as quotations, made so appropriately in this debate by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), so amply prove.

Let me now set out the points upon which I am in complete disagreement with the hon. gentleman. I disagree entirely with his interpretation of the history of Canada at the time of confederation. As he stated it to this house, it is in my opinion the very antithesis of the historical facts. I object, for example, to his assertion that the Canadian constitution was patterned after the United States constitution and inspired by the Federalist Papers, and that we adopted from that country a system of checks and balances. I suggest that the influence which United States federalism had upon the fathers of confederation in this country was in the direction exactly the opposite to that which he told this chamber that it was. The main circumstance which, in the great republic to the south of us, influenced the fathers of confederation was that at that time that great country was being torn to pieces in a civil war based upon the issue of states' rights. If there ever was a time when the United States constitution would make little appeal as a precedent to any nation like Canada, contemplating a federal system of its own, 1867 was the time. I suggest to my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, that if he studies this matter somewhat more than he appears to have done so far he will get to know—he certainly does not appear to know now—that not only were the fathers of confederation, particularly those of his own Conservative party, anxious not to create substantial provincial rights in Canada, but they were in favour of an outright unitary state in Canada.

If he looks at page 229 of the confederation debates he will see the Hon. John A. Macdonald quoted to this effect, and at page 403 the Hon. John Rose, later Minister of Finance for Canada. On page 690 of Pope's "Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald", he will see Sir Charles Tupper's views on this subject. But, owing largely to the efforts of the Liberal leaders of that day, it was made apparent that Canada had to be created on a federal basis. The result of those deliberations was stated by Sir John A. Macdonald in his usual lucid and terse way in these words:

> Therefore, we were forced to the conclusion that we must either abandon the idea of union altogether, or devise a system of union in which the separate provincial organizations would be in some degree preserved. So that those who were, like myself, in favour of legislative union—

That is, of an outright unitary state.

> —were obliged to modify their views and accept the project of a federal union as the only scheme practicable, even for the maritime provinces.

This is from confederation debates, page 29. This same idea has been covered by one of the Liberal leaders, the Hon. George Brown, in these words—confederation debates, page 108:

> There was but one choice open to us. Federal union or nothing. But in truth this scheme now before us has all the advantages of a legislative union and a federal one as well.

It was in consequence of these opinions that we had set up in Canada a federal state strongly centralized in many respects, with all of the residuary legislative powers left by our constitution with the dominion government. In no respect was it so completely centralized as in the financial plan of confederation, the very hub around which revolves nearly all of our problems of dominion-provincial relationship in 1949, as in all previous years. In this financial plan the utmost in centralization was deliberately provided for. The provinces were deliberately left with small revenues, which in some provinces were inadequate from the start, in order that the legal powers which they received under the constitution would be supported as little as possible by revenues wherewith to pay for exercising them. The idea was that after a short trial with that sort of federal system they would ultimately, in the language of Sir A. T. Galt, "at no distant day be enabled to do away with those artificial boundaries which separated one province from another, and come together as one united people"—without any provinces. The last three words are mine.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is obvious.

Mr. Garson: It is noteworthy that the leader of the opposition's Halifax speech, and all of his earlier speeches, are in keeping with this Conservative centralizing tradition, but he is slipping away from it since he became leader of His Majesty's opposition.

Let us look at the financial plan of confederation. It gave to the national government unlimited powers of taxation with which to take care of the cost of national matters, which even at confederation was very considerable. To the provinces the dominion government was to pay a subsidy. It was considered that this subsidy, together with the provinces' returns from their natural resources and other local revenues, would be sufficient to take care of the small cost of the simple machinery of provincial administration without imposing any provincial taxes at all. But against the chance that provincial taxes might be required, the provinces were given the power to impose unpopular direct taxes, such as income tax, corporation tax and death duties. At that time these unpopular taxes were not in use by any government; and the fact that the provinces could get the extra money they required only by the use of unpopular taxes was intended to make them prudent and economical. In a speech at Sherbrooke in 1864 the architect, the man chiefly responsible for this financial plan, Sir A. T. Galt, gave a full and clear statement of how it was to work. This is what he said, in part:

> Now, one objection to confederation was made on the ground of expense and in order to meet this every effort had been made to reduce the cost of the local governments so that the local machinery should be as little costly as possible, for it would not do to affront the intelligence of the people and tell them we had devised an expensive kind of machinery to do a very insignificant amount of work.

Imagine telling that to any provincial treasurer, with the duties a provincial government has to carry on in these days. Further on in that speech he said:

> It was not intended to hold out any inducement to future extravagance to local governments but it was hoped that by the operation of natural causes, such a check would be put upon expenditures as would bring them down to the lowest point or at least prevent them from becoming lavish . . . If they increased their expenses in proportion to their growth of population, they would be obliged to resort to direct taxation and he thought that they might trust the people themselves to keep a sharp watch over the local government lest they should resort to direct taxation.

Well, sir, how did this limited and static conception of provincial responsibility, as set out in this speech and written into our constitution, where it remains today, work out? It did not work. The proposed subsidies to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were twice increased during the negotiations before confederation, and Nova Scotia ran into a heavy deficit immediately after confederation. From having heard him on previous occasions I imagine the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) may say, "Well, that is because the subsidy system does not work," but I would dispute such a statement. It was not due to a defect in the subsidies as such; it was due to the concept that the provinces had an insignificant amount of work to do and that the financial provision for that work could be correspondingly niggardly and inadequate.

In Manitoba our experience was somewhat more fortunate. With us this financial arrangement, it is true, with some modification, worked reasonably satisfactorily until 1911; but with us it broke down completely under the great changes brought about by the first world war. The reason for the breakdown is simple and obvious. The insignificant amount of work the local governments were required to do in 1867 had increased in cost many times. I believe that if you take the figures for dominion, provincial and municipal expenditures upon those matters which ordinarily come under provincial jurisdiction, such as education, health and so on, for the whole of Canada, the increase is about 1,200 per cent or twelve times between 1867 and 1937. Obviously revenues which had been provided for the needs of the provinces in 1867 were utterly and completely inadequate to meet the incomparably higher costs of the 1930's and 1940's.

Thus, sir, the leader of the opposition is palpably in error when he says that we followed the United States of America with its emphasis upon states' rights, and its checks and balances. On the contrary, some of our leading Canadian statesmen did not want a federal system at all. When reluctantly they were forced to accept one they made it as strongly centralized as they could, and in no respect more so than in the matter of its financial provisions. The leader of the opposition, therefore, is under a complete misconception with regard to the Canadian constitution, which is the central point in all these discussions that have been taking place these last ten years. No matter how logical might be the reasoning he applied to the set of premises which is infesting his mind, how could he reach a sound conclusion when he began with such premises?

The fact is that in all these efforts that have been made by the majority of the provinces of Canada during the past ten years with the assistance of the dominion government, but with the minimum of help if not outright opposition from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, they have been trying to cure this centralist financial plan by providing not one or two but all the provinces of Canada with adequate revenues to fully exercise their provincial rights.

For as long as this plan remains unchanged it creates for the provinces a treasury problem which has varied in size and in intensity as between one province and another roughly in proportion to the taxable resources of the province. In the wealthy provinces, it is true, the problem has been almost completely obscured by their wealth, and thus it has not occurred to them as being a problem even in bad times. But in the less wealthy provinces this problem exists at all times, and is much more painfully apparent in bad times.

The problem is a simple one and can be stated in a short sentence. Under modern conditions the provinces do not have enough revenue, under this financial plan of confederation, to pay for the exercise of their provincial rights. Thus the rights the provinces possess at law, which are guaranteed under the constitution but for which they cannot pay, they do not possess in fact. In this way for most of the provinces of Canada, for all seven that signed this agreement, their provincial autonomy was impaired. However, it is not only provincial autonomy which is impaired. The dominion has no legal right to perform provincial functions, under our constitution; and the result is that if the provinces cannot pay to have them performed they remain unperformed, and the whole scheme of government under our constitution breaks down.

For these reasons it is difficult to understand those who argue that if the provinces enter into a tax agreement with the dominion government we are centralizing power in the dominion. Surely, sir, such an agreement does the exact opposite. It decentralizes political power in this country by increasing the effective rights of the provinces; and if the rights of the provinces are not effective, of what use are they to any province?

One of the key recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission, which was appointed to investigate and find a solution to this problem, was that income and corporation taxes and death duties should be imposed exclusively by the dominion government, and that in return for their loss the dominion government should make subsidy grants to the provincial treasuries and also relieve those treasuries of some of their current financial burdens. As we all know, an attempt was made in 1941 to secure agreement among the provinces to implement this report, but unfortunately this attempt was unsuccessful. Shortly afterward, however, the urgent need of maintaining war production in Canada necessitated the provinces and the dominion entering into the wartime tax suspension agreement. Under this agreement, the Sirois recommendation that the dominion government should be the only one in the income and corporation tax field was put into effect, upon the condition provided for in that agreement that the dominion government should make substantial grants to the provincial treasury.

These agreements, as their name would indicate, lasted for the duration of the war and one year thereafter. What, sir, was the experience of the provinces under these agreements? Were all the dire prophecies that were uttered by the premiers who walked out of the 1941 conference realized? No, sir, they were not. The experience of all the provincial treasuries, wealthy and not so wealthy, under this agreement was exceedingly favourable. All of them showed annual surpluses as long as the agreements lasted. The aggregate of these surpluses in some cases reached substantial figures. On ordinary account, those in the case of Ontario, for example, were $46,812,000; in the case of Quebec, $88,731,000. It could not be argued that, under these agreements, the wealthy treasuries were being prejudiced in any way.

Now, sir, this government realized that when the wartime tax suspension agreement ran out it would be disastrous for the majority of the provinces to return to the conditions which prevailed before the war. The dominion government, therefore, called the provinces together in a conference in August, 1945. The dominion made certain proposals to this conference, with the details of which I have no intention of detaining the members any longer than to point out, that if the provinces would continue to permit the dominion to have exclusive control over income and corporation taxes, as well as over death duties, then the dominion treasury would pay to the provincial treasuries substantially more money than had been paid under the wartime tax suspension agreement under which these treasuries had flourished so well.

In addition to that the dominion would bring in, for the benefit of the Canadian people, the most extensive program of social services that had ever been brought down by any Canadian government up until that time, as well as a public investment program which was to be worked out in collaboration with the provinces.

K. R. Wilson, one of the most competent financial journalists in this or any other country, made an estimate, I think the only estimate available, as to what it would cost the dominion to implement those proposals. He estimated it would cost no less than $600 million per year, which compares with the pre-war peak collections of $117 million per year which all the provinces obtained from income, corporation taxes, and death duties. It could not therefore be argued by any fair-minded person that this offer was in any sense an ungenerous one.

I have been told by a very well-known authority, whom I have no intention of quoting, Mr. Speaker, because it was a private conversation—this man was from Australia and an expert in his field—that this was a far more generous offer than the federal government had ever made to the states of that country.

This conference met in August, 1945, to consider these proposals. After five days the conference was adjourned, to meet again in January 1946. These negotiations which had been under way had produced at least one point of agreement upon which all the provinces and the dominion were unanimous, but which the hon. leader of the opposition, strangely enough, neglected to mention in this debate. One of his main arguments, as I have understood it, and I hope he will correct me if I am wrong, is that when the provinces sell or rent to the dominion their main tax field of direct taxation for an increased subsidy, however large, they lose their financial responsibility because they then lack any major provincial tax field in which such financial responsibility can be exercised. This is an argument with which I agree. In other words, the exercise of a financial responsibility is the balancing off on one hand by the treasury of the desire to be popular by providing more services for the people, against the desire to be popular by not imposing taxes upon the people. A tax field is required in which to exercise that responsibility.

If we stop at that point of my hon. friend's argument, as he did, it is not a bad argument. It is quite a good argument.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has asked whether or not I agree, may I point out that, at no time during that conference, did I use the term "sell", but used the term "rent", as he is well aware, because we were not prepared to give up our taxing powers. The same point was made by Premier Macdonald and Premier Manning, as well as by Premier Duplessis and myself.

Mr. Garson: I entirely accept my hon. friend's interjection because it has no bearing on the point I am making, whether it is sold or rented.

As I was saying, if we stopped at that point, as he did, this would be a good argument. With a singular lack of frankness the hon. gentleman at this point failed to tell the house that, to replace the field of direct income, corporation and death taxes, it was unanimously agreed that the dominion was to delegate to the provinces for the duration of the agreement the right to levy retail sales taxes within specified limits. In other words, one major tax field was to be replaced by another and the subsidies, at the same time, very substantially increased. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, this makes all the difference. For the sales tax is a productive field towards which, and away from state income taxes, there is a noticeable trend in the state governments of the United States within the past few years.

The negotiations were again resumed in the latter part of April and the early part of May, 1946. It was not until Monday, April 29, that the Ontario government, under the leadership of the hon. gentleman who was then Premier Drew, brought down its final counter proposal, the main feature of which was the Ontario formula for arriving at the rental which it would accept for the income and corporation tax fields. I do not have any hope in the world of being able to paraphrase this formula so I think I had better read it to the house. Certainly, it is a masterpiece of lucidity.

It reads this way:

> In presenting this formula the Ontario government submits that until the balancing factors are determined by way of principle the basic figure cannot be settled with any arithmetical accuracy.
> There would be a determined minimum per capita payment which, for convenience, can now be described as "X". The total annual rental to be paid by the dominion government to each province will be "X" dollars multiplied by the gross national production per capita for the year before the payment, divided by the gross national production per capita for the year 1941, multiplied by the population of the province for the year preceding the rental payment, or the minimum actual payment of "X" dollars multiplied by the population of the year preceding payment or of 1941 whichever is the greater. This may be set out in the following algebraic form with the preceding year being referred to as 194*y* > subject to a minimum payment.

>
> Or, in the alternative:
> "X" x 194*y* population } whichever shall be greater
> or
> "X" x 1941 population }

Mr. Jackman: Who helped you with your income tax form?

Mr. Garson: I need not tell you, Mr. Speaker, that following this submission, the next few days were taken up with attempts to determine what the unknown X and Y were, and to ascertain what they would produce in money rental for these tax fields, and also in endeavouring to get some definite figure from the province of Quebec as to what it would consider an adequate rental.

When the Ontario formula had been clarified to the point where it was possible for the then Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley, to make an estimate of the additional costs to the dominion government of the Ontario proposals, he did so. On May 3, he submitted his findings to the conference. He estimated that in the year 1947 the absolute minimum increased cost of the Ontario proposals would be $134 million over and above the cost of the dominion proposals, and then he added this rather significant sentence. I am certain that his figures have never been challenged, and if anyone wants to challenge them today I will take up the challenge with the figures I have here. He said:

> This would mean that if the proposed tax transfers and subsidies suggested by the province of Ontario were accepted, they would total something like $50,000,000 more than all the provincial revenues, including the dominion subsidies, before the war.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member says it was not challenged I feel sure that his memory must be failing, because it was challenged and these figures were described as nonsense.

Mr. Garson: Yes, they were, and the reply of Mr. Ilsley was that if you could refute them it would be much better than calling them nonsense. I will say that my hon. friend, as he so often does, challenged them by calling them nonsense. That is not the way to challenge figures.

Mr. Drew: They were Mr. Ilsley's figures.

Mr. Garson: May I say that I would be delighted to take my seat now and have the hon. gentleman rise in his place and point to the time when he has ever challenged them by refutation and not by calling them nonsense.

In other words, sir, this hon. gentleman, who the other day descanted at great length about the iniquities of the subsidies system and how it corrupted the governments which had received them, what a terrible thing it was, how it abused provincial rights, was talking about rights almost every one of which had been won by Sir Oliver Mowat in the courts against Sir John A. Macdonald at a time when the dominion government was paying large subsidies to the government of Ontario.

But this gentleman, who objects to the whole subsidized system as iniquitous, suggests that he is willing to make a deal with the dominion government for these tax fields provided the dominion will pay the provinces, not this small amount that would have corrupted anybody, but $50 million more than all provincial revenues from all sources before the war. This was on the morning of May 3, 1946.

An hon. Member: But this is 1949.

Mr. Garson: I am talking about the conference in 1946. The hon. member is three years behind.

Mr. Graydon: The minister is ten years behind.

Mr. Garson: The hon. gentleman replied to this disclosure by Mr. Ilsley—I do not want to get these hon. gentlemen mixed up. I am referring to the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the then Prime Minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I must apologize for having referred to the hon. gentleman as the then Prime Minister of Canada. I was talking about the year 1946 and I think that is as close as he will ever get to being Prime Minister. I should have said the then premier of Ontario, to which I am sure he will take no exception. When Mr. Ilsley pointed out these facts, was he embarrassed by the size of his demands? No, he was not. He said that he and his colleagues had not been haggling about money and that they were not there as clamorous beggars asking for a handout. But, said he:

> The government of Ontario has gone the very limit in making agreement possible, and when I say that it has gone the very limit I mean that it is prepared to make adjustments in detail, but not adjustments in principle or adjustments in regard to the net overriding amount which it receives.

It must get that much money. This quotation will be found at page 595 of the record of the proceedings. Therefore when my hon. friend goes about the country, and comes into this chamber, and says that Ontario was very fairminded—"We never took a take-it-or-leave-it attitude"—may I say that he did not take a "take-it-or-leave-it attitude" as to details, but his ultimatum applied only to the principles—and to his money—the overriding amount of his money.

Well, sir, once the nature of the Ontario stand became apparent the conference was finished. There was no more eloquent proof of that fact than Premier Duplessis' empty seat when the conference resumed after lunch, and after these disclosures had been made in the morning.

Mr. Drew: Let us keep the record straight. The hon. member is well aware that Quebec was represented at that conference until the last moment and that Mr. Duplessis had a representative there.

Mr. Garson: I am not talking about Premier Duplessis' representative, I am talking about Premier Duplessis. May I say, Mr. Speaker, in fairness to Premier Duplessis, that throughout this matter he had preserved great courtesy. He had preserved a courteous reticence as to the amount of rental which Quebec would accept or, indeed, as to whether it would accept any at all. When he left he was courteous enough to leave behind a note which read as follows:

> The prime minister of Quebec for reasons already stated many times at these meetings and owing to pressure of business has been obliged to leave for his office in Quebec city.

I do not blame him for leaving. Probably all of us would have been sensible had we left at that time. I suggest that Premier Duplessis knew perfectly well what the effect of the proposals of his collaborator, Premier Drew, would be upon the conference as soon as the unknown quantities in the Ontario formula became known.

It is on the basis of these facts that I submit to this house and to the Canadian people that the conference broke up because, after nine months of negotiations, Quebec would set no rental whatever and because Ontario demanded rentals which were $50 million more than the entire amount of all pre-war provincial revenues from all sources. It is in the face of these facts that the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) has the impudence —I will say that, sir, if I may—to say that the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King scuttled the conference.

Some hon. Members: He did.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I quoted the record last Monday on this matter.

Mr. Garson: Now, if the hon. member will just contain himself.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker is up.

Mr. Speaker: I do not like to interrupt the minister, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. Garson: I hope there may be some deductions for the interruptions.

An hon. Member: You had five minutes extra before.

Mr. Garson: I think it is only fair to refer to, and to place on the record, the hon. member's own explanation as to how he arrived at the conclusion that the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) had scuttled the conference. This is what he placed on the record the other day when he spoke:

> I was sitting in the gallery and had watched the little whispering campaign between the then prime minister and Mr. Ilsley. I do not think I am wrong when I say that the prime minister scuttled the conference.

Well, Mr. Speaker, a person sees two men whispering, and concludes that one of them scuttled the conference. But why pick on Mr. Mackenzie King? Why not Mr. Ilsley?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I heard what he said.

Mr. Garson: Or why not both of them? I suppose it is to settle deep problems of this sort that the electors of Souris sent the hon. member here to represent them. And he settles this deep problem of ethical guilt after listening to this whispering campaign by a procedure of eeny, meeny, miny, mo—and picking the Prime Minister as the man who scuttled the conference.

I suggest that not all the letters the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) wrote to the Prime Minister before the conference started, nor the ones he has written since; nor the motions he moved, for adjournment or otherwise; nor the pious ejaculations that he has offered; nor his sanctimonious wishes for the success of the conference; nor his protestations about being a good Canadian, cover up these plain facts that an agreement is impossible if any province demands what the province of Ontario demanded in this particular case.

Mr. Merritt: You have a surplus of $600 million.

Mr. Garson: I should like, in conclusion, to call two witnesses in corroboration.

Mr. Jackman: Collaborationists?

Mr. Garson: I said corroboration, not collaboration. We were not collaborationists; but we have corroboration.

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

The first of these is Professor J. A. Maxwell of Clark university in the United States, an outstanding authority on dominion-provincial fiscal relations. At page 15 of his paper on recent developments in dominion-provincial fiscal relations in Canada, he says:

> On April 29, 1946, the conference re-assembled at Ottawa to consider revised proposals. After reviewing the two major concessions which the dominion government had made up to that time,—

Professor Maxwell goes on to say—> —it was then apparent that the key to agreement was in the hands of Ontario and Quebec. Except for minor qualifications, the seven other provinces would accept the revised proposals. The attitude of Quebec was enigmatic although the generalizations of Premier Duplessis were such as to connote the impossibility of agreement . . . Premier Drew was more specific in his demands for Ontario . . . A rough reckoning indicated that acceptance of the Ontario proposals would add at least $134 million a year, possibly $234 million, beyond what the federal government had set as its maximum concession.

And listen to this:

> On this rock the conference foundered on May 3. So large a difference, after negotiations extending over nine months, seemed impossible to bridge.

My next witness is Mr. K. J. Binns, economist to the government of Tasmania.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Far enough away from home this time.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend says he thinks that is far enough away from home, if I heard him correctly. Well, it is far enough away from home to produce a man who would certainly be divorced from partisan bias in matters concerning this country. And may I say this, that the state of Tasmania is so hopelessly—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: What do you know about it?

Mr. Garson: —biased in favour of state rights, which would correspond to our provincial rights, that they elect one party in the provincial sphere, and elect the representatives of another party to the federal sphere, so that the state partisans may go to the federal government and watch that the federal government of that country does not injure their state rights.

Mr. Merritt: A good idea.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You did not have to go that far away to find that out.

Mr. Garson: I did not realize I was such a humorist. Mr. Binns came here from half way across the world for no purpose other than to make a complete study of what we had done in this country to settle this difficult problem, one which is also a difficult problem in the federal state of Australia. He came here to prepare a report for his government, in which he made a comparison between what we had done in Canada in this field, and what was being done in Australia.

Mr. Fulton: Which authority did he consult?

Mr. Garson: This is what he said:

> The premiers' conference resumed on April 29, 1946, but owing to the uncompromising attitude of the premier of Ontario, Hon. G. A. Drew, and the impossible attitude of the premier of Quebec, Hon. M. L. Duplessis, who did no more than reiterate time and again that the British North America Act, 1867, was sacrosanct, the conference broke up.

An hon. Member: Is that all he found out?

Mr. Garson: That is all he found in connection with this matter. I suggest, however, that in the light of these considered, objective and judicial judgments of the conduct of the leader of the opposition, at a time when he was premier of Ontario, it might be advisable for him, the next time he protests so much about his innocence in this matter, to bring forward, if he can—and I challenge him to do so—some judgment of an equally objective character which holds him innocent of breaking up the conference.

Mr. E. B. McKay (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, on this occasion I should like to speak concerning several matters which affect Canada as a whole and which are of the utmost importance to the people of southern Saskatchewan. One of these matters, which is agitating the minds of farmers across this country, and particularly those of western Canada, is the price they will receive for their wheat during the next few years. They are gravely concerned about the possibility of the federal government being unable to negotiate a long-term agreement with Great Britain, our chief customer, after the current agreement comes to an end.

Another subject of considerable concern to the prairie farmer is the campaign which is now at its height against the Canadian wheat board and which may persuade the government of this country to discontinue the operations of that important body. I do not believe the discontinuance of the wheat board would be popular with most western farmers. They react most unfavourably to the suggestion that the Winnipeg grain exchange might again be permitted to trade in that important primary product, wheat, which in turn would mean that the Canadian wheat board would be replaced completely by the exchange.

Most western farmers, and I believe farmers all over Canada, are opposed to the return of a speculative market in wheat. They have a definite aversion to the Winnipeg grain exchange and this feeling of antagonism is not without some foundation. The farmers do not forget the fact that following the first world war the exchange opened for business in August, 1920, when the price of wheat was $2.75 per bushel, but after it had operated for a little over a year, by October, 1921, the price for the same grade was down to $1.11. They do not forget the low prices that prevailed in the thirties when the exchange was in full operation. According to the Rowell report, page 175, table three, the following prices were shown to have been paid in 1930 in Saskatchewan:

	Price per bushel cents
Wheat	47
Rye	17
Oats	15
Barley	12

No one will deny that the world-wide depression which prevailed at that time certainly would have depressed the prices of primary products, but nevertheless most farmers are convinced that had the Canadian wheat board been still functioning at that time prices would never have been allowed to drop to these ridiculously low figures. I am satisfied that the western producer has accepted slightly lower prices for his grain in the past several years largely because of the prospect of having future prices stabilized and regulated through the wheat board and by means of long-term agreements so that there will be no return to the depressed prices of the thirties.

The western farmer knows full well that he has never received as high a price for his grain as has his American neighbour. This is largely due to the fact that 80 per cent of Canadian wheat is exported while only 20 per cent of the American production is exportable surplus in normal times. It has been possible for the United States to subsidize wheat exports in various ways and to maintain the price level of wheat on the domestic market, something which Canada with her much smaller population would have great difficulty in effecting.

It is obvious that, if the price level of wheat is to be maintained, long-term agreements are necessary. Because of this knowledge western farmers are interested in the fact that the united nations has set up a food and agriculture organization designed for the purpose of studying world-wide production, distribution and consumption of food. The primary objective of the nation members of the food and agriculture organization is to raise the levels of nutrition throughout the world, a most laudable objective. The attainment of the objective of giving every person enough food is dependent upon there being a satisfactory marketing and distribution agency for agricultural products, and the crux of the whole food problem is marketing.

It would be useless indeed to increase the production of food and it would be equally futile to establish high standards of nutrition unless methods were devised to move the food from the producer to the consumer at a price fair to the producer and also reasonably fair to the consumer. It will also be necessary to keep production throughout the world in equilibrium. It is the feeling of most members of that international body that when nutritional standards are raised everywhere overproduction of foodstuffs, particularly grains, is most unlikely. On the contrary, suggestions have even been made to increase the production by furnishing technical farming knowledge to those areas where such knowledge is lacking and thus make the industry more efficient.

Canada as a great exporter of agricultural products is a member of the food and agriculture organization. Farm organizations everywhere in the country approve of Canada's participation in the activities of that body. They have always been concerned with the depressing effects on the world market of the overproduction of farm products. It is now felt that if nutritional standards are maintained by the nations of the world and raised where they are substandard—in too many cases that is true—there is not the remotest possibility of overproduction of agricultural products.

The next difficulty to overcome is to provide stocks of food at reasonable prices to the consumer and at a price to the producer sufficient to encourage production but which at the same time would not be too burdensome upon any particular state. This will require long-range planning on the part of the international body, associated with other bodies which handle grain such as the Canadian wheat board. The retention of this board is essential to Canada's proper co-operation with international bodies concerned with the distribution of foodstuffs.

By international co-operation of the nation exporters of agricultural products a fair price can be guaranteed to the producer, production kept in equilibrium with food requirements, and at the same time a price established for the consumer based upon his ability to pay. That can be accomplished only by full co-operation between the Canadian government and the united nations organization.

The first task of the world organization will be to set up a satisfactory marketing agency for the distribution of grain. But should the world organization fail to set up a satisfactory marketing agency, Canada will be obligated then to sell on any market available to her, and the historic market is the United Kingdom. It is an established fact that the United Kingdom is short of Canadian dollars because this country is not purchasing a sufficient quantity of British goods. May I suggest that the federal government explore the possibility of removing Canadian tariffs against British goods so that Great Britain will have sufficient exports to this country to enable her to obtain enough Canadian dollars to purchase Canadian wheat, and other products such as eggs, bacon, fruit and cheese. I do not think that we can hope to hold the British market if Great Britain is not provided with the wherewithal to purchase our primary products.

I would further suggest to the government that they explore the possibility of setting up a barter arrangement between Great Britain and Canada similar to those now in effect between the United Kingdom and Poland, and the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia.

The livelihood of most Canadians still depends on agriculture. It is therefore very essential to the well-being of our greatest industry that there be a free exchange of goods with countries, regardless of where they may be, which are willing to trade with us, and thus take the surpluses off our hands which we create frequently in primary products. It does not seem to me that there is any other reasonable way of guaranteeing a price for farm products, and certainly no other method of setting up a stabilized price on a sound economic basis. The C.C.F. supported the British trade agreement because it was sound economics. The agreement was affected, however, when price controls were still in effect in this country. Since that time price controls have been largely removed by the federal government. Because of the removal of those controls the farmer, particularly in the west, feels he has been double-crossed by the government. I think he is quite justified in feeling that way. A ceiling has been placed on the selling price of his chief product, wheat, but there is no limit to the price he must pay for consumer goods.

Why did the federal government remove price controls? Was it because of the pressure of public opinion? Certainly not. In January of last year sixty-six per cent of the people interviewed by the Canadian institute of public opinion expressed disapproval of the government's decontrol policy. That is two-thirds of the population. Therefore we must assume that the government was stampeded into the removal of price controls by the Canadian Manufacturers Association and other bodies. I refer to the Canadian Manufacturers Association deliberately because in January of last year at its convention it called by resolution for the removal of price controls as soon as possible. There is little doubt that the attitude of the Progressive Conservative and Social Credit opposition also had much to do with it, for we must not forget that in March, 1946, a resolution was adopted by a Progressive Conservative meeting in Ottawa, reading as follows:

> We are opposed in principle to the continuation of every wartime wage and price ceiling, and restrictive controls.

Speaking in the House of Commons on March 21, 1948, the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) said:

> Social Crediters are implacably opposed to planned controls.

On the other hand, C.C.F. members have repeatedly pressed the federal government to retain price control but have received very little support from any section of this house. I think recent events have proven, beyond a shadow of doubt, that on that occasion the C.C.F. was right.

Mr. Low: No, wrong.

Mr. McKay: Talk to the farmers and workers and see what they think about it. Controls should not have been removed until surpluses of goods were available on the market.

Mr. Low: There would not have been any surpluses.

Mr. McKay: That is what you think. The C.C.F. is of that opinion still, and believes that price controls should be re-established on consumer goods if ceilings are to remain on the farmer's chief product in the west.

Mr. Hackett: Wage control as well?

Mr. McKay: Wages are now being controlled. The subsidization of essential food products such as milk and butter should also be a part, as it was during the war years, of federal government policy—

Mr. Low: Now you are on sound ground.

Mr. McKay: —so that production may be encouraged, and price levels reduced to the consumer. If it can work during a war emergency it is pretty hard to explain to the general public why it cannot work during peacetime. High prices of consumer goods are causing real distress to disabled veterans, old folks on pension, wage earners, and farmers, because of the prices they have to pay for consumer goods. They are now at the highest level in Canadian history. Big business was aware of the fact, and others too, that shortages of consumer goods would force up prices, and therefore profits would be increased. Neither the wage earner nor the producer desired the removal of price control because they knew from the past experience of twenty-five years ago following the first world war that they would be the ones forced to bear the burden of inflation.

But the government did not listen to the C.C.F. nor to the people who were canvassed by the Canadian institute of public opinion. They permitted the oil companies to increase the basic price of gasoline two cents a gallon on February 6, 1946. The effect of that increase was, of course, to boost the cost of production to the farmer, particularly those of the west who operate, in many cases, highly mechanized farms. On March 1 of the same year the federal government reduced or completely removed the subsidies on wool and cotton goods, which forced up the price of those commodities to the consumer. The government permitted the price of steel to go up $5 per ton even before the wages of the workers were increased, and despite the fact that the Steel Company of Canada, one of Canada's biggest producers, had a profit after taxes of $4 million in 1945.

On April 13, 1946, Canadian farm machinery was allowed to go up 12½ per cent over the protests of this group in the house. The increase in machinery prices also forced up the cost of production for the western farmer, and other farmers all across Canada. Thus the cost of production to the farmer and the cost of living to the worker were increased long before those two groups sought any compensating increase for their produce or their labour. Despite this fact, big business still blames the farmer and labourer for the high cost of living, and I think this is done deliberately in order to divert attention from the enormous profits that have been made since the removal of price controls.

At this time I think it important that we should know just what the farmer and labourer do receive in relation to the present prices of consumer goods. According to figures recently compiled by the Ontario department of agriculture it was found that on a can of tomatoes selling on the local market at from 25 to 27 cents a tin the farmer's share of that selling price was very small, only 3¾ cents. Peas selling on the same market for 16 cents a can returned only 2½ cents to the producer. Rolled oats, which retailed at 14 cents a pound, netted the farmer slightly over 2½ cents. Pastry flour, which sold for 5½ cents per pound, gave the man who produced the grain only 2 cents.

Mr. Low: How much to the government in taxes?

Mr. McKay: That has nothing to do with it; I am showing the proportion the farmer receives. Labour, too, receives but a small portion of the increased prices the consumer pays. In a bulletin released last year by the United States trade commission it was shown that for every dollar wages had increased in the United States, prices had gone up $6.50, or six and a half times as much.

Mr. Mitchell: Would that apply to automobiles?

Mr. McKay: I am sorry; I cannot answer that.

Mr. Mitchell: I thought you could not.

Mr. McKay: These are the figures of the United States trade commission; that is all I know. They are considered reliable. There are no comparable figures with regard to Canada, but certainly conditions here are not very difficult. Therefore it must be obvious that big business alone is responsible for the inflation which distresses this country at the present time. In 1947 corporation profits in Canada were the highest in history, and they are still going up. According to the Nesbitt-Thomson index of dividend payments, basis pre-war as 100, dividends paid by business in September of 1948 were 202, or just twice as great as in pre-war days. The decontrol of prices has been very profitable for big business, and there is not much use of anyone trying to deny it. Therefore the C.C.F. supports the reimposition of price controls on consumer goods, because a large section of the Canadian people are on low incomes and are finding it well nigh impossible to make ends meet with the present high living costs. In the United States, according to the federal reserve board, 35 per cent of those receiving incomes in 1946 had either gone into debt or had just broken even. Canadians must be in an even worse position, because according to statistics our standard of living is not quite as high as that immediately across the line. The reimposition of price controls is the keystone, I believe, of any program for the betterment of conditions for both the farmer and the worker. It must be realized that any adjustments in income tax, wages, pensions or prices for farm products, will be of very little value without some control over the prices of consumer goods.

Another matter I wish to bring to the attention of the government is the inadequacy of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act under present farming conditions, particularly in southern Saskatchewan. Many farmers in the dried-out areas of Alberta and Saskatchewan who require assistance are left out of the scheme as it now operates. The payment of benefits under the act, I believe, should be on an individual farm basis. Many farmers, because they are so unfortunate as not to live in the declared area set aside by the government, receive no award under the act. We have the case of a farmer who may live just across from a neighbour, with only a section or township line between them. The neighbour will receive the bonus and the other farmer will not. I believe the act should also be broadened to include losses from hail and insect pests as well as drought. There are complaints as well that the present payments are inadequate. Farm operating costs have increased enormously since this act was passed by this parliament. In my opinion the awards should be increased to $5 per acre in crop failure areas, with a maximum of $1,000 payable to the farm unit under consideration. This increase might mean a slight charge on the federal treasury, but I submit it would still be a wiser policy to follow than placing the people in those areas on the relief to which they were subjected in those dark days of the middle thirties.

Then I believe the government should give some consideration to the grading of wheat on a protein content basis. If this were done in the southern areas, which are usually the dry areas of the west, higher wheat prices would be realized, as the grain in the south usually has a higher protein content because of the dryness of the climate in that area. Such a plan is operated in the United States, or at least in some parts of that country, and I think the government should put such a wheat grading system into effect in Canada in order that the farmers of southern Alberta and Saskatchewan might realize more for each bushel of wheat they are able to grow, since yields tend to be low in those areas.

Now I should like to say a few words in regard to the need for irrigation in western Canada. Millions of acres of the finest soil in this country can be made productive through irrigation of the prairie land. Water is available in the South Saskatchewan river and other smaller rivers and creeks throughout the region. The United States, and almost every other country in the world, has a better record than Canada with respect to irrigation, and it seems to me about time this country realized that irrigation would be a great benefit to it. It would be a good investment for Canada, since the stabilization of agriculture in areas subject to drought would make for greater western prosperity and a greater buying power. The proposed irrigation scheme on the South Saskatchewan river and associated projects would irrigate a very large area. The cost would be considerable; but if this scheme were implemented a million and a half acres of excellent land would be placed on a sound production basis. Such a program would add upwards of 250,000 people to the population of the western provinces, and this would make that much greater prosperity and buying power for that area.

The development of a full-scale irrigation program for the prairies would be an investment in the future of this country. I submit, Mr. Speaker, such a project would return enormous dividends to the whole Canadian economy. Millions in new wealth would be created; more jobs would be created and more homes set up. Small industries, such as meat packing, sugar refining and canning could be developed. Many young people would be enabled to secure work who are now forced to go to the large industrial centres east and west of the prairies in order to secure the occupations they desire.

The officials of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act state that large scale irrigation in western Canada is feasible. Many surveys have been made and a small start has been made on irrigation. But, on the whole, very little has been done. I tell the government that people are wondering at the delay. Irrigation should not become a political football. It should not be something about which promises are made on the eve of elections and forgotten afterwards. It is a matter too important to the survival of the people in the dried-out belt of southern Saskatchewan. I believe those people are beginning to realize they must insist upon the government fulfilling its promises. The irrigation scheme should be commenced at once; not next year, not the year after, but right now.

The people of this area desire an irrigation project because they know the climatic conditions are such that, without the moisture which an irrigation project can bring, stability in agriculture is not possible in a very large section of southern Saskatchewan. The federal government should recognize this need and let contracts immediately for the development of the South Saskatchewan river, which is the major project, the Souris and Wood rivers as well as Notekeu and Swift Current creeks and other streams in the south. Only by irrigation can large areas of the south be rehabilitated and properly developed.

Finally, I should like to urge upon the government the raising of the personal income tax exemption to $1,250 for single persons and $2,500 for married folk. Living costs have increased materially since the last budget. If people are to have sufficient income on which to live, greater income tax exemptions are imperative.

I would urge the government to give some consideration to the farmer's wife. This consideration has been asked before on many occasions. I still think it is quite proper that we should ask again that some consideration be given to the farmer's wife, who does so much of the farm work for which she receives so little. When the exemption schedules are being drafted in 1949 for 1950, I suggest that careful consideration be given this matter.

More than that, I feel that the sales tax of eight per cent on a large range of consumer goods should be wholly removed because it has a tendency to increase the prices of these goods and therefore materially affects the cost of living. The burden has already reached such proportions, the people feel that if there is anything of that nature which the government could do it should be done.

Federal taxes are, of course, a very heavy burden for Canadians. The total tax revenue anticipated in the last budget, the budget of 1948, was $2,452 million or a per capita tax of $204 based on our population of twelve million people. For a family of five this means an average tax of $1,021, which is obtained from income tax, excise tax and other federal taxes. The federal government can render a real service to the Canadian people, and particularly to those people in the low-income group, by increasing income tax exemptions and by the removal of the sales tax. If such tax adjustments fall too heavily upon the federal treasury, may I make this suggestion, that the excess profits tax on big business be re-imposed. This tax netted the federal treasury $449 million in the last fiscal year it operated. If the treasury feels the need of additional revenue, this would be a good field in which to seek it.

It is my earnest hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will give active consideration to the matters I have just reviewed. The western farmer and all people in the low-income group are anxiously awaiting government action on these subjects. They are becoming just a little bit impatient.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I join with those preceding me in extending congratulations, not only to the mover and seconder, but also to the new ministers, the new stars that have been added to the crown, in the person of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), the hon. Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), and the hon. minister of external affairs (Mr. Pearson). I feel it is good that new members should come into this house and be added to the cabinet. They will be able to do no harm to that body.

I have listened with no little interest this afternoon to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, and I shall shortly refer to some of his arguments. He did impress me, and he must be a good counsel. For, having undertaken a hopeless task, he failed in the end to indicate the government's stand.

I wish to join, too, in congratulations to the new Prime Minister, and in both congratulations and good wishes to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I believe it is good to have an infusion of new blood into the house, for parliament cannot exist unless the best possible men are mobilized into public service. Our parliamentary system cannot exist if obvious and outspoken examples of enmity, and declarations of hatred and contempt, occur between members, or when there is a substitution of personal abuse for argument. The people of this country have the right to ask that while we in this house shall be outspoken in our beliefs, strong and fearless in our statements, as befits strong men with strong opinions, we refrain from abuse. Democracy and the preservation of our way of life demands that public debate do not sink to the level of abuse. During the past two or three days there have been said in this house things which might well have remained unsaid. We can carry on parliament only if we maintain its amenities, without which parliament becomes merely a cockpit for the expression of personal enmities.

I shall now deal for a moment with the speech from the throne. Several declarations that appear bear the authority and the authorship of the resolutions passed at the Progressive Conservative convention last October. I refer to the question of assistance to build a transcontinental highway. The clause dealing therewith is sedulously couched in nebulous language in the speech from the throne, and reads as follows:

> A measure for assistance in the provision of a transcontinental highway will also be laid before you.

What the people of Canada want is the construction of that highway. It is necessary for the completion of confederation.

Then there is the matter of social security and the extension of the Family Allowances Act, matters also referred to in the platform of this party. But all the promises are not made here. A few are being made in the by-election in Nicolet-Yamaska. The Solicitor General (Mr. Jean) who, for various reasons, is not in the house today, made a promise of great interest to the people of Canada in the development of our constitutional set-up. On January 23 he promised that Canada soon will have a Canadian in the office of governor general. When asked when that would be he said, "Very shortly." Why should a declaration such as that, representing as it does a major change in constitutional development, be made outside the House of Commons?

I should like first to touch on agriculture, which is of major interest not only to the people of my constituency and province but to the whole of the country. I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay), and with much of what he said I am in agreement. He made one admission which I was glad to hear. He said, in effect, "We supported the government throughout in the British agreement." He gave his reasons. He showed that the hopes of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) —and in these hopes he was supported by the members of the C.C.F. group—have not been justified. Now my friends to the left are trying to put themselves in the position that this party has always taken and now are supporting the stand taken by the former leader of the party, the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken).

My hon. friend still speaks of expert planning and of the control of prices. He condemned the government, and quite properly, in regard to promoting the rise of certain prices. I ask him and his leader why, in the province of Saskatchewan, with a C.C.F. government in power, and with legislation on the statute books which permitted the control of prices, wages and commodities, they left that statute on the books only one year. Its life ran one year from April 1 to April 1. The act lived for one year and then without proclamation was permitted to die. They would be in a stronger position in their request for the continuance of price controls had they in Saskatchewan, where they had the power, carried into effect the policies that they advocate in the House of Commons, where they have not the power.

The wheat situation is serious. The Minister of Agriculture came back from Britain and spoke with unusual vigour in criticism of some of the planners who had failed so to arrange international affairs as to put Britain in a position to purchase our wheat at a fair and reasonable price. The situation with regard to agriculture today is summed up in the words of H. H. Hannam, the president of the Canadian federation of agriculture. He recently said:

> The biggest problem facing agriculture in 1949 is rising cost of the things it has to buy and falling prices of things it has to sell. That in itself will be bad enough. The danger is that it could and might start a trend that could lead the Canadian economy into a period of business recession.

Our trade is diminishing with countries other than the United States. Our exports to all countries other than United States during the ten months of 1948 fell by $144 million compared to those of the previous year. This happened despite the extension of credits, and $600 million Canada received in United States dollars or paid by loans to the countries under the Marshall plan. The time has come for the government to tell us what it intends to do with regard to agriculture; whether or not the farmers are to find themselves caught between continued high prices for the things that they buy and lower prices for the things that they sell. Something should be done now. Unless that is done, Canadian agriculture will receive a slap such as it has never received in the history of the country.

On his return from Britain the Minister of Agriculture pointed out the difficulties both here and abroad. The wheat farmers and other farmers have a right to know to what extent the saving clause for 1948 and 1949, 1949 and 1950, in the British agreement, will be carried into effect. Except the Minister of Agriculture and possibly the members of the cabinet, no one knows what happened at the meetings with the British cabinet representatives. In the face of present threatening conditions in the world, as far as agriculture is concerned, and more particularly in Canada, an immediate statement should be made by the Minister of Agriculture—

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend wants an immediate statement I am quite prepared to make it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad that we are to get that statement, and I trust that as soon as the minister gets the opportunity he will make it.

Mr. Gardiner: It would take only two minutes to make it now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are certain things the farmer wants. First and foremost he wants an immediate payment of the twenty-cent participation payment out of the moneys that are his for the wheat sold by the wheat board during the years 1945 to 1948. Second, he wants the Prairie Farm Assistance Act amended to remove the many injustices that today deny farmers fair and proper payments under this act. He wants the area of qualification immediately reduced.

Mention was made of irrigation—and that is one omission the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) could immediately answer.

Mr. Gardiner: Certainly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will give him a chance. Why is that omitted from the speech from the throne?—because, as I remember the Rosthern by-election, irrigation was one of the main promises dangled before the farmers of that constituency by my right hon. friend.

Mr. Gardiner: Items with regard to that have been in the estimates year by year for the last three years; and they will be in the estimates again this year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Those items are for $75,000, $60,000 and $130,000.

Mr. Gardiner: About $2,500,000 last year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right; it will take only forty-five years, at that rate, to complete this particular irrigation project.

Mr. Gardiner: It was $2,500,000 last year; I have not said what it will be this year.

Mr. Mitchell: You wanted an answer and you got it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The people of the prairie provinces, in the areas where irrigation is so necessary to the preservation of their standard of living, require, not $2 million set aside in the estimates each year, but an immediate commencement of this undertaking to the end that 500,000 to 1,000,000 acres will be rendered free from the danger of continued cyclical drought. This undertaking is omitted from the speech from the throne—and it means only one thing, that the promise of this undertaking made in the by-election in Rosthern is about as nebulous as some of the other promises made during that by-election campaign.

I come to income tax—and, in passing, let me say I am glad to see they are getting some reinforcements from some of the back-bench boys whose support for reductions has been characterized by silence for three years, but who now summon up that courage which is so evident in anticipation of a convention—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —of an election. Yes, and conventions, too. They know they cannot win their conventions unless something is done about income tax.

I join with the western agricultural association which recently held a conference in Saskatchewan, upon which occasion they dealt among other questions with the injustices connected with the income tax administration. My leader, and those associated with him on this side of the house, have pointed out over and over again that a government collecting more than $600 million from the people of Canada owed to the Canadian people a substantial reduction in income tax rate as well as an increase in exemptions. I would like some of those in bureaucratic control of government, and who occupy the towering seats of the mighty, to have a talk with farmers. They would learn of anomalies and injustices perpetrated in the operation of the income tax. And that applies not only to agriculture but to all other phases of national activity as well.

As to the western agricultural association, I want to see established at this session a house committee for the purpose of studying the question of income tax as it affects farmers and labour, so that the entire tax set-up may be revised to make it equitable in the operation and incidence of taxation. Such a committee could hear representations from organized agriculture, as well as from experts in the tax branch and other experts on farm production.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) over the years has been most assiduous in bringing before the house the question of reform in income tax, so as to remedy the unfairness in respect of its application to basic herds. This year a change was made, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) proudly made the announcement. Cattle producers were encouraged by that announcement; but they are today being discouraged by the several interpretations made in various parts of the country by the several income tax collection agencies. The farmers want to know what is being done to preserve and enlarge their markets. They want to know what is being done to prevent the loss of their markets incident to the mistakes of expert planners. They want to know why the United States market is still embargoed against milk and pork products. They want to know what is to be done in connection with the establishment now of stable and adequate floor prices. As the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay) has said, they are asking—

Mr. Gardiner: One of the hon. member's questions answers the other.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to hear my right hon. friend say that, because this is the first time there has been an answer from him on a question which so vitally affects the welfare of Canadian agriculture, and which he brushes aside with such a cavalier answer.

Then, above all, I should like to have from this government, a declaration of its intention to proceed at once with the development of a great irrigation plan for Saskatchewan and on the prairies.

For years the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has advocated such a plan. He sold the idea throughout Canada. People everywhere realize that only in the encouragement and development of our natural resources can we hope to achieve that destiny which should be Canada's.

I should like now to pass on to the matter discussed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). My right hon. friend the Prime Minister roused himself to a high state of unjudicial dudgeon on Monday in regard to some of the statements made by the leader of the opposition. All I would say to him is that as far back as June, 1946, he was warned that if he persisted in departing from the principles enunciated by Cartier, and by every minister of justice through the years, including the late Mr. Lapointe, he would place the constitution of Canada in jeopardy, for it would be in control of a majority in parliament.

The Minister of Justice gave us quite a dissertation on history. He dealt with the period of confederation—and, not having the book before me, I accept his conclusions—

Mr. Garson: Thank you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —knowing that they are not more than excerpts from the records. He called as witness a gentleman from Tasmania, and another from the United States. As he read what Mr. Maxwell had said I was wondering whether his information came from one of the government information bureaux of the time. Mr. Maxwell's conclusions bear so significant a similarity to some of the statements made by the then Prime Minister that I could only wonder what his source of information was.

However, let us get a little nearer home. I should like to quote one of the provincial premiers, a gentleman who sat in my hon. friend's seat during the years of war as a minister of defence. He set out his position when he spoke here in Ottawa on August 6, 1948—I believe he was followed by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power)—and he pointed out what we on this side have said, that since the war this government had departed and continued to depart from parliamentary procedure, and that it was infringing and entrenching upon provincial jurisdiction.

I should like to quote what Mr. Macdonald said, for his views are identical in this regard. No one can say that he was a nonpartisan friend of members of this government. Here is the news report of what he said on August 5 when the then Prime Minister sat behind him:

> "You have here one great nation," he declared, "in all its affairs and in many other aspects as well. But then within that great nation you have nine other units which have their own rights, their own privileges which they are not going to yield willingly to the central government here at Ottawa."

That is exactly the stand of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). Canadians are not interested in learned descantations or declamations of what was in the minds of those present or what was discussed at the time of confederation. What they are interested in is that the confederation pact shall be upheld in law, in spirit and in fact, and that it shall not be departed from either in the guise of the emergency doctrine, which was used for quite a while to permit the government to infringe upon provincial jurisdiction, or for any other reason. Now with the passing into desuetude of that doctrine the Prime Minister claims that the federal authority can infringe upon provincial jurisdiction as long as what is done has to do with the defence of this dominion.

That theory is capable of infinite interpretation and expansion. If that doctrine be true, if all the world stands in peril internationally, then the government, having vacated the emergency doctrine, can now embark upon a new doctrine that is capable of infinite expansion in invading the field of provincial rights. I will continue to read the report of what Mr. Macdonald said, as follows:

> We have sometimes been told that provincial rights are meaningless unless you have adequate revenues to carry out the responsibilities. I agree that there is more than one way to get the revenue and I am not sure that we have gone about it the right way in this country. I believe we should divide the field of responsibility between the dominion and the provinces and then you should decide—and I believe it can be done—what each political unit should have and give to it those sources and fields of revenue which would be adequate to enable it to discharge its proper constitutional responsibilities.

In epitome, it is largely the view that was expressed the other day by the leader of the opposition.

I do not know whether it was under the emergency doctrine that allowed this government to circumvent and then amend a statute of this parliament, the Immigration Act, by an order in council passed in September last. I thought that the days of orders in council that were not made public until they were pried loose ended in the fall of 1946. That order in council carries into the days of peace the conduct of this government in the days of war when statutes passed by the representatives of the people were amended, suspended or abrogated.

I can give another example. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will remember what was done in connection with the building of a hospital at Moose bay in the north country.

Mr. Garson: Which province was that in?

Mr. Diefenbaker: You will have to look at the order in council. It provides for the expenditure of approximately $1,500,000 when as a matter of fact the expenditure had been passed by parliament year after year from 1945 on. Under order in council the government rushed in and awarded a contract to a Windsor firm, after consultation with other contractors, at five per cent upon cost. There is another example of the use of orders in council by the government contrary to the rights of parliamentary government. There was no reason for haste in February of 1948 to hire a contractor by order in council when the moneys had been available over a period of several years.

I have mentioned the emergency doctrine whereby the government for a long time during and after the war placed the dominion in the position of a landlord having the power to vacate the provinces from any field of legislation that it desired and putting the provinces in the position of tenants at will of their legislative powers.

The Prime Minister now extends it to the defence doctrine. He complains that he has been misrepresented regarding the rights of minorities and the meaning of the constitution. The reason he finds himself in his present difficulty, in so far as section 133 is concerned, is that in the legislation which was introduced in 1946 there was given to the representatives of the people the power to pass an address by a simple majority and thereby to amend that portion of the constitution.

In taking that position he has departed from the experience of the years since 1867, and in particular from the declarations of the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe, one of his predecessors as Minister of Justice. I remember well his dealing, on the 6th June, 1946, with placing in the hands of a majority in parliament the right to amend the constitution of our country. That course is a danger to the rights of minorities—and we are all minorities in this country—and particularly to the rights guaranteed under section 133 of the British North America Act. I had the honour to follow him when he introduced the resolution in this house. At that time I used words which were applicable then, and the experience of the past three years has borne out how dangerous it is to the spirit of Canadian confederation to accept the doctrine of amending serious and definitive portions of the constitution without consultation with the provinces. I said this:

> Parliament is being asked to change one of the sections—not a section thirty-one years old, but one going back to confederation itself—upon which confederation was based. The Conservative party, and the Progressive Conservative party, since confederation has believed in change based upon experience; but it believes that the constitution is the bedrock of the rights of minorities and will resist changes in that constitution, without consultation with the provinces, under which the rights of the provinces will be affected or under which minorities may be affected. Parliament is being asked to pass an address which tomorrow will become a precedent which may be used to destroy the rights of minorities if in this house there should be a majority desiring to do so. This is an example of the dangers inherent in not requiring consultation with the provinces about amendments not directly concerned with the division of powers between the dominion and the provinces, which by the way are the only ones the Minister of Justice says cannot be amended without the consent of or consultation with the provinces. Under the procedure of amendment in the address section 133 and many others might be repealed or altered by means of an address passed by a majority in parliament. This, sir, indicates the dangers inherent in this haphazard manner, this novel scheme which is now before the house, of amending the constitution.

Then the Prime Minister, then the Minister of Justice, denied that anyone should regard with fear and trepidation the danger to constitutional rights under the British North America Act. He was warned by several of us on this side of the house about the danger to which he was subjecting the constitution, a danger which is apparent now and will become more apparent as the years go by. The Prime Minister in his address in this debate asked, when did the government ever interfere with the rights of the provinces. Well, sir, they tried in October, 1945. They introduced Bill No. 15—the national emergency powers bill. We on this side of the house who opposed that bill took our stand against it in view of the fact that several sections constituted an invasion of the inherent statutory jurisdiction of the provinces. Section 3 (1) of that bill reads as follows:

The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations . . .

And so on. Then we have these words:

It is hereby declared that the powers of the governor in council extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:

(a) production, manufacture, trading, exportation and importation.

The manner of manufacture.

(c) transportation by air, road, rail or water.

Transportation by road.

(f) appropriation, control, forfeiture and disposition of property and the use thereof.

These matters were comprised in the original bill. The government asked for these powers, which were finally prevented by the opposition from becoming the law of this country. The Prime Minister, by his own action in 1946, in order to find a short-cut to secure passage through this house of an address, is responsible for a danger that exists today—the amendment of the constitution by a simple majority of parliament.

There are other matters to which I could make reference, but I want to conclude. I reiterate the necessity for action now in the building, extension and development of a great irrigation plan in western Canada; for amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and, I repeat, the necessity for a declaration now by the government of its policy on behalf of agriculture. In this country, farmers were deluded over the years by the plans of expert planners, but they are now beginning to realize that the one party that truly placed before this country the dangers inherent in a policy of control by experts was the Progressive Conservative party, and the spearhead of that attack was my hon. friend the member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken).

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks this afternoon I want to extend the usual congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Realizing I have only twenty minutes left before the house adjourns this afternoon, I want to devote a little of my time to the contradiction of an editorial which appeared in Maclean's magazine of January 15, 1949. The editorial to which I refer is on page 1 and reads as follows:

Floor prices for farm products sound like a good idea. After all, the farmer is entitled to some security. Nobody wants to go back to the days when the price of wheat was so low that a farmer's net return for a season's crop was less than the freight charges to take it to market. But these are not such times. Today food prices are the highest in history. The city man, even with a higher cash income, finds the cost of living has wiped out his gain. The farmer, for the moment, is the man on top. His real earnings are higher than they have ever been. Yet at this moment of unexampled prosperity, taxpayers of the United States and of Canada have to lay out money for crops that are not being used because they cannot be sold at current prices. Washington has been buying potatoes, mountains of them, for two years at a "support price" so high that the American consumer has difficulty paying for all he needs. Now Canada is to do the same thing.

Western farmers, who have been paying off their debts with bumper wheat crops, this year raised more flax than anybody wants to buy. Who is stuck with the resultant surplus? The taxpayer. He is buying it at the handsome price of $4 a bushel. These devices for maintaining farm income might be justifiable if the farmer were in trouble. What shall we say of them now?

Here's the whole world crying for food. Every acre of land ought to be in use for the needed crops —food that can be stored, shipped, eaten by the millions who are starving abroad. So long as governments are willing to buy unsaleable crops at boom prices, land will be misused. And so long as prices are maintained above the levels at which consumers can afford to buy, food needed by the hungry will go to waste.

Essentially, it's the same principle that led to the burning of grain, the slaughter of sucking pigs and the plowing under of crops in the 1930's. This is economic lunacy and we can't afford it.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this editorial is journalistic lunacy; and I hope the representative of Maclean's is in the gallery so he may be able to give more information to those unsuspecting people he tried, perhaps deliberately, to mislead in that editorial. First of all, perhaps I should give the net income of farmers for a number of years, and if anyone wishes to check these figures I think they will be found correct. According to the 1931 census, the farm population comprised 31·7 per cent of the national population, while in 1941 the figure was 27·4 per cent. The net farm income of farm operators, as a percentage of the national income, has been as follows:

1927	14·9
1928	14·6
1929	9·5
1930	8·6
1931	4·5
1932	4·2
1933	4·1
1934	6·7
1935	7·6
1936	7·9
1937	8·1
1938	9·3
1939	10·8
1940	9·7
1941	8·3
1942	13·0
1943	10·7
1944	12·5
1945	9·9
1947	11·3

I would point out that the percentage received in 1932 represented $198 for each farmer in Canada. I give these figures to indicate that the farmers of this country do not now and in my opinion never have received their proper share of the national income, with the exception of a few years during the first great war. Compare them with some other people in Canada, whom perhaps the editorial writer of Maclean's was trying to educate. I should like to quote a poem taken from The Western Producer of January 13 last, and contributed by Eric A. Dowson of Northfield, British Columbia:

World War Three

The owners of shipyards and factory
Heard rumours of pending war
And they plainly voiced their approval
As they voiced it once before.

"Shout angrily your defiance,
Sow well the seed of mistrust,
And set our anvils ringing
Before they turn to rust.

"Breed fear and hate of the foemen
Be they bolshevik fiend or huns,
Make sure of well-earned profits
And we will deliver the guns."

And the workers who work for their masters,
Who turn out the ship and the plane,
They heard of the looming conflict
And echoed the deadly strain.

"Let hate and mistrust keep breeding,
We'll do as we did before.
Make sure of our life-blood wages,
And we'll make the machines of war."

And we who have done the fighting
Look on with a helpless sigh,
For what care we of the profit
When men go out to die.

This poem brings to mind the condition that existed in Canada back in August of 1939, when some of our manufacturers of war goods refused to make any more machines of war unless legislation which had been passed at the 1939 session was removed from the statute books; and I believe the cabinet did nullify that legislation, which provided that these manufacturers would get a profit of only five per cent for their labour.

To the editorial writer of Maclean's I would say:

A little learning is a dangerous thing:
Drink deep or taste not the Pierian spring.

In the writing of these editorials, I think it is only right to give both sides of the story. In that way we may avoid creating hate, mistrust and bad feeling and instead help national unity. The editorial writer neglected to tell the people of Canada for whom he was writing that the farmers of this country, who he now says are too well off, provided cheap bread for all Canada during the war. He did not say that for quite a while the millers were supplied with wheat at 77⅞ cents a bushel, bonused by the government. A little later the price paid by the millers went to $1.25 and later to $1.55, where I believe it still stands, though today wheat is selling for $2.20 or $2.25 a bushel. Who is absorbing that subsidy?

Again, not so long ago the then Minister of Trade and Commerce made the statement in this house that the Canadian wheat board would sell wheat to all comers at a maximum price of $1.55 a bushel. At that time wheat could have been sold at a much higher price; but the farmers were paid $1.55. Maclean's forgot to tell their readers this. During the war years our farmers also supplied wheat to distillers and others at a subsidized price, but Maclean's did not mention that. They also forgot to tell their readers that back in 1931 and 1932 Canadian farmers sold No. 1 northern wheat, the best wheat grown in the world, at 19½ cents a bushel. At that time this editorial writer did not come around and offer to have our rate of interest cut from eight per cent to a more reasonable rate of two or three per cent. He was silent at that time, and so was Maclean's. Perhaps they should give some of this information as well to their readers. He also forgot to say that up to the end of July, 1942, the initial price for our wheat was 70 cents a bushel basis No. 1 northern Fort William, even though at that time we had been in the war for three years and the farmers were paying exorbitant prices for the things they had to buy.

I cannot understand people writing editorials like this without giving both sides of the story. Then there is another item, perhaps small, which comes under the heading of the British wheat agreement. The editorial writer forgot to tell the people that out of the 1946 crop the Canadian wheat board supplied the people of Britain with 160,000,000 bushels of wheat at $1.55 a bushel. I am not blaming the wheat board for that; they were simply administering government policy. Out of the 1947 crop a similar amount was supplied at the same price. Out of the 1948 crop 140,000,000 bushels is to be supplied at $2 a bushel; and according to the latest information the same price will apply in 1949, the fourth and last year of the contract.

Again let me make it plain that we in this group did not object to Britain getting wheat at that price. We felt we had a moral obligation to that country. We feel that should not be the job of the farmers of the prairie provinces, because they are the only ones involved in supplying this cheap wheat to the British people. The supplying of this wheat should be undertaken by all Canadian taxpayers, and the difference between the price under the British wheat agreement and the class II price should have been taken out of the consolidated revenue fund and divided among the farmers who delivered wheat to that pool.

While we were selling wheat at that price, class II wheat being sold by the wheat board to countries other than Britain brought as high as $3.40 per bushel. This group initiated the demand, now taken up by other groups, that the government make up the difference between those two prices. There has been no announcement from the government as yet, but before this session ends I should like the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) or the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) or the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to tell the country just what they intend to do about that money which has wrongfully been confiscated from the prairie farmers.

According to the figures given in the house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce at that time, the farmers lost seventy-seven cents per bushel on wheat sold during that first crop year, 1946-47, amounting to a total of $123 million.

An hon. Member: Which year?

Mr. Fair: The 1946-47 crop year. During the early days of August of last year, after the end of the 1947-48 crop year, newspaper reports were to the effect that farmers had lost approximately $1.29 per bushel on the last year's deliveries. I am not saying those figures are accurate, but based on those figures the loss would total $206 million, making a grand total of $329 million as the apparent loss under the British wheat agreement up to the end of July 1948. What will happen during the 1948 and 1949 crop years we are not in a position to say. As I stated earlier, it would not be fair to say now that is a definite loss. Unless improved prices are obtained, however, before the contract is terminated, then that must be considered a net loss.

Moreover, many people are not aware that our coarse-grain prices were based on the price of wheat under the British wheat agreement. They are not aware, either, that the price of beef and pork was based on the price of coarse grains. This whole matter can be put down to the price of wheat under the British wheat agreement during the years it has been in effect. People are not aware, either, that during the war years, when we contracted to sell large quantities of beef and pork to Britain, there was a guaranteed floor price at the seaboard for the packers but not one single bit of protection for the producer. On many occasions we have asked to have this matter straightened out, but we have not had any satisfaction so far.

During the early years of the war the farmers were told that, if they were content to accept low prices then—and we were told about the need for food in other countries which the farmers and their wives and families delivered in large quantities both overseas and at home—they would have some guarantee after the war was over. The only guarantee the farmer has received is the low price being obtained under the contract. Apparently the "have regard" clause of the agreement does not carry any weight. Judging from newspaper reports, the trip of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to Britain brought no benefits. The price for the 1949 crop should have been fixed during December of last year. We find that has been postponed until after the end of the contract period, namely, July 31, 1950. By that time we expect the general election, about which there has been so much talk, will have been held.

On motion of Mr. Fair the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall continue this debate.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing orders.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 3, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "LE CANADA" OF FEBRUARY 3

Mr. Roland Beaudry (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. May I protest most vigorously against a newspaper dispatch appearing in this morning's issue of Le Canada which I consider derogatory both to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and to myself, and which I believe will be so adjudged by every hon. member. The article, headed "Gorgeous George Drew," is translated as follows:

Mr. Drew, leader of the Progressive Conservative party, this morning went to his hairdresser's. This commonplace event would not warrant underlining if it did not denote a significant state of mind in the Carleton colonel.

Yesterday Mr. Drew brought to the house a head of hair which would have done credit to a zazoo. Whatever that is.

During his speech on the address Mr. Beaudry could not refrain from alluding to this in the following words, which do not bear translation:

"Where we were told to expect master minds we come up against recent prize ring technique. Where we were sold gorgeous George, all we see is a new hair-do."

This afternoon, at the opening of the sitting, everyone noticed with a smile that, in the morning, Mr. Drew had had his hair cut American fashion.

This is my point of privilege and my protest: I did not intend, and I do not intend, to be adjudged the hon. member's tonsorial adviser, much as I shall take great delight in being one of the Carleton Samson's clipping Delilahs.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSIONS TO CANADA IN 1948

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on record the following information regarding immigration to Canada during the calendar year 1948.

During 1948 a total of 125,414 immigrants entered Canada. This was the largest total of any year since 1929, and is almost exactly twice as many as came in during 1947, when the figure was 64,127.

Of the 125,414 immigrants, 46,057 came from the British isles, and 7,381 from the United States. Immigrants from northern European races numbered 16,957, including 10,169 Dutch. Other races contributed 55,019 new Canadians, the largest individual groups being 13,799 Poles and 10,011 Ukrainians.

Disposition of the immigrants by provinces is as follows:

Ontario	61,621
Quebec	24,687
British Columbia	11,918
Alberta	9,715
Manitoba	7,750
Saskatchewan	5,087
Nova Scotia	2,813
New Brunswick	1,476
Prince Edward Island	269
Yukon Territory	64
Northwest Territories	14

The movement of immigrants to Canada during this year was facilitated by an arrangement made with the Cunard White Star line which kept the Aquitania on the north Atlantic run and provided over 12,000 priority berths for immigrants. This arrangement, but expanded to cover 15,400 priorities, has been continued for the year 1949. The government also assisted in the conversion of a German prize vessel which is now known as the Beaverbrae and is engaged in carrying to this country from continental Europe close relatives of persons resident in Canada. Finally, the government has arranged with Trans-Canada Air Lines for 10,000 air passages to be made available to immigrants from the United Kingdom between the 1st of July, 1948, and the 31st of March, 1949.

During the year immigration offices were opened or reopened in Glasgow, Liverpool and Rome.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, has the immigration branch medical and immigration officers in every European country?

Mr. MacKinnon: No, not in all of them.

Mr. Fraser: In which countries are there no such officers?

Mr. MacKinnon: We are not represented in countries behind the so-called iron curtain.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADA-AUSTRALIA AIR AGREEMENT—PACIFIC OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Did Australia object to Canada's action in changing the Canadian-Australian air agreement by turning the Pacific operation over to Canadian Pacific Air Lines? If so, what is the present status of the matter?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Notice of the hon. member's question was received by me only a moment ago. If he sent it earlier, I can only say I received it about three minutes ago. My recollection however is that the government of Australia did not make formal objection to the government of Canada in connection with the matter referred to by the hon. member.

INCOME TAX

STOCK RAISERS—DEFINITION OF BASIC HERD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister give the house and country a clear and comprehensive definition of the expression "basic herd" as it is to be used in the computation of income tax by stock raisers during the year 1949?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I thank the hon. member for having given notice of his question. The department's definition of "basic herd" is contained in directive 230, made public on November 17, 1948. Representations for the modification of this directive have since been received, and are now under active consideration. I shall be pleased to send the hon. member a copy of directive 230, and also to table a copy of it.

INDIAN ACT

QUESTION AS TO CONSIDERATION OF DRAFT BILL BY SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources, of which I have given notice. Is the draft bill to amend the Indian Act to be presented to the special joint committee on Indian affairs, as was recommended by that committee last year?

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): It has not yet been decided when the bill will be introduced. It may be that we shall reconstitute the committee and ask its members to make a final survey of the bill when it comes from the Department of Justice. This procedure may facilitate agreement between all parties when the bill is returned to parliament. However, this is just my thought and no official decision has been made.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REPORT AS TO REMOVAL OF OPERATING HEADQUARTERS FROM WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I have a question to ask of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Since the continuous removal of Trans-Canada Air Lines employees from Winnipeg to Montreal is a matter of serious importance to the city of Winnipeg, will the government request the company to reconsider its policy and refrain from adding to the concentration of industry in Ontario and Quebec?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Trans-Canada Air Lines is a crown company, the shares of which are owned by Canadian National Railways, and the shares of Canadian National Railways are in turn owned by the government. Trans-Canada Air Lines is operated by its own board of directors, which board determines the internal policies of the company. I do not conceive it to be my duty as the minister responsible for the air line to intervene in the matter referred to by my hon. friend.

AGRICULTURAL PRICES SUPPORT ACT

QUESTION AS TO PERIOD OF CONTINUANCE IN FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice to what date the Agricultural Prices Support Act has been continued in force by the governor in council?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): A copy of this question was referred to me before the opening of the house, but it is not a question which can be answered just by giving a date. As the act was first drafted it provided in section 12:

> Section 9 of this act shall come into force on a day to be fixed, and remain in force for such period as may be determined, by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette.

The purpose of wording the section in that manner was not to place a limiting date upon the operation of the act, but to permit the governor in council to give consideration to the matter from time to time. It was found last year that we neglected to give that consideration until after March 31, and so the section was amended to read:

Section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, chapter 29 of the statutes of 1944-45, shall be deemed to have continued in force from the thirty-first day of March, 1948, until the coming into force of this act and shall continue in force thereafter for such further period as the governor in council may fix by proclamation.

This section was so worded in order to permit the government to give consideration to the matter from time to time. The present order in council sets the date at March 31, 1950, and before that date the matter will be further considered.

FOOD

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONTRACTS WITH BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, and I apologize for not having given him notice. In view of his recent trip to Great Britain will the minister be prepared to give the house a full statement in connection with the British-Canadian food contracts?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I have not decided as yet whether I will speak on the address. If I do, I will make a point of saying something about the matter. If not, I shall certainly be prepared to deal with it when my estimates are before the committee, or at any other time the matter is up for discussion.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO DISALLOWANCE OF P.E.I. TRADE UNION ACT (1948)

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): On Tuesday last the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) asked me the following question:

Nearly a year ago a delegation representing two major labour organizations in Canada waited on the then minister of justice and asked that the government disallow the Trade Union Act (1948) passed by the legislature of Prince Edward Island. Can the minister tell the house whether the government intends to take action to that end?

My information is that the government of Prince Edward Island proposes at the approaching session of the legislature to introduce a measure to amend the statute in question. Final action on the petition for disallowance has been delayed pending action by the Prince Edward Island legislature to amend the statute accordingly.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose yesterday afternoon I was dealing with the British wheat agreement. Because the farmers are not particularly satisfied with the outcome of or the returns from that agreement, I should like now to continue with a discussion of the 1949 contracts.

I think it is understood by most people in Canada that there has been a good deal of dissension, both on this side of the Atlantic and in England, in connection with the British contracts. In order to show the feelings of some people in Great Britain I should like to read a clipping from the Edmonton Bulletin as follows:

British Press sees Canada Being Slapped

London, December 10 (BUP). The British press got on Gardiner's side today. Notable was an editorial in the London Daily Graphic. It said that Canadians feel the Anglo-Danish food deal is being made at their expense, and that unless a full statement is made immediately "grave harm" may be done to Britain's relations with Canada.

The Daily Graphic then says it is confirmed that Britain is increasing her purchases from Denmark; it is a slap in the face to Canada and "rubbing salt into the wound," as the newspaper puts it.

Dealing further with the 1949 contracts, I have here an item which appeared in Canada's Weekly of December 24, 1948, with the headline, "Mr. Gardiner clarifies the position. 'Canada did not let the U.K. down on any contract.' " Then appears a fine photograph of the minister. I should like to read part of this article, because I think it will throw a little light on the contracts. Perhaps the minister when he speaks will deal with any part of it which is contentious. I quote:

"All of our discussions on food bulk contracts were proceeding satisfactorily until difficulties arose in adjusting the relationship between dollars and sterling. We were aiming at being able to provide the United Kingdom with 350 million pounds of bacon, 125 million pounds of cheese, 75 million dozen eggs and having 400,000 head of cattle which we could dispose of either to the United States or the United Kingdom. We could provide all the requirements of the United Kingdom for wheat and much of the needed barley and oats if long time contracts could be agreed to.

"It was our hope that you would agree to take these quantities and we would be prepared to accept returns for them which would bear a reasonable relationship to the returns which are being provided to your own farmers. Canada and Britain are linked in tradition. Canada and Britain are one in their hopes for the future. We were just beginning to think that at last our common sorrows growing out of war were going to result in lasting joy when the root of all evil, 'money,' entered".

I may say this is a speech that was made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to a Canadian chamber of commerce luncheon in the old country. Dealing with the 1949 contracts, he goes on to say:

To indicate that it was desired that, because of shortage of dollars with which to buy from us, it was expected that we would, as soon as possible, get our quantities of beef, bacon and eggs down to zero. When the United Kingdom traders came over this year they intimated that they could not find dollars with which to buy food, together with other purchases they desired to make, excepting wheat and cheese. They were, after much discussion, prevailed upon to find dollars with which to buy 160 million pounds of bacon and 46 million dozen of dried and storage eggs.

I am not making these statements to be critical of the United Kingdom government or its agents. I am making them to impress upon you the fact that the British people want our bacon, want our eggs, want our beef, want our wheat. I am making them to impress upon you that if dollar requirements had not intervened we would have been in a position to send you in 1949 over 300 million pounds of bacon, nearly 200 million pounds of beef, 80 million dozen of eggs, several hundred thousand barrels of apples, thousands of bushels of beans and much jam, none of which your traders feel you can afford to have from us because of the dollar shortage. We cannot sell the apples, beans, jam and salmon to anyone at any price under the present dollar arrangement, and for the moment we are finding it impossible to dispose of millions of bushels of linseed at 30 per cent less than you are paying others for it. They are taking 140 million bushels of wheat and 50 million pounds of cheese from us because they must have them, and we appear willing to provide them for fewer dollars than any other will supply them.

Then follows a paragraph of which I should like members on all sides of the house to take particular notice:

All this is bringing me to wonder if an unknown economist—or was it Abraham Lincoln or some such individual as Churchill?—was not right when he said that he would rather have the money in his pocket tied to the unthinking inanimate substance called gold which cannot change its mind than to the manipulations of some small group of crackpots who fancy themselves as economists or statesmen.

I take it the minister is referring to officials of the Department of Finance, and as our trading position stands at the present time I think they are pretty well named. In 1945 all parties, with the exception of the Social Crediters and one lone member of the Progressive Conservative party, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), voted in favour of legislation which is causing much of our present difficulty. I thought I had better place that on record so that people may do some sound thinking before adopting another program of this kind. Further on the minister says:

I barged into a meeting where I was not intended to be the other day and heard one of your members of parliament imply, if he did not say it, that the Marshall plan is creating more communists in Europe than Stalin.

Commenting on that paragraph, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the policies of our present government are helping to create communists in Canada, because the potential production of this country is not being made available to the people, and for that reason people are dissatisfied and turning perhaps to communistic ways of life. Further on he says:

I am not convinced that this latter statement is correct, but I am convinced that the world is not in any state of mind where it can be expected to agree that the manipulation of any system or systems of currency is going to be allowed to interfere with the will of those who have empty stomachs when it is preventing surpluses of food to get to them. It might be a good thing for everybody if they would close down the united nations meetings long enough to permit the United Kingdom and United States experts to get together and settle some basis upon which dollars and sterling can be converted to allow nations like Canada to produce food to feed the starving millions and distribute it. If that cannot be done, then they might provide some means by which we may have an opportunity to fill our country with working people to develop the resources the world needs for its war and other machines, that they may eat the surpluses which are already piling up but which we are not permitted to sell.

I say again, sir, that this is a direct result of legislation that has been passed in this house. It is about time we took action to relieve the suffering of people in other countries, and relieve a lot of the distress in this country as well, by having at least some of the disadvantages arising from that legislation remedied. So far as we are concerned we want to have international agreements, if possible, and we also want to have the wheat board continued. I understand that every day of the week, including Sunday, certain people are asking that the wheat board be put out of business. We want it continued in operation and staffed by the very best men who can be obtained for the purpose. Personally I have no complaint whatever about the wheat board, and so far as I know, my group has no complaint whatever about the management of that organization in the past.

In spite of the advice given in the editorial in Maclean's magazine of January 15 last, we believe that floor prices should be established for agricultural products; otherwise you are going to destroy one of the greatest industries in the country. Conditions which people are prophesying for the near future will, if they prevail, tend to destroy our agricultural industry.

I hope to say more about this subject on a later occasion, but in the ten minutes or so that remain at my disposal I should like to deal with one or two other matters.

The speech from the throne says:

> Prosperous conditions now prevailing are being reflected in the buoyant level of national revenues, a condition to which due consideration is being given by my ministers in the preparation of forthcoming budgetary proposals.

I wonder if that is not a breach of confidence, because it is the first time since I came here, and for many years before that, that any reference has been made to the budget in the speech from the throne. Many of the people are looking for drastic reductions in taxation. We of this group certainly favour them, and we also favour an increase in the exemptions from the present $750 and $1,500 to double the amount in both cases. There is no opportunity for a young man to get married today, and start off in any kind of business on his own. In my home town of Vermilion I know of several couples who want to get married, but because of the burden laid upon them by taxation they are afraid to make the venture. They are not able to provide themselves with homes. For that reason I believe the progress of the country is being hindered; for my home town is no different from any other town, city or rural district in Canada.

If the government wants to advance the interests of the country, drastic reductions must be made in taxation. Then there are a number of nuisance taxes. I would ask the government to be kind to the children first of all. At the present time we have a heavy war tax on the "pop" youngsters drink. I am not suggesting that you remove a lot of the taxes on liquor. I hope the youngsters do not drink it; as to those who are drinking it, I do not think it does them very much good. They get a little kick out of it at the time, but possibly get a kick the next day as an aftermath. In the case of Coca-Cola however, and all other soft drinks, I would urge the government to remove the two cent tax so that people may again have their drink of "pop" without the nuisance of the tax.

Again I would suggest that candy bars, which formerly sold at five cents, be made available to the youngsters at that price—and I do not mean in the decreased size which today costs seven cents. Make them bigger and better at five cents each. Give the youngsters a chance, because they have been robbed of their candy bars for a number of years. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) says they now cost eight cents. I have not bought any candy bars for years, so I do not know; but I am taking his word for it.

We have found it necessary to import some fifteen million pounds of butter from other countries. If it were not for the severe income tax that has been levied I believe you would find our own farmers milking their cows and selling the cream to be made into butter. Instead, we are turning our business over to other countries and taking it away from our farmers. Recently I read an article on turkey production in the three prairie provinces. Last year in Alberta there was an increase of about six per cent, but in Manitoba and Saskatchewan there was a large reduction, I believe amounting to 26 to 40 per cent. This production is not good enough. People want turkeys to eat, and taxation should not be such as to prevent them from getting turkeys. We also like to eat pork and beef, but again heavy taxes are responsible for reduced production.

On many occasions we have asked that the trans-Canada highway be built. We appreciated the move made last fall by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. MacKinnon), though last session the then minister of reconstruction (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) refused to have anything to do with it. A start now has been made; and we have a demand by many organizations in the west that a trans-Canada highway commission be set up. If this is done we will avoid many squabbles between provincial governments and reach a decision as to the route that highway should follow. The trans-Canada highway should have been built years ago; we should now be able to travel from coast to coast without finding it necessary to travel part of the distance in another country.

On various occasions I have been very much hurt to find that many of our crippled people, old and young, are compelled to live on a bare subsistence level. Last summer I went to the Lloydminster exhibition. After the crowd had left the grandstand and gone to see the sideshows a young girl I have known for years came to me and asked if anything was being done to help the crippled people of Canada. I told her about the national health program announced last session by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), and she asked, "Is anything provided specifically for crippled people?" I was sorry to have to tell her there was not, but I said that when I came back this session I certainly would see that the matter was brought to the attention of the minister. He has been good to some people; I hope he will not forget the unfortunate crippled people.

Mr. Martin: Of course under the health program there is a grant to deal with conditions which cause children to become crippled.

Mr. Fair: I understand that children are looked after, but I believe this young lady is close to thirty. Just as I turned away after speaking to her I met another neighbour whom I have known for quite a while; she was being pushed along in a wheel chair by her dad. Neither of these families is in a financial position to look after these crippled people. Our two major parties have been scrapping for the last week or so over their sins of the past, but now I hope the party in power will get busy and do something worth while, and that the other party to my right, the Progressive Conservatives, will get busy and help them. The sins of the past do not help people in the future. We should look ahead and prepare for the future instead of looking back searching for each other's past sins.

On the question of education I should like to read the resolution which was sent to me the other day by the Canadian school trustees' association:

Federal Grants in Aid

Whereas various educational bodies in all provinces are concerned with the present inequality of educational opportunity throughout the nation;

And whereas present sources of finances are insufficient;

Therefore be it resolved that we ask the federal government to give grants in aid in order that the provinces whose needs are greatest may be able to provide equality of educational opportunity.

This is signed by the secretary, Henry E. Spencer, who was at one time a member of this house. I am glad to see that Mr. Spencer is turning again to his old love, monetary reform, because this is the place where credit can be created. This government has that power, while apparently the provinces have not. There is no reason why this government should adopt a dog-in-the-manger attitude by restricting the creation of credit and at the same time refusing to allow the provinces to make use of it. Substantial grants should be made to the provinces to be administered by them without any strings attached.

Old age pensioners also demand better treatment than they have had in the past. We know that the amount given is by no means sufficient to afford them a decent standard of living, and I hope something worth while will be done this session on their behalf.

I have just one further matter to deal with; I refer to soldier settlers. Last session an item of $150,000 was placed in the estimates and passed by the house without any controversial discussion, but that amount does not begin to deal with the problem. The veterans affairs committee, which has done such excellent work under the present minister, as well as under the former minister, Mr. Mackenzie, who has now gone to the other place, unanimously recommended in its report that the veterans be given clear title as requested in the brief presented on June 17 last by the president and secretary of the soldier settlers association. Now, thirty years after the soldier settlement legislation was passed, I ask the government to make the final gesture of giving these men clear title, in the interests of these citizens, whose average age is about sixty though some of them are over eighty. In the name of common sense I ask today that clear title be granted to those who remain in debt to the board.

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I beg the indulgence of the house for a few moments. I know that indulgence will be readily granted, because I have not spoken very often in this house during the last ten years. However, there are times when a member of parliament must express his opinion and voice the sentiments of the people whom he has the heavy responsibility, and honour, of representing in this national forum.

Since we prorogued last summer quite a few changes have taken place in this House of Commons, to which I am going to allude very briefly. First, as one who has been in this house for many years, I want to pay a special, personal tribute, in which I am voicing the sentiments of all my constituents, to our past leader, now the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King). When I first came to this house in 1926, Mr. Speaker, I was elected as a Labour Independent; but after I saw Mr. Mackenzie King and the Liberal party functioning in this chamber I went back to my executive and said that unless I was allowed to follow Mr. King and his party—not blindly but intelligently—I would not remain here. At that time I was given carte blanche, and I have never regretted that action.

I sincerely believe, I am sincerely convinced, that under that fine leadership which was supported on so many occasions at general elections in an unmistakable way, Canada has enjoyed years of prosperity, great accomplishments, and a large measure of national unity. It is said when a man gets married people will tell of his faults; he has to die to get praise. In this instance, our revered past leader must enjoy life because, if there was ever a man that was abused in the hurly burly of public life, it was certainly the right hon. member for Glengarry. He is still in public life as a member of parliament, but is no longer leader of his party. Now, every section of Canada, every section of the press, finds it possible to put in proper perspective the fine qualifications of the right hon. member for Glengarry. He must enjoy this because he deserves it. If there was ever a man who gave of himself it was certainly the right hon. gentleman.

I also wish to say a few words of praise concerning the present Prime Minister of this country. I wish to praise him for many reasons, but the primary one is that he was a man with a successful law practice, highly honoured in his province, who was practically conscripted. We all know the circumstances. He answered the call diligently and loyally. It was not very long before this parliament and this nation fully realized the stature of this fine man, with his broad vision and his true Canadianism. I know Canada was proud when last August the Liberal party chose him as its leader. I know Canada feels secure at the present time in the fine leadership he has already given as Prime Minister of this country.

I should like to say a few words about the new leader of the Progressive Conservative party. I was proud of his nomination as leader of that national party. One of the reasons for my pride is the fact that I am an Ontarian. He has made some sacrifices in coming into this field because, as you all know, he was certainly successful in so far as provincial politics were concerned. The hon. gentleman resigned his position as premier of the province of Ontario. So long as it is possible to have men of that calibre enter the field of national politics, this country as a whole does not need to worry very much. It is a sign that there is something great; there is something for which a man is willing to make the necessary personal sacrifices to enter this field. When one considers the actions of the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country and the leader of the Progressive Conservative party, I repeat, people do not need to worry about the future of Canada. It should be secure.

I should like to make a few remarks about the past leader of the Progressive Conservative party. I get mixed up in trying to say the name of that party because my father was a Conservative in the days when they were only Conservatives. I wish to pay him a tribute. Regardless of what publicity may say about the new leader of his party, I do not think the leadership will be more dignified or more Canadian than the leadership he gave. I say that sincerely. No doubt he has brought a lot of his own fine, strong colour, which was mostly Liberal, into the ranks of the Progressive Conservative party. This parliament and the nation as a whole has benefited from his actions as leader of that great party.

May I say a word concerning a new member who has great physical size, and also, it has been stated, great mental stature. I wish to pay tribute to the new member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan). Before the election he received some praise, not only from the Ottawa Journal, which is a Conservative newspaper, but from all newspapers in the maritimes that knew him. It was said he was a well qualified man, highly respected in those sections of Canada which had the opportunity of knowing and appreciating him.

I should like to say a few words about another physical giant who lately came to this house, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Boucher). May I say to him that his predecessor was highly respected by every section of the house. He sometimes found it possible to arouse the ire of hon. members opposite but, at the same time, no one doubted his sincerity. I know that the present member must possess a large measure of his fine qualities.

At this point, I should like to say a few words about the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Demers). I may have to repeat my words concerning him when I speak about the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I should like to compliment him on his maiden effort in this house. He spoke as a true Canadian, and as a man who believes absolutely in national unity. He impressed me as a man who is not going to follow the current, but will breast the head wind. The House of Commons needs men of that calibre. It is always easier to follow the line of least resistance. I know the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains will never do that because he will follow his own personal inclinations and his own Canadianism.

I should like to say a few words about the new Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). At this point I find it necessary to answer certain sections of the press who seem to be under the impression that we backbenchers of the Liberal party were impatient at the government for bringing new members into this field. The truth is far from that, because after all, the whole is more important than any part. I praise the government for finding it possible to bring into government circles men of the calibre of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). I believe it is the duty of all parties, under any conditions or circumstances, to bring into public life all possible talents of statesmanship. Speaking for myself as well as for the backbenchers, may I say again that we are proud and glad to have within our ranks men of the calibre of those I have just mentioned.

May I also say a word of praise about the member for Marquette (Mr. Garson), the Minister of Justice. Although some sections of the house did not entirely agree with what he said yesterday, all members must have seen in him a real Canadian who will work, not only for provincial autonomy, but also for national unity. I watched the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken), during the course of the remarks made by the Minister of Justice. I am sure he could hear the echo of his own words during the time he was premier of Manitoba. It must have been pleasant for him to hear them repeated by the Minister of Justice in his presence yesterday.

I had the honour and privilege of working under the Secretary of State for External Affairs during 1948 as a delegate to the united nations in New York. Prior to that, a section of the committee on external affairs visited New York. On both occasions we were given the opportunity of seeing him in action. I know I am not revealing any secrets when I say that he was highly respected by member nations of the united nations. My own observations proved this. I believe it is safe to say that any of the higher positions in that organization were within his reach if he had wished them. It is for this reason that I repeat that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is a wonderful acquisition, not only to the Liberal party and to parliament, but also to the whole of Canada. He, also, has made great sacrifices to come here since he had a secure position which he filled to the satisfaction of everyone. I could apply the same principle to him as I did to the Prime Minister and to the leader of the opposition. It applies just as forcibly to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Now, I wish to turn my attention to that fine young man, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters). I wish to felicitate him on his assumption of the office he occupies at the present time. He also was successful in his own calling. In answering the call of his constituents, he came into the national forum. I am positive this young man will go far in the national life of Canada.

I wish to say a few words of praise to the members of parliament who have been made parliamentary assistants. Little criticism has been heard concerning the original appointments because hon. members of this house fully realize the necessity of having younger men groomed for the higher positions. I believe our experience over the last two or three years fully bears out what I have just said. To these new appointees, and to those who were appointed when this system was inaugurated, I wish all possible success in discharging the heavy responsibilities they have undertaken. I am glad to state, and I think everyone will agree with me, that every one of them has been filling his position marvellously well and to the satisfaction of the country as a whole.

I wish to say a word about the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown). A year ago last spring, accompanied by my esteemed friend the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), I visited that wonderful section of Canada which the hon. member so well described as the sun parlour of Canada. I had been there before but I made an extended visit and spent a week in that section of Canada. I went to Kingsville and saw the work being carried on by Manly Miner, the son of Jack Miner. We went to Leamington. Wherever we went, we were always well received. One thing that went to my heart more deeply than anything else was for me, a Canadian of French descent, to go into those sections of rural Ontario, which is predominantly English-speaking and protestant, and see the broadmindedness of the people there, and the friendliness they have towards other Canadians. On several occasions when I was given an opportunity of speaking, I made the wish that it might be possible for my compatriots from the province of Quebec to come and visit those sections of the country and to see the fine spirit prevailing among the population there. I also said that it would be beneficial for them to come and visit the old historic province of Quebec where they would find a great common ground, our love for Canada as a whole.

On this visit I saw things that I believe it is my duty to mention here. On a Sunday morning, in a locality whose name I do not need to mention, I went to mass at eight o'clock. It was held in the basement of the church. There was no superstructure, just a few skeleton beams of steel. After the service I went to see the priest. He said, "Mr. Bradette, we have enough money with which to go on and complete the building, but you will perhaps be greatly surprised and delighted to learn that at least one-third of the money to complete the church has been supplied by English-speaking protestants." That is the kind of spirit that everyone approves from the heart, the mind and the soul.

I wish to say just one word about our present financial situation. To me sometimes the pros and cons of politics and some of the propaganda we hear are fairly baffling. Let us suppose for one moment that, instead of having a fairly good surplus in our budget, we were to have a heavy deficit. What would be the criticism we would hear from every section of the opposition and the opposition press? They would say that this country was near bankruptcy. Now we have a surplus and perhaps it will be large. I have no time to discuss that aspect at the moment. The opposition find it possible to criticize; but, from my experience, I believe it is just as necessary to have a sound national income as it is to have a sound personal one.

I come to the province of Ontario, in which an election was held last year. Boasts were made, and rightly so, that the government of that province had a surplus of $25 million. Do you think that we Liberals criticized the Conservative administration at Queen's Park for such an accomplishment? Certainly not, because it was a real accomplishment. But there is more to it than that. What did they do with that fine surplus? Instead of doing as the national treasury did—reduce taxation —they increased it. For instance, at the present time we pay a tax of eleven cents per gallon on gasoline. When the federal government took off the gasoline tax and left the matter in the hands of the provinces, the Ontario treasury put it on. They did the same thing with the amusement tax. At that time, when the provincial government had a surplus, we were proud of it. Why should not every Canadian be proud of the present economic situation? I will go this far: I would not be in favour of having a great surplus from year to year. There is a time and a place for everything. Our present hope is that taxation will be greatly reduced in the present budget. But why will that be possible? Purely and simply because the present administration has been courageous and capable, presenting policies which were not always absolutely popular with the Canadian people. But the Canadian people are practical, and they are much happier today with a large surplus than they would have been with a large deficit, and I believe that they like courage.

One must be practical in all these things. I repeat, you may have the pendulum going too far one way or the other. I would not like to see a large surplus from year to year. But we must ask ourselves this question. If the national debt kept piling up by billions and billions of dollars every year, would we be happy then? Is it not true that when we were in danger of inflation, the national government was courageous enough to tell the Canadian people that they must fear inflation, which is just as dangerous, and more so in certain circumstances, than deflation? In warning the people the government was alert, and for its action I, representing my constituency, praise the government. Again I repeat that if we are in a position at this present session to decrease taxation, that is due largely to the fact that our economic and financial position is as fine as that of any other country in the world.

I want to say a few words about election promises. We in northern Ontario, in spite of Dr. Chisholm, still believe in old man Santa Claus. We believe that he is a fine old man and that he is performing a useful service. At the general provincial election we had a new type of Santa Claus, a rather young, handsome and glamorous young man. He made promises that dipped deeply into the Ontario provincial treasury. For what purpose? For the purpose of winning the provincial election. It is not an absolutely bad purpose, I must admit, because all parties always try to win elections. Why a person would be highly scandalized because that might have been done, I do not know. It might have to be done by this party. I do not know why the leader of the opposition thought it was scandalous when it happened so glaringly during the last provincial election. If I know anything about the constitution of the provinces, and of the country, it is this. When a legislature or the central government is dissolved, the government is then practically in the hands of the people, and I believe it is absolutely in order for the leaders of the parties or for the ex-premier of the province to make certain promises; but how it is permissible to dip into the provincial treasury in order to fulfil those promises, and for the money to be handed out immediately, without legislative sanction, is past my comprehension. If all the promises that were made during the last provincial election had been implemented, we in northern Ontario would be sitting pretty. For instance, promise was made of a fine university in Fort William or Port Arthur. Then a day or two later another university was promised for North Bay. Promise was made to a fine rural community in my own riding—and I am not scandalized about it; I merely make mention of the fact. This place was located fourteen miles east of the industrial town of Kapuskasing. The promise of an agricultural college was made to that fine rural community. I am going to see that they get it, because the promise was made. The people of that area are entitled to what they were promised; they should have it. Then, promise was made of a water system, funds for which were to be provided, to the extent of $120,000, out of the provincial treasury.

The other sixty-four rural communities in that section are watching developments. When these promises are fulfilled, the citizens will be proud of what they have. But each of those municipalities will go to Queen's Park and make similar requests; and if they do, they will be entitled to what they ask, because I say election promises must be fulfilled—there can be no getting away from that. Otherwise it would be deceiving the population, and not keeping faith with the voters of Canada or of a province.

I should like for a moment to speak concerning a delicate subject. A few days before the last vote in the most recent Ontario provincial election, in this city of Ottawa a fine institution which has been operated for generations was granted $250,000. Perhaps the amount should have been greater. But my point is this: Why was not that money voted properly from the floor of the Ontario legislature? Why was it granted just at election time? I do not criticize the grant, because in my view the organization in question should have been given at least $500,000. But a procedure of this kind skirts closely the process of political buying; there is no getting away from that fact.

These are matters which of necessity must be placed before this national forum because, in my view, no matter what party is making an appeal to the Canadian people, it has no right to buy votes out of the provincial or the national treasury. And I would stay by that statement. After all, the roof of democracy must fall over our heads if care is not taken in this connection.

In a few months it is likely that we will be engaged in a general election. I do not want to see the spectacle of the political parties of the House of Commons going before the people in an effort to overbid each other out of funds in the public treasury. That is not democracy; that is not freedom; that is not Canadianism—and it should not be done. It is falsifying our constitution.

May I next refer to those election promises which are never implemented. The Canadian people generally are as well informed as members of the House of Commons, and when promises are not fulfilled they are entitled to resent it. They do not like this failure to fulfil promises, and they soon learn that they have been fooled. You may fool them once or twice, but you cannot fool them all the time. I make this appeal in all sincerity, because I well remember when, in 1935 I believe it was, I made a definite promise during the campaign, and I promised that I would never make another one. My promise was that I would bring back a better service for the numbers 1 and 2 transcontinental trains from Toronto to Winnipeg, passing through Cochrane. But my promise was never implemented, and the people up there have held that against me,—and rightly so. Every election I am reminded of it. I would repeat that it is contrary to all democratic principles to go before the people at election time, whether provincially or in a general election, and make promises, when those who make them know full well they will never be fulfilled.

While I have not the time to go deeply into the matter, I should like to say a few words about dominion-provincial relations. In this forum three years ago, prior to the 1946 dominion-provincial conference I expressed the wish that the premier of Ontario would be big enough to see the viewpoint of all parts of Canada. I am sorry he did not come up fully to my expectations. I do not blame him altogether for what happened in those instances; but he must take some of the blame.

I come from a section of the country which at times has had quarrels with Queen's Park; I mean northern Ontario, that fine treasure house in Ontario. Sometimes our resources were badly used and wasted, and at a time when we had practically no voice in the government at Toronto. However, we have always remained true to the old province of Ontario. When one hears talk of secession of that portion of Ontario from Fort William to North Bay or anywhere else, one may be sure that 99½ per cent of the people in northern Ontario have always been against it, and will continue so. We believe that Ontario must remain as it is at the present time.

The point I wished to bring out is that those of us from northern Ontario believe that the welfare of the whole of this province is better than the welfare of the northern section of it, or even of the city of Toronto. We believe in the welfare of the whole of the province—and that same principle applies with equal force to Canada as a whole. I would ask the present administration at Queen's Park, and I would ask those here in the House of Commons, as a man who was born in the province of Quebec, to forget sometimes some of the smaller features in politics, and to think of Canada as a whole. Ontario has been described as a privileged province, but she is not. Ontario is Ontario only through the accident of geography. While the people are Ontarian, they are primarily Canadian.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), as premier of Ontario, was a talented man; no one can deny that. He is a true Canadian. But why he did not practise that true Canadianism in his relations with the dominion and the other provinces is something beyond my comprehension.

May I say one word about our present trade situation, and particularly our trade with dear old England. I am speaking my mind on this score, because I have always been a great admirer of those fine, tidy little islands; and even more so since the last war, when for over a year Great Britain was the only human rampart against the hordes of barbarism, nazism and fascism. No matter what we do for England, no matter what happens in the future, we can never forget that fact; because I maintain that had it not been for Great Britain democracy for the rest of the world would have died.

However, in our relations there may be times when some irritation is revealed. May I compliment here and now the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who, when speaking on this subject, asked us to be tolerant when discussing this matter, because it was a sensitive one. It is true that we have to be careful, because some people consider it only from the standpoint of dollars and cents. True, in any democracy dollars and cents must count; but at the same time I maintain that in our trade relations with Great Britain sentiment must always have its place no matter what some may say. We may have to exercise a good deal of sentiment if the day comes when liquidation of her debt to us is required. I repeat, without fear of successful contradiction, that some day they may find it impossible to meet all their obligations. Under these conditions, what would be the duty of the Canadian nation? It would be proper for us to forget about it, for the simple reason that Great Britain has paid in blood a price away beyond anything which can be counted in monetary consideration. She has paid in the lives she lost and the horrible tortures she had to suffer, not only among the personnel of her armed forces, people who had military training, but among her young children and her old people who were destroyed by tens of thousands when, for over eight months, the luftwaffe poisoned the skies of Great Britain.

We must not forget that situation, that great epic of heroism. While we may have done all that we possibly could, we must not forget that there may be times when Great Britain must do certain things from necessity. We too have international trade problems.

I do not believe in the iron curtain. It should never have been allowed to exist. Speaking not as an expert but as a Canadian, may I say that I cannot comprehend how it could be possible for Great Britain to hurt Canada by dealing with any nation within the iron curtain. My reasons are not only sentimental; I say that because a principle is involved. If the application of that principle is continued it may mean the doom of freedom and democracy as we know them.

In support of my opinion I should like to quote from an article which appeared in that fine weekly paper The Ensign of January 29, 1949:

Building on slavery.

This is worth listening to. It may be that Great Britain has a right to deal with other nations, but if Canada attempted to deal with a nation behind the iron curtain I would be the first to rise in my place and protest. The article reads:

The Yorkshire Post says editorially that one of the reasons Great Britain must buy food from Poland rather than from Canada—

We are all in sympathy with the fine Polish people. They do not like the communists, for they are not communistic by nature; but they are behind the iron curtain at the present time.

—is that the prices of her manufactured goods are too high to compete in North America. The editorial concludes that Britain must export more goods at present wage levels, but with cheaper raw materials than the new world can supply.

We have every sympathy with Great Britain's brave effort to restore her economy, which suffers from war wastage, from technical and mechanical obsolescence, and from currency dislocations. Nevertheless we are appalled by the implications of the Anglo-Polish and similar pacts when viewed in the light of the above reasoning. Reduced to their true significance, they mean that henceforth Britain's living standard is to be maintained, not by increased efficiency at home and unsnarled trade abroad, but by the poverty, exploitation and expropriation of eastern European farmers by their communist slave masters.

Those are strong words, but I do not think anyone will dare deny them. Those who purchase from a country behind the iron curtain should know that they are buying goods that have been produced by political slavery pure and simple and by terrific sacrifices on the part of the people. The article continues:

We know from history that a soviet government will buy machinery and other finished goods needed for its "plans" at the expense of millions of starving peasants. It has been estimated that more than three and a half million peasants were deliberately starved in the thirties when their wheat was shipped abroad to buy equipment for Magnitogorsk, Dnieprostroi, and other projects.

Can Britain eat her bread with a good conscience when it is known that she buys it cheaper than in Canada because a ruthless dictator is exploiting his Polish slaves? Can the United States permit a dollar shortage which helps to produce such a situation? Does not this constitute aiding and abetting a crime against humanity? These are questions to be answered, for not even economic distress excuses transgressions against basic morality.

I speak very feelingly on this subject. After all, we can all remember the terrible blood bath through which Canada and Great Britain have passed in defence of democracy. We see now where trade balances and a monetary system have forced a great nation to deal with other nations inside the iron curtain. I am not going to go into the question of internationalism, for I have too much respect for our great friends to the south. I think the average United States citizen would like to see the dollar made more pliable, more humanized, so as to bring about freer trade throughout the world. The average United States citizen would like to see something done about the sterling situation. It would be a great humanitarian victory if there were freer trade between Great Britain and the rest of the world, Great Britain and Canada and Great Britain and the United States, and in fact between all nations.

I should like to say a few words about what I hope will be our new sister province—Newfoundland. There is something fine in this possibility, something great. It is expected that within a few months there will be integrated into the Canadian federation that fine, old colony located in the gulf of St. Lawrence. In my youth, which was a long time ago, when I was attending a small rural school I was always baffled that Newfoundland, which was so close to the American continent, geographically speaking, and which was so close to the Canadian mainland, was not a part of Canada. To me the gulf of St. Lawrence seemed to have opened its mouth deliberately so that Newfoundland could come into Canada.

It was a proud day for us and no doubt a proud day for Newfoundland when by a majority vote they decided to come into the Canadian confederation. They have problems of their own and in my view it is the duty of every Canadian worthy of the name to study their problems, to try to know them, to sympathize with them and to help them in arriving at a solution. I believe that the Newfoundlanders will fully realize what it means to come into the great Canadian federation.

When this is accomplished, when Newfoundland does come into the Canadian federation, I hope that they will send some of their fine sons and daughters to Canada to explain to us their aspirations, their struggles in the past, their love, their culture and what they expect of the future. Then in turn Canada should send some of her prominent sons and daughters to sell and make better known this country to that great strategic island which in the future may mean so much to the peace of the world.

I make that suggestion in all sincerity. I wonder how many Canadians know the fine qualities of the Newfoundlander? How many of us know their loyalty to British traditions? Perhaps the same thing could be said, although perhaps not as forcibly, of many Newfoundlanders who have never had an opportunity to know Canada.

It would not be just a matter of selling one to the other; it would be a matter of interesting our population and making them realize what a wonderful asset there is in having that fine sentinel between Greenland, Europe, and the Canadian mainland—a sentinel to guard us against things that may happen in the future, which have never happened in the past.

I make this plea very sincerely. This is not just a political question; it is bigger than that. I hope that the moment Newfoundland comes into confederation Canada will choose half a dozen of her sons and daughters who are well qualified, and that Newfoundland will do the same. There are in each country many intelligent men and women—who will visit the other to tell them of their own. We love these people already because they belong to the British family of nations. We want them to come here to tell us of their aspirations, of their problems, of the things that they expect from the Canadian confederation.

It is true they will have to make sacrifices in order to enter confederation, but the same will also apply to us. We must be ready and willing to try to understand them, and to have respect for their traditions and ideals. Let us not get away from the fact that in the past Newfoundland has been a real sentinel of the British empire on this continent, and will remain faithful in its loyalty in the future.

I want to say a word or two about the St. Lawrence waterway. As a person who represents a section of Canada that, geographically speaking, is really central, I may say that we are open-minded as far as the St. Lawrence waterway is concerned. The potential hydro power is needed at the present time in the province of Ontario. I do not say that in a critical way. It is because of the progress that industry has made in the province. There are also the factors of immigration and transportation. I feel somewhat reticent about discussing the problem because, under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a national rail link was built between the maritimes and Winnipeg out of the federal treasury. Today, west of the town of Hearst, with one of the finest roadbeds on the North American continent, the rails are practically rusty. We are in favour of the development of the St. Lawrence waterway because it is a necessity.

The United States and Canada are friendly nations and we should have no difficulty on that project. But, in saying that, I want to protest against a situation which has been allowed to exist for many years in regard to that fine national link between Quebec city and Winnipeg. It is practically unused at the present time. You have there a potential that should be used winter and summer. Why it is not is past my comprehension. It is true that when the national transcontinental line was built north from Quebec, and out through the wilds of northern Quebec and northern Ontario, they thought that there was nothing but muskeg. Then they found the area contained the finest natural resources, and today it is the real treasure house of Canada. From Quebec city to fifty miles west of the town of Hearst they have developed those natural resources, with the result that you have there some of the best paying traffic on the whole of the Canadian National railway system.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Bradette: I greatly appreciate the indulgence of the members of the house and thank them for it. I have no right to it, because hon. members have been too kind to me in the past. I will terminate now. I may have occasion to say something else about certain problems which are very important, not only to our section of the country but also to other sections, because we are not parochial in our viewpoint. We happen to be located in what we call central Canada. We are absolutely national as far as our problems are concerned. It may surprise some of the members listening to me at the present time to know that we are familiar with the names of the mayors of the cities of Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon and Vancouver. We also know the names of the mayors of the cities of Halifax, Saint John and Montreal. Therefore we are truly national as far as our location is concerned, and I also believe we are truly national in our viewpoint.

That is why I appreciate the kindness extended to me. We have no real grievances, but I am going to mention freight rates very briefly. If there is a zone that has suffered it has been my zone. I have no right to say "my"; I am not big enough. I should say "our zone". We always had discrepancies, but we accepted them for the benefit of the whole. We must be practical. If the Canadian National Railways has great deficits, we must remember that this nation owes something to that national railway system, and also the Canadian Pacific railway system. During the war their accomplishments were such that no other nation in the world was able to match them. They did something that was a revelation to the whole world, and helped our war effort greatly. Nevertheless, I maintain that we are not getting the full benefit of our fine national system at the present time. I am not going to enlarge any more on that point. All I want to do before resuming my seat is to express the hope that in dealing with freight rates we will all take a national viewpoint. Can we expect our railway systems to carry on with deficits year after year? We must be practical. Speaking as a northern Ontario man, I am in favour of certain concessions as far as British Columbia is concerned, as far as the Crowsnest pass rates are concerned, and as far as the maritime provinces are concerned. I am sure I am speaking for the people of central Canada when I say that I believe they are willing to make adjustments and certain sacrifices as far as freight rates are concerned. I believe they should do so for the whole of Canada, because again I repeat, the whole is better than any part, and a problem of that magnitude must be faced and in a national way.

Before I forget, I want to say that I am not a Canadian National railway man, and I am not a Canadian Pacific railway man. However, I do not believe in the plank incorporated in the C.C.F. platform at their last convention involving the amalgamation of the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. It is true that I believe implicitly in the Canadian National railway system, but at the same time I maintain it would not be fair to the Canadian people if the two systems were amalgamated. You have only to mention that to Canadian Pacific men and Canadian National men to see that they highly resent that plank in the platform of the C.C.F. party. The railway systems in Canada not only have the commercial viewpoint in mind; they have to give service to certain localities. There is a humanitarianism in that regard on the part of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I say that with feeling. A few years ago the then premier of the province of Ontario, Mr. Hepburn, allowed the construction of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, as it was then called, from Cochrane to Moose Factory. At the time many people were very much in favour of that, but when they found there was very little revenue for the extension of the railway they wanted to dismantle it and take the rails away. I went to Toronto and told the premier of Ontario that he could not do it because, when they built that ribbon of steel from Cochrane to Moose Factory and Moosonee, they had permitted the settlement of certain small localities along the railway; and I said that if the people of Ontario knew the situation they would not permit the demolition of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway. To the credit of the Ontario administration it was not done.

The railways in a country like Canada have more than freight and passenger services to give. They have to provide service in a great, expansive territory at times under very difficult conditions, a service to which every Canadian man and woman is entitled. That is why, as a Canadian, as an Ontarian, and as a member of this parliament, I want to take this opportunity to say that I am absolutely against the amalgamation of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways on the ground of humanitarianism and also on the ground that better service may be given to the Canadian people if both railways maintain their identity.

Mr. Cruickshank: I rise on a question of privilege. I do so because the last speaker is on my own side of the house, and I prefer to do so now rather than when a speaker from the other side of the house has concluded a speech. We have talked about amendment of the rules. I should like to suggest that only the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) be allowed to exceed forty minutes. If you are going to permit one member to do it, then every one of us should have the same privilege. I say that with no disrespect to the previous speaker, who is a member on my own side of the house. If a member cannot say what he has to say in forty minutes he should write it out, hand it to the press and stay in his own riding. I respectfully suggest that the forty-minute rule be enforced, with the exception of the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I may say it is the custom of the Speaker to remind the house when a member has spoken forty minutes, but if the house gives unanimous consent then the member continues, and the Speaker can do nothing about that.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is gratifying to every true lover of democracy to see on the part of the Canadian public a quickened interest in what is going on in this parliament. There are many reasons one can think of for that fact. Perhaps rumours of an election have assisted. In any event, the fact that we have in the house a new Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and a new leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) undoubtedly has been a major factor in attracting increased interest to what is transpiring in this house. I would say to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that when he was elected to the leadership of the Liberal party, and then when he assumed the responsibilities of Prime Minister of Canada, it was a great pleasure to extend very hearty congratulations to him; and I repeat those congratulations today. We have had many differences; we may have more today before I conclude my remarks, but the warmth of my congratulations is not in the least abated.

I should like to say a word, too, concerning the man who leads the Progressive Conservative party, the new leader of the opposition in this chamber (Mr. Drew). I have had the good fortune to know him personally for something like twenty-four years now; and I know him, as this house increasingly will come to know and appreciate him, as a man of high courage, a man who presently, after the next election, will give the whole Canadian people dynamic, progressive and vigorous leadership. His record as premier of the province of Ontario is such that it will be the ambition of premiers of that province in generations to come to seek in some degree to emulate it. He was at all times progressive, and he gave that province such administration as will leave it forever in his debt. This party under the present leader of the opposition presents to the people of Canada an invincible unity, and that unity will make itself felt not only in this chamber during the present session, but, after the election that is to come, throughout this dominion when he takes his position as Prime Minister.

I suppose it is only to be expected that some members of the house should seek to train their cap pistols on big targets. I suppose some, like the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Beaudry), because their armoury may not be quite as heavy as they would wish, will seek to make up what may be lacking in their aim by choosing large targets. But I want to say that remarks such as those which fell from the lips of the hon. member for St. James today and on Tuesday do not hurt my leader or reflect upon him. By remarks of that kind the hon. member only hurts and reflects upon himself.

It was appropriate that the leader of the opposition, in his speech opening this debate, should have concentrated most of his remarks on the subject of dominion-provincial relations, because those who have sat in this house since 1945 will not forget how frequently members opposite have sought to regale the house with accusations directed at the distinguished man who is now leader of the opposition. It was refreshing to see that leader literally take the government by the scruff of the neck and give a complete answer to those who have been misrepresenting the record in the years that have intervened since the government sabotaged the last dominion-provincial conference.

Did it not strike members of the house as passing strange that when the Prime Minister followed the leader of the opposition last Friday evening he completely avoided the subject of dominion-provincial relations? As a matter of fact he sought with almost indecent haste to align himself on the side of the angels. Here is what he said, as we find it at page 60 of Hansard:

> Before doing that, however, I want to say to the leader of the opposition that there are many of the things he said in his speech concerning dominion-provincial relations, and concerning the constitution of Canada, and its principles, with which I am in entire agreement.

Some hon. Members: Why not?

Mr. Fleming: Quite so; at last we have a little wisdom flowing from lips opposite. Why not? There is no reason why hon. members opposite should not have agreed with every word the leader of the opposition said in his speech last Friday. I do not condemn the Prime Minister for the extent to which he professes himself to be in agreement with the leader of the opposition; I commend him for his frankness in that respect. I only regret he did not go the full distance and commit himself completely to agreement with the leader of the opposition.

But, Mr. Speaker, behold the welter of confusion, the welter of contradiction which always characterizes speeches from the right-hand side of the chamber immediately became apparent. When the new Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), making his maiden speech in the house yesterday, undertook to be the spokesman of the government on the subject of dominion-provincial relations, what an extraordinary attitude he displayed! It is time the government decided where they stand on this subject, because here we have the man who apparently is to be the government spokesman on this question describing the fundamental conception of confederation, the kind of confederation that apparently he professes to cling to, at page 165 of Hansard:

> The provinces were deliberately left with small revenues, which in some provinces were inadequate from the start, in order that the legal powers which they received under the constitution would be supported as little as possible by revenues wherewith to pay for exercising them. The idea was that after a short trial with that sort of federal system they would ultimately, in the language of Sir A. T. Galt, "at no distant day be enabled to do away with those artificial boundaries which separated one province from another, and come together as one united people"—without any provinces.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the conception of confederation that fell from the lips of the government spokesman on the subject of dominion-provincial relations. Then, very properly, he went on to give this description of his own conception, as already expressed; this is what he says at page 166.

Mr. Martin: If the hon. gentleman would permit a question, was that not a quotation?

Mr. Fleming: The part following the words "Sir A. T. Galt" is a quotation, until we get down to the words "without any provinces", which the minister added.

Mr. Cruickshank: The new way of doing it is to say "I am quoting now" and "I have stopped quoting."

Mr. Fleming: I have no time to deal with remarks of that kind. This is the way the spokesman for the government sums up his conception of Canadian confederation:

> Well, sir, how did this limited and static conception of provincial responsibility . . . work out?

This "limited and static conception of provincial responsibility"—those are the words of the government spokesman on the subject of dominion-provincial relations. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, you could not have a better description of the whole conception of confederation which has actuated the government since the time it took office, particularly in these years since the war, than in those words: "this limited and static conception of provincial responsibility." That is just the conception that has characterized the attitude of this government toward the provinces since this whole question became a national issue.

I would say to the minister, if I had the opportunity of speaking to him now, that he and his province owe very much to the stand my leader took at the dominion-provincial conference. Had it not been for that firm and courageous stand, taken with a due appreciation of the essential realities of confederation in Canada, the province of Manitoba would not have had nearly as good an agreement with the dominion government as it eventually got.

Step by step, just along the lines my leader and other leaders like the premier of Quebec and the premier of Nova Scotia had been taking at the dominion-provincial conference, the province of Manitoba and others properly began to get more and more under the agreements. The province of Manitoba and other provinces throughout this dominion, as time goes on and the truth sinks in, will come to appreciate more and more how much they owe to the courageous stand taken by my leader at the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: I would rather take the questions at the end of my statement, since time is running short.

Mr. Knowles: Is this an admission that your leader broke up the conference?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; I should point out that a question cannot be asked without the consent of the member.

Mr. Cruickshank: He cannot answer him anyhow?

Mr. Fleming: When you get a question as absurd as the one asked by the hon. member from Winnipeg, it does not take long to dispose of it. I have just made it clear the dominion government sabotaged the conference and I may say it would have been sabotaged just as quickly if the C.C.F. had been the government, because the worst centralizers in this Dominion of Canada are the C.C.F. socialists.

This mentality that has been exhibited by the Minister of Justice is apparently the mentality that is to characterize this government in its continued relations with the provinces.

We had to listen to the Prime Minister on Monday last say, in effect, that he had neither the time nor the patience to attend further dominion-provincial conferences.

Mr. Cruickshank: He never said any such thing.

Mr. Fleming: The Prime Minister undertook to tell this house how much he objected to having to return from an international conference several years ago to attend one of these dominion-provincial conferences. He went on to complain about that and to say that, in effect, the method of general dominion-provincial conferences was futile. It could result in nothing of benefit to Canada in the future. If we are to take his words at face value, apparently as long as this government is in office—and that will not be long, since its days are numbered—there will be no more dominion-provincial conferences. In other words, the method of general conference which brought about confederation has no place in the thinking of the government which clings to the treasury benches opposite. The Prime Minister has repudiated the method of open, general conference. He has repudiated the confederation method of dealing with problems arising within the framework of confederation. He has not the time, he has not the patience for any more general dominion-provincial conferences.

Mr. Speaker, none of us is going to say Canada should not be represented at international conferences where Canadian interests are involved. I am sure no one is going to say that, because many of these conferences do not succeed in their purpose, they should not be held. The Prime Minister of Canada has reached the point now in his political thinking that it is all very well to have international conferences whether they succeed or whether they do not, but in the matter of Canadian conferences—dominion-provincial conferences where Canadians representing the federal authority on the one hand and the provinces on the other might be expected to sit down and discuss problems of mutual concern—he says there is not to be any place in his time or in his patience for conferences of that kind. Where on earth, Mr. Speaker, is the consistency in the Prime Minister who complains that he was brought back from an international conference to attend a dominion-provincial conference?

I am very proud that my leader has continued to call, as he has, without abatement from the time the government sabotaged the last dominion-provincial conference in May 1946, for the resumption of the general dominion-provincial conferences. The people who are responsible for the fact there has been no resumption of the conferences are the people who are occupying those treasury benches. Their days are numbered, however, and it is a happy thing for Canada that is so.

I turn, not to another subject, but to another phase of the government's attitude towards the constitution of this country. In his remarks last Friday and Monday the Prime Minister exhibited tender spots. I was particularly interested in what he had to say on Monday concerning an incident which transpired in this house on the 18th of June, 1946, when, as Minister of Justice, he was spokesman for the government in the debate on an address which sought an amendment to the British North America Act from the parliament at Westminster concerning the redistribution of representation in this chamber.

The Prime Minister revealed a tender spot and went on to complain very bitterly about the attention paid to his words on that occasion. What were those words? What was the mentality those words revealed? What was the attitude towards the constitution of this country and towards the language rights enshrined in section 133 of the British North America Act which was discussed at that time? I found it most significant, Mr. Speaker, that on Monday the Prime Minister was very selective in his quotation from what he said on June 18, 1946. Of course, he quoted the passages in which he quoted from an exchange of remarks between King Agrippa and Festus and Paul, and some of the passages which followed on page 2621 of Hansard, 1946.

For some reason or other, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister failed, however, to quote the words which immediately preceded the words he quoted at some length and which are the nub and kernel of everything he said on that occasion and which give full justification to what has since been said in this chamber and in all parts of Canada, particularly the province of Quebec, concerning his speech. These words which the Prime Minister failed to quote, Mr. Speaker, are found on the same page of the 1946 Hansard as that to which I have referred. At that point he was dealing expressly with section 133 of the British North America Act and with a question which had been asked of him by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) as to whether, in his opinion, parliament was free to seek an amendment of the constitution as long as the subject did not fall within section 92 of the British North America Act. He answered as follows:

Can that—

—meaning section 133 of the British North America Act—

—be dealt with without the consent of the provincial legislatures?

That is the question and this is the Prime Minister's answer, given as Minister of Justice.

Legally I say it can.

Mr. Speaker, that is the remark which has been discussed.

Mr. Martin: Why does the hon. gentleman not read the whole statement instead of one excerpt?

Mr. Fleming: If the hon. minister had been in the house or had read Hansard, he would know the Prime Minister read at very great length from what he said on June 18, 1946. I repeat, for the benefit of the minister, that the Prime Minister omitted to read that most significant statement in the passage he read. I do not think that omission was accidental. That is the contention which fell from the lips of the right hon. gentleman on that occasion which has given rise to so much disturbance in certain parts of this country and which ought to be a matter of genuine concern to all parts.

Mr. Cruickshank: In all parts; what parts?

Mr. Fleming: In the parts with which the hon. gentleman apparently is not acquainted, but should be.

The Prime Minister has said the province of Quebec likes its facts straight. I wonder if the Prime Minister did not get the facts straight from the people of Quebec last July when the results of the provincial general election were announced. Strangely enough, although this subject has been discussed on many occasions, to the Prime Minister's certain knowledge, it has taken him nearly three years to rise in his place in this house and attempt to put an interpretation on remarks that he made on June 18, 1946. Let there be no mistake about that.

Mr. Martin: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, my time is limited, and I will not ask for any extension. If the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will wait until I finish, I shall be glad to answer his question.

Mr. Martin: The hon. gentleman has said—

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I wish to continue.

Mr. Martin: I should like to ask—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming: Whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare likes it or not, I say that remark from the Prime Minister was a perfectly deliberate and studied remark. It was, however, in accord with the contention the Prime Minister, then Minister of Justice, was making not only then but in the previous days of debate on that same subject.

Mr. Martin: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has just now made an insinuation that the Prime Minister deliberately tried to deceive this House of Commons.

Mr. Fleming: I did not.

An hon. Member: What is the point of order?

Mr. Martin: That is the point of order. I say that is unparliamentary language, and that the hon. gentleman should withdraw it at once.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has stated that he did not make the statement that the Prime Minister had deliberately tried to deceive this house.

Mr. Fleming: I did not say that. I did not use the word "deceive". What I said was that the Prime Minister's statement was a perfectly deliberate statement; that is, that the statement he made, which I have just quoted, was a deliberate statement. He was not caught off guard.

Mr. Martin: I rise to a point of order. I am subject to the judgment of the house, but if the hon. gentleman now says that he did not seek to convey the impression, by the words he used, that the Prime Minister had deliberately deceived this house, or if he now withdraws that insinuation, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw nothing, because I did not make that remark. I wish the Minister of National Health and Welfare would pay attention to what is being said instead of concentrating on making interruptions and trying to delay me. What I said was that the statement of the Prime Minister was a perfectly deliberate statement. He was not caught off guard. What he said was completely in keeping with the argument he was making in the house that day and in the previous days of that same session. It was a deliberate statement. The consequences of that statement of the Prime Minister, which was a deliberate statement, have been incalculably mischievous and harmful to the whole of Canadian unity, and those remarks have given rise to a distrust and disturbance of feeling for which he is entirely responsible.

He did not do that without due warning on that occasion, because he had ample warning from those who followed him.

Mr. Cruickshank: Tell us about the iniquitous family allowances.

Mr. Fleming: I wish to refer to some of the things which were said then. I had the honour to follow the Prime Minister in that debate—

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member speaks every day.

Mr. Fleming: I pointed out the danger in remarks of that kind. Here is what I had to say at that time, and I am quoting from the daily edition of Hansard because a translation was given in the bound edition. It is to be found at page 2701 of the daily edition of Hansard of 1946.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member spoke in French that day.

Mr. Fleming: Yes. And whether the hon. member likes it or not, I propose to read my remarks made in French on that occasion.

Mr. Cruickshank: What about the convention?

Mr. Fleming: I will say to the hon. member that I am happy about the results of the national convention of the Progressive Conservative party and I am happy in the selection of leader made by the convention.

Mr. Cruickshank: There will be another chance next year.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming:

(Translation):

Now the Minister of Justice says that there is no need to consult the provinces on redistribution. He contends that as long as an amendment of the constitution does not involve matters allocated in the British North America Act to the provincial jurisdiction, such as property and civil rights under section 92 of the act, the provinces have no right to be consulted by parliament.

(Text):

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member seems to be getting some amusement out of this.

Mr. Cruickshank: Any time the hon. member talks nonsense, I get amusement.

Mr. Fleming: This is what I said:

(Translation):

This is a dangerous doctrine. Its full significance should be clearly understood. If parliament can bring about an amendment of section 51 of the constitution without consulting the provinces, it can also bring about without consulting the provinces amendments of other sections of the British North America Act. How long will the rights of minorities which are now guaranteed by the constitution be safe if this doctrine, expounded by the Minister of Justice, prevails? It would mean that parliament could, if it wished, bring about an amendment of section 133 of the British North America Act, and thereby eliminate the use of the French language in parliament—all without consulting the provinces. Let us then be on our guard against creating so dangerous a precedent. The proposed increase in the number of members of parliament would be gained at too high a cost if it is to be acquired on that basis.

The British North America Act is not an ordinary statute to be amended at the whim of parliament. It is our national constitution; it contains the pact entered into by the old provinces at the time of confederation, binding the dominion and each province; and it is the great charter of the rights of minorities, particularly of those of the French tongue and culture. Let no bold hand be lightly laid on this constitution to overturn its provisions without consultation with the provinces.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear! Hear!

(Text):

Mr. Fleming: I say with respect, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister did not see fit either on that occasion or since to listen to such words of warning as were offered in good part by members of this house who appreciated the gravity of the remarks he was making. When a government has had power too long, and has had too much power, it ceases to be attentive to things that are said in the house by the representatives of the people and seeks shortcuts through the constitution to achieve the goal it has in mind; and shortcuts towards objectives, that are attained by driving through the constitution, are undesirable in a country like Canada. If the Prime Minister has cause for complaint in the fact that his words, which I have quoted, have become issues in many parts of Canada, the responsibility rests on his shoulders and on no others. And when he reminds us that the motto of the province of Quebec is "Je me souviens", meaning "I remember", I wonder if the province of Quebec did not nobly live up to its motto with regard to this subject and others at its last provincial election in July. For his personal motto I think the Prime Minister should choose "Je voudrais oublier", meaning "I should like to forget".

In the time that remains at my disposal I wish to say a word on the subject of radio broadcasting. In the speech from the throne we heard the announcement of the government's intention to appoint a royal commission. If the government intends to do that, it does not need to say so in the speech from the throne. It does not need to make it a matter of announcement in parliament. It may be interesting; but of course the government has that power of appointing royal commissions.

Here is a government that, on the eve of an election, is undertaking to say that it will appoint a royal commission to deal with some subjects that are greatly agitating the minds—and rightly so—of the people of Canada at the present time. There is in Canada a great deal of dissatisfaction about the whole method of the administration of radio broadcasting, the whole method of control and, above all, with the high-handed attitude of the government and of the C.B.C. with respect to the subject of television.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) revealed that he needs some further briefing on the facts when he undertook to give to the house, as it appears at page 82 of Hansard, apparently what was the substance of a communication addressed to him by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). The Prime Minister said:

> I have a note here that there was an attempt to set it up,—

That is, the House of Commons committee on radio broadcasting at the 1948 session—> —but that the minister in charge found there was no one who wanted it.

Mr. Speaker, if the government had made a full announcement last session of what it intended to do, or intended to permit the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to do in spending money the government put at its disposal, you may be sure there would have been a demand for the setting up of that committee. As a matter of fact the 1947 committee included in its report a recommendation that the committee should be made a standing committee of the house.

On this subject I would say this to the Prime Minister—and first of all on the subject of television—that he is not going to escape responsibility by the setting up of a royal commission. It may be a convenient device to try to sidetrack debate and discussion by saying, "Oh well, that particular subject is under review by a royal commission. We do not wish to prejudice their review of the question, and we are asking the commission to deal with it." The government must not be permitted to dodge its responsibilities that way.

This subject of television has been discussed in committees and by the press, and the attitude of the government and the C.B.C. has been exposed before committees. It was exposed before the House of Commons committee in 1947. On that occasion the Minister of National Revenue undertook to inform the committee of the stand taken by the government on this question, and to justify it.

What he said in effect was, "We do not think it is a good thing for Canadians, while this field of television is in its infancy, to permit Canadians to go ahead and risk their money in the development of it. We and the C.B.C. are not going to do anything; we will sit by and see what happens in the United States."

That was the sum and substance of the attitude of the government as portrayed to the committee by the Minister of National Revenue. Mr. Speaker, I characterized it then, I characterized it last year and I characterize it today as a dog-in-the-manger attitude, born out of the infernal paternalism which characterizes this government's attitude at all times.

What does it amount to? They will not let private stations do anything; they will not let Canadians who are quite prepared to risk their money in developing this field go ahead and do so. They will not permit them, because they say it is not a good thing that they be permitted to risk their money. They will not do it themselves. They have been marking time, and have not done anything.

The result is that Canada, which ought to be a leader in this scientific field, is far behind. We are away behind the United States; we are behind Great Britain, too, in the field of television. Apparently this government is content to sit back and watch the rest of the world go by. It is content to let the rest of the world get ahead of us while it sits with folded hands, and keeps its hands folded—and also keeps the hands folded of those who would develop the field, if the government gave them the opportunity.

The other striking point in the remarks of the Prime Minister in connection with radio broadcasting has to do with what he declared to be his open mind on the subject whether the C.B.C. should be permitted to continue to have power to regulate all radio broadcasting in Canada by private stations, or whether that function should be assigned to a public body separate and distinct from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is an operating body.

Mr. Speaker, that is a strange profession from the Prime Minister, who has been a leading member of this administration for the last seven years. It has been the policy of this administration throughout that time to refuse to deprive the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of any of its power to control all broadcasting in Canada carried on by other stations.

His colleague and deskmate (Mr. Howe) has taken the position in the house, time after time—and apparently the Prime Minister did not pay any attention to it; perhaps we should not have either—that this power should not be taken from the C.B.C. But today, if you please, the Prime Minister, as a reason for appointing a royal commission on the subject, and seeking to get the government out of its responsibility, says, "I have an open mind on the subject."

Well, he was a member of the administration for the last seven or eight years which has had a closed mind on the subject. If the Prime Minister's mind is open, then let us congratulate him and let us also hope that the opening of minds will also be communicated to other members of his administration.

I see I have only three or four mintes of my time left, so I shall devote it to the subject of housing. Again, housing is the neglected child on the doorstep of the government, despite all the promises on which the government was elected in connection with housing, and all the glorious things it has been telling the Canadian people for the last several years. Despite all this the housing situation today is as bad as ever it was.

May I remind the house what the ever-optimistic minister, the then minister of reconstruction and supply, and now Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said in the house on July 22, 1946, as reported at page 3672 of Hansard:

> As at March, 1946, our minimum immediate housing needs were estimated at 150,000 housing units.

Then he went on to describe that as the emergent requirement. I asked him about it a year or two later, but he had forgotten all about it—which proves conclusively that he was reading somebody else's speech on that occasion. Then, in the city of Toronto only last week, the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, Mr. Mansur, in a speech to the Canadian construction association, had this to say:

> The number of household groups including not only families but also individuals who maintain households, exceeds the number of front doors by approximately 350,000.

Then he goes on to say, in terms of emergency—

> It would be my guess that the immediate need is of the order of 150,000 units.

That shows, Mr. Speaker, that the housing shortage is just as bad today as it was three years ago. That indicates the measure of the government's progress in the field of housing —after all their promises, after all the nonsense they have told us in this House of Commons about the progress they were making in housing. The fact of the matter is that the housing crisis in Canada today is as bad as it was three years ago. Their progress has been exactly nil.

In conclusion may I say we are dealing with a motion by my leader expressing want of confidence in this government. We see a government that has attempted to rip up the Canadian constitution, which has neglected defence, and admits now the critical danger which this country faces because of its neglecting defence; which has made inroads upon the freedoms and responsibilities of parliament; which has imposed a crushing burden of taxation; which has been practising extravagance on a profligate scale, as evidenced in the report made to the house the day before yesterday showing that one Toronto lawyer in the last two years has been paid $172,000 in fees.

I say to you that this government does not possess the confidence of the country, and that the government does not deserve the confidence of this House of Commons.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, one of the terms which has come up regularly in this debate has been a reference to national unity, and I should like to make that the theme of my remarks this afternoon.

There is no doubt in my mind that all members of parliament, regardless of their political complexions, are interested in and desirous that there shall be national unity in this country. I believe we are fortunate in that we have one of the most wonderful countries in the world. We are the inheritors of a great tradition and of great natural resources. National disunity could be a most serious instrument in destroying much that has been done. However, I say with all sincerity that I am very doubtful if the speeches thus far made on the question of dominion-provincial relations, the subject which has occupied the time of most speakers from the government and official opposition groups, have helped in any way to create national unity in this country.

The speeches I have heard thus far consisted of accusations, counter-accusations, acrimony, recrimination and explanation. There was a political high wind blowing. Somehow through all these verbal acrobatics the speakers have managed to keep their eyes cocked toward the province of Quebec.

I am sure that if we desire national unity in this country it can be achieved, but it can be achieved only by this parliament setting its eyes resolutely to the future and being prepared to forget much of what has taken place and by striving to prepare and carve out a program of economic and social security. In addition, and perhaps even of more importance, there should be the greatest possible equality of opportunity in the future for all the people of Canada rather than privileges for the few. If we will do that, I think much more will be achieved in the way of national unity than by all this wrangling which has so far taken place.

The speaker who preceded me referred to the welter of confusion in connection with dominion-provincial relations. I would be happy if I could stand up and say that his speech had cleared up that confusion. However, much as I would like to pay him that compliment, I am not able to do so because his words have only added to the welter of confusion so far as I have been able to understand them. He merely went over the ground that has been gone over so often. I sincerely hope that for the time being, at least until the smoke screen clears away, this house will drop that subject and get on with its real business.

If we are to find national unity the real business before the house is to see that this parliament—this may be the last session of the present parliament and therefore there is a greater sense of urgency than ever—should do for the people of Canada those things which they expect will be done. What are some of those things?

First, ever since the election of 1945 the people of Canada have been led to believe that the government had plans for an overall social security system. It has been called by various names, but what it boils down to is that the government, along with other parties in and outside of the house, promised the people that they would amend the Old Age Pensions Act in a way to provide that the means test would be abolished and the age limit lowered to 65 years—in some cases it was promised that it would be lowered to 60 years, but we will be happy if it is brought down to 65 years as the first instalment—and the amount of pension raised in order to bring it into line with present costs of living, which would require approximately $50 per month.

We in this group have urged that in the form of resolutions and motions ever since this parliament commenced. We have not been successful in obtaining a majority vote on that subject. We invite other parties in the house to join our pleas to the government that they do not let this opportunity go by without bringing into being these things that I have mentioned and which were promised, in good faith I believe, and accepted in good faith at election time.

We also need legislation to provide similar assistance to all persons who are crippled or disabled in some way. The other evening the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) made an excellent plea, with which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) agreed, on behalf of persons suffering from arthritis and similar disabilities. We know from personal experience that in every community in Canada there are people who are not old enough to qualify for an old age pension, people in their forties and fifties, who are hopelessly disabled from some form of rheumatism or other disease and who must depend in most cases solely on municipal aid.

There is no legislation to provide this aid so far as the dominion is concerned. In most provinces there is no provincial legislation to provide this assistance for crippled persons, and I know this is so with regard to Manitoba with the exception of those who live in unorganized territories. In all other cases they are a drain upon the municipality.

Those who are close to municipal affairs know that municipalities, particularly rural municipalities, are having their hands full trying to provide education, build roads, repair bridges and so on and simply cannot provide the assistance required by these unfortunate victims of disease. Therefore we need legislation at the federal level to provide for disabled persons of this country on the same basis as we provide for old age pensioners. That is something that is urgent and could be done at this session of parliament. There is no reason why it could not be done.

We hear a lot about the huge surpluses that are being built up—later on I shall refer to one reason for that—and there certainly is no argument that we cannot get to work and pass the necessary legislation in order to show that we made those promises in good faith and are prepared to carry them out.

The speech from the throne makes a reference to the extension of the scope of the Family Allowances Act. We have no way of knowing just what that will mean when it gets to the stage of legislation. However, I hope that it will include at least two extensions.

The first should be in connection with students who are over the prescribed age for family allowances and who are still attending school. In many cases parents are trying to give children higher education but at a considerable sacrifice to their own standard of living. The payment of family allowances would be of great assistance to those people who are sincerely trying to educate their children.

Another way in which they should be extended is in connection with immigrants arriving in the country. At the present time the act does not permit the payment of allowances to the children of immigrants until they have been here three years. I made a plea on that point last June and if I remember correctly the minister said that consideration would be given to it. I do not know whether he has that in mind but it seems to me that if we look at the thing from a logical standpoint we will realize that these immigrants, regardless of whence they come, have not great resources. They are coming here to try to make a living out of the great wealth of our natural resources. They are prepared to work hard but during the first three years of their life in Canada they require the assistance that could be given in the way of family allowances much more so than ten or fifteen years hence. It would seem the better part of wisdom to extend the act to cover the children of these people.

We need a national health insurance program, but I shall not go into details about that as my leader has placed our proposals before the house.

There is another matter which while not strictly a social security item certainly is required. I refer to aid for education. I am glad the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), who always makes an excellent speech, referred to that today. I shall not undertake to discuss it in detail as I have a resolution on the order paper already and it would be out of order for me to discuss it ahead of time.

Suffice to say that within the last few months the people of Canada from coast to coast, especially such organized bodies as school teachers and educational societies, have expressed the opinion that it is necessary for the federal government to come to the assistance of the provinces which are trying to bring about an improved standard of education but which find themselves in financial difficulties.

Only recently we heard of the teachers' strike in Montreal and newspaper reports indicate that possibly a further dispute may arise. It is going to become more and more difficult for some of the provinces to finance their educational program unless this government is prepared to give some grants in aid to help them over the rough spots.

Perhaps the most important problem that faces Canada today, particularly western Canada, is the need for the stabilization of the agricultural industry and I say "stabilization" advisedly. During the past few years the government of Canada has been making agreements with other countries for the sale of agricultural products and has given assurance to the farmers of Canada that they will not be penalized by the fact that their products are being sold at controlled prices.

I am sure that the government will realize that the farmers of western Canada, the grain growers particularly, have been very patient and co-operative. They accepted the plan of the government to sell grain to Great Britain and other countries under agreement on the understanding that the government would do everything possible to keep the cost of production at its then level. These agreements were entered into and we know what has happened. Figures have been placed on Hansard in the last few days and I do not need to repeat them. However, I will say that the cost of production certainly has not remained stationary.

I should like to quote from the Rural Co-Operator, which is published in this province. They are giving their point of view on this question. They issue a warning, and it is a serious warning, and I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will be the first one to admit it.

In discussing the increased cost of production, Mr. Hannam had this to say:

> But a double-barreled trend of farm prices going down and costs remaining high or going higher will soon undermine farm prosperity. The danger is it could and might develop into a period of general business recession. Because of this danger, maintenance of agriculture in a healthy economic position is vital to the national welfare.

Those are words of wisdom.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend has said he is sure I would be the first to agree. I should like to point out that statement is a prophecy of what may happen in the future. Would my friend not agree that up to the present time farmers are getting the highest return for their products they have ever had?

Mr. Zaplitny: I am glad the minister made that interjection, because I started out with what I had to say by saying that it is the duty of this parliament to look into the future, and to make provision for certain things that may happen.

Mr. Gardiner: We have done very well up to the present.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am not going to detract from the minister's self-congratulation. Perhaps he feels justified in patting himself on the back.

Mr. Gardiner: Even that statement says that.

Mr. Zaplitny: I think perhaps the best thing I can do, Mr. Speaker, is to continue to quote. Perhaps the minister will take a somewhat different view of it as I go on. The same article continues:

> During the war farmers toiled long hours, increased their production, and sold their product far below cost. At the same time the dominion government paid industry's "cost plus." It promised farmers, as postwar compensation, floor prices which would give them more than the market price.

That has not yet happened.

> What have they had? A ceiling price on butter, a ban on exports to the United States, which still remains on dairy products, and margarine. At the same time industry has been making unprecedented profits. The dominion government has been allowing industry special taxation privileges such as double depreciation, for instance, charging up the cost of new capital equipment over a period of five years as a deduction from income tax.

Mr. Gardiner: The only criticism I would make up to that point is that the interjection made by the hon. member is not in the statement itself. I refer to his words, "that has not yet happened". As a matter of fact, prices to the farmer on many of these farm commodities are higher now in Canada than they could receive in the United States.

Mr. Zaplitny: The chief commodity, in the west at least, is wheat. The price of wheat is certainly not over the world price at the present time.

Mr. Gardiner: It is over the price being discussed in the international committee.

Mr. Zaplitny: Let me proceed.

At the same time the government has joined in the hue and cry, as much industry inspired and financed as the margarine campaign, about farmers not paying income tax. The dominion government has persecuted farmers, has demanded income tax returns from thousands of farmers who were not taxable, and has collected tax from others who would not be taxable if they could afford to employ accountants to keep their records and make their returns for them.

Further, the article has this to say, and perhaps this is the most significant part of it:

Why are farmers being pushed around or just ignored by their governments?

It is "governments" because it refers also to the Ontario government. It goes on:

Mr. Howe gives one of the answers. He says that in 1919 agriculture was Canada's most important industry, contributing 44 per cent of the total net value of commodity production against 33 per cent contributed by manufacturing. By 1945 agriculture was contributing 21 per cent, and manufacturing 52 per cent. Presumably, with Mr. Howe's encouragement, there has been a substantial change since then in the same direction.

May I pause there to point out that these are dollar values, and of course they do not reflect actual physical production.

First, then, farmers are producing a smaller proportion of the total dollar production volume, and farm people are a smaller proportion of the total population. Second, farmers handle only their own money, while business handles the money of producers, consumers, shareholders, and uses it to publish and propagandize the ideas and public policies of which it approves, and to finance and control political parties.

Those are strong words. A little later I will refer to the article again in another connection. I think that sets out the attitude of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Perhaps by now the minister has less reason to congratulate himself than he had when I was reading the first part of the article.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, no; I still say that the first part is all prophecy.

Mr. Zaplitny: I was not hoping to get the minister to agree with me. Then we move on from there. The gist of that whole article, and what I have said so far, is simply that, while admitting, for purposes of common ground with the minister, that agriculture is now receiving as high or higher prices—I have not the statistics before me—for its products, compared with other years, there is a trend going on now which is causing concern to the farmers of Canada. The prices of many of their products are still under control. Even if they were not we know from experience, and from a cursory study of what is going on in the world today, that the prospect for farm prices, as far as our exports are concerned, is not in an upward direction. I think the minister will agree with that because he stated that himself not very long ago. The prospect is that farmers will have to accept lower prices for their products in the future than they have in the immediate past. That being so, it makes it doubly important that the cost of production for farmers shall not rise. As a matter of fact, it has risen too much already in relation to what the farmer receives. That puts the onus on the government if they are going to undertake to ask farmers to accept controlled prices for their produce because of the condition of the export market. Farmers can understand that very easily. Farm organizations have been very reasonable and co-operative in that regard. They have understood that because European countries and Great Britain cannot pay higher prices they will have to accept the prices they can pay. There is, however, the other half of the bargain which is equally important. The government should then undertake to see to it that the farmer can buy, at reasonable prices, the products he needs in order to remain in farming, such as his farm machinery, fuel, hardware, and all the other things that are necessary for farming.

The government had the whole stabilization program in its hands in 1945. Since then it has destroyed half of it. It has destroyed that part which has to do with the cost of production of the farmer, by yanking off the controls on manufactured products, over the protests of organized farmers, organized workers and most of the professional people of this country. They listened to the advice of a small privileged group who saw an opportunity to reap a harvest when the controls were taken off; and by doing so they have placed the farmer between two grindstones, with the prospect of farm prices going down and the cost of production on its way up. If that process continues it will not be long until the farmers find themselves in a very tough position.

The government is now responsible for seeing to it that the cost of producing farm products does not go any higher; and as a matter of fact in my opinion it is already too high. It is for the government to state in this house very soon what they intend to do. Future agreements for the sale of farm products are still up in the air and the cost of living and the cost of production are still rising. The farmers of this country want to know where the government stand, whether they are going to take off all the controls and trust to free enterprise and the speculative market to see that the farmers get the going price. Already the farmers have expressed an opinion on that. They do not agree with that type of marketing, because speculative marketing has not given the farmer a fair return for his products. Or are they going to reimpose some controls on manufactured products and give the farmers a square deal?

While I am on the subject of controls I may as well say that there are those who argue, very seriously and sincerely, that since the war emergency is over we should get rid of all controls and return to a system of free enterprise. That is a very comforting, very neat little package of philosophy. The only trouble is that it does not work, because we have never successfully operated a free enterprise system in this country. Ever since the beginning there have been interests ready to run to the government for protection just as soon as they considered their industry needed it. I see the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) smiling, and I can almost hear what he is thinking. But before he even says anything to me let me tell him that the industries in his province were the first to deny the free enterprise system in Canada. They were the first to benefit from our tariff system, and some of them are still benefiting from it. That might have been the proper thing to do at the time, to subsidize and assist the manufacturing industries of Canada in order to develop greater production; but these same people, like the Canadian manufacturers' association, for example, and the Canadian chamber of commerce, who today go out and rave against the subsidy system and in favour of free enterprise, who are against controls, have a very short memory. They were the main beneficiaries of government intervention when it was in their interest for the government to intervene. Now that they have obtained what they want they say, "Throw it wide open. We want free enterprise from now on." That is a very comfortable position if you are in the driver's seat, but there are many people in this country who are very serious about this matter and who know we shall never move out of the field of subsidies. If we did we would have to revise our whole economic system in a backward direction, and it cannot be done. If we moved out of the subsidy field in its full sense we would have no social security schemes in this country, because that is a means whereby the wealthier subsidize the poor. We would have no government assistance of any kind to industry; and some of those who today are crying about controls would be the first to weep bitter tears and ask the government to intervene in their behalf. So let us not kid ourselves about free enterprise; we do not have it in the full sense of the word, and we will not have it. What we will have is a combination of free enterprise and public enterprise, and it is up to the government to provide the balance wheel of public enterprise in order to keep prices at reasonable levels. I am not saying the government must do it all, because the co-operative movement in this country has been doing a great job in keeping prices at reasonable levels.

Mr. Gardiner: Ever since the Liberals first encouraged it.

Mr. Zaplitny: I remember that the Liberals encouraged it a couple of years ago by slapping on an income tax. If it had not been for the fight this group put up in the house for a period of about ten days the co-operatives would have been taxed out of existence; and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was the first to admit it.

But let us not get sidetracked on that subject; let me follow through with what I was saying. The co-operative movement, if carried into government and public affairs, would be one method of keeping prices reasonable, because there is no profit motive in a co-operative association. It is production for use and service at cost. When you take out the profit motive there is no reason to jack up prices and profiteer, because people would not be so foolish as to charge themselves more than is necessary for their services. Co-operatives have an equalizing tendency in keeping prices at reasonable levels. But co-operatives are limited in what they can do. They are limited in the amount of money they can raise; and some of the things that need to be done in this country must be done on a large scale. Only the federal government have the finances with which to do them, and only the federal government are in a position to do them. In the meantime, until they accept the philosophy of public enterprise as one of the chief factors in our economic life, we must have price control or we are going to have profiteering.

But let me move on. We also need increased income tax exemptions for many of the low-income groups in this country. Here I want to quote from a leaflet entitled "Labour Research" containing figures which come from the statistics branch of the Department of National Revenue. These figures are for 1946, and I am told more recent figures are not available because the income tax department is about two years behind in supplying these statistics. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) shakes his head. If he can produce the figures for 1948 I shall be very glad to see them. According to these figures the breakdown of incomes in this country for 1946 showed that those receiving up to $1,000 a year totalled 13·7 per cent, while those receiving from $1,000 to $2,000 a year comprised 52·8 per cent of our population. The figures show that 89·3 per cent of the people of Canada earning incomes received less than $3,000 a year. If you take the two lower groups and add 52·8 per cent to 13·7 per cent you get 66·5 per cent; and you can appreciate the position of 66·5 per cent of the people of Canada who are receiving less than $2,000 a year and still have to pay income tax.

If I were to carry on a bit further I might point out that the trend in regard to savings over the last three years is very serious. The speech from the throne makes reference to this wave of prosperity which is supposed to be bubbling around us.

We may have been at the crest, but it appears from the report on savings that the crest has passed and we are on the way down. Soon, we may be in the trough. In 1944, the percentage of income that went into savings was 21·6 per cent; that is, it was possible to save roughly one-fifth of your income, taken on an average across Canada. By 1947, that percentage of income which could be saved fell to 6·4 per cent. This is a serious drop in the space of three years. If that trend continues, by 1950 and 1951, that portion of income which the ordinary people of Canada can save will have disappeared entirely owing to the high prices.

Mr. McCann: The government was doing the saving for them in 1944.

Mr. Zaplitny: You are no doubt referring to compulsory savings. Whether they were compulsory or voluntary, they were savings at the disposal of the people of Canada. The portion of income people have been able to save has slipped from 21·6 per cent in 1944 to 6·4 per cent in 1947. You cannot refute that argument.

I wish to refer to a few more items in connection with agriculture. The speech from the throne makes mention of an amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I have no way of knowing just what is contemplated, but I do hope it will include the type of amendment we have urged from here on several occasions in the past, to the effect that the unit be made smaller than a township for the purpose of qualifying for assistance. In Manitoba, particularly the northern part of that province, where we suffer more from hail and flood than we do from drought, such an amendment would be of importance to many farmers in acquiring assistance to which they are morally entitled but which, because of the technicality involved in putting it on a township basis, is denied them. I have taken this matter up on so many occasions, I shall not take the time to go into details. The Minister of Agriculture knows very well what I mean. He has been in the area and has seen for himself the grave injustices which arise from the present system of administering the act. It must be made possible to administer it on a smaller unit basis so that the farmers who actually need assistance will be the ones to receive it.

At the present time we have the anomaly of farmers who have a good crop receiving assistance on top of that, whereas the farmers who are completely wiped out by flood or hail get nothing. Surely, that is an administrative problem which should be solved before this session is completed.

There is also need for the extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. As a matter of fact some members, including the member for Souris (Mr. Ross), have argued the act should be made applicable to all farmers from coast to coast. I am going to make this plea to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), that the designated area be extended to include the three prairie provinces. As it is now, it covers only a section of the three prairie provinces, usually referred to as the Palliser triangle. There are other parts of these provinces which need the services of the rehabilitation provisions just as seriously. There is a need for flood prevention and water conservation, which makes it necessary to extend the operative provisions of that act to take in the total area of the three prairie provinces. I am sure the minister will give that suggestion serious consideration, knowing the problem as he does, around the area of Dauphin particularly, about which I am speaking at the present time.

Another thing which would bring about greater national unity would be an equalization of the burden of freight rates across this country. It is not necessary for me to go into detail on this subject because we talked freight rates at the last session until we dreamed about them. Nothing has been done as yet to solve the problem. The railway companies have received one increase of 21 per cent and have made application for another increase of 20 per cent.

May I say at this point that I am pleased to see the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) take his seat. As premier of the province of Manitoba, he was one of those who went all over that province making a lot of fine speeches about their opposition to the increased freight rates. Fate has so arranged it that the hon. member is today the Minister of Justice. I say it is his duty now to see that justice is done on the freight rates question. When this matter comes before the house, it will be interesting to see what stand the Minister of Justice will take, since he is now a member of the government. I wonder if he will be as bold in his statements, as sweeping in his denunciations of the actions of the government, as he was in Manitoba. I hope he will not retreat from his position, since it might cause some of us to say some very nasty things about him.

For the remainder of my time, I should like to turn to another subject which is of great importance in connection with national unity, and that is electoral reform. Recently a bill was placed before the house by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). I am not going to discuss that bill, Mr. Speaker, but merely refer to it. In his opinion this bill would have the effect of reforming some of the practices that are being carried on during elections. At the outset, without discussing the bill at all, I should like to say I am not convinced we can legislate any political party into honesty. I am not that much of an optimist. The bill may have, however, some effect in bringing out discussion in this house. It is a serious matter that such practices do take place.

I refer now to an article which the hon. member for Quebec South, a former Minister of National Defence in this government, wrote and which appeared in Maclean's magazine. I will have time to quote only a few excerpts from this article concerning the practices which have been carried on by his own party. I wish to congratulate the hon. member on his frankness. I believe he has done the people of Canada a public service. The article reads as follows:

> There was a time, of course, when votes were literally bought for money in the market place. I well remember an incident, more than forty years ago, when the Liberal buyers set up shop on one side of an actual market and their Tory competitors for votes on the other, while the vendors, the voters, moved from one side to the other, offering their franchises to the highest bidder. It was a tight election and toward the end of the day single votes were going for as high as $75 and $80 and one transaction was even recorded for an even $100. When the exchange, or rather the polling places, closed the winner's majority was two votes.

If the other party had had $300 more, they might have won the election.

Then the writer goes on to say that such things are not done any more. This was forty years ago, and we have now become smoother operators. Today there are surreptitious deliveries of coal, large orders of groceries, or even electric washing machines made at the right moment. Surely, the people of Canada do not approve such tactics.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): If you continue reading that article, you will see the writer says the people who owned the washing machines came and took them away again.

Mr. Zaplitny: That is right. I was only trying to save time. Bills were sent for those washing machines and they had to be returned. The people of Canada will, no doubt, be astonished to find out that is still going on in this country of ours. Surely we should set higher standards of behaviour when we appeal to the people of Canada.

The people are asking these two simple questions.

First, why does the Liberal party, as revealed by one of its own members, find it necessary to offer cash, groceries or washing machines for votes, if their policy is correct? And second, where are they getting the money from?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I count it a great privilege to have another opportunity to represent the constituency of Fort William. The people there are intelligent, sensible, honest and progressive, and I still consider it a great honour to represent them.

My first words are those of congratulation of the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I know the mover somewhat intimately, because he is my roommate. He is a faithful, hard worker; there is not a lazy bone in his body, and the government would do well to consider him for advancement. He is not in his seat, so I am free to say this.

Then, there are two other men, neither of whom is in the house tonight—and one of whom will not be here. There are no other two men who stand higher in my respect because of their unselfish service. The first of these is the former member for Carleton; for any man who resigns his seat to let another man come in to take his place is rendering an unselfish service. Indeed, had he not done that, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) might not have been in his seat at the present time.

The other man to whom I pay tribute is an old friend, the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken). He, too, did an unselfish thing by stepping down to allow another man to take his place. The House of Commons would be much poorer if he were not here, and I pay tribute to him.

My next words will have reference to the speech from the throne, which contains many good things, as I am sure you will agree, Mr. Speaker, after I have finished. The speech is full of hope, and contains suggestions concerning actions which I hope will come to pass. These are not empty promises.

I would congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) upon trying to pay off a little of our national debt. Some hon. members well know that there are people who will borrow money on Friday, tell you they will pay it back on Monday, but who do not "come across." Any minister representing an honest government, as we believe we have, has a right to see that the debts are paid.

The speech contains much hope in that its first suggestion concerns tax reduction. The first measure of reduction will come about because of the slice which will be taken off the national debt; for that reason some taxes will not need to be paid.

Then, there is the further promise in the speech from the throne that the sales tax will be reduced, which in my opinion is a proper procedure. The common people are hit hardest by the sales tax, and when it is reduced the cost of living must come down. In that connection let me say there is one extra sales tax, over and above the regular business sales tax, which should be wiped out completely; I refer to the 25 per cent tax applied to the business of jewelers. That should be wiped out, and I fully expect it will be.

Then, further, the tax on soft drinks and chocolate should be reduced. However, we shall have another opportunity to speak on that point because a Liberal member has had the foresight to introduce the subject by way of a resolution now appearing on the order paper.

Another hope held out in the speech from the throne is that of the construction of great waterways. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has given us much encouragement in this connection, and I believe President Truman is a man of his word. It would seem now that the great waterways project would reach fruition before any great time has elapsed. We at the head of the lakes believe this to be an absolute necessity. We know it will help employment, that it would furnish much-needed power and that it would be of great advantage to transportation. I would like to be able to step onto a freight boat at Fort William and go across to Londonderry. I would enjoy riding even on a freight boat for that distance because of what I would see when I got there.

This construction of a great waterways project would mean much in the development of power. I need scarcely tell the House of Commons that we at the head of the lakes are in a comfortable position, so far as our supply of power is concerned. When people in this section of Canada could not get the power, we were revelling in it, and did not need to turn off our lights, if we did not want to. And if there is anyone here who is thinking of opening up a new industry, then let me tell him that because of our supply of power, water and good fresh air, the finest place in Canada would be Fort William or Port Arthur.

Mr. Brooks: And lots of wind, too.

Mr. McIvor: Another hope in the speech from the throne is for the building of the trans-Canada highway. We at the head of the lakes think this should come through, and have held the view for a good while. However, if you keep pecking away at a thing long enough, if it is right you will get there eventually. We believe that the trans-Canada highway will soon be a reality, and we thank the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. MacKinnon) for his big-hearted co-operation. This highway would be of great advantage to people in the east, so that they could come up yonder to lake Nipigon, up through Port Arthur and Fort William, up to Hillcrest on the top of the hill. Boy! the view there would pay them for the whole trip. And then, if they were to go around Fort William and up past Loch Lomond, 800 feet up on Mount McKay and looked over that scenery, they would realize that it is truly gorgeous! There is nothing to touch it in all Canada. Therefore I thank the minister for the work he has done.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is not in the house, but I should like to congratulate him upon his visit to the head of the lakes. We had a promise of $200,000 for an addition to our sanatorium, one which serves not only the Thunder Bay area, but the whole of northern Ontario. Because of the number of Indians and others who were being cared for in that sanatorium, the former Minister of National Health and Welfare said that $200,000 would be set aside for us. Some difficulty developed. We thought we had that $200,000, and we were not going to let go. When the minister saw our sanatorium, and the work being done, and when he saw the way the Indians were being cared for there was no further doubt about our getting it. For this we thank him.

I should like to speak about another matter which was mentioned either in the speech from the throne or at some other time, something I have advocated for six years, and that is a national contributory pension. Railroad men have called on me, and they say it is an absolute necessity. A railroader may have a pension, but that does not provide for his wife. And any railroader who loves his wife wants to leave the best for her after he is gone. Therefore I say we should have a national contributory pension for all Canada; and I believe this has been suggested by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Of course that scheme must not conflict with other pension schemes conducted by industries.

I do not know for certain, but I have my own ideas as to who spiked the dominion-provincial conference. My heart was sore when through the years, having built up a wonderful contributory health bill, it was wiped out entirely. We had men from New Zealand, England, the United States and all over Canada who helped in the framing of this bill. We thought it was a fine bill that had been drafted under the supervision of the former minister of national health. I think that bill should be called back from its resting place and put before this house. If all the provinces do not agree, those who do should be able to put it into force.

I have a word to say about old age pensions. Before I came down here I had the honour of being called to speak to a group of older people, some old age pensioners and some who had retired from the different railroads. It was a well conducted meeting. I agreed with those people that the present old age pension of $30 per month is not enough. It will be said that Ontario gives another $10 per month, but very few get it. I stood up in this house last year and congratulated the premier of Ontario on providing that extra $10, but at the present time there are a great many people who have no other income and who get only $30 per month. It is not enough.

The other day I was out tramping around and I passed the home of an old age pensioner about 8.30 in the morning when some hon. members are supposed to be taking it easy. I called in and found that breakfast was still on the table, so I said, "I am just in time." They had porridge, but they had no milk and no brown sugar. They were buying their little cottage which their son-in-law had helped to build.

I hope the province of Ontario will rise in its dignity, in its honesty and in its spirit of self-sacrifice and give every pensioner that $10 per month extra no matter who he is. I think Ontario will do it. British Columbia does it and I think Ontario is just a little better than British Columbia.

I am not forgetting Fort William, of course. Some of you may think that there are no farmers at Fort William; you may think that we have nothing but water, rocks, scrub, bush and mines. We have those things, but in addition we have one of the best farming districts in Ontario. The farmers in this district are well looked after. Mr. Harrison is the agricultural representative and Mr. J. K. Knight is the supervisor of the agricultural substation. Those men keep the farmers on their toes.

Then there are many agricultural societies and our farm life has developed considerably. Our farmers are encouraged to do things in the right way. Many attractions are offered to the boys on the farm. These efforts appeal to me, as I am sure they would appeal to anyone who wants to see the young people kept on the farm. We have a good baseball league in that district. If you want to spend a thrilling night you should attend one of those evening games in the summertime. Not only do they put on a good round of baseball; they provide refreshments of a type that permits you to go home without your head being light.

In the wintertime they have a rural hockey league which attracts large numbers even to the open-air rinks. They play a splendid brand of hockey and the cup that is presented in the spring is well contested.

Then we have other types of competition. Last year I mentioned our 500 bushels to the acre potato club. That was carried on this year and F. J. Kailik of Upsala managed to produce 649 bushels of potatoes to the acre, not just 500 bushels. I say to other farmers that if they want to know how to raise potatoes they do not have to go to Ireland. If they go to Kailik he will explain the program that enabled him to achieve that production.

Then we have the hundred bushels to the acre oats club. Mr. Finholm of Cloud Bay raised 105 bushels per acre of good oats. I think that record leads Canada.

We have several farm associations which are supported splendidly by the Department of Agriculture under the leadership of the minister. We have the head of the lakes agricultural society and there are many exhibitions held in the fall, the principal ones being at Fort William, Murillo, Hymers and Upsala. The chief attractions at these fairs are animal husbandry and farm products.

Fort William and Port Arthur are known for their good record in connection with juvenile delinquency, something to which the good city of Toronto cannot lay claim. They might be able to make that claim if they would take my advice. We have a family juvenile court which helps, but perhaps what is of even greater help are our supervised playgrounds. These are conducted all through the summer so that our boys and girls do not have time to get into mischief by hanging around in gangs. We have our swimming pools under the supervision of the Y.M.C.A. and many boys and girls learn to swim during the summer months.

A large section of our library is set aside for boys' and girls' books. The librarian has conducted special film showings with the assistance of the film board here in Ottawa. Our city is really tops of all Canada in film showing. You see that through their eyes, through their bodies and through their hands and feet we keep our boys and girls busy so that the devil does not have a chance to get into their lives.

I do not think there is a city in Canada where the churches, Protestant, Roman Catholic, Jewish and Gentile, are more on their toes than in Fort William. Our people do not mind paying their ministers decent salaries. I would consider it a special privilege if Toronto would send up one of those hoodlum gangs and let me place them on one of our hockey teams. I think they would go back to Toronto ready to conduct themselves sanely.

We have a mining district west of Fort William fifty miles wide by one hundred miles long. I should like to read a brief description by W. A. Gray of the Shebandowan district. He says:

> The Shebandowan area lies in a belt of rocks comprised of sediments and volcanics which have been intruded by granite, porphyry, gabbro, diorite, diabase and several smaller intrusions.
> Geological conditions are similar to other areas where gold and base metals are being produced.
>
> At the south-west end of the belt gold was produced from the Ardeen mine. East of this you have the great lakes copper property which at present is developing a large deposit of copper-silver-gold around the old Tip Top mine.
> Three miles east of this at Kashabowie, Andowan gold mines are developing a copper-gold property along with their associates, Norpic Mining Company. East of this you have the International Nickel property which, although not producing, has outlined an ore body by diamond drilling, and is talked about as a billion dollar deposit in nickel, copper, gold, platinum and platinum group metals.

May I interject here that I think the International Nickel Company should be compelled to open that mine, and not just keep it for a future generation.

> Around Shebandowan lakes there are many gold, copper and nickel finds. Some of them have had considerable development and have proved commercial ore bodies, but due to conditions and lack of finances never were able to come into production. Geophysical surveys have been made north of the village of Shebandowan, and large anomalies have been found by this work and have never been diamond drilled. The Shebandowan area offers plenty of possibilities for finances, and if work was done systematically and money spent wisely, there is no doubt that more mines would be produced, and of large tonnage, as the deposits so far found in the area are of the major type.

I should like to ask the minister to see that something is done towards the opening up of new gold mines. I know some of the old mines are able to carry on, but they are having a terribly hard time. I was very grateful to the gold mining district north of Port Arthur for the way they helped us during the depression. They took hundreds of our young men who could not get work anywhere else.

Then again we have a trades and labour council in Fort William. We think it is just about the best. There are Progressive Conservatives in that body; there are Liberals in that body; there are C.C.F.'ers in that body; there are some Labour-Progressives in it, and there are some who think they are better than any of the others. As a labour body they are not contributing to any political party as far as is known. They were somewhat disturbed in the past year, and I was disturbed with them, because of the treatment of young men who make their living on boats. I mean the merchant marine. I think it is not fair for young men to leave Canada, sail across the Atlantic, and then find they have not any ship to bring them back home again. I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to see that the merchant marine receive decent treatment. I know we have at the head of the lakes one shipping company that would not stoop to that sort of thing. It is headed by Senator N. M. Paterson. He treats his men fairly if they co-operate with him. I congratulate him on the way he treats his men.

We have new industries at the head of the lakes. There is an old starch factory which was taken over by a group of men and is now producing edible oils. The former member for Moose Jaw has taken quite a part in it. He was kind enough to tell me that he thought Fort William was the best place for that project, and I think so, too. Then we have a fuel oil industry which is growing rapidly. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will know that we have the manufacture of starch from wheat, but because wheat went up in price they are pretty well out of business. If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce could give this company the same subsidy that is given to flour mills we would appreciate it, because the day will come when wheat will not sell for as high a price as it does today.

We have certain needs at the head of the lakes. From the Steep Rock mine trainloads of hematite ore are brought to Fort William and then taken to the United States. We think we should have a smelter so that we could keep that ore in Canada and not have to buy back steel from the United States. That is an absolute necessity. If I had strong enough powers I would see that we had a smelter there. Then we need a breakwater at island No. 2. I should like to congratulate the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) on dredging the McKellar river and lowering it by 20 feet, so that steamers will be able to go up the McKellar river instead of having to go away down and back into it, and then go out that way again. That is one of the finest things that the Department of Public Works has done for Fort William in many a long year. We need a public dock. We have no public dock. It is perhaps my fault that I was blind to the need, but we hope that will be remedied this spring. Then we need the development of Mount McKay into a public park. I spoke of that last year. The scenery is par excellence. There is not anything to beat it in all Canada, but the Indians are in control. They have not the ability to develop it, and what has been given to them has perhaps been abused. It would make a splendid public park. People from the United States and Canadians from east and west could enjoy the scenery.

To come back to pensions, I should like to pay tribute to the chairman of the pension board, Brigadier General Melville. He is a splendid friend of the veterans, and is doing a magnificent job. There are some things, however, that he cannot do without legislation. I think Imperial veterans who have been twenty years in Canada should be given the burnt-out pension. The veterans of the South African war are holding a convention in London, I believe in July. I think that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) should see to it that a number of veterans have their passages paid over there, because some of these old veterans have not a great deal of this world's goods.

I have here something I enjoyed reading. It is the platform of the Progressive Conservative party as established by the Progressive Conservative national convention, the program on which the party and its new leader, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew), hope to be elected. I should like to refer to plank 27, a Canadian national flag. I do not know whether or not that will come about under the present government leadership but I wonder what kind of flag they are going to propose.

Mr. Brooks: It would not be one like the one you brought in here a year ago.

Mr. McIvor: Then again we get a lot of literature to read. I read all I have time to read, and some of it I just look at. I had great pleasure this past summer in spending a day, or part of a day, when I was not busy at anything else reading "Harvest Triumphant" by Merrill Denison. It is a good book, one that is well worth reading. I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) should advise the department of education in Toronto to place this book in our public schools for collateral reading. It shows the daring, courage, Christian character, ability and perseverance of the early settlers of Canada.

I should like to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I have never been very close to many of the deputy ministers, but from what they do we know of their outstanding ability. I congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the work he has done in striving to set up Israel as a nation. I think that was a fine thing, but again it is necessary for me to prove it. There is not a nation in the world that has done as much for civilization as the Jews.

The greatest sanitary expert that the world has ever known is Moses. If you do not remember it, go back and read it for yourselves. We would do well to practise some of his teachings. If we did we would not have so much stomach trouble. The greatest lawyer the world has ever known—he is not excelled even today—was Moses. The laws of Canada, of the United States, of Great Britain, and all jurisprudence are based upon the ten commandments. Sometimes they were changed a bit but not to their betterment. You will find that it is all there. In addition they have given us this old bible. There is no book to compare with it. It is never out of print, and it is the best seller today. I notice that a large number of hon. members have a copy of this old book in their offices. I suppose they also have it on their room tables.

As far as literature is concerned, there is no other book that will compare with the bible in beautiful diction, in simple language and in plainness of speech. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether you would permit me to give you a quotation from the bible, taken from the 55th chapter of Isaiah.

> For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater;
> So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.
> For ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace; the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands.

You cannot show me in the writings of any poet, ancient or modern, any passage that will compare with it in simplicity, directness and diction. No other book written can compare with the bible, which is written in words of one or two syllables. The second book to it is Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." Some believe it and some do not. I believe it.

Somebody asked, "What is truth?" Anybody who reads the 14th chapter of John will know what truth is:

> Jesus said unto him, I am the way, the truth and the life.

That truth will never change. The only thing that is the hope of civilization today is that truth put into practice. I am happy to say that a great many hon. members agree with me in this. A poet has said:

> There is a divinity that shapes our ends,
> Rough-hew them how we will.

In conclusion I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister on the way in which he finished his speech. This is what he said:

> There is something more important than dollars.

I thank him for that. Then he said:

> Man shall not live by bread alone.

That is true. If you and I practise that, and if the Prime Minister keeps that to the fore, as the former Prime Minister did, he will lead Canada in a way that is equal to the leadership that any country of the world has ever had.

Mr. John R. MacNicol (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the kindly remarks of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) about the great city from which I come, I am proud to be a humble citizen of Toronto. If there are one or two hoodlums in a population of a million, that does not spoil the whole city nor does it spoil the great metropolitan city from which you come, Your Honour.

That is all I am going to say in reply to the remarks of my hon. friend. I rise tonight to take up another subject, namely the marvellous effect that navigation on the great lakes has had on the building up of the economy of Ontario. I shall spend most of my time talking about Ontario. What would we do in Ontario without our great harbours? I do not know. They have had an outstanding place in building up Ontario and also Canada. I would not touch on this subject at all had it not been for something the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said when he spoke the other day. I do not intend to criticize what he said, and I am not going to pass comment on it other than to quote one passage. He mentioned the probable implementation of the St. Lawrence canal proposal at Washington. I shall quote from page 66 of Hansard of January 28. This is what the Prime Minister said:

> I think it is only fair for us to say that if we cannot at this time get implementation of this agreement for the double-barreled purpose of navigation and power, the value of the power is so great that we shall have to give very serious consideration to going ahead and developing it on the power side alone—which would be amply justified, I think, by the economic benefits which could be derived from the power alone.

I wish to emphasize as strongly as I can that in our dealings with our cousins to the south, while we promote as strongly as we can the production of power in that agreement, we must not under any consideration forget the vast advantages that accrue from navigation.

This province and its great industry are a living example of what has happened because of our ability to navigate the great lakes. In preparing to take part in the debate on the St. Lawrence canal, when and if it ever does occur in this house, I made a very exhaustive survey of everything pertaining to the subject, but one survey was in connection with the fifteen ports in Ontario on the great lakes and connecting rivers. I was much impressed in learning what I did on that journey. I shall try to take the house on an imaginary journey over the course that I took, which should show, if I can properly express it, the vast advantages that have accrued to Ontario, to Canada and to the economy of all of us, as a result of what we have been able to obtain from the navigation of the great lakes. I for one shall not forget the vast place that navigation holds in this whole problem.

I shall first take the house to the head of the lakes from which my hon. friend who has just taken his seat comes. There are congregated elevators whose capacity is greater than that of any other centre in the world so far as I have been able to ascertain. I believe that the elevators at the head of the lakes have a storage capacity of almost 150,000,000 bushels of grain. They are so well equipped with loading and unloading machinery that five or six hundred million bushels of grain are passed through these elevators in some years and sent on down east. I am going to follow the grain east for a while. A large proportion of it goes directly overseas either from ships right to Montreal or by being unloaded at the lower lake ports and then by rail to the ports on the Atlantic ocean. First of all I am going to talk about the ships that go down the lakes, loaded with grain, which unload their cargoes at one of the great Ontario bays, Georgian bay. Therefore after returning from the head of the lakes I shall take the house to the first port that I visited in the course of my survey, the port of Midland.

Midland has more elevator capacity than any other elevator centre on the lower lakes.

I believe the elevators there have a capacity of approximately 14 million bushels. So magnificent is the loading and unloading equipment at that point that through that port on Georgian bay pass approximately 58 million bushels of grain per year. Lest I forget, I must say that all this grain comes from our great western provinces, to which the province of Ontario owes a very great debt of gratitude. The harbour has a draft of not less than twenty-five feet. It is an excellent harbour. It could be improved and made larger, and I hope the government, in surveying what has been done, will do something in that regard. I am glad to see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) in his seat, for I believe such matters come under his jurisdiction. I hope the responsible minister will see to it that the harbour at Midland is extended. There is ample space to extend it. I examined it very carefully. The extension of it would permit the berthing of more ships loaded with grain in the fall of the year.

A day or two ago I read in the newspaper that, at present, in the Midland harbour the ships and elevators are plugged to the roof with 50 million bushels of grain. If the harbour were extended, perhaps boats containing another 25 million bushels of grain could be berthed there. It is important that we do everything we can to handle the capacity shipments of grain which are sent down to us by those devoted farmers of the three western provinces.

Just across the bay from Midland there is another port, Port McNicoll, named after the late David McNicoll who for many years was the general manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway. This port has elevators the capacity of which is about 6½ million bushels. There, too, as well as at Midland, the loading and unloading equipment is so efficient, and the men operating that equipment are so capable that through that port almost 50 million bushels of grain are transshipped yearly. This makes a total of over 100 million bushels per year for these two ports. All this grain does not go through to the ocean ports. A lot of it goes out by railroad and truck to the great counties surrounding these ports, the counties of Simcoe, Grey and the other counties thereabouts where it is used by the farmers, chopping-mill operators or flour mills. This is a tremendous business, sir.

Continuing west, the town next to Midland is Collingwood. At Collingwood there is also an excellent elevator. At this port, in distributing the grain, they go farther than any other port I surveyed. The elevator capacity at that point is about 2 million bushels, but they handle up to 15 million or more bushels a year, two-thirds of which goes to the farmers in the counties of Grey, Simcoe, North Wellington and perhaps partly into the county of Bruce. This is a tremendous business, Your Honour. We in Ontario are very proud of that marvellous business built on the handling of western grain. We are all working together. In Ontario, we help the west by using the grain and the west helps us by producing it.

The harbour at Collingwood has a draft of about twenty-two feet. It could be improved. I did not find many complaints. The main complaint is that when there is a storm on the bay there is difficulty in getting into the harbour behind the elevator. The elevator is most expertly managed. The men who operate these elevators are men of whom we might well be proud for their expert ability in processing, shipping and distributing the grain grown by our western farmers.

The next port is that of Owen Sound. Owen Sound is a very beautiful city represented in this parliament by my hon. friend from Grey North (Mr. Case). There is a splendid harbour and an excellent elevator, due mostly to the efforts of a former member of this house, Mr. Telford. I believe he sat on the other side of the house. This elevator is a credit to the men of Owen Sound who organized and built it. It handles approximately 25 million bushels per year; that is big business. A large portion of the grain goes to the surrounding counties, helping to build up the great livestock trade for which Ontario is so well known. This harbour is large enough to permit another elevator, and I hope the men of Owen Sound will go ahead and build another one.

Continuing around the Bruce peninsula we come to the very excellent harbour of Goderich, represented in this house by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff). Goderich is one of the best harbours on the whole of the great lakes. It has about a twenty-five foot draft right in from the lake. The harbour could be improved. The fine men operating the two main elevators in that harbour do a magnificent job but they are handicapped by an island right in the harbour. I am going to ask the Minister of Public Works to take notice of that and see that the small island is removed. If one watches the movement of boats in the harbour it will be observed they find it difficult, when backing up from the elevator, to avoid backing into that island. If the little island were removed it would allow more ships to be berthed in the harbour, and thus more grain could be handled. If you went to Goderich today, you would find the harbour full of ships, which they move around after sawing the ice and taking it out of the harbour. Then, the grain is unloaded into the flour mill and elevators which are located there. The harbour at Goderich brings great credit to the province of Ontario.

I must hurry along, as time is short. Continuing down the lake, we come to another great port at the city of Sarnia. This city is growing very rapidly. I have to be very careful, since the representative of that city is present, but I believe the population is around 40,000. Located there is an excellent elevator. It has not as large a capacity as that at Goderich, which is 3,600,000 bushels, but a capacity of about three million. The elevator distributes approximately fifteen million bushels of grain which comes from the west. The elevators at Goderich process approximately thirty million bushels of grain.

At the city of Windsor, represented by my hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), there is a very fine elevator. I am happy to learn that plans have been made for doubling the capacity which is, at present, 1,325,000 bushels. I was very pleased to be able to observe the elevator in operation when I was there. Approximately ten million bushels of grain are distributed or handled by this elevator, a great deal of which is distributed throughout that magnificent county of Essex. There are many stock raisers and farmers in that splendid county doing a fine job.

Mr. Martin: There are no better people.

Mr. MacNicol: When we leave Windsor, the next stop is at the lake Erie entrance of the Welland canal, at Port Colborne and Humberstone. There too are elevators that have a capacity of over 6,500,000 bushels but through which pass upwards of 40,000,000 bushels of grain a year. Some of this grain is distributed out around the counties of Welland, Lincoln and Haldimand. Few people would think that Toronto would have elevators, but we have. Anyone inspecting the harbour at Toronto today would be amazed to see the four gigantic elevators located there—two rows of tanks, I think they call them, or silos for holding grain. Those elevators have a capacity of about 8,000,000 bushels. For an inland port, that is an amazing situation. Through these elevators pass 16,000,000 bushels of grain a year, all of which is used for making oil, flour, feed for cattle or cereals for human beings. I do not think much of it is going across the ocean.

Then going farther down the lake we come to the city of Kingston, where there is an elevator with a capacity of approximately 5,000,000 bushels. There again, while that is the capacity of the elevator, it handles up to 25,000,000 or 30,000,000 bushels a year. Much of this grain is distributed as far east as Cornwall and some of it as far east as Montreal. I should like to point out what a magnificent job for the economy of this country is being done by the lake and river navigation and the Ontario ports on the shores of the great lakes.

Then we come to the town represented here by the excellent, capable and hard-working whip of the official opposition, the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman), where there is an elevator with a capacity of 5,500,000 bushels. It is a government elevator managed by a most excellent superintendent or manager by the name, I believe, of Alex Ross, with whom I had a chat. That harbour at Prescott, where I used to swim when I was a boy living down there, is doing wonderful work. These elevators on the lower great lakes have a combined capacity of the sum of the figures I gave, perhaps 50,000,000 to 75,000,000 bushels of wheat, but they have a capacity for forwarding wheat of not less than 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels, or whatever is the total of the figures I quoted; I did not add them up. All of this goes to show what they mean to Ontario.

The farmers in the counties in the hinterland behind every one of these fine harbours use a great deal of that grain. Ontario could not do more than a fraction of what it does for the stock trade of Canada if it were not for the grain that comes down from the west through these lakes and through these harbours. The government assists—and most wisely so, in my opinion—in the payment of freight on that grain that is sold east of Fort William and that comes down here for use. That is a great help to the Ontario farmer and to the western farmer in the selling of his grain in Canada. It is of help to a vast line of businesses that I could not take the time to mention, although I should like to do so, just to give an idea of what it means to these various businesses and industries making material in Ontario for the elevators, for the transport of grain, and in connection with ships, and the thousands and thousands of men that are engaged in that interchange of trade in connection with grain. Thousands and thousands of farmers and others in Ontario would be out of work if it were not for their ability to obtain grain, grown in the west, as it comes down through that line I have mentioned.

We have a great country, Mr. Speaker, if we all just have vision enough to see it, work together and help to build it up. In using the grain down here we are trying to do our part by using a product that is raised in the west. I can foresee in the future of this country a growth of population such that, instead of selling abroad the vast proportion of what we raise, we shall reach the stage at which the United States has arrived. Only about 6, 7, or 8 per cent of what is produced there is sold outside. Over here we must sell anything over 35 per cent or 40 per cent. Let us all work together and build this country up. That whole line of elevators and ports in Ontario is doing a big job. The men whom I met on that trip, I was proud to meet. They are men of a splendid type. I do not know what there is about the handling of grain; but, whatever it is, it seems to make the men rugged, friendly, gracious and kindly. Everywhere I went I was met with courtesy and obtained all the information I required. I made up my mind that when the time came that I could use it I would present a picture of the vast value of the whole trade not only to my own native province but to the whole of Canada. To all of those concerned in the trade, in the department and elsewhere, who help to see to it that the grain is moved and used, I say, "The country owes you a debt of gratitude."

In the beginning I had intended to tell the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in connection with his observation about the probability of the St. Lawrence agreement coming before the senate at Washington, that I doubt if any bill or agreement will be passed for power alone. I have a clipping here but I will not take the time to quote it. Everyone else has read it. It is a statement by the president of the United States to the effect that, with them, it is either power and navigation or neither. So I will again say that I hope none of us here, in promoting the building of the St. Lawrence seaway, will disjoin the two elements. I believe we shall get farther if we keep together those two forks, power and navigation. If we take a stand for one and not for the other, I believe we shall be quoted at Washington as not being united to obtain the whole. We want the whole development. In the picture I have presented tonight of what navigation on the great lakes means to Ontario alone, and through Ontario to Canada, in the matter of transportation, I have presented only one product of importance, namely grain. I could of course give an equally good picture of others, but I thought I ought to confine my remarks to the product raised by our farmers in the west, those men who have done such a wonderful job all these years and under distressing circumstances often beyond description.

My time is nearly up, but I want to impress the minister, who is in his seat, and the other ministers who are equally concerned in the promotion of trade in Canada—and I am convinced that they all are. I can never get myself into the frame of mind where I believe that only men of one group are anxious to promote trade. I urge that an effort be made to encourage the construction of other elevators in Ontario, since I am talking about Ontario, so that the counties round about the suggested elevators can do the same job as is being done elsewhere.

Yesterday I was talking to the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Gauthier) about the possibility of a port on the north shore of Lake Huron where an elevator could be built. He told me—and I endorse what he says—that the Spanish river flows into the north shore of lake Huron, and that between its mouth and Espanola there is an excellent site for an elevator which, in building up business, would play as big a part in that section of the country around Algoma and Sudbury as in our wonderful counties of Grey, Huron, Bruce, Kent, Essex, Waterloo, Wellington and elsewhere. So I hope some consideration will be given to that. The fact is that on lake Erie there is no elevator from the time one leaves Windsor until one reaches Port Colborne. The whole of the centre of that great area of western Ontario is without elevator capacity to enable them to have the same great benefits which accrue at other places where they have them.

I should think Port Stanley, situated in the constituency of Elgin, would be an excellent place to erect an elevator. Through the railways grain could be run out into the great counties of Middlesex and Oxford, and other neighbouring counties.

One cannot visit Chatham without wondering why there is no elevator at that point, because there used to be an elevator on the Thames river. Today, however, there is nothing of that kind, despite the fact that Chatham offers great opportunities for the building of a fine harbour. I surveyed it carefully, and I know there is ample water to enable ships to come up to Chatham, if the river were dredged properly. There is ample space for an elevator at that point—all of which would help boost the economy of the great county of Kent, one of the greatest in Canada.

Then, perhaps I should mention other points like Belleville, on the north shore of lake Ontario. Perhaps I need not refer to any other places, although there may be others worthy of mention. However, the object of my speaking along these lines tonight is to congratulate all those who have been associated with the development of the grain trade—those who are connected with the harbours, the elevators, the banks, the farms, the railways and the trucks. I congratulate all of them, and I would encourage them to go on and to expand. The more grain we use in Canada, the better for all of us.

I believe I have time for only one or two further observations. Someone may ask what all this means to Ontario. Well, when anyone looks at the figures he will be amazed, as I was. Not being a farmer—although I lived on a farm—I thought most of the cows and other stock were in the west; because, after all, it is really only in western Ontario and in eastern Ontario that farming is congested. However, I found upon consulting the bluebook that of the total average crop acreage in Canada of 63 million acres and over, only 8,213,000 are in Ontario. But on those acres, because of the assistance from harbours, elevators and western grain, one must look at the vast job they are able to do.

There are more milch cows in Ontario than anywhere else in Canada; the figure stands at 1,250,000. Then, there are more other types of cattle in Ontario, with a figure of 1,618,000; more swine—2,013,000; horses—not so many as in two other provinces, but still 467,000; sheep—not so many, but still 701,000; poultry—we are at the top, with 27,013,000; laying hens, 11,100,000; eggs, 115,000,000 dozen per year, all this from this little province of Ontario—because it is not so large when one takes off the vast unsettled areas north of the main lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the old Grand Trunk Pacific in northern Ontario. Then, the figure for milk is 5,700,000,000 pounds in this little province of Ontario; butter, 76,700,000 pounds, and cheese, 96,000,000 pounds. I give much credit for that to our western farmers, because the Ontario farmers could not have achieved that high record, that enviable peak, had it not been for our ability to obtain western grain.

Then, as my last word, may I give credit to the splendid harbours on our great lakes, those I have mentioned—as well as the men who operate the elevators, the railroaders and truckers who take the grain away, and all those others who are associated with the movement of grain in Ontario from the time the grain reaches us from the west until it is on our farms. This grain has enabled the Ontario farmers to do the great job they have done, as represented by the figures I have just placed on record.

In support of our arguments concerning the St. Lawrence seaways development, let us keep both programs together—both power and navigation. I am convinced that if we do that we will get both; and if we do not do it I am not sure that we will get either.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I wish particularly to welcome to the house the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). For a long time we have admired their respective careers, and it does us good to have them with us in the house.

I should like also to extend a personal word of welcome to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew). Party politics aside, he and I, and the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Kidd), have something in common. We are the only members here who sat together in a provincial house. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) followed me in the provincial house; he followed me to Ottawa—indeed, I feel as if I am being followed. But I can assure him I shall do everything I can, and I hope successfully, to stop his following me over to the government benches.

The first point which strikes me in the address of His Excellency is that it devotes itself to the present and looks to the future. We as a party are not content to rest on our past achievements. I am not minimizing the record of this government: there it is. It is worth looking at, not once but twice. Certainly it is not from poverty of performance that I suggest we should not rely upon our past record. But the fact is that it is past. The record shows what we stand for; and we are not going to be content to stand on our record. Much requires to be done today and tomorrow. This much we can say, that today Canada is stronger and sounder than she has ever been in her history; and that the people of Canada can and will stand five more years of good government, and the prosperity that has gone with it.

Let me say something about foreign trade. Our exports have reached the all-time high record of $3 billion, one-half of which has been with our neighbours to the south. What was more important than the volume was the ever-increasing variety of exports. No longer are we a one-commodity or two-commodity country. Those who have been at the helm and who have planned and encouraged industrialization have rounded out the economy of this country so as to give us an entirely new stability; and our high level of production is reflected in the employment index, which continues to rise to a new peacetime record.

I am happy to say that industrial relations seem to be going through a bedding-down process as the two partners, labour and industry, are learning to get along with each other much better than they have in the past. It is worthy of note and worthy of recognition that labour is becoming more mature and is taking the long view. Under present circumstances the emphasis is on pensions and security rather than on short-term gains.

In order to ensure manpower for our expanding economy the government is moving ahead with the most ambitious immigration scheme we have had in the last 35 years. I saw government immigration officials in Italy, France, Germany and Austria and I found them competent, considerate, interested in their work and willing to help people to get to Canada as quickly as they could. I found the administration to be as good as could possibly be expected. I do not like to name anyone on the floor of the house, but I am told that the commissioner of immigration, Mr. Jolliffe, is responsible for the present set-up. He has done an excellent job. I was impressed with the people I saw, with the work they were doing, and I felt that they were a credit to Canada.

During my trip I talked with many people of all races and all nationalities in different camps. I am happy to report to the house that not once did I receive a complaint that there was bias or discrimination on the part of the Canadian immigration officials in these various countries. These people were all impatient to get to Canada, but they agreed, and I agreed with them from inquiries I made, that the officials are free from bias and that the choice is being made on merit. For that reason, I was interested in the few words said the other night by the hon. and very kindly and gentlemanly member for Middlesex East (Mr. White). I quote his statement from page 127 of Hansard as follows:

> I do not know of any department that is so discouraging to work with or from which you get so few results as the department of immigration.

I have many occasions to visit the department of immigration and the officials there have never failed to show me every courtesy. I am satisfied that not only are they conscientious and able, but that they are understaffed and over-worked. In my opinion they are doing an excellent job for which they deserve very high marks indeed. I have one thing for the ears of the government. I do not think the regulations are wide enough. I think there should be an immediate broadening of the relationship category to a point where a person would be admissible if he had a relative of any kind in this country who was willing to give the necessary guarantee. As a matter of fact I am prepared to go further than that. If a person has in this country a friend who is willing to vouch for him, who will be responsible for him, that person should be permitted to come here.

Our experience in this country with immigrants has been excellent. They have made a fine contribution by their addition to the Canadian scene. We are particularly lacking in professional and technical people, doctors, dentists, teachers, lawyers, professors and technicians. Europe is full of such people, who are anxious to come here to contribute their knowledge and skill. I think the time has come to broaden the occupational categories. We can use these people in the urban areas and we can use them particularly in the rural areas where they are badly needed. Last week when in Toronto I made a speech which was reported in the Ottawa Journal of January 31, which report reads:

> . . . the Canadian medical profession has "actively worked" to discourage the entry of refugee doctors into Canada.

And again:

> . . . it is to the discredit of many of our professional bodies that they have actively worked to discourage immigrants in their particular fields.

The charge was promptly denied by Dr. Magner, president of the Canadian medical association. Maclean's magazine of February 1 contained a leading editorial which reads:

> Canada Needs Brains, so Why Keep Them Out
> But there's a bigger obstacle to the immigration of highly skilled men. There is more than indifference, there is, in some cases, active hostility, based on a fear of competition.
> According to the officially accepted estimate, Canada needs about 2,000 more doctors to provide adequate service by present methods. If we had health insurance on a national scale we'd need many more. In fact, one of the arguments against health insurance is that we've nowhere near enough doctors to carry it out.

And again:

> Doctor Hugh Keenleyside, the deputy minister in charge of immigration, said last spring, "The only trade union that has been adamant in its official opposition to the admission of competitive D.P.'s has been the medical profession".

And just a few more lines:

> We can't afford to keep skilled people out merely because they might compete with people already here. In fact, it's to the national interests that they should compete, the more effectively the better.
> The present is the greatest opportunity in one hundred years—since the revolutions of 1848—to enrich our nation with fine new blood. We're letting that opportunity slip.

I do not suppose that there is any member who rises to speak on the speech from the throne who does not say something about taxes. We all agree that reductions are overdue and that they will come from this government.

Mr. Fleming: Why did not the hon. member say that last year?

Mr. Croll: I said that last year. The hon. member did not listen. These reductions should be tailored to do the most good. I worked out a simple formula; it is so simple that if you do not like it, you can forget it. It is about as follows:

> For the labouring man—higher exemptions
> For the white collar worker and middle class—reductions
> For those in the high brackets—a kind word
> For corporations—not even that
> For all of us—some reduction in indirect taxes.

As I said, this can be easily forgotten if the minister does not like it, but it struck me as having some fairness. I should like to say something about international affairs.

We are singularly fortunate in having at the head of the department a gentleman who has gained his knowledge firsthand. In my opinion the minister is a believer, not in the British line, not in the United States line but in the Canadian line. That was illustrated by the stand taken by the government in connection with Israel.

Great Britain turned over the Palestine problem to the united nations. At that moment it became a Canadian concern, and the lion's share of the credit belongs to Canada for the fact that within eighteen months from the time that the united nations tackled the problem a fair settlement was arrived at. Today a democratic state is created, strong and free, and all that after twenty-five years of fruitless discord and strife. Under any circumstances, Mr. Speaker, the birth of a nation is a profound event, but in the case of Israel it is heavy with urgency, tragic with memories, historic in meaning such as to stir the heart of every man. So to the government of the day, and to the members of this House of Commons, on behalf of countless thousands of Canadians, and particularly on behalf of some 200,000 Canadians of Jewish origin, I can only say, thank you. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, I have waited a very long time to be able to say that, but I am glad that today it falls to my lot, and under such circumstances in this chamber.

Canada's first major incursion into the field of international affairs has been an outstanding success, and her second one, the North Atlantic security pact, augurs well to follow suit. We have come a very long way from the Imperial conferences of the twenties, when the theory was advanced that Canada was incapable of performing the necessary defensive and diplomatic functions. It took the first world war to prove to everyone that Canada was a nation. It took the second world war to prove to the world that Canada is a power. The people of this country have great confidence that this government will do everything within its power to see that there is no third world war.

In the speech from the throne, on page 3 of Hansard, the suggestion was made that there would be a royal commission on cultural matters. I put great stock in that, for reasons different perhaps from those of other people, because I think such a commission might well examine into the very soul of Canada as a nation. No people, no nation, yes, and no civilization, will endure without expressing its aspirations and its achievements in the arts, in painting and in music. Perhaps they can tell us what makes a Canadian. Perhaps they can tell us what keeps a Canadian in Canada, and how we can keep him here, because there has been a steady and relentless drain of young people from this country to the United States.

Writers have coined a phrase, absorptive capacity, to indicate the number that we can take in without upsetting the balance of our economy. We are far from reaching our absorptive capacity, but let us look at the other end of the scale. I think the time has come, and is overdue, for us to consider our evaporative capacity, the number of people a country can lose by emigration without upsetting the economy of the country. The two factors exist in this country in inverse ratio to each other; our absorptive capacity is high and our evaporative capacity is low. We can cure the one by immigration, but what about our evaporative capacity? I believe that the royal commission can be helpful in that respect, because one of the first reasons for evaporation of population is lack of economic opportunities for the young people of this country. No less is there a lack of cultural and intellectual opportunities which drives people of talent and people of skill elsewhere to find recognition, and an opportunity to develop their artistic and their cultural personalities. I think the role of an enlightened government could be well played in encouraging the arts and sciences, and the growth of a cultural heritage, for our cultural background in this country is as good as any in the hemisphere. We lack the financial resources that are available in the United States, which facilitate so much what we call the free enterprise culture of that country.

We have to make up for large audiences and capital with increased government interest and sponsorship of cultural affairs in general. I know that Canadians truly wish for a national library, a national theatre, national films, and, yes, for government-owned television, too, and more liberal support for the museums and art galleries. These things will do much to provide our young people of talent with openings to develop that talent which they are now compelled to seek outside our borders. I think the commission can be an effective means of checking the evaporation of population which we cannot afford in this country.

Let me speak of one other major problem, the matter of social services, a matter that is becoming not only urgent but of a demanding nature, and with particular reference to contributory old age pensions and national health insurance. We need in this country a system that will not only give, but permit, the average Canadian to pay for proper medical care. We need more doctors, and we need to locate them more evenly. We need more hospitals, and they should be within easy reach of every person in the country. These fine hospitals and excellent doctors are not of much use unless the people can afford them. Health insurance in this country is not extravagant, nor is it back-door socialism; but if it is either it is still necessary, for today many people who need hospitalization, nursing, and medical care avoid it because they cannot pay for it. Health has become a matter of public concern. It is not a personal matter dependent upon the size of the individual's purse. The cost has to be spread across the whole country and medical aid should be available according to need rather than financial position. That is not true in Canada today.

I want to say something on dominion-provincial relations. It seems to me that provincial rights should not be associated with isolation, impoverishment or disregard of human rights. Prosperity is divisible and should be shared with all provinces. That is a provincial right and a provincial responsibility which should be wholeheartedly supported by every Canadian in every province.

I have kept silent on this question for a long time, but I feel the time has come when I must speak out. I feel that Ontario has been put in an unfavourable and ungenerous light. The people of Ontario want contributory old age pensions; they want health insurance; they want hospitalization; they want medical services, and they want them now more than ever before, because they see the benefits that have come from hospitalization to the people in Saskatchewan and to the people of British Columbia. Ontario, rich in money, rich in resources and rich in people, must realize that her prosperity depends upon the prosperity of the rest of Canada. It is undeniable that the western and the eastern provinces contribute to the welfare of the central provinces. We in Ontario have the wealth, and we tax it, and the social services in the other provinces must be provided for by people who are poorer. That is not the view of Ontario. That is the view of a political party in Ontario. These narrow views are narrowly held.

After listening to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), when the double talk was washed aside, when the welter of contradictions was cleared away, when the tin soldiers were knocked down, one thing became crystal clear. It is not a question of provincial rights; it is not a question of centralization; it is not a question of a threat to confederation, nor is it a question of a threat to the constitution; it is, you pay my price or else. That is what it has been. It is very clear now that the proposition that Ontario wanted was not social security for Canada, but social security for Ontario which would perpetually foster inferiority in the other provinces; and so mischievous and so selfish was the proposition that even Duplessis saw the implication and could not stomach it. Therefore I say that Ontario must not, and Ontario will not, squeeze the rest of the provinces for the last dollar. Ontario's position is being misrepresented.

Mr. Skey: By you.

Mr. Croll: I know Ontario. My hon. friend says, by me. Certainly I am telling the country what I think Ontario's position is. I am in a position to speak for Ontario to the same extent as any hon. member over on the other side, because I know it as well as they do. It may be that some of my hon. friends across the way have become recent converts, but I say that from every aspect it was possible and was necessary that an agreement should be reached in order that we may have these things that I talk about, not only old age pensions and health insurance but public investment, in order that we may have a cushion against any possibilities that might arise in this country.

I went through the thirties, when it was necessary to come hat-in-hand asking for handouts in order to be in a position to look after the people who were unemployed. Now when we are attempting by public investment to build up a cushion, to have something ready, we find people standing in the way of it. I have been at dominion-provincial conferences. I know that a conference is a place of compromise. You cannot have your own way at them. You bring together people of different points of view, and in concert somehow or other a solution is found. When that happens the conference is a success; but reading the record and listening to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew) in this house, and the Minister of Justice, one finds the record reveals that the conference foundered on the inflexible and remorseless obstacle of the premier of Ontario. There was no will to make that conference work. There was a will, but that will was to impede and to destroy. The difficulty was that the premier of Ontario misunderstood, he was dealing with figures and statistics, but other people came here to deal with human beings.

As a result of what happened, the sick will have to wait until the votes are counted, but the leader of the opposition will have to answer for that in due time.

Mr. Drew: That is the most inaccurate of all the speeches.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne is somewhat like a blind earthworm apparently going in different directions without any definite course and without any definite apparent reason. But, Mr. Speaker, like the blind worm the speech from the throne has a very useful purpose. The ordinary earthworm has the business of aerating the soil. Without the earthworm the soil would grow sour and stagnate. Similarly, the speech from the throne gives an opportunity to all elected members to air their problems and their constituents' difficulties. It gives this house an opportunity to air the problems facing Canada today. Therefore it fulfils a useful purpose. To cut it short, or to cut it up into little bits, is akin to cutting an earthworm into little bits. Each bit has the power to wiggle but none has the power to do a useful job.

The other day I listened to an impassioned speech by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). In that speech he accused the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). He felt very aggrieved about something that had been left out of a text. I heard the words "left out", "left out", over and over again. My mind went back to the time when those words were altered from the far more sinister words "kicked out", which were recorded and then altered on the printed pages of the Hansard of this house. It seemed to me, Mr. Speaker, that anyone who was as likely to alter the record himself to such a degree would, perhaps, be like the pot calling the kettle black in bringing up a matter of alterations. Referring to the field of histrionics, sometimes I wonder: "methinks the lady doth protest too much."

There was in the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, one phrase with which I wish to deal in some detail tonight. I shall read it to you.

> So long as trading and financial conditions remain unstable, a degree of control over foreign exchange will be required.

I believe that is a fundamental fallacy. The speech should have read, there will be no stability of foreign trade until a free exchange of currencies is permitted. Then, Mr. Speaker, we might be accomplishing something. If the government had indicated an intention of allowing the foreign exchange control board to lapse on March 31, as it would under the present statute, instead of actually wishing to continue it for two whole years, then we could have looked forward to a free trading position based on the soundness of individual and corporation trading, which is the only true lasting form of international trade.

I have been interested in the great credit the government has taken unto itself as a result of our export trade. I was interested in the figure of $3 billion worth of export trade last year. Unquestionably $3 billion is a lot of money for a country with only twelve to thirteen million people. Let us examine how this is made up.

First of all, I should like to mention the Marshall plan. I do this in some detail because the figures, so far as I know, have not been made public—at least they have not been given to this house. Up to the end of 1948, the total appropriation authorized under the Marshall plan—I shall not call it the ECA because the Marshall plan is the general name—was $4,229 million; the ocean freight was $347 million, leaving an authorized net of $3,881 million. I am omitting the hundreds of thousands although I have them here. Of that amount, the total offshore purchases amounted to $1,499 million, of which the Canadian portion was $593 million; that was to the end of 1948.

Since the beginning of April, 1948, when the plan began to be operative, to the end of January, 1949, the figures I have show that up to the 28th of January the total authorized was $4,072 million; the ocean freight was $356 million. The total offshore purchases were $1,596 million, of which the Canadian share was $650 million, leaving Canada's percentage of offshore purchases at approximately 40 per cent and Canada's percentage of the total aid at 16 per cent. The United States internal purchases came to $3,881 million, less $1,499 million, or $2,382 million.

I put those figures on the record, Mr. Speaker, to show that our treatment under the Marshall plan has been extremely fair. At this moment, I wish to give every credit to the executive of that fund for treating this country as fairly as they have.

I should like to break down the figures in regard to this Marshall aid a little further into percentages of the Canadian purchases. These percentages are reasonably accurate, approximately within one or two per cent. Fifty per cent plus, that is 50 or 51 per cent of the purchases, was for breadstuff grain; 10 per cent for other foodstuffs; 12 per cent for wood products, including paper; 4 per cent manufactured goods or products of industry; 23 per cent metals in the raw and base states and one per cent miscellaneous. From a cash point of view, $135 million was spent in Canada for base metals in the raw state.

Recently, Mr. Speaker, a number of commodities have been declared surplus in the United States. These commodities are as follows: oats, cotton, tobacco, peanuts, beans, flaxseed, linseed oil, oil cake, meal, and prunes. Many other items are on the list and they may be declared surplus within a short time.

The United States Act which makes the Marshall plan operative reads as follows:

> When agricultural commodities are surplus in the United States, they will be procured in the United States.

It is my opinion that is an eminently fair arrangement. Since the United States is putting up the money for the Marshall plan, it should decide where it is going to purchase the commodities. The percentage of United States purchases is therefore increasing while the Canadian percentage of purchases is remaining static. I put these figures on the record, Mr. Speaker, so that when we come to examine the export trade we shall see how Marshall aid affects the total and in what way.

Let us assume our export trade for the year 1948 was, in round figures, $3 billion. A breakdown of this into different types of trade shows something of this nature: Sixty-seven per cent for raw products, 7 per cent for ships and agricultural machinery, leaving 26 per cent for secondary manufactured goods which, exclusive of Marshall aid, leaves our exports at $3 billion, less $600 million or $2,400 million. Breaking this down into dollar value, we have $1,608 million for raw products; $168 million for ships and agricultural machinery; and $624 million for manufactured products.

It is these manufactured products which are so important to us at the present time. Manufactured goods are the stable export. I do not think I need to tell the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) what the fluctuations are in the prices of agricultural products. The other day I received a letter from a major exporter, and I will read just two paragraphs because I think they put the story on the record as well as can be done. The first paragraph reads as follows:

> Now it must be quite clear to our government that the export of agricultural produce and mined raw materials is always subject to fluctuations and consequently a most unstable kind of export. The anxiety of the Canadian government at the delay in the receipt of purchase orders for wheat, bacon, etc., from Britain shows how unstable these agricultural exports are, particularly in times when prices for agricultural products slump and countries such as the Argentine may be forced to throw their products at very low prices out to the world market in order to obtain the sorely needed dollar exchange.

In view of the news today from the Argentine, and the warning from the Bank of Canada, that statement is significant. The second paragraph reads:

> The history of the foreign trade of such classic exporting countries as Great Britain, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Switzerland, shows that a stable export business can only be created through the export of finished products, the products of the secondary industries, the products which bear special brands or names and which through these brands and their special features create and establish a definite demand in foreign markets. Canadian wheat, bacon and eggs, Canadian lumber, pulpwood, copper, nickel, have no brand and will never establish a stable market if price fluctuations should occur.

I think that shows how important are the 27 per cent of manufactured goods in our export trade. These are the goods which are finding it most difficult to obtain a market, because they must be paid for in American dollars. Canadian manufactured goods must be paid for in American dollars. That is a most extraordinary situation, and one that puts a crimp or an obstacle in the way of trade, which many manufacturers today are finding it almost impossible to overcome.

Before I go on I want to mention one of our major exports, newsprint. The figures that were given to me this very day show that Australia today is paying sixty-three pounds, Australian, per ton for newsprint whereas Canada could supply the same or better newsprint for forty-four pounds, Australian, per ton. Here we have newsprint, a major export of Canada, unable to be sold because of currency difficulties; unable to be sold to Australia because we are not playing with the same kind of chips. To tie the currency of this country to that of the United States and to channel and virtually to sterilize our currency is, I suggest, one of the most dangerous things that any government in any country could do.

I also received these figures with regard to newsprint. Our exports in the last year before the war came to 550,000 tons whereas our exports this last year were 400,000 tons, or a decrease of 150,000 tons; in our best and most stable single export we have a reduction of about 20 per cent from pre-war sales. I must say that the figures came to me as a surprise, but unless I hear otherwise I consider them to be quite accurate. Here we have a reduction in the sale of newsprint or in the export of newsprint; and if the Australian condition is symptomatic, the reduction can be based almost entirely on the inability of our purchasers abroad to find the currency with which to purchase our newsprint.

With unemployment growing in the Pacific province of British Columbia, with some 25,000 people out of work in the metropolitan Vancouver area, we shall pay a heavy price in unemployment alone for the lack of stable, long-term, continuing markets for paper and for other wood products. In this connection may I say, Mr. Speaker, that no manufacturer in any foreign country cares where the raw materials that go into his product come from. The Swiss manufacturer of electric motors does not care whether the copper for those electric motors comes from Canada or from Africa. All he cares about is that he gets his copper, and that he gets it at a price. In the same way, the Frenchman looking for a loaf of bread does not care whether the flour comes from our No. 1 northern hard wheat. Even though it is perhaps a better flour, he does not care. All he cares about is that he gets a loaf of bread at a reasonable price. The raw material exports, which comprise 67 per cent or two-thirds of our total exports, are today in a most vulnerable position; and they are in that extremely vulnerable position almost entirely because of our currency situation with respect to the United States dollar.

I come now to another point. We who represent great industrial ridings have a responsibility to our constituents. That prime responsibility is to see that the wheels of industry are kept going. There is no panacea that will prevent unemployment and depression except that of a full weekly pay envelope. No scheme of social security, no promises of any kind under any circumstances, will take the place of happy, productive industry and a full pay envelope. It is a will-o'-the-wisp of the most dangerous sort to consider that any type of social security is in any way a substitute for industry operating at capacity.

I come again to Canadian exports cut off by the austerity program announced last year. At one time—and I give this purely as an example—we imported about $2,500,000 worth of Mexican tomatoes. Last year we put on an embargo against those imports; and I understand that Mexico followed suit and put on an embargo against certain Canadian manufactured goods.

Then these austerity duties were to a degree removed, but there was no quid pro quo with regard to our trade with Mexico. Their prohibitions still exist. The trade, which used to be fairly good and fairly useful, does not now exist. I feel that, while it is not the policy of the government, before this austerity program was taken off there should have been at least exploratory talks with Mexican authorities to see if a return in trade could not have been arranged.

Then, there is one other thing in connection with trade, and that is that a great deal of it is on a long-term loan basis. From 15 to 25 per cent of our total trade is on that basis. It would be a very sanguine man who would expect that these loans would be paid back in full, and with interest.

In this connection I should like to quote briefly from the observations of Mr. C. E. Gravel, president of the Banque Canadienne Nationale, who makes this significant comment:

> At first sight the situation and prospects of Canada's foreign trade appear to be satisfactory. But if the official figures are analysed it will be found that such progress is somewhat illusory. Besides ignoring the rise in prices, the statistics do not indicate that, since the end of hostilities, our exports have been, to the extent of 15 to 25 per cent, on the basis of long-term credits, the full repayment of which remains doubtful. What have the following years in store for us in this field?

With those sentiments I agree entirely.

Then, one other thing: until governments get out of the business of trying to conduct international trade, stability will not return. It is not the function of government by any stretch of—I was going to say anybody's imagination, but there are people who do imagine it is the function of government to act as a trading medium—I will say it is not the function of government to act as traders.

Trade was built in Canada by individuals, by firms, by these corporations which get so much abuse. And those corporations and individuals took the trouble to analyse the markets in which they were selling. They had the time and the ability to train personnel who knew what their markets wanted.

No government, no cabinet, no group of civil servants, no matter how expert, able and willing, can ever take the place of the individual who is studying the market for himself and, if I may be permitted to point out the one essential factor which is not understood by the socialists, using his own judgment and taking the risk.

Until we return to a basis whereby each individual trader carries out his own deal and arranges his own exchange through the once able facilities of the chartered banks, trade will be insecure. We shall not know from one month's end to the next what regulation, what government edict, or what prohibition will be enacted. That is the essential first step.

There is one further point I should like to mention with regard to a quid pro quo, and that is that we have been singularly generous throughout the world, but particularly so to the United Kingdom—and I believe in most instances, extremely justifiably so. But in the light of the difficulties we are having at the present time in obtaining stable markets for our raw materials in the United Kingdom, and finding the ability to purchase over there, it should be remembered, for instance, that we spent $14 million to provide aircraft on an interest-free loan for the British Overseas Airways Corporation. That may not seem a very great sum, but it is an example—and a high percentage of that was American dollars. This is $14 million for aircraft for an air line which will compete with our own, and it is given as an interest-free loan. It seems to me that if I were negotiating a loan I would have my minister of agriculture somewhere near, and I would perhaps say, "Let us see if we cannot sell some eggs for this" or "Let us see if we cannot sell some butter for this". Perhaps they did, but apparently not.

Mr. Rowe: They are not too good at that.

Mr. Adamson: I should like briefly to analyse our current situation. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) announced in the house the other day, with a degree of satisfaction, that our gold and United States dollars held at the present time amounted to $998 million.

Mr. Abbott: That was as of December 31.

Mr. Adamson: Yes, December 31. Are they up since then?

Mr. Abbott: They are not down.

Mr. Adamson: At the low point, which was December, 1947, just a few weeks after the austerity program was announced, the figure was $461 million. On those figures there would be a gain of $537 million in gold and hard currency. On the face of it that would seem to be satisfactory, but let us look at what happened in another period, a somewhat shorter period. We got Marshall aid for $600 million and we apparently—

Mr. Abbott: We did not get any Marshall aid.

Mr. Fulton: We certainly did.

Mr. Adamson: We got Marshall aid purchases.

Mr. Abbott: We got paid for $600 million worth of goods from Marshall aid funds.

Mr. Adamson: Six hundred million dollars.

Mr. Fulton: We got United States dollars.

Mr. Adamson: We got Marshall aid purchases; we got dollars; we got exactly $593 million.

Mr. Fulton: The minister should stop splitting hairs when he knows perfectly well what it means.

Mr. Abbott: Which is more than my hon. friend does.

Mr. Fulton: The minister is entitled to his own opinion, but I sometimes wonder who knows best.

Mr. Adamson: And then there was a United States loan of $150 million. On that basis we received $750 million in American dollars which could not under any circumstances be considered as a normal trade item.

Mr. Abbott: We loaned about $150 million.

Mr. Fulton: The minister should get up and make a statement about it some time and not leave us in the dark.

Mr. Adamson: That still leaves us with a much impaired position.

Mr. Abbott: A pretty good position.

[Mr. Rowe.]

An hon. Member: The minister does not like it.

Mr. Abbott: I will say he likes it.

Mr. Adamson: I do not know what the minister did with the $150 million he had left.

Mr. Abbott: It went to the United Kingdom and western Europe.

Mr. Adamson: You never can tell what happens. Even with the Marshall aid and the United States loan of $750 million and the gain of $537 million in our net hard currency and gold position we still show a deficit in normal trade, excluding Marshall aid, amounting to $213 million. If it had not been for the extreme generosity of the United States and the extraordinary contribution made by the European economic recovery program we would be in the hole to the extent of $213 million in our over all hard currency and gold position.

It should be remembered that the Marshall plan started in April, whereas the low point in our hard currency position was reached in December, 1947. Therefore if we were to take a figure on an annual basis it would be far worse.

We cannot count on Marshall aid continuously. As a matter of fact, Marshall aid will come to an end either next year or in 1951. I am not certain of the termination date or what will happen in Washington. Up to the end of January we received $650 million for offshore purchases for the European recovery program. To count that into our ordinary trading position and say that it is much better is a dangerous fallacy.

I want to take a brief look at our taxation and deal with the question of surpluses. The other day the minister mentioned that since the war we had reduced our funded debt by $900 million. That is a lot of money and perhaps that is good. But what about the surplus we had last year; what about the surplus we had the year before? Last year the surplus was approximately $600 million, and according to the usually accurate press it will be at least $700 million this year, possibly far more.

Mr. Abbott: Do not bet on that.

Mr. Adamson: I would not bet. Incidentally, I would not make betting a habit over there if I were the minister. Betting is one thing that I would eschew.

Mr. Rowe: Especially on by-elections.

Mr. Adamson: Anyway we have a $900 million retirement funded debt. Last year we had a surplus of $600 million and this year we shall have one of at least $700 million, or perhaps more. That means that in the last two fiscal years we have had surpluses amounting to $1,300 million; yet we have reduced the funded debt, according to the minister's statement, by only $900 million. What on earth happened to the $400 million?

Mr. Rowe: Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. Adamson: They would not have spent $400 million in Digby-Annapolis-Kings. Notwithstanding what the minister said, I know he could not have done that. Apparently a lot of money has disappeared. Whether there is a pronounced boom along the south bank of the St. Lawrence in Nicolet-Yamaska halfway between Montreal and Quebec I do not know, but still they could not get away with $400 million on one or even two by-elections.

We have this position: We have had two enormous surpluses and according to the minister's own statement our funded debt has been reduced by only $900 million since the war.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the non. member that his time is up.

Mr. Adamson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I shall finish with just two sentences. To continue controls in currency is like sliding down a greasy inclined plane into a crocodile pit. You hope the crocodiles will not eat you, but as far as recorded history goes anyone who has tried it has always been eaten by the crocodiles. That has been true from the days of Diocletian right up to the present time. I warn the minister that the economic crocodiles in the twentieth century are just as unpleasant as they were in Roman times.

Mr. H. E. Brunelle (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the program of the government for this session as enunciated in the speech from the throne is one that will affect every Canadian citizen once it is in operation. In the first place, family allowances, which have already contributed so much to raising the standard of living of the mass of people, will be increased and therefore the allowances will render still greater service.

My constituency of Champlain alone received during the last twelve months the sum of $1,145,232. That will present the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) with occasion for additional scorn for the baby bonus as a measure of iniquity and as an instrument of bribe, to use his own expressions.

On the other hand, I am glad that the income tax will be reduced. I hope that it will be considerably reduced, and the sooner the budget is brought down the better for all concerned. A great part of the national debt is made up of the cost of the last two wars. Those wars were fought, and the expenditures for them were incurred, for future generations as much as for the present generation, and although it is rather elementary, I submit that future generations should be called upon to pay their full share of those expenditures.

There are vast projects in the speech from the throne which will have a definite bearing on the future welfare and development of our country. For example, there is the St. Lawrence deep waterway, which will give employment to thousands and thousands of people not only during the time of construction but afterwards. It will provide more electrical power, which will mean more plants, more manufacturing, more industries in our country, and in turn more work for our industrial workers.

Besides the Trans-Canada highway, there is the all-important question of the entry of Newfoundland as a tenth province in our Canadian confederation. Situated as it is at the gateway of our country, this new province will be of great advantage to us. Some people look upon such national projects from the point of view of the duration of a man's life, whereas a nation's life should be considered in terms of centuries. Some will judge the new project in terms of dollars and cents. Some are saying that Canada is paying too much in this deal. I wish to remind those who have that view that in 1867, when the United States purchased from Russia the vast land of Alaska for $7,200,000, certain people thought that the United States was paying too much for that new land. That is less than one hundred years ago, but I wonder who would say now that the United States paid too much to acquire Alaska as a part of their territories.

I am glad the government is anxious as always to protect the farmers by finding new markets for agricultural products. Farmers are entitled to the continuous protection of governments owing to the fact that when it comes to organizing their forces they must meet almost insurmountable difficulties on account of the size of our country, and the varying geographical conditions. I regret that the dairy industry must now face the competition of margarine. I wish to remind everyone—and there are some in my province who do not seem to realize it yet—that for over fifty years the federal government protected the farmers by prohibiting the sale, manufacture and importation of margarine. It is only recently that our highest court has declared unconstitutional the federal law which banned margarine from our country. In declaring the federal law unconstitutional our highest court has followed the plea and recommendation of Mr. Beaulieu, solicitor for the Union Nationale government, who pretended that the federal law was unconstitutional, and that the regulation, manufacture and sale of margarine should be handled by the provinces. Mr. Beaulieu won the case for L'Union Nationale government, and also won margarine. The provinces will now have to look after the question of the regulation, manufacture, and sale of margarine, and while I hate to think it, I feel certain that margarine is now in Canada to stay.

I am glad to know that the Liberal program of social security and national services is being rapidly carried out by our able and aggressive Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). The 1948 plan for spending $150 million in five years is being effectively implemented, and a sum of nearly $4 million has been granted to the province of Quebec during the last four months. In my city of Cap de la Madeleine there is need for a hospital. The need has been recognized and this government is offering to give a minimum of $1,000 per bed. Therefore, if the hospital is built and has 250 rooms, this government is offering and is willing to pay the respectable sum of $250,000. The poor people of Canada will naturally profit by the generosity of the government in making these grants to improve the national health of our country.

The question of rent control is a matter which was taken over by this government during the war, and has been administered by it since the war. It is a provincial matter. The government, as in all other matters, is willing to allow the provincial governments to resume the exercise of their rights. Apparently those who form the government of my province, and the premier of my province, who usually has so much to say about provincial rights and autonomy, have not decided yet to do anything to regain the control of rents, although it is a provincial matter. If I had my way I would hand over rent control to that particular province, no matter what happened.

I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to say that I have always been desirous of respecting the rights and prerogatives of the provinces, and I am sure that every hon. member is anxious to respect those rights. I said "every hon. member." I hope I am right. Yet, speeches replete with hypocrisy, half-truths and plain falsehoods are being inflicted upon us by those so-called autonomists and opportunists of the day. They persist in saying to whoever will listen to them that the present federal government has been and is still invading provincial rights. That is not so. Let those who say this name one such invasion of provincial rights that has been made since the war. Be that as it may, there is real confusion in the minds of the people as to the respective rights of this government and of the provinces in certain matters, and this government is the victim of the confusion.

Last week the leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Drew) gave us a striking example of his supreme desire to keep up that confusion, hoping to draw from it some political advantage that somebody else has already drawn. For nearly two hours he tried to show one aspect of his mind in the matter of provincial-federal matters, and I now beg leave to show as best I can the other aspect of the hon. gentleman. I listened attentively to him and I came to the conclusion that he had fairly well played his very bad part in the first scene to which the speech from the throne gives rise. May I first say that frankness, dignity and self-respect will always win the general esteem of one's fellow man. On the other hand, to be false, to be arrogant and to be mean is fatal. I do not wish it said or thought that for one reason or another I exaggerate when I say that the leader of this government, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), enjoys the enviable reputation of being straightforward, humble, fair-minded and dignified. That applies to him in private as well as in public life.

The leader of the opposition, in his long speech last week, hardly touched upon any of the paragraphs of the speech from the throne. That was his business, and I have nothing to say about that. He chose to speak for over two hours on provincial-federal relations, placing great emphasis on his respect for provincial rights and on his great consideration for the prerogatives of the inhabitants of Quebec. I shall check that in a moment. In fact he laid what he considered to be a safe foundation for posing later as a friend and defender of the rights and prerogatives of myself and of my fellow men in Quebec. This is the impression he gave everybody when he spoke for over two hours last week. The leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) noticed it and referred to it in his speech. Again I say that was the business of the leader of the Conservative opposition, but it is also mine and I wish to say something about it. The trick was childish and manifest, but as it took the form of an offer of sympathy it became insulting, in view of what he would naturally expect in return.

When one can find motives in a man's words or actions it is easy to interpret those words and actions with accuracy, and I may say that sympathy which has its source in personal interest is of rather doubtful value. In recent years it has pained me to become aware of the inner sentiments of the leader of the opposition with regard to the people of my province. Of late, and last week in particular, a noticeable change was shown for the better, probably as a consequence of some instinctive need of sympathy. I speak in the name of my constituency, where the people are no different from the rest of the province of Quebec.

In Quebec, Mr. Speaker, we are all jealous of our rights and prerogatives, and we are all firmly opposed to a legislative union or to a central form of government in this country. I can say that I am just as firmly opposed to a legislative union as the premier of Quebec is himself, and I am sure that everybody in this house is just as opposed to a legislative union as is Mr. Duplessis. When the leader of the opposition last week expressed his own opposition to a legislative union, or to a form of one government only for our country, and when he gave, as an example of the demerits of an act of union, the Act of Union of 1840, I wish to say that he forgot to mention the fact that the Act of Union of 1840 was brought about against the will of the people of Quebec by a hostile group who wanted to drown us, and who wanted to quickly assimilate us. When the leader of the opposition said that he was opposed to such a legislative union I did not believe him because on other occasions, when he was free to speak his true mind, he said he was in favour of a different system. In order, as he says, to make the record clear, I wish to quote what he said, and until I indicate that my quotation is ended I shall be quoting from the Toronto Globe and Mail.

Mr. Sinclair: A great paper!

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Not accurate, but fulsome.

Mr. Brunelle: On the 10th of November, 1936, addressing the board of trade of Toronto, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said:

> Canada must eliminate the costly inefficiency of ten governments doing, in most cases, the job of one, or else sink in the rising tide of fascism.
> We must decide whether we are one nation or nine.

As for Canada, according to the Toronto Star, February 23, 1935:

> Harassed by debts, labour troubles, and conflict in company, insurance and labour laws, Col. Drew saw in one strong central government the solution instead of an utterly mad jigsaw puzzle of ten conflicting governments.

Note this well.

> If we were starting all over again, said Mr. Drew, who would be crazy enough to set up ten governments in Canada?

I believe the hon. member tried to give a different impression in the house the other day. By the way, it seems the present leader of the opposition resembles the late Lord Bennett in some ways, particularly in that he has all his faults. He seems to believe in concessions to be made to us. He seems to believe also in the great principle of a French minister who once said:

> La parole a été donnée à l'homme pour cacher sa pensée.

I might translate that in this way:

> The faculty of speech has been given to man so that he may more easily conceal his thoughts.

May I return to the question of concessions? We, in the province of Quebec, want no privileges. Once more, I should like to make it plain we do not beg for concessions; we only want the respect of our rights and prerogatives. The word "concession" is humiliating.

On the Plains of Abraham in 1759, when the French army was defeated, my forefathers were not disgraced nor dishonoured. The general of the English army, Wolfe, and the general of the French army, Montcalm, both died gloriously on the battlefield. Afterwards, a treaty was signed. Those who stayed in Canada after both armies had left became simply Canadians, irrespective of names, religion or language. Later difficulties came up, but no difficulty was found insurmountable. There were cases of conflict, but I say that the feelings of the descendants of those who lost the battle of the Plains of Abraham are cruelly hurt when someone holding a high position in our country tells them they are only a vanquished race and should be content with whatever concessions the victors condescend to give. I say that if anyone is guilty of that baseness he is marked by the people of the province of Quebec.

In our province, Mr. Speaker, I can say we are proud of our survival. Our feelings are more easily hurt because we are a minority with distinct but nonetheless respectable characteristics. In response to the implied, heartfelt offer of sympathy of the leader of the Tory party in this house, I simply say, "no", and I hope each one of my people will answer with a resounding "no", which will be heard in every part of Canada. Is anyone surprised at my assertion? If anyone is I wish to tell him I have just used the very words the leader of the opposition himself used in Ontario not very long ago when he was trying to stir up the feelings of the people of that province against the people of the province of Quebec.

In order to keep the record straight, I shall give you another quotation. When the leader of the opposition made the statement to which I have just referred he was speaking about family allowances. Referring to the Globe and Mail of August 10, 1944, I find he is reported to have said:

> But I assure you that the government of Ontario intends to do everything within its power to make sure that this iniquitous bill does not go into effect. It is not this bill alone, but the whole principle involved which we intend to resist.

That is a statement by Premier Drew, now leader of the opposition. According to the Toronto Star of August 10, 1944, he also said:

Are we going to permit the isolationist province of Quebec to dominate the destiny of a divided Canada? I hope that each one of you will answer with a resounding "no", which will be heard in every part of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is that the same man who is now leader of the opposition?

Mr. Brunelle: Yes. I do not wish to be an easy dupe, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure the people of my province are of the same mind.

To substantiate my reaction against intolerance, against arrogance, against concessions and other humiliations which always seem to come from the same class of people, I wish to call as a witness one who knew the Tories well because he was one of them. I wish to quote from a speech which was made, not years ago but during the last parliament, by Mr. J. S. Roy, who then represented the constituency of Gaspe. This speech was made on the 4th of November, 1941, and until I indicate that the quotation is ended, I am quoting from the 1941 Hansard, page 4058:

Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in order to make a statement with regard to my change of seat in this house. I am sure the house will be interested to know why I intend to follow hereafter an independent course in this parliament.

A political party is usually composed of men with the same principles, and among whom there is some friendship or brotherly spirit.

I omit a long paragraph and commence about the middle of the page.

The bonne entente between the two main elements of the Liberal-Conservative party gradually deteriorated. As time went on, French Canadian influence dwindled in the party. This was largely due to the demise of Sir John A. Macdonald. The Liberal party was strongly organized, and it manoeuvred the Conservative party into becoming an English Canadian party in which French Canadian sympathy was forcibly thrown into the background. The present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) cleverly followed Sir Wilfrid's tactics, and the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is using the Minister of Justice for all he is worth. Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Meighen were never able to control the element which is bent on wrecking our efforts to make Canada a country in which three million French Canadians will be considered. Mr. Bennett, now Lord Bennett, was the man who said we ought to be pleased with the concessions granted to us by English-speaking Canadians. He went back on the principles of the party which had put him in power, and did more than all the Liberals put together to shake public confidence in political conservatism.

Any French-Canadian member of this house who has mixed with the Conservative party as it now exists must realize that he is not a member of their political family. He is at best a tolerated stranger, accepted from necessity and looked at with a certain degree of curiosity. In the opinion of Conservative members he is and always will be a poor relation. His views of Canada are not their views; his ambition for more French-Canadian influence in our public life is not their ambition. They are firm in the opinion that we French Canadians are a source of trouble in their endeavours to make Canada an American England. There is no friendship or sympathy between them and us. I may add, however, that a good proportion of English-speaking Canadians, particularly the young generation, show us more sympathy, because they have a real sense of true Canadianism.

I have decided to leave them, and I did not do so hastily. For the past few months I have been in consultation with people in Quebec who all expressed the opinion that it is useless for the province of Quebec to make any further attempts to work hand in hand with the Conservative party. Warm sympathy, the main element, is lacking. You all remember the story of the man who called upon an acquaintance. He was first told that the man was not at home; he then forced the door, but he was received with a heap of abuse. He went a third time, when he was taken by the sheriff by the scruff of the neck and kicked down the verandah. He then said, "Well, I don't think that man wants to see me." Take out the violence and I think you will see there is something like that in the attitude of the Conservative organizers toward Quebec Conservatives.

I had intended to end my speech here—

Mr. Hackett: Your speech?

Mr. Brunelle: That is the end of the quotation.

Mr. Hackett: Yes; you mean that is the end of the quotation.

Mr. Brunelle: Apparently the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) was not here when I used a celebrated phrase of the hon. leader of the opposition in the matter of making quotations.

Mr. Hackett: Yes, I was here; and I thought it highly original on the hon. member's part.

(Translation):

Mr. Brunelle: Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, I shall add a few words in French. I want it understood that what I have just said in this house was devoid of any animosity whatever.

Mr. Hackett: No, it was all perfectly friendly!

Mr. Brunelle: I do not wish to offend anyone. If I have told truths which might have offended some, it must not be forgotten that they were taken from statements made in the house by the Progressive Conservative leader himself or by the former member for Gaspé.

The main object of my remarks was to be of some service to the youth of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear! hear!

Mr. Brunelle: I wish to prevent it from committing a fatal error.

I have tried to make our young people—gifted, ambitious, brilliant and truly capable of filling the highest posts in the public, political or social spheres—realize that the fact of being intolerant and arrogant may bar them from the high offices they seek to attain.

Our great statesmen, Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, remained at the helm for so long because they were, above all, human, and never hurt the feelings of either of our great racial groups.

The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent), the leader whom I have the honour to serve, follows in the footsteps of these great men. Now 67 years of age, Mr. St. Laurent has never hurt the feelings of anyone in this country. A true Canadian, proud of his origin, he is deeply respectful of those of others and frankly prepared to walk hand in hand with all men of good will. For these reasons, the Canadian people from coast to coast will place their trust in him.

On motion of Mr. Weir, the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall continue this debate.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 4, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

INCOME TAX

COMMUNICATION OF INFORMATION TO THE SENATE OR HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, this bill would add to section 121 of the new Income Tax Act the following words which are underlined in the bill:

Provided that nothing in this section shall operate to prevent a minister of the crown from communicating to the Senate or to the House of Commons any information with respect to corporations obtained under the provisions of this act.

The purpose of this amendment is to remove in part the restrictions as to secrecy imposed by section 121 of the Income Tax Act, which as it stands at present can have the effect of preventing a minister of the crown from giving the Senate or the House such information as it might be perfectly legitimate to ask for and obtain. No change is made by this bill in the matter of information obtained from personal income tax returns. Such information must still be kept secret. I may say that in this particular the bill is different from the one which I introduced last year and to which some objection was taken. On the other hand, this amendment would make it possible to make public any information respecting corporations obtained by the income tax division of the Department of National Revenue.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

ADVANCES BY WAY OF LOAN—EXTENSION OF LIFE OF THE CORPORATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act to provide authority for advances to the corporation by way of loan out of the consolidated revenue fund and to extend the time of operation of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT

AMENDMENTS TO IMPLEMENT TERMS OF UNION OF NEWFOUNDLAND WITH CANADA

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend several statutes to make them applicable to or otherwise conform with the Canadian confederation as and when Newfoundland becomes a province of Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—QUESTIONS AND NOTICES OF MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister when provision will be made for answering the sixty-nine questions now on the order paper, and for dealing with notices of motion for production of papers?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to take the question of the leader of the opposition as notice. I will discuss the matter with my colleagues and give an answer at the earliest opportunity.

REVISION OF STANDING ORDERS—RECOMMENDATIONS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF LAST SESSION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister? Has the government given consideration to recommending to the house the adoption of any of the proposed changes in standing orders that were recommended to the house last session by a committee of which Your Honour was chairman, and the report of which, as the Prime Minister will recall, was unanimous?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The government has been discussing the recommendations that were made by that committee, but feels that there should be informal discussions with the various groups in the house before deciding whether or not they should be brought forward during this session. It is a matter which does, of course, affect the way in which government business can be dealt with in the house, but primarily it affects the rights and privileges of members of the house. Therefore the government would not be disposed to recommend these modifications unless, after informal discussions, it appeared to be the desire of a large number of members of the house that an opportunity be afforded to discuss them.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister if any opportunity will be given to try out at this session, on an experimental basis, a change in the hours of sitting of the house by advancing the time of the sitting by, say, an hour?

Mr. St. Laurent: If I remember correctly that was one of the recommendations, and naturally it will be considered when the recommendations are before the house, if it is found desirable to bring them before the house.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

PROCEDURE IN AMENDMENT—REFERENCE TO RADIO BROADCAST BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is a matter which I suggest does require that some information be given to the house, in view of other proceedings which will be taking place. In a radio speech last night the Prime Minister said, in part:

> You all know that the terms of confederation are set out in the British North America Act. That act is the foundation of the Canadian union. The British North America Act is a most important part of the Canadian constitution. But it is also a statute of the British parliament. Every time we Canadians want any change made in the British North America Act we have to go through the form of getting the change made by the parliament of the United Kingdom. As a Canadian I do not like to have to do that. What is more, I feel sure, the United Kingdom parliament does not like it either. I believe we Canadians should work out a method of making our constitutional changes right here in Canada.

In view of the fact that certain matters are before the house which may well raise a question as to the necessity of amendment of the British North America Act, I believe the house should be informed this afternoon whether it is the intention of the government to take proceedings which would have the result of empowering the parliament of Canada to change our constitution, and if so, whether that is to be done without consulting the provincial governments.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no one could contemplate anything of that kind without consulting the provincial governments. As the leader of the opposition knows, there was a consultation with the provincial governments ten or twelve years ago, perhaps more than that. The negotiations reached a stage where it was required to have the provincial governments consider the situation as it had developed throughout the conference. While that consideration was being given by some of the provincial governments, there was a provincial election in my province which brought about a change in government, and the matter dropped. The procedure which I believe would be required to deal with a question of the kind would be similar to that which was followed at that time, some twelve or fourteen years ago.

Mr. Drew: May we take it, then, that it is not the intention of the government to deal with this subject during the current session?

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh, no. I do not think it would be possible to complete the preliminary negotiations which would be required to give to this matter the serious consideration it deserves, in time to enable us to have anything for parliament to consider at this session. It is probably one of the most serious steps since confederation for the people of Canada to contemplate. I think it would be desirable, if we can find a method that would satisfy the two requirements I mentioned in my radio broadcast last night, to have the power to deal with constitutional amendments here. But I pointed out that on the one hand we would not want a constitution so rigid that it would be a strait-jacket on the Canadian people and prevent the proper development of our national personality, and on the other hand there would have to be the most positive safeguard for all the historic rights which are to a certain extent safeguarded by the act as it exists at present.

Mr. Coldwell: I was going to ask the same question.

BERLIN

PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN MAINTENANCE OF AIR OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I am not taking any part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, but I want to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I understood him to say that Canada has taken no part in the maintenance of air supremacy at Berlin because it was not invited to do so. As I understand it, the government is not taking any part, although the Canadian Legion have asked the government to do so. As I see it, if the west is driven out of Berlin—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Church:—we will lose supremacy of the seas. Is the minister prepared to make a statement on the question?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am not quite sure whether I understood the exact purport of the hon. gentleman's question. I should like to answer it, but I would wish to answer it correctly. I think I had better wait until I see it in Hansard and answer it at the first available opportunity.

PASSPORTS

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST IMPROPER USE—RENEWALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): In view of recent press reports indicating that there is racketeering in and fraudulent use of passports, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs make a statement as to what steps his department is taking to guard against the improper use of Canadian passports?

Hon L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member was good enough to advise me of his intention to ask this question. I have been able to get some information bearing on the point which he has raised. The inquiries I have been able to make—they have not yet been exhaustive—do not bear out the suggestion that there has been extensive racketeering in Canadian passports. The present procedure is that an applicant for a Canadian passport is required to complete an application form which contains information as to his name in full, occupation, place of residence, and citizenship. He also gives such physical description as will reasonably ensure his identification. A photograph of the applicant is attached to the application form. Attached to the form also is a declaration to be completed by one of a number of classes of persons who may themselves readily be identified in the community. The person who makes this declaration must certify that he has known the applicant, and must identify the photograph. Heavy penalties are provided by law in the case of a person who misrepresents or conceals the facts in making application for a passport, or who falsely represents himself to be a Canadian.

No indication of any widespread impropriety in the use of Canadian passports has been revealed. Nevertheless the officers of my department are constantly on the alert for abuses, and are taking the necessary corrective or precautionary measures.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to follow up that question by asking the minister another. Why is it that since January 1 no renewals have been allowed, that those applying for renewals have had to take out new passports?

Mr. Pearson: I cannot give the answer to that question at the moment, but I shall get the information and give it to the hon. member later.

OLEOMARGARINE

QUESTION AS TO PROTECTION OF CONSUMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Assiniboia): Is the government taking any steps under the pure food laws to protect consumers from fraud through the unrestricted sale of margarine?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The answer is yes.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): If I may ask a further question, will the minister tell the house what steps are being taken?

Mr. Martin: Under the authority of the Food and Drugs Act the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare, in the food and drugs division, are watching this product, and all others offered for sale to the consuming public, to make sure that no substance or product is offered which is injurious to health.

ALBERTA LIBERALS

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT OF MR. WINTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), based on an article which appeared in the press yesterday, coming from the Canadian Press, under date of February 2, and emanating from Calgary. The article reads in part as follows:

In an address before more than two hundred delegates attending the annual convention of the Alberta Liberal Association, Mr. Winters said—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows it is against the rules to read from newspaper clippings when asking questions on the orders of the day. He should not give information to the house; he should ask for information.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fair: Then I need not quote the article, but in effect the minister stated that at least seventy-five per cent of the people of Canada are Liberals at heart.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fair: Then he went on to say, "They are ours for the asking; let's go out and get them." Based on that, I wonder if the minister would care to venture a guess as to what will be the success of his party in the province of Alberta at the next election.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): After visiting that convention, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I was a little modest in my estimate.

HOUSING

STATEMENT AS TO COMPLETION OF PROJECT IN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I should like to reply to a question asked on Monday last by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), as to the steps being taken to see that the houses of the Bow River Construction Company at Calgary are completed.

The answer is that although the lending institution and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are mortgagees only and are not parties to the contractual relationship between the builder and the veteran, every effort has been made to find a solution which will allow this project, now in default, to proceed. In the case of owners in possession, an offer has been made to increase the mortgages so that they may pay the liens and complete the houses. Where veterans take advantage of this offer it should be possible to effect a satisfactory solution. For those not yet in possession because the houses are incomplete, the lending institution has offered to buy the purchasers' equity.

Although the houses cannot be completed until financial arrangements are made by the purchasers, every effort is being made to find a way to bring the project to completion.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): If I may ask the minister a supplementary question, I should like to know who appointed the contractor and what inquiry was made with respect to his ability, either by practice or his financial position, to carry out the project?

Mr. Winters: I believe a similar question is on the order paper; at any rate I will take this as notice.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Can the minister not tell me now?

[Mr. Speaker.]

PRIZE MONEY

DISTRIBUTION BETWEEN NAVY AND AIR FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Will the Minister of National Defence, either now or at an early date, make a statement as to the distribution of the $3,000,000 in prize money resulting from the disposition of enemy vessels captured by the navy during the war? I may say I have information that there are a number of complaints with regard to—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I can answer the hon. member by saying the government has decided to bring before parliament a measure to provide for the distribution of prize money received from the pool of prize money obtained from the capture of enemy ships by the nations of the British commonwealth. The share of the total pool which will be received by Canada and payable in Canada will be divided in the proportion of 68 per cent to the navy, and 32 per cent to the air force, which, as hon. members know, participated in the destruction of many enemy ships. The exact form of the measure to be brought before parliament has not yet been determined, because this decision has just been arrived at; but it will provide for the payment of the sums of money to the Royal Canadian naval benevolent fund, in respect of the navy's share, and to the Royal Canadian Air Force benevolent fund in respect of the air force's share.

Some hon. Members: Where does the army come in?

Mr. Claxton: The army did not share in the destruction of any ships at sea that we know of; their work was on land.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Will the minister consider making a contribution from this money to the army benevolent fund, because of the fact that the army captured many of the bases and airfields from which the air force and the navy were able to operate?

Mr. Claxton: No, Mr. Speaker; no such consideration will be given.

COARSE GRAINS

QUESTION AS TO MEASURE FOR MARKETING BY WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ronald Moore (Churchill): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or his parliamentary assistant. In view of the fact that the government passed legislation in 1948 to provide for the marketing of coarse grains through the wheat board, is the minister in a position to say whether the government intends to proclaim this legislation in 1949?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): This question involves a pronouncement of government policy, and I am afraid I shall have to leave it for the minister.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my first words in this debate, indeed my first words in any debate in this house, must be those of appreciation for the privilege of representing the riding of Algoma East. In this riding live friendly and industrious people. It is a riding of great undeveloped resources, of beauty of lake and stream and mountain, which makes it a tourist's paradise. I have been given a very difficult task in succeeding, as member for Algoma East, a man who has now been translated to another place and who held for so long the confidence of his constituents. I shall do my best, Mr. Speaker, to follow his example, both in service to his constituents and in his ability to sit here for so long a time. I already realize there is a connection between those two things.

I should also like to add my very warm congratulations to those that have gone before, to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I assume there will be a debate on external policy later in this session and possibly a debate devoted more particularly to the ratification of the North Atlantic pact. Much, therefore, of what I should like to say in regard to external affairs generally will have to be reserved for those occasions. Today, I should like to attempt to do two things. In the first place, I should like to deal with some of the points that have been raised in this debate concerning international matters. Secondly, I should like to make a few general observations on the international picture with particular reference to communism and the proposed Atlantic pact, both of which are mentioned in the speech from the throne.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) in his speech suggested, if I correctly understood him, that it was a mistake for Canada to become a member of the United Nations, and that the reference in the speech from the throne to the Atlantic pact constituted an admission by the government of this error in judgment. If I interpret him correctly, he seems to think that the weakness of the United Nations is due to some fault in its structure, and that the members of his group discerned the inadequacy of the United Nations when the charter was signed. No one claims or has ever claimed, Mr. Speaker, that the United Nations charter is a perfect document.

On many occasions this government has expressed the hope that the United Nations will be improved in many respects. The basic difficulty, however, which the United Nations encounters at the moment is not constitutional but political. The unsolved problems which divide the soviet union from the rest of the world today make it impossible, under the present circumstances, for the organization to fulfil all the purposes, or indeed most of the purposes, for which it was designed. It is precisely for this reason that the government is now giving its support to the discussions which are taking place in regard to the North Atlantic pact. By that fact we do not, however, admit that we were wrong in signing the United Nations charter in 1945 or that we are wrong in supporting the United Nations in 1949.

The hon. member for Peace River raised certain other points to which I may just refer, though I am afraid I cannot deal with them in detail. He stated that the unfortunate situation in Berlin, at the present time blockaded, with no corridor leading to the west, could not have been the result of stupidity some years ago, but he suggested it might have been, in part at least, due to the influence of perfidious civil servants. I think those were the words he used. These civil servants, he implied, may have been responsible at that time for keeping Great Britain and the United States out of Berlin and permitting the Russians to enter ahead of them before the end of the war. It has been pointed out on numerous occasions, Mr. Speaker, that that particular decision which resulted in the occupation of Berlin by the soviet union was made not by civil servants, perfidious or otherwise, but by the supreme commander himself, General Eisenhower.

The hon. member also referred somewhat critically to his experience in Germany when he witnessed the dismantling of a steel plant which was going to Yugoslavia. The house will recognize of course that, since Canada is not an occupying power in Germany, we are not directly concerned with these matters which fall within the province of Great Britain, France and the United States. I believe the hon. member said this was a matter about which I should be informing myself and, therefore, I should like merely to tell him that, in my opinion, this might well have been a legitimate procedure because reparations from Germany were worked out at an international conference at which an overriding agency was set up on reparations to be levied on Germany. These reparations were to be divided by percentages among the eighteen active belligerents. These belligerents were entitled to take their share, and no doubt this was part of Yugoslavia's share, Yugoslavia having been a devastated country.

The hon. member then referred to the question of steel scrap in the Ruhr valley and the many millions of tons which were lying there idle. He believed that steps should be taken to get it out of Germany. Such steps are being taken. I believe the day before he arrived in Germany, early in October, an agreement had been reached between the United Kingdom and the United States by which 500,000 tons of this scrap was to be sent to each of those countries, and 225,000 tons to the other countries. It is hoped that within the present year more than two million tons of this scrap will have left Germany. Indeed, it is hoped some of it will come to Canada.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) asked if we could state the views of the government on the situation in the Pacific. He believed the House of Commons was entitled to have those views at a time when we were talking so much about the Atlantic. I would remind the house that last year in the discussion on external affairs there was a very complete statement by the then Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). At that time, he dealt with the Pacific, and I hope there will be an opportunity at this session for me to go into greater detail on this subject than at present. I should like to quote one sentence from a statement made last year by our present Prime Minister when he said:

> It is also the view of the Canadian government that the immediate menace of communism in the far east should not be met by the restoration of Japan to a position of such power she could once again become a threat to peace.

That remains the policy of the Canadian government.

The hon. member for Vancouver South, not unnaturally, was somewhat perturbed lest the preoccupation of the government with the Atlantic pact might indicate we were not alive to our responsibilities in the Pacific. I can assure him, however, there is no better way of ensuring the security of the Pacific ocean at this particular moment than by working out, between the great democratic powers, a security arrangement the effects of which will be felt all over the world, including the Pacific area. Our preoccupation at the moment with the North Atlantic alliance does not suggest that the government need do nothing in regard to the Pacific. We are, in fact, actively participating in the far eastern commission. We maintain a diplomatic mission in Tokyo. We took part in the commonwealth discussions in 1947 in Canberra. In various other ways, we are participating in Pacific affairs.

In his remarks the hon. member for Vancouver South referred to newspaper reports which stated that some Pacific bloc was being formed. He wondered why the government had not made any announcement in regard to that situation. I can tell him and the house that, so far as we are concerned, no proposals of that kind have been made to us by any government. We have no knowledge whatever of proposals for a Pacific alliance, nor have we been asked to give our blessing to any such proposals. The statement which he read, and which I have also seen, was a purely speculative one and, so far as we know, had no foundation at all.

To deal with more general subjects now, Mr. Speaker, I should like for a short time to give the house a review—and it can be only a cursory review at this time—of the international position as I see it. Naturally that position still gives cause for much anxiety. However, the situation should be considered, I suggest, without panic but without illusions. There is no doubt that fear has gripped the world again, fear arising primarily out of the extension of the brutal domination of revolutionary communism, based on the massive and expanding militarism of totalitarian Russia.

As yet, though there is still no ground for undue optimism, there has been, I think it is safe to say, an easing of the tension in recent months. Hon. members, and in fact the people throughout this country, will be asking themselves the question, why is that? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is certainly not due to the so-called peace overtures which have recently been made in Moscow, in Rome and in Paris, by communist leaders. To my mind it would, of course, be folly and even worse to reject or discourage any genuine move toward a peaceful solution of the problems that divide the world today between the democratic west and the totalitarian east. In this connection the house, and I am sure the country, will have read with much interest the answers given recently by the head of the soviet government to certain questions asked him by a United States newspaper correspondent. I suggest that we should be careful, in our reaction to these answers, not to confuse words with deeds or to be lured by them into wishful thinking. There is no doubt that much of the icy dread and fear in the world today would tend to melt away under the warm radiance of Mr. Stalin's smile if he could only hold it, and if it were the smile of genuine friendship. But Mr. Stalin himself has said that "there is no logic stronger than the logic of facts." That is true, and I think it can be applied to statements which come from Moscow or indeed from any other capital. The leader of the soviet government also once said to a journalist:

> The export of revolution?—that is nonsense.

But to his own people he has said in the soviet bible, which is called Problems of Leninism:

> The goal is to consolidate the dictatorship of the proletariat in one country, using it as a base for the overthrow of imperialism—

—that is noncommunism—

> —in all countries.

The people of Czechoslovakia know which of these statements is true. The leader of Russia and his followers in the various countries may now be willing to issue conciliatory statements. Of course, we should not go out of our way to rebuff them but at the same time we should not forget, in our anxiety to go far beyond half way to meet peace, that those leaders have affirmed and reaffirmed that it is inconceivable that communism and the soviet republic should continue to exist indefinitely side by side with capitalistic states. "Ultimately", Mr. Stalin has said, "one or the other must conquer." By peaceful means? There is nothing of this in the communist dogma. Let me quote again from Stalin. He said:

> Transition from capitalism to socialism can be accomplished not by means of slow change, not by means of reform, but by means of revolution.

In bringing about this revolution, tactics of course may change and misleading answers may be given to questions asked by American journalists, and which the soviet people are not allowed to see; but the strategy outlined above remains fixed and consistent. Again to quote Stalin, and I think this is the last time that I shall have to draw on his speeches or books in this speech of mine, he said:

> . . . Tactics change dozens of times, whereas the strategical plans remain unchanged. Tactics deal with the forms of struggle and the forms of organization of the proletariat, with their changes and combinations . . . The object of this strategy is to gain time, to demoralize the enemy, and to accumulate forces in order later to assume the offensive.

Is it any wonder, therefore, that the western world looks to the future with anxiety?

Men of good will continually and rightly hope for a basic change in the relations of soviet Russia with the noncommunist world. But easy optimism and self-delusion are disastrous substitutes for cool analysis and consistent policies. The door to real co-operation should always be open but not to admit Trojan horses.

If then, Mr. Speaker, the tension has recently decreased—and I think it has—it is not because of words which have come out of Moscow or because of any fundamental alteration in communist doctrine. It is because of the policy of steady but unprovocative resistance to communist aggression; of progress toward an Atlantic security league; of the steps taken to restore the military and economic strength of western Europe. These policies are working and they may have provoked one of those recurring changes in communist tactics of which we have had examples in the past.

We may welcome any such change, but we should not permit it to divert us from the course that may well have brought about the change. We should keep on the road which the democracies have recently been following and which is the best road to peace.

We must continue the policy of deepening and broadening the basis of economic and social co-operation between free democratic states; of pressing forward toward economic and social justice within our own states. By showing that democracy can contribute more to the dignity and well-being of the citizen than communism can ever hope to do, we are making our best ultimate contribution to the defence, the "home defence", against communism. This, however, will not be effective if we rely exclusively on the building up of armed forces or if we allow ourselves to be frightened into reaction and repression. In every country the communists have two great allies, social and economic injustice on the one hand, and political reaction on the other. If we can destroy these allies and build up a strong, healthy, and progressive society on a democratic foundation, we can destroy communism. That should be, I suggest, our purpose and our objective.

But, while we are attempting to reach this objective, immediate protection is necessary against aggressive forces outside our country allied to subversive forces within it. If these aggressive forces should lead the world once again into war in a struggle between totalitarian communism and our Christian democratic way of life, Canada, in my view, could not and should not remain aloof. If we attempted to do so and the other free democracies, including our two mother countries and our neighbour, were involved, as they would be, what would happen then?

Leaving aside for the moment the diplomatic and strategic strain that this would put on relationship with our mother countries and our neighbour, isolation would split our own country wide open in a way which we have avoided happily, but not too easily, in two world wars. It would be the end of Canadian unity, and therefore it would be the end of the Canadian nation. For this reason alone, Mr. Speaker, and quite apart from the fact that the next war, if we permit it to occur, would make the last one like a militia skirmish, the foreign policy of this government must be directed to one single end, the avoidance by every means within its power of this atomic catastrophe.

How can we do this? By burying our heads in the snow and allowing others to make the decisions, without our participation, which would bind us in spite of ourselves? There is no safety there. Or relying wholly on the United Nations? That to my mind would be clearly unrealistic, because that body, though it must remain the basis of our policy on international co-operation, and we should spare no effort to improve and strengthen it, remains, under present circumstances, quite unable to provide the means by which any country can ensure its security; nor does it, in present circumstances, provide an effective instrument for use in removing the causes of war.

What is the remedy, then? Surely, Mr. Speaker, the best way to minimize the possibility of war is for the free nations to stand together on a regional basis, and, by doing so, to make it clear that no aggressor has any possible chance of winning any war which he may be tempted to start. It is necessary to accumulate enough force now to preserve freedom in order that ultimately freedom can be preserved without force. This force must be organized in such a way as to ensure that it will guarantee that the free nations cannot be defeated one by one. This is the policy, sir, which I think would have prevented war in 1914 and in 1939. It is our best hope of preventing war in the years ahead. It is a policy of peace.

In the pursuit of this policy, the government has been for some months now negotiating with other north Atlantic countries who share our democratic ideals a treaty for collective defence, which would strengthen the national security of each of the participants. I hope that these discussions, which have been taking place in Washington on an ambassadorial level, will soon be concluded, and that the representatives who have been participating in them will be able to submit to their governments a complete draft of a north Atlantic treaty, which in its essentials at least can, I hope, be made public at the same time that it is submitted to governments. The next stage will be a careful study by each government, and careful examination by the public opinion of each country, of the principles embodied in this draft. Amendments can be submitted, and then a conference will be held at which I hope the treaty can be signed. It would then be for each government to submit the treaty to its legislature, in the democratic way, for approval or rejection.

What has been said about this proposed Atlantic pact in the present debate, Mr. Speaker? The leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) has declared that his party agrees that Canada should support and join such a north Atlantic pact. Similarly the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) said the other night:

> We of the Social Credit organization favour the Atlantic pact and support it.

There is, however, Mr. Speaker, a serious omission in the unanimity with which this matter is otherwise regarded in the house in that no single Progressive Conservative member has so much as mentioned the pact. I think I am not strictly accurate in that statement, because the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) did mention it. He said that he thought we were busy on it. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew), the leader of the official opposition, went back two thousand years and talked about the Achaean league, which he seemed to think was a federal state, but he had not a word to say about the Atlantic league of 1949. In his opening speech, all that the leader of the Conservative party had to say about international affairs was:

> No one will disagree with the fact that the first concern of this and every other government and every other parliamentary body is to do everything humanly possible to preserve the peace and to protect the people in the country which it serves.

That of course is quite true and very well said; but why this omission? Why no reference of any kind to this very important measure which is forecast in the speech from the throne? Is this parliament not united in the objectives that we are seeking through this pact? Or are any of us playing politics with peace at this time?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Would the hon. member permit one question?

Mr. Graydon: The first speech and he plays politics.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Will the minister permit one question? In view of the fact that foreign policy has been a matter of co-operation of all parties, does the minister think he is doing any good now by making this a political issue?

Mr. Graydon: We expected more of him than this.

Mr. Abbott: Suppose you listen to the answer.

Mr. Pearson: It is because I think and hope that the foreign policy of this country can be the foreign policy of all parties in this house and of all sections of opinion in this country that I am so disappointed that no reference to this important aspect of foreign policy was mentioned in any speech from the other side of the house. I agree that foreign policy should be as nonpartisan as is consistent with responsible government and I hope it will continue that way.

Mr. Graydon: That is a poor way to start.

Mr. Fleming: Why did the government cut off the debate?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I remind hon. members that the hon. member who has the floor should not be interrupted without his permission.

Mr. Graydon: That is bargain-counter politics; that is all.

Mr. Sinclair: The big foreign affairs expert.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Cheap playing with the nation's future.

Mr. Pearson: The reason I mentioned this particular matter, and this important omission, is that it seemed to me that I have been reading about and hearing about speeches on foreign policy made in other parts of this country which are far removed indeed from some of the statements that have been made in this house. That is why I express the hope once again that we will not play politics with peace in this house.

Mr. Graydon: Hear, hear; give us an example of that. The minister had better set the example on that.

Mr. Pearson: I have known the hon. member for Peel for a long time, and I do not think he believes for a minute that he is going to be able to intimidate me or throw me off my balance.

Mr. Graydon: He won't show you how to play politics.

Mr. Pearson: He used to be so effective, Mr. Speaker, in our college debating society. May I return to the main stream of my remarks. May I mention to the house certain principles which have guided the Washington discussions about which I have just spoken, and which will be embodied in the resulting treaty. In the first place, this pact will be a regional agreement, if it is concluded, under the united nations charter. It should be subject to the provisions of the charter and it should be registered with the United Nations, which it is designed not to replace but to supplement. Indeed, if by some chance the security council of the United Nations should become an effective body for the preservation of peace, then our Atlantic pact would be unnecessary and it could be allowed to disappear.

We should also make sure that the Atlantic pact does not become merely a screen for narrow nationalist suspicions and fears; an instrument of unimaginative militarism or an agency of power politics or imperialistic ambitions of any of its members. In this respect I agree entirely with what was said the other evening by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I feel strongly, as he does and as I am sure all hon. members do, that this regional association must be far more than a military alliance. It must make a collective contribution to the social and economic betterment of the peoples of its member states.

In the past, alliances and leagues have always been formed to meet emergencies and have dissolved as the emergencies vanished. It must not be so this time. Our Atlantic union must have a deeper meaning and deeper roots. It must create the conditions for a kind of co-operation which goes beyond the immediate emergency. Threats to peace may bring our Atlantic pact into existence. Its contribution to welfare and progress may determine how long it is to survive. The Canadian government, therefore, attaches great importance to the part which the pact may play in the encouragement of peacetime co-operation between the signatories in the economic, social and cultural fields.

There is another point and it is for us an important one. The parliament of Canada, when the time comes, must be in a position to take its decision, in regard to this proposed security pact, deliberately and in full knowledge of what it means. The nature of the obligations which we undertake must be clear. Further, our own constitutional processes by which we call these obligations into action must be preserved. There must be mutual confidence and mutual trust in the will and ability of each member of the league to discharge its responsibilities. This mutual confidence is something which we do not now find in the United Nations, and it is a fatal defect in that organization at the present time. In our Atlantic league we can hope that the situation will be different.

Canada's obligation under this pact, however, must be within the measure of our resources and as part of the plans agreed to by all and by which each member of the group does the job for which it is best qualified. If I were asked now what precisely those obligations will be, what they will involve, I would have to reply that I am not at the moment in a position to answer. But I can say this: The pact will be a group insurance policy and group insurance is cheaper and more effective than any individual policy.

Finally, every member of the group must share in all the decisions of the group even though we may recognize that the greater responsibility of some in carrying out these decisions must give their views special weight in reaching them. The treaty must therefore establish a constitutional basis by which that which concerns all is decided by all. Canada is no satellite of any country and would not be one in this association. If Canada is to be asked to share the obligations of the group, it must also share in the responsibility for determining how those obligations shall be met. On no other basis could Canada, or indeed any self-respecting state, sign such a pact.

On the other hand, it is by full partnership in a group of this kind that we can best hope to exert any influence which we possess to ensure that peaceful policies are followed by all its members.

This Atlantic pact, if we can bring it to a successful conclusion, does not give us the certainty of peace. No pact, no human achievement can do that. But it may give us a chance to establish peace in the future; and it is essential to our security in the present. It is certainly our best hope now for the prevention of aggression. It is our best hope for the establishment of relations between the two worlds on a basis, if not of friendship, at least of mutual toleration. That would give us time for men's minds to change and their souls to be freed so that toleration may turn to something better. That is all that we can ask for at this time from an Atlantic pact, but that is much and I think it is within our grasp.

In this breathing space which we may now secure, there will be time to resolve the eternal struggle that goes on between conflict and co-operation; the paradox of good in the midst of evil, of life in the midst of death. That paradox, and the utter futility of war as a method of resolving it, was never more dramatically illustrated than by the fact that the same bombers and bomber pilots who smashed Berlin and its people in 1945 are keeping those people alive in 1949.

There is nothing inevitable about war; there is nothing unchangeable about evil. If we of the free world can pursue the firm and constructive policies of resistance to communism that are now in train, refusing to be dazzled by the delusions of appeasement or stampeded by the rash counsels of panicky men, we may emerge from this wasteland of our post-war world into greener fields.

I feel certain that the people of Canada will support this Atlantic pact because it can lead us just in that direction. They will support it, not primarily because under it they can successfully wage war but because it will help them successfully to wage peace.

We Canadians know that, no matter how great the effort we make, how large the armed force we may try to build up, how peacefully we may behave, we cannot preserve our security and maintain our freedom by our own unaided efforts. To do this we must join our fortunes with those of the other north Atlantic democracies.

This is for us a new venture. But it is also a new adventure. It is an adventure in the building of a new community—the north Atlantic community. This year 1949 is an historic one for Canada. By union with Newfoundland we shall complete the work of confederation begun long ago. By helping to create a north Atlantic pact we shall have begun the work of uniting the north Atlantic community.

Mr. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be of appreciation for the kindly greetings which have been extended to me by all members of the house regardless of the side upon which they sit. In that connection I should like particularly to express my personal appreciation of the greetings tendered me by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). These are things that shall never be forgotten. I realize that some of these expressions may be tinged with regret, but I realize also that they are nonetheless sincere and they certainly are most welcome.

If it were not for the ordeal confronting me I would think that this was a most pleasant place in which to find one's self. I am sure that I have the sympathy of all those who have preceded me in this rather trying experience.

I appreciate that on an occasion such as this one does not engage in partisan political discussion. I trust I will have the indulgence and forbearance of the house. I should also like to express my best wishes and congratulations to those other fellow sufferers of the other afternoon who were introduced to the house prior to myself. I am sure that like myself they found the walk from the door to the clerk's table one of the longest walks upon which they ever entered in their lifetime.

I think most of them have already participated in the debates of the House of Commons despite the fact that only a little over one week has elapsed. I wish to congratulate all of them and express my good wishes to them, although I do not want that remark to indicate my agreement with all the remarks of the last speaker, who, I think, very unfortunately interjected a political atmosphere into something which should be absolutely devoid of politics. Perhaps it would not be amiss to remind the hon. gentleman that those on this side of the house, in order to keep external affairs out of politics, sedulously avoided contesting the election so that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) might enter the house as he did.

I understand it is appropriate at this time to make some passing reference to the constituency which one has the honour to represent. If I embarked upon that course it would exhaust the time that is allotted to me. Therefore I will simply say in passing that my constituency is a sort of microcosm of Canada. The home of the first government of Canada was in my constituency. It is the land of Evangeline, the background for the expulsion of the Acadians. I am sure that British Columbia members will admit that we grow the finest apples in the world. I will proceed to other matters without further remarks on that score.

There are various matters of local interest to which I should like to refer. I think we all appreciate that an occasion such as this is perhaps not the best time to deal with them. There are many that perhaps would be dealt with better when the estimates are before the house. I do not intend to enter upon a discussion of local matters to any greater extent than necessary. It is true, however, that the result of the election in my riding was, to some extent, determined by the fact that the people wanted certain protests uttered, and certain demands brought before the House of Commons.

With your permission I should like to refer for a few moments to matters which, although of local interest, may have some interest outside of my own constituency. I should like to say something about our fishermen. When I say "fishermen" I do not mean the fishermen of the riding of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) who go out on the banks in schooners. I wish to deal with inshore fishermen only.

We have many of them in my constituency. During the last few years United States trawlers have dragged along the coast line of the United States until the fishing grounds there are certainly depleted. Whether that is due to this or other causes may be a matter for argument. As a result, United States trawlers are now appearing off our own coast in ever-increasing numbers. The livelihood of the inshore fishermen of my constituency and of the maritimes—I know nothing about the west—is threatened because of this practice. As I understand it, under international law these heavy United States trawlers can drag to within three miles of our coast line. Yet Canadian trawlers, built with Canadian money and manned by Canadian crews, are prevented by government policy—and, I suggest, proper policy—from fishing within twelve miles of our coast. I suggest that it is a rather anomalous situation that Canadian fishing vessels, manned by Canadian seamen, should be prevented from fishing within twelve miles of our coast, whereas United States fishermen on United States trawlers are permitted to fish within three miles of our coast. It is a situation which should be rectified.

Not too many years ago, the Department of Justice was not slow in moving the three-mile limit out to twelve miles when it was a question of catching rum-runners hovering off the coasts of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. During the first great war the navy decided to scrap the old three-mile limit and move it out to twelve miles. I believe this is a matter with which the government should deal. It is my understanding that at the present time there is proceeding an international conference on fisheries. I would suggest to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, who I know, has a tremendous interest in the matter, that this question should be taken up at that conference and some arrangement made concerning it. If that is not possible, then I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if this is not a proper matter for negotiation with Washington. It must be done, and it can be done. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs undoubtedly knows, in so far as the bay of Fundy is concerned, this is an open question. If you read the correspondence between Mr. Bacon, who was Secretary of State at Washington, and Lord Bryce, you will find that the British claimed the bay of Fundy was coastal waters, and the United States said it was a part of the high seas. They both agreed to disagree, and to keep the matter open for future reference. I suggest that the time has now come to settle this matter once and for all, and I urge upon the government the necessity of taking action which will avoid the absolute ruin of our inshore fishermen.

Nor is that all of the trawler story. Not only are United States trawlers fishing outside the three-mile limit, but persistently and consistently they are fishing inside that limit—under cover of darkness, and sometimes in broad daylight. They drift to within a short distance of our coast line. As a matter of fact, on more than one occasion lobster traps set within a few hundred yards of our coast line have been caught up by the trawls of United States trawlers. This matter has caused a great deal of concern to Canadian fishermen. It is bad enough to have the three-mile limit, but not to be able to enforce it is something which causes dissatisfaction. The reason for that is that we have in that area only one small, old and inefficient patrol boat, the Capelin. In a stiff breeze no self-respecting sailor would embark upon her because he would realize that he was risking his life. That boat has to tie up at night because it cannot patrol after dark. Representations were made to me by the fishermen a short time ago. I took up the matter with the Department of Fisheries, and as a result of my representations the superintendent of the fisheries department at Moncton sent the big patrol boat, the Cygnus, down to the bay of Fundy. I am sure that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Minister of Fisheries know what result attended upon that. On its first patrol of the bay of Fundy the Cygnus caught a United States trawler within two and a half miles of the Nova Scotia coast line.

If one had the time it would be rather interesting to read the newspaper stories which appeared last week concerning this matter. The first day there was a glaring headline announcing the seizure, and a picture of the boat with men of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police guarding it. The next day the statement appeared that the boat was going to be forfeited and sold. Then there were stories of protests from various places outside the country, but the department still stood firm and said that the boat was going to be sold. On the next day there was a suggestion that possibly the boat might be released in order to engage in fishing, but that a deposit would have to be made with the department. Then the next day, Friday to be exact, the Minister of Justice issued a little statement—for which he should be commended, because it was certainly brief and economical—in which he said that on his instructions the Araho was being released immediately. I asked if it was released without a deposit, and he replied that it was; therefore the incident is closed.

I presume the department felt this was a proper case in which justice should be tempered with mercy, and perhaps one should not quarrel too much with that point of view. But I am sure neither the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) nor the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson)—and I am certain not the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters)—would be so naive as to accept the explanation that the radio direction finder was out of order, and that this was the reason this boat was within two and a half miles of our coast line. These were deep-sea fishermen. They could tell by glancing across the water, either by day or by night, whether they were within one, two or three hundred yards or one, two or three miles of the coast line, and no radio direction finder was needed. It is the story we always hear when the murderer is caught; he says the gun went off by accident.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, two things are necessary. In the first place the Cygnus must be maintained in those waters, and in the second place more and more efficient patrol boats must be built. In that connection I should like to mention another matter which has been advocated by the Halifax Herald from time to time and which I think is in the thoughts of most people in the maritimes. We are a maritime people. We are proud of our sailors, proud of our fishermen; yet on our eastern coast, at any rate—whether or not this is so on the west coast I do not know—we do not have any coastguard service whatever. When our ships get into trouble we have to call upon the United States coastguard to help us out. They have done so generously and well. I realize that in this modern day and age the aeroplane renders wonderful service, and certainly the search and rescue squad of the R.C.A.F. at Dartmouth, and now at Greenwood, has rendered yeoman service. But aeroplanes cannot rescue drowning sailors; and I suggest that to help maintain the traditions of Canada as a great maritime nation we must have an efficient coastguard service to help our sailors and carry out the work which has to be carried out in that connection.

Then, Mr. Speaker, if we had a patrol service and a coastguard service I believe the difficulties of the fishermen would be met temporarily, at least until such time as it is possible to negotiate a treaty under which the coastal line may be moved further off shore.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer, a matter which has been mentioned in this house a great deal, of course, during the last few days; that is, the plight in which our farmers find themselves. We in our constituency are particularly conscious of that situation, because the fruit growers of the Annapolis valley have been largely dependent upon the export markets of Great Britain and, to some extent, western Europe. Those markets have been lost to us, first because of the war and now because of sterling restrictions. This applies not only to apples. This week here on parliament hill we saw a committee representing all the poultry raisers of Canada, who were worrying about the restriction of their markets, and who could see that within the immediate future their industry might be facing disaster. Our fishermen are facing restricted markets because of lack of sterling; our lumbermen see the possibility that the British market may be closed to them through restrictions on sterling, and they are facing a most serious situation.

All these primary producers are in difficulties. This government has inaugurated a system of price support, and that is good. However, I am sure the minister and everyone else will admit that price support in itself is not a solution. We see these surpluses starting to build up; and what the end may be it is hard for any of us to say. I think we must go further than that, even as a temporary measure. Many may not like it; there are those, I know, who are violently opposed to it, but some system of controlled, orderly marketing of all these surpluses which are starting to overhang the markets of this country and of the world must be developed. I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) one step I believe he should seriously consider; that is, the inauguration of a natural products marketing act. I believe the minister is giving this matter consideration; I hope he is, as I know he has been giving consideration to many of these matters for a long time. So I do urge upon him the importance of this action.

But that would not be a final solution. You can have your price support; you can have your marketing act; but the only possible solution in the long run is some action to regain the markets of western Europe, Great Britain and the entire sterling area. Unless that is done I believe our producers may be in great difficulties and even reduced to the level of a peasant economy. Our principal market has been across the seas, and without that export market we may barely eke out an existence. Thousands may be forced to migrate, as has been suggested; and the economy of the country may be permanently impaired.

I am not suggesting for a moment, of course, that this government is wholly responsible for the loss of the sterling markets. We all realize that various factors enter into this matter. There was the war; there have been the controls which have come on since, and the various policies of other governments. All these things enter into the situation. I do believe there has been a trend of thought—perhaps a proper one—that Canada was going to develop into a great industrial nation because of changes that have occurred in regard to natural resources and so on, and that during the coming years we would see an increasing flow of goods to the south, with the result Canada would become a wealthy exporting nation, sending tremendous quantities of goods to our neighbour the United States. Then we would be wealthy and powerful, and exchange restrictions would be a thing of the past. That is a pleasant picture, and it may become a true one; it may materialize within the next twenty-five years. Given that development; given migration; given an increase in population, and all these things can happen. But, sir, that is not a solution for the people of this generation. They will not live long enough to benefit from those markets. They must regain the overseas markets.

So if this government is vulnerable—and I think perhaps it is on some points—I would suggest with respect that there are two points on which I would differ markedly with it. One of these points, of course, is only indirectly in reference to sterling; but I think the financial policy of tying our dollar to parity with the United States dollar brought a great deal of economic loss and disaster and prejudiced our dealings with the sterling area. More than that, I believe there has been a tendency, probably not on the part of the minister but on the part of officials in various departments, to assume that Great Britain was through, that sterling never again would be convertible, and that those of us who had any hope of regaining access to the markets of western Europe or Great Britain were living in a fool's paradise and ought to resign ourselves to the harsh facts of life. I think there was and probably still is an attitude of defeatism in that respect, Mr. Speaker, which has motivated this government in not proceeding as aggressively as I think it should in trying to rectify these difficulties and get us back into the sterling area.

We talk a great deal about the iron curtain; in his speech this afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) referred to it. There is another curtain which is causing almost as much trouble in the world, economically. That is the curtain which is hanging across the world with a dollar sign painted on one side and the pound sterling painted on the other.

That curtain must be lifted, sir, so that people can trade easily back and forth. Unless that is done the primary producers of this nation face disaster. This government must do something about it. Without interjecting political complications into this opening debate, I say this, that if this government does not succeed in overcoming this difficulty, with respect to trading in the sterling area, then as surely as day follows night it will be replaced by another government which will attempt, and will finally succeed in doing so.

There is a minor matter relating to agriculture to which I should not refer at all perhaps at this time, and that is the plight of the potato growers in my province. I know it is a matter of which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has considerable knowledge. It is the unsatisfactory situation in which we find ourselves in Nova Scotia, not only from an economic standpoint, but it is also definitely irritating to the pride of the people of that province. I am not criticizing this government for what it originally did. It had to take some action. The only trouble was that it moved too late. We were embargoed, kept out of the United States market, in so far as table potatoes were concerned.

Then, this government proceeded to set floor prices for potatoes grown in certain parts of New Brunswick, floor prices for potatoes grown in Prince Edward Island, but no floor prices for potatoes grown in Nova Scotia.

An hon. Member: How about Manitoba?

Mr. Nowlan: I do not know about Manitoba; that is a matter for the Manitoba members themselves to discuss. I am saying that the minister well knows the situation that developed. Unfortunately, perhaps there were election complications injected into it. Assurances were given that floor prices would be forthcoming. A floor price has not been established as yet, as far as I know. Certainly, it is not in effect today.

As a result, potatoes are being sold in my constituency today for export. They are being bagged, graded and trucked, and all those expenses are being paid by the grower who receives less than the floor price that is promised to the growers of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island next April.

Next April those growers will receive a greater amount for the potatoes in their cellars, in bins, unpacked, ungraded, and all the rest of it, than our growers now receive for potatoes graded and delivered. You talk about your iron curtain! In our case, there fell across the strait of Chignecto an iron curtain which made it impossible for us to export potatoes and which kept the money of the government from coming in.

Speaking of Nova Scotia products, I am reminded of something which I saw in the speech from the throne. There is a reference to loans which are being made for the development of the steel industry. I am glad to see that, sir. I trust, not only that legislation will be introduced to that effect, but that that legislation will afterwards be implemented, because in Nova Scotia we have the potentialities for a tremendous steel industry. I hope and expect that this government will inaugurate a policy under which the steel industry will be enlarged and strengthened. If this is done it will provide an additional market for our agricultural products.

In that connection, sir, many statements have been made in the press lately with respect to a bridge which is or is not to be built across the strait of Canso. I understand the engineers are not yet ready to report on that. Certainly, sir, that must be done. Although I am speaking as a very junior member of this party, judging from the position taken by our party when this matter was discussed in the past, I think I am safe in saying we are unanimously behind this proposal to erect a bridge across the strait of Canso. We believe it must be done by this government at the earliest possible moment.

Dealing with matters of transportation, I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to a rather peculiar situation which exists with respect to the Canadian National steamships operating from Halifax to the West Indies. Preliminary surveys show the possibility of developing a small export market for our apples in the West Indies. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) realizes how important that might be. Our apple marketing board has taken this matter up with the management of the Canadian National boats with a view to obtaining the use of cold storage facilities on these boats. Cold storage facilities are essential in exporting apples to that market. We have been told by the management that we should first get the orders and then take the matter up with them and they would see if they could make some arrangements. How in the name of common sense can you get orders for the shipment of apples until you are assured of transportation facilities?

These ships contain at least three cold storage compartments. I quite realize that the beautiful aroma from Nova Scotia apples might affect the butter, eggs or cheese being shipped from Ontario. But at least, it should not be beyond the bounds of possibility to reserve one compartment for the shipment of apples during the period when apples are normally exported. It is estimated that, had we been able to ship these apples, we would have exported 10,000 barrels this year. I quite realize that 10,000 barrels does not seem a large amount, but to people suffering from a lack of markets, as our people are, 10,000 barrels is an important amount.

Since the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) is in the house, I should like to mention another matter of transportation. In our constituency, we are not served directly by the Canadian National Railways. We are served by the Dominion Atlantic Railway, a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In the old days, of course, the Dominion Atlantic Railway provided the most efficient means of shipping to an export market. Today, however, we have to pay freight over the Dominion Atlantic Railway to a Canadian National railway point, then pay freight over the Canadian National railways, which means paying freight for goods to travel over that long, tortuous, winding, military road which was built nearly a century ago when we were expecting an invasion from another country. It is absolutely impossible to ship goods efficiently or cheaply over that road. Perishable commodities cannot be shipped over this route at all because the time taken is too great. We have to face the fact that whatever is done in the future, there will be a restriction on the development of the apple industry. We will have to develop other products to some extent. In the meantime, we have to ship those apples wherever we can. We need faster shipping facilities to the markets of the New England states, Montreal and Toronto; that is essential.

I noticed the other day it was suggested that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply would have a billion dollars to spend on public works when the period of unemployment is upon us. I should like to tell him that in my constituency unemployment is present today, and there is a great deal of it. If the lumber situation continues to deteriorate, there will be still more. I suggest that the piers at Saint John and Digby be constructed so that a car ferry can be operated across the bay of Fundy. This would mean that we could ship our goods in carload lots direct to the markets of Montreal, Boston and Toronto. That, sir, is more than a possibility; it is something which I think should be done in the very near future.

One other reference should be made to the apple industry, and with that I shall have finished. Our growers have received, and they appreciate the fact that they have received, from the treasury of the Dominion of Canada, substantial payments during the last few years. Those payments were made because of the fact that the industry found itself, through no fault of its own, deprived of its export market. The government realized that, unless those payments were made, the apple industry of this nation would be ruined. Every dollar, sir, which was received by the growers was of direct benefit to the apple growers in all the rest of Canada.

Let no one overlook that fact. If the government had not adopted that policy, the marketing system of Canada would have been completely disorganized. This expenditure was for the good of Canada. Our growers do not want, and they did not receive, handouts. They do not want, and they did not receive, beneficences. I am making this statement now, not because of any words or expressions that may have been used by any individual or individuals. I quite realize that statements are sometimes made in a jocular manner and not with the intention of being taken as seriously as they sometimes are. I want to make that plain. But I realize that some parts of the country are under the impression that special benefits have been given to that industry. I want to disabuse the minds of the public on that score. That industry received nothing more than was essential to maintain it. This government now faces the situation that, within the next few days, it will have to decide what its policy will be for the future. Policy is a matter for the government to determine. It will have to decide whether it wants to allow the industry to go under or whether it will give it further assistance. No government is justified in continually spending money on an industry that cannot be saved, and certainly the apple growers of the Annapolis valley do not want that, and do not expect it. I believe, however, that where an industry has every probability of recovery, when it can be reorganized, when it can be put back on its feet, then the government is justified in giving it support. Without discussing the matter further, because I realize that I may be trespassing upon ground on which one should not tread in a semi-political discussion, I leave it at that. I only say that if help is to be forthcoming, it must come now. Here we have an industry in which within the next few weeks millions of dollars must be spent for fertilizer and spraying materials. The growers have not the money with which to buy them. If satisfactory arrangements can be made so that spraying material and fertilizer can be purchased, those things can be purchased. If those arrangements cannot be made, they cannot be purchased. The worst thing that could happen would be to have this matter delayed and delayed until, in the end, perhaps some financial arrangement would be made; but in the meantime it would be too late, and the industry could not function efficiently this summer.

I wish to deal with one more matter and then I am through, because I notice that my time is rapidly expiring. As I said at the outset, I appreciate greatly the welcome I received from all members of the house, and particularly from those on the other side. I feel that I am under some obligation to them, and I should like to return that courtesy now. The other afternoon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was calling expert witnesses to deal with the matter he was discussing, that of dominion-provincial relations. I think perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I would not be accused of being immodest if I should classify myself as an expert witness on the subject of why the government candidate lost the election on December 13. I think I might possibly be able to give some information to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house with respect to that matter. It certainly was not because of the candidate, who was a man who had in the past won by large majorities, and who for many years had been a responsible minister of the crown in that province. Many local factors entered into the situation, but there was one primary matter which motivated the thinking of all the electors, and that was their resentment against the crushing burden of taxation imposed by this government at the present time. I wish to give this explanation to my hon. friends, if they have not already got it. I heard them getting it the other day from their own side, but possibly they can take it from me as a disinterested, unbiased observer! That is the explanation. That is the answer: the burden of taxation, the reckless expenditure, as I think it was termed. I should like to show certain hon. gentlemen opposite letters I have received from many Liberals whom they know throughout the province. These men wrote to me after the election and said they believed that the electors were justified in protesting against a government which imposed such heavy taxation and maintained such reckless expenditure. Those are not my statements. Those are statements from Liberals whom three of the hon. gentlemen opposite know well and whose judgment they would respect.

An hon. Member: Thanks for your advice.

Mr. Nowlan: I hope you profit by it. The only possible hope my hon. friend has of coming back in the next election is that the government accept that advice. It is not only the burden of taxation that is resented, but particularly the administration of the income tax. I do not intend to weary hon. members with a recital of the farmers' complaints with respect to the income tax. As I understand it, the Department of National Revenue proposes to issue to the farmers an income tax return about the size of a post card. I am glad to hear that, but may I say that it never was the size of the return which bothered the farmers so much. It was the interminable nagging, the questions asked, the letters which were written time and time again, year after year, about something which happened in 1942 and 1943; that was what broke the hearts of the people. Such questions were asked as when a cow was sold, or what happened to it. The people were asked to give a full explanation about such matters.

I realize that it is good financial policy to balance the budget. I realize that there is justification for decreasing the debt. But I suggest that the debt should not be decreased through the imposition of a heavy burden of taxation when the cost of living is bearing down on the people as it is at the moment. That policy cannot be justified.

I heard the Minister of Finance speak on an occasion on which, as he later said, he had never laughed so hard in his life. Speaking of taxation he first said that the government was setting aside something for a rainy day. Then he said it was to reduce the debt. Then finally he said it was to prepare for national defence. I suggest that this country is prepared to assume a burden of taxation for national defence if it is asked to do so properly, and for that purpose. But if we continue to impose a burden of taxation and try to justify it one minute on one ground, and another minute on another ground, sooner or later, when the necessity for national defence arises, we shall find ourselves in the position of the boy who called "Wolf, wolf," when no wolf was there; and the public will even resent paying taxes for the purpose of national defence.

I see that my time has just about expired. May I say this in closing, with regard to the matter of taxation, particularly as it concerns farmers and fishermen. At this session, I believe, a committee should be appointed—and I believe there is some hope of it—to deal with this whole matter. The farmers and fishermen do not wish to avoid the payment of taxes but they resent certain features and injustices in connection with the administration of the present act. I urge the appointment of a committee of the house to go into the matter thoroughly, to work out a system whereby the taxes may be collected and whereby at the same time the co-operation of the farmers and fishermen may be obtained.

I thank the members of the house for the courtesy they have shown me on this occasion.

Mr. Max Campbell (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of following two new members who have made their maiden speeches in this house, and I wish to congratulate both of them on the splendid effort they made. I was greatly interested in the address delivered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and was most happy when he accepted in large part the C.C.F. policy in regard to the north Atlantic pact. I wish the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) had gone a little further in one statement he made, namely that he was in favour of a national marketing act.

I wish he had said whether he was in favour of a voluntary act or a compulsory act, because I attended a conference of farmers in the Chateau Laurier a little over a year ago, and I heard members of that organization from his province and from New Brunswick talking about a national marketing act. Every one of the speakers I heard that morning made remarks to the effect that in the maritime provinces they had tried voluntary marketing and it had been a failure, but now the maritime provinces are in favour of compulsory marketing schemes. I hope that the hon. member will agree with those farmers who came from his part of the maritime provinces, and will try to get his party to follow along with him.

I wish to deal this afternoon with one part of the minister's speech in which he made a jab at the official opposition. They resented it. I am not going to say whether they should, or whether he should have said what he did say. But let me give a little advice to the government members. This will probably be the last session of this parliament before the next election. In a good many provinces last year we had provincial elections. In Manitoba we had a coalition of Liberals and Conservatives, a coalition for the sole purpose of stopping the C.C.F. The same was true of British Columbia. While in Saskatchewan the Liberals and Conservatives did not form a coalition, they had gentlemen's agreements of one kind or another. The fact that my hon. friends on the government side are going after the official opposition in a rough manner is proving most embarrassing to some of my Liberal friends in Saskatchewan. In order to be fair and reasonable with their own people in Saskatchewan perhaps they should pull their punches a little. I picked up the North Battleford Optimist the other night, and I saw that my friend, and our old colleague in the House of Commons, the former member for Rosthern, had made a speech in that city. I read the speech because I am always interested in Mr. Tucker's speeches. Mr. Tucker was in the city of North Battleford, and his speech is reported in part as follows in the issue of January 20:

> Our Conservative friends helped materially in making the gains we did in the provincial elections. Our mutual differences were overcome by the common aim of defeating socialism.

Mr. Knowles: For once Tucker is right.

Mr. Campbell: I continue:

> It is different in the federal field. Mr. Drew has stated that every seat in Saskatchewan will be contested, and his organizer in this province has made attacks on both Liberals and the C.C.F. I hope that the provincial relationship between Liberals and Conservatives will not be destroyed by these attacks.

My friends over on the other side: put on your boxing gloves, but do not be quite as hard on the leader of the opposition and the supporters behind him. Mr. Tucker says that his Conservative friends helped materially. There is no doubt that if it had not been for the support the Conservatives gave to the Liberals in Saskatchewan, not many of them would have been elected. He said:

> Our mutual differences were overcome by the common aim of defeating socialism. The problem is different in the federal field.

He then complained about the Conservatives making attacks not only on the C.C.F. in the House of Commons, but also on the Liberals, and he said that it would be most embarrassing when the next provincial election rolls around. He hopes that hon. members here will be just a little bit milder in their language and in their attacks on each other so that these attacks will not destroy the unity that helped in the last provincial elections in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia. I just give this as a little bit of advice.

Already in this house issues are beginning to appear. The parties are beginning to show the people of Canada what they are to fight on in the coming election. I was interested in the leader of the opposition's frontal attack on the government the other day, and I was equally interested in the answers of some of the hon. members on the other side. If I were to be appointed a judge of what has taken place so far I would say that possibly the official opposition got the worst of the encounter.

The position taken by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is that he does not believe in subsidies to provincial governments. He does not believe that one government should collect revenues and another government spend them. I believe the opinion in western Canada is largely summed up in an editorial I read a few days ago in the Farm and Ranch Review. There is a little politics in this which, if I were writing it, I would leave out. This is what the article says:

> Mr. Drew, unhappily, decided to double-talk about dominion-provincial relations. Mr. Drew is against subsidies from the federal government to provincial governments. He can be quite eloquent on this point, for he says that when subsidies are substituted for taxing powers the federal system breaks down.
>
> The fact remains that no taxing power yet devised by man can be effectively levied against wealth or income that is not there. That has been the essence of the prairie problem for twenty-five years. That was why we went through the wringer during the depression. That is why we lack roads and schools and hospitals and even industries.
> The immense profits made through the years by Canadian business on the prairies have been shipped to Ontario and Quebec. National corporations have paid corporation taxes in the provinces where their head offices are located, not in the prairies from which a substantial portion of these profits are earned. Prairie governments, before the war, were forced to impose heavy taxation on local corporations and local taxpayers in an effort to stay solvent. That placed western companies and western business men in an impossible competitive position. Ontario and Quebec, because they were taxing the wealth earned all across Canada, could afford to charge lower rates.

The system now in effect recognizes this fact, and the payments made to the provinces are in large part based upon it. In his speeches out here Mr. Drew seemed to be saying that this arrangement wasn't good enough for us, and that he had something better to offer. He was exceedingly vague on this point, and with good reason. The Tories hope to win in Ontario on promises to get back to the pre-taxation agreement era of low taxes on corporations and personal income. And they hope to win on the prairies on promises they have not made.

I heard somebody say the other day—I do not remember who it was—that the same appeal would be made from one end of Canada to the other. I could go back and give instances, and a good many of them, in which different appeals have been made in different parts of Canada by both the old parties, but I shall not take the time to do it.

We have been hearing a good deal about socialism, and different names have been attached to the C.C.F. with regard to socialism. I wonder if those who are attacking the socialistic part of the C.C.F. and socialistic ideas of the C.C.F. realize the extent to which socialism has spread throughout the world during the last ten or fifteen years. If we stopped to consider I think we would agree that it spread because there was some reason for its spreading. Six out of the nine countries in the British commonwealth of nations have democratic socialist governments.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Campbell: The hon. member can disagree if he likes, but I say that six of the nations in the British commonwealth have democratic socialist governments. The Scandinavian countries, France, and nearly all the countries in western Europe, have democratic socialist governments. The last election in the United States showed a definite trend away from monopoly capitalism. Canada, South Africa and Rhodesia are the only three countries in the British commonwealth of nations that still retain the old system of laissez-faire or monopoly capitalism.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): And prosperity.

Mr. Campbell: The people should consider that. When slurring remarks about this group are made in the house—I think we accept most of them with good grace—hon. members should realize that this trend is not only in the C.C.F. movement, it is spreading pretty well all over the world. In western Europe, and the British commonwealth of nations there is what we call democratic socialist government; in eastern Europe they have what they call socialist government, but I call it totalitarian government.

I took the trouble to get different definitions of the word "socialism". I have my own idea of what socialism means; it is not totalitarianism, and it does not mean doing away with our democratic principles. I found this definition in the Encyclopaedia Britannica:

> Ethics of socialism and the ethics of Christianity are identical. The general tendency is to regard as socialistic any interference undertaken by society in behalf of the poor. In general it may be described as that movement which seeks, by economic changes, to destroy the existing inequalities of the world's social conditions.

And then Webster's dictionary gives this definition:

> A theory of society which advocates a more precise, orderly and harmonious arrangement of the social relations of mankind than that which has hitherto prevailed.

Johnson's Universal Cyclopedia has this definition:

> Socialism is a moral reform; it is the vices of mankind and the miseries resulting from these vices, to which socialism wishes to put an end, and it seeks its means not in a new religious issue, but in a new social organization.

If I were asked to define the kind of socialism in which I believe, I would take the first of these definitions and add three words, so that it would read:

> Ethics of socialism and the ethics of Christianity are identical. The general tendency is to regard as socialistic any interference undertaken by society in behalf of the poor. In general it may be described as that movement which seeks, by economic changes and democratic methods, to destroy the existing inequalities of the world's social conditions.

I would add the words "and democratic methods".

The reason for the trend that has taken place all over the world I think can be found in the evils of the capitalistic system. My main criticism of the speech from the throne is that it does not provide for any legislation to curb the monopolies that have grown up in this country. I think every hon. member will agree that we have giant monopolies and cartels, both national and international. I should like to present some evidence to prove absolutely that this government knows, and has known for a great many years, that these cartels exist, but it has done nothing effective to curb them. I do not say that they have not done anything; I say that they have not done anything effective to curb them. I realize that Mr. McGregor is investigating certain businesses and industries, and action may be taken against them, but even though action is taken and they are found guilty, the only result is a small fine.

As I said, I intend to present proof that this government knows and has known for a great many years that these things exist. I have in my hand a little book which perhaps a good many members of the House of Commons have never seen. It is entitled, "Manifesto of the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier." It was issued on November 5, 1917. It will be remembered that the Liberals were in opposition at that time. The title on the page is, "Who shall rule, the people or the big interests?" The title continues:

Democracy and a free people
or
Autocracy and organized privilege

On Which Side Are You?

The soldier	The profiteer
The worker	The trusts
or
The consumer	The food manipulators
The taxpayer	The pork barons

The Liberals went to the country in that election and promised the people that they would take care of the situation, which, even at that particular time, was growing into a problem. I say that they have not done anything effective. It is true that a commissioner was appointed, and I think he has done a good job. I have in my hand the report of the commissioner, and I should like to direct attention to it. It sets out some examples of cartel arrangements affecting Canadian import commodities.

A great number of people in Canada are affected by high prices. During the last recess I think I had more complaints from my people about high prices of the things they have to buy than about anything else. One of the reasons why we have high prices is the monopolies and cartel arrangements that exist.

The first chapter of this manifesto gives examples of cartel arrangements affecting Canadian import commodities as follows:

Fertilizers: potash, nitrogen, phosphorus; tanning materials: quebracho; flat glass, sulphur, dyestuffs, tools—cemented tungsten carbide; magnesia refractories, titanium pigments.

The next chapter deals with examples of cartel arrangements restricting Canadian manufacturers to home market on an exclusive basis:

Chemicals, soda ash, electric lamps, radio tubes and sets, matches.

The third chapter is with respect to examples of cartel arrangements involving participation by Canadian exporters. It deals with the base metals, copper, lead, zinc, nickel, and it also deals with steel, aluminum, acetic acid, radium and newsprint. Chapter 4 deals with the need for an effective policy. Chapter 6 comprises the conclusions and recommendations. I hope all members of the house have read this report. The leader of the opposition in his speech complained about the concentration of power that the dominion government has today, and the danger of greater concentration in the future if we allow the dominion government to exercise certain powers. He did not say one word, however, about the tremendous concentration of wealth in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. He did not say anything about the tremendous power that that monopolistic situation has over the whole life of our country.

The other night the member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) made what I thought was an excellent speech. He went into the matter of what combines and monopolies were doing to the Canadian people. In this report five recommendations are made. I say that the government is lax in its duty. It is not doing its duty to the people of Canada when it takes no effective measures. There is nothing foreshadowed in the legislation outlined in the speech from the throne which will take care of the situation.

I am not going to read all the recommendations, but the fourth is as follows:

It is recommended that public policy be carried forward in a number of directions to deal effectively with the varied conditions of industrial control. What is required is an integrated program to ensure that the possibilities in modern industrial efficiency are developed and stimulated to serve the public interest. Investigation, publicity, and prosecution have their parts to play, but they cannot in every case serve as a solution to the problem of monopoly. Prosecution can be relied upon to remove restraints of trade only where it is possible and desirable to restore competition. In other circumstances different remedies must be applied. Canadian public policy with respect to combines has been established in existing legislation and judicial decision.

I say it has not gone far enough.

Further formulation of Canadian policy in regard to international cartels, presumably by the extension of similar principles, will enable representatives of this country to enter more readily into negotiations with those of other countries . . .

And so on. My contention is that this is one of the big problems facing us. The government has done nothing to implement the recommendations of this report. I also believe that this problem is being recognized to a far greater extent in the United States than it is in Canada. The United States has set up a small business committee of the house of representatives, and that committee has presented a report to the government. I have here an article in the Christian Science Monitor commenting thereon. It says:

The house small business committee, in a unanimous report on its investigations on monopolies during the past year, said:

"If capitalism in the United States is not to experience the fate of other capitalistic systems abroad, then time is of the essence in achieving a successful working of the nation's laws against private monopoly and restraints of trade."

The report said present penalties, which include fines and prison sentences for anti-trust violations, are not adequate, and "have not served to deter offenders." Violators usually are only fined, the report added. "The fines are just a slap on the wrist for a serious offence," Chairman Ploeser of Missouri said in a news conference as the report was released. "They are a cheap tax to pay, and in fact a fine can be used as a base of expense for new profits—just a business expense."

The committee made certain recommendations as follows:

1. Creation of special anti-trust courts to hear anti-trust cases. Appeals could be made directly to the supreme court.

2. That preferential commodity freight rates by railroads be made illegal.

3. Losses of individual chain stores should not be deductible from the parent organization's income for tax purposes if the losses are incurred by selling below cost "or at unreasonably low prices to eliminate competition."

4. That a graduated percentage tax on cigarettes be substituted for the present flat rate. The tax would be based on the selling price of the cigarettes.

5. That the federal trade commission be directed by congress to investigate "the problem of bigness in business" and study "the desirability and feasibility of breaking down so-called conglomerates in American business."

There is no suggestion there that any action should be taken by the government to take over any of those industries and operate them as a public monopoly. I think that in the near future it will be necessary for both Canada and the United States to take over and operate some of these monopolies. I do not say it will be necessary with all of them. I think that in a good many cases co-operation can be secured from them, and they can be persuaded to deal fairly with both the United States and the Canadian people.

I heard my friends to the left say that a government monopoly would be just as bad as a private monopoly.

An hon. Member: Worse.

Mr. Campbell: Somebody says "worse". I cannot see the logic in an argument of that kind. As an illustration, let me speak of a project that is a monopoly right here in Ontario, the hydroelectric system. I think the people of Ontario were very wise when they took over and operated most of the power producing facilities in Ontario. The hydroelectric commission is operated as a public monopoly. The whole idea is to give the people cheaper electricity, and to give it to them at as near cost as possible. A private monopoly is operated mainly for the purpose of extracting more from the consumers. It does not make sense to me, therefore, for anybody to interject that a government monopoly is worse than a private monopoly. There is no comparison. The purpose of a government monopoly is to give service at cost to the people. I think if you tried to get the people of Ontario to go back to a private enterprise, or a private monopoly, for their electricity, you would not get very far.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I listened this afternoon with a great deal of interest to the speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I am sure that all hon. members will agree that in his first speech in the House of Commons he created a very favourable impression. The speech from the throne commences with a declaration regarding the government's concern to ensure peace and security throughout the world. Nevertheless, we in this group feel that many of the government's post-war policies have had the opposite effect and, moreover, that by the very nature of those policies the inevitable result must be insecurity and international friction. When I say that I have in mind particularly the government's post-war international trade and financial policies.

In recent months the Canadian press has given a good deal of publicity to the warnings issued by the food and agricultural organization. I note that Sir John Boyd Orr is quoted as saying that the situation in the world today may be likened to the death march of our civilization. Then a warning is also issued that, unless the undernourished world spends as many billions of dollars on increasing food production as on war, half its population in the next twenty years may suffer from food deficiency and premature death. I think all hon. members will agree that is not a condition conducive to peace. It is a situation or a warning that cannot be lightly set aside.

The food and agricultural organization urges that greater consideration be given to soil conservation and increased efficiency in methods of production; and I would recommend that hon. members, if they have not already done so, should read a book entitled "Road to Survival" by Vogt. This is a statistical summary which fully backs up the warnings issued by the food and agricultural organization. Some of the recommendations may be considered somewhat drastic, but I think one must agree that the basis of the warning is sound.

The food and agricultural organization points to conditions throughout the world. It points out that in Australia the area of the desert is steadily expanding; that in South Africa the jungle is steadily encroaching upon the fertile cultivated lands; and that on the North American continent there has been a loss of top soil amounting to three billion tons annually. Then I noticed in the November 13 issue of Foreign Trade an article on

India entitled, "Greater Agricultural Production Essential to Economy of India," and I quote from page 999:

> There is at present an annual deficit for the Dominion of India of approximately five million tons of food grains. Without any increase in production and taking into consideration the natural increase of population, the deficit will amount to nine million tons at the end of five years.

Then it outlines a very progressive program the government is endeavouring to put into operation to increase the productivity of the land, including a large-scale program of irrigation; and I quote from page 1000:

> Out of the numerous projects that are under consideration it is proposed that immediately priority shall be given to two developments that would require an expenditure of 1,000 million rupees, and would bring a further 3,600,000 acres under irrigation, while nearly 2,000,000 acres of hitherto uncultivated land would be made available for the growing of food crops.

Now I want to say a few words with regard to the situation in Canada. I think much could be done to assure the continuation of a high level of production of food by means of irrigation. A large number of projects already have been surveyed and are ready for action on the part of the federal government, but unfortunately in the past the policy of the minister of reconstruction appears to have been to hold back these projects as a cushion against unemployment. I was very glad to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), in a speech he made last year in a bid for the leadership of the Liberal party, state that he believes these irrigation projects should be proceeded with immediately and not held back as unemployment relief projects. I attended the annual meeting of the eastern irrigation association in Alberta last December; and in spite of very severe weather—the temperature was more than 25 below and the roads had been drifted—a large number turned out, some of the farmers driving for a hundred miles in order to be at the meeting. The government representative, Mr. E. L. Gray, gave a very interesting talk on what had been done in connection with building two small dams on east and west Berry creek, and he urged the convention not to press the government too hard to proceed with the main project in that area, known as the Red Deer diversion scheme, but to utilize the water that could be obtained from the two new dams and later on ask the government to proceed with the Red Deer diversion project. The interesting point to note is that after he had completed his remarks a prominent Liberal in the audience rose and moved a resolution to the effect that the government be asked to proceed immediately with the construction of the Red Deer diversion project. The reason given, of course, was that owing to the conditions which exist in that area there are many years when the surface run-off water is altogether insufficient to meet the needs of any irrigation project depending upon it, and that therefore it would be necessary to divert water from the Red Deer river to ensure an adequate supply.

There is something else I think the government should do in order to maintain production at a high level; that is, adjust their taxation policy in regard to agriculture. I do not think there is any doubt that the government's agricultural taxation policy is running foul of the law of diminishing returns; and until such time as that legislation is changed in relation to agriculture they are definitely handicapping the production of food.

In spite of various warnings issued by the food and agricultural organization, today many people are warning of the danger of impending surpluses of food. I have in my hand an extract from the Calgary Herald, dated Tuesday, December 21, 1948, which reads:

> Sir Hartley Shawcross, Britain's attorney general, said Saturday that "the world will starve unless all nations pursue an aggressive agricultural policy to pump up food production."
> And Tom Williams, Britain's minister of agriculture, stated that failure of a single harvest in North America could mean disaster. Underlying a temporary improvement, he said, is a fundamental long-term insecurity.
>
> In New York, however, two economists, Dr. Julius Hirsch and his wife Edith, give another view, and state that the world is headed towards surpluses.
> Already, they say, wheat supply outstrips demands, adding that American food prices have passed their peak and, despite a probable interim rise, will fall next autumn below the price level of this fall. They state that world production of six of the seven main foods already equals or exceeds pre-war production. These are wheat, corn, potatoes, oats, fats and oils, and sugar.

While there may appear to be some contradiction between the views expressed by those gentlemen, I would point out that in reality there is no contradiction. On the one hand the FAO is warning that our production is altogether insufficient to meet the needs of the people of the world and that unless steps are taken to rapidly increase production there will be large-scale starvation. On the other hand the United States economists are pointing out that owing to the fact that the people who require food lack the means with which to buy it, surpluses will accumulate. In other words it seems to be a repetition of the situation which developed throughout the world in the thirties, when on the one hand we had thousands, yea millions, of starving people and on the other hand we had surpluses of food available for distribution; but unfortunately owing to our financial policies and the system of distribution, it was not possible to make that food available to the starving masses. So, we actually had a reduction in the production of food to meet an inadequate buying power. It is mainly in that regard, Mr. Speaker, that I say government policies are not such as to provide security, nationally or internationally.

Most people, I think, appreciate that, in order to maintain high levels of agricultural production, the producer must be assured of adequate markets at fair prices. Failing that, production is bound to suffer. As a matter of government policy during the war and post-war years, farmers were forced to accept less than they might otherwise have received in return for some nebulous form of promise regarding stabilized prices. The farmers of Canada today, Mr. Speaker, are greatly concerned over what is happening in connection with the United Kingdom food agreements and in connection with foreign markets generally. They wonder what might happen if the United States had a large wheat crop this year and declared wheat a surplus commodity, when ECA funds would be no longer available to the European countries for the purchase of Canadian wheat.

I have read with a great deal of interest the speech made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) before the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in London on December 17. In this speech I note the minister time and again deplores the fact that Britain is increasing her purchases of food from other countries at the expense of trading with Canada. He points out this is largely due to the shortage of dollars. I noted the minister deplored the fact that no basis has been established for the conversion of sterling into dollars, and the minister implies that the blame rests upon the manipulation of some small group of crackpots called economists. I think the minister should remember that he and his government supported these same crackpots at a time when they were formulating post-war financial policies on an international basis. I have in mind, of course, especially the Bretton Woods agreement and, in some respects, the Geneva trade agreements.

Mr. Speaker, people who look for the convertibility of currencies are indulging in a pipedream unless, first of all, a basis is laid for the balancing of international trade. Looking at the world situation today, we see that the United States has a favourable balance of trade in the neighbourhood of $12 billion, whilst the rest of the nations of the world to a very large extent suffer an unfavourable balance of trade. Does anyone think that, under circumstances such as these, it would be possible to have the convertibility of currencies into dollars? The only way those countries can obtain dollars is by selling goods to the United States. Obviously, at a time when the United States has a favourable balance of trade to the extent of 10 to 12 billion dollars, there must be an adverse balance somewhere in the neighbourhood of 10 or 12 billion dollars. To talk of convertibility at such a time is to talk utter nonsense.

I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the fact that Europe was advised by the international monetary fund to reduce her imports from the western hemisphere and expand her imports from other countries. We should keep in mind the fact that the government of which the minister is a member enthusiastically supported the international monetary fund at the time it was brought into existence. People have been criticizing Britain, and I have in mind the statement of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), for dealing with the countries behind the iron curtain. I say to him that Britain is doing the very thing recommended by the international monetary fund. I do not say Britain would not have done it without the recommendation of that fund, but I would say she is taking the only action open to her in view of world conditions.

I should like to quote from the annual report of the international monetary fund, dated April 30, 1948. Turning to page 11, I quote:

> The gap in Europe's dollar payments may be bridged in part, as it has been in the past, through the development of an export surplus with areas other than the western hemisphere, particularly Africa and Asia. For this to be possible it will be necessary for these parts of the world, in turn, to develop an export surplus with the western hemisphere.

I pause for a moment at this point to say that it is very easy to tell these countries to develop an export surplus with the western hemisphere without laying down any basis for doing so. We know very well that would not be possible unless the United States was willing to exchange goods for goods instead of dollars.

I proceed, then, to a point to which I especially wish to draw the attention of this house.

> These areas might also be further developed as alternative sources for certain European imports and this would diminish European demands for imports from the western hemisphere. Such developments, however, even if supplemented by American investment abroad and by increased expenditures by United States tourists, are unlikely completely to restore the dollar payments position of Europe.

Then, the report continues, and this is the crux of the whole situation:

> An expansion of European exports directly to the western hemisphere, therefore, appears essential if Europe's dollar shortage is to be eliminated by the end of the program of the United States assistance.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that it is only possible, or it will only be possible, for Europe to expand her exports to the western hemisphere provided there is a change in the international trade policies of Canada and the United States. We stressed that point time and again during the discussion on Bretton Woods. We pointed out that that agreement placed the main responsibility on the debtor nations for balancing their trade and placed no responsibility whatever on the creditor nations to accept payment for their goods in the only way a debtor nation can pay, and that is with goods. The Bretton Woods agreement gave the creditor nation the right to demand payment in its own currency without providing any means by which the purchasing nation might secure that medium of exchange.

According to the outline of Canadian policy as given time and again by the former Minister of Finance, Mr. Ilsley, and more latterly by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), we want to continue sending goods to Britain for dollars instead of accepting payment in goods, knowing full well the only way Britain could obtain dollars would be by exporting goods equivalent to the value of those they buy; unless, of course, Britain is to be forced into a position of unpayable debt, and no nation wants to be placed in that position.

It is also very interesting to note that the production of most nations in Europe today is greater than it was before the war. Again, I quote from the international monetary fund report, page 2:

> Although European production in 1947 was hampered by another unusually poor harvest and by shortages of coal and other vital materials, industrial production was about ten per cent greater than in 1946. By the end of 1947 nearly all the European countries had reached or exceeded their prewar outputs. This was a remarkable achievement for a group of economies which had so recently been devastated and dislocated by war.

I think we may judge from that that the European nations will, in the future, insist that when they buy goods from other nations those nations must accept goods in return, because with their production rapidly expanding they will have the goods with which to pay for their imports.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, we have consistently urged that exporting nations be willing to accept payment in the currency of the importing country, so that with this currency the exporting nation may buy an equivalent value in goods from the importing nation. In other words, currency obtained in payment for the exports would be convertible into goods of the purchasing nation. If we adopt that policy I do not think we shall in future have any difficulty in selling our exports in Europe. To those people who would say to me that what I am suggesting is bilateral trade agreements, and that it is desirable that we should put trade on a multilateral basis, I would point out that such an objective could easily be accomplished by the setting up of an international exchange on which the credits held in one nation could be traded for the credits held in another. For example, if we exported one billion dollars' worth of goods to Britain and needed to bring back only $750,000,000 worth of goods, we could then take that credit of $250,000,000 worth of goods from France; and France would then take goods in payment from Britain. In that way you would be putting your trade on a multilateral basis and would be making goods convertible into goods instead of making goods convertible into currency.

However, I notice that the international monetary fund stresses an important condition which must be met if we are to increase our imports from Europe; and again I quote from the report of the international monetary fund at page 13:

> A high level of demand in the western hemisphere will be a necessary condition for increasing exports to this region. A further relaxation of tariffs and import quotas in the western hemisphere countries applicable to primary commodities as well as to manufactured goods would be helpful in encouraging the necessary increase and redirection of world trade. But recognition of these considerations should not obscure the fact that Europe's need to increase its exports to the western hemisphere arises not only from the exceptional circumstances of the transitional period but also from more enduring changes in the world economic structure.

It is well to note that they stress the fact that this is not a temporary situation.

Mr. Blackmore: The old order is gone.

Mr. Quelch: In order that the condition mentioned might be accomplished with regard to Canada, I think it would be highly desirable for the government to conduct an educational campaign urging upon the people of Canada the necessity and desirability of buying more European goods; pointing out to the people that if we desire to maintain in Europe our markets for our agricultural and other products we wish to export there, we must be prepared to accept payment in goods. Therefore, the Canadian people should be encouraged to buy European products.

In that regard, an important point will be that of seeing that the purchasing power of the people is at all times maintained at a level that will make it possible to buy these imports when brought into the country. In other words, demand by itself is useless unless backed up by money so that it may be effective.

Mr. Blackmore: Let us have dividends.

Mr. Quelch: In a speech before the Canadian chamber of commerce at London, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made a statement regarding surpluses and starving people, and I should like to quote what he said, because I agree 100 per cent.

Mr. Gardiner: I would ask the hon. member to read in Hansard the two statements. Apparently he is agreeing with the two statements.

Mr. Quelch: I agree with most of what the minister said. I think the speech was a good one. On the other hand, the minister did not seem to realize that the very people he was referring to as crackpot economists were the people that he and his government so thoroughly endorsed and supported in their post-war policies at the conclusion of hostilities; and therefore the situation which has developed in Europe has been brought about by the very policies he and his government have been supporting.

Mr. Blackmore: Along with the United States.

Mr. Quelch: I wish to quote what the minister said. He stated:

> . . . I am convinced that the world is not in any state of mind where it can be expected to agree that the manipulation of any system or systems of currency is going to be allowed to interfere with getting surplus food to those who have empty stomachs.

Mr. Blackmore: What is the government going to do about it? That is what we want to know.

Mr. Quelch: I would agree with that statement 100 per cent, but I would point out to the Minister of Agriculture that the condition is not merely a general one throughout the world. It applies equally to our own Canadian economy.

Mr. Gardiner: That is what I was talking about.

Mr. Quelch: The minister was referring chiefly to the European situation. I would point out that I do not believe the people of Canada will again tolerate what happened in this country in the thirties. They will not be willing to see surpluses pile up on the one hand and see hundreds of thousands of people suffer a bare existence, on the other.

Mr. Blackmore: What is the government going to do about it?

Mr. Quelch: What is the situation today? Surely the minister will agree that it is not to the credit of Canada that, at a time when our production, employment and income are at their highest level, no provision whatsoever has been made to take care of those people who are physically incapacitated and unable to take care of themselves. While these people may not be exactly starving, they are only barely existing. The same thing, but to a lesser degree, may be said about our old age pensioners and about those benefiting under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. Gardiner: I might say, Mr. Speaker, that in the area in which my hon. friend lives, the fundamental responsibility for people physically incapacitated rests with the provincial government which, as I understand, had a large surplus last year.

Mr. Johnston: They are trying to pass the buck.

Mr. Quelch: It is really amusing, Mr. Speaker. The government are always trying to pass the buck on a question of this kind. But it is the federal government which has sole control over the issue of currency and credit in this country.

Mr. Gardiner: There was a $20 million surplus, I believe.

Mr. Quelch: On various occasions the government of Alberta have tried to pass legislation that would give them some control over credit, but, as the Minister of Agriculture knows only too well, those measures have all been declared ultra vires. As a matter of fact, the government did not wait for the legislation to be declared ultra vires, but disallowed it themselves.

Mr. Blackmore: That is right.

Mr. Quelch: That shows how much the government of this country are interested in Alberta's trying to solve her own problems. Instead of trying to help Alberta, they impeded her progress, and they impeded the social credit program of the government of Alberta, in spite of the promise that was made by the Prime Minister of this country in September, 1935, when he spoke in Saskatoon and stated that a great experiment was being tried in Alberta, that he hoped from the bottom of his heart it would succeed, and pledged that his party would do nothing to impede the progress of that movement.

Mr. Blackmore: The bottom dropped out.

Mr. Gardiner: Why do they not spend that $20 million surplus on the people who need care?

Mr. Quelch: The Minister of Agriculture seems to be a little bit jealous of the progress that Alberta is making. I shall not give special credit to the government of Alberta for what is happening with regard to oil; that is a fortunate circumstance. I can assure the minister that the government of Alberta will use those resources to the greatest possible benefit of the Alberta people and of the Canadian people as a whole.

Mr. Low: And they will not be putting on taxes as hon. members opposite are.

Mr. Quelch: In order to help to promote peace and security throughout the world, it is imperative that Canada do everything in her power to maintain her production of food at the highest possible levels. First of all, in order to satisfy the needs of the Canadian people; second, in order that our surpluses may be used abroad for the purchase of goods which we cannot produce economically; third, to the extent that our production is in excess of the needs of the Canadian people and in excess of the amount of goods which are needed to bring imports into the country, a contribution could be made to a world pool of food, from which all other nations less happily situated than ourselves may be able to draw supplies.

On the other hand, to suggest curtailing the production of food for fear of piling up surpluses in the face of actual physical want would be an act of criminal folly. We have to face the fact that, owing to certain international policies supported by the federal government, our foreign markets are drying up. I listened to a broadcast just yesterday by the exporters association, in which it was said that they were having great difficulty in selling their products abroad owing largely to the shortage of dollars. Briefly I have placed on record what we believe to be a solution in part of our international trade difficulties.

I wish to devote the few minutes remaining to the government's agriculture policy, and I am especially pleased to see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his seat. Since 1942, as a result of government policies, farmers have had to take less for their produce than they would otherwise have received. Those are practically the words of the Minister of Agriculture himself, and that has been the situation since 1942. In return they have received some kind of vague promises regarding stabilization. Nobody knows just exactly what the government's policy regarding stabilization is, and certainly we have not before us at the present time any long-term policy. But the point is that the farmers have already paid the premium for insurance against low prices. The British wheat agreement has only one more year to run, and the Agricultural Prices Support Act has only been continued in force to March 31, 1950, by order in council. I noticed what the minister said in the house yesterday, as reported at page 185 of Hansard. I thought we would have something more definite. He said:

> The present order in council sets the date at March 31, 1950, and before that date the matter will be further considered.

I had hoped he would say that before that date the act would be further extended. We have absolutely no assurance whatever that the Agricultural Prices Support Act will be continued in force after March 31, 1950. In the house we have time and again urged upon the government the desirability of making the Agricultural Prices Support Act permanent legislation so that it could be discontinued only by act of parliament.

Many attacks have been made upon the Canadian wheat board, but all farm organizations across Canada are solidly behind the continuation of the wheat board as the sole marketing agency for wheat. On the other hand they are asking that certain policies or principles governing the wheat board be changed. I hold in my hand a report of the western agricultural conference held in Saskatoon on January 20, as reported in the Manitoba Co-operator. I wish to quote from a part of a long resolution which states:

> That the Canadian wheat board should be an agency operating in the interests of grain producers, with a duty at all times to sell grain for the best available price whether in export or domestic markets, and should not be used as an instrument of government policy to limit domestic prices.

We agree with that 100 per cent, and we would emphasize this fact, that if it becomes necessary or desirable in the future to subsidize any body of consumers, whether of another country or the people of Canada, we insist that the cost of that subsidy should be borne by the Canadian people as a whole, and not placed solely upon the farmers, as has been done under the British wheat agreement, and the subsidizing of the Canadian consumers of wheat.

I also strongly believe in long-term international wheat agreements. Personally, I believe they are absolutely essential if in this country we are to receive a parity price for wheat. I believe that no government will maintain a parity price for wheat unless they can also obtain a parity price for their exports. Therefore I am somewhat critical of the policy which was laid down in the former international wheat agreement, because the price of wheat was in no way tied to the price of other commodities. I suggest that in the future the price of wheat in the first year should be set in relation to price of other products, and that price should be tied to the general price index of the countries buying our wheat, with the result that if the general price level went up 10 per cent the price of wheat would go up that amount. If the general price level went down 10 per cent the price of wheat would go down. The net result would be that our exports of wheat would always bring back to this country an equivalent value of imports, which would be desirable from the point of view of the importer as well as from the point of view of the exporter. But merely to try to gamble or speculate as to what the price is going to be in the future and say that this year the price is so much, and next year it will be so much, and the following year it will be so much, may lead to a repetition of what happened under the British wheat agreement. The government was badly fooled as to what happened. At the time the price was set it may have seemed a fair price in relation to other products, but the general price level rose and no provision was made for the price of wheat rising with the general price level. I am suggesting that when long-term international wheat agreements are signed they be signed on a basis that will assure to producers a parity price on an international basis.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. A. Robinson (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to join with hon. members who have spoken already in this debate in extending congratulations to the mover (Mr. Brown) and the seconder (Mr. Demers) of the address. I am sure my colleague from Ontario will forgive me if I make particular mention of the seconder, the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains. We on the back benches to your right, Mr. Speaker, welcome him to our midst and predict for him a long and honourable career in this house.

I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) on starting his journey the other evening over the great lakes at the port of Midland. He mentioned our wonderful harbour and he said something about our elevators, but he failed to mention our shipyard. I propose to spend some time this evening in a discussion of shipbuilding and of six words contained in the speech from the throne. Those words are, "assistance for the Canadian shipbuilding industry."

Those six words were of considerable interest to the municipalities in Canada in which are situated our seventeen great shipyards, and also to the numerous other municipalities in which our smaller yards are located. Shipbuilding is one of Canada's oldest industries. I understand that the first two ships built in Canada were two small vessels that were launched by Francois Grave in 1606 at Port Royal, now Annapolis Royal, in Nova Scotia. A seagoing vessel was constructed at Quebec as early as 1663 and others soon followed.

It is reported that in 1715 shipbuilding was a busy industry in Quebec, but it was suffering from a lack of encouragement by the governing authorities in France. This is an instance of the way in which history repeats itself. We find that in recent years the Canadian shipbuilding industry has been complaining about a lack of governmental encouragement. The words in the speech from the throne which I have quoted bring great hope to all those engaged in this important industry.

We had a striking experience last fall in Midland of the way in which history repeats itself. At that time there were launched two hopper barges for the French supply council. On that occasion my thoughts inevitably turned back to the past history of the Georgian bay district. Three hundred years ago this district was as densely populated as it is today, but in that far-off time the population was made up of Huron Indians who were living peaceably in their numerous villages.

Fort Ste. Marie stood as the westernmost outpost of New France and was the sanctuary of a gallant band of Jesuit missionaries who had left the comforts of France for the hazards of life in Canada in order to bring light to the aborigines. Three hundred years ago—this is where history has repeated itself—the natives supplied the visitors from France with Canadian-made transportation in the form of birch-bark canoes. Three hundred years later the natives were again supplying visitors from France with Canadian-made transportation, but this time it was in the form of fine steel ships. I need not remind hon. members of the disasters which overtook the Huron Indians and their Jesuit friends at the hands of the Iroquois. However, I would remind them that the year 1949 marks the tercentenary of the murderous attack on Father Brebeuf and Father Lalemant. This historic occasion will be commemorated next summer by appropriate ceremonies and pageants at the original site near Fort Ste. Marie, close to Midland.

I have mentioned the early days of shipbuilding in Canada, but I do not intend to trace its history down through the years from 1715 to date. But I should like to say a few words about the development of this industry on our upper lakes. The first Canadian shipyard on the upper lakes was established at Collingwood, Ontario, in 1902 for the building of steel steamships to be employed in those waters. I understand that their first important contract was the building of the s.s. Huronic of 3,329 tons and 308 feet in length, built for the Northern Navigation Company.

In 1912 another shipyard followed at Port Arthur, larger in size and designed to take care of the increasing size of the upper lake freighters. One of this company's first ventures was the building of two steel canal type freighters which were completed in 1912 and 1913. Later in 1913 they built the celebrated passenger steamship Noronic for the Northern Navigation Company.

The yard at Midland was established a little later but it proved itself during the first war and in 1926 had the distinction of launching the great bulk freighter, the s.s. Lemoyne. That ship was 621 feet in length, it had 70 feet of a beam and a gross tonnage of 10,480 tons. This steamer, which I have mentioned before in this house, holds many records for cargo carrying.

Sad to relate, all these yards, which had proved their capacity in war and in peace, fell on evil days. During the fifteen years preceding the last war our Canadian yards constructed about 42 steel ships exceeding 150 feet in length, or an average of less than three such vessels a year. Twenty-three of those were canal size freighters; three were St. Lawrence river passenger steamers; six were upper lake bulk carriers, of which two were the s.s. Lemoyne and the s.s. Stadacona; the remainder were in various other categories. Those vessels were built at Midland, Port Arthur, Collingwood, Montreal, Sorel, Levis and Halifax. Some of those yards built no more than one of the larger vessels during that entire period.

One of the causes of this situation is not hard to find. It has been estimated that in 1931 only about one-third of the Canadian-owned ships of the larger class were Canadian built. Out of approximately 530 vessels exceeding 150 feet in length, 234 were British built, 118 were foreign built, and only 178 Canadian built. During the depression and up until the start of the war in 1939, our shipyards had constructed only about 14 larger vessels. Repairs and minor construction work kept some of the yards in operation at a low level of employment, but some of them were closed entirely.

I think the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) and other hon. members who represent ridings in which large shipyards are located would be glad to bear testimony with me to the calamity which overwhelms such a community when the big yard begins to lay off its men. How much better it might have been, in view of the approaching war, to have helped those yards to remain in operation rather than to pay out fantastic sums in unemployment relief, to have kept intact the skilled staffs of workers rather than to allow them to scatter? As a result we found ourselves unprepared for the challenge which met us in 1939.

Accordingly, the outbreak of the second world war in 1939 found the Canadian shipbuilding industry in rather poor shape. Expensive machinery had been rusting for years in the yards, and the skilled workers, who are so essential to the success of the industry, had scattered far and wide, and had taken other employment. As you will well remember, submarine warfare soon broke out in its full fury, and the cry went out for ships and more ships. I think it is significant that one of the very first references to Canada in Winston Churchill's book, "The Gathering Storm", occurs in his account of his activities shortly after he took over his old post at the Admiralty. I should like to quote from that account:

> The usual conflict between long term and short term policy rises to intensity in war. I prescribed that all work likely to compete with essential construction should be stopped on large vessels which could not come into service before the end of 1940, and that multiplication of our anti-submarine fleets must be effected by types capable of being built within twelve months or, if possible, eight.

Mr. Churchill was referring there to the program for corvettes, frigates, trawlers and motor launches, in which we in Canada played so large a part. I go on to quote:

> Orders were placed to the limit of our shipbuilding resources, including those of Canada. Even so, we did not achieve all that we hoped, and delays arose which were inevitable under the prevailing conditions and which caused deliveries from the shipyards to fall considerably short of our expectations.

I think these remarks by a world statesman of great experience in these matters should have great force in emphasizing that, if only from the standpoint of national safety, our Canadian shipbuilding industry must not be neglected. We all realize that we are living in troubled times. In fact, the dreadful word "war" was heard in this chamber only a few days ago. There seems little doubt that the signing of the north Atlantic security pact will increase, rather than diminish, our responsibilities.

I listened with great interest this afternoon, as did other hon. members, to the magnificent speech by our new Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I am sure that none of us could help feeling that there is a situation of gravity which must be faced. Some of the parties to the proposed north Atlantic security pact lie across the Atlantic. Should hostilities ever commence again—which, of course, I pray will never happen—it is plain to see that the need for shipping will be very great, and that the time will be very short. In other words, in the national interest, it is important that our shipyards be kept in constant operation, and that they be ready to expand their activities at a moment's notice.

I now turn to some of the physical aspects of our great lakes fleet. We have in Canada 61 upper-lakes freighters, and 116 canalers, making a total of 177 vessels of an aggregate of approximately 510,000 gross tons. The year before last, I believe, I put on Hansard figures as to the age and comparative obsolescence of some of these vessels. Suffice it to say now that the average age of our upper-lakes fleet is approximately forty-two years, of the canalers twenty-four years, and of the whole fleet thirty years. With the average age of our dry bulk carriers at approximately thirty years, and with only two bulk carriers in process of building at the present time, one at Collingwood and one at Midland, some definite action must be taken at an early date if the great lakes shipping industry is to survive.

I mentioned the bulk carriers at Collingwood and Midland. I should like hon. members to bear with me for a few minutes while I say something about those vessels. I only have particulars of the vessel under construction at Midland, but I think the one at Collingwood is similar. These vessels will surpass the Lemoyne in length, and I think it is a Canadian achievement in which hon. members might be interested. The bulk freighter now under construction at Midland is scheduled to be launched in June and to be completed in September. Provided there is no delay in the delivery of steel from the mills, it is considered that the program can be accomplished. When completed, the freighter will be one of the two largest vessels in operation on the great lakes. It will have an ore-carrying capacity of 8,000 tons. Other interesting features of the vessel are over-all length of 640 feet, over-all breadth of 67 feet, and depth of 35 feet. The engine is being built by Canadian Vickers of Montreal and will have an indicated horsepower of 3,200.

As I said before, these two vessels when completed will be two of the largest on the great lakes. In many trades our upper-lakes fleet is in direct competition with ships of the United States, and the average age and carrying capacity of their fleet is much better than our own. In the United States upper-lakes fleet there are about 325 vessels of approximately 2,000,000 tons, with an average age per ship of thirty-six years,while Canada's upper-lakes fleet consists of only 61 vessels of approximately 292,000 gross tons, and with an average age of forty-two years. The passenger fleet on the lakes is also far from satisfactory. The only part of the great lakes fleet which has been increased in recent years is the tanker fleet, and there is still a need for an increase in this trade.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is imperative that effective steps be taken without delay to replace the ageing Canadian lake fleet. We must keep Canada independent in lake shipping, and in a position to take care of Canada's domestic business, both in peacetime and in times of emergency. I think it was sufficiently demonstrated in the last war that our very life may depend upon our ability to move our commodities; and it is of almost equal importance in times of peace.

This situation is urgent, requiring immediate attention. I have already mentioned how disastrous it is when skilled employees leave the shipyards and are scattered throughout the country, and then we find that an emergency must be met. Already this scattering process is in full swing, as I think I can show from the employment figures. In 1944, at peak employment during the war, the shipbuilding industry in Canada employed approximately 75,000 workers, of whom some 9,000 were in great lakes yards. The average monthly figure for the fourth quarter of 1948 was only 12,449 workers, of whom 2,181 were employed on the great lakes.

Then there is the matter of steel. Information from the office of the steel controller as to monthly shipments of primary steel and steel castings to the shipbuilding industry, in relation to the total Canadian production, is equally revealing as to what is happening to the shipbuilding industry. In March of 1944 that industry received 34,404 tons, which was 15·4 per cent of total Canadian production. In September of 1946 the industry received but 367 tons or ·6 per cent of the total. In the first six months of 1948, shipbuilding got 2,990 tons in its worst month and 5,327 tons in its best month, ranging from 1·4 per cent to 2·3 per cent of the total Canadian production. Here again we see evidence of the recession in this important industry. Some of it, of course, is the result of the ending of our huge war program, but some of it is working to the disadvantage and detriment of the industry. I was informed that in Midland our contracts for French hopper barges were held back considerably through lack of steel; and I am also informed that for almost two years a very large Canadian steamship operator has wished to build a large passenger steamer, but that steel has not been made available. Surely the least we can do is see that essential supplies reach this important industry.

United States policy with regard to shipping was clearly defined in the United States merchant marine act of 1936, as follows:

> It is necessary for the national defence and development of its foreign trade and domestic commerce, that the United States shall have a merchant marine sufficient to carry its domestic water-borne commerce and a substantial portion of the waterborne export and import foreign commerce of the United States.

In implementation of this policy, four government aids are available in the United States. First, there is the construction differential subsidy, which consists of absorption by the government of part of the higher labour and material costs of building in United States yards. Second, is the operating differential subsidy, which is based on five items, the chief of which is labour. Third, is a countervailing subsidy, designed to offset any bounties which may be paid by foreign governments. When last I inquired into that feature I understood it had not been invoked. Fourth, is assistance in the financing of new construction—trade-in allowances on old vessels and a system of tax exemption and tax deferments to channel profits into the acquisition of new tonnage.

What is our Canadian picture? One of the most recent statements of policy I think was contained in the address of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) last year in this house when moving the adoption of a resolution for the establishment of the maritime commission. I should like to summarize some of the points he made in that address.

A merchant navy adequate to our needs should be retained . . .

The merchant navy has to pay its way if it is to survive . . .

It is a definite part of a nation's defensive armoury and a considerable factor in a nation's economic structure . . .

The efficiency of such an important industry is therefore a matter which must be of concern to any government . . .

Inseparably related to the merchant navy is the shipbuilding and repairing industry which must also be taken into full account . . .

The continuation, development, prosperity and welfare of these enterprises is of national importance both economically and strategically . . .

Naturally I stress the reference to the shipbuilding and repairing industry. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope the words "assistance for the Canadian shipbuilding industry" in the speech from the throne mean immediate implementation of that part of our policy relating to shipbuilding. I think it is clear that the Canadian shipbuilding industry is confronted with special problems and, at the same time, is of special importance in the economy of the nation. At this time I do not intend to discuss what form the assistance should take, but I do urge that it should be entirely adequate to the needs of the industry and the great national interest to be served. I therefore urge this with all the force at my command, not from the standpoint of national prestige, but from the standpoint of the national welfare and the national safety.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow the pleasant custom of congratulating the mover and seconder of the address. It seems quite a long time now since they made their speeches, and perhaps it will be a still longer time before the actual vote comes, but at any rate I have pleasure in following that custom.

I should like tonight to ask the house to spend a few minutes in considering one interesting paragraph in the speech from the throne. It is a very innocent sounding paragraph, Mr. Speaker. It might mean anything or it might mean nothing. This paragraph reads as follows:

Prosperous conditions now prevailing are being reflected in the buoyant level of national revenues; a condition to which due consideration is being given by my ministers in the preparation of forthcoming budgetary proposals.

From one point of view, as I said a moment ago, that could mean anything or nothing, but there is no question whatever but that the meaning taken out of it is that it indicates a reduction of taxes. The Prime Minister was jocular about it the other evening. He said people could guess that if they liked. He suggested some newspapers favourable to the opposition had made that point, and he left it there. The Prime Minister might have gone further because, actually, one of the newspapers which took this inference quite strongly was the Toronto Star, a newspaper of which I presume the Prime Minister has heard and which I hope he reads from time to time, because it seems to spend most of its time supporting his party, especially when they are wrong.

Notwithstanding the Prime Minister's jocularity, I do not think anyone doubts very much what that was intended to mean. You will observe, Mr. Speaker, it was given a very important place in the speech from the throne. It is not just tossed in with the other benevolences; it is put right at the end in a very prominent position along with the request for the customary provision for essential services. If it was given a very prominent position, I think it was intended to have a prominent position, and I presume it was given that prominent position, among other reasons, so that the electors in the Nicolet-Yamaska district would not miss it when they were reading the budget speech. No doubt it was with them in mind that that paragraph was put in and given such a prominent position. One really wonders why the tax reductions were not put right in the speech from the throne so that the electors in the Nicolet-

Yamaska district would know all about it and would not have to guess at all.

One can sympathize with the government in that because, after all, they have suffered a bit lately. This afternoon the new member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan), with a generosity which I admired but which I could hardly emulate, gave them the secret. He said he had won and the government had been defeated because of the crushing burden of taxation.

A year ago this intention of the government was really made known. When no reduction was made last year, in spite of the large surplus, it was pointed out at that time by your humble servant:

> The one universal comment made when the minister was through was, "Well, no election this year."

I am reading from Hansard of May 21, 1948, page 4241:

> The reason is obvious. The reason was that the minister did not, like little Jack Horner, put in his thumb and pull out a plum.

He was keeping the plum until next year. This question of tax reduction leads to the question of surpluses and it is the latter question, Mr. Speaker, to which I shall ask the house to confine its attention for a few moments. I think it is of interest to us to consider the fact that in the last two years the government will have taken from us something like $1,200 million surplus and used it in various ways. I am going to ask you to examine some of the ways in which it was used later because some of them have no possible relation to the day-to-day business of the country; I mean the ordinary purposes for which the budgets are set up. I wish to ask the house before I take my seat whether they consider it proper and wise that a government should play about with these hundreds of millions of dollars with which it has been playing. It is apt to prove a temptation to them and get them into bad habits.

What we really want from the government is a clear statement of receipts and disbursements, not a mixed-up jumble such as has been given us this year. It is really worse than that. Like other governments, this government has fallen into bad habits. It really seems to be getting to the point where the government hardly regards a man's income as his own income at all. In fact, one impatient man said to me the other day, "Why don't they take the whole lot and then give each of us back a little?" Really, when you consider the effect of some of the taxation, I must say I think his impatient remark had something in it. It does seem as if the government was not only collecting enough taxes to carry on the business of the country, but as if they wanted, in their wisdom, to determine just how much should be left to the individual person. We have not yet got the planned sandwiches as they have in England. Yes, they have planned sandwiches in England. Instructions are issued as to how to make sandwiches. We issue instructions as to recreation, I understand, but we have not got the sandwiches yet.

In England, I believe, they also have undertaken to tell the housewives they can do the shopping better than the housewives. We have not got that here as yet. Nevertheless we have gone quite a long way. Really, this business of the government getting money and playing about with it in various ways has got to stop. If we do not stop them, they will go on doing it more and more.

Let us look at these surpluses. You will remember that in 1947-48 the government had a surplus of some $670 million. The minister explained to us that was not the whole show because there were other special receipts, as I think he called them, which enabled him to get the surplus up to $1,180 million by the end of that year. In the first nine months of the current year it was $609 million. There you have $1,200 million with which the government has been playing.

Let us look at that and compare it with some other things. Let us take $600 million as the annual surplus. It is interesting to note that the total revenue of all the provinces for the last year for which I can get statistics, 1946, shows their revenues as $450 million, $150 million less than this little pin money with which the government has been playing. If you take $600 million, you will find that it works out to about $45 per head for the people of Canada. If my simple arithmetic is correct, for a family of five, that means $225.

Since 1939, the dominion tax has gone up from $38 per head to $198 per head which would mean $990 for a family of five. It is wise to remember that, while the dominion per capita tax has risen, municipal taxes have happily stayed put.

This conception of large surpluses is a kind of new conception of government financing. Philip Snowden, only a few years ago, said that any government that found it had half a crown more than it needed for its expenses was guilty of getting money under false pretences. That may be a little extreme. I think extreme leftists like Snowden are always inclined to be a little more extreme than those of us who go down the middle of the road.

In this house some forty-eight years ago, Sir George Foster, speaking on the budget, quoted from a Liberal minister named Mills. This Liberal minister, for once, was a sensible man. Mr. Mills was referring to a surplus which had occurred. I imagine it was about the size of the half crown to which Mr. Snowden referred, because in those days they would argue for a whole summer afternoon about a few thousand dollars. Speaking about his opponent, Mr. Mills said:

> He boasts of a surplus. I say a government is not entitled to a surplus. There is no stimulus to economy when a large surplus remains in the hands of the government.

I am not going to go as far as Philip Snowden, but I think it is true that when governments get a large amount of money in their hands, they are inclined to spend those moneys rather easily. It makes benevolence so easy.

There is a little incident I am going to give you concerning a million dollars. We know that to the people across the gangway a million dollars does not mean very much. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said that, and I am glad he is not here tonight because I have quoted that remark before when he was here, and I know he does not like it. But in the supplementary estimates last spring provision was made for $500,000 to uproot some of the fruit trees in Nova Scotia. I understand—and I say this on the strength of information which I have always found accurate before—that actually the amount spent on that project up to date is $1,500,000. The government most kindly has found an extra $1 million. I do not know where they obtained the authority. I checked the supplementary estimates today and the amount shown there is only $500,000. But with $600 million at their disposal, how are they to be careful with $1 million? They say, "Oh, well, that is $1 million. There is $599 million left."

Mr. Gardiner: Would the hon. member like to know the reason for that?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Is my arithmetic wrong?

Mr. Gardiner: No. The arithmetic is right. But the provision was for the pulling up of 240,000 trees and the pulling was to have taken three years. But it was found that the trees could all be pulled in the one year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): That is the very point I am making.

Mr. Rowe: Most of them were pulled in Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I am grateful to the Minister of Agriculture, because that is the very point I am making. The government have a great deal of money and do not need to pay any attention to what is in the estimates. They do in one year what is supposed to be done in three. I am grateful to the minister, as I say, for what he has said.

Mr. Gardiner: It is a very good job, as the hon. member will find when we get through.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I am interested to observe, Mr. Speaker, that this is just a joke to ministers opposite. They are taking our money, without any authority, and spending it; and when we point that out to them, they say "Well, it was worth doing." I am not objecting to the trees being taken up. I am objecting to our money being spent without any authority.

I should like to go back to the budget speeches of the last two years and bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, for a moment or two, what I call the "surplus mind" of the Minister of Finance. First of all, I should like to go back to 1947, two years ago. At that time the minister told us that he had a surplus of some $352,000,000. Then he really corrected that by saying that there had been special receipts of $372,000,000, I think, so that the surplus was really no surplus at all. But nevertheless the minister, for reasons that I shall outline to you, made a reduction in taxes at that time. He was rather frank about it. As reported on page 2553 of Hansard, 1947, he said:

> Economic considerations alone would hardly justify immediate tax reductions.

Then he went on to say this:

> One must reach the conclusion that those who must bear them—

That is, the taxes.

> —are not ready to support income taxes on the present scale.

In other words, he just said it should not be done, but the income tax payer wants it, so therefore we shall do it. So taxes were reduced by about $160,000,000.

Then in 1948 the Minister of Finance comes along and says that he has a surplus that would gladden the heart of any Minister of Finance. He has not heard about Philip Snowden. He does not know that he has stolen this money from us. He says that the surplus would gladden the heart of any Minister of Finance. Nevertheless, he gives many reasons, and some of them do not sound so bad, for not making any tax reduction last year. The year before, when he had no real surplus, he made a tax reduction. But last year when he had a surplus which, by various means, he totted up to about $1,180,000,000, he made a tax reduction of some $60,000,000. He explained there should not be any tax reduction then and gave a great many reasons for that. He talked about inflation among other things. One always talks about inflation when in doubt about other things. He also talked about cyclical budgeting, and I shall come back to that in a moment. He entirely ignored some of the suggestions that were made to him by those on this side of the house to the effect that with this big surplus he might have given a little relief to those in the low-income brackets. I myself suggested that some relief might be given. We calculated as well as we could that it would have cost about $125,000,000. But although we had a surplus which, as I say, he totted up by various means to $1,180,000,000, nothing could be done. We suggested a little easement on small companies so that small companies could become big companies, so that they would get a chance to increase enterprise and increase production, which we want. But no; the Minister of Finance would not listen to that suggestion at all.

I just want to make the point that in 1948, when we had a surplus of almost four times as much as the year before, we had no reduction.

Now we come to 1948-49, and in the first nine months of that year we have a surplus of $609,000,000. The minister says sometimes that it gladdens his heart, and sometimes it does not seem to gladden his heart so much. It is what I call a kind of concertina surplus. Sometimes he pulls it out to make it look big and at other times he squeezes it in to make it look small. Recently he has been squeezing it in to make it look small. He points out—

Mr. Sinclair: When I hear the hon. member quoting Philip Snowden—

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I wonder if I could have a little silence from the hon. member across the way.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister explains that he has this surplus but he says, and I ask hon. members to listen to this, that this surplus constitutes the principal source of cash for financing large demands upon our cash reserves over and above the regular budget expenses. I think it is desirable to realize what is going on. The government has hundreds of millions of dollars which they are using not for ordinary budget purposes but for all kinds of other purposes.

An hon. Member: By-elections.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Let me just give one example. The minister says they spent $275 million to increase the assets of the foreign exchange control board. In other words, they used $275 million of money collected from the taxpayers for the purpose of these United States assets which, I suppose, are the premier security in the whole world and for which they could easily have obtained the money in other ways. In addition, another $140 million was spent partly for the purpose of the security investment fund, this highly mysterious fund which has now risen to some $600 million. That is another way in which the government plays about with our money.

This whole business reminds me of a kind of arithmetic question we had when we were children at school. I am sure all hon. members had it. You remember the cistern that had running into it a pipe which would fill it in two hours, and other pipes running out which would empty it, one in three hours, and another in four hours, and so on. We were required to figure out how long it would take to empty or fill the cistern. That question would be all right here if you had one pipe running in, which would be taxes, and another pipe running out, which would be outgo. But here we have the foreign exchange control pipe and the security investment pipe, and so on. They are all running out, and nobody knows where they are running to, least of all the government, in all probability. We therefore just have this thing all jumbled up so that the ordinary citizen has not the slightest idea of what is happening.

I now want to say a word about another thing. Whenever the minister runs out of reasons for this huge surplus, he is asked to fall back on cyclical budgeting. There is such a thing as a proper plan of debt reduction which every sensible man would approve; but that is totally different from crystal gazing, from trying to look years ahead and decide that in this year you will collect several hundred million dollars more than you need because four or five years from now you may be four or five hundred million dollars short.

The Prime Minister stepped into this, and he invoked the name of Mr. Ilsley, whom we all here respect very greatly. Mr. Ilsley, as a good Baptist, had gone back to his bible. He had gone back to the story of Pharaoh and Joseph, to the fat kine that ate the lean kine. My Presbyterian friend over there will know all about this and I hope others do. All hon. members will remember that this was a dream.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): This was Pharaoh's dream and of course Joseph interpreted it. I am quite prepared to believe that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) can have dreams, but I want to know who is to interpret them, because it makes a very great deal of difference.

Mr. Sinclair: Didn't that dream come true?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Oh, yes; that dream came true. I am glad to see that the hon. member for Vancouver North is listening. Have you the bible there?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Good. I am saying that if we could be sure that we had someone who could interpret those dreams as well as Joseph did it might be all right. I am not sure that we would get along so well in these days.

Mr. Rowe: Does it say anything about oleomargarine there?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sinclair: You would not know much about it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I am glad that I have everybody interested in this and that they are all taking part.

Mr. Knowles: It is becoming a coat of many colours.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): The coat of many colours is not in this. That is another story.

Mr. Sinclair: That is Tory leadership.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Tonight I intend to stay well within my time, and I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to get me a little quietness if you will.

As we look back over the last two years and try to take stock of $1,200 million, I think it is a serious matter. It is too bad we have been laughing about this because it is a serious matter. As we look back, in spite of all these reasons that the Minister of Finance gave, which sounded so good—I can see him working over this; I wish he were here now to give us some more—it is perfectly clear that the real reasons that were interesting were political reasons. The cycle they had in mind was not an economic cycle; it was a political cycle.

I have been reading the minister's speech. It was such a good speech. He worked so hard at it. He read pages and pages giving us reasons. I can think of some that were contradictory. At one time he said it was because they had underestimated. Then he said that if they had not taxed that way it would have gone higher. I say the reason that he did not give a reduction in taxes in 1948 is that that year was not an election year. We were going to wait until 1949. We are now in 1949, and as far as I can understand from various things that the Prime Minister and others have said, all the pollsters —though they are now a discredited lot—are anticipating that 1949 is going to be an election year. It looks to me as if they are going to be right.

If that is so, what I want to say is this. It may be that the political cycle has turned up the number in this revolving wheel that the minister and his assistants surveyed so carefully. But I think that the people of Canada are entitled to have their taxes this year assessed on a proper basis, on an economic basis and not on a political basis. They are entitled to ask that their taxes be levied on the basis of what is necessary to run the affairs of this country for the next year, and not to run a lot of enterprises which the government has become interested in and on which they spend a few hundred million dollars here and a few hundred million dollars there.

It is quite true in a general way that if the minister were here he would say that the various projects were mentioned in his speech a year ago. That is quite true. Nevertheless it has nothing to do with the ordinary principles of budgeting. It merely confuses the ordinary man on the street and I say it is time we simplified this situation. It is time that we put this thing in such a way that the ordinary man can understand it. When the budget comes down this year it should have a very substantial reduction. I say that the people of Canada should see to it that that reduction is on a proper basis. I do not believe that the people of Canada, who have had the government's hands deep down in their pockets for years now, unnecessarily, are going to be unduly pleased if those hands are withdrawn just such a little way but still kept pretty deep down.

Mr. Warren: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Green: You are too late.

Mr. Warren: Will the hon. member not agree that the average man on the street might be pleased with the knowledge that we are endeavouring to pay honest debts?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes.

Mr. Warren: Does the hon. member believe that it is a good thing to pay one's debts?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I said that, yes. Why did you not listen to me? I made a good speech on that.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is the proper time for me to follow the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. He has been talking in thousands and millions of dollars, and I am going to talk of the commodities which make these things possible, namely, agriculture. I am going to point out that I come from the riding of Yale. It may not mean a great deal to some of you, but Yale is one of the finest fruit producing ridings in the dominion. It comprises a couple of valleys, the Okanagan and the Similkameen. It has been seriously suggested to me by several people in the riding that the name of Yale should be changed to include Similkameen or Okanagan, one of those, if not the two names. The Okanagan would be more in keeping with the riding because Yale itself is a community wholly outside the riding and has no connection with it.

I shall confine my remarks mostly to local matters, but in doing so I shall only be doing justice to a riding which has been neglected for the last eighteen months or so through not having a member, and in the last session having one for roughly two weeks of that time.

During the last session events took place which affected the welfare of that riding probably more than any other riding in this country. I refer to the Geneva pact, which affected apples. During that period we lost the British preference, and also during that period the British austerity program hurt the fruit industry. Freight rates were increased, costing our fruit industry in the valley approximately $1,000,000 in freight alone. Added to these troubles, we had flood conditions, and that is still with us. All of these things may be ordinary events in the economy of Canada but to us in the Okanagan they are major events, and that is why I wish to deal with them.

Our fruit industry is a major event, and I should like to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, the marvellous growth that this industry has made in the last few years. In 1941 our production of cherries, apricots, peaches, plums, prunes, pears and apples amounted to $7,175,000. In 1946 it had increased to $24,999,000.

The plight of the fruit industry in the maritimes has naturally caused us a great deal of alarm. Stories coming from Nova Scotia, where trees have been pulled out, and the conditions reflected in the talks in this house have naturally caused us alarm. I am going to make one or two suggestions that would materially strengthen our position economically and avert such a calamity before it overtakes us.

First of all, I should like to outline briefly the history of the fruit industry. I shall not go back to the days when we had to sell our fruit at twenty cents per box, to the days when the fruit grower was exploited to such an extent that he did not get enough from the sale of his fruit to pay for his freight. Those were the days of private enterprise, but we are now operating under co-operative methods of production and sale. I hope that those other days are gone forever.

The production of fruit in British Columbia started in a small way at the beginning of this century in an effort to supply the four western provinces. Production increased more rapidly than consumer demand in those provinces. At that time there were no cold storage facilities. Then production began to disturb the available markets toward the end of the great war, and shipments to Great Britain were started in an effort to supply a high-class product. Tremendous investments were made by the growers in order to produce the varieties that were wanted in England. They took out old trees and replanted new ones. In 1932 the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, who was then Prime Minister, and his associates, intimated that the British Columbia fruit industry should feature the production of apples that were suitable for the British market. Following that intimation the industry planted new varieties and increased cold storage facilities. The fruit was well packed and was produced under the best of conditions.

The industry has grown to the point where we are fast approaching the ten million box stage of production. In 1946 our production was 8,800,000 boxes. The pre-war market in the United Kingdom had been developed to take about 50 per cent of our apple production, which was made up of sizes and varieties not acceptable to the Canadian and United States markets. The British housewife wanted a small apple of a particular variety.

The uncertainties of the export trade due to conditions imposed by the war were partly overcome by an increased market demand in Canada. The Canadian worker and the farmer were able to get more apples than they normally could. However, today we find ourselves without the British market, when the industry has been geared to that market for 50 per cent of its product, which is suitable only for that market.

Under these conditions we in the interior of British Columbia feel that we are entitled to special consideration. The British people want our Canadian apples, but a shortage of dollars has denied our apple producers that market. Other member nations of the commonwealth and other countries in the sterling area as well as countries without the commonwealth are supplying the British market with apples. We fear that a prolonged absence of Canadian apples from the British market will mean that those people will develop a taste for other apples and that once again we will have to fight in order to be able to enter that market and have our product accepted by the British people.

In view of the fact that British people are buying apples in other countries, I urge the government to take steps to review the situation, particularly with regard to the exchange difficulties. I submit that when the people of one country desire a commodity produced in another, a commodity which that other country has in abundance, ways and means should be found to carry out some form of commodity exchange to their mutual advantage.

This would not call for the setting up of an export-import board, because we have already established a corporation that could do this work very nicely. Chapter 40 of the statutes of 1946 provides for the setting up of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and section 4 reads:

> The corporation is established for the following purposes:
> (a) to assist in the development of trade between Canada and other nations, and
> (b) to assist persons in Canada
>
> (i) to obtain goods and commodities from outside Canada; and
>
> (ii) to dispose of goods and commodities that are available for export from Canada.
> (2) The corporation shall comply with any general or special direction given by the governor in council or the minister with reference to carrying out its purpose.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) mentioned that the continuing committee on trade exchange is now sitting in London, and perhaps that body could carry out this work. I have stated that 50 per cent of our market is in Great Britain. I feel quite sure that by approaching the problem on the basis of exchange or barter the difficulties of marketing this 50 per cent of our production could be overcome. Great Britain has already approved that principle because she has signed a pact with Poland providing for barter and exchange. If the Canadian government could get into the same frame of mind and accept the barter principle in carrying on their negotiations with Great Britain we could get rid of some of our surplus fruit.

We could sell some of our fruit and berries from the Fraser valley to the British people. If they were not ready to exchange goods, our fruits and vegetables could be converted into sterling, which could be frozen in England. Until such time as England was ready to supply the necessary goods, that sterling could be used. In the meantime the farmers and fruit producers of Canada could be financed by the government, who would have as a pledge the sterling payments which had been frozen in Great Britain. I am quite satisfied that that could be done.

There is another suggestion I am going to make. Probably I am quite green in political matters, but on reviewing the trade between Canada and the United States it has struck me that there are several commodities and articles that could very well be purchased in Great Britain. Our trade with the United States shows an adverse balance and by trading with England we could take up some of that adverse balance and place ourselves on a better footing. We could adopt the barter or exchange principle in trading with Great Britain and thus obtain many of the goods we now buy in the United States. I am thinking particularly of such things as sporting goods, golf clubs, and so on, which England manufactures, and quite well.

I should like to deal now with the domestic market for fruits and vegetables. The bulk of our fruits and vegetables are sold on the domestic market. There is no question but that the stabilization of that market does not involve foreign exchange or international agreements. It merely calls for a sound, sane, federal marketing act. I do not intend to enter into the details required in such an act. Competent authorities are available to do that for the department. I shall merely make one or two observations from the point of view of the fruit and vegetable producers.

Fruit in particular is a perennial crop and calls for long-term marketing. You cannot rotate fruit trees as you can other crops. Therefore you must regard it as a long-term crop which calls for a different type of rules to govern the conduct of its marketing and production. To some extent the production of vegetables follows the same pattern. Through the Canadian federation of agriculture the industry has submitted to the government a sample act in which they seek power to market their products in an orderly fashion. They seek to eliminate unfair practices in the marketing of their product. In normal times such a federal act would give producers more confidence in their industry, and would eliminate many of the present-day abuses to which both the consumer and the producer are subject. It would bring stability to an industry that has always been sensitive to the nature of its commodity.

The government has had this legislation under advisement for several years, and farmers are becoming impatient. A simple act is all that is required. I have a copy of a draft given to me by a farm organization, and they have asked that I include it in my speech.

It is suggested that the marketing act be in simple form but with all the teeth necessary to bring about orderly marketing. I read:

1. The purpose and intent of this act is to provide for the marketing and regulation of the marketing of any farm products that may be designated by the governor in council in accordance with the provisions of this act.

2. Whenever, under any law of a province, any board or agency has been established to market, or regulate the marketing of, any farm product, the governor in council may confer upon such board or agency authority to exercise in respect to interprovincial trade or export trade in such product, such powers similar to all or any of the powers provided by or under such provincial law.

3. The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary for the efficient enforcement and operation of this act, and for carrying out the provisions thereof, according to their true intent and meaning.

4. Every person who fails to comply with any regulation of the governor in council, or with any order, rule or regulation made by any board or agency pursuant to the authority conferred under this act, shall be guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction with a fine of not less than $25 and not more than $1,000, or to imprisonment not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

They feel that such an act has teeth in it. It covers the object they have in mind, security for the farmer in marketing his own products within the dominion. The proof that farmers are ready for it and need it is evident from the fact that all provincial federations of agriculture, the Canadian federation of agriculture, the western agricultural conference, the Canadian horticultural conference, and many other bodies such as the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association, have already endorsed in principle legislation similar to that.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) knows the wishes of the farmers. That is apparent from what he told a gathering in Kelowna on May 17, 1948, as quoted in the Vancouver Sun of May 18, 1948.

Mr. Gardiner assured growers that his government was prepared to grant the federal marketing legislation required, and this would be done as soon as the government allows the present Emergency Transitional Powers Act to expire.

That is the very assurance the growers wanted. I was at the Chateau Laurier this last week attending a conference of the Canadian horticultural council. I was there shortly after they passed this resolution, and I was rather surprised. The resolution reads:

Whereas Canadian farmers face changing conditions with increasing costs of production and declining demand for many of their products;

And whereas the need for dominion marketing legislation is now more urgent than ever;

And whereas at a public meeting held at Kelowna, British Columbia, on May 17, 1948, the dominion Minister of Agriculture stated that the government was prepared to enact marketing legislation that would meet the needs of Canadian farmers;

Therefore be it resolved that the Canadian Horticultural Council register an emphatic protest with the Canadian government against the unreasonable delay in introducing marketing legislation, which legislation is now recognized by all main political parties as being necessary and desirable.

And that if unable to obtain from the government a definite promise that a satisfactory marketing act will be introduced at the earliest possible opportunity, the council insists upon being given valid reasons for the ignoring of the wishes of the farmers of Canada by failure on the part of the government to furnish them with a legal basis upon which the marketing of their products could be stabilized.

I believe that if agriculture can offer greater security to the people employed in it there is no doubt that many young people would stay on the farms who are now leaving them to go into our already overcrowded cities. But they feel they lack that security which is essential, and which could be given to them in part by the passing of a federal marketing act.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was reported recently as saying that industrial production last year exceeded agricultural production for the first time in our history. Canada has always been regarded as a food-producing country, but from his statement it would appear that a change is taking place. I do not know to what extent, but a change is definitely taking place in our status as a food-producing country. I was amazed to find that this trend has had tangible results in some of our international trade. I had occasion to secure certain statistics from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics regarding trade with Australia. I was amazed to find that trade with Australia amounts to total exports of over $38 million and total imports of about $25 million; but all of the imports from Australia are agricultural products and all the exports from Canada are manufactured goods. To me that indicates the trend of the change that was referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I should like to deal briefly with another matter, believing as I do that the British market is only a temporary loss, and that a federal marketing act will be introduced, both of which events would not only bring stability to our industry but make it possible for us to consider its extension as well. I believe that steps should be taken now to protect the interests of the Okanagan and Similkameen valleys. The Okanagan regional advisory committee have been studying the resources of this district for several years. They are of the opinion that the two chief resources upon which the population must depend are irrigable land and hydroelectric power.

Both of these resources are complementary to one another. They have given all our other resources a very low rating. Their present concern is with the damming of the Arrow lakes, and the materials to be used in the construction of the proposed dam. That is what is causing them worry. According to my information, owing to the cold winter, water supplies are drying up in the state of Washington, and agitation has begun for storage of water in the Arrow lakes, the interests to be served being primarily those of the United States. So far the press items are limited to a proposal for an earth dam near Castlegar or Syringa.

No mention has been made of any power development. It has been said that a subsidy of several millions would be paid the provincial government of British Columbia for the storage of the water. I have no quarrel whatsoever with that; all I ask is that any storage dam that may be constructed should be built of reinforced concrete or some similar material and so designed that in future it may be used for the development of hydroelectric power. May I also suggest that the Okanagan interest in this project be kept in mind, especially during the period of technical studies that precedes design and construction, and before the international joint commission which is now considering the proposal.

At this time I should like to place on record for future use some reasons why the interests of the Okanagan and Similkameen valleys should be protected in this proposed development. The figures I am going to quote were supplied by the regional planning board I have mentioned, which was set up with the approval of the provincial government at Victoria. In the area I am dealing with, commonly called the irrigation area, there has been an influx of nearly twenty-one thousand people in the last six years; and this movement continues unabated. This has caused a high demand for our limited irrigable land, causing a sharp rise in prices. Canada will continue to grow and our particular district, with its fine climate, will always attract its quota of newcomers. While our climate probably will prolong their lives, it will not provide a living unless they have the land as well; and we are looking to the future and are anxious to meet this need, and to provide the means whereby our people can live under healthy conditions and at the same time maintain a high standard of living.

Our present limited land cannot carry our population. We must enlarge our irrigation projects and bring new land under water. At present the land is mainly irrigated by gravity, with some small pumping schemes. Water is supplied for a total irrigated area of 44,897 acres. I need not give the details as to how that is made up, but the bulk is 28,037 acres of fruit trees. The gravity water is not available for 23,421 acres of fruit and vegetable land and 13,500 acres of mixed-farming land in this region. That is an area practically equal to that now irrigated, which now provides a high standard of living for all the people living there. Therefore we need a policy based on power to supply water for 36,000 acres, at a cheap rate.

According to a survey it has been found that without irrigation it takes approximately fifteen acres to support one person; but when the same land is brought under irrigation and intensively farmed, as in the Okanagan, four-fifths of an acre will produce a good living for one person. So these added 36,000 acres placed under pump irrigation could support a population of at least 36,000; and we could also develop our dairy industry to meet the demands of that increased population. I have a table showing in detail the lands comprising the 36,000 acres I have mentioned, compiled by the bureau of post-war rehabilitation and reconstruction. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like it included in Hansard, rather than take up the time of the house in reading it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. gentleman shall have permission to place the table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jones: The table follows:

During the war some of these lands, particularly the government lands, were frozen in the interests of veterans, but there are still no veterans on them because there is no water. Beyond a few preliminary surveys of soils and water supplies, no actual development of any major irrigation project has yet been completed. Today we have a market for the products of from five to six thousand acres of canning crops. We have the canneries and the facilities for packing as well as the markets; but we have not the irrigated land to produce the crops. In addition to this, eleven irrigation districts administering some 15,261 acres report an insufficient water supply; and of course the yield and quality of their products is reduced accordingly. They, too, need power for irrigation.

Of course the cost of power is a limiting factor in determining how high it is economical to pump. In the list I have just submitted is shown the height of pumping required, which averages 286 feet. One large grower, Mr. J. W. Hughes, who is located just outside Kelowna, is already pumping some 450 feet on a high-priced crop, and finds it profitable. For the Columbia basin project they will pump 280 feet at Grand Coulee dam, at a power cost of half a mill per kilowatt hour. At Foster creek, down the Columbia from the dam, it is proposed to pump 600 feet with power at between one-half and three-quarters of a mill per kilowatt hour. Current rates in the Okanagan of $4.50 net per horsepower per month represent 6·94 mills per kilowatt hour, as compared with the Grand Coulee power cost of half a mill.

I realize that power developed for irrigation alone would leave the power plant without customers during the winter months. Therefore I suggest that we are ready for vast industrial development to balance our economy in the Okanagan and take a great deal of the load for the winter months. We are also confident that the West Kootenay would purchase our surplus. Already they are purchasing a small surplus from Princeton, and some from the hydroelectric power in Vernon, and they supply the full power needs of C.M. & S. at Trail, so probably they would welcome that. As a means of developing a winter market for the energy used in pumping in summer I am going to suggest that it is feasible to heat homes by electricity. At least that possibility should be investigated. In the study of the Bonneville power administration, as reported in the bulletin "Pacific Northwest Opportunities", I find this statement:

> There is little question that for moderately well insulated homes, power rates of approximately one-half cent per kilowatt will prove definitely competitive with other fuels. Advantages are convenience, cleanliness and automatic control, which favour the use of electricity.
> Actual operating experience with fifty electrically heated houses at Longview, Washington, indicate that no unusual peaks are experienced. Accurate tests show that maximum demands with thermostatic control averaged 5 kilowatts per individual house.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit a very friendly question?

Mr. Jones: I will talk to you outside afterward, if you wish.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May I ask if the source of the water is the lake? I gather it is.

Mr. Jones: The main source of the irrigation project would be Okanagan lake; but there are other lakes, since the area we are dealing with is from Kamloops to the international boundary. In the table I have placed on Hansard is shown the location of the districts to be pumped.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): In other words you want to irrigate higher levels?

Mr. Jones: Yes, levels that cannot be irrigated now by gravity.

The offer of a load-building rate opens the way to a wider use of electricity, but it may take years before the more expensive equipment is in common use. Given a rate at which electricity can compete with other fuels for cooking and heating water, the average man is prevented from taking advantage of the favourable conditions by the high cost of equipment and the terms of sale. I suggest, therefore, that a policy of low-cost financing of high consumption equipment should be introduced as a means of building the market for electricity. Before the war the United States government loaned money at around three per cent interest for this kind of financing. This enabled retailers to lower service charges and thus encourage sales. A similar policy would speed up conversion to electric cooking and water heating in the Okanagan region.

These lands, I might point out, are amongst the wealthiest untapped resources of the Dominion of Canada. The increase in population of our Pacific coast cities and the prairie provinces in general will increase the demand for our fruit, vegetable and dairy products. The interior of British Columbia is the logical place to produce these products, not in California. We are not asking the government at this time to develop a hydro-electric project, but asking them to protect the future interests of the Okanagan and Similkameen people by including their future power needs in any proposed plans for the development of the Arrow lakes project. We are asking that any proposed dam provide adequate facilities for hydroelectric development.

When our marketing difficulties are overcome, when we have first-class arrangements for the barter or exchange of goods with other nations, then we can quickly develop that land to give you some of the finest fruit and vegetables in the Dominion of Canada.

I have been considerably worried over the attitude of the government to the flood conditions of last year, plus the possible flood conditions of the coming year. The commission determining the best course to guard against future floods in the Okanagan made its report some time ago. The cost of protection, I understand, is in the neighbourhood of $1,700,000. The government has been requested time and again by the people, probably driven by the fear of another flood, to start this work. To date, a year has gone by and the condition in which we find the Okanagan lakes and rivers is worse than it was a year ago before the floods took place. The creeks are silted up, the boulders and rubble are still there. Certain of these creeks cannot possibly take care of the resultant runoff from the heavy blanket of snow which lies on the land surrounding our lakes.

The dominion experimental station itself lost some land in the flood of last year. There is a good chance it will lose a great deal more this year, not only by erosion but owing to the action of the flood in Trout creek. Some of the experimental station buildings are in direct line with the flow of water down the creek if the creek is unable to follow its present channel. I assure you the creek cannot possibly follow its present channel, for the reason that there is much low-lying land in the surrounding area.

I have just one other matter to which I should like to draw the attention of the house. I should like to make an appeal for the old people. I am going to ask you to consider the high cost of living, which hits the old people possibly more than any other group in Canada. I do not know whether you have old people in Ottawa but, if you have, I do not know how they pay rent. The old people find it difficult to pay rent in British Columbia. I am sure that if there are any old age pensioners living in Ottawa they have not much left with which to buy food.

Speaking for the old age pensioners of British Columbia, where possibly we have a higher cash pension than any other Canadian province, I find that even in that province the old people are having a grim economic struggle. They can afford no luxuries. I shudder to even contemplate what their life is like in non-pension bonus provinces where their maximum income is $360. The greatest hardship in British Columbia is where two old people have to live on one pension. This should be eliminated by the granting of an adequate pension so that two people could live decently upon it.

It is my belief that the means test should be abolished and the pension should be paid to everybody as soon as they reach a pensionable age, just the same as the children's allowances are paid, thus removing the stigma attached to the payment of the old age pension. The pension should be payable on the date of the application. I find that a lot of old people get muddled about the form. There are many documents which must be produced. Sometimes there is a period of two or three months in which these documents are brought from England. The pension starts only at the date it is registered in Vancouver. I suggest the pensionable date should commence on the date of the first application.

This is not a party issue. I believe every member in this house is sympathetic to the proposal to increase the pension and to lower the age. We have financed two wars without any difficulty and, if one is to judge from the sentiments expressed in this house, we are prepared to finance a third war. The cost of increasing the old age pension is only a fraction of the cost of war. Really, it is a matter of whether we are willing to do it or not.

We face a serious problem in connection with men who are over forty-five years of age. I have here a letter from a man who has just turned forty-five. About two years ago the government told the municipalities to try to find work for men over forty-five to ease the pressure on unemployment insurance and so on. This man about whom I am speaking is a man qualified for the postal service. He left the postal service after twenty years' service and lately applied for re-admission. He was told he was over forty-five years of age and too old to get the job. I bring that to your attention because the government itself must set the example and find work for people over forty-five, and not leave it to others to do it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): I draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that his time is up and he cannot continue without the unanimous consent of the members.

Some hon. Members: Let him continue.

Mr. Jones: These people are not seeking charity. They are the people who have built up this dominion. They have built up what we have today, what we are enjoying now. Many of these people lost what they had built up during the depression and during the days of high taxation. I know of one man who was reputed to be worth $200,000 twenty years ago. He invested in railroads, mines and real estate, all the things in which a man usually invests. He lost it all. Today he is dependent upon the old age pension. His money is gone. Many of these old people have contributed their own efforts, their own work plus their money to the building up of this dominion during their lifetime, just as this man did. We are not granting charity but justice to these old people. On their behalf, I am entering a plea.

Mr. Maurice Lalonde (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne is characterized by the magnitude of the subjects with which it deals, by a cohesion of concrete proposals which constitute a well drawn up legislative program. Other colleagues in a masterly way dealt with and authoritatively discussed national problems which I will not attempt to consider immediately, but which I will reserve for a later date. I will confine my remarks to the North Atlantic pact and to certain local problems.

I remember the numerous protests which arose in this house in 1937 when the federal government of that day asked for a few additional millions for re-armament purposes. It cannot be denied that some of us in all good faith saw therein a statement of imperialist policy. Others thought that it was a foolish race towards useless re-arming. Unfortunately, the tragic events of 1939 proved that the Liberal leaders of that time were right. Together with other free nations of the world Canada was dragged into the vortex of the second world war. It then appeared that we had not spent foolishly the money we had put into re-arming. At the present time, Mr. Speaker, we face a similar situation.

War did not kill evil. War did not kill nazism. War did not kill communism. We have not found yet the true peace formula. The world is divided into two different political ideologies, communism and democracy, and some day one or the other will have to prevail. Is war imminent? Only God knows. Only one fact remains certain: the old conflict between the ideologies remains. The strife between good and evil, which is as old as the world, will disappear only when the last suns have ceased to shine. Attempting to unify the whole of humanity under a single political unit would be aiming at Utopia. Those governments which are aware of their responsibilities must lay their cards on the table and reveal to their citizens the truth as they know it through the privileged position they occupy. However brutal these facts may be, we must know them.

I wish to thank the Prime Minister for revealing completely and truthfully the position Canada occupies among the nations, together with the magnitude of our commitments toward the other free nations of the world. Some in my province were alarmed when they heard this. We are not quite accustomed to politicians' frankness. We will therefore be a party to the North Atlantic pact. This commitment bears several meanings. It shows that our country has attained, through its efforts, a high rank in the international sphere. It means that real progress has been made towards our total constitutional independence. We thus assert ourselves as a military and economic power of the first order. By adhering to this pact Canada takes its rank among the great nations of the world.

It would indeed be impossible to secure unanimous consent with regard to such a question. With their old mentality of isolation, a loud minority in the province of Quebec will surely criticize the north Atlantic pact. One Rene Chaloult, trying to mimic my predecessor in this house—and God knows, Chaloult does not measure up to Bourassa's knees—shouts his noisy ultra-nationalist principles in the chamber of the Quebec legislature. But he who opens his eyes and faces the hard facts and the unavoidable truth will better understand the tragic scope of his duties than he who, through political design and with an eye on election results, conceals from his constituents the only meaning of the obligations they have assumed. And still we should remember the teachings of these last few years.

Can a member of parliament who knows his duties advocate seriously, and without wincing, that Canada remain totally isolated among the free nations of the world? Can we imagine that nowadays an honest public man can go back to his constituents and make the same promises and take the same pledges concerning our external policy which we made and took with sincere statesmen like Lapointe, King, Rinfret and Cardin? Can we still believe that events will be shaped by men and that men will not be led by events?

The other night, when I heard the ineffable member for Pontiac repeat the same worn out, isolationist stories which we heard on the hustings in 1935, I became convinced that the hon. member must have been sleeping during these last thirteen years and had not yet awakened to the thunder of the frightful war which upset the world.

Mr. Speaker, whether Rene Chaloult likes it or not, Canada is changing. Whether the isolationist school likes it or not, Canada has become of age. Whether our ultra-nationalist friends like it or not, Canada, owing to its providential position and the forces inherent in the very nature of things, is a great nation and as such must assume important duties and terrific obligations. No power in this world will prevent our country from climbing the road which will eventually lead it to constitutional independence. I am most upset when I see that those who protest against the importance of our international commitments are precisely those people who demand total independence for our country. How can they reconcile the total independence of Canada with the weakening of the obligations which are a part of the status of total independence? How can they stop the irresistible progress of events and repudiate the political evolution of our country during the last twenty-five years?

As I recall the events of the last years of the nineteenth century I think of the time when, under the inspiration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, political liberalism was being properly defined; when, in a slow and gradual process of labour, the various constituent factors of Canadian political liberalism and of Quebec nationalism were being separated and shaped into different units; when, under the pressure of jingo traditionalism, the political theory of Canadian conservatism was being evolved, as dictated by protectionist interests of high finance; when after the first world war, under the leadership of Mackenzie King, the political life of Canada was beginning to free itself from colonial ties, and the independence of Canada within the British commonwealth was being proclaimed by the Quebec nationalist school led by Bourassa; when the Tory conservatism of Sir Robert Borden was sinking deeper in the old tradition of closer colonial ties; when, after the coup d'état of 1926, the Canadian people, at the request of Mackenzie King, were telling those advocating imperial solidarity that we were determined to tear loose from the colonial strait-jacket, in order to enjoy the privileges and freedom of free nations. When I think of all that, Mr. Speaker, then I realize that our constitutional evolution was swift and continuous.

We then had Westminster, which was the first test of our strength and the first important constitutional step towards Canadian independence. A Canadian signed our first treaties with foreign powers. In 1939, war was declared by the Canadian parliament, under its own authority, and Canada entered into this conflict of its own free will, without subservience to colonial ties. Bourassa himself, in his book entitled "What do we owe to Great Britain?", admitted that Canada must take part in any foreign war where the prestige of Great Britain and France would be at stake, as long as such a step be not dictated by the strength of colonial ties.

Then we attended international peace conferences, where Canada was brilliantly represented by statesmen like the minister for external affairs, the Minister of Transport and the parliamentary assistant to the minister for external affairs, and the hon. member for Lotbiniere, all of whom spoke on behalf of Canada, a free country, where free men live, a country which, in the short period of half a century, became an essential factor to the peace of the world.

We must admit, Mr. Speaker, that we are now paying the ransom of freedom, and a politician who would allow himself to be led by the fear of electoral results, and would neglect to raise the curtain of secrecy in order to tell the brutal truth to his constituents, would fall down miserably in the fufilment of his duties.

Do our opponents wish to ignore twenty-five years of history and continue to deceive the people of Quebec by leaving them under a sense of false security? Is it their intention to forget fifty years of keen struggles toward national independence, in order to satisfy a very small part of a backward public opinion, and for the advantage of an old-fashioned political ideology? After the frightful events of the last decades and the tragic and forceful lessons imposed upon humanity during the last ten years, I cannot admit, Mr. Speaker, that in my own province a person can so lack realism as to deny that it is necessary and urgent for all free democratic countries to unite for the defence of their common inheritance.

When I support the government on this question, I know that I am fulfilling an imperative duty towards my constituents. Far from being a hostile demonstration, the North Atlantic pact is rather the expression of a collective determination towards universal security. Russia slightly raised her iron curtain when she offered to discuss peace. Would she already realize that an alarmed public opinion is exerting pressure upon her people? Would she be aware of the importance of the coalition of free nations which she knows she will never be able to defeat?

The future alliance, Mr. Speaker, is already bearing fruits. Stalin offers to talk peace, he offers democracies a wavering hand, and I believe democracies should not accept Moscow's offer straight away. If we bear in mind the treasons and repudiations of solemn pledges, the repudiation of solemn signatures affixed to official parchments, will we believe that it is still possible to have faith in Russia and her satellites? It is indeed interesting to recall the pacts which our enemies tramped upon from 1889 to 1939. The Hague conventions of 1899 and 1907; the treaty of Versailles, of June 28, 1919; the treaty of Berlin, August 25, 1921; the treaty of mutual security of Locarno, October 16, 1925; the treaty of arbitration between Germany and Czechoslovakia, October 16, 1925; the treaties of arbitration between Germany on one hand, Belgium and Poland on the other hand; the treaty of conciliation of June 2, 1926, between Germany and Denmark; the Kellogg-Briand pact of August 27, 1928, under which the signatories renounced war; the treaty of arbitration of September 11, 1939, between Germany and Luxembourg; the treaty of nonaggression between Germany and Poland, January 26, 1934; the guarantees given by Germany on May 21, 1935, to the federal state of Austria securing inviolability of its territory; the convention of July 11, 1936, between Austria and Germany; the German guarantees of January 30, 1937, April 28, 1939, August 26 and October 6, 1939, that the neutrality of the Netherlands would be respected; the conventions of January 30, 1937, October 13, 1937, April 28, 1939, August 26 and October 6, 1939, offering Belgium the same pledges and the same guarantees; similar conventions between Germany and Czechoslovakia, on March 11 and September 26, 1938; the treaty of Munich of September 29, 1938, the guarantees which Germany gave to Norway, September 3, April 28 and October 6, 1939, that the independence and sovereignty of that country would be respected; similar pledges to Luxembourg, April 28 and August 26, 1939; nonaggression treaties between Germany and Denmark, May 31, 1939; between Germany and Russia, August 23, 1939; guarantees which Germany gave Yugoslavia, October 6, 1939, concerning the neutrality and territorial integrity of that country; there you have, Mr. Speaker, so many scraps of paper which were torn up by Germany, so many lessons which we should not forget.

We will soon have the North Atlantic pact. Let us hope earnestly that the signatories of this pact will be sincere, since without sincerity no human convention can be effective.

(Translation):

Moreover, such a unification of the material strength of free nations is conclusive proof of the futility of international isolationism. I ask those who advocate the total independence of Canada on the world scene to suggest a definite formula for the participation of Canada in the bilateral benefits of trade agreements and for her withdrawal from bilateral commitments. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that we can always demand benefits from other countries without assuming ourselves the risks inherent in such deals. If the constitutional independence of Canada can, in the course of time, become a reality and attain its ultimate perfection, I submit that our country cannot at this time isolate herself in total independence from the world scene. We are now bound to the other free countries, and these must take into consideration Canada's influence in framing their foreign policy. Exposure to danger makes men wiser. The great human brotherhood finds in world events its most positive manifestation.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal, for the next few minutes, with certain local problems. Obviously, it is hardly possible, in the course of the few moments at our disposal, to analyse each and every one of the problems mentioned in the speech from the throne. I would like however to submit to you, Mr. Speaker, three problems affecting in particular the people I represent, namely, the tourist industry, forest protection and income tax. Other hon. members have already dealt with them in a much more eloquent fashion. Already these members have asked from the government a substantial reduction in the taxation of personal incomes of less than $3,000 a year.

A few moments ago, I heard the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) express his amazement at the government surpluses. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that no Conservative government ever administered the country in such a way as to show a surplus. During all the time our friends opposite were in power they had nothing but deficits. They are therefore surprised when the Liberal government of today shows a surplus. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) resorted to arguments I would like to refute when he stated that the government was playing with its surplus. I am taking the liberty to remind him that according to official information which has been given to us by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), it was quite the opposite. The government paid the people's debts by reducing the national debt by almost $3 billion, while paying such expenses as are authorized by the laws and statutes.

The hon. member was quite content to make statements without adducing any concrete evidence that these expenditures were illegal. The charges leveled at the Minister of Finance, the latter will refute much more ably than I could when he brings down the budget.

I wish to refer now to an important matter concerning Labelle county and the surrounding counties, located in the beautiful Laurentian region. I refer to the tourist industry.

According to official statistics, the tourist trade earned this country $166,354,000 in 1945 and, in 1946, $220,800,000. It is therefore one of our chief industries and one that should receive proper support from the authorities.

Right away, the Quebec Tories, who forever borrow misleading misnomers and hide under the cloak of the Union Nationale party, will state that the Canadian constitution puts the tourist industry outside the ken of the dominion government. Mr. Speaker, the Canadian constitution does not forbid the dominion government to co-operate with those who wish to do so. I am convinced that the present government is willing to spend the money required to help the tourist industry in our locality.

Mr. Speaker, my constituents have three means of livelihood: farming, lumbering and the tourist industry. May I therefore urge the dominion government to dig deep down in its coffers, even in its surplus, if possible, and promote the tourist trade in our district by building good roads, as was done from 1935 to 1937.

Mr. Speaker, I will support any legislation designed to help the provincial governments establish tourist guide training schools. The first question of any visitor to Canada is to ask if we have good guides to take him where game and fish are most plentiful.

We have, of course, specialists in this field, but I believe that such men would profit greatly if the Quebec provincial government, assisted by federal funds, could provide them with guide training schools where they would learn to perfect their trade.

Lumbering, the second largest industry of my county, must be protected at the earliest possible moment. Between 1938 and 1945, it brought this country hundreds of millions of dollars. If the house permits, I shall place on record a table showing that in 1945, this country produced almost 7 million cubic feet of lumber, valued at more than $133 million. The lumber industry is therefore one of those that deserves assistance, but, Mr. Speaker, it—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. Has he unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Casselman: Two minutes.

Mr. Lalonde: It will take only a few seconds, but perhaps it will take an hour to understand it.

Year	Quantity (Cu. ft.)	Average price per thousand cubic feet	Value
1938	634,954,194	$ 96.27	$ 61,125,628

1940	559,035,364	109.20	60,948,570
1941	649,250,184	119.12	77,341,826
1942	698,334,208	136.12	95,060,441
1943	591,672,197	155.55	92,032,163
1944	653,989,310	175.72	114,918,046
1945	698,204,256	190.86	133,261,833

However, Mr. Speaker, I wish you could see the sorry spectacle the forests present from the air. Thousands of acres of wooded areas have been clear-cut, not unlike meadows shorn of their hay, and in the north of my constituency the forests are disappearing with a terrific speed. We find that logs must now be looked for at a distance of more than 50 miles from the mills in Mont Laurier while a few years ago we could get them a few miles away. I say, Mr. Speaker, that an emergency exists and that the dominion government should take immediate action with a view to helping the provincial governments to plant trees in sufficient number to ensure future crops.

The program forecast by the speech from the throne is one of those which call for approval.

It is national in scope. Let our forests be despoiled and in less than twenty-five years you will witness desolation instead of the prosperity of our people. Let our forests be despoiled and within twenty-five years there will be no more tourist business. Let our forests be despoiled and within twenty-five years there will be widespread unemployment.

I congratulate the government on taking this situation in hand. Mr. Speaker, the government will never spend too much on helping the provinces restore to our forests the life of which they are being depleted to satisfy the needs of trade.

I am happy to see my good friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in his seat. May I support the requests he probably heard already for tax reductions. It is imperative,

Mr. Speaker, that the government grant adequate tax reductions to white-collar workers.

I will not make so bold as to suggest a figure, being no mathematician, but I believe that if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) could see his way clear to grant white-collar workers and those whose income is less than $3,000 a year income tax reductions proportionately equal to the reduction in national debt, I believe that people would be satisfied. This would mean a decrease, if I am well informed, of approximately $100 million a year.

There is another project which I would like to submit to this house, that of assistance to municipalities. Before the war we passed a law enabling the federal government to lend municipalities money with which they could build waterworks, sewers and other local improvements. We were fortunate enough to benefit from this law in my district. It has helped us to alleviate unemployment. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether the government could not examine, at an early moment, the advisability of renewing these provisions. There now exists an incipient condition of unemployment. Admittedly it is not yet serious; still it is not impossible that, within a few months or a few years, we will be faced with real unemployment.

The coming economic readjustment cannot happen without some of us being hurt. Can anyone think of more beneficial legislation than one involving the spending of dominion funds on local improvements in our municipalities?

Mr. Speaker, in making those suggestions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), I ask him to plead with his colleagues on behalf of the electorate so that this legislation may be re-enacted during the present session. If it has become obsolete, let us take the steps required so that by next spring our municipalities, especially the poorer ones, may benefit by it.

Perusal of the speech from the throne might lead to other considerations. However, I have nothing else to add tonight, except this final thought which has just crossed my mind.

As the years go by and men and things disappear, as we begin to grasp the true meaning of life and understand that men come and go but their achievements stand, we detach ourselves from the contingencies of human politics and consider only truth and reality. Who among us will be here, in this house, a century from now? No one. The coming generations will then be sending other Canadians to sit in these same seats and discuss other problems and follow other ideals. Though our names will be forgotten our achievements will stand and it is through them that our sons will judge us, because they will be eternal. Glory, prestige and human ambition will vanish as the echo of a lonely osprey's cry dies out on a peaceful summer evening over our Laurentian lakes. It is because I have a deep and burning faith in those things that I ask my fellow countrymen to tie up their names with works of Christian peace and of real progress which time will chisel in the rock of history, as an indelible memorial to those who will have served their country well.

(Text):

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the amendment to the amendment. I do so at this time because this is the conclusion of my first full week in the House of Commons. In view of the fact that the motion which we opposed, but which was adopted by the house, will bring to an end temporarily, the debate on the speech from the throne, I think I should deal tonight with certain of the things that have been said during this past week, because I do not think it would be either desirable, or in fact appropriate, that they should be left unchallenged. I confess that I came here with a natural feeling of respect for the great chamber in which the nation's business is conducted. I had expected during the early days that I would be attending the sessions of the House of Commons to hear debates in keeping with the measure of responsibility that is supposed to be assumed by this house. I must confess that in the ten years I was in the Ontario legislature I did not in any one week hear, from the government ranks, or from elsewhere, speeches which reflected so little of a sense of responsibility as many of the speeches have during this past week.

A very considerable part of the time that has been devoted to debate by those sitting in the government ranks has been employed for a type of personal attack which, on the one hand, is a reflection on the members making those attacks, and which, on the other hand, does indicate a very flattering degree of attention to speeches I have made over a very long number of years. It is quite obvious that a good deal of effort has been devoted to an examination of those speeches. Of course, members may not be aware that this is not the first occasion on which similar efforts have been made to do the same kind of thing. Really it is not in any way new nor in any way original.

There are some points that I should like to make in regard to the emphasis on consistency which was put forward first of all by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), then in such a lordly manner by the new Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), and also by others who have spoken. It is very interesting to listen to these lectures on consistency which perhaps invite an examination of the consistency of some of those who have assumed the role of high authority on this particular virtue. This afternoon we had one rather interesting example of that very thing. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), throughout the major part of his speech, made a presentation of the Canadian position with which every Canadian will agree, and of which members of this house may well be proud. It was unfortunate that, perhaps carried away by the new sensation of being a member of the party he has recently adopted, he should have found it necessary in the middle of that very important and responsible speech to embark upon what was so manifestly a political interjection. He had this to say:

> There is, however, Mr. Speaker, a serious omission in the unanimity with which this matter is otherwise regarded in the house in that no single Progressive Conservative member has so much as mentioned the pact.

A little later he qualified that by saying he believed the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) had referred to it in some way; then he went on to say:

> Why no reference of any kind to this very important measure which is forecast in the speech from the throne? Is this parliament not united in the objectives that we are seeking through this pact? Or are any of us playing politics with peace at this time?

It was very appropriate for him to make that remark, because unfortunately he was playing politics when he did so. The answer is given in his own remarks, at the beginning; these are his words:

> I assume there will be a debate on external policy later in this session and possibly a debate devoted more particularly to the ratification of the north Atlantic pact. Much of what I should like to say, therefore, in regard to external affairs generally will have to be reserved for those occasions.

That, Mr. Speaker, was precisely why I omitted to discuss—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: —why I omitted to discuss—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: That was exactly why I omitted to discuss a pact that is not yet before this house, a pact no member of this house has seen except the government, in fact a pact which it would be most improper to discuss until the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has tabled it in this house. But may I say to some of those who are giving such striking evidence of their disregard for the business of this house that a subject of this kind is one that should be discussed with knowledge of the details, and hon. members opposite may feel quite certain that when that pact is before this house it will be discussed in a way which will leave no doubt about my stand or the stand of any other member of this party. And may I say to some of those who are making these strange and not very impressive sounds that, long before any of them were prepared to recognize that there were such things as international problems of this kind, my position was perfectly clear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest to hon. members on both sides that they must not interrupt the hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. Drew: I want also to refer to another statement that was made this afternoon. Referring to a radio address by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) last night in which a new statement of policy—which might well have been given to the house—was announced to the people of Canada, I asked whether that suggested that we were to deal with this very important question of amending the British North America Act during the present session and, if so, whether this was to be dealt with in consultation with the provinces. The answer was that it would not be dealt with without consulting the provinces, and that there was no possibility of dealing with it during the course of the present session because of the difficulty of the problem involved. Now I suggest to the members of this house, to those on the government side as well as elsewhere, that they ask themselves exactly why this statement was made last night if there is no intention of dealing with this very important subject during the present session. Was that just a political suggestion, with no intention of carrying it out? Let us see just what the position of the Prime Minister is in regard to meeting the provinces in conference. The other day when we were discussing the necessity of having the governments come together to deal with those problems which affect the people of Canada so seriously, the Prime Minister left no doubt that he did not believe we could have any general conferences between the provinces and the dominion government with any hope of success. This is what he said, at page 83 of Hansard:

> The results there show that, when we have meetings with the provinces that are not full dress performances of the premiers, their ministers and associates, we do get effective co-operation and collaboration to the benefit of the general Canadian public.

Later he went on to say, at page 86 of Hansard:

> I am convinced that conferences of that kind, when there are elections in the offing, are stalemated from the start. There is no genuine desire at any of these conferences to deal with the various matters on their merits; and they were not dealt with on their merits. Since then on many occasions we have had meetings with representatives of the provincial governments, meetings with officials, and meetings even on the ministerial level, and have done things that have been for the benefit of the whole community. But when we have these full-dress provincial conferences, such attitudes are taken—and I will not say it is all on one side; there may be just as great fault on our side as on the other—that it is quite impossible to expect anyone who has his eye cocked on elections to do anything about the merits of the matter under discussion.

Let us see exactly what that means. The conference to which these remarks referred met on August 6, 1945, and the Prime Minister tells us there were elections in the offing in Ontario and Quebec. He seems to have forgotten that there had been an election in Quebec a very short time before, with results which perhaps were not entirely satisfactory to him. There had also been an election in Ontario just two months before, almost to the day, at which time the Progressive Conservative party was returned to power for a second consecutive time with 66 out of the 90 seats in that legislature.

We had a fairly satisfactory mandate to speak for the people of Ontario in spite of what was said by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) last night. I may say that mandate was continued on a very satisfactory basis in June of this past year.

An hon. Member: What about High Park?

Mr. Drew: You know, Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting to hear references to High Park because the early part of this session was devoted to extolling the virtues of the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King), who was hailed as one of the great examples of leadership of a political party. He holds the all-time record for having been defeated as Prime Minister in the various ridings in which he ran.

Mr. Sinclair: But never because of cocktail bars.

Mr. Drew: So, if I did avoid the necessity of a second election in High Park which appeared to be quite necessary, may I say that was the first occasion on which, as premier, I had had that experience. I still have to have it many times more before I equal the record of the right hon. member for Glengarry.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You asked for that one.

Mr. Sinclair: He was never defeated on cocktail bars; he was defeated on issues.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Sharply so.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the statement that has just been made is a statement to the effect that, although a series of elections had just taken place in 1945 when the conference met, there was no hope of success because those attending that conference were not sincerely approaching the problem before them. Now that, Mr. Speaker, is a serious reflection upon every premier of every province of Canada, including the Hon. Angus Macdonald, the Hon. Mr. McNair and the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson).

Mr. Garson: Look at me worrying.

An hon. Member: He does not mind it as much as you do.

Mr. Drew: I will say this much, that the present Minister of Justice was preaching for a call during that conference and he has been called. This is a statement to the effect that these men, chosen by the people of their own provinces, were not meeting here with any sincere intention of reaching a solution of the problems before them. No statement which has been made here or elsewhere throughout this country more clearly indicates the reason that conference broke down, because the Prime Minister indicated he felt quite sure that was likely, and each delegate felt that in his own mind as well. Well, he cannot speak for the others, but he can speak for himself. He apparently left no doubt that he was not approaching this in such a way that he ever expected success.

Now the Minister of Justice, after having gone to the United States to find someone who had come here to get an official handout from those who give the anonymous statements on behalf of the government, and then getting as far away as Tasmania, challenged me to produce any statement which suggested I had not been responsible for the breakdown of the conference. Let me quote one witness who was not in Tasmania but was here in Ottawa at the time that conference was meeting in May of 1946. This is what he said.

> If this conference fails—then the responsibility rests squarely on the doorstep of the dominion government due to its attitude of uncompromising rigidity as expressed by the Minister of Finance.

That was the statement of Mr. Manning, the premier of Alberta, who, along with Premier Macdonald of Nova Scotia, made statements which stand out in the clear and which constitute an extremely important record of the efforts of the provinces of this country, or most of them, really to reach results at that conference.

Mr. Garson: On a point of privilege, what I said in my remarks, as I recall them, was that the hon. gentleman, the leader of the opposition, should produce some statement of an objective and judicial character, meaning thereby someone not connected with the conference itself. Let him produce such, if he can.

Mr. Drew: What the Minister of Justice actually said was:

> I challenge him to do so—some judgment of an equally objective character—

Mr. Garson: Yes, equally objective.

Mr. Drew: Equally objective to a man from Tasmania. This house has it within its power, Mr. Speaker, to express an opinion that there should be a conference in which all the provinces can meet with the dominion government to achieve these results which can only be brought about by the various governments coming together. We have been told by the Prime Minister first over the radio—we might have liked to hear it in this house but that is the way we heard it—of the tremendous importance of being able to amend our constitution. Having been told that, we are told, first, that he has no intention of bringing that up during the present session and that, while he does believe he should discuss it with the provinces before he does anything about it, he has no intention of meeting the provinces at any time.

Mr. Rowe: He says it would be a waste of time.

Mr. Drew: Yes; he says it would be a waste of time.

Mr. Brunelle: That is what is happening now.

Mr. Rowe: I do not know what hon. members opposite are going to do now. One can almost see the handwriting on the wall.

Mr. Hartt: Stop your dreaming.

Mr. Rowe: The chickens are coming home to roost.

Mr. Sinclair: It is nice to see the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) here on Friday evening.

Mr. Rowe: I am sticking around to see what is going to happen.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I must say that there are times when I regret that there are in the chamber no loudspeakers connected with the broadcasting system of this country so that the people of Canada might hear how some people conduct themselves here.

Mr. Abbott: Television is what we want.

Mr. Drew: Since this matter has been entrusted to your care, Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will take this demonstration as a unanimous expression of the desire of hon. members to have loudspeakers, and an indication that they would welcome the chance to have their utterances conveyed to the public.

Mr. Abbott: Television too.

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Drew: It depends on what the question is.

An hon. Member: Getting scared?

Mr. Garson: This is the question. My hon. friend has stated that he has expressed himself upon these international matters. Will he tell us this evening what his views upon them are, so that we may hear them?

Mr. Drew: That remark is a perfect example of how much we ever received from the hon. gentleman in the way of useful contribution at the conference.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: No co-operation on television.

Mr. Grant: Tell us about the iniquitous family allowances.

Mr. Drew: Yes, I will. I came here, Mr. Speaker, expecting to hear contributions to the debate.

An hon. Member: And the hon. member is going to get them, too.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why does the leader of the opposition not make one, then?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: Instead of that, I have listened to a type of personal attack which, I am sure, is unprecedented in the records of this chamber. I listened to a dissertation by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on frankness, and I accept the challenge to deal with that subject. The Prime Minister referred to a statement from which he quoted an extremely short part, and left the impression that I had expressed my opposition to family allowances.

An hon. Member: Iniquitous family allowances.

Mr. Drew: He said that it was only at a later date, when the party met here, that there was any change in attitude. If the Prime Minister had been frank or fair he would have quoted from the same speech these words of mine which he knew were there, because he had the speech.

Mr. Abbott: Which speech is that?

Mr. Drew: This is what I said:

We are in favour of every proper step being taken to encourage large and healthy families. We believe in sound provisions for family allowances and social security.

He also knew perfectly well when he made that statement, and a highly offensive one it was, that I had made this statement in the Ontario legislature, which was the body to which I was responsible on February 22, 1945, because we had subsequent meetings dealing with this and other subjects. This was what I said, and it is contained in the record of that legislature under date of February 22, 1945. I would ask hon. members to compare this with some of the statements that have been made.

Mr. Sinnott: We will not allow this iniquitous bill to pass; that is what the hon. member said.

Mr. Drew: I am now quoting from what I said:

I have stated over and over again that we regard family allowances as one of the most important social services; that it is therefore within the exclusive constitutional jurisdiction of the provinces; that the provinces must be consulted if there is to be any effective administration of family allowances; and I have publicly urged over and over again that there be a dominion-provincial conference to settle the basis upon which the dominion and provincial governments of this country can best combine their legislative authority for the benefit of all our people.

The problem with which this and every other provincial government is faced has been stated most clearly by the Hon. Stuart Garson, Premier of Manitoba. I will quote his own words on the subject:

"We are still puzzled as to one of the most important points . . . We have no information before us which indicates conclusively whether the dominion government itself regards and justifies family allowances primarily as a social security measure, or as an instrument of federal fiscal policy . . .

It seems to me that the point here is that the dominion government in introducing family allowances without consulting the provinces, whose jurisdiction over the field of social services heretofore in practice has been considered almost exclusive, surely could not have intended to justify them solely or even primarily as a social service measure. As such they would constitute a federal intrusion in a provincial field of jurisdiction."

Those are the words of Mr. Garson. Then I go on with my own words in that speech in the Ontario legislature, which was well known to the Prime Minister of Canada when he charged me with lack of frankness the other day. This is what I said:

I do not believe the situation could be more clearly stated. If family allowances are to be regarded solely or even primarily as a social service measure, then again to quote Mr. Garson's words—

I almost said "garcon."

—they would constitute a federal intrusion in a provincial field of jurisdiction.

Now we are told by the minister responsible for the administration of this act that it is part of a broad system of social security. If that is so, and we have never been in any doubt that it was so, then this act is an intrusion upon the provincial field of jurisdiction without any consultation with the provinces. In fact the situation goes very much farther than that. Having disregarded the constitutional position of the provinces and their jurisdiction over social services in the introduction of the act, the dominion government has refused repeated requests from myself and other provincial premiers for a dominion-provincial conference to discuss this and other invasions of our authority.

I wish to assure the members of this legislature that we have at all times made it abundantly clear that we were not seeking to raise constitutional issues but that we were seeking to avoid constitutional difficulties in the future. I have made it clear, and I believe the premiers of other provinces have made it equally clear that our purpose in insisting upon a dominion-provincial conference immediately is not to raise barriers against measures which will be for the benefit of our people but rather to make sure that we combine the full constitutional power of the dominion and provincial governments, so that whatever is done may not be upset subsequently by anyone who wishes to test the validity of legislation of this nature in the courts. We also wish to make sure that the highly trained and competent social service workers in the different provinces have their part in the administration of any plans of social security which may be adopted.

Anyone, with the least knowledge of family and child welfare, knows that the health, housing, nurture and all the interests of human beings, hang together in a well integrated whole. You cannot deal with the human needs of a family today without relating closely all the resources in your social catalogue—maternal care, nutrition, housing, mothers' allowances, all forms of assistance, etc. So, your whole welfare security program cannot be done on a bits and pieces basis. It has to be unified and its administration rests with the provinces unless the whole basis of confederation is to be destroyed.

Mr. Martin: Would you repeal the present act if you became Prime Minister of Canada?

Mr. Drew: That, Mr. Speaker, was known to the Prime Minister when he made his speech, because several months after that we met here in Ottawa in a dominion-provincial conference when they finally acceded to our requests and we discussed these very subjects and the Prime Minister knew that we were in favour of family allowances on a higher basis than had been paid, but we said that these family allowances should be for the benefit of the children, and the advantage of our social service organizations should be brought to play upon the administration of this tremendously important function.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Page the Minister of Justice, who has run out.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Martin: If the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that before interrupting an hon. member who has the floor permission should be asked.

Mr. Martin: I was going to ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Drew: No. My time is not up.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I have heard these appeals to prejudice which have been made. I want to say that I am not in any way concerned about these appeals except to the extent that they themselves are doing immeasurable damage to Canada by appealing to prejudice in that way.

Mr. Brunelle: You started it.

Mr. Drew: The reason I say that is this. I had been premier of Ontario for some years, until I resigned to come here.

Mr. Brunelle: You were beaten.

Mr. Drew: I must ask that if these hon. members are unable to recognize the responsibility of this great chamber and are unprepared to listen to debate, the hour should not be called at the usual time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask hon. members to be serious and to listen to the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I have reason for saying that I am not concerned with the slanderous attacks which have been repeated over and over again long before this. I am not concerned with them for this reason. In Ontario we have seven ridings where there is a substantial majority of French Canadians who are as proud of being French Canadians as any French Canadians anywhere in Canada. In these constituencies the same appeals were made.

Mr. Brunelle: They were afraid of you.

Mr. Drew: In the last election in June, after I had been premier of Ontario for five years, and they knew my record, we won six of the seven ridings. I am not concerned, but I do say to the Prime Minister, who set the pattern which has unfortunately been followed by those who were not competent to judge their own course, that the weapon of prejudice—

An hon. Member: Iniquitous.

Mr. Drew: —is a sharp and dangerous two-edged sword, and it would be well for those who wield it to realize that it is very sharp and very dangerous and it is very sharp on both sides.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I do not for one moment accept the proposition that the type of attack which has been made here during the past week, not by members of any one party—

Mr. Knowles: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Drew: —not by members of any one group, but by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), represents the real feeling of our people and I am sure above all that it does not represent the sentiments of the great race who populate the province of Quebec.

In view of the interruptions, Mr. Speaker, may I just have one moment.

Mr. Knowles: Eleven o'clock.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Let him finish.

Mr. Abbott: Let him finish.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Let him finish.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think it would be only fair to give a few minutes to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: I have no intention of delaying the house very long beyond merely completing the remarks I was about to make. This country today is a very fortunate land.

Mr. Grant: Good government.

Mr. Drew: This country today has opportunities unequalled anywhere else in the world; but one of the great questions with which this country is confronted is whether, in a world torn by dispute and strife, we are to seek every little ground, whether justified or not, for fanning the flames of prejudice, or whether on the other hand we are going to seek common ground of agreement on which we can march forward as a great people to the destiny that lies ahead. That is the challenge that lies ahead. That is the challenge to every one of us, and a challenge which I believe is put forward in the continuance of this debate.

On motion of Mr. Drew the debate was adjourned.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Friday last the house passed a motion giving priority to government notices of motion and government orders from February 7 to February 18 inclusive. On Monday next we shall proceed with the two resolutions concerning Newfoundland. I do not know whether the house will wish to debate these resolutions at length or whether the discussions will take place on the second reading of the bill. If the motions are passed a bill will be introduced, read the first time and the second reading would come up the next day. If that takes place we shall then proceed with resolutions numbered 7, 5 and 4 on the order paper. Those are the resolutions relating to emergency powers, the Agricultural Products Act and the Foreign Exchange Control Act. If we conclude that work we will resume the debate on the address.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 7, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS AND NOTICES OF MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): At a recent sitting the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) asked when there would be an opportunity for answering of questions that are on the order paper, and for dealing with notices of motions for production of papers. If for that purpose we can have the unanimous consent of the house, as in previous sessions when there was delay in disposing of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, we will answer questions and deal with notices of motions on Wednesday of this week and once a week thereafter until we return to the usual application of the standing orders.

NEWFOUNDLAND

REPORT AND DOCUMENTS RELATING TO NEGOTIATIONS FOR UNION WITH CANADA

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I desire to lay on the table English and French copies of a report and documents relating to the negotiations for the union of Newfoundland with Canada. Copies in English have been distributed to all hon. members today. Copies in French will be on their desks tomorrow.

HOUSING

FRASERVIEW VETERANS RENTAL PROJECT, VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is carrying out a building project in Vancouver, known as the Fraserview project. Apparently the corporation has expropriated the property of certain residents who already live in this particular district. Over the week end I have received complaints about bulldozers tearing up gardens without warning, and other alleged high-handed procedure on the part of the corporation. There would seem to be undue interference with the present residents. Can the minister make a statement on this question? If not, will he have an immediate investigation made?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question, and I have looked into the matter briefly. The Fraserview project is in accordance with an agreement between the city of Vancouver and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The development is a veterans' rental project involving some 300 acres of land immediately west of the Fraser golf club. Most of this land was owned by the city of Vancouver as tax sale land, but some parcels are owned by individuals. It was considered desirable to replan the area. For this reason, possession of all the land was required. Expropriation has taken place in respect to both privately-owned vacant land and privately-owned buildings.

The planning has been arranged so that, as far as possible, existing buildings will remain undisturbed. A number of houses may have to be moved, although by arrangement of the planning it is hoped to keep this number to a minimum. The situation has been explained to individual owners in the area, and every effort is being made to cause as little inconvenience as possible. An official of the corporation is devoting his whole time to dealing with individual owners. The vacant land is now being cleared so that an early start may be made upon the 1,200 houses for veterans.

Mr. Green: Will the minister have a further investigation made to see if there is not some way in which those who already live there can be protected against interference with their property?

Mr. Winters: I shall be glad to do that. As I pointed out, an official of the corporation already is working, on a full-time basis, with individual owners.

CITY OF OTTAWA

SUGGESTED CONSTRUCTION OF SHELTERS AT BUS STOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I have a suggestion to offer the Minister of Public Works, though I do not ask that he reply today. My suggestion is that the government erect temporary shelters in this city for the convenience of people waiting for buses. One might be built on crown property near the Chateau Laurier and another in front of the new post office building, and perhaps others elsewhere. Since the government owns all these properties I see no reason why the men, women and children of Ottawa should suffer in severe weather. I should like the minister to look into the matter and give a reply later.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I think I should give an immediate answer to the hon. gentleman's suggestion. The federal government is always ready to co-operate with the city of Ottawa for the benefit of the people of the city. The suggestion, I understand, is that a shelter be erected in front of the new post office building on the square. I do not know whether this would be feasible. It is also suggested that a shelter be erected in Major's Hill park, close to the Chateau Laurier. I will ask my officials to communicate with the authorities of the city of Ottawa and try to help them out if they need any space for such shelters.

Mr. Church: I would ask the minister to confer with me and with the civic authorities.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I shall do that, with pleasure.

PROPOSED RELOCATION OF PRINTING BUREAU

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): May I ask the Minister of Public Works whether the decision which, according to recent press reports, appears to have been reached with respect to moving the printing bureau to Hull, was made by the government, or was it made personally by the minister and then concurred in by the government?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I imagine most hon. members have read the letter I sent in reply to a letter from the mayor of Ottawa. In 1945, when considering new buildings in the district, we asked the federal district commission to give us advice as to the location of these buildings. They submitted that request to the national capital planning committee, which suggested that of the three buildings contemplated, one, the veterans building, be constructed on Wellington street facing the supreme court building; that the second, the trade and commerce building, should be built in the western part of Ottawa, and that the printing bureau should be built on Sacred Heart boulevard in Hull. These recommendations were approved by the federal district commission and submitted to and approved by the government, and the Minister of Public Works was given authority to proceed with the purchase of the site in Hull for the printing bureau. Expropriation proceedings were undertaken, and part of the property has been acquired after negotiation. The engineer and the architect were appointed to prepare the plans and specifications for this building, and at the same time we appointed architects to prepare the plans for the veterans building.

That is how the matter stands at present. I happen to be the member for Hull, and Minister of Public Works. I did not initiate the question of choosing these sites, but I submitted to cabinet the recommendations of the bodies to which I have referred. On these committees are members from all over the country. The national capital planning committee is composed of men from different parts of Canada, and within the last six months the government has appointed to the federal district commission persons from the nine provinces. We think they comprise a body of disinterested people who want to work for the development of the national capital, and the government thought it wise to follow and approve their suggestions and recommendations.

SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS

CONSIDERATION OF COST OF LIVING BONUS BY ADVISORY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Unless it has been done already, will the government refer to the advisory committee on matters having to do with the Superannuation Act the question of a cost of living bonus for superannuated civil servants?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I understand the committee in question has had this matter under consideration without reference from the government.

Mr. Knowles: Will it make a report?

Mr. Abbott: I have no idea.

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF INTERIM REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs table a copy of the interim report of the organization for European economic co-operation?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I shall be glad to look into the matter and see if the report is available and suitable for tabling in the house.

WAR VETERANS

QUESTION AS TO INCREASE IN PENSIONS AS RECOMMENDED BY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): I should like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs whether the rumour is well founded that the government intends to increase war veterans' pensions by the amount recommended by the last house committee on veterans affairs, namely, 33⅓ per cent.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I have not heard the rumour referred to by my hon. friend.

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Lennard: I did not ask the minister if he had heard the rumour; I asked if the rumour is well founded.

Mr. Gregg: The answer is no.

COARSE GRAINS

INQUIRY AS TO MARKETING THROUGH WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he can give us a report on the negotiations that have been going on between the dominion government and the three prairie provinces with regard to the marketing of oats and barley through the wheat board.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I know of no recent negotiations on the subject. I am informed that a delegation will come to Ottawa later, but I have not been advised of the date of their visit.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Were they not here last week?

Mr. Howe: No, not so far as I know.

FRASER RIVER

QUESTION AS TO TABLING OF REPORT OF CONTROL BOARD

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Has the Minister of Public Works received any report from the Fraser river control board? If so, will he make it available immediately?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I believe the Fraser river control board reports to me, and I shall be glad to table a report shortly.

Mr. Fulton: It has been received, has it?

Mr. Howe: The government receives weekly progress reports, and from these can be compiled a report suitable for the house. I shall be glad to have that done and the report tabled.

NEWFOUNDLAND

APPROVAL OF TERMS OF UNION WITH CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill for the approval by parliament of the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada. The implementation of these terms will involve a charge upon and payment out of moneys in the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the minister not going to make his statement with the Speaker in the chair?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am prepared to make the statement at the time which might best suit the convenience of hon. members. I can make it now on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair, or I can make it as soon as the Speaker leaves the chair, when we are in committee. I had thought it might better suit the convenience of hon. members, since no doubt more than one will be speaking on this resolution, to have everyone speak under the same conditions, where questions may be put and answered, if hon. members should find it desirable. I am quite prepared to go on now, however, if it is the wish of hon. members that I do so while Mr. Speaker is in the chair.

Mr. Drew: I think it would be appropriate that the Prime Minister proceed with his explanation now, while the Speaker is in the chair.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members will be of the view that the measure with which the house is now called upon to deal is of an epoch-making character. This fifth session of the twentieth parliament has the historic task of considering the addition to Canada of the last segment in the original plan of the fathers of confederation. The bill to follow the resolution will ask parliament to give approval to the terms of union with Newfoundland which were signed in Ottawa on the 11th of December last.

Of course this is not the first time that the project of the fathers of confederation has received serious attention from the Canadian parliament and the Canadian public. It is well known to us all that two of the original members of the Quebec conference in 1864 were from Newfoundland. They participated in the resolution which ultimately proved to be the basis upon which the British North America Act was drafted, submitted to the parliament of the United Kingdom, and passed, though in a good many respects in a form which departed rather substantially from the terms of the original resolution. Nevertheless Newfoundland was not represented at the conference at Westminster when the draft of the British North America Act was being considered by the conferees and the law officers of the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Provision was made, as all hon. members know, for the entry of Newfoundland on the same terms as were made for the entry of Prince Edward Island. Prince Edward Island did enter the confederation, but not Newfoundland. In 1869 there was an election in which the proponents of confederation with Canada were decisively defeated. The matter was dropped and remained quiescent for a long period of years. In 1895 it was brought up again. Serious financial difficulties had been facing the government of Newfoundland. One of its commercial banks was forced to suspend its payments. At that time there were negotiations with the Canadian government looking to union, but it proved to be impossible to agree upon tentative terms that the participants in the negotiations would undertake to recommend to their respective parliaments.

During the first war, Newfoundland, as we all know, made a magnificent contribution to the cause of the allies. Concurrently with the activity resulting from this contribution to the war a certain amount of prosperity came to the island. However, the world-wide depression of the early thirties again created a serious situation for the people of Newfoundland, who depend so largely upon world trade for their prosperity. An investigation was made by a commission appointed, at the request of the government of Newfoundland, by the government of the United Kingdom. The commission recommended that the constitution of the island be suspended and that the government of the United Kingdom make itself financially responsible for the obligations of the government of Newfoundland. It was also recommended that the government be replaced by a commission of government, made up of a governor appointed by the United Kingdom and six commissioners appointed by the dominions office, three of whom were to be chosen from residents of the United Kingdom and three from residents of the island. It was also provided that when the financial difficulties had been overcome the constitution might be restored, but nothing was done about that during the period of the war.

In the second world war the Newfoundlanders repeated their most generous contribution to the cause of the allied nations. The activities carried on in the island, and the amount of money that had to be spent to make the island the outpost of defence of the North American continent and the jumping-off place for convoys to Europe brought about a situation of unparalleled prosperity. The commission of government was able to increase materially the public services provided by the government, and in addition to accumulate a surplus of some $70 million.

Following the cessation of hostilities, to ascertain the wishes of the people of Newfoundland a national convention was called to consider the future form of the government of the island. Forty-five elected representatives met in a national convention early in 1946, considered the economy of the island, its financial position, and dispatched delegates to interview the British government as to what that government's intention might be with respect to the future of the island. The convention also considered the dispatch of delegates to Washington to see what arrangements might be possible with the government of the United States of America, but decided against it. The convention sent an important delegation to Canada to discuss with us the possibility of bringing about the completion of the original scheme of the fathers of confederation.

The delegation arrived here early in June, 1947. It was headed by Mr. F. G. Bradley, and the other delegates were Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne, Mr. Charles H. Ballam, Rev. Lester L. Burry, Mr. P. W. Crummey, Mr. G. F. Higgins, K.C., and Mr. J. R. Smallwood. Exploratory talks and investigations with a committee appointed by the Canadian government extended into September, 1947. As a result of those studies and discussions the Canadian government prepared a statement of terms believed to constitute a fair and equitable basis for union. This statement was forwarded to the governor of Newfoundland by the then prime minister, with a covering letter. It set forth the terms the Canadian government would be prepared to recommend to this parliament if the people of Newfoundland decided they really wanted to become partners in our union on substantially such terms.

These terms were placed before the national convention in Newfoundland and were discussed at great length. The national convention passed a resolution to the effect that there be submitted, in a referendum to the people, two questions as to the future form of government: (1) the restoration of responsible government, and (2) a continuation of the commission of government. There was a motion before the national convention to include on the ballot a third question: whether or not the people wished union with Canada on substantially the terms expressed in the statement which had been submitted. This motion was defeated in the national convention by a vote of 29 to 16.

Mr. MacNicol: What were the numbers for and against?

Mr. St. Laurent: Twenty-nine against and sixteen for the inclusion of that third alternative on the ballot to be submitted.

In newspaper reports it has been stated that following this decision, widely signed petitions were submitted to the governor asking that the third question be also included in the ballot to be submitted.

The government of the United Kingdom, which still had the final responsibility for the affairs of the island, decided that the question would be included as one of the three to be submitted to the electorate of the island. The secretary of state for commonwealth relations, in a dispatch to the governor of Newfoundland, said in part as follows:

> The terms offered by the Canadian government represent . . . the result of long discussions with a body of Newfoundlanders who were elected to the convention, and the issues involved appear to have been sufficiently clarified to enable the people of Newfoundland to express an opinion as to whether confederation with Canada would commend itself to them. In these circumstances, and having regard to the number of members of the convention who supported the inclusion of confederation with Canada in the ballot paper, His Majesty's government—

That is, the government of the United Kingdom.

> —have come to the conclusion that it would not be right that the people of Newfoundland should be deprived of an opportunity of considering the issue at the referendum . . .

This first referendum took place on June 3, 1948. Out of a total of 176,297 registered voters on the list, 155,777 votes were cast. For responsible government there were 69,400 votes cast, or 44·55 per cent; for confederation, 64,066 or 41·13 per cent; for the continuation of the commission government, 22,311 or 14·32 per cent. As there was no over-all majority, and as had been announced before the referendum took place, a second referendum was arranged to decide between the two forms which had received the larger number of votes, namely, the restoration of responsible government or confederation with Canada. The second referendum took place on July 22, 1948. At that time 6,000 fewer votes were cast than in the first referendum. The total number of votes cast at the second referendum was 149,657. Of this number, 71,334 or 47·66 per cent were for the restoration of responsible government and 78,323 or 52·34 per cent were for confederation with Canada, a majority for confederation with Canada of 6,989 or 4·68 per cent.

In this second referendum, confederation received a majority in eighteen out of the twenty-five electoral districts from which members had formerly been elected to the legislature of Newfoundland. Following the announcement of the result of that vote, Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, then Prime Minister, stated that the result of the referendum was clear, and beyond all possibility of misunderstanding an expression of opinion of the people of Newfoundland for confederation, and that he believed the people of Canada would welcome the result. Mr. King went on to state further:

> The Canadian government is now consulting with the governments of Newfoundland and the United Kingdom in the working out of appropriate constitutional procedure for implementing the decision taken by the people of Newfoundland. The government will also be glad to receive with the least possible delay authorized representatives of Newfoundland to negotiate the terms of union on the basis of my letter of October 29, 1947, to the governor of Newfoundland, and the documents transmitted with it. In these negotiations any special problems which may arise in connection with the entry of Newfoundland into confederation will, I am sure, receive most careful consideration. Before final action is taken, the government will recommend the resulting agreement to the parliament of Canada for approval.

Following that letter, the government of Newfoundland appointed a delegation to come to Ottawa to negotiate the final terms under which the entry of Newfoundland might be brought about. The delegation was headed by Hon. A. J. Walsh, K.C.—now Sir A. J. Walsh, K.C.—commissioner of justice and chairman of defence in the commission of government. The other members of the delegation were Mr. F. G. Bradley, K.C. and Mr. J. R. Smallwood who had been members of the first delegation and with them were Mr. Chesley A. Crosbie, Mr. Philip Gruchy, Mr. J. B. McEvoy, K.C. and Mr. Gordon A. Winter. Negotiations with this delegation were opened at Ottawa on October 6, 1948, and ended with the signing of terms of an agreement on December 11, 1948. Copies of the terms have been distributed to hon. members, as well as a statement of questions raised and answers given by the representatives of the Canadian government in the course of the negotiations, and also a report and documents relating to the negotiations for the union of Newfoundland with Canada, in which hon. members I think will find practically all the pertinent information that was before the representatives of the Canadian government and the delegation from Newfoundland. On examining it, I noted that there was one omission which is not substantial but which I regret, and which I hope will be rectified when there is a reprint of this historic document.

When we met in the senate chamber on December 11 to sign the terms of the agreement that had been arranged, I made a few remarks before the actual signing took place.

I took that opportunity to pay what I considered, as I am sure did all those who had participated in the long negotiations, was a well deserved tribute to the former Prime Minister who had had the responsibility for initiating the proceedings. I venture to take the time of the house to read into the record of Hansard what I said then:

I am sure the Newfoundland delegation will be as pleased as his former colleagues that Mr. Mackenzie King is present on this historic occasion. Mr. King had the main responsibility on the Canadian side for the beginning of the negotiations which we have now completed. We have reached an agreement for the entry of Newfoundland as a province of Canada. The agreement is now to be signed on behalf of Newfoundland by the members of the delegation and on behalf of Canada by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs and by myself as Prime Minister.

There was a rather agreeable incident to which I called attention at that time in the following words:

I should like to ask those who are to sign the agreement between Canada and Newfoundland if they would use the inkstand which has been placed on the table for the purpose. Perhaps I might explain why this request is being made. The inkstand was left to the Canadian nation by the late Major R. A. C. Kane, V.D., who inherited it from his grandfather, Sir Etienne Pascal Tache. The inkstand was used at the famous Quebec conference in 1864 by the original fathers of confederation, and was subsequently presented to Tache, who presided over that conference. It is particularly fitting, therefore, that it should be used at the signing of the agreement to complete confederation.

I also mentioned the following:

It is also of interest that this inkstand was lent to Mr. Mackenzie King at the time of the Quebec conference of 1943 with the late President Roosevelt and Mr. Winston Churchill, and that it was also used on that occasion.

It may be of interest to hon. members to know that the inkstand will be placed in the library of parliament, which is visited by thousands of Canadians and of visitors from other lands each year, and where it is more apt to attract attention than if it were deposited in the museum, or in the archives or in some other of those places where we have so many interesting things which so few see.

There are still certain stages required to complete this matter of the entry of Newfoundland into confederation as a tenth province. The target date has been set as March 31, and the agreement requires that to come into effect it must first of all receive the approval of the Canadian parliament and of the Newfoundland government, and must also be confirmed by action of the parliament of the United Kingdom.

As hon. members know, in order that there may be passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom any law affecting Canada, it must be stated in the preamble that it is done with the acquiescence and at the request of the houses of the Canadian parliament. That is one of the express provisions of the Statute of Westminster. In order to finish the work that is being done to bring about this completion of the original scheme of confederation, it will be necessary that there be passed by the parliament of Canada a statute ratifying the terms of the agreement and that they be also ratified by the government of Newfoundland, and that they be confirmed by a statute of the United Kingdom. All this must be done before March 31 because the terms of agreement are conditional. The words used in section 50 are as follows:

These terms are agreed to subject to their being approved by the parliament of Canada and the government of Newfoundland; shall take effect notwithstanding the Newfoundland Act, 1933, or any instrument issued pursuant thereto; and shall come into force immediately before the expiration of the thirty-first day of March, 1949, if His Majesty has theretofore given his assent to an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and northern Ireland confirming the same.

That is the condition upon which these terms can come into force, and if the condition were not fulfilled these terms could not come into force.

The passage of an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom will require joint addresses of this house, and of the other place, to His Majesty, asking him to submit to the parliament of the United Kingdom the appropriate legislation. I would imagine that this house will wish to consider very carefully, and perhaps debate at some length, the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada. However, if this parliament comes to the conclusion that these terms should be approved by a statute of the Canadian parliament, the adoption of the addresses to His Majesty the King will become a mere formality, because the matter is already covered by the terms of union, which by that time will have received the sanction of the parliament of Canada by a Canadian statute. Therefore I would hope that there would not need to be much debate upon the joint address. After the parliament of Canada has come to the conclusion, as I hope it will, that these terms of union should be accepted, there will also be required—but it need not, in my view, give us very much concern at the present time—to be passed before March 31 a bill making changes in language in the general Canadian statutes which will be appropriate and which will after the union be designed to apply to Newfoundland.

The terms of the union provide that the legislation of Newfoundland will remain in effect until it is repealed or modified by the appropriate body having jurisdiction under the division of powers provided for in the British North America Act, and that the Canadian legislation will come into effect upon dates to be fixed by proclamation of His Excellency the governor in council. That was requested by the delegation from Newfoundland because they said it would be inconvenient to have the whole body of statute law of Canada come into force at one given moment. Nothing can be done to bring that body of law into force until the union has become effective the last minute of March 31, 1949. They felt that there should be a proclamation immediately bringing a certain portion of these laws into effect, but that there were others for which preparation for proper administration would have to be made, and that it would be desirable to provide that they might be gradually brought into effect as the proper administrative machinery had been set up to enable them to be followed and carried out.

Perhaps the question may arise as to why it is necessary to have a statute passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom to confirm the entry of Newfoundland into Canada. There are two reasons for that. One is that this does in fact, though it may not in form, amount to an amendment to, or a derogation from, the terms of the British North America Act in so far as Canada is concerned.

Hon. members will recall that under section 146 of the British North America Act it was provided that Newfoundland might be admitted into the confederation upon joint addresses of the houses of parliament of Canada and of Newfoundland by order made by, then Her Majesty, on the advice of her council of the United Kingdom. This time it was not possible to comply, even if it had been desirable to do so, with the exact terms of the procedure set out in section 146, because there were no houses of parliament of the colony of Newfoundland; and secondly, it might not have been desirable to have that procedure resorted to because, since the enactment of the Statute of Westminster and as a consequence of constitutional developments, His Majesty, on the advice of his ministers responsible to the parliament of the United Kingdom, no longer exercises the prerogatives of the crown over Canada.

His Majesty now, by reason of the situation or development which brought about the Statute of Westminster, and which is registered in the terms of the Statute of Westminster, exercises the royal prerogative in respect of Canadian affairs upon, and only upon, the advice of his ministers responsible to this parliament.

The second reason is that at the present time the government of the United Kingdom, responsible to the parliament of the United Kingdom, still has the ultimate responsibility for the affairs of the colony of Newfoundland. And though it might be thought that Canada, on the decision of its own parliament, should be entitled to add to its territory, and though under the Statute of Westminster the parliament of Canada has the same rights, recognized internationally, to make laws having extraterritorial effect as has the parliament of the United Kingdom, a law of the parliament of Canada would hardly reach out and gather in a territory that was subject to the legislative and administrative jurisdiction of another autonomous nation. And whatever may be the fine points of technical procedure in that regard, the relations between Canada and the United Kingdom are not such that anything which would appear so discourteous would be considered on either side.

It was felt therefore that the most expeditious procedure might be to follow the precedent which had been established when changes were made with respect to natural resources in the possession of the western provinces. There the entry of the western provinces into confederation had been accomplished in accordance with the terms of the British North America Act. However, it was found that when it became advisable to modify those terms, their modification would constitute a derogation from the express provisions of the British North America Act. In order to bring that modification about in such a manner as to leave no doubt in any mind that it was done in a form beyond successful contestation before the courts, agreements were made between the government of Canada and the governments of each of the western provinces. The agreements contained clauses very similar to this section 50 which I have read to the house. Those agreements were to be subject to the approval of the Canadian parliament and the approval of the legislature of the province concerned, and confirmed by an act of the United Kingdom.

That was the procedure adopted at that time. It is a procedure which operated in a manner that no one has been tempted in any way to test. It is a procedure which requires short bills, in the case of the Canadian parliament, expressing, more or less, only that the terms of agreement of Newfoundland with Canada annexed to the bill as a schedule are ratified and, with respect to the parliament of the United Kingdom, that those terms shall be a schedule to the act which will be introduced before the parliament of the United Kingdom, if and when this parliament sees fit to proceed further with the matter.

The result will be that everything contained in the terms of union will have the effect of law for all the Canadian people, those who now constitute the inhabitants of the nine present provinces and those who, by virtue of that confirmation, will become the Canadians of the tenth Canadian province.

I do not think I should attempt at this time to deal with the terms of union. They will have to be dealt with at some length, I am sure, by hon. members. Perhaps however I may be permitted to refer in a general way to some aspects of the problems we had to consider. We found at the outset that those problems were perhaps even more complex than the ones with which the fathers of confederation had to deal in 1867, and in the months which preceded the adoption of the British North America Act.

The colonies represented at the Quebec conference in 1864 were similar in their development, and similar in their financial and tax structure. It required no great change to divide powers which were practically the same in all the colonies which were coming together—that is, to divide them between the central authority, which would exercise one portion, and the provincial legislatures which would have jurisdiction over the other.

But between Canada and Newfoundland in 1948 there were great differences in the system of taxation and in the administrative structure. Those differences had to be harmonized with the existing fundamental basis of our constitution, the British North America Act. And I may say that there have been no substantial departures from the provisions of the British North America Act. There has been one in connection with education. In the British North America Act provision is made for certain guarantees for denominational schools. But the sanction of those guarantees is an appeal to the governor in council, if anything is done in violation of them.

The experience of the years has been that an appeal to the governor in council over matters which become highly controversial, when they involve the religious beliefs of honest people of diverging views about the way they should worship their Maker, is not an effective safeguard.

With respect to this agreement the delegation from Newfoundland was told that of course we did not pretend to exercise or to ask for any control over their school system. We had none; and we were not going to make it a condition of their entry into Canada that they should give us some control in the central authority as to their education.

The situation was not the same as it was when new provinces were created out of the territories. When the new provinces were created out of the territories this parliament had legislative control over the educational system, and it was turning over that legislative control to the new bodies. It was felt to be fitting at that time that it should retain some portion of that control to ensure respect for the constitutional safeguards which were being written into the constitutions of those new provinces.

But with respect to Newfoundland, they had at the time of the negotiations, and they have today in their legislative body, full and exclusive control over their educational system. But we said to them, "If, for the satisfaction of your own people, you do wish to have constitutional safeguards written into the terms of union, we will be quite prepared to consider those you will suggest." The treatment they suggested was constitutional safeguards, but constitutional safeguards the application of which will be left to the courts of justice.

It is provided that the legislature will have exclusive control over all educational matters, but must not make any laws that would prejudice what is described in the terms of union as the rights of the denominations which comprise the people of Newfoundland. The legislature has no power to do anything prejudicial. Review will be a matter for the courts. If there ever should be an attempt by the legislature to do anything that would contravene the terms of the union it will not be a matter of appeal to His Excellency the governor in council. It will be a matter for resort to the courts of justice of the island of Newfoundland in the first instance, and then to the ordinary courts administering the laws of the country.

The other departure had to do with oleomargarine. In Newfoundland the dairy industry is very small, and over the years the people of Newfoundland have been using oleomargarine produced from raw materials available in their own economy. At the time of the negotiations the Supreme Court of Canada had not decided that this parliament has no juridiction to deal with oleomargarine in the form set out in the Dairy Industry Act. We agreed that there would not be any attempt by this parliament to prevent the people of Newfoundland from continuing to use oleomargarine, because they are not in a position to get the article which many of us regard as more desirable, butter produced by the dairy industry. But it was also provided that, unless and until the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine ceases to be prohibited in the other parts of Canada, they would not ship any of their oleomargarine into the other provinces. Perhaps we would not have felt it was necessary to talk about that problem at all if the judgment of the supreme court had been available at the time negotiations were proceeding. There was a feeling that it was somewhat undesirable to have this special situation with respect to Newfoundland, but after all I think the completion of the scheme of confederation is of more concern to the general Canadian public than is the question of determining whether Mr. John Jones or Mr. Tom Allen, residing in one of the villages or towns of Newfoundland, shall have the right to use oleomargarine instead of having to use butter.

I think those are the only departures from the general scheme, because in a general way it was the desire of those people of Newfoundland who favoured entry into Canada to become Canadian citizens, subject to the same laws and entitled to the same great privileges that are the heritage of Canadian citizens of the nine other provinces.

I come now to the matter of financial terms. That was a tough one. The people of Newfoundland did not want to become a province of Canada under conditions which would not make it reasonably probable that they could carry on successfully, and participate in the advantages which appertain to Canadians generally. We on our side wanted to provide financial terms which would make it reasonably probable, if not certain, that the addition of Newfoundland to the economy of Canada would ultimately prove to be beneficial to both partners, to the older Canadians and to the newer arrivals. It was found, after more precise and careful study of the administrative problems that would be faced by the government of the province of Newfoundland, that the terms suggested in the offer submitted in October, 1947, would not be sufficient at the start to enable the provincial government to provide for its people on a basis comparable to that which is provided by the other Canadian provinces. It was felt there had to be quite substantial provisional grants, extending over a period of twelve years on a diminishing scale, to bridge the transition from the present economy of the island to the kind of economy which would make it possible for the provincial government to provide the people of Newfoundland with substantially the services that are provided for the rest of the Canadian people by their provincial governments, without resorting to a burden of taxation heavier, having regard to capacity to pay, than that which bears upon the people of the maritime region. The section of the Canadian economy generally described as the maritimes was felt to be the one which would be most nearly comparable to the situation which would be apt to develop in Newfoundland. It was felt that for a transitional term the government of Newfoundland had to be provided with sufficient funds to establish and develop services comparable to those available to the people of the maritime region, and that it had to be able to do so without imposing upon the people of Newfoundland a burden of taxation heavier than that prevailing in the maritime region.

After long negotiations it proved possible, I think, to arrive at the scheme which is set out in the terms of union, and which is apt to achieve that result. Human foresight, however, is never as good as hindsight. It was also provided that within eight years from the coming into force of the terms of union a commission would be set up to examine the situation anew, and to report as to whether or not the terms provided are working satisfactorily and are sufficient to bring about the object of equalizing the lot of the people of the new province with that of the people of the older provinces. There is no undertaking to implement any terms of recommendation that may be made at that time by a royal commission. It was felt by the Newfoundland delegation, and by the representatives of the Canadian government, that this was something that was being entered into in a spirit of fairness on both sides, and that it was not necessary to make binding stipulations about what would happen with respect to the report of a royal commission. It was felt if there was an investigation and a report by a commission, in which the public at that time would have confidence, the legislators of that day could well be trusted to do what would prove to be right in order to make this enlarged nation a united nation continuing on its path of progress toward its great destiny.

At the time many people in Newfoundland felt that the government of the United Kingdom should have proceeded in some other way; should have at once restored responsible government and left it to a responsible government to discuss and negotiate a possible union with Canada. The government of the United Kingdom chose to call together a national convention of elected representatives, to have them advise in respect of the future form of government. After that commission had made its investigation the government of the United Kingdom decided to submit directly to the public of Newfoundland the question whether they wished to have responsible government restored or whether they wished to join us in our march toward the future. The people of Newfoundland, by a substantial majority, decided that instead of having responsible government restored they wished to have confederation with Canada immediately implemented.

As far as we were concerned, of course, it was not our business. All we had to do—and I think we did that with the most scrupulous care—was say that we would be glad to have them join with us, but that it was something which was their concern, and that if they decided they wished to become Canadians we would be glad to welcome them and to extend just as fair terms as we could hope to have ratified and confirmed by a Canadian parliament animated by the same sentiments. And it was in that spirit that the negotiations were carried on.

From what I have been able to read in the press since the agreement was signed, there appears to be almost complete unanimity on the part of the Canadian public that this was a good arrangement to make, and that it is a good thing in this year 1949 to complete the original project envisaged by the fathers of confederation in 1864. From what I have seen of the editorial comment in the newspapers of the island, there are still those who would prefer to have had responsible government re-established and the terms of confederation discussed by and through that responsible government. In the referendum the majority decided otherwise, however; and even among the objectors I think there are now large numbers who feel there has been a sincere attempt to make a fair proposal, and that confederation with Canada has been made inevitable both by the Almighty in the distribution of the lands and waters of this northern half of the North American continent, and by the historic development of the people who have inhabited these two parts. They are not strangers to each other. They come from the same stocks. They have developed under the same system of responsible government, of love of individual freedom, of respect for the human being as more important than the state. They have developed in the view that the state exists for the individual, and not the individual for the state. It is my hope that this arrangement will commend itself to the Canadian parliament, to the vast majority of the Canadian people and also to the vast majority of the people of Newfoundland. We are here now considering a matter of great moment. In the last two wars we realized how close we were to each other and how close we had to be in order to survive. In this troubled world I think we, both in Newfoundland and in Canada, feel that in this way our risks are more apt to be successfully met and any dangers overcome than was possible even with the non-constitutional union of spirits and hearts that united us during the last two wars. I earnestly hope it will be the view of this house that this union of Canada and Newfoundland is desirable in the interests of the people of these two lands, and as a lesson to the whole world of what can be accomplished by men of good will.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, following the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) it is not my intention today to deal with the terms of the agreement in any detail, because the agreement will be under discussion when the bill is before the house. I shall simply discuss the resolution before us, which will have the effect of bringing before hon. members the bill the government intends to introduce. For this reason I shall defer any comments I might make about certain references made by the Prime Minister to some features of the agreement, which to me suggest that careful consideration should be given to its full effect.

Perhaps I might go so far as to suggest that, before the bill is formally introduced and the agreement accompanying it is placed before the house, the government give consideration to the desirability of removing the section in regard to oleomargarine, for reasons which have nothing to do with the use of oleomargarine itself. The Prime Minister said the completion of confederation is more important than the question whether or not Tom Jones in Newfoundland is to eat oleomargarine. The balance of importance unquestionably is in accordance with what the Prime Minister said; but there is a very important question that may be involved in the inclusion of that section, to which I think the government should give some attention before we are asked to discuss it.

It is true that the section to which I refer was included in the draft terms of agreement before the Supreme Court of Canada had reached its decision as to the constitutional authority of the Canadian parliament to deal with restrictions on the use of oleomargarine. The provision that the manufacture of oleomargarine should be continued in Newfoundland related to the fact that already it was being manufactured there.

I am not concerned with the circumstances which led to the inclusion of this provision. What I am concerned with is that a principle is put forward which, if accepted, might apply with equal force to other matters of trade and commerce, and with serious consequences. It suggests that it is an acceptable principle to create trade barriers between provinces of Canada. Serious consideration should be given by the government and by the house to the principle involved in the acceptance of this provision of the agreement, even though the Supreme Court of Canada by its decision may to some extent have made this discussion academic.

There is one other interesting provision in the agreement which should not be disregarded by some of those who have found occasion to avail themselves of the absence of any similar limitation upon their discretion. The Prime Minister referred to the terms of the agreement which relate to financial arrangements. Without going into them in detail now, I wish to point out another question of principle which is important. Having placed before the appointed representatives of Newfoundland certain proposals in regard to a tax agreement, the following provision is then included:

> The subsequent entry into a tax agreement by the government of Canada with any other province will not entitle the government of the province of Newfoundland to any alteration in the terms of its agreement.

The present Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), while he was premier of Manitoba, the premier of New Brunswick and other premiers who succeeded in obtaining adjustments when other adjustments were made, would have felt themselves greatly injured if they had been subject to any such limitation as this. It seems unusual that the only province, among those accepting agreements in respect to the payment of subsidies in return for taxing powers, to have any limitation placed upon its subsequent right to ask for readjustment should be the new province of Newfoundland, to which we should be extending every courtesy and offering every encouragement. These, however, are details, but I suggest they are worthy of consideration and will be given consideration when we are discussing the precise terms of the agreement.

As has already been pointed out by the Prime Minister, the union of Newfoundland with Canada will represent the fulfilment of the great and challenging vision of those who met in Charlottetown on September 1, 1864, in the hope of bringing together the whole of British North America as one united nation. It will give reality to the dream of Sir John A. Macdonald, whose proposals to Newfoundland for confederation were not first made at the time of the Charlottetown conference but were in fact put forward to Newfoundland in 1858. It is well to remember the significance of the fact that these proposals which were put forward to Newfoundland in 1858 brought the first favourable official response to his contention that steps should then be taken to create a federal union.

When I had the privilege of visiting the confederation chamber in Charlottetown not long ago, I was greatly impressed, as I am sure all other members were who have visited that beautiful room, by these words on the memorial tablet which commemorates that historic meeting. On the tablet are these words: "They builded better than they knew." They built so well that we are seeing before us the fulfilment of the vision of those who sat there in 1864 and pictured this great union of free people embracing all the territory then known as British North America and extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Macdonald, Cartier, and those associated with them, were disappointed that Newfoundland did not become part of Canada in 1867, but they never despaired of ultimate success. Macdonald's renewed proposals of 1888 gave convincing evidence of the continuing hope that Newfoundland would join with the rest of Canada. Again in 1895, as has already been pointed out, another attempt was made to find a satisfactory basis for union, but again without success. It is not without interest to note that on these earlier occasions the renewed discussions related to the difficult financial conditions in Newfoundland. The present discussions, on the contrary, have taken place in a period of greater prosperity than has ever before been experienced in the island's history.

From those earlier days up to the time of the discussions which have led to the agreement which will be before us for consideration, there has been a continuing hope in the minds of a great many people in Newfoundland and Canada that the vision of the fathers of confederation of one great nation from sea to sea would ultimately be fulfilled.

The motion now before the house calls for a decision whether the bill to bring about the union of Newfoundland with Canada is to be introduced. In fact that is the only issue before us in this motion. Speaking on behalf of all the members of the Progressive Conservative party in this house, and with their unanimous support, I wish to welcome, personally and on their behalf, the introduction of such measures as will complete this union upon terms satisfactory to the people of Newfoundland and the people of Canada. It is neither appropriate nor possible at this stage to discuss any details of the procedure, because we are still to be told what the provisions of the bill will be and the course which is to be followed in the discussion. We are now simply discussing a resolution which, in effect, asks us to express our opinion as to whether or not this house should proceed to deal with such legislation as may be required to bring about the effective union of the sister dominions of Newfoundland and Canada. On that simple question it is difficult to believe there can be any division of opinion, and I join in expressing the hope that the proposal for union, made by Sir John Macdonald so long ago, may soon become a reality. I trust that in the years ahead the people of Newfoundland will be given every reason to have, in ever-increasing measure, confidence in and good will towards those with whom they will be associated within the boundaries of one great nation.

Newfoundland has a great and unique history. It was the first part of the area of North America to be discovered. While other explorers were taking back to Europe reports about and later actual cargoes of gold from the newly discovered Americas, John Cabot, who discovered the island in 1497, carried back to England and to Europe, not tales of gold but tales of immense shoals of fish off the Newfoundland banks, which revealed a new form of wealth. That wealth challenged the adventurous of those days, and it has continued to be the main concern of those who have settled and built Newfoundland during the past three hundred years.

Great new industries have been built to use the forest resources of the island and now, in recent years, Newfoundland has added to its many achievements that of becoming one of the most important centres of international air travel in the world. It is a fascinating picture, one to arouse and to stimulate the imagination of every young Canadian as well as of every young Newfoundlander, to see the movement, from every part of the world, of people whose paths cross at Gander or at Goose Bay. I recall seeing only a few months ago, at the great airport of Gander, one plane which had just arrived from India on its way to New York and another from New York putting down just afterwards on its way to the Mediterranean. There were also passengers who were already there from planes moving both ways between Britain and the United States and between Britain and Canada, and also between this continent and France and Italy. It is one of the most challenging pictures of the immense changes which have taken place within these past few years, and it gives the youth of Newfoundland and of Canada as a whole some suggestion of what the expanding use of air transportation means to this country in the years ahead.

Mining also has long been an important industry on the island, and there is every reason to hope that further exploration and development, which undoubtedly will be greatly stepped up with the new associations that will be formed, will greatly increase the value of these resources in Newfoundland itself as well as in Labrador.

The Newfoundland we know today is the result of the hard work and the fortitude of a great people who have at all times retained the highest standards of personal integrity and public service as well as those simple virtues of thrift and hard work which are today perhaps more important than they ever were before. With improving transportation facilities, more and more Canadians have come in contact with the people of Newfoundland and know how justifiably proud the people of that island are of what they have accomplished, often under great difficulties.

Not only have our contacts with Newfoundland been extremely close during the long years of peace, but in the years of war there was an increasingly close relationship which laid the firm foundation of admiration and respect upon which has been built a widening confidence, in Newfoundland and in Canada, in the advantages of confederation.

In two world wars the people of Newfoundland wrote some of the greatest pages in their long island history, and I should like to refer to that contribution because it has a direct bearing on the subject we have under consideration today. In 1914 Newfoundland had the distinction of being the first of the dominions to commit itself to that vast struggle for freedom which ultimately enveloped the whole world. On August 4, the very day on which war was declared, Newfoundlanders who had voluntarily joined the royal naval reserve were called to the colours. On August 7, only three days after the outbreak of war, the Legion of Frontiersmen, the only military unit then organized in Newfoundland, volunteered for overseas service; and that unit became the base of a wider enlistment which ultimately took the form of the Royal Newfoundland regiment. On October 4, 1914—a day that will be recalled by many hon. members of this house—the first Newfoundland contingent sailed on the s.s. Florizel from St. John's to join the first contingent of the Canadian expeditionary force off the island of St. Pierre. I happen to know that there are in this chamber those who will recall that significant union of forces when the s.s. Florizel joined the other ships which were then lying at anchor. On arrival in England the Newfoundland contingent was brigaded with the first Canadian division on Salisbury plain.

In August, 1915, the Royal Newfoundland regiment, as it had then become, sailed from England for Egypt and joined the 29th imperial division, landing at Suvla bay in the Gallipoli peninsula on September 20, and it took part in the terrific battles which followed at that time, when we who were then opposed to them learned to respect the fighting powers of the people of Turkey, as others fortunately have come to respect them today. After the historic evacuation of Gallipoli, this regiment was transferred to France and on July 1, 1916, fought at Beaumont Hamel in the tremendous battle of the Somme. On that occasion the Royal Newfoundland regiment was engaged in one of the really Homeric battles of history. It took part in one of the most desperate and tragic attacks of the whole war. Seven hundred and forty officers and men went over the top that morning to attack that key position in the enemy defences, and they suffered 684 casualties. Of this action, Sir Douglas Haig said in his dispatches:

> The heroism and devotion to duty they displayed on the first of July has never been surpassed.

Their own corps commander said in his dispatches:

> The assault only failed because dead men could advance no further.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is with people such as those who wrote that imperishable page of history that we now join hands in the great enterprises of peace.

The Royal Newfoundland regiment had one of the finest records in the whole war. When it was demobilized in St. John's on November 25, 1918, 5,046 officers and men had passed through the ranks of that one unit, whose establishment in the ordinary course of events would be only approximately one thousand men.

Thousands of Newfoundlanders also served with great courage and distinction in the army, the navy and the air force units of Canada, Britain and the United States. All who saw them in action or learned of their achievements knew the stout hearts and great spirit of these splendid people who are about to unite with us in confederation.

In the second world war the association between Newfoundland and Canada was very much closer. The changing character of global warfare placed Newfoundland in a central position in that great struggle. Its strategic importance was highlighted in the early days of the war when Churchill and Roosevelt, with their military and official staffs, met in one of its many bays to draft and sign the Atlantic charter which pledged the people of the commonwealth and the United States to join forces in restoring freedom to the people of Europe who had been engulfed in the flood of nazi power.

With the increasing role of long-range bombers and aircraft of all kinds, Newfoundland became a focal point in the efforts of Canada, Great Britain and the United States through the years which followed.

During the whole of the war, Newfoundlanders served side by side with Canadians in different parts of the world and also in their own country. Because of the threat to the Atlantic coast by German submarines and aircraft, it was necessary to provide for the actual defence of Newfoundland as a very real contingency which might be faced. For that reason many Canadians served in Newfoundland throughout the war.

In the spring of 1940, the Black Watch of Montreal were dispatched to Newfoundland to protect the great airport at Gander, which was then being expanded as an operational base for the Royal Canadian Air Force and the air-ferrying services of Canada, Britain and the United States—the United States, of course, indirectly at that time. Because our common interests had become so closely linked, the defence forces in Newfoundland were brought under the Canadian Atlantic command in 1940.

Canadian coast defence batteries and anti-aircraft units were stationed at the airports at Gander, Goose Bay, Torbay and also at the loading piers at Conception bay, the mines on Bell island, as well as the fuel tanks and docks at Lewisporte and Botwood. A Newfoundland coast defence battery manned the defences at Bell island while Canadian batteries were stationed at St. John's.

I mention this to indicate the close military association which existed between the people of Newfoundland and Canada under the Canadian Atlantic command. In due course the Queen's Own Rifles of Toronto relieved the Black Watch at Gander and, as the war progressed and increased in intensity, units from every part of Canada were moved to different points in the island. These included the Chaudiere regiment, the Royal rifles, the Edmonton fusiliers, the New Brunswick rangers, and other well known regiments.

The Royal Canadian Air Force operated bases at Botwood, Torbay, Gander and Goose Bay. Thousands of our young men and women served in these units at these various bases. Extensive communication systems were also set up under Atlantic command signals. Other Canadian services included the Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, the ordnance corps, medical depots and other special units.

In addition to those who served in their own units, many Newfoundlanders served in the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Navy. They also served in all branches of the Royal Canadian Air Force, including the women's division. Those with Canadian units wore the Newfoundland badge on their shoulders and won friendship and respect from all with whom they served in every part of the world.

Because of these many contacts, thousands of Newfoundlanders trained and served in Canada while thousands of our own young men and women saw service and made warm friendships in Newfoundland.

I have mentioned these details at some length because that history of the participation of Newfoundlanders in two wars, and particularly that association between the young men and women of Canada and Newfoundland in the second world war, convey an impression of how close our natural friendship really is, and undoubtedly greatly increased support in both Newfoundland and Canada for this idea of union, which has been before us for so many years. These young men and women, the very finest of our youth, were our ambassadors in this great cause; and no nation ever had better ambassadors than we had. Their efforts on our behalf, whether or not intentionally carried out for that purpose, have had much to do with what we have under consideration today.

The spirit of unity and wholehearted co-operation between Newfoundlanders and Canadians, which was so apparent at the Canadian army, naval and air bases established in Newfoundland during the war, offers a happy augury of the spirit of understanding and good will which can be established between the peoples of these two dominions when we become part of one nation.

I have touched only briefly on the many reasons why Canadians will welcome Newfoundland into confederation, as was intended under the original provisions of the British North America Act. But it would be folly for us to disregard the criticism which has been directed to the methods which have been employed in bringing this about. It is not only in Newfoundland that very severe criticism has been directed against the way in which this has been done. Many Newfoundlanders who are in favour of confederation, and strongly in favour, have been insistent that legislative authority should be restored to the people of Newfoundland and that elected representatives of such a legislative body should negotiate any terms which are to bring Newfoundland within confederation. They contend that the commission of government, appointed by the government of the United Kingdom, has no right to negotiate such terms either directly or through appointed representatives.

Newfoundland is not a colony. Newfoundland was accorded the full status of a dominion in the Statute of Westminster. It is argued, and in many cases argued with much bitterness, that it is inconsistent with democratic practices that any group short of the representatives of a fully constituted legislative assembly should be empowered to decide the terms under which Newfoundland will join Canada.

How strong that criticism is outside of Newfoundland, as well as within its boundaries, is shown by a letter published recently in the Manchester Guardian from Mr. Thomas Lodge, who was one of the first members of the commission of government appointed in 1934. Denouncing in the most vigorous terms the procedure followed, Mr. Lodge describes the whole transaction as an "unholy deal." And those are his words, not mine. The same attitude is reflected in the press and in many public statements in Newfoundland. There is also much public criticism of the procedure in Canada, so far as Newfoundland is concerned, and the method which has been followed.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) met the Newfoundland delegation appointed to discuss the terms of union, he said to them, "One thing is sure, the objective itself is more important that the approach." It seems to me that the approach is very important. It is essential that the union of Newfoundland with Canada be something much more than a mere legal union. It is essential that the union be one which appeals now, and will appeal in the years ahead, to the people of Newfoundland and to the people of Canada as something which united them in spirit and in friendship even more than it did in statutory form.

We have no way of knowing what discussions took place between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom or the appointed representatives of Newfoundland. We do know that there is widespread discontent and dissatisfaction, and that this will not contribute to the spirit of harmony and good will which should be the main consideration of all those who welcome Newfoundland as a part of Canada.

It must however be remembered that in the house we are called upon only to deal with the steps which Canada will take to bring about confederation. Except for any action by the Canadian government which has not been disclosed and is therefore not known to the members of the house, the procedure so far as Newfoundland is concerned is one which affects the people of Newfoundland in their direct relationship with the government of the United Kingdom. We may well regret that appropriate steps were not taken to assure that there would be no cause for any widespread feeling of bitterness or dissatisfaction, but it is not for us to tell the people of our sister dominion what course they should follow in their own dealings or in their dealings with the government of the United Kingdom.

I hope I shall be forgiven for indicating that I have some personal sentimental feelings toward the transaction we have under consideration. It happens that my father's mother was born in a fishing village in Newfoundland, and that as a young boy I was constantly impressed with the stories of the hardy life of those fine people who lived by their daily efforts, chiefly from their ships at sea.

I was imbued in my early youth with the feeling of justifiable pride which those born in Newfoundland have in their great traditions and the great background of that island. Knowing even by that indirect contact, as well as by more direct contacts in later years, something of the feeling of the greatness of their own island's history and all it stands for, I hope that everything possible will be done to avoid the discontent and misunderstanding which does exist, and which is reflected in the press and in public speeches being made in Newfoundland and elsewhere today. For we want to see the splendid people of Newfoundland joining Canada in a spirit of real satisfaction and friendship and with a certainty that it is to the interests and advantage of all of them.

This is an historic occasion. The proceedings which carry into effect the purpose of this resolution will of necessity be debated in detail, and there will be discussions in relation to those details. But in regard to the principle of carrying into effect the vision of those great men who met at Charlottetown in 1864, I find it difficult to believe that there can be any difference of view anywhere in the house as to the hope that this will be carried out to the complete satisfaction of the people both of Newfoundland and of Canada.

For the reasons I have indicated, we will support the resolution before the house.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this is not the stage at which to discuss any of the details of the agreement and therefore I do not propose to do so. May I say at once that members of the C.C.F. throughout Canada join with other people in welcoming into confederation the island of Newfoundland.

When in 1867 the fathers of confederation succeeded in uniting this great land which we call Canada, Newfoundland remained aloof. Now, after eighty years, what we may term the oldest British colony in North America joins this great undertaking, the nation of which we are a part. I say therefore there can be no wonder when, in discussing the resolution, we are filled with a sense of its historic importance.

Newfoundland, by reason of her strategic position, to which reference has been made this afternoon, her wealth and, Mr. Speaker, most of all, the sterling qualities of her people, is indeed a welcome addition to the country in which we live. She, may I add, has resources which have never been adequately and thoroughly surveyed, and about which in many instances very little is known.

Her people are descended principally from those hardy seafaring folk who crossed the stormy Atlantic in little cockleshells of boats from places like Bristol, Bideford, Plymouth, fishing villages along the Devon and Cornish coasts, and from places on the shores of Brittany, Normandy and Scotland.

If I might interject a personal note: In the district where I was born, in the county of Devonshire, our parish registers record how in the late seventeenth and eighteenth century fisherfolk who crossed the Atlantic paid their church tithes after having returned from fishing expeditions on the grand banks. When they came back, this great reservoir of new food for a hungry continent of Europe was more valuable to the people of Europe than all the treasures Sir Walter Raleigh hoped to find farther south. It was his brother adventurer, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, who concentrated upon Newfoundland. I believe it was Francis Bacon who said that the fisheries of Newfoundland were more valuable to posterity than all the mines of Peru. I believe that is true.

So the beginnings of Newfoundland were laid by hardy fisherfolk who, perhaps, had no thought of settling so far across the stormy ocean. But it was the wealth of fish which laid the foundation of Newfoundland, just as it may be said that the fur trade laid the foundation of New France. And just as in the seventeenth century Canada was typically French in its origins, characteristics and customs, so it may be said that Newfoundland is typically British in its origins, in its customs, and in its general outlook upon life.

So that once again, within this North American confederation we call Canada, the two great races who have laid the foundations of this country, together with the many hundreds of thousands who have come to us from many lands and who, too, have made their contribution, are engaged today in laying the foundations of a Canada greater than we have known, making it a nation stretching at last in every sense from sea to sea.

But just as the gentlemen adventurers into Hudson bay tried to keep the settlers out of what was then known as Rupert's Land and is now the Northwest Territories, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, so the fish-dealing merchants of the west of England tried to keep settlers from landing and taking root in Newfoundland. They wanted to keep the harbours and coves for the curing of fish, and to add to their own profits thereby. But settlers came, and in spite of the gentlemen adventurers they remained and they fought their way through. I mention this because I think it tells us something of the type of people and their background, and indicates clearly the sturdy stock from which they sprang, and their determination to see things through. The settlers had to fight repressive laws, and literally they were under a star chamber jurisdiction.

Just before I came into the house I looked up a reference to this repression in our history. In 1633, in the reign of Charles I, the star chamber laid down a number of rules by which the people of Newfoundland were to live, and they were repressive indeed. Then in 1660, in the reign of Charles II, the preamble was altered and confirmed. Let me read you a paragraph from it:

> All owners of ships trading to Newfoundland are forbidden to carry any persons not of the ship's company, or such as are to plant or do intend to settle there, and that speedy punishment may be inflicted on offenders.

I can recollect no similar provision touching any other British colony, or indeed any other colony elsewhere.

In 1832, if I may take a jump, representative government was granted by the parliament of the United Kingdom, but it was not responsible government. True, it was representative government, but the governor and the executive were not responsible to the legislature. A few years later there was great friction in the colony, and the British government was asked to intervene. They did so, and the constitution, such as it was, was suspended for a time. It was not until 1855 that the country followed Canada in obtaining responsible government.

I do not propose to traverse the checkered story of the island's political and economic history up to 1931. That was done in part this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and to a certain extent by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). In 1931, when the loss of markets and world-wide depression brought into bold relief the desperate financial plight of the island and the terrible suffering among its people, something had to be done. In response to appeals from the people of Newfoundland a royal commission was set up under Lord Amulree. I am not going into the details of its report. I am going to say, however, that I have read very carefully the report of that royal commission, which I think was published in 1934, and I was shocked at the conditions which were revealed in it.

As we have heard this afternoon, the result was the suspension of the constitution again, and the setting up of a commission government, which was also described this afternoon. That is where the matter rests today. I agree with the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition that what we are about to consider is an agreement into which Canada is entering, and it is our duty to see to it that that agreement is in the best interests of Canada. It is none of our business to discuss other matters in relation to it. It is the business of the government of Newfoundland, which at the moment is the government of the United Kingdom, to protect the interests of the people of Newfoundland both in the agreement and in the manner of its making.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I hope and trust that the agreement when consummated will prove mutually satisfactory and advantageous to Canada and Newfoundland. Therefore our first duty is to see that the terms of the agreement we are about to discuss are fair and satisfactory to our own country. As I say, I hope that as time passes both countries will find the agreement satisfactory and mutually advantageous.

I think another matter we have got to be clear about is that we are not taking into confederation the stricken country of 1931. I believe it was the Prime Minister who said this afternoon that a financial surplus has been piled up, and that the country is now relatively prosperous. It has accumulated a substantial surplus. Indeed, the reason why we are discussing this problem at the present time is that it has emerged from the slough of despond which afflicted it in the hungry thirties.

In September, 1944, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), and I attended a conference of the British commonwealth labour, co-operative and socialist parties held in London. We had the opportunity of meeting Lord Ammon and of hearing from him quite a long and interesting report. He had been appointed in 1943 by the coalition government to head a good-will mission to inquire into the situation as it then existed on the island of Newfoundland. The mission visited every part of the island and held discussions with representative people of all types, from the fishing people along the coves and coasts to the people of the towns and in the city of St. John's, on economic conditions, the political future of the island, and all those matters which are very much under discussion today.

Subsequently the Fabian society published a pamphlet much along the lines of the address which Lord Ammon made, and which I, and my hon. friends who attended the conference with me, heard. I want to quote from it a few words which express his appraisal of the people of Newfoundland. He said:

> I should record my appreciation of the integrity, shrewdness, and high level of intelligence of the Newfoundlanders. They are, on the whole, a kindly, hospitable people, hardworking yet easy-going, well-mannered but outspoken, thrifty but generous to strangers. Living in close contact with nature, employed for the most part on hard and often dangerous manual work, they have an ingrained healthy contempt of danger; an easy—perhaps too easy—philosophy that tomorrow will look after itself, and an ability to turn their hands to anything from boat building to home construction. Their aptitude as seamen is well known, and their contribution in manpower to this war requires no comment. It would be hard to find a more loyal and delightful people.

I thought that was worth putting on the record this afternoon. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has spoken at length in regard to their war record, and I think we all appreciate what the island did during the war. But Lord Ammon also found that conditions on the island were deplorable. He noted that the people depended for their livelihood mainly on fish, timber and the land, with fishing quite the predominant industry. He said that much of the poverty was due to the long-established methods pursued by the old-style salt and dried cod industry, in which the fishermen went from one debt sheet to another through the operation of what is known as the truck system, now illegal in the United Kingdom and in many other places. On this his comment was interesting, and again I want to quote it:

> The uncrowned kings of the settlements are the "planters" or outport merchants, who supply the fishermen, buy their fish and in their own lights act as "guides, philosophers and friends" to the settlements. All of them take heavy risks in advancing money on the probable out-turn of the fishery. If it fails, they fail heavily; if it prospers, they prosper. Many are honest men who have helped hundreds of fishermen through hard winters, others are unscrupulous. All profess to abhor the truck system, but none seems willing to help the fishermen out of the net of debt in which they are constantly enmeshed; and all hold surprising views on the profit an honest trader is permitted to make in a normal year.

He also noted something else; that wherever co-operatives had been established—and the establishment of co-operatives has proceeded apace, very largely under the leadership of the university of St. Francois Xavier in Nova Scotia—or where the fisherfolk received cash for their product, the condition of the whole community had greatly improved.

As I said before, at this stage it is not proper to discuss any of the fifty sections, and I do not propose to do so. That will come when we are discussing the legislation. However, I do want to say something about the necessity of our working together in an effort to develop the material resources of the island for the purpose of raising the standards of living and preventing further exploitation by monopolistic and selfish interests, from which the masses of the people of Newfoundland have suffered from the very beginning. We should consider Newfoundland and Labrador as part of the whole maritime region, which incidentally is a region that cries aloud for a new deal. We believe the federal authority, of course in co-operation with the provinces, of which now Newfoundland will be one, should institute a policy to encourage the location of industry and investment so that the whole maritime region will be protected from further exploitation by powerful interests with head offices in central Canada or elsewhere.

The other day we heard a great deal about the centralization of government. In my opinion the real danger of the loss of provincial independence, yes, of individual independence, is not in the dominion-provincial tax arrangements made by this parliament with seven of the provinces, but in the concentration of financial and economic power in the hands of a few wealthy individuals or corporations in one or two of the provinces of Canada. Not many months ago the present leader of the opposition, then premier of Ontario, stated that 52 per cent of all industrial and military production during the war came from Ontario. Granted, that was a fine record for the managers and workers in industry in this province, a record of which they can be very proud. But is it not an indication of the tremendous concentration of industry in one province, if the hon. gentleman's figure is right, especially since the bulk of the remainder of Canadian industry, 48 per cent, is concentrated in one other province? It is all very well to argue that Canada has grown strong because the provinces control certain resources which make for national strength; but to say, as the leader of the opposition did on January 28, that—> —the strength of this country has been built upon the combined strength of all the governments . . .

—is unfortunately simply not in accordance with the facts. The fallacy of that statement is that some provinces are weak, not because they signed tax agreements but because of the concentration of industry, wealth and power in a steadily diminishing number of corporations located in a few places, and mainly in two provinces. Yet it should be noted that the masses of the people of Ontario by and large are no better off than the masses of the people in the other provinces of Canada.

We welcome Newfoundland, then, on another count; because it will tend to strengthen the position of the maritime provinces and the other "have not" provinces, and to highlight their problems. Indeed, the addition of another "have not" province will assist all the other provinces similarly situated. If I may once more use the phraseology of the leader of the opposition the other day, this will help provide further checks and balances, not only against over-centralization of power in this parliament but against over-centralization of financial and economic power anywhere in Canada. Indeed, in my opinion the tax agreements represent the only attempt yet made in Canada to decentralize this vast power in our country by effecting some redistribution of public revenue among them.

But more than a policy of financial decentralization is essential. Already since the war we have seen serious unemployment affecting Halifax, Trenton, Cape Breton, and other maritime industrial centres. When the closing of the Trenton steel works and its removal to Montreal was being investigated, the president of Dosco defended it on the ground that to continue or expand the industry in Trenton would be uneconomical. Well, it is all very well to say, as the leader of the opposition said, that—> —the great developments that have taken place in the nine provinces have very largely been the result of the wise and intimate guidance of the provincial governments in each of those provinces.

But the function of the national government surely must be to give wise guidance to the national economy, so that all parts of the country may share in the development of our resources and the benefits derived therefrom. In other words, this parliament should have a positive economic policy for all Canada. What is needed is a national policy to provide the maritimes, now including Newfoundland, with the means to supply opportunities for maritime youth in the maritime region, just as we should have a policy to provide opportunities for prairie youth in the prairie region and for Pacific youth in the Pacific region. The centralization trend, economically and financially, can be reversed only by the national government, which must have both the financial resources and the power to achieve a positive development program.

I suggest to the house that we might find some inspiration in what has been done in the United Kingdom since the war to reverse a similar trend and to assist the depressed areas of England, Scotland and Wales. Indeed it is not only socialist theory but economic necessity which has caused the Labour government to nationalize some facilities and to propose the nationalization of some others, including the steel industry. By controlling the banking and credit policies of the Bank of England and by directing national investment, as well as using its power of granting priorities on things in short supply, since the war the British government has encouraged the building of more than seven hundred new and important factories, more than four hundred of which have been built in depressed areas. Last evening I was talking over the telephone with a gentleman, not a resident of Canada but from New York, who has just spent six months in Britain; and he told me that the transformation in the depressed areas was nothing short of miraculous. He mentioned particularly conditions in Cumberland, where before the war some thirty to forty per cent of the people were continuously idle and unemployed. He went on to say that within a month or two that area will have a shortage of labour.

Some delegates to the parliamentary conference last September and October visited South Wales, for example. I was not one of that party, but they told of the tremendous industrial expansion and mounting level of employment in that depressed area, where for years before the war misery, poverty and unemployment dominated the countryside.

The effect of this is also improved housing, improved health and a tremendous drop in the death rate, particularly the infant mortality rate. Taking as an illustration the northern city of Jarrow, which Ellen Wilkinson once described as the city that was murdered, in 1934 the infant mortality rate was 95·82 per thousand, far above the national average of 61·92. Last year, because of the relocation of industry and employment, it fell below the national average, to 39·68 per thousand.

Side by side with the decentralization of industry, requiring for our own country, incidentally, a program of housing, the expenditures on ill-health will drop sharply. The effects of malnutrition and overcrowding are minimized or largely prevented when you have industry, employment and all that goes with it. I say, then, that the entry of Newfoundland into confederation should be an occasion when this parliament should be considering policies that will give new hope to the maritime area. The problems of Newfoundland are similar to those of the maritime areas; transportation, economic development and the marketing of products. I say this is a challenge presented to this parliament at the present time, a challenge to adopt a really imaginative national policy.

It is my contention that no single province, no matter how rich, can alone undertake this kind of thing successfully, for it requires a careful survey of the primary products and resources of the country so that a decision can be reached as to the types of industry which should be located in the several areas that are under-industrialized or depressed. Then, of course, an intelligent national plan for the utilization of our resources is required. Along with that a conservation policy should be formulated, adopted and indeed put into effect. I know that, when Newfoundland comes into this confederation, Newfoundland as well as our other provinces will need a policy of that description for the conservation and intelligent use of resources. Along with that should go a national transportation policy which would serve the nation instead of emphasizing the discrimination in facilities and rates which now exists. All this would have a great psychological and material effect, not only on the maritimes but on the whole country.

When I was speaking last week on the address, I noted that there are difficulties ahead, difficulties which have been obscured, postponed or minimized because of the post-war demands and the European recovery program. Our whole economy is, indeed, very vulnerable. An imaginative plan for the development of Canadian resources, including Newfoundland, in the interests of all parts of Canada and particularly in the interests of the depressed or potentially depressed parts of Canada, should be formulated and begun. As I have said before, I think that is a challenge to this house and an opportunity which the entry of Newfoundland into confederation brings forcibly before us. So far as we in this party are concerned, we are prepared to co-operate in accepting that challenge and trying to do something effective about it.

Is there any other reason, Mr. Speaker, except that of the economic policy of the financial and industrial monopolies which have located in the central Canadian provinces, why the prophecy of Sir Leonard Tilley should so long have remained unfulfilled at least in part? Speaking in this house in 1879 Sir Leonard Tilley said this:

> I am not, I think, over-sanguine when I say the day is not far distant when the population in the western country will be greater than in Canada and when the maritime provinces with their coal, iron and water power will be the manufacturing centre for this vast dominion.

Perhaps he was over-optimistic so far as the maritimes and the western part of the country are concerned. But, in large part, the vision should have materialized, because the resources are there.

Those of us who can look back on the war years can remember a discussion before the war expenditures committee of this house when the late member for Vancouver-Burrard, Mr. McGeer, the present member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), the present member for Victoria (Mr. Mayhew), myself and others urged there should be some decentralization of the steel industry. We urged that if at all possible steel should be produced where the plates were being used, and that the valuable deposits of coal and iron on Vancouver island might form the basis of a Pacific coast steel industry to supply British Columbia shipyards. We were told categorically by the steel controller of that day that no such development would be permitted because the steel industry was already well located; and, when the war was over, expanded production might be an embarrassment to the steel industry as established owing to a falling-off of demand or the import of foreign steel.

While Sir Leonard Tilley may have been too enthusiastic in his vision, yet there are no reasons, other than those I have given, why industry should be centralized or why it should become concentrated more and more, not only in one or two provinces, not only under the control of one or two corporations and individuals, but under the control of industries which have become monopolistic in their character and in their methods. To my mind, at least, the partial fulfilment of this vision of Sir Leonard Tilley lies largely in the hands of the present members of this House of Commons.

Newfoundland will come into confederation with her great resources, many of them unsurveyed and many of them unknown. Not long ago, I read a statement by a Roman Catholic prelate who had spent many years on the island, Monsignor Sears, who spoke of the fine agricultural possibilities in western Newfoundland. Again, the problem of conservation enters because that is where lumber is being cut. If we are going to have agriculture, as we are finding out in many parts of our country, we have to conserve our trees or reforest the slopes when they are denuded.

I am very glad that this resolution gives us an opportunity of thinking not only of the great historic event of the entry of Newfoundland into confederation, but also of her sterling people with their interesting history, people who have fought against great odds in the past and are fighting against them now. They will add much to our Canadian nation. It offers us too the opportunity to think not only of the future of Newfoundland but of the future of the maritime region, and indeed of that of all of Canada, and to impress upon us that we must do our part in the building of a far greater nation than even the fathers of confederation visualized when they planned complete confederation of the scattered colonies over eighty years ago.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to take a great deal of time this afternoon, because I feel that the ground has been quite adequately and well covered by the speakers who have already taken part in this debate. I feel, however, that we would be remiss in our duties and responsibilities if at this time we did not say something to indicate that we too, in our great movement across Canada, support the principle of this resolution without any qualification. The social credit movement rejoices that the process of confederation, which started more than eighty-five years ago, seems now to be entering its final stages. We join in welcoming Newfoundland into the Canadian community of provinces, the Dominion of Canada. To her, if she should choose to ratify the agreement which will be brought before us in due course, we extend the warmest possible welcome. At the same time we express the sincere hope that divine Providence will set His seal upon the greater Canada to the end that she may go forward and realize fully her great destiny.

I hope that the terms of agreement between our two countries, as finally approved, will be so satisfactory to both the people of Canada and the people of Newfoundland that it will stand unchallenged for many years to come. I confess, though, that I have felt some misgiving arising out of the fact that, when the second referendum took place on July 22, 1948, only 44 per cent of the electorate voted for confederation. It is true, I admit, that, of those who voted, a majority voted for union. I do not suggest at all that anyone was at fault except the electors themselves, in that they did not get out to the polls. I believe, however, that we all could have felt more secure and happier about the result if sufficient interest had been taken by all the electorate in Newfoundland so that, when the vote took place, there would have been an undoubted, over-all majority of the electors supporting union. I hope of course that the great majority of the people of Newfoundland will eventually come to understand and appreciate the step that is being taken and that they will eventually give to it their wholehearted support.

Much has been said this afternoon about the people of Newfoundland and about their great country. Thus far all the speakers have extolled the virtues of Newfoundlanders, and quite rightly so. I share in the admiration that has been expressed for this great people and for what they have accomplished under, as we all understand, great difficulties. If the Newfoundlanders confederate with us, they will definitely enrich the sum total of the qualities of the people of greater Canada. Their spiritual, moral, physical and cultural qualities are certainly no less than our own. We know of course that their country possesses resources and strategic values of great importance. We appreciate all of these; nevertheless the advantage will not be all on one side. Let me say that if we are fortunate enough to have Newfoundland join with Canada, Canada will gain much. At the same time, let me say that Newfoundland also will gain much. We have here the greatest country on the face of the earth, and I say that in full realization of the magnitude of the statement I am making. I believe, and have always believed, that Canada has a great destiny. I believe that in the years to come Canada will prove to be the real bulwark of the whole of America, not only materially, but spiritually and morally as well.

I have always appreciated the fact that Canada is the one part of America that retains by statute observance of the Sabbath day. That fact gives to our country a moral strength which cannot be found in any other part of America. It may not be appreciated now, but I am strongly hoping that certain forces in our country, who today are moving to repeal that statute and to throw open the Sabbath day to the same activities that take place on week days, will forget their aims and objectives and join with us in maintaining in this country the Sabbath day as it should be.

When Newfoundland comes in, if she chooses to approve this agreement, I express the hope that she too will join with us in trying to defend what we consider to be one of the fundamental strengths of our great country. We have in Canada, in my opinion, a people second to none anywhere in the world. We have a country which, if properly developed on sound economic lines, can yield to its people a standard of living unequalled in any part of the world. We also have in our country, and it is a fact we all appreciate, a forward-looking people who, though they are sometimes given to inertia, when they are moved gather momentum and in due course, I think, find the right path and do what is right.

I say these things for the reason that I do not want it said at any time that, on this historic occasion, we did not point out to our friends from Newfoundland who may join with us, as we hope they will, that they are fortunate in the opportunity that confederation offers to them, just as we are fortunate in having them join with us. When our country, in very fact, reaches from sea to sea, Mr. Speaker, let us express the hope that, from one end of that greater Canada to the other, our people will join hands and march forward determined to make this country the finest place in the world in which to live; to build the happiest people it is possible to find anywhere on the face of the earth; and indeed to build here for the western hemisphere a real bulwark, spiritual, material and moral.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The speakers who have preceded me have all referred in the most fitting and eloquent terms to the importance that the entry of Newfoundland will have in the consummation of the dream, the work and the achievements of confederation. One newspaper said that this is one of the great historic developments of the year. This, sir, will have been one of the great historic developments of any year in the history of Canada. And what is more, its importance transcends even our own national interests and our own national hopes, because this is one of the few occasions in recent years on which it is possible to speak of union rather than disunion, of construction rather than destruction. And when we see, as we have seen around the world, disunion, revolution and disorder, it is a great forward step that we in Canada and our neighbour Newfoundland should be able to point to this as a constructive achievement in the completion of confederation. But further, too, it is significant that this union should be coming at a time when we are looking forward to the consummation of a pact—also a union—of north Atlantic nations in the proposed north Atlantic security pact.

It is something more than a coincidence that these two great events in the history of our country should be brought about at the same time and for reasons which contribute one to the other. We can point to this work of union, this work of good will, this work of construction. The only other kinds of unions that have been consummated in recent years are unions whereby country after country has been brought under the domination of the soviet union by coercion, by force and by revolution. Our union today is being brought about by co-operation of men of good will, of men who have the same traditions, the same historical background, the same racial origin, and who also, as long as there has been any knowledge of North America in Europe, have lived on this continent beside each other.

It is interesting, too, that we should consider this proposal against the background of the act of confederation itself; for union will be the final achievement of what was begun in 1867. Confederation was brought into being in consequence of the discussions between the representatives of the various colonies in British North America, begun at Charlottetown in 1864 and continued at Halifax, Saint John and Fredericton, and then carried on again at Quebec with representatives there from the colony of Newfoundland. It is greatly to be regretted that it was not possible at that time to consummate this union. But it was possible there to make the beginning of the great nation of Canada, and so we saw added to the original group under the provisions of section 146 of the British North America Act or other legislation Manitoba in 1870, British Columbia in 1871, Prince Edward Island in 1873 and Alberta and Saskatchewan in 1905. They formed the original nine, and we are now completing this union of the colonies of British North America of 1867 to form the nation of Canada of 1949.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) referred to some of the differences in the nature of the problem that faced the representatives of the governments of Canada and of Newfoundland when we sat down in 1947 and again in 1948 to discuss the terms together. Just imagine how conditions have changed since 1905. This brings into focus the new factors that have to be determined, the additional complexities and the new and greatly extended functions of government. In 1905 there was no social security, there were no old age pensions or pensions for the blind, there was no unemployment insurance, there were no family allowances and there was no veterans charter. On the material side there was no civil aviation and there was no broadcasting, nor was there any income tax.

These matters that I have mentioned represent the immense change that has taken place in the functions and in the scope of government, but they also show an immense increase in the complexity of the subjects that had to be dealt with in the discussions with representatives, first of the convention, and then of the government of Newfoundland. These discussions started, as has been said by the Prime Minister, in 1947 when representatives of the cabinet met for several months with a committee representing the convention. In consequence of that discussion a proposal was produced headed "Proposed arrangement for the entry of Newfoundland into confederation". The subheading is very important. It reads as follows: "Terms believed to constitute a fair and equitable basis for union of Newfoundland with Canada should the people of Newfoundland decide to enter into confederation." It is dated October 29, 1947. By a letter dated the same day it was forwarded to His Excellency, Sir Gordon Macdonald, K.C.M.G., governor of Newfoundland, by the then Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. W. L. Mackenzie King. These terms for proposed arrangements had been worked out by the committee representing the convention under the chairmanship of Mr. F. G. Bradley, K.C., and by the Canadian government under the then Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King.

These terms were made available to the governor and the government of Newfoundland and then they were tabled in the house and released to the press. The terms were before the people of Newfoundland when on the second referendum they decided to enter confederation. I would submit that those who have some difficulty over the fact that the terms of union have been negotiated with representatives of the government of Newfoundland, rather than with those appointed to represent a responsible government in Newfoundland, must take into account the fact that first it was the British government which decided to put the question as to whether they wished to enter confederation on the plebiscite which was put before the people of Newfoundland; and, secondly, that at the time, when a majority of the people answered yes, they had these terms before them, and those terms had been explained by representatives of the people, including the members of the convention who had sent representatives to discuss the terms here.

That having been done, I submit this government had no choice but to proceed to meet the representatives of the government of Newfoundland. Once there was a plebiscite on whether or not Newfoundland should enter confederation, once the people with the terms before them had decided in favour of entering confederation, then this government could not do other than express its willingness to entertain negotiations and to discuss the terms of union with the representatives of the Newfoundland government. It really is as simple as that. Once the British government had allowed the question of joining confederation to be put before the people, then this government had no choice whatsoever in the subsequent course it followed. In consequence, the government of Newfoundland, acting through the commission of government, appointed the seven gentlemen, whose names were given by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), to come here to enter into negotiations.

They arrived and were met; and I should like to tell the house something of the course of those negotiations. We recognize that this is an historic occasion, and it may be useful for our own people, yes, and perhaps for future generations, to have a note placed on Hansard as to the way in which negotiations were carried on. As a member of the cabinet committee, I had something to do with those negotiations and as deputy chairman, when the Prime Minister could not attend, it was my responsibility to preside at the conference, and to do a good deal of the work of preparation and discussion at all stages.

My experience in conferences includes the dominion-provincial conferences of 1941, 1945 and 1946, and conferences with representatives of the provinces dealing with different matters at different times, as well as conferences with other nations dealing with various aspects of international affairs. Thus far, no conference at which it has been my privilege to represent the government or the country has been conducted with closer attention to the sole interests and welfare of the people concerned—in this instance, the people of Canada and the people of Newfoundland than was this conference.

I should like to pay tribute to the delegation representing Newfoundland, under the chairmanship of a most distinguished lawyer, citizen and statesman, in the person of Sir Albert J. Walsh, K.C. As chairman of the Newfoundland delegation he showed great capacity—and tenacity, too—in explaining the position and rights of the people of Newfoundland. He put forward those views he felt it his duty to express, and did so with a courtesy and fairness as well as a frankness which inspired the whole proceedings.

That was the atmosphere in which the work was carried on. There was no bickering; there was no backbiting; there were no recriminations; there were no leaks, either accidental or inspired; there were no occasions when there was a lack of frankness; there were no charges. There was the steady and competent effort by well-meaning people to see if they could not arrive at a fair and equitable basis upon which our two countries could enter into union and partnership.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Claxton: The conference began to meet on the 6th of October of last year, and was continuously in session until the terms of union were settled. The conference had its final plenary session in the Senate chamber, as it did its opening session, on the 11th December. Thus some two months were occupied in arriving at the terms. In addition to the plenary sessions of the conference, a number of subcommittees were set up. They are enumerated on page 81 of the report and documents which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) tabled today. They included subcommittees on drafting, finance, fisheries, transport and veterans affairs, which met in practically continuous session from the beginning to the end.

The subcommittee on drafting, in addition to considering the form which the terms of union and the bill should take, also considered the Canadian statutes and the Newfoundland statutes that might be affected, as well as the procedure that might be adopted in making a submission to the parliament at Westminster. Altogether the subcommittee on drafting produced not less than fourteen drafts of the terms of union after they had begun to be submitted to the plenary conference, and also a number before. This work, as I say, continued night and day throughout the more than two months from the 6th October until the 11th December of last year. On the 11th December the terms of union were signed by representatives of Canada and Newfoundland at the ceremony in the Senate chamber.

In addition, a number of points had been raised by the Newfoundland delegation in the course of the proceedings. Many of these were put in the form of written questions, and others were raised from time to time throughout the deliberations. It was decided in the end that they should be dealt with in a document accompanying the terms of union and headed, "Statements on questions raised by the Newfoundland delegation during the negotiations for the union of Newfoundland with Canada." These were transmitted by the Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent as Prime Minister of Canada in a letter dated December 11, 1948, addressed to Mr. Walsh, chairman of the Newfoundland delegation. He said in the letter:

> During the course of our negotiations covering the final terms and arrangements for the union of Newfoundland with Canada, a number of questions concerning government policy were raised by your delegation and answered by the Canadian government. In addition a number of temporary administrative arrangements were settled in order to facilitate the union.
> It would not seem fitting to include in formal terms of union matters of this kind, since they are scarcely of a constitutional nature. I am therefore sending you the enclosed memorandum covering these various items. While these will not form part of the terms of union, they contain statements of the policy and intentions of this government if union is made effective by the approval of the parliament of Canada and the government of Newfoundland, and confirmed by the parliament of the United Kingdom.

These statements in reply to the questions raised by the Newfoundland delegation were forwarded to the Newfoundland delegation and constitute a statement of government policy or administrative intentions on the various points that they cover.

I am sure hon. members will realize that this result was made possible by the assistance of very competent officials. Both the Newfoundland delegation and the Canadian representatives were fortunate in that respect. On the Canadian side a number of officials participated, representing every department, agency and activity of the government. I should like to refer particularly to the work done by our high commissioner in Newfoundland, Mr. J. Scott Macdonald, who was succeeded at the time of these negotiations by the Hon. Charles J. Burchell, K.C., who returned to Newfoundland for the purpose, and who assisted in the discussions by securing information for the government, and also by facilitating the Newfoundland government in obtaining information about the situation in Canada. Through this instrumentality and also through other officials such as Mr. J. R. Baldwin, who was secretary of the conference and of the Canadian delegation, and Mr. R. A. MacKay of the Department of External Affairs, there was the freest possible interchange of information, and at every stage the work was facilitated in consequence of the public spirited service of these officials.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and also the member for Peace River (Mr. Low), in their speeches this afternoon, referred to the character and the characteristics of the people of Newfoundland. Our experience during these negotiations extending over a period of a year and a half completely confirms everything that has been said in praise of the people of Newfoundland. Our experience could not have been better. It is also confirmed by the experience of the Canadian soldiers, sailors, and airmen who served in Newfoundland during the war. The Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition referred to the great part played by Newfoundland in the first as well as in the second world war. It appears that in the first war a total of more than ten thousand residents of Newfoundland served in their own forces and in the forces of Great Britain, Canada, and the other allied countries. In the second world war a total of more than ten thousand served overseas, and in addition some 1,500 men and 600 women served in the Canadian armed forces. Altogether a total of something like 13,000 saw service of one kind or another. In his book "The Canadian Army, 1939-1945" Colonel C. P. Stacey, director of history, has this to say at page 43:

> There was close co-operation between the Canadian and Newfoundland governments from the outbreak of war. Newfoundland afforded all facilities to the R.C.A.F.; Canada provided Newfoundland with equipment including some coast defence guns; and when France collapsed in June, 1940, steps were immediately taken to safeguard the great airport at Gander and the seaplane base at Botwood. An infantry battalion and a flight of bomber reconnaissance aircraft, now hastily despatched, were only the vanguard of larger forces.

Then Colonel Stacey goes on to describe the very close co-operation at sea, on land and in the air between our armed forces. In a book to be published shortly under the authority of the Minister of National Defence, on naval operations during the war, written by Joseph Schull, this is said:

> St. John's was a hospitable and storied capital where few men lacked a home to go to for a meal. There were friendly hostels, provided, stocked and operated by Canadian service organizations; and there was a St. John's hospitality committee which could receive and fill without blinking the request of an incoming ship for a hundred girls and a dance "tonight" . . .

Newfoundland

Perhaps nowhere in the world was there a garret exactly like the Crow's Nest; fifty-nine steps from street level up the outside of an old store building—officially named the Seagoing Officers' Club and open to officers of the allied fighting ships and the merchant navy. Reminiscences went round the world, and doubtless are still on the wing, of that loud and smoky room where ships' crests and bells and trophies hung thick on every wall.

It is true to say that, in the hearts of the officers and men of our navy and our merchant marine, St. John's occupied as large a place as any Canadian port. It was regarded as the home port of a large part of the Canadian fleet. On this account, as well as the others that have been mentioned, we shall be especially glad to welcome Newfoundland into confederation.

But this story of working together in our common defence is not a recent one. It is reported that five companies of the Newfoundland regiment were sent to Upper Canada during the war of 1812; and I am glad indeed that, in the terms of union, reference is expressly made in paragraph 44 to defence establishments, as follows:

Canada will provide for the maintenance in the province of Newfoundland of appropriate reserve units of the Canadian defence forces, which will include the Newfoundland Regiment.

So if union is consummated it is our intention to see that this great regiment is perpetuated, with its name and its traditions, as one of the components of the Canadian armed forces. By joining the military traditions of Newfoundland and Canada, we will be enriching both.

Mr. MacNicol: Would the minister add just a word about the distinguished record of the Newfoundland Regiment in Upper Canada during the war of 1812? In Toronto we have a monument erected in its honour.

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to. I referred to the regiment a moment ago.

Mr. MacNicol: I heard what the minister said, but I did not hear any reference to the victories of this regiment in Upper Canada.

Mr. Claxton: That is what I was referring to. Mr. Speaker, Newfoundland forms part of the geographical pattern and formation of North America. This island with a population of 330,000 has an area of 42,000 square miles, larger than Ireland and amounting tc 84 per cent of the combined area of the maritime provinces. But in addition Labrador, which since 1927 has been found to form part of Newfoundland, has an area of another 110,000 square miles. Newfoundland is situated at the mouth of the gulf of the St. Lawrence; and those of us who have come home from abroad, on coming within sight of Newfoundland going through the strait of Belle Isle, have felt that if we were not at home, at least we were getting close to it. It will be a source of the greatest possible satisfaction to us in the future if, when we reach the island on the way home, we really can feel that this is part of our home, our native land.

Then, sir, the resources of Newfoundland have been referred to. They have great fisheries. They have two great pulp and paper plants, one of them, Bowater's, being the largest paper mill in the world. There are seventy-five firms constituting secondary industries, with some 3,500 employees; and in addition to the iron ore mines of Belle Isle there are various other mineral deposits. Our belief is that, properly explored and developed, these resources of Newfoundland will soon establish the soundest possible economic as well as historical, racial and geographic reasons for union.

Our conviction is that it is in the interests of both countries that we should join together. Common experience is that generally speaking a marriage between fairly mature adults is likely to be successful, because they have gained something in the way of tolerance and understanding. Our hope is that that understanding will help us over the difficult times, because there will be difficult times, in working out the terms of our union. On the basis of our separate experiences, we will be able to build a better common life than either of us can separately. There is every reason for our supporting this measure. I am sure it will be a matter for the utmost gratification to the people of Newfoundland, as well as to the people of Canada, that the debate on this subject should have been carried on in a way which recognizes to the full that this is an important occasion in the life of Canada.

At the time of confederation, Mr. Speaker, D'Arcy McGee, who then represented part of the constituency I have the honour to represent, said this:

I see, in the not remote future one great nationality bound, like the shield of Achilles, by the blue rim of the ocean. I see it quartered into many communities, each disposing of its internal affairs, but all bound together by free institutions, free intercourse and free commerce. I see a generation of industrious, contented, moral men, free in name and in fact—men capable of maintaining, in peace and in war, a constitution worthy of such a country.

I believe that that hope, Mr. Speaker, and that aspiration of D'Arcy McGee is now being realized in the union of Newfoundland with Canada, for the good of both our peoples and, we believe, to the benefit of the people in other countries as well.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to endorse the opinions expressed by all the members who have preceded me in this debate in their references to the good will which has prevailed between the people of Newfoundland and the people of Canada during so many years. The right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King), in welcoming the delegates to Ottawa on June 25, 1947, expressed, I believe, the sentiment of all Canadians when he said:

> In welcoming you, we welcome neighbours and kinfolk who, with us, owe a common allegiance to the crown and whose countries are members of the British commonwealth. History and geography have given us much in common. We enjoy with you the heritage of British freedom and the even older heritage of Christian civilization. We have shared together the perils and sacrifices of two world wars. Side by side, we face the uncertainties of the post-war world.

The leader of this group this afternoon mentioned some of the common problems we must face along with the people of Newfoundland. The people in Newfoundland will be a long distance from Ottawa. They will experience the difficulties which others, who are also a long distance from central Canada, have experienced since confederation. I believe this parliament must be very sure the acquisition of Newfoundland should not be regarded as a new empire to be exploited by vested interests.

I should like to discuss this evening a problem which so far has not received very much consideration during this debate, namely, the point of view of the 71,334 or the 47·66 per cent of the people in Newfoundland who voted for responsible government. Very frankly, I admit I cannot pose as a competent authority on Newfoundland's history or problems. I did, however, spend a week in Newfoundland in December. It was something of a shock to me to find so much bitterness there over the question of confederation. This is a problem which the rest of us in Canada would do well to consider carefully. I realize it is not primarily a Canadian problem, but we must face the fact that 47·66 per cent of the people voted for responsible government. Here is a minority coming into confederation feeling that they have real grievances.

I should like to take a little time tonight to present a point of view which I found in Newfoundland. I might say I was rather surprised to find that Newfoundland is so isolated from Canada. I happened to be there the day after the terms of union were signed. The following day, when the by-election was held in the constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings, I was curious to ascertain the outcome of the elections, and I checked with the only radio system there, as well as with the newspapers, to find out what word there was from Canada. I was told that news from Canada had to reach Newfoundland via London and the people of Newfoundland would not expect to hear any news of the by-election on the radio until the following day. It was a matter of surprise that we had not had Canadian Press service in Newfoundland during these years. You will recall, too, that during the years we in Canada have had very little information concerning events in Newfoundland.

If I had not spent that week in Newfoundland, I would have allowed this resolution to pass without raising the point I plan to discuss with the members of the house tonight. I should like to remind you that, as has already been pointed out, Newfoundland played a very active part in world war I. They added to their national debt to the extent of over $50 million and then, in the years following the war, found themselves in a difficult financial position. In 1931, Newfoundland appealed to the British government for financial assistance, but was not satisfied with the terms offered by the British.

In 1933, Newfoundland consented to the setting-up of the Newfoundland royal commission, better known as the Amulree commission. The king's warrant sets out the objective of this commission.

> —to examine into the future of Newfoundland and in particular to report on the financial situation and prospects therein.

The recommendations of the commission are well known, but it might be mentioned that, in producing the papers relating to the report of the royal commission, it was pointed out that:

> His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom would think it a little less than a disaster if the oldest colony in the British empire were to default in its obligations. On the other hand it is clear that the present burden of the debt is more than the people of Newfoundland can, for the time being, discharge unaided despite the utmost effort.

The recommendations were as contained in the report of the Newfoundland royal commission, one recommendation being as follows:

> The existing form of government would be suspended until such time as the island may become self-supporting again.

A second recommendation, found in the report of that commission, reads as follows:

> It would be understood that, as soon as the island's difficulties are overcome and the country is again self-supporting, responsible government, on request from the people of Newfoundland, would be restored.

Since 1933, the people in this important island have been denied the right to elect their members to transact the business of the country. As I stated, it was clearly set forth in 1933 and 1934 that this was a temporary arrangement and that, when the economic position of the island improved, the democratic rights of the people would be restored.

The war years brought prosperity to Newfoundland, as they did to many other parts of the world. The Canadians, British and Americans made large expenditures in Newfoundland, and by 1941 it seemed as if the economic position had improved to the point that the island might consider getting responsible government. In 1943 the then secretary of commonwealth affairs went on record as follows:

> The arrangements made in 1933 included a pledge by His Majesty's government that as soon as the island's difficulties had been overcome and that country was again self-supporting, responsible government, on request of the people of Newfoundland, would be restored. Our whole policy is governed by this undertaking.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What date was that?

Mr. Nicholson: That was December 2, 1943, In 1946 the commission of government passed the Convention Act, which was referred to this afternoon, and this national convention was in session for about a year. I believe the Prime Minister reported this afternoon that the convention sent a delegation to London, to Ottawa and to Washington. My information was that a proposal was made to send a delegation to Washington to consider the question of linking up with the United States but that the proposal was defeated. Delegations went, however, to London and to Ottawa. While the delegation was in London, I am informed, the question of the type of plebiscite to be presented to the people was discussed with Lord Addison, who was then secretary of state for commonwealth affairs, and he was asked this question: If three forms of government were recommended to be put on the ballot by the convention, would all three go on? His reply was:

> If you recommend it, I should think so; but I should be bound to be advised by the convention.

Later he said:

> If a substantial majority of the convention said "we would like these questions put to the people," I feel pretty sure I should be most anxious to give effect to their wishes.

As was mentioned this afternoon, there was a proposal that, in addition to putting on the ballot the question of the continuation of commission government and the question of restoring responsible government, public opinion should be tested on the question of confederation with Canada. That proposal was defeated, 29 to 16. I have been interested in reading the information which was tabled this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). At page 10 of the document I find the following:

> The national convention, before concluding its sessions, resolved by unanimous vote to recommend that two questions, restoration of responsible government and continuation of commission of government, should be included on the referendum ballot; but by a vote of 29 to 16 declined to recommend that confederation with Canada should also be included. The United Kingdom government concluded, however, that "it would not be right that the people of Newfoundland should be deprived of an opportunity of considering the issue at the referendum," since the terms offered by the Canadian government had been the result of long discussions with a body of Newfoundlanders elected to the convention . . .

Then later on in this report, at page 71, there is a copy of a letter from the commonwealth relations office discussing this question, and I am not at all convinced by the reasoning. Mr. Noel-Baker, in paragraph 4, says:

> His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom appreciate that there has been a feeling amongst some members of the convention that the entry of Newfoundland into a confederation with Canada should only be arranged after direct negotiations between a local responsible government and the Canadian government. The terms offered by the Canadian government represent, however, the result of long discussions with a body of Newfoundlanders who were elected to the convention, and the issues involved appear to have been sufficiently clarified to enable the people of Newfoundland to express an opinion as to whether confederation with Canada would commend itself to them. In these circumstances, and having regard to the number of members of the convention who supported the inclusion of confederation with Canada in the ballot paper, His Majesty's government have come to the conclusion that it would not be right that the people of Newfoundland should be deprived of an opportunity of considering the issue at the referendum and they have, therefore, decided that confederation with Canada should be included as a third choice on the referendum paper.

I think it is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, in view of the clear decision in the first vote of 29 to 16, and later on after a unanimous vote by the convention, that the British government decided to disregard the considered opinion of the convention. I submit that this is a grievance that will be remembered in Newfoundland for a great many years. As an impartial observer, I cannot see any good reason why the people of Newfoundland should not have had the first opportunity to decide whether or not they wanted a continuation of the commission government or wanted to have responsible government. I refer to the large number, 71,334, who voted for responsible government as compared with 78,323 who voted for confederation. I am well aware of the argument that in the first referendum there was quite a small vote for the continuation of the commission government namely 22,311. But let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that of those voting, the largest number voted for responsible government. There were 69,400 votes for responsible government and 64,066 for confederation.

In the interval between the two votes, a great deal of propaganda was put out by those who wanted responsible government and by those who wanted confederation. When I was in Newfoundland I was given a copy of a "memorandum to the commonwealth prime ministers now assembled in conference in London from the responsible government league of Newfoundland". I am sure a great many members of parliament have received copies of this memorandum. It draws attention to the fact that, after the decision had been reached by the most democratic process that the people had had for many years, those who were in the minority used the publicly-owned radio there to get signatures to a petition and to get telegrams sent into the British government to the extent of some 50,000. On the other hand, the responsible government people point out that while they wanted to present their point of view in connection with appealing their case to the British parliament, they have been denied access to the radio, and that they have not been given the same advantages as have those who were supporting confederation. The charge was made in this brief that large sums of money came from outside Newfoundland to influence the voting in connection with these plebiscites. These are extremely serious charges, and I think that the people of Canada are entitled to information as to whether the charges are well founded or not. I think the Canadian government should profit by the experiences we had in Canada following the signing of confederation in 1867.

For years we have had regional problems in Canada as a result of the tactics used in bringing about confederation. If in connection with bringing about confederation between Newfoundland and Canada there have been practices which should not be approved, the people of Canada should have full particulars.

In summing up their grievances, the responsible government league mentioned that in 1876 letters patent were granted. These were suspended in 1934 on the recommendations of the royal commission of 1933, when a firm undertaking was given that this was a temporary arrangement and that eventually, when economic conditions improved, responsible government would be restored. I do not accuse the Canadian government of being guilty in connection with these grievances. But our representatives who were negotiating should have gone out of their way to see that this commitment was fulfilled if at all possible.

The British North America Act of 1867 sets out specifically that the people of Newfoundland have rights which should be respected. Section 146 of that act reads as follows:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable privy council, on addresses from the houses of the parliament of Canada, and from the houses of the respective legislatures of the colonies or provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia, to admit those colonies or provinces or any of them, into the union, and on address from the houses of the parliament of Canada to admit Rupert's land and the northwestern territory.

It is clear to me that this important provision of the British North America Act is being disregarded in the negotiations which are taking place, because the people of Newfoundland have not been able to express themselves through a representative legislature, and those who have negotiated for them have not been elected by the people and are not responsible to them. As far as we are concerned, we should have been more anxious that this provision of the British North America Act should be given some attention by the British government and by the negotiating members of the representatives from Newfoundland.

In their representations the responsible government league point out that while a majority of 7,000 was secured in support of confederation, some members of the commission government ignored their obligations and duties by participating in this controversial question, and they pointed out, that when the people in Newfoundland did vote on the question, the terms that were proposed to them were later found to be unsatisfactory.

If the negotiations could have been carried on by the elected representatives of the people after they had full information on the problems that were being discussed we would not have had that dissatisfaction.

When I was in Newfoundland on December 20 my attention was drawn to a telegram which was posted in the post office in Grand Falls, a notice asking people to fill in their application forms for family allowances. I was later sent a form. At that time a great many people in Newfoundland were unwilling to accept the fact that Newfoundland was to be a part of Canada. They said to me: "By what authority are you Canadians coming into Newfoundland and distributing your propaganda?" A good deal was said about what family allowances were going to mean to Newfoundland, but while they were taking their case to the courts they thought it was quite unfair that Canadian family allowance forms should be circulated through the mail in Newfoundland, further aggravating the problem. I am aware of the justification for this conduct. We had given a commitment to make family allowances payable after March 31, but some consideration should have been given to the feelings of the 71,000 people who felt that circulating the family allowance forms and literature was disregarding their constitutional rights while they were trying to get the British government to reverse the decision or trying to carry their case to the highest possible tribunal.

In conclusion, I should like to plead with hon. members in all sections of the house to face up to the fact that here is a minority problem that will embarrass us for some considerable time. I am familiar with the comment made by a great many that in this point of view I am expressing the case of the wealthy people in the Avalon peninsula. I need not tell the house that my contacts were not with the millionaires in St. John's. I tried to find a fairly good cross section of opinion in Newfoundland, and we must try to recognize that an injustice has been done in the methods which have been adopted in the negotiations. I do not suggest for a moment that all the wrong is on one side and all the right on the other. I do not propose to take sides in what is really a Newfoundland domestic problem, but it does vitally affect Canada and it is the duty of all hon. members to admit frankly that there is a problem there and that together we must try to solve it.

I have no doubt that eventually the people of Newfoundland will be happy members of our larger Canadian family. I agree with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), who suggested that marriages which take place between mature adults can result in a happy future for the participating parties. There are also adjustments which have to be made by people who marry late in life. The negotiating parties should have full information regarding all the details which have occurred in connection with the arrangements leading up to the marriage. I should like to express the hope that people in all parts of Canada will co-operate with our friends from Newfoundland, who will become a part of the country, and that we shall see to it that we can all work to establish a better Canada than we have ever known before.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I wish to endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson). I do not think that any hon. members will misunderstand the stand that we are taking in this particular situation. Most Canadians will welcome Newfoundland and the people of Newfoundland as a sister province of our great nation. Surely nature intended that the north half of the North American continent should be joined together economically and by blood. What has happened quite recently is the discovery of great material wealth in ore in Labrador. This seems to have had something to do, at any rate, with the sudden interest which we Canadians and Americans have taken in recent months in the development of that great area.

Mr. Adamson: Nicolet-Yamaska has been conceded to the Progressive Conservatives.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. Castleden: The reason we object to this resolution is based on the fact that we feel there has been some miscarriage—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Castleden: —of some of the basic principles of democracy. We are here as the representatives of the Canadian people, having before us an agreement the terms of which this government has entered into with a delegation from Newfoundland. The basis upon which we are making our decision is that we, for the Canadian people, believe that on the basis of these terms Canada should form an agreement and an alliance to go into confederation with Newfoundland. But the sad fact about this whole arrangement is that no similar legislature in Newfoundland, elected by the people, ever had any opportunity to discuss this matter.

In a few weeks, if this measure becomes law, the parliament of Great Britain will similarly be deciding the fate of Newfoundland on the basis of an agreement of confederation between it and Canada. I say there is a very serious lack here, when the people of Newfoundland are denied that right. Surely they are the people more concerned than any others.

Definitely, there should be an opportunity for the people of Newfoundland, through a legislative body democratically elected by the people of that country, to take the terms of the agreement, place them before their representatives, have those elected representatives discuss the matter and decide it in a proper democratic way, as should be done by a real parliament. Surely this should be done in any country among the democracies of the British commonwealth of nations.

But what have the people of Newfoundland had? They have had no responsible legislature for a number of years. A commission has been governing that country since 1934, I believe. This commission carried on its work, and suddenly it was decided that a convention should be held. Under the authority of the British government they sat in convention. In that convention there were some forty-five representatives who, under their terms of reference, were instructed, I believe, only to investigate the matter and make recommendations. But instead of that, they have gone ahead with some kind of referendum—a referendum which has not given a very large or clear majority. Even those people who voted for confederation did not represent one-half of the voters on the voters' list, though, it is true, they represent 52 per cent of the people who voted.

But what did they vote for? Did they vote for some agreement? No; the agreement was brought into being after the vote.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): They knew it would be fair.

Mr. Castleden: I do not think it is our problem. I do not think there is any question that the people of Canada would be fair with the people of Newfoundland; that is not the question at all.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): They trusted us.

Mr. Castleden: It is their legislation. It is the right of a people in a democratic country, through their legislature, to have some say about the terms of an agreement which they are to enter into. That, it seems to me, is not right, and Canada's parliament should not be a party to an agreement under which such fundamental, basic, democratic rights are denied to a people who some day will be welcomed, as I know they will be, if they decide to come in. Let Newfoundland feel that we have stood here and fought for her democratic rights. Let her feel that we welcome her as a sister in a great dominion. Let her be convinced of our belief that fundamentally her people should have the full and proper democratic right, the basic right, to some say as to whether or not they accept the terms of agreement.

I hope I have made our position clear. We certainly would welcome Newfoundland, if she could come in. I think we could do it more wholeheartedly if we felt that all the people of Newfoundland and of Labrador had had a proper democratic part in making the decision and in drawing up the agreement.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate, because I thought this afternoon that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) stated very clearly the case for members of this group. But after listening to the last two speeches I have felt that members of the House of Commons, or the public generally, may think that there is a division in this group over the entry of Newfoundland into confederation.

Mr. Rowe: Better have a caucus.

Mr. Gillis: Such is not the case. This afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did an excellent job in placing the facts of the matter before the house. Moreover, they gave, I believe, a comprehensive historical background, and the reasons why Newfoundland should enter confederation.

I rise at this time to say that I know something about Newfoundland and its problems. From where I have made my home for a good many years it is only ninety-six miles across the gulf. I have known many Newfoundlanders, and there are perhaps more of them in my constituency than in any other constituency in Canada.

Mr. MacNicol: There are over a thousand in mine.

Mr. Gillis: I believe the step now being taken to bring Newfoundland into confederation is one which should have been taken many years ago. My understanding is that Newfoundlanders are now being emancipated from a small group of fish merchants who have exploited them for the past three hundred years. As I said before, this is a step in the right direction.

Let me now say something which has not been said before. For many years the people of Newfoundland were allowed to enter Canada freely and to take employment here. During the winter months when they were not able to fish—and that is about the only industry on the island—hundreds of Newfoundlanders would come to Cape Breton island to work in the coal mines. They would find employment there during the winter months, and then return to their fishing industry when the season opened.

Since about 1931 that has not been permitted. The coal mining regulations in Nova Scotia were amended so as to preclude them from going into the mines and taking employment as coal miners. Consequently our immigration laws were amended so as to prohibit the entry of Newfoundlanders into Canada. They were treated almost as Europeans, or others coming from foreign countries. I thought that was a great disservice to the people in my part of the country because, as has been suggested by one hon. member, they are good workers and good citizens. Not many of them are to be found on relief, and they can turn their hand to almost anything. They have had to develop that technique because of the conditions under which they have lived in their own country. They had to be jacks of all trades.

Having said that, let me add that I am not quarreling with what happened in Newfoundland. I believe that those who argue along the lines of responsible government are dealing with a misnomer. It is not responsible government they are looking for, because that is exactly what they are getting now.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): They never had it before.

Mr. Gillis: Arguments were made for the setting-up of a national government, and remaining out of confederation. In the last fifty years they have had governments of that kind which have failed twice. In each case when the national government failed they had to turn to Great Britain for a commission government to administer the affairs of the island. Having failed twice with that kind of thing, I think it is unreasonable to ask the people of Newfoundland to go back to it. If it is responsible government they are looking for, in my opinion they are getting responsible government now for the first time in the history of the island. Two votes were taken, and after they were taken there was still a majority of approximately 7,000 in favour of entering confederation. I do not think anyone can say that is undemocratic, because the whole population of the island is only equal to about three constituencies. After a lot of propaganda and educational work two votes were taken, and the majority of the people of Newfoundland who voted said they wanted to come into confederation with Canada. I think that is democratic. I think the processes employed in elections in Canada were followed in Newfoundland. The argument has been raised, what are you going to do about the 71,000 people who voted the other way? I should like to ask any member of the house, what are you going to do with the large number of people in your own riding who voted against you in the election? Whether they like you or not, they accept you as their representative. That is exactly the situation in Newfoundland. There was a 45 per cent vote in favour of union. Under the circumstances, where the use of the franchise had been out of the hands of the people of Newfoundland since 1934, and where very little educational work had been done in the matter of the ballot, to get a 45 per cent vote in favour in a vote taken under the conditions that existed reflects a good deal of credit on the people who turned out to vote.

I do not see any reason to quarrel with that. As I see it, it is our duty now not to confuse the matter any further by raising those arguments which arise from sectarian sources. On this question I have seen certain briefs which have come from Newfoundland, and which I would be ashamed to introduce in this house. It is a straight sectarian appeal that is being made to the people of Canada and to the members of this House of Commons in order to offset what, in my opinion, was a democratic vote of the people of Newfoundland.

I live close to them and have worked with many of them. I know the disabilities which handicap them at the present time; but I believe that, if we handle the matter sensibly and do not fan the flames any more than they have been fanned, if we put this agreement into effect, install good administrative machinery, have members from Newfoundland in this House of Commons, and let the people of Newfoundland set up their own provincial government, the union will be successful. That is responsible government.

In my opinion they are being fooled, by a lot of propaganda they are getting now, into the belief that they are going to be dictated to and legislated for by Ottawa. The reverse is true. They will have their own government similar to our provincial governments. They will work out their own problems in the provincial field. They will have their members in this national forum to carry their message further. They will benefit from much of the social legislation for which we have had to fight over the years. I am in favour of this agreement and I think it should be carried into effect. I intend to go to Newfoundland and say what I am saying here tonight, only a lot more so. I got up on the spur of the moment because I felt I had to say these things in view of what was said by the last two speakers.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11, to approve the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the Prime Minister whether the bill which is founded upon this resolution is now available for distribution?

Mr. St. Laurent: It is available. It consists of one clause, and of the terms of agreement as hon. members have now had them for some considerable time. The bill is ready for distribution and will be distributed immediately.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT

AMENDMENTS TO IMPLEMENT TERMS OF UNION OF NEWFOUNDLAND WITH CANADA

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend several statutes to make them applicable to or otherwise conform with the Canadian confederation as and when Newfoundland becomes a province of Canada.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I presume we shall follow the procedure that was followed on the previous resolution. I take it the Minister of Justice will want to make a statement now while the Speaker is in the chair.

Mr. Garson: The statement in connection with this resolution must necessarily be an extremely short one. As hon. members know, there are on the federal statute books of Canada a number of statutes which refer to the various provinces of Canada by name. They have to do with a variety of subjects. The only purpose of the bill, to which this resolution is the introduction, is to amend those various statutes by inserting the word "Newfoundland" in the appropriate places in order to make all of those statutes now upon the books apply to Newfoundland in the same way as they do to every other province of Canada. When the bill goes into committee anyone who is interested may follow, section by section, the explanations which are given opposite, and tie them in, but all of these provisions without exception are what lawyers term consequential in that they arise out of the fact, and as a consequence, of Newfoundland being brought into confederation. They are the amending provisions that have to be made in a number of federal statutes.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I am not attempting to speak on this, but I should like to learn from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) what method has been adopted. Have you gone through all the statutes of Canada with a view to finding the particular ones that need to be amended, or will your bill be in somewhat general terms, saying that where so and so is mentioned it shall be deemed to include Newfoundland? I am merely asking for information. For example, I can think of a number of places in the criminal code where there are specific provisions relating to certain provinces which do not apply to other provinces. Will the bill when we get it, with the explanations, call attention to the individual statutes to which the bill may have reference, so that we can understand it without doing a great deal of research on our own?

Mr. Garson: The answer is yes, that it will call attention to the specific statutes. The bill will contain a number of sections, and each section will refer to some section of an existing statute which will be amended. It will not be just a general statement of a rather indefinite character.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Garson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, to amend the statute law.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I may say it is not the intention to ask the house to proceed with this bill until we have made substantial progress with the other one. The last section of the bill will provide that it would come into force on March 31, 1949, and would not be sanctioned unless and until the previous bill approving the terms of union with Newfoundland had been sanctioned.

Mr. Graydon: Then may I ask the Prime Minister when it is intended to move the second reading of the first bill introduced tonight?

Mr. St. Laurent: It is hoped to go on tomorrow with the second reading of the first bill and to allow this bill to stand until the sense of the house has been taken on the first one.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRANSITIONAL MEASURES ACT, 1947

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, may I say just a word about this, because I think it is one of the most important measures contemplated for this session. At the present time the cost of living has reached an all-time high. Though there was a slight reduction a month ago, the latest report from the bureau of statistics indicates that the cost of living has now reached the highest figure in our history.

It seems to me the government needs to consider this because of the effect it is having on all the people of Canada. If we look at the price index for 1945, when the war ended, and compare the figures with the present index, we find an increase that is phenomenal. The cost of living index in August, 1945, stood at 119·6. It has now risen to 159·6. That is a tremendous increase since the removal of controls; and the effect, of course, is really disastrous on people with small and fixed incomes, such as veterans and other pensioners, or people whose wages or salary have not gone up to any extent. It seems to me this is a matter with which the house should grapple this session. I have noticed that in the United States, for example, where the increase has been greater than here and the cost of living figure is higher, in his message to congress President Truman indicated the necessity of doing something about the restoration of controls if the cost of living did not come down. And I would say the government should bear in mind the lesson of the United States election, because President Truman campaigned up and down that country on issues of the sort the C.C.F. has been endeavouring to bring to this house for the past several years.

One of them, of course, is this matter of the increased cost of living. Actually what has happened is that today a dollar is worth only seventy-five cents as compared with the end of the war, in the basic commodities that it will buy. Think of the effect of this upon old age pensioners, for example. While there was a slight increase of $5 a month some eighteen months or two years ago, this means that the $30 they get today will buy only as much as $22.50 would buy in 1945, only three and a half years ago. And this increased cost of living, coming at the same time as the enormous increases in profits of some of our corporations are being published, is bound to provoke a great deal of discussion among those who know the real facts. All during the war our people were encouraged to buy victory bonds, to invest in war savings certificates, and all the rest of it. They were encouraged to save every dollar. At that time a dollar would buy a dollar's worth of goods; today it will buy only seventy-five cents' worth. It seems to me that is a very serious matter for all concerned, and particularly for those who made the savings several years ago.

I have other figures here. Everyone knows the manner in which the costs of production on the farm have gone up. It is said that the cost of living in urban areas has risen more sharply than on the farms, but as a matter of fact the figures do not bear out that statement. The index of farm living costs has risen by 38 per cent since 1945, compared with a 33 per cent increase in the general cost of living. Nor can it be said that this is due to the cash income of the farmer. The total cash income from the sale of farm products went up 17 per cent from 1945 to 1947. When you turn to the distributor, you find the profits of the largest food companies have risen by 47 per cent.

Sometimes it is said that wages are responsible for the rise in the cost of living. Weekly wages and salaries, for example, in one of our best paid industries, iron and steel, went up by nine per cent, while profits in that industry have risen by 66 per cent; in pulp and paper, wages are up 23 per cent and profits are up 247 per cent. I could continue the examination of the manner in which the great mass of people are being penalized by the tremendous rise in the cost of living. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I think this is a matter that the house cannot pass over lightly.

I am glad to see that the government intends to ask parliament to continue certain powers which parliament conferred upon it in order to cope with this situation. But something more is necessary than pious hopes and asking for the continuance of power, if our people are to be rescued from this tremendous increase in costs which are adversely affecting all of them, with the exception of those who benefit from the increased returns in certain classes of industry and business. I do not want to pursue this, Mr. Speaker. I have emphasized the increased cost of living. I believe the government intends to continue rent controls under this authority; that is a good thing as far as it goes.

After the removal of certain aspects of rent controls made a short time ago, I was told of cases where increases were made, particularly in the newer buildings, which put them beyond the reach of people with average incomes. If these controls were removed altogether the shortage of houses would cause rents and values to shoot sky-high. When we come to the bill itself, these are matters that should receive very thorough consideration. I just wanted to say I am glad the government is going ahead with this resolution. I hope it will reconsider its whole position with regard to controls and subsidies. As a matter of fact, I think subsidies of some types are necessary and fully warranted at this time.

Mr. Ferguson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Ferguson: Is he aware of the fact that the first reduction in the cost of living in the United States was made in meat by that octopus, the meat packers and abattoirs, which reduction was later followed by the retail merchants? This octopus, about which our friends are so glib, set the example for the reduction in the cost of living. That is private enterprise.

Mr. Coldwell: I am very glad indeed to find that we have at least one defender of the organizations which he himself describes as a great octopus.

Mr. Ferguson: I was using the hon. member's words. He so described it. I used those words so that he would recognize it.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, I recognize an octopus when I see it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Where are you looking—over there?

Mr. Coldwell: I was not looking at the member for Calgary West when I said that. What I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted a few minutes ago, was that perhaps what the hon. member says is partly true.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): I ask hon. members not to interrupt. They will please observe the rules of the house. It is not in order to interrupt any member who has the floor. I am sure hon. members will co-operate with the Speaker in this regard.

Mr. Coldwell: What I was going to say is that if it is true, and I believe it may be, that the packing interests in the United States did begin the reduction in the price of meat, that only underlines the fact that for months and even years before that reduction was made they were reaping enormous profits. So far as our own meat-packing industry is concerned, a year ago last Christmas, when the government removed certain controls, the packers had quite a large backlog of meat and other commodities. This enabled them to reap a very good harvest at that time and should enable them to make a reduction in the price of meat in this country.

An hon. Member: And butter.

Mr. Coldwell: Probably butter, but I am not conversant with that now; a year ago it was true.

I do not propose to say any more at this stage. I think that more than rent control is necessary, and the government should consider, either by subsidy or by the exercise of powers conferred upon it by parliament, ways and means of endeavouring to bring down the cost of living within reasonable bounds.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the motion which has been presented simply calls for the resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

This is a very different basis from that of the resolution we dealt with this afternoon. In that case, we knew the principle involved, but in this case we certainly have not the information which would enable us to deal with the resolution. I believe the house should have a full explanation from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) as to what emergency regulations it is intended to continue and what the effect will be, before the house is called upon to vote on this resolution.

Mr. Knowles: I rise to a point of order. Is the minister going to close the debate? He moved the motion; that constituted his first speech. When he speaks the second time, he closes the debate.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this resolution. In the first place, the minister is asking for something for which he should not be asking. Justice and law are not synonymous terms. The enforcement of the law is the responsibility of the provincial attorneys general, and they turn it off on the municipal police. There is no way of enforcing these laws. I forget how many orders in council were passed during the war, but I think it was something like 180,000. The war is now over. In the old country complaints have been made about the same thing. The other day in the British House of Commons the attorney general, Sir Hartley Shawcross, was complaining about the high cost of litigation today. Mr. Churchill supported him. Since the war closed 25,000 orders in council there have been passed. Nobody knows the law. Only five of these orders in council have been before the courts. Rules and regulations have been made from them which have the force of statutes. Complaints were made the other day in the British House of Commons about the high cost of litigation. I have been complaining here about the same thing for a long time. Nobody knows the cost of litigation today. Sir Hartley spoke on this matter at Lincoln's Inn, and Mr. Churchill referred to it in a radio speech.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is asking for something that should not be asked for, now that the war is over. In England nobody knows what the law is until it is interpreted by the privy council. Only five of these orders in council, and the rules and regulations which have the force of a statute, have come before the law courts. That should not be. As I say, the enforcement of these orders in council rests with the municipal police force, and they get nothing for it. In New South Wales the federal government of Australia gives Sydney $2,500,000 as a subvention to the city police to enforce the federal law. What is the result? We have all these violations. Only five of these orders in council have ever come before the Supreme Court of Canada and 20,000 of them altogether have been passed since the war; and the rules and regulations made under those orders in council have the force of statutes. As I say, law and justice are not synonymous terms. In 1491 B.C. Moses gave us the ten commandments. I would call to the attention of the house and the government the simplicity of those commandments compared to the laws that must be enforced by the courts today. Law reform is badly needed in this country. We have no law reform at all.

Is this law reform, to impose these orders in council which were passed during the war for emergency purposes? I say no; it is not law reform at all. Who is to enforce these orders in council? Enforcement is on the municipal police, and they do not get a cent for it. I can tell hon. members this. The ten commandments are simplicity itself, and everybody understands them. Not so these orders in council which are proposed now, long after the war is over.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, we should have some statement from the government regarding these matters, because only five of these orders in council have ever been interpreted by the Supreme Court of Canada. Yet they are imposed on all the citizens of this country, although they may not be legal. Nobody knows whether they are legal or not until they are interpreted by the privy council. Even my hon. friends to my left just recently appealed to the privy council with regard to certain legislation. If it is legal to impose these orders in council years after the war is over, I fail to see it. Nobody knows what the law is. Osgoode Hall cannot tell you what the law is. There is no finality to it on an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. The judges and magistrates are imposing these orders in council on the poor working classes of this country, and I say that the principle of it is all wrong. The municipal police get nothing for the enforcement of these orders in council, and the federal government does not itself enforce federal laws. Nobody knows what the law is until it is interpreted. Only five of them have come before the privy council.

What I am complaining about is the high cost of litigation today. The result is that everybody settles his case. Everyone must settle his case owing to the high cost of litigation. The other day in England Mr. Churchill was complaining about it, but no one in this house has done so except myself; I have been complaining for three or four years and asking for law reform. We have never had any law reform under any Minister of Justice. From Moses down to the present Minister of Justice is a long route. If this is the law reform he proposes, I am opposed to it. I can tell him that the enforcement of laws is on the provincial attorney general and he turns it over to the municipal police.

My friends on my left are no doubt extremely eager. My friend the whip down there is not a lawyer, but he knows something about law. The magistrates are convicting people illegally, as are county court judges. This matter came up in the British House of Commons, and the law was quoted to them over there, and what is being done even in this country. In England many of these things have been complained about, and it is not law reform at all. There is no law reform. As I say, the magistrates are convicting people on orders in council which are absolutely illegal. There has been no law reform that I can see. I am complaining today not only about the extension of this act but about the rules and regulations, passed under the act, which have the force of statutes. If you go to any lawyer, he cannot tell you what the law is with regard to these matters.

In England an effort was made to upset some of these orders in council, and only one county court judge questioned the law. What is being proposed here by this resolution is to extend these orders in council. The resolution says that it is expedient to do so. I say it is not expedient, years after the war, to impose on the people all these rules and regulations, which have the force of statutes and which have never been passed by this house. They are absolutely illegal. I could name some of them. I referred the other day to an adjourned debate in the British house in which reference was made to the fact that in a town called Stevenage in England all the houses were torn down. An appeal was taken to the law courts. Only one magistrate questioned the proceedings. He expressed the opinion that nothing like it had been done since the time of Ahab, who was a king of Samaria, when he took Naboth's vineyard. A county court judge questioned the law, and he was supported in the British House of Commons accordingly. He quoted the law. Naboth had a vineyard. It was taken away from him. We can find all about that in the second book of Kings.

The next thing that came up was paper money. The government in the old country passed another act and Shawcross, the attorney general of England, took it up. Mr. Churchill complained about the high cost of litigation. He said there were only five orders in council that came before the courts. There were 25,000 orders in council passed.

Is it any wonder that the poor people back home are disgusted? I see them lined up in the police court waiting to pay their fines because they had not paid $2.50 for a radio licence. They were charged $5 and costs by the magistrate. It is all illegal. They are convicted because of the actions of that mischievous institution, the C.B.C. They summoned 7,000 citizens in our city. They have a special magistrate. The magistrates do not know the law. They know it in England. What did they say in England? Mr. Churchill referred to it. First they go to the borough magistrate; then to the county court judge.

The government is introducing a measure dealing with emergency powers to go into patent law, trade-mark law and all these things. The other day in England Mr. Churchill referred to the high cost of litigation. Everybody understands the ten commandments, but who can understand the voluminous judgments that we are getting from the Supreme Court of Canada and the other courts in Osgoode Hall? Everybody can understand the simplicity of the ten commandments, but who can understand some of the judgments which are contained in the law reports which the lawyers are getting in this country today? Is that law reform? It is no wonder the people in Toronto and in constituencies throughout the country are complaining about the high cost of litigation. People are being haled before the magistrates, and some of them have no money. If that is the kind of law reform we are facing here tonight all I can say is that I am opposed to it.

Another thing is the 25,000 orders in council. Mr. Churchill complained about the same thing in England the other day. Take the law of income tax under which people are summoned and all that kind of thing. In England the application came before the borough body. I forget what they call it now. My memory is not as good as it was. In England under the exchequer court act they are required to hear and determine the application. But what did they do? This matter came before the borough magistrate and then the special commissioner of income tax. Then it went to the high court of justice, to the court of appeal and all that kind of thing. In England the courts are required to hear the application under an express clause of the exchequer court's proviso. They must hear and determine the merits of the application. A learned English lawyer, P. St. George Kirke, is my authority in this regard.

Then we have trade-marks and paper money. We are meeting here and we are prepared to pass all these things seriatim. I am going to oppose it. We must have constitutional reform, parliamentary reform, cabinet reform and most of all law reform. We have never had any law reform since I have been a member of the house. I have been a member for a long time. I am opposed to the whole program of the attorney general. I had hoped that that portfolio would go to Ontario, because Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when he was elected away back in 1896, appointed David Mills as Minister of Justice from Ontario. Quebec has had a Minister of Justice and solicitor general as head of the law of this country. I had hoped that Ontario would be favoured.

There is no emergency. The resolution says "It is expedient." Is it expedient to fine people as they have been fined in Ontario and in other provinces? They have fined 7,000 people in my city. The magistrates have fined them $5 and costs for not having a radio licence. The return I received three years ago showed that the city of Ottawa and the city of Hull across the river had not one single case in the courts, but 7,000 people were summoned before the magistrates in my city. The magistrate says, "$5 and costs, you can pay it or not." If that is law reform, five years after Germany collapsed, I say, God help the country, God help the people who have to pay for it.

You can understand the ten commandments, but can anybody understand the voluminous law reports which we are getting from Osgoode Hall and from many other courts? They wear new robes of office. They have new robes of ermine and gold. Where did they get authority for this? Is that law reform? They are dressed in all the colours of the rainbow. It is all vanity and conceit. Vanity of vanities, said the preacher, all is vanity. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) may smile. I have never had the privilege of meeting him. They say that he is not a bad fellow personally. Is that the law reform we are looking for? I noticed a lot of people from the constituency of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) in the courts the other day. I asked, "What are you doing here?" They said, "We are down here to pay $5." They call that law reform.

My hon. friends to my left say that they are the same as the Labour government in England. Well, if they are they do not believe in law reform. Who knows the law today? No lawyer can tell us what the law is. They do not know the law. The magistrates' courts are the first courts. Then we have the county court judges' courts. Members from the county court bench come to Toronto and fine the people there. They should know something about these orders in council and the rules and regulations which are actually illegal. I have never seen them. The Minister of Justice has never seen them. That applies to the income tax law and to every statute which has been passed. If that is law reform, then God help the people of this country, because there is no such thing as law reform.

I asked the Minister of Justice last session to appoint a legal committee to go into this matter. He said he would consider it. He has now appointed another commission. It seems to me that we shall become a nation of professors. These are not professors at law. But the fact is that we are becoming a nation of professors. I count that day lost when I do not read about some order in council passed appointing two professors, plus somebody else, to some job. We are nothing but a nation of professors—professor this and professor that. There are very few professors I know of in the universities now who want to hold their jobs; they would rather have these jobs. In the Annapolis valley they used to say that an apple a day kept the doctor away; but we know that a professor a day will not keep the tax collector away, especially when he is enforcing some of these famous orders in council which have been placed on the statute books.

Fortunately in the mother country they have closed off much of this. I can tell you this, that in my own constituency in Toronto many youths have been sent to jail because of these orders in council—and some women, too, who did not have the money to pay the fines imposed for infractions of some of these emergency regulations. They go to prison when they have not the money to pay the fines.

In that connection, a farm on Yonge Street, Toronto, was taken over for men, and another for women at Concord. That was taken away illegally from the city. Is that law reform? I call this to the attention of the government.

In conclusion let me say this. If that is the kind of justice and law reform the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has in mind, then I repeat that law and justice are not synonymous terms, although some people think they are.

Let us compare these emergency regulations with what has been done in England. Let us consider, too, the high cost of litigation today. Let us look at the divorce cases, which have become such a nuisance to high court judges that they want to get rid of them and place them before the county court judges.

Here we have involved magistrates and county court judges, and other judicial officials—and I have great respect for them all. They are enforcing fines and imprisonment as a result of regulations which never have passed the House of Commons. Yet I have not heard one of those regulations questioned. They say it is expedient, when in fact it is not expedient at all to provide for the continuance of certain orders and regulations.

These regulations were never necessary. They were issued by someone in this building, or someone in Ottawa. People are being fined as a result of these rules and regulations made by the governor in council. There are so many of them that no one knows what the law is. Only five of them have ever come before the supreme court, and it would take about two thousand years to interpret them. How long it would take to interpret 200,000, I do not know.

I have risen to speak for the protection of the Minister of Justice, and to ask him to do what his predecessor said he would do, namely, to have a legal committee. A legal committee should consider these legal bills.

I do not wish to take up further the time of the house. The minister has been in the house only a few days, and I have no desire to embarrass him or to say anything unkind to him. But I do call his attention to the high cost of litigation today in this country; no one can afford it. The result is that people are paying fines on orders issued by departmental officials about which lawyers and judges do not know. The lawyers and judges do not know the law in this connection. No one knows it, and it is interpreted by the privy council. My hon. friends to the left have had it before the privy council.

I believe it would be well if we had a legal committee to consider all these bills, and these rules and regulations. Then we could have some means of saving people from paying these fines, when they should not pay them.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat the suggestion I made a few moments ago, that the house should have an explanation.

Mr. Abbott: I was going to give it.

Mr. Rowe: What about the Minister of Justice?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that a technical position might be taken that the Minister of Justice would close the debate if he spoke now, and also because of the fact that most of the orders which will be continued in effect under this measure relate to my own department or are under my administration, perhaps it would be well if I were to make the explanation.

As the house is aware the government announced some time ago that it proposed to ask parliament to authorize the continuance of rental controls until March 31, 1950, and that provision would be made in the order continuing that control to provide that the dominion government would withdraw from that field in any province where the province requested that it do so, and that parliament would also be asked to make provision for paying the costs for one year of rental controls in any province which might see fit to exercise control in that particular field. As a consequence, orders relating to rental control will be included in the schedule to be annexed to the bill to be founded on this resolution.

In addition, the orders relating to the wartime prices and trade board will be contained in that schedule, but provision will be made in the bill that price control powers shall continue to be exercised only with respect to articles now under price ceilings. Perhaps the house might wish me to indicate what those articles are. They are flour, bread, butter, citrus fruits, imported canned citrus fruit juices, certain fresh vegetables, imported onions, certain fresh fruits including imported apples and imported grapes, domestic canned vegetables, imported canned fruits, molasses and sugar.

In addition there will be continued, of course, certain orders in council respecting steel control, and I believe price control on those commodities. Those are under the direction of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and information with respect to them will be given by him.

Mr. Green: What about timber control?

Mr. Abbott: Timber control as well, I believe, but that is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am glad the hon. member brought that up.

Generally speaking, those are the orders which the bill will ask should be continued for a further period until March 31, 1950.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Why? Are you going to explain why?

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps the explanation might be better made when we are in committee on the bill. For instance, a subsidy is still being paid with respect to flour used for domestic purposes. I think perhaps it would be unwise to remove price control so long as the subsidy is being paid out of public moneys. Certain commodities are being brought in from the United States, but in restricted quantities, because of exchange difficulties. There again it is felt that because of the possible short supply it is well to keep a measure of control on the profit markup.

As the house will appreciate from what I have said, the field is pretty restricted, and rapidly diminishing.

Mr. Rowe: Why on butter?

Mr. Cockeram: Why is it necessary at this stage to have two or three departments dealing with these various controls?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cockeram: No, I have asked a question.

Mr. Abbott: I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. MacInnis: When this debate ends—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: We will get the answer when we go into committee.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind hon. members that they are not entitled to speak twice. If they want to question ministers, who are not entitled to speak twice, I would suggest that hon. members wait until we reach the committee stage.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): If I may continue the explanation, the Department of Trade and Commerce administers three controls which it is proposed to continue. The first is steel control, the second timber control, and the third priorities control. Of these, the most necessary is steel control. As hon. members know, Canada's production of steel has been and continues to be greatly short of Canada's requirements. We have been importing roughly 30 per cent of all the steel that is used, and those imports have been obtained with a great deal of difficulty. By the control of steel it is possible to utilize Canada's production of basic steel to the full capacity of our finishing works. At the present time we are moving surplus primary steel, or semi-finished steel, from the Algoma Steel Company to the finishing plants at Hamilton, to the amount of about 18,000 tons per month. We are also moving semi-finished steel from the Dominion Steel and Coal Company at Sydney to Hamilton, to the extent of about 10,000 tons per month. That 28,000 tons of steel, which cannot be finished at Algoma or at Sydney, would ordinarily go for export and be finished in other countries. That was the pre-war history of the surpluses of those two plants. By moving that steel to Hamilton 28,000 tons per month of additional basic steel are turned into finished products.

The department also has the responsibility of dividing the limited tonnage of pig iron so that the foundries of the country can be kept in operation. We also have the responsibility of allocating scrap which is in very short supply, and which today comes largely from foreign countries. To end steel control abruptly at this time would, I am sure, reduce the production of finished steel from Canadian plants and Canadian foundries by as much as 20 per cent. Price control is maintained, as I think it should be, where an acute shortage exists. All steel is handled under rigid price control. I think that the industry as a whole welcomes control since it assures to each his fair share of Canadian production. I know of no demand that the control be ended; I know there is a general desire that it be continued, and I consider it definitely in the best interests of Canadian industry that it should continue for a further period.

The importance of timber control is less apparent. Only certain grades of timber are in short supply, but on the west coast particularly there is an active demand for the high grades of timber, the clears. These can be sold to the full capacity of the cut. There is a surplus of low grades. Low grades are not selling nearly as well as clears, particularly in export markets. Without control Canada would be stripped of its supply of clear lumber from the west coast. It is believed to be in the interests of Canadian industry that this control be continued for a certain period. It is being relaxed as opportunity offers, and it may probably be removed before many months go by, but at the moment it is considered necessary.

Mr. Green: Does that control operate only on the west coast?

Mr. Howe: No, it operates across Canada, but its importance is greater on the west coast on account of the export demand for clear timber.

The priorities control is used almost exclusively in connection with low-cost housing. Supplies for low-cost housing are not yet easily obtainable. Large-scale buyers for larger projects have a definite advantage in bidding for these materials. It is felt that without priorities control the building of low-cost housing would be severely handicapped. It is likely that the duration of that control may not extend beyond many months, but today for materials such as my hon. friend opposite mentions so frequently, nails and products of that kind, it does assure more equitable distribution than would be possible if we did not have a priorities control.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I quite realize, sir—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me it is more than timely that we should be discussing this resolution tonight. The resolution before us refers, among other things, to certain measures of price control. It provides, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has just indicated, for the continuance of price control on a limited number of articles, and also for the continuance of rent control for another year on the basis suggested by the Minister of Finance. As far as it goes, this measure is all to the good; but, further to my opening suggestion that it is timely that we should be discussing this matter tonight, I should like to suggest to the government,—indeed to all members on the other side of the house—that it is time that they were doing some real serious soul-searching. They do not look very happy over there tonight.

Mr. Abbott: Beaming from ear to ear.

Mr. Knowles: I may say I am not familiar with the factors that may have led to the defeat of the government today in Nicolet-Yamaska, but I can tell the government members that we are discussing in this resolution tonight one of the factors that has led to loss after loss sustained by the government since the general election of 1945.

Mr. Rowe: Too much control.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friends opposite pounded their desks a great deal a few days ago when a number of new members were brought in, but I remind the government, and the rank and file of those opposite, that since 1945 six seats that went Liberal on June 11, 1945, have since been lost. The government has picked up only two new seats. In other words, it has sustained a net loss of four seats since the general election. To complete the picture, my hon. friends to the right have had a net gain of two. We in this group have had a net gain of three. The Social Credit group has had a net gain of one. The Cartier seat was formerly held by a Labour-Progressive. The seat of Laval-Two Mountains was formerly held by an Independent. They are the only two seats the government has picked up in the last four years.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, this is not something for my hon. friends to the right to gloat about tonight. Neither is it something to justify my hon. friends opposite in making smart replies; rather it presents them with something they should think over very seriously.

Mr. Fraser: They will.

Mr. Knowles: I am satisfied there are many members opposite who know just as well as I do that one of the main reasons the government has been losing ground since 1945 has been the way in which it has bungled its policies having to do with the cost of living.

Several things have been turning the people of this country against the government they elected, though by a minority vote, in 1945: its failure to do anything substantial or adequate in regard to housing; its failure to make proper moves in matters of social security, including a proper old age pension and health insurance; its failure to keep down the cost of living. In fact, if you want to point your finger at one fundamental cause of the loss of ground by this government, it is right here in this question of the high cost of living. In addition to all the other fears and disillusionments the Canadian people are experiencing today, it is most disturbing to see the way the value of the dollar has shrunk, the plight of our old age pensioners, our superannuated civil servants, our veterans on burnt-out pensions, and others, and also the way in which the increased wages and incomes in the pockets of our people have become worth less because of the rise in the cost of living.

This is a subject, Mr. Speaker, with which, as hon. members of this house know, we are familiar, and as to which we could go on and on. But I am going to stop, for the reason that I think perhaps I may make my case stronger if I put it as I have, and say to the government that unless they wake up while there is yet time this continuing rise in the cost of living—and it is still going up despite the fact that there was a slight recession in the report before the last one—will result in their being turned out of office when the election is called. I submit that for the well-being of the Canadian people they should, while there is yet time, make a turn in the direction they have been traveling and do something about this continually rising cost of living. In this measure now before us there is a chance for the government to amend and revise the bill which is to be based upon this resolution, and go in the direction of restoring price controls. Conditions today demand a determined effort to bring down the cost of living and improve the standard of living of our Canadian people; failure to do this will not be tolerated.

Mr. J. H. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I realize that when we get into committee stage we will be in a much better position to look for answers to pertinent questions in regard to this resolution, but I ask the indulgence of the house while I make one or two general observations. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that these observations will not be of the kind to which I have just listened. Just why at this stage any honourable and intelligent member of this chamber should get up and discuss whether or not the government has the confidence of the people is beyond my comprehension. Surely anyone and everyone must know what is going on in Canada at the moment. The confidence of the people is slipping away from the present administration faster and faster all the time; and that does not need to be brought to the attention of this honourable assembly, using this as a vehicle to bring it to the attention of the fourth estate in order that they may spread the word across Canada. Why, already this fourth estate, to which I seldom have the privilege of speaking, have told the people from Vancouver to Halifax what is transpiring; and what they say tomorrow morning no doubt will not only emphasize but underline in every paragraph what they have been saying previously, so that when the time comes the people will arouse themselves and put in an administration a little more to their liking than the one we have had since 1945.

My purpose in rising, Mr. Speaker, is to mention two or three matters of a general nature on which the government might cogitate until such time as we get into committee of the whole. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who has been a kind of omnibus minister, who has had his finger in almost every pie it has been my privilege to see cut into during the last decade, must know something about what he is going to do in connection with this resolution, because he has been part and parcel of its subject matter. Not only that; he has been the boss. What he said went, and probably that is still the case. Every job needs a boss. Just how efficient and capable that boss may be, or how he may be regarded by those under his control, is another matter. I remember that in my younger days I told my boss I thought a certain thing might have been done in a certain way. I remember so well that he pointed to his white shirt and said, "Why do I wear a white shirt? Just to show you young people who is boss around here."

The day of the Minister of Trade and Commerce wearing a white shirt to show who is boss around here has gone by, and from here on I suggest that he should be cautious. At the same time, as I said before, in order that members of the government may have something to cogitate about, I want to mention one or two matters of moment. May I preface my remarks by making a general observation, expressing my own opinion, not something I read in some journal, though perhaps the opinion more or less settled itself upon me because I read the journals now and then.

I am of opinion that general commodity prices the world over and particularly on the North American continent are starting to go down. They are following the curve that obtained in 1921-22, just after the first war, when in 1922 prices slipped so badly that they were only about one-third the prices in 1920. If anyone examines commodity prices today he will see that the same course is being followed, in almost the same period of time to the month from cessation of hostilities.

The disaster of 1921-22, financially speaking, was a serious one. The difficulty I see ahead will not be quite as severe, for the reason that in Canada we had some control. I hope this house will not applaud that statement too much, because that control was taken off by the powerful nation to the south before the control in Canada was removed. In the United States inflation reached a higher point than in this country; but from that inflation those charged with the responsibility of conducting affairs in that country were able to pad a cushion that will help them tide over the difficulty we are facing now; that is, not the collapse but the gradual recession in the prices of commodities.

Whilst controls were on, those of us in Canada who had the responsibility for the conduct of industry were not able to pile up that same cushion to take care of, not a depression but a decline in commodity prices. This decline in commodity prices is fast coming to our country in common with the United States. I hope it is a gradual decline and not precipitous. I hope the collapse, if I may use that expression for lack of a better one, or the gradual lowering of prices of all commodities, will not be too severe. When one considers this decline, I say that the lack of necessity for the ideas embodied in this particular resolution becomes more and more apparent. The need for the lessening of controls becomes more apparent because, with the lowering of commodity prices, in due course the law of supply and demand will take care of the necessity for having legislation such as this. I say to the government now, when it is framing the terms of the bill upon which this resolution is based: Do not incorporate in it anything which is not necessary. Let us get back to common sense, and let the law of supply and demand take care of the items which make it necessary for you to introduce this bill at this time.

I should like to mention, Mr. Speaker, one or two particular items. Perhaps I can be forgiven if they pertain to the community from which I come. The last items mentioned by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) were lumber and steel. I believe he will agree with me that the necessity for control of lumber is pretty well past. The control of lumber is not a large item, nowhere near as large as it was twenty-four months ago. You could almost forget about it. I feel that when the minister mentioned lumber he was sort of filling in. I leave it there.

In so far as steel is concerned, steel is in great demand. Steel undoubtedly requires some measure of regulation. For what reason? The reason is that projects of great magnitude, so far as this little country of Canada is concerned, have been held up for a great variety of reasons. To my mind, some of these reasons are patriotic. We had a war. We were told not to use steel while the war was on. We were told to forget, until the war was over, about our building projects requiring steel. The war consumed a tremendous amount of steel. Those charged with the responsibility for new construction requiring steel, realizing that a war requires a great quantity of this product, delayed their projects five years—yes, six, seven and eight years. The blueprints, however, were on the table. Those blueprints were worrying those who were directing the affairs of different organizations such as, for example, banks and office buildings.

May I give you a particular illustration in this regard? It is this that causes me to rise in my place tonight, and it concerns the necessary improvement of transportation in the city of Toronto which will require many thousands of tons of steel. Hooking up that problem with the control of priorities, which is in the hands of the same minister, I ask the indulgence of this house to give consideration to that requirement of the city of Toronto. Including the metropolitan area, this city now has the tremendous population of a million people. In its handling of the transportation problem, it is ten or twenty years behind. Give the city of Toronto the steel required for this project which has already been delayed by one decade, if not close to two.

I urge this, Mr. Speaker, from the sensible and practical standpoint I mentioned a moment ago, that I was of the opinion that commodity prices are coming down. Let the hon. and sensible members of this house charged with the responsibility see to it that the commodity prices slide does not become a toboggan slide. Let them see to it that the bottom does not fall out of things as it did in 1922. I believe that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should give priority to the steel for that tremendous project in the city of Toronto which will help take a good deal of surplus steel off the market, and in the final analysis the Toronto taxpayers will not be in the position of having to pay more for the completion of their transportation system than they would have had to pay had there not been this control over the supply of steel. What I am trying to say is this: Let us soften the collapse of commodity prices by going ahead with projects of a kind that will not only absorb the production of steel, but will absorb that other and more important factor, the unemployed. During a period of recession in prices, the most important factor of all is keeping our people employed. Give the people the tools and materials to do the job so that employment will continue at a high level over this period which might become a transition period.

So far as other commodities are concerned, I say to the hon. members to my left not to worry too much about the cost of living. I can see a recession in commodity prices which will help that situation. Before I resume my seat, I should like to make one or two more suggestions in that regard.

I notice that at this moment the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is in the chamber. As I look at him I think of the work he is doing on behalf of his department. I think of his $30 million expenditure spread over a period of years in a humanitarian cause. I hope that the minister of priorities, the minister of steel, will be generous to the Minister of National Health and Welfare when he approves of a scheme here and there which, in the final analysis, will relieve the suffering of humanity. When the Minister of National Health and Welfare spends his $13 million and finally his $30 million, and he finds projects delayed because of the minister of priorities and the minister of steel, I know, Mr. Speaker, that they will not even need to get together; a note from the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the minister of priorities will smooth the way so that these great projects to the credit of Canada and of the Department of National Health and Welfare, which are being undertaken in order that humanity may be served during sickness and for the preservation of the health of the whole community, will not run short of steel or lumber and may in due course go on with their construction.

I was addressing myself to some of the ideas that are running through the minds of some of the hon. members to my left. I was thinking of the high cost of living, and at the same time of rent control. I will try to describe the high cost of living as it appears to me, speaking on behalf of my constituency and myself. I am just as satisfied that the cost of living will not pyramid as I am of the fact that I am standing here, and that the cost of living will not go much higher. On the contrary, I am satisfied that it will come down. It will come down by using the efforts of our Canadian people to get more production not only for our own consumption but for export overseas. The overseas picture has not been too bright. I am not one of those who think it will get a great deal brighter with regard to our exports. Where will our exports find their port of destination? In days gone by they found it largely in the United Kingdom. Then it was a simple matter, because of the invisible balance of funds in the hands of the United Kingdom, which was our greatest customer, to take care of the requirement of getting Canadian dollars back into the hands and pockets of the producers of Canada. But that invisible balance which was so necessary in those days has fast disappeared. In the days to come, what is to take the place of that balance?

It has been my high privilege to observe what has happened to the world around. Although I am only an observer, I have some conception of the world financial situation. I think of the pound sterling versus the Canadian dollar and the American dollar. I think of Rhodesia producing tobacco the same as is produced in western Ontario. I think of Australia producing wheat and those great white-faced cattle they turn into beef for the British market. I think not only of products of that kind all down the line, but of products such as non-ferrous metals like zinc, lead, and so forth. Other parts of the world produce these commodities. We are in this spot. Those other parts of the world which produce these commodities I have mentioned accept with gusto the British pound sterling as payment whereas they are unable to find Canadian dollars and American dollars, we will say, for the reason that they are unable to balance their trade payments. So to the other problems I have mentioned to a slight extent I add this additional problem: Whence will the 50,000,000 people of Britain receive their supplies or receive their food? The natural place from which these supplies will come is those countries in which they are produced and which are happy to accept the British pound sterling. So we must give some thought to that matter, having regard to the economy of Canada at this time. With that factor in the equation, I say to my hon. friends to my left: Do not cry too much about the high cost of living. World-wide factors and economic conditions will in turn take care of that problem, and we producers in this country of ours will be looking for consumers. When the law of supply and demand applies, in due course the cost of living will go down and find its proper level.

There is one other point to which I wish to refer before I resume my seat. Rent control has been a difficult problem and it has been difficult of administration. With so many people taking advantage of it, and so many people suffering from the lack of housing accommodation, a problem of the first magnitude is created for this honourable assembly. Many people are afraid to rent space they may have in their homes for fear that those who come in and occupy that space cannot be dispossessed in times when they are perhaps not behaving or in times when the immediate family which owns and operates the domestic establishment finds for one reason or another that it wants the space. What are the reasons, hon. members may ask. The answer is, the return from overseas, a few years ago, of young men bringing back English brides, and finding the upstairs flat of the father's home occupied by a tenant under rent control, as a result of which the son of the family and his new bride, and perhaps a youngster, were unable to get into the upstairs of the home, and live in peace and harmony with the father and mother. That is one reason.

The other reason is that there are selfish people who find themselves in a position of advantage, in that they happened to rent the premises during the period when rentals were depressed and wages were going up. On the one hand, the man and his wife accept the wages they receive, which were going up and up for two or three years, and at the same time refuse to pay their fair share of the cost of their lodgings, which cost was going up as far as the owner of the premises was concerned. Taxes were going up, and the cost of coal for heating purposes was going up, as was the general cost of the operation of a home. The owner found all those costs going up but not to the same degree the return from boarders or roomers, or from sublet premises. Those returns did not go up to the same extent. The net result is that there has been no peace and harmony among those people who have rented accommodation, and the owners have become so disgusted that, if they got these people out, never again would they rent premises to anyone whomsoever. I am of the opinion that when this rent control finally comes off, and these restrictions have been removed from the individuals who own premises and sublet them, there will be such an abundance of space offering, for those unfortunate enough not to have a domicile at the moment, that half of the difficulty of this problem will be solved. When the Minister of Finance rises in his place, as he did a few moments ago, and says that we will extend these controls of one kind and another to March 1950, I say to him: Give some thought to whether or not you mean March 1950, or whether you mean what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) intimated—as soon as possible. Relieve the restrictions. Relieve the position. Help the position to cure itself. Do not dogmatically say March 1950. When we go into committee, tell this house that as long as you have in hand the administration of this particular feature of our controls, your officers will advise you. I do not hold the minister entirely responsible, Mr. Speaker. I do not like the word which has been used around here a good deal, but I cannot think of a better one. Perhaps the bureaucrats write the story for the minister. Perhaps the minister often tells the story as it is written. It is humanly impossible twenty-four hours a day for the minister to keep track of everything which is written and which he must be responsible for. He knows that as well as I do. I ask that ordinary common sense be the judge. I am just as sure as I stand here, in view of the predicament he is in now, in view of the predicament the country is in now, while many of these controls are being enforced, that if he uses common sense he will get rid of those portions of the controls which can be lifted without too much turmoil, which conditions will permit him to lift, and on lifting which public opinion will congratulate him. Do not do that all of a sudden in March 1950, but do it between now and then. He will not be there then; that is the difficulty. I say: Speed and oil up the machinery that is behind you. It does not need much oil; it seems to be well oiled. Increase the voltage a little bit and get rid of everything that public opinion wishes to be rid of, so that the shock and turmoil which will come in March 1950 will not be quite as severe as it looks as though it might be, looking at it from today's vantage point.

The Minister of Finance knows better than I do the commodities that are being subsidized. They have been an expensive luxury. They have been made necessary in his department by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation which has gone into business. Government in business is not the best thing for a virile Canadian people. Government in business paying subsidies and stepping out into the market and of necessity buying commodities of one kind and another is not the best thing. You have had some experience of it, Mr. Speaker. When history is written, it will show on the credit side of the ledger some value to the Canadian people in so far as controls are concerned; but the government will not receive thanks for that value. On the other side of the ledger there will be a tremendous debit which has been added to the national debt, a national debt which will be bearing interest when my grandchildren and great-grandchildren are still wondering how democracy functioned during the days from 1945 to 1950. Therefore I say to the government: weigh these matters in the balance and get out of business. Get your Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, backed by the wealth of Canada, out of business.

I can give a half dozen reasons why they should get out of business. The first one that runs through my mind, and the most potent of all, is this. Who are they to conduct this business on behalf of the government? They are the best men that the government could find. I admit that. They are honourable, upright and courageous. Many of them worked for $1 a year. But, Mr. Speaker, the war is over. Those who are left—and this is no reflection on them—are men who cannot find their way back into their own business. They know that the war is over. They know that in this particular vocation they are working on behalf of the government. They must realize in their quiet moments, when they are thinking over their life's work and their career, that they have served their country well. During the war they served to their own disadvantage. Financially speaking, perhaps, they might have gone farther ahead if they had stuck to their own business. Now that the war is over, let them get back to the vocations for which they were trained and apprenticed. Let them do that in our behalf and in behalf of private enterprise. Let us get out of business as far as government is concerned.

The thought runs through my mind, as I think about the career of many of these great Canadians who have been of such service to the government during the tragic days of the war, that they have aged since then. Five years in these positions means ten years. It is most unfortunate if, during their declining days, or during the days when they have not the push and initiative that they had when the war first broke out, they have to be kept in positions sponsored, and paid for, by this government. That is a sad thing for Canada. I say that the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, mentioned by the minister when he spoke of flour—

Mr. Abbott: It does not pay that subsidy.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Fruit and molasses.

Mr. Abbott: It is paying no subsidies.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): —whatever portion of it has to do with this particular resolution. Let us in an orderly businesslike way, to the general weal of the whole of Canada, get rid of the necessity of having these control organizations. At the same time I add a word of caution. Be careful that you assume your full responsibility with regard to any organization, whatever it may be, which in any way may form a cartel or gang up on any particular commodity to the disadvantage of Canada. Use the Combines Investigation Act to the limit in these things. Put behind that particular act some of the power that is in price control and let Canadians know that that act is to be enforced, and in the final analysis I am of the opinion that the Canadian people will be glad to be rid of these controls which put the government in business. Do that as soon as is reasonably possible. I did not say get rid of all controls. Avoid the shock of March, 1950—and meantime probably we will be over there to do it for you.

I say to the government, take some of the power now behind controls and put it behind the act which protects our Canadian people from monopolies and cartels. If that were done, this country would ultimately be far better off.

On motion of Mr. Low the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will proceed with Bill No. 11, to approve the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada. If we pass that bill during the day, we will proceed with resolutions numbers 6, 4 and 3 on today's order paper, which deal with emergency powers, the Agricultural Products Act and the Foreign Exchange Control Act.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.56 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 8, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

GRANTS ANNOUNCED MAY 14, 1948—ORDERS IN COUNCIL AND REGULATIONS

Mr. Thomas Reid (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): I desire to lay on the table orders in council and regulations, in French and English, dealing with the administration of the health grants announced on May 14, 1948.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On June 30 of last year the Minister of Labour said it was the intention of the government to submit the whole question of government annuities to a special committee at this session of parliament. Can the minister say whether the government will now carry out that intention?

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): The intention of the government will be made known when a decision is reached.

CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER ACTION BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I have not had an opportunity to put it in writing, but the subject matter is such that I think he will be able to answer it without notice. The question has to do with the news of the result of the trial in Hungary. A few days ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) made known the message the government had communicated to the representatives of Hungary. Today it has been announced that Cardinal Mindszenty has been sentenced to life imprisonment. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said a few days ago, it is recognized that this is a challenge to freedom of worship—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —and I would ask the Prime Minister what steps the government will now take to carry further the objection taken by Canada prior to the trial?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The verdict and sentence of the Hungarian court have just been announced, and the government has not yet had an opportunity to consider the matter. Before indicating the steps it may take, the government will again communicate with the other signatories to the Hungarian peace treaty, because we feel that if there could be joint action it would be likely to be more effective than the separate action of one signatory.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DISTRIBUTION OF MEDALS AND CAMPAIGN STARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Can the Minister of Veterans Affairs confirm a press report that service medals and campaign stars will be issued this year? If so, how early in the year?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The matter referred to comes under my colleague the Minister of National Defence. My department provides the records and does the searching of them to ascertain to whom the medals and stars should go. The question should be directed to my colleague.

Mr. Fulton: Then I will put the question to the Minister of National Defence.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Arrangements have been made under which a sufficient supply of stars will be available to begin the distribution about the month of September, and to continue the distribution at the rate at which new addresses are likely to be received from the veterans entitled to medals.

IMMIGRATION

COUNT JACQUES DE BERNONVILLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources. Is Count Jacques de Bernonville still in Canada, and if so where is he?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): So far as I know, the man in question is in Montreal. At the present time he is out on bail bond under habeas corpus proceedings, pending a decision by the courts following the dismissal by me of his appeal from our deportation order.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask a supplementary question? Is the minister aware that this man is a traitor, and that he betrayed allied soldiers to the gestapo?

TRADE

QUESTION AS TO DEVALUATION OF THE CANADIAN DOLLAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alan Cockeram (York South): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? In view of the increasing difficulties encountered by Canadian exports in world markets, is the government prepared to give an early decision on these questions: (a) allowing the Canadian dollar to find its own level in relation to other currencies, and (b) devaluing the Canadian dollar according to the Bretton Woods agreement?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend did not have an opportunity, I take it, of giving me notice of his question. It is one with which I have dealt on numerous occasions before. I do not think it is a matter of urgent public importance, and I am not prepared to deal with it now.

Mr. Cockeram: It certainly is important. You are losing trade every day.

NEWFOUNDLAND

APPROVAL OF TERMS OF UNION WITH CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 11, to approve the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Mr. John R. MacNicol (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, during the last fifteen years I have given a good deal of study to problems affecting Newfoundland; therefore I should like to add some comments to what has already been said with regard to the measure now before us.

I wish to congratulate all four leaders upon the splendid addresses they delivered yesterday. I assume it is quite in order that I should say a special word about my own leader (Mr. Drew), who delivered an able and instructive address.

I first became interested in the question of Newfoundland through a study of the history of the Newfoundland regiment which served in the war of 1812. This study took me on a trip of over a thousand miles, because the Newfoundland regiment travelled 2,500 miles before seeing action in this country in the first year of that war. The Royal Newfoundland regiment was not large. The part of it which served in Canada at that time consisted of not more than fifty men, but they were fifty heroes. Having been born in Ontario I am proud of the part that regiment took in keeping Canada within the empire. I do not know what we would have done had they not come here at that time.

The Newfoundland regiment was brought here by General Brock. Before the war broke out, General Brock had been at Quebec city. Having come from the island of Guernsey, one of the Channel islands, the former home of many Newfoundlanders, General Brock desired a portion of the Newfoundland regiment to go with him to York, now called Toronto. This they did. Brock took them with him to what is now called Amherstburg, and they were not long there before they were in the thick of the fighting.

When Brock arrived before Detroit—or, as the English called the area at that time, the straits—he had with him about fifty of the Royal Newfoundland regiment. The euphonious French word, Detroit, has been applied to this place ever since. These fifty men participated in that great victory, the capture of Detroit, which helped Brock in the splendid work he did before his death. After that battle, members of this regiment remained in the forces in that part of Canada, in what was then called the "right division."

I have made an exhaustive study of this period in our history in connection with the work I am doing for the restoration of the site of Moraviantown, in Kent county—Moraviantown was known in those days as Fairfield. The Royal Newfoundland regiment remained under Colonel Proctor in the "right division" and took part in the engagements on the Maumee. They fought up as far as Fort Wayne. They also took part in the attack by Proctor on Fort Meigs. I do not know whether they were at Fort Stevenson, Sandusky, but I presume they were. After the retreat of Proctor, the members of the Newfoundland regiment retreated with him. The majority of the party were taken prisoner east of the present city of Chatham when the boat in which they were ascending the Thames river was captured.

Later members of this regiment served in the vicinity of Toronto, then called York, and still later in the vicinity of Prescott in the attack on Ogdensburg. I shall not take the time of the house to enumerate all the points in which they served, but history records that on many fields a portion of the Royal Newfoundland regiment did a major job in Upper Canada and aided in preserving this part of Canada for the British empire.

In the pursuit of my inquiries I learned of course about the battle of Moraviantown—or, as it is called in American history, the battle of the Thames—which was fought on the 5th of October, 1813, about three miles east of the present town of Thamesville in Kent county. During the last ten years I have made extensive studies in that part of the country, because, Mr. Speaker, in 1950 we expect to hold an international commemoration service at the site of Moraviantown. We hope the President of the United States will attend, along with the governors of the states of Ohio, Kentucky, Pennsylvania and Michigan. At the battle of Moraviantown the governor of Michigan was present, Governor Cass. General Meigs, the governor of Ohio, was not on the battlefield, but was on his way there. Many of his troops served in that battle. Governor Shelby of Kentucky was on the field. I assume that the present governors of these states will attend the commemoration service. The American commanding general at that battle was General W. H. Harrison, who later became President of the United States. I expect that President Truman will attend this service next year; also the governor of Pennsylvania, from which state many of the soldiers came, as well as many of the citizens of Moraviantown.

More than fifteen years ago, in the pursuit of the studies I was making, I decided to go to Newfoundland. While there I made an exhaustive survey of what will soon be our tenth province. The names of places in Newfoundland are interesting, because the people are nearly all from the Channel islands, Ireland, or England. Not many of them are from Scotland. Even in St. John's I could hardly find a church of my own persuasion to which I could go on Sunday, because there are few Scots on the island. Quite a number of the people there are from France, or from the northern provinces of Spain, called the Basque provinces.

The names are beautiful. The first port at which one lands from Canada is Port aux Basques—one could hardly find a more attractive name. Then there is a port called St. Georges, and as you go round the coast you come to a place called Curling. There is Corner Brook, in which the big paper mills are situated; and there is Twillingate, from which so many Newfoundlanders left to come to Canada. As I said yesterday, perhaps a thousand of them now live in the riding of Davenport. I am well acquainted with many of them and know of their splendid qualities, their fine character, their ability and their industry. Naturally I am pleased indeed that their homeland is to become a province of Canada.

I could mention other names, such as Grand Falls, Harbour Grace, Carbonear, Bay Roberts—I spent some time there; Brigus; Ferryland, first settled by Lord Baltimore before he went to what is now the city of Baltimore in the United States. It is too bad he did not remain in Newfoundland; perhaps it would have been better for that country had he done so. All around the coast of Newfoundland you find these euphonious and beautiful names.

I made a thorough survey of the resources of the country, of which there are many. I was greatly interested in the iron mines, having been in the iron smelting business myself. Canada has bought from Newfoundland as many as several million tons a year of raw high-grade iron, all of which I believe went to the furnaces at Sydney, Nova Scotia. I hope it will continue to go there so that that great port in Nova Scotia may be kept prosperous.

After my return home I read an article in Collier's, the issue of April 12, 1941, which argued that Newfoundland should become part of the United States. I always found Newfoundland to be intensely British and intensely loyal to British institutions and traditions. It will be perhaps the most British province in Canada, and will be a welcome addition to that sentiment here. When I spoke on this matter in 1941 I quoted this paragraph from the article in Collier's to which I have referred:

> The Yanks have come for ninety-nine years. Maybe they would never leave. Maybe presently they'd take the whole island over, ship the commission of government back to England, build roads, start industries, set up Yankee relief, restore self-government.

That possibility will exist no longer when the house passes this bill, as I know it will.

There are one or two statements in this quotation of which we might take particular notice. One is "build roads." We must do that to help them out. I made a careful survey in the south part of the island, and it struck me that we would have a golden opportunity to make the island happy by building a road directly through from St. John's to Port aux Basques. I do not believe you can now motor across the island at all. But if the road followed the railway it would have to run away up north from St. John's to Grand Falls and finally come to Port aux Basques, a distance of over five hundred miles. A road straight across from St. John's to Port aux Basques would shorten the distance to be traveled and would speed up transportation between the various parts of Newfoundland and St. John's, and from the Avalon peninsula to Canada. The construction of such a road is one thing we might well keep in mind.

We should welcome these people by doing everything we can to make them happy. As someone said yesterday, there may be differences of opinion, but there are differences of opinion about many matters of importance, and I shall not worry about that. I like the remarks made by my leader in that regard. I thought he handled the subject effectively and satisfactorily, as did the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis.) We have an opportunity to do something for these people, to make them happy after Newfoundland becomes part of the confederation.

In addition to the roadway I have suggested I would strongly recommend that we have a new boat for the service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. The last time I went across the strait I remember that the boat was a small one. It was satisfactory; I have nothing but compliments for it, but a new boat should be constructed so that freight cars as well could be transported. The narrow gauge railway from Port aux Basques to St. John's should be widened to standard gauge. I realize that it would take some time to do this, but it would make the people of Newfoundland happy that they had come into union with Canada. It would result in a great deal of business to them and to us also.

Let us consider Newfoundland as a tourist centre. We can say that every province in Canada is a magnificent tourist centre, and so it is. Newfoundland is a tourist's paradise. It has magnificent bays all around the island. As my leader said yesterday, when John Cabot and his son first reached Newfoundland they were so strongly impressed by what they saw that they called the place Bonavista, which means "beautiful view", and it certainly is a beautiful view. That name could be applied to any of the magnificent bays about the island. Then up in the north, at the centre of the island, as those who have been there know, for two hours before you arrive you see high projections or peaks which they call the Topsails. They are named the Foresail, the Mizzen Topsail, the Main Topsail and the Gaff Topsail. The view which they present is a topographical wonder, well worth anyone's trouble and expense to go to see; and so all over the island. It is a natural paradise.

Finally, Newfoundland has magnificent ores, one of which I have mentioned, iron. Iron ore from that country is the basis on which the fine city of Sydney has been built. I hope that every effort will be made to keep the Sydney plants in operation, using the iron ore which will now probably come in in larger quantities. It came in free of duty anyway. It is obtained at Bell island, not far from St. John's. I have been there. It is a very high grade ore, and a resource which can help to build up eastern Canada. We must do all we can to build up eastern Canada.

In the addition of seven representatives to the membership of the House of Commons, and six in the other place, the union of Newfoundland with Canada will greatly strengthen the delegation from the maritime provinces. From the maritimes we now have twenty-six members in the House of Commons and twenty-four in the other place. The members and senators from Newfoundland will be a welcome addition to the strength of the maritime delegation—and it cannot be too strong. If the electricity program I announced last year were carried out in its entirety, the delegation from there would be doubled. I am happy to say that at the conclusion of my speech in 1941 I said that the island would be entitled to seven members in the House of Commons and five in the other place.

I am pleased at having had some small part in creating favourable sentiment towards union, both in Canada and in Newfoundland. I have been given some credit for that in the press in Newfoundland. I created favourable sentiment here, particularly through the Newfoundlanders in my own riding. I feel that I have had some small part in bringing about this sentiment in Canada, in relation to a project which has been mooted since 1858, as the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew) said yesterday. I take a good deal of satisfaction in having had a small part in the creation of the feeling which has brought this grand climax to the whole program of the fathers of confederation, namely, the bringing in of Newfoundland to form the tenth province of Canada.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the committee which considered the Labrador case, and I took part in the debate regarding that important part of Newfoundland. As hon. members know, Labrador was given to Newfoundland by a decision of the privy council. It had been under the protection of the British government, you might say; a governor had been appointed to the territory and Labrador was given to Newfoundland.

I wish to bring before the house the questions which were before the committee at that time. First of all, according to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

> The second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure.

According to May, the last edition:

> The second reading of a private bill corresponds with the same stage in other bills, and in agreeing to it the house affirms the general principle or expediency of the measure.

The present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was minister of justice at the time this other matter was under discussion. I hold in my hand a copy of Everybody's magazine, published by a great man in England, Mr. Poke. In an article he refers to the present Prime Minister. The article is a laudable one, which I approve. I knew the present Prime Minister before he was a member of this house. I have always had a great admiration for him because of his many personal qualities, which have endeared him to a large number of people. In the city I come from he opened our winter fair, and he has been a welcome guest there.

I also wish to refer to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) because I have known him longer than anyone else in the house has. I knew his father: I knew our leader as a student at the university of Toronto. I did not like the reception the leader of the opposition met with here last Friday night, because he is a great Christian gentleman. He is a distinguished lawyer, and was an athlete. He is a kind-hearted man. I cannot speak too highly of the services which he gave to the glorious cause of education. I remember when he lived on Wellesley street. I lived around the corner from him, and he was a member of a great fraternity, D.K.E., opposite the house where young Jack Copp, a varsity rugby player, was killed by a burglar a few years ago. I have always been a great admirer of the leader of the opposition and I am a strong supporter of his today.

Now I wish to say something about the merits of the proposed bill. I was a member of the house in 1941 when the hon. member for Davenport, the great traveler and discoverer, took a trip down there in the summer of 1941. He made some discoveries about Labrador. The bill which was before us in 1947 had to do with the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador railway. I was a member of the committee which dealt with that bill. Important matters came up in that connection. At that time we had no control over Newfoundland. The sponsors of the bill were proposing to deal with the natural resources of Labrador and to build railways in contravention of the Railway Act. At that time we inserted a saving clause which read:

> Provided that authority be obtained from Newfoundland.

That was a wise provision, because Labrador, I understand, is to have one member in the House of Commons and one senator. The final discussion on Labrador took place on April 25, 1947, and I shall quote from page 2433 of Hansard of that year. In connection with the bill many matters came up. The sponsors of the bill were asking for hotel services and railway services. At that time we did not own the territory or the country. Here is a matter which I brought up at that time:

> Another point I wish to make is that we are committed to a 99-year lease on bases, from Newfoundland to British Guiana, between Britain and the United States. That lease was given with the consent of Canada. We have given to the United States leases on all the bases in the Atlantic ocean, including some on the shores of Newfoundland and Labrador. The bases are not all out in the ocean, because some are on Greenland, Iceland and other places in the north country, including Newfoundland and Labrador, the territory under the joint defence board and the atomic board.
> This proposed agreement is ultra vires of the dominion. At the end of the bill it is brought under the Railway Act by saying that it is declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

We did not have the power in the House of Commons at that time to sanction the Labrador bill. But this lease for ninety-nine years was practically a freehold. They were urging that the Newfoundland and Labrador bases be given to the United States, although the lease for ninety-nine years was to protect United States shores.

I believe the government of Canada, the provincial governments and Newfoundland would be well advised to seek the co-operation of Britain and the United States in having that lease cancelled and charged up to lend-lease. In the darkest hours of the war, during the battle of the Atlantic, fifty ships, many of which were not fit for use and some of which could not be taken to sea, were given as consideration for that lease. I hope the Prime Minister will do something to help Newfoundland and Labrador by taking the action which I suggest.

I support the principle of the bill now before the house, and hope that it passes the House of Commons unanimously. If it does, I know that sooner or later we shall have the Chignecto canal leading into the bay of Fundy, because that is the back door into the St. Lawrence waterway. I speak with the possibility of war in mind—because this present weaponless war, as I call it, is just as dangerous as was the Hitler war. They are almost two of a kind.

I believe a better day is dawning for Newfoundland and Labrador and also for this country. Newfoundland was a pioneer at the time of confederation. I support my leader on the stand he has taken, and also the Prime Minister in what he has said. I do urge, however, that the giving up of those bases in Newfoundland and British Guiana in the darkest hours of the battle of the Atlantic should not be charged against Canada, Newfoundland and Labrador, but that negotiations should be had with the British government and with the United States to have them charged up to lend-lease.

Newfoundland

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly concerning only two matters which arise from the bill now before us. It has been said by a number of hon. members who have already spoken that as Canadians we must do our best to extend the warmest possible welcome to the people of Newfoundland as they enter confederation.

One of the consequences of confederation will be the coming to this city and to parliament of seven members of the House of Commons and six members of the other place. The question I raise, and which I hope is being considered by the government, is this: What sort of welcome will it be for these thirteen new members of the Canadian parliament if, upon arriving here, they find they have no office space? I suggest strongly that this is a matter which should receive the serious consideration of the government, and I suggest further it would not be out of place for the government to indicate to parliament whether or not such consideration is being given, and if so, along what lines.

This matter has been taken up on many occasions both in the house and with officials of the house, not only because of the coming to parliament of representatives of Newfoundland, but because of the overcrowding already existing, and because of the increase in membership provided by redistribution.

Mr. Probe: Put the senators in the new printing bureau.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend suggests that the senators' offices might be moved to the printing bureau. To say the least, space might be found in the east block for members of the other place; they would be somewhat closer to the Chateau Laurier. But speaking seriously, this is a matter that does require consideration.

I could make a case for the greater space needed for members on the opposition side of the house. Were I to do so, it might be regarded as a case of self-interest. May I add however that it seems to me to be unfair and poor business when so many parliamentary assistants, who have certain extra duties as a result of their appointments, find themselves crowded in the matter of office space.

I urge the government to give consideration to this matter, particularly because of the way in which the problem will be aggravated when these new members come from the province of Newfoundland. I would ask the government to do the fair thing and to tell us, either from the floor of the house or informally, what ideas they have, and to indicate whether or not progress is being made toward implementing those ideas.

[Mr. Church.]

If the government wishes to have my suggestion, then I have already made it, namely, that space be found in the east block for the offices of a number of senators, including those we now have and the new ones who may be appointed within the next few months, and that members of the House of Commons be permitted to move into some of the offices thus vacated. As a matter of fact, in the light of the number of vacancies in the other place at this time, it seems to me only fair that this working section of parliament should be entitled to some of the vacant space on the other side of the building.

Mr. Graydon: The government will not need much space after this.

Mr. Fraser: The C.C.F. want to go into the red.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend's remarks are understandable. They are the observations one would expect to be made the morning after the night before.

Mr. Graydon: What a day!

Mr. Knowles: I move on to say a word about the other matter I mentioned at the opening of my remarks. It has been touched upon by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), although I must confess I was not able to hear his remarks well enough to get clearly the point he was making.

I too am concerned about the relationship between the measure now before us and chapter 80 of the statutes of 1947, an act to incorporate Quebec, North Shore and Labrador Railway Company. I understood the hon. member for Broadview to point out that there had been inserted in that act a saving clause as set out in section 7 to the effect that all the things parliament was permitting this company to do should be done only up to the border of Labrador, and that from that point on, permission would have to be secured from Newfoundland. The reference is not to the government of Newfoundland, to the provincial government of Newfoundland or to any government in the future. I raise the question as to what now happens when Newfoundland becomes a province of Canada. My point is of particular concern in view of the fact that section 20 of the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador Railway Act says that—

> The works and undertakings of the company are hereby declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

We all recall the arguments in the house at the time this bill was before us. Hon. members will have in mind our opposition, lest this act be made a means whereby private interests would have the opportunity to exploit a great natural resource in the north-eastern section of this continent, a resource part of which was in Canada and part in another country, namely, Newfoundland. I am wondering whether the action we are taking today, without some kind of assurance or saving clause, does not give to the company —provided they exercise the right within the five-year period set out in section 19 of the act to which I have referred—the right to go in and exploit for private gain the iron ore resources and other great natural wealth to be found there.

That wealth can mean great things for the people of Newfoundland, if properly developed in the interests of the people. It can mean great things for the people of Canada as a whole. I should hope that when we reach the committee stage on the bill and are dealing with the section concerning natural resources, the ministers piloting the various sections through the committee might be in a position to give us at least their opinions as to what the situation would be with respect to the act to which I have referred. As hon. members are aware, we are vitally concerned that the great natural resource be developed for the good of the people of Canada as a whole, including the people of Newfoundland, and not for the advantage of private interests.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. St. Laurent moves that I do now leave the chair and that the house resolve into committee of the whole on said bill.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I thought the Prime Minister intended to speak on the second reading.

Mr. St. Laurent: I had intended to say something about the points that have been raised, but I did not insist because I thought I could make those remarks as soon as the house got into committee. Then if what I said suggested further questions, those questions could be answered during the committee stage. While Mr. Speaker is in the chair I could say what I intended to say but I do not think that that would be of any particular advantage to hon. members.

Mr. Drew: I do not want in any way to seek a change in the ordinary rules of the house. The reason I did not speak on second reading was that I thought the Prime Minister had indicated that he was going to speak. There are certain observations that I should like to make on the second reading, and in view of that I should like to have your consent, Mr. Speaker, to proceed.

Mr. St. Laurent: That will be quite agreeable to us. After I had moved the second reading, if I spoke I would close the debate. I thought that if I were going to close the debate it would be just as convenient to have my intended remarks made in committee, where there would be an opportunity to ask further questions as might be suggested. I think it is the desire of all hon. members of the house that no one be deprived of his right to speak on the second reading. If the leader of the opposition wishes to do so I think we could consider the motion as not yet carried and allow him that opportunity.

Mr. Knowles: Is this a precedent that might be quoted on future occasions?

Mr. St. Laurent: If on a future occasion the circumstances are such as they are today, I hope it would be the temper of the house to make the same disposition as I suggest should be made today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the leader of the opposition unanimous consent to speak at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make certain remarks on second reading of this bill and explain my position in regard to the agreement which accompanies it.

First of all, I should like to refer to the remarks that I made yesterday when the motion was before the house, and express the hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will have something to say on those points before the house goes into committee. I believe that they raise important considerations which should be borne in mind by hon. members when dealing with this extremely important bill.

The bill itself is simple and brief. It merely has the effect of approving the terms of the draft agreement which was settled by the representatives of the Canadian government and by those who had been appointed to represent Newfoundland in those discussions. In effect, the considerations before hon. members on second reading of this bill are very similar to those which were before them yesterday when they were dealing with the motion.

The question before hon. members is really whether or not they wish to proceed with the arrangements which have been made to bring Newfoundland into confederation.

I think it should be pointed out and remembered during the discussions that in a case of this kind there is not the latitude to suggest amendments which can be exercised ordinarily when a bill is in committee. Usually, when a bill is in committee, any changes that are made by way of amendment or deletion affect the legislative authority of this house alone. Therefore if there are any changes in the minds of hon. members, there is no reason why those proposals should not be put forward, by way of argument, by way of amendment, or otherwise within the rules of the house.

But in this case it must be remembered that the government, acting on behalf of Canada, has signed a draft agreement which is now before us as an appendix to this bill. The same draft agreement has been signed by those who were called upon to represent Newfoundland, no matter what their status may have been. Therefore, the house must recognize that if the terms of union are to proceed they must of necessity proceed upon the basis of the draft agreement which has been presented if there is to be concurrence within the terms of that agreement.

The principle involved is to agree or not to agree to proceed with the terms of union along the lines of this draft agreement, but the support of this bill which brings such draft agreement into effect for the purpose of completing the confederation cannot be regarded as approval of every term of that draft agreement.

As I pointed out to the Prime Minister yesterday, there is real objection to the inclusion in an agreement of this kind of a provision which, on the one hand, permits a province to do a particular thing and to carry out a particular type of production and, at the same time, places a limitation upon the sale of that product in other parts of Canada. It matters not that the particular provision may have no practical effect now that the decision of the supreme court has been given in regard to the constitutional authority of the parliament of Canada to place restrictions on the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. The fact remains that imbedded in this agreement is a principle which, if it were accepted as one which could apply to other types of production within Canada, would produce very unsatisfactory results. It could, in fact, produce the very thing that confederation was intended to bring to an end; that is, any form of trade barrier between the provincial areas within Canada.

For that reason I think this particular provision might well be made the subject of discussion between the government of Canada and the representatives of Newfoundland, with the idea of deleting it so that a principle which may have very serious consequences in some other case might not be established as a precedent which would be contrary to the practice that has been so carefully followed ever since confederation. I strongly urge the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to take this suggestion into consideration, because it would seem to me that there is no reason why the dominion government on the one hand should wish to put forward any special provision for one province, and on the other hand impose a restriction in relation to that particular provision.

I should like to point out also that in relation to the financial arrangements there is a restriction which does not apply to any other province. As I pointed out yesterday, there is a specific undertaking that, even though new financial arrangements are made with other provinces, that is not to be taken as a ground for any claim by Newfoundland for similar consideration by way of adjustment of their position. Again, it seems to me, that is imposing a particular restriction on a single province, which is not consistent with the uniform type of arrangements which have applied to the other provinces of Canada.

As will be recalled, this provision is not something which can have only a theoretical importance. It is related to events which actually occurred in regard to the adjustment of financial arrangements with other provinces during the past two years. When the then minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, announced in this house in 1946 the terms the dominion government would put before the provinces as the alternative to the retention by the provinces of their major taxing powers, no provision was made for any changes to follow. But very shortly after those proposals, or I should say those arbitrary terms, had been stated in this house, negotiations took place between the dominion government and different provincial governments. As the result of arguments advanced by one provincial government, some changes were made; and those changes were passed on to the other provinces. Then certain very advantageous terms were placed before British Columbia. I am not suggesting that those terms were not quite properly demanded by that province, because British Columbia has found even the present terms inadequate. Nevertheless there was an immediate demand from the premier of New Brunswick and other premiers that they should receive equally favourable terms, and so the bidding and the consequent adjustment went on. It was a form of horse trading between governments, such as had been anticipated by Sir Wilfrid Laurier so many years ago when he condemned this very practice in such vigorous terms, saying that such arrangements usually were merely the payment of a note given in return for political treachery. I remind hon. members that those are the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, not mine; but this type of horse trading over the subsidies that should be paid in return for taxing powers has produced precisely the result anticipated so many years ago by Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

At this point may I interject that when I was premier of Ontario and was putting forward the position of my province, I did not refuse to deal with subsidies as part of the arrangement. I mention that because of certain remarks made during the debate on the address prior to its adjournment last Friday evening. I would remind hon. members that the proposals I put forward at that time are a matter of record, and that we in fact proposed a system of subsidies on a basis which would adjust itself to the requirements of the provinces, with a national adjustment fund, which was the key recommendation of the Rowell-Sirois report. We stated that we wished to enter into arrangements of that kind under a transitional agreement which would also provide for an examination of the whole combined taxing system of Canada by competent experts of all the governments and other experts who would be brought in to examine this extremely important subject.

We pointed out that there is only one group of taxpayers in Canada, who pay taxes to the dominion government, the provincial governments and the municipal councils. We pointed out that there is no magic by means of which money can be drawn from any obscure source. There is no question of generosity on the part of the dominion government involved in any of these proposals or, if one chooses to use the term preferred by the minister of reconstruction (Mr. Winters), no question of beneficence. There is nothing of that kind. The dominion government is merely the collecting body which draws from the people of Canada taxes for the purpose of undertaking certain responsibilities. If the dominion government requires more money for the purpose of making payments back to the provinces, the money comes from the very same people; it comes from the taxpayers of Canada as a whole.

What we recommended then, and what I still recommend, is that there be an examination of our whole taxing system so that the taxes required by the dominion government, the provincial governments and the municipalities may be adequate for the responsibilities they are called upon to assume. In this way we may be enabled to establish in Canada the most scientific tax system possible, adjusted to meet the modern conditions in which we live, so that the taxes called for by these three levels of government may be imposed upon the people of Canada in a way that will place a less onerous burden upon them and place the least possible restriction upon personal effort and upon production in every part of this country.

I think it is appropriate that I should recall my recommendation in that respect, because certain comments have obviously been made without knowledge of what we actually recommended. I also refer to that proposal because it has a very direct bearing on the terms that are included in this draft agreement between Canada and Newfoundland. The representatives of Newfoundland have accepted terms similar to those which were placed before the provinces of Canada in this house in 1946. This restriction has, of course, been placed upon Newfoundland that they cannot apply for an adjustment in consequence of a subsequent adjustment with any other province. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, there is a particular reason for that restriction being included.

This agreement also does something that I recommended, and recommended very strongly as premier of Ontario at these dominion-provincial conferences. I urged that, in addition to the taxing systems we proposed and the subsidy payment provided by a transitional agreement, there be also an immediate recognition of the recommendations in the Rowell-Sirois report that a national adjustment fund be set up. We urged that such a fund be set up on a basis very much higher, however, than that recommended in the Rowell-Sirois report. This would enable those provinces still needing additional financial support, over and above the ordinary subsidy payments during the transitional period, to obtain funds from this national adjustment fund. Perhaps I should interject that it is a matter of record that I also said I was prepared to agree to any form of distribution of that fund, which was acceptable to those provinces receiving contributions from it.

I mention that for this reason. In the draft agreement with Newfoundland the principle of grants in aid, recommended by the Rowell-Sirois commission, is recognized. Over and above the ordinary subsidy payments, there are substantial grants in aid which are related to the recognition of special financial requirements. I find it difficult to believe it was not in the mind of the dominion government that, when this new province shall receive these special grants, there may well be demands from those provinces that have accepted these unsatisfactory terms. In some cases the provinces are not satisfied and there may well be a demand from them that they receive similar consideration. It would look as though the dominion government had decided that this type of horse trading would have to stop some place. Therefore they decided, after further negotiations, that they would say to Newfoundland, at that point it stops; you cannot claim any more.

If that is the purpose, and I cannot see any other purpose in placing such a limitation in the agreement, then right at the outset we are accepting the inclusion in the agreement of something that the people of Newfoundland, within a comparatively short time, may consider unsatisfactory, having regard to the speed with which those adjustments took place after the terms of the dominion-provincial agreements were announced in the House of Commons in 1946. I therefore come back to my comments of yesterday on this subject. I suggest to the Prime Minister that consideration be given to the unsatisfactory results that might follow the inclusion of a limitation of that kind, and that, through negotiation with the representatives of Newfoundland, this particular restriction be deleted.

In so far as these arrangements are concerned, it is appropriate to point out that the representatives of Newfoundland have concurred in these terms. Whether the authority of those who represented Newfoundland was adequate is, as I said yesterday, something to be determined by the people of Newfoundland and the government of the United Kingdom. The mere fact of concurrence, however, does not constitute a reason for opposing the terms under which the union goes forward. I wish to make it clear that I see very serious objections to the provisions I have mentioned. I think it would be desirable that these grounds of possible objection be removed. It could be done by consultation; and, if it is done, at least two reasons for misunderstanding in the near future may have been withdrawn from the terms of union.

There is in this agreement a provision that the subsidy payments may continue, not for the shorter period in which they are payable to the other provinces but, on the option of the representatives of Newfoundland, for an extended period of eight years. This is not a ground for opposing the terms of union, although I do object in principle to such an arrangement. It has been agreed to by certain provinces. I think it is an unsatisfactory arrangement, but that is for them to decide. The whole problem, of course, can be solved when there is a resumption of the dominion-provincial conferences and the dominion government and provincial governments sit down, as they should, and discuss the whole relationship of the dominion and provincial governments in the tax field, with particular reference to the financial requirements of the municipalities in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The very terms of this agreement once more emphasize the need for the revival of that conference, which only stands adjourned by the dominion government and can be recalled at any time by them. This action has been requested over and over again, not only by myself, but by other premiers of the provinces of Canada. The terms of the agreement emphasize as well the need for a conference which will set up a continuing, integrated, functional relationship between the dominion government and the governments of the provinces, so that the very type of discussions which are suggested by some of the terms of this agreement could, from time to time, be dealt with by the representatives of those governments who are working together within this federal structure, and who can deal with practically any problem that may arise, without the necessity of any constitutional change, so long as they work together in a spirit of co-operation and good will.

I should like particularly to remind the people of Newfoundland that, in supporting this bill which embodies these terms, it will be my aim, as it will be the aim of those associated with me in this house, to bring about such a conference at which Newfoundland and the other provinces will be present, where the combined constitutional authority of all these governments can be brought together most effectively for the advantage of the people of Newfoundland, of every other province of Canada, and generally for the welfare of Canadians.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must remind the house that if the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I asked a few moments ago for the unanimous consent of the house to hear the remarks of the leader of the opposition, I did not realize what I was letting the house in for. But I am sure we have all found it most interesting to hear him extol and congratulate himself on the high statesmanship of his attitude in respect of dominion-provincial relations.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of privilege. I sat down because the Prime Minister indicated that he was going to speak. I received no concession from this house when I spoke; and I sat down on the understanding that the Prime Minister was going to speak.

Mr. St. Laurent: On the point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the leader of the opposition read the rules of this house. When he does so, he will learn that, if the mover of a motion speaks in the course of a debate, he closes the debate; and that no one can be heard in that debate after he has spoken. If the leader of the opposition felt that I was rising to speak, and did not object to my doing so at that time, his failure to object would have prevented him, in the absence of consent of the house, from himself being heard. That explanation having been made, and because I felt that possibly there might have been some misunderstanding of the effect of the rules of this house, I asked the house to waive the application of the rule, even to waive the motion that had been put for the second reading of the bill, and to revert to a previous stage so that the leader of the opposition might be heard, not after I had spoken but before. He could not be heard after I had spoken. I think that is exactly what the position is. If the hon. gentleman did not wish to have any courteous waiver of the rules by the house, I am sorry that the circumstances made it necessary for him to have it in order to make the remarks he has made at this stage of the discussion.

Mr. Drew: I was under the impression, from some of the earlier proceedings, that it was someone else who needed to read the rules of the house.

Mr. St. Laurent: It may be. The hon. gentleman is not the only new arrival in this house.

Mr. Rowe: The Prime Minister himself might read them.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not intend to be led into discussing at this time the whole matter of dominion-provincial relations. The motion before the house is for the second reading of this bill. Other opportunities will be presented when the matter of dominion-provincial relations can be taken up again. On this bill I wish to deal with the pertinent points made by the leader of the opposition. The first one is the undesirability of there being in the terms of union something which appears to many to be a new principle; that is to say, some impediment or barrier to interprovincial trade arising out of the terms of this clause which was inserted in the agreement with respect to oleomargarine. I think I am privileged to refer to the document, since it has been tabled, and I am referring to the document that was tabled and not to the schedule of the bill as such. In the document tabled, term 46 provides as follows:

(1) Oleomargarine or margarine may be manufactured or sold in the province of Newfoundland after the date of the union and the parliament of Canada shall not prohibit or restrict such manufacture or sale except at the request of the legislature of the province of Newfoundland, but nothing in this term shall affect the power of the parliament of Canada to require compliance with standards of quality applicable throughout Canada.

(2) Unless the parliament of Canada otherwise provides or unless the sale and manufacture in, and the interprovincial movement between, all provinces of Canada other than Newfoundland, of oleomargarine and margarine, is lawful under the laws of Canada, oleomargarine or margarine shall not be sent, shipped, brought, or carried from the province of Newfoundland into any other province of Canada.

Hon. gentlemen will notice with what care this provision was drafted. It provided that the parliament of Canada would not prohibit or restrict such manufacture and sale in Newfoundland except at the request of the legislature of the province of Newfoundland. By a majority judgment the supreme court has now decided that the parliament of Canada cannot prohibit or restrict the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in any of the provinces. I must confess that one of the reasons given in the majority judgment came to me rather as a surprise. I had assumed that this provision in the Dairy Industry Act was one which related to the subject of agriculture. As hon. members know, parliament and the legislatures of the provinces have concurrent jurisdiction in respect of matters dealing with agriculture. But the supreme court held that this was not a matter related to agriculture, but rather something which was local and private within the province. Consequently it held that the parliament of Canada had no jurisdiction in regard to it. The clause as drafted envisages that the parliament of Canada would not so "prohibit or restrict" except at the request of the legislature of Newfoundland. If the parliament of Canada has no jurisdiction, in that the matter does not come within the clause relating to agriculture in the British North America Act, it cannot do anything at all about it. My view was that if it had jurisdiction, it was because the subject matter related to agriculture, over which both parliament and the legislature would have jurisdiction. As far as I was concerned, I felt that it might be proper, in a matter in which both had jurisdiction, to agree, since oleomargarine had been available in Newfoundland for a long time, that the parliament of Canada would not exercise its jurisdiction unless the legislature of the province requested it to do so.

The term provided in addition that, if this was something over which parliament had jurisdiction, the oleomargarine manufactured and offered for sale in Newfoundland would not be exported into any other of the Canadian provinces, unless the parliament of Canada, having jurisdiction, made it legal for oleomargarine to be manufactured and sold in those provinces. That is the thing that is regarded as setting up a barrier to trade, involving a new principle.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it does not involve a new principle. There have been for many years in the dominion and in the provinces a barrier to the transportation, or to the forwarding from one province to another, of any form of intoxicants. The provinces have asserted their control over the sale and distribution of intoxicants within their respective areas; and under these provincial laws it is an offence, which is sometimes committed unwittingly by Canadians going from one province to another, to have in a province any intoxicant which has not been purchased from the liquor control board of that province. Very recently I was a bit embarrassed by a guest at my own apartment who had an empty bottle that had contained something which would be regarded by most persons as coming within the legal definition of intoxicants, and which had been purchased from the board of control of Quebec.

Under the legislation administered by the leader of the opposition, it has been for a good many years an offence to have in Ontario any intoxicant that has not been purchased from the board of control which operated under the government of which the hon. gentleman was the premier for several years. That was not only something done by the provinces. So that it might be fully effective throughout the whole dominion, in spite of the fact that the dominion has jurisdiction in interprovincial trade, there were introduced into the Canada Temperance Act by a statute of 1916, amended in 1919, the provisions which are now sections 168 and following of the Canada Temperance Act, which is itself chapter 196 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. That makes it an offence punishable under the terms of the legislation of the parliament of Canada to transport or have in one's possession any intoxicant—and the word is defined by the statute—contrary to the provisions of the laws of the province where the person happens to be. Therefore, in order to make effective this barrier to the trade in intoxicants produced or manufactured in one province and designed to be sold in other parts of Canada, the legislatures of the nine provinces of Canada and the federal parliament agreed in setting up this concurrent system which makes it an offence punishable under the laws of Canada to have anything which is not allowed under what the legislature has seen fit to provide as the regime in the province where it exercises its jurisdiction.

In a general way, since 1919, the Canadian public has regarded that portion of the legislation of the provinces and of the dominion as good legislation. Perhaps I should say that I have heard it is the intention of the government of one province to recommend to the legislature a prohibition against the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine within its limits. There was a report that the premier of Prince Edward Island, in the exercise of the jurisdiction which the majority of the supreme court have declared to be that of the provinces, had said that he was going to recommend to the legislature of his province that the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine be prohibited.

Mr. Drew: I believe he has already dealt with it by order in council.

Mr. St. Laurent: That may be so. I was not aware that it had come into effect, but I did read in the newspapers that it was the intention to do that.

This matter of where the jurisdiction lies in the sale of commodities that might compete with the produce of the dairy industry may not yet be finally settled. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture is still considering the advisability of applying to the privy council for leave to appeal, and has quite recently asked the Canadian government whether it would not itself assert an appeal. It has been informed that that was highly improper in view of the attitude taken by the government in recommending to this house that there be in future litigation no further appeals to the privy council. Whether or not there will be an appeal has not yet become certain.

When these terms of union were drafted and signed there had been no decision from the supreme court. If hon. members will reread them they will see that they were carefully prepared, to be applicable to any situation that might arise. If the jurisdiction had remained with the federal parliament, or if an appeal to the privy council results in that tribunal saying that it does rest in the parliament of Canada, then term 46 will make it certain that the people of Newfoundland will not be deprived of the right to continue to use a substitute for the butter they do not produce in their island, and which they have been using for so many years. If on the other hand it is decided by the courts that the parliament of Canada has no right to do anything about it, the fact that the government of Canada agreed with the delegation of Newfoundland that it would not do anything about it is not going to cause any harm to anybody.

It may be suggested that there is a difference between intoxicants and oleomargarine. There is. Intoxicants are obviously connected with peace, order and good government in a local way. Therefore it is obvious that those who are responsible for peace, order and good government in a local and private way within a province can be concerned about exercising proper control over the sale and distribution of intoxicants.

Are the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine something about which provincial governments or provincial legislatures are concerned? The majority of the supreme court have said that it is. They have said that it is something of local and private concern within the province. Well, if it is, the provincial legislatures have a right to do about it that which may appear to them to be in the public interest. They are the ones to judge, if they have the jurisdiction, what they should do about it.

The exercise of jurisdiction is never in any instance controlled by the opinion one may hold about the wisdom of the way in which the person having the jurisdiction has exercised it. The privy council has repeatedly said that it will not concern itself with the wisdom or otherwise of the exercise of jurisdiction, if there is jurisdiction. If there is jurisdiction, the constitution says where that jurisdiction lies; and it is those who have the jurisdiction who are supposed to have the wisdom to exercise it properly.

With respect to the second point, that there is in the terms of agreement with the province of Newfoundland something which is different from the terms to be found in the tax agreements with the other provinces, I believe the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has omitted to look at the last part of the clause in question. That clause provides that the government of the province of Newfoundland shall have the right to enter into a contract with the dominion government along the same lines as the contracts made with the other provinces; but that it shall also have the option of making that contract, not only for the period for which it is made with the other provinces, but for five years longer than the period made with the other provinces.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What paragraph is that?

Mr. St. Laurent: That is term 27 (2). Perhaps I should read it, so that my point may be not only asserted but proved on the record. It states:

> 27. (1) The government of Canada will forthwith after the date of union make an offer to the government of the province of Newfoundland to enter into a tax agreement for the rental to the government of Canada of the income, corporation income, and corporation tax fields, and the succession duties tax field.
> (2) The offer to be made under this term will be similar to the offers to enter into tax agreements made to other provinces, necessary changes being made to adapt the offer to circumstances arising out of the union, except that the offer will provide that the agreement may be entered into either for a number of fiscal years expiring at the end of the fiscal year in 1952, as in the case of other provinces, or for a number of fiscal years expiring at the end of the fiscal year in 1957, at the option of the government of the province of Newfoundland, but if the government of the province of Newfoundland accepts the latter option the agreement will provide that the subsequent entry into a tax agreement by the government of Canada with any other province will not entitle the government of the province of Newfoundland to any alteration in the terms of its agreement.

In other words we say to them: You may have your choice; first, you may place yourselves in the same position as the other provinces. But if for greater security you wish to have at once an agreement that will go on five years beyond the agreement with the present provinces, you have to make it as a firm agreement for the whole period. And if we make a new agreement in 1952 with the other provinces, that will not entitle you to have yours revised. In other words, you cannot have it both ways. You cannot have an agreement whereby, if we make a less favourable agreement from 1952 to 1957 with the other provinces, you will keep the former advantage, whilst, if we make a more favourable agreement with the other provinces, you will get the increased benefits. You must say at the outset whether you will stand on the same level as the other provinces and get in 1952 the same kind of agreement they get, or you can at once secure for yourselves the benefit for a further period of five years on the present basis. But if you do that, you take it for the period for which you are exercising your option.

I submit that is not a principle which would prove substantially to be objectionable.

I am fully in accord with the leader of the opposition when he states that the principle we are now debating on second reading is as to whether there should be made an agreement for the union of Newfoundland with Canada on terms which will appeal to the people of both sections as fair and reasonable. We suggest that these terms are fair and reasonable. But accepting the principle of the bill does not involve acceptance of the individual terms. It involves merely the desire of parliament to look at the document to see whether or not it amounts to fair and reasonable terms.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) raised the question of the embarrassment which might result to the people of Canada from having Newfoundland join with Canada in view of the fact that in 1941 there had been given a ninety-nine year lease for certain military bases in Newfoundland. Those leases were made on terms agreed to by the government of the United Kingdom and that of the United States at a time when the situation was a most unhappy one. The leases are in existence. The government of the United Kingdom, the government of Newfoundland and the government of Canada alone can do nothing to modify those terms. They create a condition for years in certain areas in Newfoundland; and they must be respected, unless it can be arranged with the government of the United States that they shall be varied.

There are in process at the present time negotiations looking to variation in the leases to bring them into accord with the joint declaration made by the President and the Prime Minister on February 12, 1947, about the principles which would govern the arrangements for military co-operation between the two countries. Those principles were agreed to by the two governments. They were announced simultaneously by the President and by the Prime Minister. I believe they have received pretty universal approval throughout the United States and Canada. It is our hope that in our negotiations with the government of the United States we shall have the actual exercise of the rights provided for by these leases brought into line with the principles which have been set out in this joint declaration. We hope that will be so because of the attitude of the two governments of Canada and the United States. Their practice has not been to deal with each other at arm's length, but rather to try to make arrangements which would afford the most satisfactory method and degree of co-operation between the peoples of the two countries.

We hope it will be possible to have the lessees, who by contract have their rights for ninety-nine years in these leases, agree that they should exercise their rights in the manner which the two governments of Canada and the United States agreed would be the proper way to ensure co-operation between them as set out in their joint declaration of February 12, 1947. The hon. member for Broadview may be assured that I hope to be able to discuss with the President of the United States some aspects of these leases on the occasion of the visit I am to have the honour of paying him on this very week end.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) feels that the entry of Newfoundland into confederation and the presence of six senators and seven members of parliament in addition to the present membership of our houses of parliament is going to place a serious burden upon the restricted office space available in this central block. I think everyone who occupies any portion of the central block will be in full agreement with him as to the facts.

His suggestion that space should be made in the east block for the hon. members of the other house would seem to indicate that he does not realize to what extent there is already congestion in the space available in the east block for the services located there. I was Secretary of State for External Affairs for well over a year before I could get space in the east block. During that period I had to use as my office the one that was available for me during the session in the centre block.

Mr. Cruickshank: Put them in the printing bureau.

Mr. St. Laurent: The suggestion is made that they might be put in the printing bureau, but those who have visited the printing bureau know that there is such congestion there that a large part of the work which should be done by the king's printer has to be let out by private contract. Hon. members are aware of the serious difficulties which arise in providing additional buildings for government services in this capital district. There are urgently required in the capital district more buildings for the housing of government services.

Up to the present time it has been felt that it would be unfair to take any building materials or manpower which could be used for the provision of houses and devote them to the construction of government buildings. But there has been some easing in the supply situation. Hon. members are aware that for the last week or so there has been quite a controversy here in Ottawa as to where the additional buildings are going to be located.

The matter was submitted to the federal district commission and to the planning commission. They were told that the three services that require new accommodation were the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Department of Trade and Commerce and the printing bureau. They looked over the field and found two sites in Ottawa and one in Hull. One site in Ottawa was opposite the supreme court building on Wellington street and it was decided that that should be used for a building for the Department of Veterans Affairs. They recommended that the other site in Ottawa west should be devoted to the building for the Department of Trade and Commerce and that the printing bureau, which requires a large site—I am told it will have a frontage of seven hundred feet and a depth of three hundred and fifty feet—should be located in the city of Hull.

Mr. Knowles: Let the senators go to Hull.

Mr. St. Laurent: The provision of additional accommodation for government services is necessary in order to relieve congestion throughout the whole service. If accommodation is made available for the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of Trade and Commerce it will relieve congestion in the space available for the houses of parliament. The project I hear discussed most frequently for the housing of hon. gentlemen of the other place is the east block. The west block is the one I hear discussed as being the proper location for additional offices for members of parliament. I feel it is urgent that more space be provided for hon. members. This is something which is receiving active consideration, not only out of concern for the comfort of others but out of concern for the comfort of each one of us who is affected by the congestion which now exists. Perhaps hon. members do not realize that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is still located in one of the temporary buildings where he has been since the beginning of the war.

There is a necessity that something should be done. It is recognized that the redistribution which we have provided for and the augmented number of hon. members occasioned by union with Newfoundland will increase the urgency for additional space.

I have attempted to deal with the matters which relate to the principle of this bill. My own view is that in accepting the principle of the bill the house does not go beyond asserting that it is desirable that there be union of Canada and Newfoundland on terms advantageous to the people of both sections. When the bill is in committee it will be the responsibility of hon. members to look at the terms set out in the schedule annexed to the bill and determine whether those terms will be of mutual advantage to the people of Canada and to the people of Newfoundland in their desire to be united with the people of Canada.

Motion agreed to, on division, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Agreement approved.

Mr. St. Laurent: As hon. members will see, there is only one section to this bill, which asserts that the terms set out in the agreement are approved. I think probably it would be more satisfactory to hon. members if the terms were first read so that hon. members would know what is implied in approving or refusing to approve these terms. I would suggest that we suspend consideration of section 1 of the bill and immediately give consideration to the terms of union.

Mr. Knowles: Clause by clause?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

The Chairman: Then clause 1 of the bill stands, and the preamble to the schedule will also stand until we have considered the sections of the schedule. Is it the wish of the committee that we consider the schedule under headings? For example, the first heading is "Union" and includes sections 1 and 2 of the schedule.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was just wondering whether it would not be better to take the preamble first, for the reason that certain questions arise in connection with the preamble which might be cleared away at this time.

The Chairman: Standing order 76 reads:

In proceeding in committee of the whole house upon bills, the preamble is first postponed, and then every clause considered by the committee in its proper order; the preamble and title to be last considered.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Lake Centre is that we consider the preamble of the schedule, not the preamble of the bill. I may be mistaken, but I have always taken it that standing order 76 referred to the preamble of a bill. Here the preamble of the schedule is part of a document which, coming to us in the form it does, has to be taken or rejected as it is, because it is an agreement made with another party which is submitted for approval. It can be approved or disapproved; parliament can say it will not approve this one but that it would be perhaps disposed to approve one that contained something else, but in that event the bill would be defeated and this agreement would not be approved. It seems to me there is some value in the suggestion of the hon. member for Lake Centre, because I think the facts alleged in the preamble help us to understand the terms of the agreement. Even if it were necessary to have unanimous consent to do so, I would suggest that such unanimous consent might be given and that we take up the preamble of the schedule before attempting to deal with the individual terms.

The Chairman: Then it is agreed that the preamble to the schedule be considered now.

Section stands.

On the preamble (to the schedule).

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the preamble generally deals with the discussions that took place with members of the national convention of Newfoundland, and also the submissions made and the arrangements entered into at the discussions which took place between the governments of the United Kingdom and Canada and the representatives of Newfoundland. Yesterday my leader made clear that we in this house had but one matter to determine, and that was the question of whether or not we favoured consummation of the dream of confederation by the inclusion of Newfoundland.

That, of course, is the legal and parliamentary position. But in addition to the legal position, as I see it there is also a moral responsibility resting upon this parliament to remove or alleviate any causes of discontent on the part of the very large minority who voted in the negative during the two referendums. The essence of democracy is a recognition of the need to preserve the rights of minorities. Dictatorship denies that minorities have rights and, as far as minorities are concerned, those rights are determined by the simple process of coercion.

On June 19 of last year I asked the right hon. Prime Minister a number of questions in regard to the proceedings that led up to the question of confederation between Newfoundland and Canada. At page 5545 of Hansard for last year the right hon. gentleman used these words:

> The British North America Act contemplated that there might be union between Canada and Newfoundland on a joint address of the houses of parliament of Canada and the legislature of Newfoundland. That principle could be resorted to; but it would require, in order to be resorted to, the restoration of self-government in Newfoundland, and then joint addresses under the terms of section 146 of the British North America Act. On those joint addresses, union could be consummated by order of His Majesty in council without legislation in the parliament at Westminster or legislation in the parliament of Canada. But if that method is not resorted to, the matter is not expressly provided for and would have to be accomplished by new legislation that could, I suppose, be adopted only by the parliament at Westminster if there were joint addresses from the houses of the Canadian parliament asking that it be done.

Then he goes on to set out in detail the usual processes. Once more I should like to point out that we in this parliament recognize with pride the fact that the hopes of the fathers of confederation are about to be consummated. The acquisition of Newfoundland will take its place, in strategic importance, with the acquisition by the United States of Alaska and Louisiana. It is actually the completion of that unity which caused Mr. Galt, as he then was, to say at the time of confederation:

> Half a continent is ours if we have but the courage to take up the burden.

In taking up that burden, in welcoming those who heretofore have belonged to a sister dominion, above everything else we want to be sure that these new citizens who join us will do so in a spirit of amity and unity, thereby making their contribution to the strength, power and destiny of this confederation. For that reason I bring up these questions, because as I read the British North America Act the procedure followed here was never contemplated. Section 146 contemplated only one procedure, much different from that now being adopted.

With a view to ameliorating the causes of division and bringing into this confederation the people of Newfoundland in that spirit of dedication to our common destiny, I ask certain questions by way of explanation. I believe that the answers to these questions, properly given by the Prime Minister of this country, will go far to remove the causes of the discontent which now exists in Newfoundland, which cannot be denied and cannot be answered by a refusal to face the facts.

I ask, first, in view of the fact that under the Newfoundland Act, 1933, and the commission report at that time, it was contemplated that responsible government would be restored, why is it that the plan of confederation as provided for under section 146 of the British North America Act has not, in fact, been followed in this case? Secondly, what has the Canadian government done to remove the reasons for the objections that have been made by that very large minority that showed its strength in the vote on the two references? Thirdly, have any representations been received in opposition to the course followed by the Canadian government from groups of individuals in Newfoundland claiming to represent the seventy odd thousand who voted for the restoration of responsible government? If such representations have been made, would the Prime Minister table them and also table the replies given in reference thereto? Fourthly, and I think it is very important, the leader of the opposition has made clear that our responsibility as Canadians is to vote on this legislation and in no way to infringe upon the sovereignty of another dominion.

Recognizing that, I should like to ask this question. In view of the fact that Newfoundlanders will now become Canadians, and the desire of each of us must be to remove any possibility of disunity by reason of the fact that the government has not followed the scheme set forth in the British North America Act to cover possible union in the future, has this government made any representations to the British government regarding the question whether or not it would be preferable that responsible government be restored in Newfoundland prior to the matter of confederation being discussed in this house?

I think an answer to those questions would go a long way towards arousing the people of Newfoundland to a realization that we in Canada, in welcoming them, want them to realize that in no action we take are we endeavouring to control their destiny without a recognition of their rights.

Mr. Church: In passing Bill No. 11 you are passing on to the people of Newfoundland all the criminal law, the civil law, the law of patents, the law of trade-marks and many other matters. I do not wish to take any further part in the debate on the control bill, Bill No. 12, to amend the statute law to implement the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Last night I read a statement by the attorney general of England, Sir Hartley Shawcross, in an address at Lincoln's Inn, in which he complained about the costs of law. He said that it was too complicated, the procedure too involved for the ordinary litigant to be able to afford court costs. It is this type of thing we are passing on to the people of Newfoundland under Bill 11. Nothing is being done to rectify these conditions in Canada. Reference has been made by Sir Hartley to the shocking state of statute law in England. The criminal code even in Canada has not been revised by the House of Commons since its inception in 1905.

In a radio address reported in the Daily Telegraph, Mr. Churchill spoke of the need for legal reform. In the same article it was reported that he said the same thing in a radio address on March 2 last. Mr. Churchill was complaining about the very same thing, the cost of litigation. There were 25,000 new rules, orders in council and so on, and no one can tell about their validity until the court of last resort has been reached. He said that only about five of these orders in council had been considered by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Last night, I asked about the difference between that kind of rule and the lucidity of the divine laws. I am reading something from the twelfth chapter of St. Luke in which lawyers were reproved. I wish to quote the following verses:

> 44. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are as graves which appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them.
> 45. Then answered one of the lawyers, and said unto him, Master, thus saying thou reproachest us also.
>
> 46. And he said, Woe unto you also, ye lawyers! for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers.
> 52. Woe unto you, lawyers! for ye have taken away the key of knowledge: ye entered not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye hindered.

So, you see, we have a divine rule relating to lawyers who are needed in the law courts.

In 1491 B.C. the ten commandments were laid down by Moses from Mount Sinai, yet their lucidity is amazing. Everybody understands them. Now, there is a conflict between divine law and constitutional law. Any minister or member of the government knows that he must follow constitutional practice. A government which does otherwise is proceeding unconstitutionally, as a great lawyer in England, P. St. George Kirke, said. It is difficult for us, men of all occupations, to decide what should be done about the criminal law, civil law and matters of the kind.

Last night I referred to a town in England, called Stevenage, which had been planned by the Labour government. They tore down the old buildings and started something else. An appeal was taken to the law courts. A judge of the lower courts expressed the opinion that nothing like it had been done since the time of Ahab, who was a king of Samaria, when he took Naboth's vineyard. But Ahab gave Naboth compensation for it. Of all the judges in England, there was only one county court judge who questioned these rules and regulations of statute law. He said that this statute law conflicted with the eighth, ninth and tenth commandments which are as follows:

> Thou shalt not steal.
> Thou shalt not bear false witness—
> Thou shalt not covet—

The county court judge referred to that, and he did something which was very fine indeed. This shows the need for law reform in this country as well.

Another matter came up which I should like to mention, and with that I shall conclude. This matter came up in connection with the nationalization of a very important industry in Great Britain. A billion dollars of paper money was issued. It is turned out by printing presses and adds nothing to the national wealth of the country. After depreciating a person's investment, the government compels him to take that particular type of money. What chance have the people in the law courts when the judges over there do not act?

The other matter about which I wanted to speak was with regard to patents and inventions. The law regarding patents and inventions mentions a seal. The law is set out in the 15th chapter of Genesis, verses 5 to 18. God made a covenant with Abraham. That was the authorship of that seal. What did the inventors get? They have been interfered with; something has been written into the law which should not have been put in. The patentees have been interfered with. The patentee was to get all the rights and privileges under the patent. Every patent had been granted by the king and the crown to the patentee. It is issued by the crown under the royal seal which goes with this patent or trade-mark, the patentee to have and enjoy the whole profit and advantage from time to time accruing by reason of the said invention during the time of sixteen years. What is being done? Inventors are being driven out of Great Britain, and here in Canada they are being driven to the United States by the same factors, by the control system, income tax and surtax up to a large sum of money. The surtax is 2½ per cent. The result is that inventors are leaving this country and are going to a free country, namely the United States. The inventors are also leaving Britain with the same object in view. I commend the changes made in this law. In conclusion, I can only say that these instances I have given are violations of the eighth, ninth and tenth commandments: thou shalt not steal; thou shalt not bear false witness; thou shalt not covet. That is what the government is doing with regard to patents and trade-marks under the law as it is. The lawyers know something about that.

I do not wish to criticize the high court judges. Far from it. I can tell hon. members, however, that we have no real law reform in this country. For many years past I have been trying to get some. It is a forgotten subject here. We should have a committee to go over these legal bills and see that we get some reform. With the complexity of the law, with the maelstrom of red tape and the cobwebs in it, I can tell hon. members that it is a relic of other days. In England, as a result of the summary offenders act, half the prisons have been closed. How? The people are given time to pay. Yet we have no law reform in Canada of the criminal law which we are to pass on to Newfoundland according to this bill. In Toronto we built the Toronto jail, the jail farm on Yonge street for men and the jail farm for women three miles from there at Concord. The government here, through one of the departments, have taken those two new jail farms. I do not know why that was done. I can tell hon. members that 400 people have been crowded into the Toronto jail. It was built after 1867 for use only for remands, and is fit for no more than 200 persons. We have been trying to get something done, and we did get something done by establishing these two jail farms. If that is the kind of law reform that is to be passed on to Newfoundland, it is another matter. Having explained these matters, and pointed out the urgent need for law reform in this country, I suggest that we should have a legal committee to go over every one of these laws every year in order to see that we get some real law reform.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words along the same lines as those spoken by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), although I am not taking the same position. Indeed, I am taking the opposite one. I am speaking not in criticism of what he said but because two members from this group spoke along the same lines in the debate yesterday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I merely asked questions.

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, I quite understand. It seems to me that we are going a little bit too far when we say that the fathers of confederation could lay down the procedure by which the dominion of Newfoundland, some eighty years later, could come into confederation. It is true that a procedure was laid down in the British North America Act, but when that procedure was laid down it could not be foreseen that the dominion of Newfoundland would not have a responsible government in 1949 when its entry into confederation was being considered. That is one of the points I wish to make. There is so much unanimity in this house on the desirability of Newfoundland joining with Canada that I think it would be a mistake to indulge in criticism that can lead nowhere; because, in my opinion, there is nothing this parliament can or could do in the matters complained of. I am not attempting to defend the government in what it has done. It does not need my defence, because it has plenty of supporters on its own side quite able to defend its actions. I do not believe it was up to this government to suggest to the government of the United Kingdom that it should restore responsible government to Newfoundland to enable it to negotiate with the government of Canada. I am not well versed in how these things are done, but I do not believe that it would be proper for the Dominion of Canada to make proposals of that kind to the United Kingdom government. There were two referendum votes taken on this question by the people of Newfoundland. According to the system of voting followed, both votes were opposed to the reconstitution of responsible government. The first vote was on three questions: the commission form of government, responsible government and confederation. Responsible government received the largest vote. But it was stipulated that it would require to have an over-all majority. The first vote then stood at 85,000 to 69,000 against responsible government. In the next vote the situation was somewhat similar. Confederation carried by quite a reasonable majority. If an hon. member came to this house with as clear a majority as confederation received I believe he would think that he was quite justified in speaking for the electors of his constituency. There is only one logical conclusion to the criticism of how the negotiations were carried out, and I do not think any hon. member would want to accept that conclusion because, in the first place, it would delay confederation and in my opinion the results would be the same as they are now. That conclusion is to have another referendum taken by the people of Newfoundland with the exact terms of confederation before them. They should be asked whether they want confederation or not. That is the logical conclusion to the criticism made by the hon. member for Lake Centre and the two hon. members from my own party. I do not think anyone would suggest that seriously as a solution, if a solution is required, or if we want to insist that a greater degree of democracy should be used in the circumstances. I believe that the procedure followed, namely a referendum vote of the people of Newfoundland, was a democratic one. There may be a difference of opinion in Newfoundland between those who wanted responsible government and those who wanted confederation, but I do not believe that the best way to smooth out those differences of opinion, and put an end to any bad feeling that may still exist, is to keep harping on it in this house. Let us get ahead with the terms of confederation as quickly as possible, and when we bring Newfoundland into confederation with the rest of Canada I hope that neither they nor we will ever regret it.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration will undoubtedly assume considerable importance in the annals of this country. I therefore feel it only proper that, upon the entry of the new province into confederation, a small part at least of the debate in the house be carried out in French, so that our future fellow citizens may remember that Canada has two official languages.

The few comments I wish to make in connection with the preamble of this bill are as follows:

Following the statements made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), I must first agree with the view he has expressed, and maintain that, in so far as the entry of Newfoundland into confederation is concerned, we should have been governed by the stipulations not of an ordinary statute, but of that basic, fundamental law which governed the birth of Canada, the British North America Act. As we all know, section 146 of the act provides for the entry of Newfoundland into confederation. It is probably expedient to recall it.

> It shall be lawful for the queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable privy council, on addresses from the houses of parliament of Canada, and from the houses of the respective legislatures of the colonies or provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia, to admit those colonies or provinces, or any of them, into the union, etc.

I must point out, Mr. Speaker, that this has already been done. Indeed, when British Columbia joined confederation in 1871, the process followed was that provided in the British North America Act. The preamble of the order of Her Majesty in council, dated May 16, 1871, states unequivocally:

> And whereas by addresses from the houses of the parliament of Canada, and from the legislative council of British Columbia respectively, of which addresses copies are contained in the schedule of this order annexed, Her Majesty was prayed, by and with the advice of her most honourable privy council, under the one hundred and forty-sixth section of the hereinbefore recited act, to admit British Columbia into the dominion of Canada, on the terms and conditions set forth in the said addresses.

And later when Prince Edward Island joined confederation, the British North America Act was once more complied with. The procedure followed was that which is outlined in section 146. The preamble to the order in council dated June 26, 1873, reads as follows:

> And whereas by addresses from the houses of the parliament of Canada, and from the legislative council and house of assembly of Prince Edward $sland respectively, of which addresses copies are contained in the schedule to this order annexed, Her Majesty was prayed, by and with the advice of her most honourable privy council, under the one hundred and forty-sixth section of the hereinbefore recited act, to admit Prince Edward Island into the dominion of Canada, on the terms and conditions set forth in the said addresses.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the new bill before the house is a further departure from the provisions of the British North America Act and I take the liberty of drawing the attention of hon. members to that fact. When one is aware of the present government's ideas on centralization, this breach assumes a great deal of importance. Not only do the government deliberately overrule a section of the British North America Act, but they disregard explicit undertakings agreed upon since 1934 with the people of Newfoundland. In November 1933 Newfoundland's legislative assembly requested the suspension of its letters patent, and the said act was ratified by the British parliament. The act passed by the assembly of Newfoundland included the following proviso:

> Be it agreed that as soon as the island's difficulties have been resolved and the country is again self-supporting, responsible government shall be restored at the people's request.

When the British parliament ratified the act, it was decided as follows:

> Whereas we are in receipt of an address from the legislative council and the house of the said island asking that we be graciously pleased to suspend the said letters patent and to issue new ones providing for the administration of the said island until it again becomes self-supporting, on the basis of the recommendations contained in the report of the royal commission which was appointed by us on the 17th day of February, 1933 . . ."

A little later, in 1941 or thereabouts, Newfoundland's economic situation having improved considerably, the island people approached the British parliament with a view to restoring responsible government. At that time, on December 2, 1943, Mr. Emrys-Evans, then Secretary of State for Commonwealth Affairs, expressed himself as follows:

> The arrangements made in 1933 included a pledge by His Majesty's government that as soon as the island's difficulties had been overcome and the country was again self-supporting, responsible government on request from the people of Newfoundland would be restored. Our whole policy is governed by this undertaking.

In 1945, in violation of this agreement—since it actually was an agreement between the Newfoundland legislature and the British parliament—the commonwealth relations office, through the government commission, decided to call a national convention.

Members of this convention were elected during the summer of 1946 and on February 8, 1947, the convention decided to send a delegation to Ottawa to examine the conditions under which Newfoundland might possibly enter confederation.

After the lengthy discussions with which we are familiar, proposals were submitted by Canada and there occurred at this stage a rather important development: the proposals made by Canada to the Newfoundland national convention that had been called in the summer of 1946 were implicitly rejected, since it was decided to submit to the people two questions only:

First, were the electors in favour of responsible government and second did they favour a commission of government.

This means that the national convention, having been apprized of the proposals made by Canada, had decided to ask the people of Newfoundland, by means of a referendum, if they wished to return to their pre-1933 type of administration or whether they were content to keep the system which had been in force since that date.

What happened then?

The British government, without consulting anybody in Newfoundland, without the approval of anyone there, or, at any rate without the approval of any legally constituted body, decided to put three questions to the people of Newfoundland, in spite of what had been formerly decided upon by the national convention. This is how the first referendum came about.

Now, evidently, the only legally organized body which at the time could speak on behalf of the people of Newfoundland was this national convention, and that is why, contrary to the wishes and decisions of that convention, the British government resolved to put three questions to the people of Newfoundland in the referendum of June 1948.

I submit that this decision by the British government was irregular, even illegal and unjustified. In my opinion, it would be interesting to know what interests were then at stake, what lobbying took place about which no report has reached us. Why did British interests decide to put the third question to the people of Newfoundland so that they could answer whether or not they favoured the entry of the island into confederation?

It would surely be interesting to know what must have taken place at the time, about which we have not been told anything.

And so on June 3, 1948, when the first referendum took place, there were 22,311 votes cast for the commission government, 64,066 for confederation with Canada and 69,400 for responsible government. Here I ask myself this question: On what grounds, under what statute, legislation or authority was the result of the first referendum disregarded and a second one held?

If the result of the first referendum, in which responsible government received a majority, had been complied with, conditions would have become again as they were before 1933. The government of Canada could then have dealt with the established responsible government according to the rules set forth in the British North America Act.

Why was the result of that vote disregarded? On what grounds? Under what authority? We do not know. All we know is that the second referendum took place on July 22, 1948. At that time 78,323 votes were cast for confederation with Canada and 71,334 for responsible government, a majority for confederation with Canada of 7,000 votes.

But it must be noted that only 78,323 votes favoured the entry of Newfoundland into confederation and the electoral list comprised 176,297 electors. Therefore if the first result had not been satisfactory because there had not been an absolute majority, the same principle could have applied to the second referendum, and the latter might conceivably nave been rejected, in view of the fact that the results were far from expressing the will of an absolute majority of the electors. It must also be noted how the appeal was made to the electors in favour of the entry of Newfoundland into confederation.

I have here an article written by Mr. Camille l'Heureux in Le Droit of November 10, 1948. I wish to quote the following paragraph:

All kinds of abuses crept into the pre-referendum campaign. Aided and abetted by members of the commission government, the advocates of confederation openly led an intensive campaign of scandal, trickery and sectarianism. The propaganda in favour of responsible government was not only delayed in post offices but in many cases it was destroyed. The responsible government league goes so far as to accuse the leaders of those who advocate confederation, of pitting Orangemen again Roman Catholics on the island. In this connection, the league quotes the rallying cry given its members by the Grand Master.

However, it happened that Canada accepted that second vote which was taken on July 22, 1948, and after such irregularities, after that infringement of the British North America Act, we are now told that things must be done quickly, that the debate must necessarily be shortened, so that Newfoundland's entry may be decided as soon as possible.

That is not satisfactory, especially since the scanty details we have been able to obtain do not permit us to size up the extent of the burden which the entry of Newfoundland into the confederation will mean for the Canadian ratepayers. I submit that we have not been given all the information which would enable us to analyse the importance of the action we are going to take, because if we are to rely on what the press has brought to our knowledge on various occasions, it would appear that Newfoundland's entry into confederation is going to be exceedingly costly for us.

Here, Mr. Chairman, there is a third point I wish to make. As the cost of Newfoundland's entry into confederation will no doubt come out of the present revenues of the Canadian government, it is clear that the government will draw from the income tax as well as from all other existing revenues, a considerable part of which belongs to the provinces, and that is why we were and still are right in claiming that the provinces should have been consulted. The province of Quebec especially should have been consulted, because of the marking of boundaries between Labrador and that province, which is a matter included in this bill. No doubt that is why the premier of Quebec used these words which I quote from a statement he made on November 8, 1947:

That is a problem of the highest importance, concerning as it does all provinces in Canada, and especially the province of Quebec. It seems to me altogether discourteous for the federal authorities to take such important action without even consulting provincial authorities, particularly those of the province of Quebec, deeply interested in this matter.

(Text):

Mr. McIvor: I enjoyed very much the intelligent presentation which was given to us yesterday to show why we should have this union, but more important than trade, more important than national defence is something else which has not yet been presented to this committee. I refer to the religious union that exists already between Canada and Newfoundland. I can give you a concrete example. The advisory board of the Salvation Army, of which I am a member, has jurisdiction over Canada, Newfoundland and Bermuda. Perhaps this is one of the indirect reasons why we are to have union at this time. I say that when the Christian church leads, all others can intelligently follow.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member for Lake Centre asked certain questions. I have not all the material here but in order that the record may not appear incomplete I shall attempt to give a provisional answer. First, I should like to say that I appreciate the attitude which has been taken by hon. members in respect of this proposal. Personally I share the views expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver East, that it is not apt to be helpful, in eradicating the irritation that naturally comes from losing out in any contest by popular vote, to be constantly referring to that fact.

Rules were set for this matter. It so happens that there was a substantial minority that did not have its way and that would now like to see the thing started over again. There are some people who would like to see a more recent test determined by a vote started over again, but that is not the way democracies work.

In this case there was originally an undertaking by the government of the United Kingdom—I am not attempting to make a defence of the government of the United Kingdom, I am simply stating the facts which I think afford justification—to restore responsible government to Newfoundland on demand or on request—I do not remember exactly what the terms were—when the situation had improved.

In December, 1945, the government of the United Kingdom decided—there was no other government in Newfoundland at that time than the commission of government composed of a governor appointed by the United Kingdom, three residents of the United Kingdom, and three residents of Newfoundland—that they were not the ones to make the request for the restoration of responsible government and determined that there would be a national convention, elected by the people of Newfoundland, to consider the form of their future government.

That convention was elected. After it had investigated the financial situation and so forth its findings were made public. Then the government of Newfoundland said: We will ask the people themselves whether they want responsible government, a continuation of the commission of government, or confederation with Canada. In view of the fact that three questions were to be submitted, they said, if there is not an absolute majority in favour of any one there will have to be a second referendum. There was a vote but there was no absolute majority in favour of any of the three questions, and a second referendum was held.

On that second occasion the people of Newfoundland, instead of saying that they wanted responsible government restored, decided against it. In the first referendum some of them had wanted responsible government restored, but they were not a majority of those who voted. In the second referendum the majority said: No, we do not want responsible government restored; we want union with Canada.

Twenty-five members of the convention voted against the submission of the proposal of the convention and I am rather surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay that there was no justification for putting the question to the people of Newfoundland. The national convention was merely a convention to inquire into the situation and to make recommendations; it was not even a legislative body.

In the absence of any legislative body other than the commission of government, which was not representative, and a referendum having been submitted to the people, it seems to me that the result of that referendum was a democratic expression of what the people of Newfoundland wanted.

I shall deal with the other questions at eight o'clock. I appreciate that the hon. member for Lake Centre is as desirous as any of us here to have union accomplished under such terms as will leave the least possible resentment in the minds of the new Canadians who are joining our nation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was the purpose of the questions.

Mr. St. Laurent: I shall endeavour to give as full answers as possible, because I think the hon. member feels that the more light we can throw on the fact the greater help will be given to dispelling resentment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was the purpose of the questions.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. St. Laurent: That was as I understood them.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. St. Laurent: When the committee rose at the dinner hour I was proceeding to deal with the questions suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and I believe I said I appreciated that he was putting these questions for the purpose of having the facts upon the record in the hope that it might dissolve some of the resentment felt by those who believe some other procedure to achieve confederation should have been followed.

If I understood the hon. member correctly his first question was why, in view of the terms of the Newfoundland act of 1933—which provided that on request of the people of Newfoundland, when their financial situation had been restored, they would get back responsible government—the procedure to bring about union had not been that contemplated in section 146 of the British North America Act. That section, as hon. members will recall, provided that her majesty, on the advice of her most honourable privy council, might on the joint addresses of the houses of the Canadian parliament and the houses of the legislature of Newfoundland or Prince Edward Island, admit those colonies into union.

I think I have dealt with the first part. We did not consider it would be proper for us to express any views in respect to the manner in which the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Newfoundland should carry out the provisions that had been made in 1933. We constantly maintained the position that we felt the Canadian people would be glad to welcome the entry of Newfoundland into confederation, but that we should not do anything to influence her decision or course of action in the matter. To be quite frank, I may say we felt that this would probably be the most helpful attitude for us to maintain in order to bring about a desire to join Canada. We felt that the people of Newfoundland, naturally proud of their history and the control over their own affairs which they had up to 1933, would resent any action by the Canadian government or the Canadian people which might be construed as expressing an opinion as to what they should do.

The hon. member for Lake Centre will remember that we had some exchanges in that regard at the end of the session of 1948. He referred to the Hansard report of Saturday, June 19, 1948. I will not take time to read the exchanges that took place then, but in answering questions put by the hon. member for Lake Centre I said our position was that we felt we should not attempt to interfere with the discharge of the responsibilities of the government of the United Kingdom or the government of Newfoundland, and that we would scrupulously endeavour to avoid doing anything which might be construed as an attempt on our part to dictate to our good friends of the island.

The situation which presented itself to us was that the government of the United Kingdom had requested the election of a national convention; that this national convention had passed a resolution requesting the governor of Newfoundland to inquire whether the Canadian government would be prepared to receive a delegation and to explore with that delegation whether or not there were satisfactory terms which could govern the union of Newfoundland with Canada. The reply given was that we would welcome that delegation. The delegation came. We worked with them for over three months, and afterward submitted what we then considered would appear to be fair terms upon which the union could be consummated.

We did nothing beyond that at that time. The matter came before the national convention; and after discussing the terms a majority of the national convention voted against including in the referendum a question as to whether or not the people would wish to unite with Canada. I can give this house the assurance that we expressed no views as to whether that question should or should not be included in the ballot. The government of the United Kingdom decided that, in view of the number who had voted for its inclusion in the ballot, and in view of what we were told, that there were petitions signed by great numbers in Newfoundland asking that it should be included, they would submit the question.

During the whole of that period we were maintaining an attitude of the strictest neutrality, because personally I think many of us felt that by doing so we would favour the prospects of union to a greater degree than if we attempted to say or do anything which could be construed on the island as showing a desire to influence their decision in the matter.

The question was submitted, with the result that has been referred to already in the course of the debate. After the first referendum a statement was made by my predecessor, the Prime Minister at that time, that if on the second ballot the people of Newfoundland indicated in a clear and unmistakable way that they wished to join Canada on substantially the terms of the proposal that had been submitted, the Canadian government would co-operate with their representatives in giving final form to those terms. If I remember correctly the hon. gentleman, or some hon. gentleman on the other side, asked what would be considered a clear and unmistakable decision of the people of Newfoundland. Speaking for myself—because we had not discussed the matter in council—I said I thought it would be the usual democratic process; that if there was a majority, that majority would be apt to be considered as the expression of the views that should prevail, but that after all it was not our responsibility to count the ballots or decide the sufficiency or insufficiency of the vote. If the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Newfoundland, after counting the ballots, stated to us on their responsibility that there had been a majority for union with Canada, I said I thought it would be very difficult for us to refuse to recognize the validity of that statement; and they did state to us that there had been a clear majority expressing a desire to unite with Canada, and that the governor was appointing a delegation to come and discuss the final terms of union.

That delegation came. The situation was discussed, I think, in a manner that did credit to both the Canadian and the Newfoundland delegations. I believe the view that prevailed was that it was not a time to try to get this or that particular advantage but that it was in the interests of all, if there was to be union, to have such terms determined as could be accepted by the majority of the reasonably-minded people in Canada and Newfoundland as being fair and apt to promote the welfare of the enlarged Canadian nation.

On the day those terms were to be signed there arrived from St. John's a telegram addressed to me, which in compliance with the request made by the hon. member for Lake Centre I shall table. It is signed by Mr. Fred W. Marshall, chairman of the responsible government league. Perhaps I should read the telegram so that its contents may be available to all hon. members in the house. It was in the form of a night letter, dispatched from St. John's, Newfoundland, on December 10, and which reached us here on the morning of December 11. It is addressed to the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, K.C., Prime Minister of Canada; report delivery Ottawa, Ontario.

Following memorial passed unanimously at mass meeting of citizens held tonight " this vast gathering of citizens of Newfoundland meeting at St. John's in the dominion of Newfoundland the 10th day of December, 1948, places on record its strong objection and protests most emphatically against the manner in which Newfoundland is being forced into confederation with Canada.

It affirms that the only manner in which terms of confederation can be negotiated with Canada is by a duly representative legislature of Newfoundland.

It consequently objects to the appointment of any delegation of citizens to negotiate terms with Canada.

It most strongly protests against the recognition of the present delegation of citizens appointed by the governor in which the people of Newfoundland had neither choice nor voice.

It demands that instructions be given immediately by the governor or the commission of government to the said delegation to refrain from signing any terms on the ground that it has no power to do so and that, moreover, such an act of signing would prejudice the constitutional position of Newfoundland in England.

It moves that a copy of this memorial be sent immediately to the governor, the members of the commission of government and the members of the said delegation and the Prime Minister of Canada.

Fred W. Marshall, Chairman, Responsible Government League.

This document arrived on the morning of December 11, but notwithstanding its arrival the terms of union were signed at that ceremony to which I need not refer. The proceedings were broadcast at the time to the whole Canadian public.

The telegram was answered on the 14th of December in the following form:

Fred W. Marshall, Esq.,
Chairman,
Responsible Government League,
St. John's, Newfoundland.

Dear Sir,

The Prime Minister has directed me to acknowledge the receipt of the telegram which you sent to him on December 10th on behalf of the Responsible Government League, and to let you know that its contents had been duly noted.

Yours sincerely,

R. G. Robertson,
Secretary.

I will table these documents. I should add that the only other document of which I know, and I have had a fairly careful search made as well as endeavouring to keep as fully informed as possible about the proceedings, is the receipt on October 8, 1948, of a communication from W. L. Collins, Secretary of the Responsible Government League. It reads as follows:

Sir,

Herewith enclosed you will find a copy of the resolution passed unanimously at a giant rally held in St. John's, Newfoundland, on Friday, October 8.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

W. L. Collins.

Forwarded with this letter was a carbon copy of something which reads as follows:

Whereas a delegation, privately selected by the chairman of the commission of government, is at present at Ottawa under instructions to prepare the entry of this country into the Canadian Federation;

And whereas since the said delegation was neither chosen nor elected by the people of Newfoundland, it cannot, in justice, claim the right to represent our people or to negotiate on their behalf any final terms of confederation;

And whereas it has been officially stated by the commission of government that the people of Newfoundland will not be permitted to express, by way of plebiscite, their approval or otherwise of the final terms on which Canada proposes to absorb this country;

Be it therefore resolved that this mass meeting of Newfoundlanders do most strongly condemn the unjust and improper methods which are, and have been, used to deprive us of our inalienable democratic rights and of our existence as an independent people;

And be it further resolved that, on behalf of approximately half the electorate of Newfoundland who share our beliefs, we do most strongly deny to the members of the said delegation any right whatever to act on our behalf, or in our name to give their consent to any terms which would finally commit Newfoundland to confederation without the prior approval of our people being first obtained to such terms, by way of plebiscite;

And be it still further resolved that copies of this resolution be sent to the British, the Canadian and the Newfoundland governments, to the members of the Ottawa delegation and to the press.

One other document which I have not before me at this moment was addressed, not to the Canadian government, but to the meeting of prime ministers in London. I will certainly have it found. During the dinner hour efforts were made to have it located, but since it was after six o'clock those efforts were not successful. It was not a document addressed to the government of Canada; it was addressed to those attending the meeting of prime ministers in London.

The answer to that communication was sent immediately after my return to Ottawa on November 9, 1948. It reads as follows:

W. L. Collins, Esq.,
Secretary,
Responsible Government League.

Dear Sir:

On his return from London, Mr. St. Laurent asked me to acknowledge receipt of your letter addressed to him there under date of the 16th of October, enclosing a memorandum to the commonwealth prime ministers then assembled in conference in London, and to inform you that the matter of the union of Newfoundland with Canada was not dealt with in the conference.

Yours very truly,

Guy Sylvestre,
Private Secretary.

With respect to these representations of the organization which calls itself the responsible government league in Newfoundland, I can only repeat what I said in the house at the end of the last session, at page 5546 of Hansard:

The department would, of course, receive courteously and file anything that would come from any group in Newfoundland, but the department would not act on anything that does not come from those who have the constitutional responsibility for the government of Newfoundland at the present time.

This referendum had been held and the majority of those voting expressed the opinion they did not want the restoration of responsible government but did want union with Canada substantially on the terms of the proposal. It was our feeling that had we, at that time, done anything to rebuff or repulse the advances being made by the people of Newfoundland we would have seriously offended a large number of them, and possibly offended them to the point where the matter of union with Canada would have been shelved again. We felt we must be extremely careful to do nothing which would offend the susceptibilities of those who we hoped, as the fathers of confederation had hoped more than eighty years ago, would ultimately become our fellow citizens in this Canadian nation.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has asked what the Canadian government has done to remove the objections. For the reasons I have stated, the Canadian government did nothing to remove those objections, leaving it to the people of Newfoundland to make their decision and deal with those who favoured and those who did not favour union with Canada.

The third question was, Have any representations in opposition been received by the Canadian government. I have answered that question, and as soon as the staff find it for me I will table the further document which was addressed to the prime ministers in conference at the London meeting.

The fourth question was, Has this government made any representations to the United Kingdom government as to the desirability of restoring responsible government. To that question I must answer that we did not. We felt that it was not our province to do so and that, in so far as the Canadian government was concerned, it should leave entirely to the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Newfoundland the taking of such steps on their side as they might see fit. We felt that the Canadian government would have its responsibilities to the Canadian parliament in the attitude it was taking for Canada in these issues, and that it should not assume any further or greater responsibility than that.

I hope that this statement of fact will satisfy most people that we endeavoured to maintain a correct attitude in the course of these negotiations. As I have seen in newspaper articles the statement that this suggestion of union was the result of a deep-laid conspiracy which had arisen out of the meeting of the Quebec conference in 1943, there is one assertion I wish to make. I do not think I need to do more than mention the date. Hon. members know what it was that brought together in Quebec, in 1943, Mr. Winston Churchill and Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt, and I do not need to deny that statement. But for the record I deny that any question whatsoever of the entry of Newfoundland into confederation or of the union of Newfoundland with Canada was discussed at the Quebec conference of 1943. At that time the leaders of those democratic nations were endeavouring to devise ways and means by which to bring to an end the horrible war which was threatening the very existence of us all. That was the matter that was discussed at the Quebec conference of 1943.

Moreover, I emphatically deny that there was at any time any attempt by the Canadian government, otherwise than by maintaining a correct attitude and by maintaining the attitude that the whole of the people have maintained, to induce our Newfoundland friends to become associated with us. We felt then, as I still feel today, that the most effective way we could act to bring about, as early as possible, a consummation of this dream of 1867, was to behave as honourable, free men in a prosperous community, acting in a correct manner in the administration of their affairs. We felt that was the thing that would be most apt to make an impression upon the people of Newfoundland. That attitude was adopted and maintained with the most scrupulous exactitude. On the other hand, we felt that to do anything that might be construed as a rebuff to or a repulse of any advances that were being made would be offensive to that population; and we refrained from doing anything of that kind. I hope the people of Newfoundland and the people of Canada will find in the end that this union, on the terms that have been proposed, will work out to the mutual advantage of all those who will be citizens of greater Canada, and that it will prove to be a step forward in the progress of that people, which already occupies an important position in the family of nations.

Mr. Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with the observations I intend to offer to the house on this subject I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. I should like to know whether the Statute of Westminster applies to Newfoundland.

Mr. St. Laurent: I should not like to be too positive about that. We are told by the Newfoundland delegation that it did not apply to Newfoundland inasmuch as it provided that it would come into force in any one of the dominions upon adoption by the parliament of that dominion, and the parliament or the then legislature of Newfoundland had not adopted it. But the terms of union provide that, if union is consummated, it will thereafter apply to the province of Newfoundland in the same way as it applies to the other provinces of Canada.

Newfoundland

(Translation):

Mr. Raymond (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Chairman, the question of a union between Canada and Newfoundland—the latter coming into confederation as a tenth province—gives rise to a certain number of problems which may be classified under the following headings: constitutional, financial and economic, political, both from the national and international points of view, and all that follows therefrom.

We are therefore about to commit ourselves to a most important undertaking, one that carries with it most serious consequences for the future of this country. For the time being, I will restrict my remarks to the constitutional problems.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave, as his authority for the procedure adopted, section 146 of the British North America Act. He does not believe it necessary to obtain the approval of the provinces, being of the opinion that, in cases like this, the members of this house represent the particular provinces from which they come.

Had the act of 1867 not provided for the annexation of Newfoundland, I would maintain that this procedure is altogether unconstitutional since I do not share the opinion expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to the effect that our constitution is merely a law that may be amended or changed according to the fancy of a majority of this house, without the consent of the provinces, the contracting parties to the act.

On the contrary, it is not an act in the ordinary sense of the word; it is, in the words of an eminent member of the Montreal bar and a former bâtonnier, "the outcome of an understanding, of an agreement, of a contract. It is a pact agreed to between the provinces; more than that, it is an agreement between two totally different races and creeds."

The statutes passed by the imperial parliament only served to enact this contract into a law; they ratified it. Proof thereof is found in sections 91, 92, 93 and 133 which are a recognition of the agreement, of the contract entered into, without which recognition Quebec never would have agreed to it. I will never allow that, after having secured our agreement to a contract, the power given by a parliamentary majority be used to amend this contract. That would be a denial of justice.

This truth was recognized by the judicial committee of the Privy Council, in the matter of The regulation and control of Aeronautics in Canada (1932 A.C.). Here is what Lord Sankey had to say:

(Text):

Inasmuch as the act embodies a compromise under which the original provinces agreed to federate, it is important to keep in mind that the preservation of the rights of minorities was a condition on which such minorities entered into the confederation, and the foundation upon which the whole structure was subsequently erected. The process of interpretation, as the years go on, ought not to be allowed to dim or to whittle down the provisions of the original contract upon which the federation was founded, nor is it legitimate that any judicial construction of the provisions of sections 91 and 92 should impose a new and different contract upon the federating bodies.

(Translation):

It will be noted that Lord Sankey insists on the word "contract." Now, I agree that section 146 of the British North America Act, to which the four contracting provinces had agreed, grants the power to proceed with the union of Newfoundland, but it does not follow that in the exercise of that power, the constitution could be transgressed in other respects. According to section 146, a very definite method must be followed and a majority of this house has no right to change it without the consent of the provinces which were parties to the act of 1867. Section 146 of the constitution reads as follows:

(Text):

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable privy council, on addresses from the houses of the parliament of Canada, and from the houses of the respective legislatures of the colonies or provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia, to admit those colonies or provinces, or any of them, into the union . . .

(Translation):

To invoke that section of the constitution, all the conditions mentioned would have to be fulfilled, to wit: addresses from the parliaments of Canada and Newfoundland. This implies the existence of a legislature in Newfoundland, but such a legislature does not exist. The island is governed by a commission appointed by London in 1934. There can therefore be no address from the Newfoundland legislature before it has been restored. One of the main factors to carry out union is missing.

The procedure followed is counter to the constitution. We have not negotiated with the non-existing Newfoundland legislature; we have dealt with the creatures of the imperial commission which had only administrative powers until a responsible government was restored.

The contract agreed to on December 11 last was not between two parties authorized to make such a contract; one of the parties was unauthorized. The adoption of this measure would be not only a breach of the constitution but it would make us share in the breaking of a solemn pledge of Great Britain to Newfoundland, and in a most arbitrary action taken by the London government commission.

Reference is made to the referendum of July 22 last which gave a bare majority in favour of union. Concerning this referendum, I shall merely quote the views of Monsignor J. M. O'Neill, Bishop of Harbour Grace, and add a few personal remarks:

(Text):

I do not mean to insinuate that the confederate leaders are communists. Perhaps they are not. But I do say that they used communistic tactics to obtain the small majority they secured in the second referendum. By pitting the poor against the rich, the outports against St. John's, the protestants against the catholics, they succeeded in accomplishing the communistic aim of divide and conquer. Divide they did, perhaps for all time.

(Translation):

That gives us an inkling of the means used to secure a majority. In addition to that, reference was made to the trying conditions of 1933, when the people who were on relief were getting six cents a day. Then there was the lure of family allowances, and old age pensions, considerably higher in Canada than in Newfoundland. I believe that in Newfoundland the old age pension does not exceed $72 per person and $120 per couple, while here it is at least $360 per person. The members of the imperial commission participated in the campaign in favour of the union. No stone was left unturned to reverse the wish already expressed by the Newfoundland people in favour of responsible government.

I have said that in approving this agreement we would be sharing in the violation of a pact between Newfoundland and Great Britain. As a matter of fact, when, as a result of financial difficulties and after an inquiry by a royal commission, the Newfoundland legislature sent to London a request for the temporary suspension of the constitution, the statutes show that it was agreed as follows:

(Text):

The existing form of government would be suspended until such time as the island may become self-supporting again.

It would be understood that, as soon as the island's difficulties are overcome and the country is again self-supporting, responsible government, on request from the people of Newfoundland, would be restored.

(Translation):

These clauses were incorporated in "The Newfoundland Act 1933".

Later on, in 1943, Mr. Emrys-Evans, Under-Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, commenting on this act in the British House of Commons, expressed himself as follows:

(Text):

I am quoting from page 599 of the House of Commons debates of England:

The arrangements made in 1933 included a pledge by His Majesty's government that as soon as the island's difficulties had been overcome and the country was again self-supporting, responsible government, on request from the people of Newfoundland, would be restored.

Our whole policy is governed by this undertaking.

(Translation):

In 1946 the government commission decreed that a national convention, consisting of 45 members elected by the people, be appointed to inquire into the state of the country and recommend various methods of government to a nation-wide people's referendum rather than rehabilitation of the promised responsible government.

I quote the following excerpts from the said act:

(Text):

Acts of the honourable commission of government of Newfoundland of 1946.

The National Convention Act states:

Whereas it has been decided that provision should be made for enabling the people of Newfoundland to examine the future of the island and express their considered views as to the suitable forms of government for the island, having regard to the financial and economic conditions prevailing therein, and that this provision could most appropriately be the holding of an elected national convention of Newfoundlanders;

And whereas it has been decided that the said convention should have the duty and function hereinafter in this act set forth;

And whereas it is necessary to provide for the constitution of the said convention and the election of representatives thereto and the regulation of their proceedings;

It shall be the duty and function of the convention to consider and discuss among themselves as elected representatives of the people of Newfoundland the changes that have taken place in the financial and economic situation of the island since 1934, and, bearing in mind the extent to which the high revenues of recent years have been due to wartime conditions, to examine the position of the country and to make recommendations to His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom as to possible forms of future government to be put before the people at a national referendum.

(Translation):

Having acquainted itself with the terms of union submitted by Ottawa, the national convention, appointed in 1946, suggested to the British parliament two forms of government between which the people would be asked to choose: firstly, maintenance of the present status and, secondly, restoration of responsible government. It also defeated, by 29 votes to 16, a motion recommending a third form of government, namely, union with Canada.

Notwithstanding the decision of the people's elected assembly, the British government ruled to include union with Canada on the ballot forms, even though this had been turned down by a majority of almost 2 to 1. In the referendum of June 3, 1948, the majority voted for responsible government. This was the second time, so to speak, that the people and their representatives expressed themselves in favour of or against union between Newfoundland and Canada. The government commission, however, never admitting defeat, arranged for a second referendum which gave a slight edge to those favouring confederation after the struggle I have already summarized. The governor then appointed a delegation to negotiate union with Canada. This delegation had no legal status to enter into such an agreement; such a step was autocratic and totalitarian.

May I remind the house that in a letter dated October 29, 1947, the then prime minister expressed himself as follows:

If the people of Newfoundland stated clearly, in a manner excluding the possibility of any doubt, their desire that Newfoundland become a province of Canada, on the basis of the proposed arrangements, the Canadian government, subject to the approval of parliament, would be prepared, insofar as it was concerned, to take whatever constitutional steps were required to achieve this union at the earliest possible moment.

The reply given by the national convention, by a vote of 29 to 16, on January 27, 1948, was a plain answer, more so surely than the slight majority afforded by the second referendum. Moreover, no doubts could remain after the first referendum, which favoured responsible government and excluded entry into confederation. Yet we have a very slight majority, secured by means which brought condemnation by Bishop J. M. O'Neill, dispelling any doubt in the mind of the government.

The conclusion to be drawn therefrom can be found in a letter published by Bishop J. M. O'Neill:

(Text):

It became obvious to many Newfoundlanders that the government of Canada, in collusion with the government of the United Kingdom, had long ago determined to annex Newfoundland regardless of the outcome of the referendum.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, we cannot be a party to a contract that violates an explicit agreement, concluded between Great Britain and Newfoundland, to re-establish responsible government. In doing so we would be party to an injustice, to an unlawful act.

On section 3—Application of the British North America Acts.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I was not satisfied with the Prime Minister's explanation regarding the application of the British North America Act. While strictly speaking this is a problem for the British government, I suggest the Prime Minister should give some indication as to how that government is going to overcome the British North America Act which, as I said last night, states very definitely in section 146—

It shall be lawful for the queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honourable privy council, on addresses from the houses of the parliament of Canada, and from the houses of the respective legislatures of the colonies or provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island—and so on. Would the Prime Minister indicate what is going to be done to make it legal for this union to take place, in view of the terms of the British North America Act?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can add to what I have said. We have acted here in full conformity with what was prescribed by the terms of the British North America Act with respect to the Canadian situation. The responsible authorities for the government of Newfoundland are, and have been since 1933, the government of the United Kingdom and the commission of government.

The hon. member wants to know how they are going to act to overcome that. They are going to act in accord with the expressed wishes of the majority of people of Newfoundland who, in referendum, stated they wished to have union with Canada and did not wish to have restored now their responsible government. How will that become effective? It will become effective by virtue of a confirmatory statute of the parliament of the United Kingdom, which is the parliament that passed the British North America Act and which, according to the terms of the agreement, is called upon to give legal effect to the terms of the agreement before they become effective.

The hon. gentleman asks why the other procedure was not resorted to. The other procedure was not resorted to, first, because it could not be resorted to without restoring responsible government, and the majority of the people had said that they did not want that done; and, secondly, because of the constitutional developments which have taken place since confederation and which are reflected in the terms of the Statute of Westminster. No longer does His Majesty exercise the royal prerogative in respect of Canadian affairs on the advice of his most honourable privy council in London; he exercises that prerogative in respect of Canadian affairs on the advice of his Canadian ministers. It would have been a retrograde step to ask that that prerogative be exercised for this purpose by His Majesty on the advice of ministers responsible to the electors of the United Kingdom and not on the advice of ministers responsible to the elected representatives of the Canadian people.

It must not be forgotten that the British North America Act was passed in 1867, almost eighty-two years ago, and that conditions in this country, its people, its parliament and its government are not the same today as they were then. I was surprised at the attitude expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay. Most of us from my province derive perhaps some sentimental satisfaction from the developments that have taken place and that have brought about the situation whereby the prerogative of His Majesty is now exercised on the advice of ministers responsible to his Canadian subjects, but the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay seems to be one of those who have lagged behind, and he is not willing to keep pace with the developments that time has brought about.

The situation is that a statute will have to be passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom before these terms of union become effective. If that statute is passed it will have the same effect as had the statute of the parliament of the United Kingdom which confirmed the agreement made, in a manner not strictly in accord with the British North America Act, for the return to the province of Saskatchewan, to the province of Alberta and to the province of Manitoba of their natural resources. The procedure being followed here is the procedure that was followed there.

It was found that the British North America Act did not provide the proper machinery for the return of those resources to the western provinces. In order to get them back to the western provinces, as my hon. friend's constituents wanted, and as the rest of the people of Canada felt was fair, an agreement was made that they would be returned. It was provided that that agreement would not come into operation until it was ratified by the parliament of Canada, by the legislature of the province, as far as that province was concerned, and then confirmed by an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom. That was necessary because it was a procedure not strictly in accord with the terms of the British North America Act.

This is the same thing. This procedure is not strictly in accord with the terms of the British North America Act. It is to do something which the British North America Act contemplated, but it is being done under conditions which have changed over the eighty-two years. The requirements of the British North America Act, in so far as they can be complied with, are being complied with, but in order to give it the effect of law —no one can dispute that something is being added—there must be a confirming statute of the parliament of the United Kingdom, the same parliament that originally passed the British North America Act.

Mr. Nicholson: I am sure the Prime Minister is making a sound legal argument, but I should like to draw the attention of the committee again to the fact that this is a very controversial question in Newfoundland. As I mentioned last night, I spent a week there in December. I have been in a great many countries throughout my short lifetime and that was the first time I have ever been in an embarrassing position as a Canadian. I was embarrassed on a great many occasions.

I want to make it clear that the people I met, who were so bitter about the question, were not necessarily opposed to becoming part of Canada, but they felt that an injustice was being done. They felt that it would have been better in the long run to have taken the additional step of granting responsible government to Newfoundland and then having the elected representatives of the people carry out the terms of the British North America Act and negotiate with the elected representatives of the Canadian people.

I have here a copy of the St. John's Daily News which contains reference to a letter to the London Times by Sir Alan Herbert, who is sponsoring the Newfoundland bill in the British house. Sir Herbert says in his letter:

> Canada may think it wise and proper to take in a new province of which at least half of the population is bitterly opposed to the arrangement. That is her affair. But the United Kingdom's good faith and honour are ours. Further if the Statute of Westminster means anything we have absolutely no right to dispose of this dominion's independence, population and possessions by a British act of parliament as our government proposed to do. Our only right and duty is to say, here is your liberty again. Do what you will with it. Many people seem to think this affair is settled. I hope they will think again. I have the Newfoundland (Liberation) bill ready and shall introduce it as soon as I have power. I hope some lover of liberty and right dealing who is successful in the private members' ballot will take it over.

Then the St. John's Daily News of January 13 contains a summary of the bill and the report goes on to say:

> Sir Alan said he isn't opposed to confederation of Newfoundland with Canada but he supports the convention of the Newfoundland responsible government league that the island's government should be restored by the United Kingdom and allowed to conduct its own negotiations with Canada. He said if responsible government were restored there could be a Newfoundland general election in May when the candidates favouring self-government and confederation could face each other. If the confederation party was elected the terms recently signed with Canada by certain "unelected Newfoundlanders" would be a useful basis for discussion. "Confederation (if there is all that hurry) could still be accomplished before the snows fell again." If the self-government party was elected then "Newfoundland is quite able to take care of herself and looks like being able to do so for a long time to come."

I might remind the committee of the opinion expressed by Mr. Lodge, who was a member of the commission of government which was established in Newfoundland by the British government in 1934. When he returned to Great Britain in 1939, he said:

> After five years of commission government, Newfoundland is economically poorer than she was before its advent. Notwithstanding all the optimistic utterances of the secretary of state the commission has failed to make any definite progress towards rehabilitation.

Then in chapter 1 he said:

> At the end of 1933 two governments of His Majesty, theoretically equal in status, agreed together that one should surrender to the other not merely independent dominion status but the whole of the political freedom of its people.

And later on:

> It was the negation of political liberty and the repudiation of all those principles of democracy on which British statesmen affirm—and believe, at any rate when they are making after-dinner speeches—that the empire has been built up and will always rest.

Again it mentions:

> It is quite possible that, had the problem been posed at a point of time either a year earlier or a year later, the decision might have been quite other . . .
> On the other hand, before the end of 1934, Great Britain had elaborated the comforting doctrine that, however reprehensible debt repudiation may be when practised by other countries, default ceases to be really default when the defaulter is the British government.

It seems to me that the fact of having been in financial difficulties in those early thirties should not have been a situation which imposed a penalty which deprived the people of this important part of the world of their democratic rights for such a long period. Now, regardless of the terms of the British North America Act, notwithstanding that 78,000 voted in favour of union with Canada, we cannot overlook the fact that 71,000 registered their opinion that before we could proceed with the terms of union the commitment given by the British government should be fulfilled and the people should have a chance to go to the polls and elect their own government.

I cannot press this further, because I know that legally the Prime Minister is quite within his rights in saying this is not primarily a Canadian problem. But I should like to tell the members of this committee that during my lifetime we are going to have a great deal of bitterness because of the method that has been followed; not because the people of Newfoundland cannot be happy as a part of Canada, but because the government of Canada has approved the treatment that has been given to Newfoundland in depriving those people of responsible government for this long period and is completing negotiations without having given them a fair chance to have their own elected representatives carry on their negotiations for them.

Mr. Claxton: I do not want to reply at length to the hon. member for Mackenzie, because the points he raised have been covered already. But the hon. member speaks about thwarting the will of the people. I ask him whether in these circumstances it would be better for Canada, for the union and for the people of Newfoundland to thwart the will of the majority, as expressed in a plebiscite, or to thwart the will of a minority as expressed in the same way.

Mr. Nicholson: I pointed out last night that, at the first democratic opportunity the people of Newfoundland were given, a proposal was made that the question of confederation be placed on the plebiscite, and that was rejected by 29 to 16. Then the democratically elected representatives of Newfoundland decided unanimously that at that stage they would not confuse the issue by pressing the question of confederation with Canada; they would ask the people the two straightforward questions: are you in favour of continuing commission of government, or are you in favour of responsible government? In spite of that unanimous decision by the Newfoundland convention the British government disregarded this expression of opinion and the people were obliged to express themselves on the three questions. I know that in the first referendum there was not a clear majority. In the second referendum there was a small majority; but the charge is made that a large amount of money from outside Newfoundland was used to influence opinion.

Mr. Case: That is just a suspicion.

Mr. Nicholson: It is a charge that has been made.

Mr. MacNicol: By whom?

Mr. Nicholson: By those in the minority, who I think should be given a chance to prove their claim. Certainly there is a great deal of bitterness in Newfoundland because of the feeling that funds from outside that country were used in order to obtain a majority decision in favour of confederation. Whether we like it or not, Canadians are going to be held responsible for the bitterness that now exists and will continue to exist.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Representation in parliament.

Mr. Fleming: A number of hon. members have expressed concern about the right of the Newfoundlanders to representation in a democratically elected body prior to union. I am just as concerned about their representation after union comes about, presumably on March 31 next. Article 4 of the terms of union provides that the province of Newfoundland shall be entitled to be represented in the Senate by six members and in the House of Commons by seven members. Then article 6 (2) provides:

> For the first election of members to serve in the House of Commons, if held otherwise than as part of a general election, the governor general in council may cause writs to be issued and may fix the day upon which the polls shall be held, and, subject to the foregoing, the laws of Canada relating to by-elections shall apply to an election held pursuant to any writ issued under this term.

I take it that once union becomes a fact there will be no delay in the appointment of the six senators. Patents can be issued, and they can take their places in the Senate very quickly. But I am concerned about the time within which Newfoundland will obtain representation in the House of Commons, through the election to this chamber of seven representatives. In the terms of union there is no time limit within which this election is to take place. I mention that fact because there is an interesting comparison in article 16, where you find a time limit imposed by the terms of union upon the election of a legislature for the province. That article reads:

> The legislature of the province of Newfoundland shall be called together not later than four months after the date of union.

There is no similar time limit with respect to the election of the seven members of the House of Commons. Once union becomes a fact, presumably this parliament will proceed at once to enact legislation which will be as binding upon Newfoundland as upon any other part of Canada. In particular, taxation will be imposed upon Newfoundland just as upon any other part of Canada; and as this parliament proceeds to impose such taxation while there are no members from the province of Newfoundland holding seats in this house, we shall be in the position that parliament will levy taxation without representation, something I hope every one of us will view with the greatest apprehension.

I do not know whether we may expect a general election this spring. That possibility is at least contemplated in article 6(2). But unless we are to have some assurance that there will be a general election this spring I think the house is not only entitled to but should require an assurance from the government that, immediately union becomes effective, writs will be issued for the holding of elections in these seven constituencies in the province of Newfoundland, so that province may have representation in this house just as quickly as the law will permit.

Mr. Jaenicke: The question I should like to raise is somewhat different. Not long ago we amended the British North America Act, and the representation in parliament was fixed at 255. This amendment was brought about by an address to His Majesty. As I read this section, the number of members of parliament is now to be increased by seven. Therefore this will be contrary to the provisions of the British North America Act. Is it the intention of the government to present another address to His Majesty to increase the representation, or will the British legislation provide for that increase? The same thing also would apply to the number of senators.

Mr. St. Laurent: The British North America Act provides that, in the event of Newfoundland becoming a province of Canada, it would be entitled to six senators. In 1867 the act provided for four senators, but by virtue of an amendment which was made, I think in 1915, it was provided that the number would be six instead of four. This provision has existed in the British North America Act for over thirty years.

With respect to representation in the House of Commons, if and when the terms of union are ratified here and approved by the parliament of the United Kingdom, provision will automatically be made for seven members additional to the representation in the house. In the omnibus bill which was read for the first time yesterday, hon. members will find provision is made for the required amendments in the Representation Act to refer to Newfoundland and to refer in the schedule to the electoral divisions of Newfoundland.

In answer to the question of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), I may say that this parliament has decided what provisions will apply to elections required to provide representation for all parts of Canada. As soon as the existence of a vacancy is brought to his notice, the Speaker is required to notify the chief electoral officer. It is a statutory provision of the Dominion Elections Act that writs for the filling of that vacancy must be issued within six months.

Mr. Jaenicke: I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the procedure he outlined would not be a departure from the established precedent concerning the manner in which the British North America Act is amended? In my opinion it can only be done by an address to His Majesty, and the parliament of the United Kingdom would have to pass a special act in order to amend the British North America Act, or to change the representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. St. Laurent: I submit not, Mr. Chairman—any more than it was necessary to amend the British North America Act for the purpose of giving legal effect to the return of the natural resources to the western provinces. It was not done in the form provided by the British North America Act, but it was confirmed by the parliament that passed the British North America Act and made effective notwithstanding anything to the contrary. In the Votes and Proceedings tomorrow the hon. member will probably find the form of address which it is proposed to ask the houses of parliament to adopt. I think he will find the matter is properly taken care of in that form of address.

Mr. Fleming: I appreciate the point the Prime Minister has raised in his answer, but I am also not unmindful of the fact we wait very long sometimes for the holding of by-elections. I recall very well that two years ago, owing to inclement weather, we were told, the by-election in the riding of Halifax was delayed for seven or eight months. In view of the circumstances under which these vacancies will exist, presumably on the first day of April, would it not be very simple for the Prime Minister to assure the house that steps will be taken immediately to see that the writs are issued and everything possible is done to expedite the filling of the vacancies in the Newfoundland seats in this house.

Mr. St. Laurent: The only assurance I can give the hon. member is that we will attempt to discharge our responsibilities in that regard in such a manner as will satisfy both the house and the Canadian public.

Mr. Case: I should like to make this observation. It has been some time since the dominion of Newfoundland has had an election. Clause 4 provides for the election of seven members. I think it can be reasonably assumed that the people, given that opportunity of expressing themselves, may or may not elect all of one party on certain conditions or matters of policy.

I notice provision is made for the appointment of six members to the Senate. I do not know what practice was followed by the fathers of confederation when the upper chamber was created. Appointments were made from Ontario, from Quebec and from the other provinces which entered into the union. I may now be trying to pry into an internal secret, but it would be interesting if the government would disclose how generous they might be in seeing to it that, not only the government, but His Majesty's loyal opposition would be represented in the Senate. I can understand how these appointments are made at a later stage; but when a province is coming in and there are these appointments to be made, it would seem reasonable to think that some recognition should be given to the minority who have never had an opportunity of electing any part of the federal government of the Dominion of Canada. If I am not presuming too much, and the Prime Minister would care to make an observation, I am sure I would appreciate it very much.

Mr. St. Laurent: All I can say is that we are endeavouring to obtain the best possible information concerning what would be apt to make the people of Newfoundland feel they had chosen wisely in joining confederation. So far, the only specific recommendation we have had is that, because of the general mentality of the people of Newfoundland, it would be wise if it were possible to have two of the six senators chosen from the Anglican denomination which represents about a third of the population.

Mr. MacNicol: From what group?

Mr. St. Laurent: Two chosen from members of the Anglican denomination; two chosen from the Roman Catholic denomination and two chosen from the United church or other denominations which make up the remainder of the population.

I inquired how soon after the entry of Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, Manitoba and the setting-up of Alberta and Saskatchewan appointments had been made to the Senate. To my surprise I was informed it was about five months. I am not sure whether there was one earlier than that, but I believe the earliest were made around the five-month period, and in some cases it was much longer than five months. I was surprised to find that so long a time had been found necessary to deal with these vacancies. This point was discussed with those from whom we were seeking to be enlightened about the situation in Newfoundland. We were told it would be unwise to proceed otherwise than by threes, if we could not make six appointments. If we made the six appointments, it would be all right provided they were distributed according to religious denominations, as I have described. But if we did not do that we should make at least three appointments at a time, because it would be unsatisfactory if any one of these three groups was preferred to the other two. We were told we should be careful to avoid offending the susceptibilities of these three separate religious groups in the island.

Mr. Stephenson: I should like to ask the Prime Minister one question. He has mentioned that two members of various religious denominations might be appointed, but is it not possible for them to be all of the Liberal faith?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am told it has been so long since elections were held in Newfoundland that most of the people are unable to indicate what their political faith is. On the other hand, I have received representations which were along the lines of the statement made by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) about the people of Canada generally, that they are Liberals and it behooves us to go out and see that they vote that way.

Mr. Knowles: All public men over seventy will turn out to be Liberals.

Mr. Graydon: Perhaps the Prime Minister might want to ask the minister of reconstruction if he would care to revise those figures he gave the house the other day. I would ask him this question. Does the government anticipate arranging the election so that there will be representation from Newfoundland in this particular session, provided that this session goes its normal length?

Mr. Knowles: Fishing again.

Mr. St. Laurent: I hope it will not be possible to have representation during this session, because that would mean that the session would have to go on until late in the summer. The matter cannot be dealt with until after March 31, and it then requires two months at the very least in order to arrange an election. That would account for April and May. I would hope that by the time April and May were over we would be nearing the close of this session.

As to the other question, that matter has also been under consideration and discussion. We were told that it would be unfortunate if gentlemen were elected to this parliament and then a general dissolution came about as a result of which they were not able to take their seats but were forced to go back for re-election, or in other words to be elected twice before they really became members of parliament. We would have to wait and see how events developed in order to determine whether or not the holding of a by-election or by-elections would provide those who were elected with an opportunity of being introduced to the Speaker and taking their seats in the house.

Mr. Knowles: Purely for the information of the people of Newfoundland and of course not because we here are interested, the Prime Minister might solve this whole problem by telling us the date of the election.

Mr. St. Laurent: If the Prime Minister knew the date of the election, he would be glad to confide it to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Fulton: There is one consideration which I feel should be borne in mind and given careful thought in making appointments from Newfoundland to the other house. A number of hon. members have observed—with some degree of deprecation, I take it—that there is in Newfoundland a substantial body of opinion which is opposed, we will say, not to the idea but to the method of confederation. I feel that that fact should be carefully borne in mind when appointments are being made to the Senate. That body of opinion, which we understand is substantial, is entitled to representation in the six appointments to be made to the other chamber. I think we can all take it as a fact that the purpose of the other house is, among other things, to provide representation for all groups of opinion, particularly minority groups, in the Canadian parliament. I would strongly urge that this matter be taken into consideration. Perhaps the Prime Minister would be willing to give us some assurance that that fact would be borne in mind when making those appointments.

Mr. St. Laurent: The only assurance I would care to give the hon. member is that we shall endeavour to take into consideration, in making those appointments, all factors that will tend to bring about a state of satisfaction among the people of Newfoundland.

Mr. Drew: That is not one of the things that are to be referred to the royal commission to find out what will enrich the life of the country, is it?

Mr. St. Laurent: I think there are many things which would enrich the life of the country merely by being omitted from discussion in this house.

Mr. Graydon: That is not all on the one side, either.

Mr. MacInnis: Some of this debate on appointments to the Senate has been in a jocular vein and perhaps some of it has been serious. But if it has done nothing else, it has pointed out the farcical way in which appointments to our Senate are made. Perhaps the debate also offers a good opportunity for this house to consider whether we should not change the way in which such appointments are made? I have been reading editorials in the press from one end of Canada to the other, and what is said about the other place is not particularly complimentary. I was reading recently one of the few books on politics written by a Canadian—"Democratic Government and Politics", by Professor J. A. Correy—and what he says about the Canadian Senate is not particularly complimentary either. After many years as a member of parliament, I find myself in general agreement with him. If we are to have a second house, it should be such a house as to warrant the respect of the Canadian people, and be of some use in the government of Canada. Otherwise we should abolish it.

Mr. Rowe: It is of plenty of use to the government; but that is all the use it is.

Mr. MacNicol: Is a question about appointments to the Senate in order?

The Chairman: I do not think that discussion generally on appointments to the Senate is in order. When the house is in committee of the whole, discussion must be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration.

Mr. Hazen: I should like to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kamloops. The Prime Minister has just told us, perhaps jocularly, that the people of Newfoundland do not know just what their political opinions are now, because they have not had an election for so long a time. I would point out to him that at the time of confederation there was a great upheaval in political opinion, and some men who took an active interest in public affairs changed their ideas. Some went one way and some went the other. Some were in favour of confederation and some were against it. I believe it is true that, when the senators were appointed after confederation, they were chosen both from those who opposed confederation and from those who favoured it. The government of that day took care to see that the Senate was represented by both those who favoured confederation and those who opposed it. In Newfoundland today there are people who oppose this union and people who favour it. I think that the example followed at the time of confederation could well be followed today, and that it would have good results in the end.

Mr. MacNicol: I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that if the present government remains in power—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): As it will.

Mr. MacNicol: Wait a minute. I know what I am going to say. If it remains in power for another five years, there may be only one party in the other place.

Mr. Rowe: Five years? You mean five months.

Mr. MacNicol: I am taking an arbitrary position. If the government remains in power for another five years, and appointments are continued on the present basis, all from their own party, it will mean that there may be only one party in the other place. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert brought up the matter I had in mind. Right after confederation a bill was introduced. I forget the name of the sponsor, but I have a copy of the original bill at home. There was a suggestion that the government of each province should appoint one half the senators from that province. The Prime Minister nods his head. He is familiar with that suggestion. The government in each province would name one half of the senators and the federal government would name the other half. In that way the government would avoid what is taking place now. I have forgotten how many Liberal senators and how many Conservative senators there are in the other place. They are so far apart in numbers that the other place has become only a government rubber stamp, with no possibility of the opposition affecting any controversial legislation.

Since the government will name the senators from Newfoundland, I suggest to the Prime Minister that one half be named from supporters of the official opposition and one half from government supporters.

Mr. Brooks: Everybody seems to be giving advice to the government as to whom they should appoint to the Senate. I noticed that three religious denominations were mentioned. I thought that I should mention the military forces of Newfoundland. Yesterday we heard of the splendid record of the navy, the army and the air force of Newfoundland. I remember that after the first world war vacancies in the Senate were filled from the different armed forces. If that practice was good in those days it is good now. I suggest to the Prime Minister that in making these appointments he consider making some of them from the different armed forces. The armed forces are entitled to this consideration and Newfoundland would be a good place to start. It could then be followed out in filling the large number of vacancies that we have in Canada.

Mr. St. Laurent: I thank hon. members for the advice that is being tendered tonight. I would not have risen even to express my thanks were it not that I find it necessary to differ from the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Davenport. It would be a mistake to have in the other place gentlemen feeling that they had a responsibility to a government of a Canadian province. National unity in Canada demands that all those who form part of the Canadian parliament feel that their responsibility is to the Canadian people as a whole, and that they are not the representatives of any provincial government or any municipality or other local authority. On that point I feel that I have to differ from the hon. gentleman. But I do recognize that it is abnormal that there should be, in the event forecast by the hon. member, a Senate composed exclusively of members of one party. That is something which is giving concern not only to hon. members on the other side of the house but to others. I can assure hon. members that we have within our own party serious misgivings about the situation that is apt to occur because of the way in which the Canadian public favours those who are elected to this house.

Mr. Fulton: Your misgivings will be removed at the next general election.

Mr. MacNicol: Can the minister give the name of the sponsor to whom I referred?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not remember his name.

Mr. MacNicol: It was shortly after confederation.

Mr. Hansell: The Prime Minister has thanked us for some little advice that he may have received from members of the opposition. I should like to put my little finger in the pie and give him some further advice. I appreciate what he has said with respect to the overbalancing of one side of the other place, but there is a way in which it can be overcome. I know that I am not voicing anything new, but from my experience here a feeling has grown upon me that we are in need of some parliamentary and electoral reform. No country remains static. We make progress. We change our ideas and we change the machinery which is used to put over those ideas.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the government and this entire house should give some consideration to a change in our parliamentary and electoral machinery and have the gentlemen who sit in the other place elected by common consent of the people of Canada. Personally I see no particular reason why in the other place there should be sitting two apparently separate bodies, one the counterpart of the government side of the house and the other the counterpart of the opposition side. Why cannot that body be a true example of a democratic institution? Let each member act independently and oppose or favour a measure as his experience guides him.

I know it is difficult to put this election idea over to any government which is in power. It is extremely difficult to do that because naturally they like to have the privilege of appointing various distinguished gentlemen to that other place. I am confident every one of us is aware of the fact that in Canada there is a large body of opinion which belittles our parliamentary institutions. I do not know that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was right when he made the remark which caused so much discussion the other day, but I just wonder how much of that kind of thinking is retained in the public mind. The effectiveness or the ineffectiveness of our parliamentary institutions is the subject of some concern to us and to the people of Canada. We do know that in Canada many people hold the view that the gentlemen who sit in the other place sit there as the result of having been good party supporters in the past, and what they have received is just a juicy political plum.

Mr. Knowles: It is a pretty good old age pension.

Mr. Hansell: A lot of people think that. I am not prepared to say that it is not so.

Mr. MacNicol: You will admit it is a good plum.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hansell: It is a good plum, whether they deserve it or not. I believe the time has come when members of that other place should be elected by the people of Canada.

Mr. Fraser: The Prime Minister and the hon. member for Macleod have mentioned the fact that gentlemen are called to the other place. I was wondering whether the Prime Minister was going to select some ladies for the other place. There are two there now. The women of Canada constitute over 50 per cent of the voting strength of the country. They should also be appointed to the other place.

Mr. Rowe: Many years ago the policy of the party opposite was to reform the Senate—I believe that was some thirty years ago. We were to have Senate reform.

Mr. Garson: We have now.

Mr. Rowe: The Minister of Justice has said that we have it now. It is reformed because nothing has been appointed to it for a number of years except reformers. However, the predecessor of the Prime Minister stated on one occasion, when asking about reforming the Senate, that no one was appointed to the Senate by his government except those who were committed to submit to any reforms the present party might design. Therefore I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether in the appointment of these new senators from Newfoundland he would inflict that obligation upon them which, I understand, has been inflicted upon every senator appointed by his government.

Mr. St. Laurent: I know of no infliction imposed upon any of the members in the other place, nor have I found in their reaction to notification of appointment that they felt that anything was being inflicted upon them.

Newfoundland

Mr. Knowles: May I say a further word on this matter, arising out of the section with which we are now dealing. I should like to say first of all that I do not see why our Tory friends to the right are so concerned about the lack of nominal Tories in the Senate. Most of the Liberals who go over there soon become Tories, anyway.

Mr. Mitchell: You have a few Tories yourself.

Mr. Knowles: They are not looking for places in the Senate, though.

Mr. Mitchell: Oh, I don't know about that.

Mr. Fraser: I would hate to see one offered to you.

Mr. Rowe: There will be many over there looking for them now.

Mr. Knowles: The very fact that we are dealing with this subject in the jocular manner which has characterized our discussions in the last half hour or so—

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Knowles: —suggests the sense of frustration which we feel about this branch of parliamentary government, namely the other place. I think the hon. member for Macleod was hitting the nail on the head when he referred to some disillusionment on the part of people with respect to parliamentary institutions; and that part of that stems from the feeling that we are maintaining an institution which does not fill a proper and necessary place.

My question, either of the Prime Minister, or of the Minister of National Defence, both of whom were involved in these negotiations, is this: Was there any discussion with the representatives from Newfoundland about possible changes in or reforms of the Senate?

Mr. St. Laurent: To the best of my knowledge the question was not raised.

Mr. Knowles: By neither side?

Mr. St. Laurent: By neither side.

Mr. Knowles: Then I take it that the present government is not concerned with reforming the Senate?

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh, my hon. friend can take what he likes from it, but that does not flow from anything I said. I said, on the contrary, that there were in our party many members who were concerned about a situation which was apt to arise under conditions forecast by the hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. Graydon: Not forecast, no; it was a hypothetical question.

Mr. Fleming: At the risk of changing the subject, I should like to draw the attention of the committee to another provision in the group of articles with which the committee is now dealing. Article 6 (3) states:

> The chief electoral officer shall have authority to adapt the provisions of The Dominion Elections Act, 1938, to conditions existing in the province of Newfoundland so as to conduct effectually the first election of members to serve in the House of Commons.

Attention has already been directed to the fact that this election cannot take place in any event until after April 1. In view of that circumstance, what justification can there be for vesting, in an appointed official, authority to adapt legislative enactments of this parliament? That seems to me an extraordinary provision. Parliament enacts provisions, and now it is proposed that an appointed official shall be given authority to adapt those legislative provisions to meet the circumstances of Newfoundland.

I suggest there is ample time for parliament to do everything required to adapt the provisions of the elections act to the circumstances to be found in Newfoundland, and that this is a departure which parliament ought not lightly to tolerate, namely the proposal that authority be vested in an appointed official to adapt the legislative enactments of this parliament.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member for Eglinton might do well to read the elections act. He would find in it provisions put there by parliament authorizing the electoral officers to adapt the provisions of the act to special circumstances of individual cases. That was put there by parliament, and has been there for a great many years. Probably it was there when the hon. member was reading the elections act in his university days.

There exist in Newfoundland special circumstances which do not exist in other Canadian provinces. There are provisions for the revision of electoral lists by officials who are called by one name—county or district court judges—in the other Canadian provinces, and these judicial functions are normally performed by an official who goes under another designation in Newfoundland. It is matters of that kind which the chief electoral officer would have to adapt as conditions arose, as he is authorized to make those adaptations under the elections act for the other parts of Canada. That is all there is to it; there is nothing more sinister than that.

Mr. Fleming: If this article contemplates vesting in the elections officer nothing more than the powers he now has under the Dominion Elections Act, is that matter not sufficiently taken care of by the bill introduced yesterday by the Minister of Justice, which would have the effect of applying the Dominion Elections Act to Newfoundland as it applies to other parts of Canada? This article certainly suggests on the face of it much more than what I contend is in the elections act, by way of vesting powers in the chief electoral officer.

Mr. St. Laurent: An attempt was made in drafting these terms to satisfy the delegation from Newfoundland, one which in its composition comprised some very distinguished lawyers. In the group there were the law officers of the Canadian government, and the law officers the delegation from Newfoundland brought with them. They suggested it would be advisable to have this provision in there to take care of such differences as conditions might present. And the recommendation made by the law officers accompanying the Newfoundland delegation and those accompanying the Canadian delegation were thought to be unobjectionable, with the result that the clause was inserted. One of the law officers acting for the Newfoundland delegation was the dean of the law school of Dalhousie university. They considered all these matters in detail and made their recommendations. They appeared to the two delegations to be unobjectionable, and were inserted.

Mr. Timmins: My recollection is that last year when the previous prime minister was speaking to the house, and we were talking on the matter of Senate reform, he informed the house that in respect of later appointments he had made to the Senate there were certain conditions attached—that he had spoken to members to be appointed, and had suggested to them some conditions, and that he would expect them to respect any change or reform that might be made in the Senate, if any reforms or changes were to be made. I say, if there are changes or reforms to be made.

I am sure the Prime Minister is not unmindful, and has knowledge, of what those recommendations or commitments were when they were made, and I should like to have him tell the house whether that same policy is to be followed in the future in making appointments to the Senate from Newfoundland or whether the matter was given any consideration when the discussions took place.

Mr. St. Laurent: The matter was given no consideration when the discussions took place. With respect to conditions imposed upon appointees to the Senate, I must say to the hon. member that I have no knowledge of any having been imposed.

Mr. Rowe: You should have had a caucus before you took office.

Mr. St. Laurent: When my hon. friend sits in my place he may tell the house how things should be done, but in the meantime I am deciding that.

Mr. Rowe: I hope I know more of what my predecessor did than my hon. friend.

Mr. Drew: In view of the caustic nature of some of the remarks of the Prime Minister, may I say that he is not going to decide; this house is going to decide.

Mr. St. Laurent: This house has never in the past, and I hope it will never in the future, decide when, where or why party caucuses should be held.

Mr. Drew: I am not talking about party caucuses.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is the matter the hon. member was referring to.

Mr. Rowe: You may not need any more caucuses; one or two more will be about all you will need.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Prime Minister a question. On the same date that the terms were signed certain statements were given to the Newfoundland delegation some of which seemed to tie in with sections of the terms of union. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether there are to be subsequent agreements between Canada and Newfoundland with regard to some of the questions contained in the statements, or just what is to be done? For example, there is one statement having to do with elections and changes in electoral divisions. Are there to be further agreements dealing with some of these items that were raised by the Newfoundland delegation?

Mr. St. Laurent: I know of no further agreements. These statements were in respect of matters which it was felt were not proper to have put into the terms of union which would become the constitution of the new province. We were constantly being told by members of the Newfoundland delegation: Our understanding is such and so. I told them that I did not want them to understand anything that was not going to be brought before the houses of parliament when the terms of union were being confirmed, that everything that they felt had influenced their attitude should be put in the form of statements that could be given to the houses of parliament. We could then assert to the houses of parliament that all that was being undertaken in the form of constitutional obligations was in the terms of union; that in discussing the terms of union we had declared what would be the policy of this government but that that would not bind anyone but ourselves. Nevertheless we felt that it would be unfair to the houses of parliament if we did not make known to them what declarations as to policy we had made during the course of the discussions. It was for that reason that these statements were made up.

Many more things were talked about than are referred to in these statements. We asked the Newfoundland delegation to give us an indication of all the things that they were taking as probable future happenings, and we said that we would put them in the document that we would produce before parliament. We would not ask parliament to make these part of the terms of union but parliament would know what this government intended to do so long as it was the government responsible for the direction of affairs.

I have not looked at the terms, but with respect to the electoral boundaries my recollection is that they were told that, after each decennial census, a redistribution bill was introduced and a committee set up to consider the boundaries of each constituency and to make a report to parliament. They were told that with respect to the boundaries of the Newfoundland constituencies that would come about in the regular way.

There were some members who did not want to take the responsibility for those boundaries because they said that they did not know enough about where the lines would run to want them to be permanent boundaries. They were quite satisfied that they be the boundaries for the first election and that somebody else should take the responsibility of saying what should be the boundaries of the constituencies for future elections. They were told that that responsibility would be taken, in the first instance, by the committee of the house that studied the matter and reported to parliament and, ultimately, by parliament when approving or disapproving of the recommendations made by the committee.

Mr. Green: I raised the question because some of the statements are an indication of government policies while others say that further consideration will be given to this or that subject and then agreement will be reached. In reading over the pamphlet it seemed to me that several things had been left in the air, that they have not yet been decided, and apparently are to be dealt with at a later date.

For example, there is the question of responsibility for the Northern Labrador Trading Operations, which is to be the subject of discussions between Canada and Newfoundland, or if necessary the province of Newfoundland. Then reference is made to penitentiaries and the question whether national harbours will be set up in Newfoundland.

What is the intention of the government with respect to these particular items where obviously no conclusion has been reached as yet but on which conclusion is to be reached shortly? Will there be further agreements, or just what does the government plan to do?

Mr. St. Laurent: These are matters which would be determined either by the Canadian government, under its responsibility to the Canadian parliament, or by the government of the island, under its responsibility to the legislature, according to where the jurisdiction may lie.

With respect to penitentiaries, there will have to be an agreement with the province. They were told it was unlikely, that probably it would be undesirable to establish a federal penitentiary in Newfoundland, and that it probably would also be undesirable to bring prisoners convicted by the courts of Newfoundland to the penitentiary at Dorchester because of the inconvenience to their families or friends when visiting them. It was stated that for the start there would be made an arrangement whereby the Canadian government, being responsible for the care and maintenance of those sentenced to terms of two years or more, would undertake to reimburse the government of Newfoundland for caring for these prisoners in the provincial jails.

That is something which will have to be worked out and we would hope to have it worked out in a manner that would be most satisfactory to the people of Newfoundland and to the Canadian people. There is another provision concerning certain boats that are presently owned by the government of Newfoundland.

Mr. Green: Clarenville boats?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, Clarenville boats. They are operated in a manner which is conducive to the development of the trade of Newfoundland. They carry relatively small cargoes of fish down to ports they can get into and that large boats carrying heavier cargoes cannot visit, and from those ports they bring back commodities that enter into the trade of Newfoundland. It is a desirable trade for the economy of Newfoundland. It might be very undesirable to attempt to have these boats operated by the Canadian National steamship lines, because then their operation would come under the collective agreements between the steamship lines and the seamen, which might make the operation of these boats so costly that instead of being profitable it would be detrimental to the economy of Newfoundland. There had not been time or opportunity to determine just what would be the most practicable way of continuing the operation of those boats in order to benefit the economy of the island. There a question arose as to whether the government of the island could operate boats in international trade, and that was not finally determined. The outcome was, "Well, we all know that we want to have done that which will best contribute to the economy of the island, but at the present time we do not know what that will have to be. We will trust each other and work out something satisfactory in that regard."

Mr. Green: These are more or less loose ends that will have to be tied up as the information becomes available?

Mr. St. Laurent: That is so; just as there is another loose end with respect to public property, for example.

Mr. Knowles: I hesitate to raise a point of order when the Prime Minister is seeking to be helpful in connection with these matters, but would it not be better if we took up these things in relation to the proper clauses?

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is always very free with his advice to other hon. members as to how we should follow the rules of the house. I brought up this question because in this statement there is one paragraph which deals with elections, and I wanted to know how that was to be tied in with the sections in the terms. I submit that the right hon. Prime Minister is perfectly in order in explaining just how these statements tie in with the terms of union.

Mr. Knowles: Not at all.

Mr. Pearkes: Following the suggestion made by the hon. member for Royal, I strongly urge that, when these appointments are being made, full consideration be given to the ex-servicemen of Newfoundland. I am quite certain the denominational question should not cause any difficulty, because there will have been distinguished ex-servicemen in all three denominations mentioned by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Jaenicke: I am worried about the words "British North America Act, 1867 to 1946," in section 5. I hesitate to say very much because of the statement made a few moments ago by the Prime Minister that some eminent counsel and the law officers of the crown drafted this agreement; but supposing we have an amendment to the British North America Act subsequent to this date, dealing with the representation in the House of Commons and the Senate. Is the Prime Minister satisfied that Newfoundland, the new province, could not take the position that they would not be bound by a subsequent amendment, in view of this wording? Should it not read "1867 and amendments thereto"?

Mr. St. Laurent: This is the official description of the British North America Acts determined by the parliament of the United Kingdom. Each of the amending statutes contains a provision substantially along this line: "This act may be known as the British North America Act, 1946; and this act and the others may be described together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946." The description is always of the original and all those up to the date of the one that is mentioned.

Mr. Jaenicke: I realize that; but supposing we have another amendment, say in 1950 or 1951. Would not Newfoundland then be in a position, if they do not agree with that amendment, to say, "We are not bound by it, because we are only bound by the amendments to the British North America Act up to 1946"?

Mr. St. Laurent: No. That matter was given serious consideration, and a provision was even drafted and considered by the law officers providing that the reference to any act would mean that act or any amendments made or to be made thereto. However, they came to the conclusion that it was unnecessary to have this kind of statement, that the interpretation acts of Canada, Newfoundland and the United Kingdom were sufficient in that regard.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want to ask the Prime Minister one question in regard to this. As I understand it, the new province is to have the same number of members in the other place as we are, though their population is just equal to that of one of our towns. Will they have the same number of parliamentary assistants that we have?

Sections 4, 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Provincial constitution.

Mr. Green: This paragraph provides that the constitution of Newfoundland is revived at the date of union and shall continue as the constitution of the province, and so on. Can the Prime Minister tell us how the constitution of Newfoundland will be amended once this union takes place?

Mr. St. Laurent: The constitution of the province of Newfoundland will be subject to amendment by the legislature of Newfoundland under the first subsection of section 92 of the British North America Act. They will have the right to amend their constitution in every respect save in respect of the office of lieutenant governor, just as every other Canadian province has that right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): How is it the parliament of Canada has power to revive the constitution of Newfoundland? In section 1, under the heading "Union", I read:

> On, from, and after the coming into force of these terms . . . Newfoundland shall form part of Canada and shall be a province thereof—

At that stage, when Newfoundland comes in, does it have no constitution? Does it receive its constitution after that? How is it that we, the parliament of Canada, and not the parliament at Westminster, are to revive the constitution which, as I understand it, was derogated from, or whatever the proper expression may be, under the authority of that other parliament?

Mr. St. Laurent: If this were not to be confirmed by a statute of the parliament of the United Kingdom the revival of the constitution of Newfoundland could not be done by the parliament of Canada; it would have to be done by the parliament of the United Kingdom. But it is one of the conditions of this agreement that it does not come into effect or have legal effect until confirmed by an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom.

The delegation from Newfoundland and its law officers insisted that they did not want the province of Newfoundland to get a new constitution out of the union. They wanted to be in the position of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which had constitutions before union and retained all the powers of their constitutions, except those given to the central authority. It was for that reason that the dean of the law school was insistent upon having the constitution revived an instant before union becomes effective. It will be revived only because there will have been enacted an act by the United Kingdom agreeing to this.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I am still not clear as to why this clause is in here at all. Has it any effect? As I understand the Prime Minister, this would have no effect unless there was an act passed by the parliament at Westminster. What effect has this clause in here?

Mr. St. Laurent: None of these clauses would have any effect except by virtue of an act passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom. The parliament of the United Kingdom is, at the present time, the legislative body having jurisdiction and authority over Newfoundland. You cannot have a marriage merely with the consent of the groom. You have to have the bride agreeing thereto as well. These terms of union have to be agreed to by Canada and they also have to be agreed to by those who are competent and willing to give consent for the other contracting party.

Sections 8 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On section 17—Education.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if the Prime Minister would be good enough to explain why it is necessary to make a special provision for education in Newfoundland, and why section 93 of the British North America Act is not sufficient to cover the case if it were made applicable.

Mr. St. Laurent: With respect to education, the situation was different from that which existed at the time of the creation of the two new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. At that time, this parliament had control over education in those territories. It could reasonably stipulate it would part with that control, subject only to certain guarantees of the rights of minorities. The delegates from Newfoundland were told we had no control over their educational system at the present time. The authority having legislative jurisdiction at that time, however, could make any provision it wished to make with respect to education. We also told them we had no right to insist upon any guarantee being written into the constitution because they have complete jurisdiction themselves; but if, for the satisfaction of their own people, they felt it was preferable to have a guarantee written into the constitution, we could not object. The matter was discussed back and forth for quite a long time.

The hon. member knows that the sanction of the rights of minorities under section 93 of the British North America Act is an appeal to the governor in council and the enactment by this parliament of remedial legislation. The hon. member knows what difficulties arose out of appeals under that section and out of the attempt to pass remedial legislation some forty years ago. It was felt by the delegation from Newfoundland that it would be more effective to have the clause concerning guarantees drawn in this way so that the legislature would have complete control over education but would not have jurisdiction to do things that would impinge upon the rights of minorities. To do those things would be a denial of jurisdiction.

If an attempt were made to do those things, the recourse is to the courts of law. The courts of law will examine whether or not the thing that is being done is contrary to the guarantee written into this clause. If it is found by the courts of law to be contrary, the courts of law declare it to be void and unconstitutional. It was felt that would be a more effective safeguard than appeal to the governor in council and a request to the central parliament to pass remedial legislation.

Mr. Fulton: I take it, then, one might summarize the effect of this section by saying it has the effect of preserving permanently the status quo in Newfoundland and providing, instead of an appeal to the governor in council against infringement and action by parliament, an appeal to the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. St. Laurent: The ultimate appeal would be to the Supreme Court of Canada. It would be an appeal to the ordinary provincial courts in the first instance, but ultimately there could be an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The hon. member says the effect is to fix the status quo for all time, but that is subject to some modification. I understand the schools in Newfoundland are denominational schools, but under the present practice different denominations can amalgamate for a school district. The right to do that is preserved. Moreover, there is a right in the legislature to set up other schools than those which exist at the present time, but it is provided that if they do set up other schools they must not discriminate against the denominational schools in the districts. Such was the desire of the delegates from Newfoundland; and, as the hon. member has indicated, the sanction was to be an appeal to the courts, not an appeal to a political body.

Mr. Kidd: May I direct a question to the right hon. the Prime Minister? It has to do with the education of veterans. I notice that veterans affairs comes under section 38, but I do not see the word "education" mentioned in section 38, so I am taking this opportunity of asking my question. The Prime Minister may be familiar with the educational system in Newfoundland. There are no universities in Newfoundland and a student wishing to receive advanced education, after receiving first or second year college, has to go to Dalhousie, McGill, Queen's or varsity. The student finishes his education and takes his degree there. The result has been that a great many Newfoundlanders who came to Canada for their education remained in Canada. There were those, of course, who had to go back because of some business association in the island. I may say that Canada has benefited during the past thirty or forty years from the large number of Newfoundlanders who have remained here upon completion of their education.

In the universities at the present time we have the veterans of world war II. Will the veterans who are attending university today, and those who come in next year, receive the same grants? My question might be directed through you, Mr. Chairman, to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I know this matter has been taken up, and that the student veterans in university today get $60 and $80. I have in mind particularly the veteran who today is taking a medical course, who has perhaps another three or four years ahead of him—it is a long course—and whose money is running out.

Mr. Gregg: As my hon. friend said, that matter properly comes under section 38, paragraph (f). Perhaps I am out of order but I think I can answer the question quite briefly. Paragraph (f) reads:

> Sections six, seven and eight of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act will be extended to Newfoundland veterans of the second world war who have not received similar benefits from the government of any country other than Canada.

University education comes under section 8. In such a case as that referred to by my hon. friend, completion of the veteran's education would be provided for by my department in exactly the same way as though he had been a Canadian veteran.

Mr. Dickey: On this section on education I should like to say just a word. Many tributes were paid in this house yesterday to the various groups and influences which, down through the years, have contributed to the drawing together of the old colony of Newfoundland and this country.

I think one of the strongest and most important of those influences, which was not mentioned, is the number of young men and young women of Newfoundland who, through the years, have come to the universities and colleges of eastern Canada for the purpose of completing their education, and I refer particularly to the colleges and universities of Nova Scotia. It has been a delight to those institutions to have these welcome visitors who have made so signal a contribution to their academic life. When speaking a few minutes ago, one hon. member referred to the fact that, of those Newfoundland young people who came to Canada to complete their education, a great many stayed in Canada. Happily that has not been true in every case. Perhaps indicative of the importance of the bearing this has on the happy subject we are discussing tonight is the fact that four out of the six Newfoundland delegates, who came here to discuss with the representatives of the government of Canada the terms of union which we are here discussing, were graduates of the law school of Dalhousie university. I am sure we all hope that the young men and young women of the new province will continue to come and pursue their studies at the eastern Canadian universities to which their fathers and mothers came in their day. Along with a widespread and, I hope, important development in the educational life of the new province itself, will be the backing and the help of the existing institutions which have contributed in great measure to the professional and cultural life of Newfoundland down through the years.

Mr. Timmins: I do not think it would be inappropriate to say that a good number of the young men from Newfoundland have found their way up to Ontario to seek their education. The Secretary of State for External Affairs will bear me out when I say that he and I, as students at Victoria college in Toronto, had with us many young men from Newfoundland, a good number of whom have become professors in Canadian universities. One of them was also a delegate who came from Newfoundland to consult with our officials and our Prime Minister in respect of this act of union. We have welcomed many in the past, and I think that in the future we will welcome more and more of these young men to our various universities, particularly those in Ontario.

Mr. Bentley: I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether consideration has been given to certain things. When speaking on second reading of the bill this afternoon, the leader of the opposition pointed out, in connection with oleomargarine, that there was embodied in this agreement a certain term which, while it may not be operative now, since time and circumstances have removed the need for it at the present time, is nevertheless there for future consideration by anyone who may feel that he may want to take advantage of it. In this section the same thing happens.

The Prime Minister has said that the terms of the Newfoundland delegation with regard to their educational system were something they themselves wanted, and that the Canadian delegation agreed to them because the Newfoundland delegation wanted them. That means that there is a departure from the regular practices under the British North America Act in that the new province of Newfoundland, when union takes place, will not need to appeal to His Excellency the Governor General—or to the lieutenant governor, I presume, in the case of a province —for any changes in connection with the agreement. That may be all right. Traditionally, Newfoundland undoubtedly wants that. They are accustomed to it. But did the Canadian delegates consider seriously the possibility that if this becomes part of the agreement by consent of Canada, then in the future some other provinces which may wish to adopt this particular procedure may possibly put up a strenuous fight, and that we shall find our whole Canadian system of education altered to suit that of Newfoundland? Was that possibility considered when the matter was under discussion?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think this term can have any effect on the educational system in Newfoundland or in Canada. It is a modification of the guarantees of minority rights set out in the original British North America Act. In the acts which created the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan there were made for those two provinces special provisions which were somewhat different from the terms set out in the original British North America Act. The hon. member suggests the possibility of some province wishing to have these or similar terms instead of having the terms that are now in the British North America Act. I do not know how an an amendment of that kind could be brought about. I think it would be a relief to all of us in Canada if these matters could be dealt with by the courts of justice whenever there was any feeling that a minority right had been violated, instead of being dealt with by means of an appeal to a political body. The experience of the Canadian public with respect to appeals that have been taken under section 93 of the British North America Act is really an unhappy one. It has created disunion, and whatever disposition was made by the governor in council, there was a large section disappointed and dissatisfied with the decision. They are apt to consider that the decision is not really a judicial but a political one. In these matters where there are to be constitutional safeguards it is better to have them sanctioned by judicial decisions than by decisions which many people feel are more of a political than of a judicial character.

Mr. Bentley: The Prime Minister has tacitly agreed that what I suggested might happen could happen and would be desirable. If a province wished to adopt this particular principle or practice, any changes in educational matters would not be subject to a legislative body.

Mr. St. Laurent: No; all changes, under this section, have to be made by the legislative body of Newfoundland, but if the legislative body of Newfoundland attempted to do something that violated a minority right, instead of having a political body decide the question whether or not there was a violation, that question would be decided by a judicial body. It is the same in the other provinces. There are guarantees of minority rights. But when there is a contention that they have been violated, instead of going to the courts to determine whether that is so or not the matter is taken to the governor in council; and, whatever he decides, many feel that his decision is more apt to be a political decision than a judicial decision.

Mr. Knight: Was any arrangement made in regard to federal grants in aid of education? Was there any discussion in regard to that?

Mr. St. Laurent: There was no discussion on federal grants in aid of education other than the provision made for the extension to the people of Newfoundland of the legislation relating to veterans. The transitional grants provided were fixed after all the requirements of the public services of the province had been considered. There was no special portion allotted for education, but the over-all picture was studied to arrive at a figure that, in the opinion of those who were making the agreement, would make it a workable agreement.

Mr. Knight: I was thinking in particular of the vocational grants now given to technical schools in the other provinces and derived from dominion funds. Was anything done about that? Will these same grants be available?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes. We attempted to draw this agreement in such a manner that the citizens of Newfoundland would become full Canadian citizens in every respect of rights and obligations.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Continuation of laws.

Mr. Cruickshank: Am I to understand that any laws enacted here will be binding, or can they be appealed and abolished as was done in the case of oleomargarine by the supreme court after sixty-seven years?

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member uses language which does not perhaps accurately describe what the supreme court did. The supreme court did not abolish the law. The supreme court decided that those who passed the law had no right to do so and that it had never been any good.

Mr. Cruickshank: What about my question? Am I assured by the Prime Minister that this law is good and that they cannot abolish it?

Mr. St. Laurent: To the best of my knowledge, and to the best of the knowledge of the legal experts who were accompanying both delegations, it is good. It is something within their jurisdiction. Beyond that I cannot go. The hon. member knows that it is not only with respect to oleomargarine that the courts have found that after a long period something that was looked upon as valid law was not so. Perhaps he remembers what happened to the so-called Lemieux act dealing with industrial disputes. It had been applied for a good many years in a manner which the Canadian public thought was satisfactory, and all at once the privy council said that those who passed that law went beyond their jurisdiction and it was not binding on anybody.

Mr. Timmins: Will the Prime Minister make a short statement in respect to the meaning of this particular section, having regard to the following subsection:

> (1) Subject to these terms, all laws enforced in Newfoundland at or immediately prior to the date of union shall continue therein as if the union had not been made . . .
> (2) Statutes of the parliament of Canada in force at the date of union, or any part thereof, shall come into force in the province of Newfoundland on a day or days to be fixed . . .

I presume that means that the criminal law of Canada will probably come into force immediately after the passing of the act of union. I should like to know whether the criminal law of Canada will immediately supersede the criminal law of Newfoundland, or just what the situation is to be.

Mr. St. Laurent: No, Mr. Chairman. This section was drawn precisely for the purpose of not having the criminal law, among others, come into force immediately, because we were informed that it would be embarrassing to administer the criminal law of Canada until arrangements had been made to provide the proper machinery, and that therefore it would be preferable to have a provision that these general laws of Canada could from time to time be put into force in the province as machinery to administer them had been previously provided; and that pending that time the laws in force at the time of union would continue.

In Quebec at the present time there is a civil code which came into force in 1866, and which contains provisions that the parliament of Canada would have the right to amend or repeal. But it has not yet been seen fit to do that. The legislature of Quebec would not have the right to enact that kind of legislation, but it does apply as a part of the legislation of Quebec until such time as parliament sees fit to deal with it. It will be the same with respect to Newfoundland. They have a certain body of laws which will continue to be applied until by proclamation it is stated that the present laws of the dominion in that regard will be substituted for those that exist in the province. Of course it is not intended that it will take very long. It is intended to be merely a transitional measure to bring progressively into force those Canadian laws under conditions which will not prove to be embarrassing; and it is perhaps because there were on the delegation those distinguished lawyers, graduates of Toronto and Dalhousie, that a section such as this was very carefully considered. We were told that it would be embarrassing to them in the administration of criminal justice to jump right away from a common law system to the code; that they were not going to take the trouble of learning our code and our procedure until they were sure that they were going to have to apply it; and that it would take them some little time after they became sure that the union was going to be realized to put themselves in a position properly to administer the provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada.

Mr. Hackett: Will the Prime Minister say to what extent the judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada and of the privy council, in so far as they bear upon the relationship between the provinces and the dominion, would find application to the new relationship about to be established between Newfoundland and the dominion?

Mr. St. Laurent: The only answer I can make is that it was assumed by delegates on both sides that the Canadian constitution as it applies in fact to the other Canadian provinces would apply to Newfoundland after the union.

Mr. Hackett: Is there any enactment to that effect? Is there anything that would warrant that statement?—and I hope the Prime Minister will not think I am unduly inquisitive.

Mr. St. Laurent: It was felt that section 3 would have that effect. And then, as the Statute of Westminster is not one of the British North America Acts, and the decisions which may be given with respect to the Statute of Westminster do not affect the British North America Acts, and vice versa, it was felt there should be a special declaration as to the manner in which the Statute of Westminster would apply to Newfoundland. That was provided in section 48. From and after the date of union it will apply to the province of Newfoundland as it applies to the other provinces of Canada.

It was felt that having section 3, which refers to the British North America Acts, that included not only British North America Acts but those acts as the courts have construed them to be; and that section 48, adding to it the Statute of Westminster, would give the new province exactly the same status as the other Canadian provinces.

Mr. Jaenicke: Will the Prime Minister tell us whether Newfoundland has a divorce law?

Mr. St. Laurent: Newfoundland has no divorce law; and we were informed that there were, I believe, three persons who claimed to be divorced because they had gone to other jurisdictions and there obtained decrees. But there seemed to be some doubt as to whether those divorces were divorces which should be recognized. And of course that would depend upon whether there had been really a change of domicile before the divorce decrees were granted.

Mr. Pearkes: Will there be any change in the laws in force on those portions of the ocean between Canada and Newfoundland? In other words, will there be any extension of the extraterritorial waters, now that Newfoundland will become part of Canada—because I believe it is customary that when a portion of the ocean is nearly surrounded by a country, that water is declared a territorial water.

Mr. St. Laurent: We intend to contend, and hope to be able to get acquiescence in the contention that the waters west of Newfoundland constituting the gulf of St. Lawrence shall become an inland sea. We hope that, with Newfoundland as a part of Canadian territory, the gulf of St. Lawrence west of Newfoundland will all become territorial waters of Canada, whereas before there would be only the usual off-shore portion that would thus become part of the territorial waters. Of course that is a matter which is not governed by statutes; it is governed by the comity of nations. It is our intention to assert that position and it is our hope that it will be recognized as a valid contention.

On section 19—Supply.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am sorry to say I was not here at the time representation in parliament was being discussed, but I believe I am in order in discussing that matter on this subject of supply—because it provides the money.

Mr. Knowles: Move an amendment.

Mr. Cruickshank: I wish I could. Do I understand seriously that 320,000 people are to have seven members representing them in the House of Commons, while they are to have six appointed—and parliamentary language does not permit me to say where. In British Columbia we have one city, the city of Vancouver, with 350,000 people—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: "Order"—my foot. I do not think they are serious about this bill. Are there to be seven members elected by the people of Newfoundland, and six appointed to the other place—and by I don't know whom? It does not make sense, and I object seriously to it.

I cannot move an amendment. I am in favour of having a tenth province, but I am definitely not in favour of moving six from one graveyard to another—over there—particularly when British Columbia is limited to its present number, six.

Mr. Abbott: Carried.

Mr. Cruickshank: No. And I presume with those seven members, and six appointed to the other place, if we were to carry this through to its logical conclusion, that would mean three and a half parliamentary assistants.

Mr. MacNicol: Too many of those now.

Mr. Cruickshank: So far as I am concerned, through you to the Prime Minister, Mr. Chairman, I strenuously object to the six members not elected from this population.

Mr. St. Laurent: Unfortunately the objection comes a little too late, because the provision for six members in the other place, in the event of Newfoundland's joining Canada, was enacted some thirty-three or thirty-four years ago. It was enacted at the same time as the provision was made that representation in this chamber should never fall below the number of members to which it was entitled in the Senate. It is for that reason that the province of Prince Edward Island is still entitled to four members in the House of Commons, although the quotient of representation for the rest of Canada would be something of the order of fifty odd thousand per member.

Mr. Cruickshank: Does not the Prime Minister think that right in this parliament we enacted an amendment whereby we did exactly the opposite to what he is stating? We are changing our redistribution at the present time. Quebec is getting more than she had before; and some of the other provinces will have more.

I am afraid the Prime Minister's argument does not hold good at all. This will mean six people we will have to look after in that little island over there—and a certain parliamentary assistant made a speech here not so long ago along the very lines I am following. If Prince Edward Island, with a handful of population, is entitled to four senators, then surely to goodness British Columbia is entitled to more than six. Surely we are entitled to more than that, when one of our larger centres has a greater population than either of these districts I have mentioned—including the new province entering confederation. I do not think the Prime Minister's argument holds good at all.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): What the hon. member for Fraser Valley has said must bring closely to the attention of the Prime Minister the very urgent need for reform in the Senate, which was so often promised by his illustrious predecessor. It does seem fantastic that the maritime provinces—

Mr. Knowles: Where have you fellows been all night?

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I thought you were interested in the reform of the Senate?

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, we discussed this matter for an hour.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): After all, in the maritime provinces, producing about the same amount of fish as British Columbia does, there will be 30 senators; yet we have only six senators. I can assure the committee that there are as many indigent politicians in British Columbia as there are in the maritime provinces.

Sections 20 and 21 agreed to.

On section 22—Fisheries.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the Minister of Fisheries would make some comment on the sections having to do with fisheries? This is one of the subjects connected with the coming into confederation of Newfoundland about which I have been reading and I have found it rather interesting, in fact almost intriguing. Such documents as I have read would seem to suggest that Newfoundland may be ahead of Canada in her legislative provisions for the marketing of fish. I understand that Newfoundland is to have the right to continue for another five years the arrangements that she now has. May I inquire whether the Department of Fisheries and the government generally will be considering the methods employed in Newfoundland with the possibility, should it be found that theirs are better than ours, of changing the Canadian laws.

Mr. Mayhew: I do not know whether you wish to call it eleven o'clock, but it will take longer than five minutes for me to give an adequate answer.

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps if the explanation will extend beyond eleven o'clock it might suit the convenience of hon. members if I moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow the government would propose to continue with this bill in committee. If that is disposed of we will continue with the debate on the resolution concerning the extension of certain emergency powers, which debate was interrupted last night.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, we will not take up the bill of the Minister of Justice respecting Newfoundland?

Mr. St. Laurent: That bill has not been distributed and I would not like to ask the house to consider it until it has been in the hands of hon. members for at least a few hours. It was decided that questions would be answered and consideration given to notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 9, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO COUNT JACQUES DE BERNONVILLE

Mr. Frederic Dorion (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am one of two counsel for Count de Bernonville, a citizen of France who is before the court contesting an order for deportation. It is for this reason that I strongly resent the untrue and unfounded statement made yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), when the orders of the day were called. He said:

Is the minister aware that this man is a traitor, and that he betrayed our allied soldiers to the gestapo?

Had I not been convinced, not only of this man's innocence, but especially of his assistance to our soldiers during the war, I would not have acted for him. My conviction is based on authentic and true documents which are in my possession. I invite anyone, especially any hon. member of this house, to come to my office and examine those documents if he so wishes.

BILL OF RIGHTS

PRESENTATION OF PETITION SIGNED BY 625,510 CANADIANS

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to present to this house, on the same basis as previously, a petition signed by 625,510 Canadians requesting a bill of rights. I now present this petition, although I do not agree with the religious views of the organization which promoted it.

NEWFOUNDLAND

CORRESPONDENCE PROTESTING AGAINST PROCEDURE IN UNION WITH CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table several documents in connection with the protests from organizations in Newfoundland concerning the procedure followed in connection with the union of Newfoundland with Canada. There are two communications addressed to the former prime minister, and the answers which he made thereto. The first communication is dated the 29th of July, 1948, and the answer is dated the 30th of July, 1948. It was a telegram. The other communication is dated the 10th of August, 1948, the answer being dated the 11th of August, 1948.

Questions

INCOME TAX—FARMERS' NET WORTH STATEMENT

Mr. Hatfield:

What number of farmers in each province made out a net worth statement for the years 1946 and 1947?

There is no statistical record of farmers filing net worth statements for these years.

EMBARGO ON POTATOES

Mr. Hatfield:

1. Was the government requested by the authorities at Washington to place an embargo against table stock potatoes entering the United States?

2. If so, on what date was the request made?

3. Did Washington request the Canadian government to stop certified seed potatoes from entering the United States except on a quota monthly basis?

4. If so, when was this request made?

5. Will there be any table potatoes allowed shipment to the United States by the Canadian government of the 1949 crop?

6. If so, under what arrangements?

7. Under what act was the embargo placed on table potatoes shipped from Canada to the United States?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. No; however, on October 27, 1948, this government received a request from the United States government to discuss the subject of potatoes. We were advised that it was the intention of the United States government to stop the importation of Canadian potatoes on the grounds that such imports were rendering ineffective the United States price support program. Realizing that such an embargo would do incalculable injury to our United States market for seed potatoes, this government pressed for a control system that would not arbitrarily cut off shipments at some early date, but which would allow United States buyers of Canadian certified seed potatoes to take delivery, as is their custom, during the winter or early spring.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. No, nor have monthly quotas been established. However, to ensure that Canadian seed potatoes are not channeled into United States table stock markets, the United States authorities have required that shipments of Canadian seed potatoes be restricted in such a way that they shall enter the United States during a period of approximately two months prior to the actual seeding time. This period will vary with the seeding dates of the various states.

4. See answer to No. 3.

5. The agreement under reference, entered into with the United States, applies only to potatoes of the 1948 crop. There have been no intergovernment discussions with regard to the 1949 potato crop.

6. See answer to No. 5.

7. Table potatoes were placed under export control under the provisions of the Export and Import Permits Act.

WHEAT—PURCHASE BY U.S. FOR DISTRIBUTION IN EUROPE

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What is the total number of bushels and the total price of all Canadian wheat purchased by the United States for distribution under ERP or the Marshall plan since the first day of January, 1948?

Mr. McIlraith: The economic co-operation administration, the administrative agency for ERP or the Marshall plan, does not purchase wheat from Canada for distribution to countries in receipt of ECA grants or loans. Sales of Canadian wheat are made by the board to countries receiving ECA assistance but settlement is made with the board or its agents in the normal way. The extent to which ECA funds may be utilized is a matter entirely between the recipient country and the economic co-operation administration.

The office of the administrator of ECA issues daily press releases which announce from time to time the granting of procurement and reimbursement authorizations. These announcements give an indication of the amount of ECA grants, according to recipient country, the commodity involved and the country of origin. The information contained in the releases, however, cannot be construed to be final, since many changes and modifications can and do occur between the time of granting procurement and reimbursement authorizations and the ultimate completion of the transaction.

Questions

The difference between the total enrolled and those now enrolled—some 25,000—are no longer receiving assistance because of graduation, failure, entitlement under the act expired, or discontinuance for personal or other reasons.

The department has no record of the number, if any, of veterans who discontinued university training for purely financial reasons prior to the academic year 1947-48. In the academic year 1947-48, twenty-five veterans were unable to complete the year's work for this reason; of these, training had been authorized by the district office at Vancouver in 6 cases, at Saskatoon in 3, London 4, Toronto 4, Ottawa 1, Montreal 6, Halifax 1. A survey for the academic year 1948-49 is in hand and the result is expected shortly.

The department has no record of the number, if any, of veterans who have discontinued vocational training for purely financial reasons.

AIR MAIL—REGULATIONS AS TO FIRST-CLASS MATTER—USE OF FRANK

Hon. Ernest Bertrand (Postmaster General): On Monday, January 31, I was asked a question by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) about air mail transport, and I said that I would give an answer in a few days. The answer is as follows:

In reply to an inquiry made by the hon. member for Red Deer on Monday, 31st January, respecting the transport of first-class mail by air, may I say that I can find no evidence of widespread confusion as to the practical application of regulations governing the air transport of first-class mail.

For the benefit of the hon. member, however, I shall describe air mail service as existing in Canada at this time. There is, first of all, what has been called "all-up" air mail, which was introduced in July last. This "all-up" service involves the carriage at normal letter rates of postage of all letters mailed in Canada for delivery in Canada weighing not more than one ounce.

There is also air mail service at surcharged rates for letters weighing over one ounce for delivery in Canada and for all letters to be sent by air to points outside of Canada.

Finally, there is air stage mail consisting of mail posted at, or addressed for delivery at, post offices in outlying districts in Canada where the service is performed entirely by air. Here, too, special air mail rates apply.

As to that portion of his question dealing with the franking of letters, may I say to the hon. member that the right of free postage for air conveyance applies only to letters not exceeding one ounce in weight for delivery in Canada. It does not apply to mail requiring air mail surcharges. In other words the franking privilege does not apply on letters weighing over one ounce intended for air conveyance within Canada, to letters mailed at or addressed for delivery at post offices served by air stage services, or to letters addressed to points outside of Canada.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HALIFAX HARBOUR

COLLISIONS WITH HALIFAX-DARTMOUTH FERRY—QUESTION AS TO RADAR EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. King Hazen (Saint John-Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I did not have an opportunity to give him notice of it. Was the naval tug Glenevis, which was in collision with the Halifax-Dartmouth ferry in Halifax harbour this week, equipped with radar? Is there any shore-based radar available at that port? Was harbour craft No. 303, which was in collision with the North Dartmouth ferry in Halifax on the same day, equipped with radar?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman has said, he did not have an opportunity to give me notice of the question. I shall be glad to look into the matter and give him an answer later.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRIES AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEES

Human Rights

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to call together this session the special joint committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I received notice this morning of the hon. member's question. I think it would be in the interests of hon. members to have a full statement made of the developments in connection with this matter of human rights and fundamental freedoms since the adjournment of the committee at the last session. I have asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to prepare such a statement, which will bring hon. members up to date in the matter. The question of deciding whether it will be opportune to set up the committee can be dealt with in the light of the facts which will be revealed in that statement.

Radio Broadcasting

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): On January 28 I addressed this question to the Minister of National Revenue:

> Is it the intention of the government to take steps to set up a special committee of the house at this session on radio broadcasting?

At that time the minister gave the following answer, as recorded at page 44 of Hansard:

> The matter has not been given consideration. When it has been considered, an announcement will be made.

I now ask the minister whether consideration has been given to this question, and if an announcement can now be made.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I am not in a position to give an answer, but if there is a demand for the setting up of a committee on radio broadcasting, the matter will be given consideration.

WHEAT

REPORTED PURCHASE OF 120 MILLION BUSHELS IN CANADA BY ECA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of certain representations made and evidence given yesterday before the Senate agriculture committee in Washington relating to the approval of the purchase of 120 million bushels of Canadian wheat by ECA for delivery to Britain. Is the minister in a position to say what the price was, and whether or not the price arrived at or agreed to is above or below the world price?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I presume the hon. member refers to the price under the United Kingdom contract.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; this is a purchase direct by ECA.

Mr. Howe: So far as I know, this government sells nothing to ECA. It sells to ECA countries. We have no means of knowing whether payment is made from ECA funds or otherwise. We receive periodical publications of ECA, showing the funds allocated for purchases in Canada, and the commodities for which such funds are to be applied. The government of Canada does no business direct with ECA.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I be permitted to ask a supplementary question? According to the press report, Canada is selling 120 million bushels of wheat to Europe on behalf of ECA. That was the evidence given yesterday before the committee in Washington.

Mr. Howe: I can assure my hon. friend that no such sale has been made. Canada has been selling wheat to Europe periodically. I dare say some of it, and perhaps a large part of it, has been paid for by the recipient countries with ECA funds, but Canada has no information as to whether or not payment was made from ECA funds or otherwise.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FRIDAY EVENING ADJOURNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. When may we return to the usual practice of adjourning at six o'clock on Fridays? We seem to be proceeding with the Newfoundland matter much more quickly than we expected. Some of us who do not go home on week ends feel that it is in the public interest to become a little bit better acquainted with our families and think we might return to that old tradition of adjourning at six o'clock on Friday afternoon.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): My impression is that the standing orders provide that the house shall sit until eleven on Fridays, and that it was only by special dispensation in the early part of the session that the house, with the unanimous consent of hon. members, adjourned at six o'clock instead of going through to eleven o'clock.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I agree with that.

Mr. St. Laurent: This is the first time I have heard the suggestion that unanimous consent be sought to adjourn at six o'clock on Fridays. I am sure hon. members will recall that toward the end of the session we frequently reproach ourselves and each other for not having earlier made greater efforts to expedite the business of the house, and for having to work under great pressure at the end of the session. However, in these matters the government is always disposed to accommodate the largest number of members possible, and if there seemed to be any general desire to have the house adjourn at six o'clock on Friday on two or three occasions, the government would be willing to have the question put before the house for decision.

TRADE WITH BRITAIN

QUESTION AS TO REDUCTION OF TARIFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I hope he can see his way clear to give me an answer. In view of the fact that the continued lack of balance in Canada's trade with Britain would appear to be jeopardizing our markets for farm produce in that country, will the minister state whether the government has recently considered lowering tariffs on British goods, or taking any other concrete steps to encourage British imports?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The government has taken steps from time to time in the direction indicated. Tariffs have been lowered and in some cases suspended. Other concessions have been made, all with a desire to encourage the importation of British goods. If my hon. friend will refer to the trade statistics over the past twelve months, he will find that importation of British goods has increased very materially.

Mr. Thatcher: Has the government considered the feasibility at this time of any kind of barter agreement with Great Britain?

Mr. Howe: The Canadian government is not favourably disposed toward barter agreements between governments. It has no objection to private barter transactions when they can be worked out. It believes in multilateral trade, and is opposed to any system of trading which tends to interfere with multilateral trade.

POSTAL SERVICE

ADDITIONAL POSTAGE CHARGES IMPOSED DURING THE WAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John T. Hackett (Stanstead): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. In view of the reports of the successful administration of his department, will the minister give an indication when the additional postage charges imposed for purposes of war will be abandoned?

Hon. Ernest Bertrand (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think I may say in all frankness that it will be many long years before the additional postage is abandoned.

GOLD

RESTRICTIONS ON FREE SALE FROM CANADIAN MINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alan Cockeram (York South): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. In view of current reports appearing in our daily papers to the effect that gold producers in countries other than Canada are making sales at prices above those fixed by the United States treasury, will the government give immediate consideration to relaxing its restrictions against the free sale of newly-produced gold from mines located in Canada?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Again I assume my hon. friend did not have time to send me notice of his question.

Mr. Cockeram: I do not have to.

Mr. Abbott: I am aware of the special interest which he has in the matter. I shall take his question as notice and see whether I can give him an answer at an early day.

Mr. Cockeram: The minister is always frivolous in his replies to questions.

NEWFOUNDLAND

APPROVAL OF TERMS OF UNION WITH CANADA

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 8, consideration in committee of Bill No. 11, to approve the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 22—Fisheries.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, before proceeding further with this section may I make a brief statement. The information I gave the committee last night about the recommendation I had received as to the distribution of posts of senators for the island of Newfoundland has created some uneasiness there. I said it had been represented to us that there were three main groups of the population, divided according to religious denominations among Anglican, Roman Catholic and adherents of the United church. That has been taken to mean that it would exclude the possibility of anyone not belonging to those three denominations being considered for a Senate appointment. That is not at all what I meant, nor was it the real meaning of the recommendation made to us.

The recommendation made was that there were these three groups, namely the Anglicans, the Roman Catholics, the members of the United church and adherents of other denominations not forming part of the United church. The high commissioner reported that my statement might create a false impression and I feel it is desirable to have any false impression corrected. So I wish to say that those recommendations did comprise in the group described as the United church group the adherents of the United church, and members of other denominations being neither Anglican nor Roman Catholic, and that would include Presbyterians, adherents of the Salvation Army and other denominations.

Mr. Graydon: Do not forget the Baptists.

Mr. St. Laurent: I understand there are a few Baptists there, but that they have not yet established any denominational schools. The information given to me was that there were Anglicans, Roman Catholics, and others, most of whom belonged to the United church. But it was not intended that anyone would be excluded from consideration because of his religious views.

Mr. Knowles: So long as he is a Liberal.

Mr. Gillis: I did not think we would ever reach the point when the House of Commons would discuss appointments to the other place, or anywhere else, on sectarian grounds. However, that is not the point I had in mind when rising.

We are dealing with section 22 of Bill No. 11, dealing with fisheries. I consider the subject matter now under discussion one of great importance to the whole fishing industry of Canada, because the provisions of this bill could affect that industry in the wrong way.

It seems to me that at this time it would be necessary for the Minister of Fisheries to give us a comprehensive statement about the whole industry. For example, according to a press dispatch it was stated that a fisheries treaty was to be signed within a few days. That procedure took place in the United States. I understand eleven countries were represented, that Canada and Newfoundland are part of the set-up, and that this particular treaty deals with research. We are acting together in that field.

In Quebec and the maritime provinces fishing can be considered as one of the basic industries. I notice that section 22(2) states:

> Subject to this term, all fisheries laws and all orders, rules, and regulations made thereunder shall continue in force in the province of Newfoundland as if the union had not been made, for a period of five years from the date of union and thereafter until the parliament of Canada otherwise provides, and shall continue to be administered by the Newfoundland fisheries board; and the costs involved in the maintenance of the board and the administration of the fisheries laws shall be borne by the government of Canada.

While I am not sure of the accuracy of my information, I am informed that the fisheries board which regulates marketing in Newfoundland is representative of the fish dealers only, and that the industry is not represented thereon. I am further advised that the commission of government as such has no representatives on the board. If that kind of marketing arrangement is to continue for five years in Newfoundland, I think it is wrong. If my information is incorrect, I would ask the minister to give the correct information. If what I say is the fact, then surely this section should be rewritten.

My greatest concern, and the point about which I wish to be most specific, is the bounty now paid maritime fishermen. This is a fixed amount. If Newfoundland is now to be included in the bounty arrangement—and it would seem that it is—the result would be a reduction in the amount of money paid to Quebec and maritime fishermen. Surely it is time the Fisheries Act was amended to preclude any such results. For the benefit of members of the house, and fishermen generally, I believe an explanation as to the way the bounty was established might be in order. I am aware that most fishermen know very little about it and I confess that I did not myself until a few days ago. I am indebted to the Department of Fisheries for the information that I have received and I think it should be a matter of record.

This bounty to the fishermen is known as the Halifax award. It was established by the treaty of Washington which was entered into in 1871 between the United Kingdom and the United States. Under that treaty United States fishermen were permitted to take fish off the coast of the maritime provinces, Quebec and Newfoundland for a certain term of years. For that privilege the United States paid $5,500,000 to the British government. The British government then paid $1 million of the award to Newfoundland and $4,500,000 to Canada.

The Canadian payment was placed in the consolidated revenue fund and after $500,000 had been deducted as expenses the net amount of $4 million was recognized as the payment received by Canada for the grant of these fisheries concessions. In 1882 parliament made provision for an annual grant of $150,000 for the purposes noted in the act, and that sum was later raised to $160,000. It is from this grant that the annual fishing bounties have since been paid.

That summary is taken from the report of the royal commission on fisheries which sat in 1927, which report goes on to say:

> From the House of Commons debates of 1882 when the resolution upon which was founded the legislation of 1882 was passed, it is plain that this annual grant was regarded as the interest upon the amount of the Halifax Award.

As I said in the beginning, the amount of money available for the purposes of paying this annual bounty is now $160,000. Fishing is the largest single industry in Newfoundland, and if under this agreement all the Newfoundland fishermen are to be eligible for payments under that grant, and if no additional money is to be disbursed, it will mean that the grants to Quebec and the maritime fishermen will be cut down.

I suggest that our Fisheries Act should be amended in order that the amount of the grant may be increased so that grants now paid would not be cut down because of the Newfoundland fishermen coming under the provisions. I should like to ask the minister if the governor in council have not the necessary power under the regulations to increase this amount. The regulations are to be found in P.C. 5366 of 1947, section 14 of which reads:

> The amount of the bounty to be paid to fishermen and owners of boats and vessels will be fixed from time to time by the governor in council.

I am making these remarks in order to get a definite and specific answer from the minister. The fishing industry is very important to the whole of Canada and at the present time it is facing many difficulties. If we are to bring in another large group of fishermen then I think it is time the Canadian government began to pay more attention to this industry than has been paid in the past.

I want to give some credit to the Minister of Fisheries. He comes from the west coast and when he took office he had not had very much experience. Immediately after being appointed he took his duties quite seriously and made a trip across Canada and today I think he knows a great deal about the industry. I hope the cabinet will have just as serious views in connection with this basic industry as has the minister.

As in practically every industry, a fight is going on now in the fishing industry. It has reached the stage where mechanization is the order of the day. A struggle is going on between the shore fishermen and the trawlers which will have to be settled. I think it is the obligation of the government to view that particular angle very closely. The fishermen claim that the trawlers are depleting and destroying the industry. That is the assertion that has been made to me and if it is true it is the responsibility of the government to see that the industry is not destroyed.

The best methods will have to be found to perpetuate this industry because it is an important food industry and deserving of much more consideration than it has had in the past. With the bringing in of another large group of fishermen, with the fight that is going on between owners and fish dealers and those engaged in the industry, I think the time is ripe for a thorough examination of the whole question. I should like the minister to answer the questions I have posed.

Mr. Mayhew: Mr. Chairman, I shall not at this time attempt to answer the hon. member for Cape Breton South, but I shall start out by answering the question that was put to me last night by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am pleased indeed to have an opportunity to speak briefly about the Newfoundland fisheries.

As all hon. members well know, the fishing industry is the oldest industry on the island. But it is more than that; it is by far the most important industry. It is the most important, not necessarily because of the annual dollar value of its products but because of the number of people engaged in it directly and indirectly and because of the unique way in which it has affected the whole economy of Newfoundland and even the character of the Newfoundland people.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was quite right when he suggested that we in Canada might profit from the knowledge and experience of the Newfoundland fishing industry. To my mind, we stand to gain a great deal by coming into association with Newfoundland fishermen, shore workers and management in that industry.

I should like to pay a tribute to these magnificent people of Newfoundland. The Newfoundland fishermen come from a hardy race of men and by their courage and resourcefulness they have built up a long and honourable tradition of life on the sea. From generation to generation they have faced without question the challenge and the hazards of the sea; they have gone out in very small boats and battled the elements; they plied their perilous trade long before the advent of steam and other modern improvements and safeguards. In spite of the many obstacles they have had to overcome—and have overcome—they have forced their way into the markets of the world. They have succeeded, not only because of their initiative and courage but also because of their skill in the methods of processing and because of their attention to the quality of their products.

A comparison of the history of Ontario and Quebec and the history of Newfoundland would perhaps emphasize the contribution that fisheries has made to the heritage of the island. Here in the interior of Canada our forefathers cut down the forests, plowed and cultivated the land and reaped the harvests. Farming became the very backbone of our economy and was the determining factor in our social evolution.

Exactly the same thing occurred in Newfoundland, except that the sea took the place of the land. The harvests of the sea formed the substance of life for Newfoundlanders, and the life of the sea has left its impact on the character and the economy of the people.

The fishing industry is the one industry that has held Newfoundland together over the years. The sturdy fishermen have provided the island with the first line of defence from the very beginning. They are the real Newfoundlanders, and will make real Canadians. We should be proud to welcome these fellow Canadians.

I should like to quote, if I may, from a recent book entitled "Newfoundland", edited by Dr. R. A. MacKay. Dr. MacKay is well known in this city. The passage I wish to read is as follows:

> At least as early as the sixteenth century annual fishing voyages began from western Europe, the banks becoming as well known to the fishermen of the west of England, of Spain and Portugal, of Brittany and Normandy, as the Caribbean was to the fighting men of Spain. Proximity to the fisheries ultimately induced permanent settlement in Newfoundland, and determined its distribution about the coasts. The annual fishing voyages ceased with the Napoleonic wars, and the English fishing industry became resident on the island. The local economy which developed was pre-eminently a fishing economy. A merchant class concerned with the export of the fish and the import and distribution of supplies was established on the island, particularly about St. John's, which early became the commercial capital. The whole business life of the island developed around the fishery. Retail merchants branched out to become wholesalers as well as retailers, importers and exporters, insurance brokers and ship owners, bankers, and in more recent times manufacturers. Although conditions have changed greatly within the past half century, the stamp of the fishing industry still marks the economic and social life of the island.

For four centuries, up to 1900, the fishery was the only industry in Newfoundland of any real significance. In the period 1901 to 1905 the value of fishery exports amounted to just over $8 million out of total exports of $9·6 million. Later the pulp and paper industry, and mining, exceeded fishing in the value of exports; but as I intimated before, from the standpoint of the number of people engaged in the three industries, the number in fisheries has remained in first place.

The fishery of Newfoundland has always centred primarily around the dried-codfish trade. Generally speaking, "fish" to Newfoundlanders means "cod". Recently there has been a development in the fresh and frozen trade. This branch of the industry, however, has tended to supplement rather than to supplant the salted fish production. In addition, Newfoundland has important lobster, herring, seal, and whale fisheries.

There is a wide range in the types of dried salted fish produced, and in the requirements of the various foreign markets. Newfoundland ships fish to many markets in Europe and in the western hemisphere. The Mediterranean markets of Portugal, Spain, Italy and Greece have long been the principal markets for Newfoundland codfish. Substantial quantities are also sold in such markets as Brazil, the British West Indies, and other Caribbean countries.

Dried codfish is essentially a cheap source of the protein used in semi-tropical countries, and its keeping qualities give it a decided preference over other protein foods. The fact that markets for dried codfish are, for the most part, in countries in which a large part of the population exists on a very low standard of living, renders the industry somewhat susceptible to world economic conditions.

The development of the fishing industry in Newfoundland has not been one of continuous progress. Over the four centuries of its history there have been many ups and downs, and a number of remedies have been applied to bring about recovery. When the world economic depression struck in the early thirties, the economy of Newfoundland was unable to cope with the pressure exerted on it by falling markets for its principal export economy. In the period of 1926 to 1930 the codfishery yielded close to $13 million annually in value of exports, but from 1931 to 1935 the average was cut approximately in half to $6·4 million.

In the face of these conditions, in 1936 the commission of government established the Newfoundland fisheries board, and endowed it with wide powers over the production and marketing of salted codfish. This was a drastic change in tactics made necessary by drastic economic conditions. The board was given authority not usually vested in such an organization in a democratic country; but as I have said, the desperate plight of the fishing industry made such a step imperative.

As world conditions improved, the fishing industry, and indeed the whole economy of the island, began a slow recovery. The value of exports of fishery products, which stood at $6.9 million in 1937, rose to $8.1 million in 1940, and then rose sharply throughout the war to a peak of $33.8 million in 1946. In 1947 the Newfoundland association of fish exporters, NAFEL, was formed by the board. All exports from the island are now controlled by this association.

This has been but a brief survey, Mr. Speaker, of the Newfoundland fisheries. I am sure you would not expect more from me at the present time, although it would be very profitable to anyone to read the many books and articles that can be found in the library.

Before answering the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), I should like for a minute to give a brief outline of the method by which the fisheries committee proceeded with its part of the program of bringing about union. It was felt that any time you tackled the fishing industry you were tackling a very live nerve centre in the whole economy of both countries. Therefore it had to be dealt with in a spirit of good will on both sides. When the committee was set up, I asked them to come to my office. Mr. Walsh was the chairman of that committee. He and his associates visited the office, and with the departmental officials we sat down to consider the problems before us. Before proceeding I suggested to him that we would not consider them in the manner of horse traders. I said that I realized they were here to do a job—to negotiate—a job which they would want to live with, not only in the immediate future, but for years to come. I asked them to look upon us in the same way. I assure you that this was the spirit in which we approached the whole problem.

At the beginning I suggested to them that we all knew, facing each other as we did, that there was one problem about which there would be some difficulty, and that was the fisheries board and NAFEL. At that time I intimated to them I had had some experience in the splitting of wood, and had found it was very desirable to put a wedge in at the knot to open it up, and that the rest of the block would then fall apart in an easy and fairly reasonable way. That is exactly what we did. We started immediately to discuss the things that we knew were going to be hurdles, and somewhat difficult to get over.

After spending two or three hours in exchanging views on this matter, we proceeded by way of memorandum. We were given a list of questions which the delegates wanted us to answer. We answered these questions and then discussed our answers in another meeting. After various meetings, by a process of elimination, we finally reached a list of understandings which will be found in this pamphlet. I believe all hon. members have a copy of the pamphlet, and they will find the questions on page 8. These were the questions this committee was finally able to submit to a committee of the cabinet and of which we were finally able to get approval. These questions then found their way into the pamphlet which we have before us. I want to show that never at any time were there any harsh words. At all times the matter was viewed in a reasonable and business-like way and we are very pleased with the results.

Some of the questions which were asked this afternoon have to do primarily with our own position, and the fight between trawlers and shore fishermen. I think those questions can quite easily be left to be dealt with when our estimates are under discussion.

A question was raised about the fisheries board. The fisheries board was set up in 1936 by the commission. It is composed of a chairman and two members. This board has fairly wide powers, I will grant you. In 1947 a company was set up known as NAFEL, which is an exporting company.

Mr. Knowles: What is that word?

Mr. Mayhew: NAFEL, a Newfoundland association of fish exporters. We are not getting all the privileges that were originally given the company. We agreed to let them retain the export market for salt fish only, which will amount to about $14 or $15 million a year, depending of course on market conditions. NAFEL has nothing to do with the rest of the fishing industry.

From the various departments we are taking over the freezing facilities, the inspection service and the research department, incorporating these into the federal system of fish management.

I believe I have answered all the questions except the one concerning the bounty. Please do not ask me to give the dates in connection with this question, because I do not remember them. In substance, however, the Newfoundland people received a million dollars as their share of the bounty; that was considered as their reward. The matter of sharing the $160,000 a year with the fishermen of Newfoundland was not discussed during the conference. It will be divided therefore, as it always has been divided, between the maritime fishermen.

Mr. Gillis: Am I to understand, then, that this $160,000 which I understand is interest on the original $4 million grant Canada received, will continue to be distributed between the Quebec and maritime fishermen? The Newfoundland fishermen will not share in that sum until such time as there are other arrangements.

Mr. Mayhew: That is my understanding, and it was not discussed at any other meeting.

Mr. Baker: As I am interested in seeing this union between Newfoundland and Canada go through, and I do not want to do anything that may impede it, I shall be very brief. Taking the long view, this union will be of strategic, economic and social advantage to both Newfoundland and Canada. Dealing specifically with fisheries, I know the union will prove to be mutually beneficial. True, the salt fish industry in Newfoundland is going to be, so to speak, on its own, to a certain extent for five years, but that is quite understandable. It takes a certain amount of time to adjust these things.

There has been an historical association between the fishermen of Newfoundland and the fishermen of our great province of Nova Scotia. Many of the Newfoundland fishermen have fished out of Nova Scotia's ports, and particularly out of the home port of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, Lunenburg. These men are well known to us all. There is one point I should like to mention and that is that, as a result of Canada and Newfoundland coming together, the hand of the Minister of Fisheries will be strengthened. We all realize the fine job he is doing. I think this union will help him because it is going to make the fishing industry a very large industry. Few people realize it is an industry that brings in a large volume of United States dollars. It is an industry that is growing.

The Louisburg project is one example of the co-operation between the federal government and Nova Scotia on behalf of the industry. With Newfoundland becoming a tenth province of Canada, we may some day be able to establish a continental shelf, which I think is of the utmost importance.

Now I bring up my perennial story. The stronger the claims of the fishermen become, and the claims of seafaring people in general, the greater the opportunity of having some sort of coastguard system, perhaps not exactly the same as the one the United States set up. I believe this union will help strengthen our request for such a system. There may be some difficulties during the period of transition but I am sure, taking the long-range view, this union will prove to be beneficial to Canada, Newfoundland and the maritime provinces in particular.

Mr. Archibald: I should like to ask the minister about this Newfoundland association which has control over the export of fish. If an individual desired to set up a business for the export of fish, would he have to pay a fee of $10,000 in order to belong to that association?

Mr. Mayhew: My understanding is, and I think I am right, that the regular fee for joining NAFEL is $10,000. Four or five men may get together and take out one membership. A person who has fish to export may ask a member of the association, and there are in all some 43 members in NAFEL, to sell his fish for him. It will be sold for a commission of from 3 to 5 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: I want to thank the minister for the trouble he has taken in replying at length to the question I asked last night. This is a subject in which the people concerned are keenly interested. Some hon. members may wonder why I should be interested in the subject, since I come from the centre of the continent. I suppose it is partly due to the fact that, as a child, I was brought up on stories of my Nova Scotian ancestors who had gone fishing on the grand banks. I dared to hope when I asked the question last night that the permission to Newfoundland to retain their present set-up, at least in part, for five years, was a concession to the fishermen themselves, the men who actually do the work. But after listening to the minister's description of the set-up today, particularly in view of his answer to the question just put to him by the hon. member for Skeena, it looks to me as though it is the old story: it is a concession not to the men who do the work but to a privileged few. In the beginning the set-up sounded good, in that the marketing and export of fish were under the direction and control of a state fisheries board. Had it stopped there, one might have said "hear, hear." But, lo and behold! that board seems to have turned over all its rights and privileges to a fishing association, which is a fairly select group, if it is true that there is a fee of $10,000. If that is the situation, I hope that the department will get out of it any advantages there are. But I also hope that, in the interests of the men who do the work, modifications of this set-up will be made as quickly as possible.

Mr. Archibald: Can that fishing association do what the fisheries council of Canada did with the west coast co-operatives, namely, turn down on political grounds an application for membership?

Mr. Mayhew: I do not think I should be expected to answer that question. There seems to be in the minds of a few of the members an impression about which I think I should say something, and it will take me only a minute or two. They seem to think that the coming in of Newfoundland and the bringing in of another $30 million or $35 million of business will in some way affect the industry in the maritime provinces. As a matter of fact, there will be no more fish for sale by reason of Newfoundland coming in than there would be if she stayed out. Both countries will be doing business in the same markets. I believe one will strengthen the other in looking for markets, and that both will be able to go after business together in a better way than would be possible separately.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): In the event of a maritime fisherman finding it to his advantage to take his fish to Newfoundland, would he be entitled to sell his fish through NAFEL? Or conversely, would a Newfoundland fisherman be able to bring his fish to the maritimes and sell it through NAFEL? I refer to codfish.

Mr. Mayhew: That is salt fish. The answer is no.

Mr. MacInnis: I quite agree with the point the minister has made, that bringing Newfoundland into confederation does not increase in any way the world fish supply or the North American fish supply. The fish supply is much the same as it was before; that is, the production of Newfoundland as a dominion and the production of the maritime-province section of this dominion will be much the same after confederation as before. But it may affect the maritime fishermen if the assistance given to the fisheries board, or to the organization that has been set up by the fisheries board—which, as has been mentioned, is a purely big-business commercial organization—will give the board a greater advantage in the markets of the world than the Canadian fishermen have under production conditions in Canada, where better labour conditions prevail—conditions which are none too good but perhaps better than they are in Newfoundland. That is the point I wish to make. I think we should be satisfied here, because of the understanding that the dominion government is to pay the costs of the fisheries board for the next five years.

Mr. Mayhew: We are paying only the deficit. I do not think there is any difference in the opportunity that Newfoundland has. I do not think the people are in any better position than we are in the maritime provinces at the present time. They operate some boats of their own between Newfoundland and the West Indies and have enjoyed that market right along. I expect they will continue to do so. Those boats will be taken over by the Department of Transport. There is in Newfoundland a bait-freezing service which I think is a better one than we have in Canada. We shall have to do something to improve ours so that it will be equal to Newfoundland's.

Mr. MacInnis: The minister said that, according to the terms of the agreement, Canada was undertaking to pay only the deficit in the administration of the Newfoundland fisheries board. Is that the statement the minister made? Before he answers, I may say that is not the way I read it in subsection 2 of term 22, which reads as follows:

> Subject to this term, all fisheries laws and all orders, rules and regulations made thereunder shall continue in force in the province of Newfoundland as if the union had not been made, for a period of five years from the date of union and thereafter until the parliament of Canada otherwise provides, and shall continue to be administered by the Newfoundland fisheries board; and the costs involved in the maintenance of the board and the administration of the fisheries laws shall be borne by the government of Canada.

This subsection does not say anything about assuming responsibility for the deficit only.

Mr. Mayhew: There is in the hon. member's mind a little bit of confusion between the board and NAFEL. The board will be considered part of our official organization, will be treated the same as are our officials, and will be paid by the government.

Newfoundland

Mr. MacInnis: Part of the Department of Fisheries of Canada?

Mr. Mayhew: Yes.

Mr. Isnor: I think there is one point we should bear in mind with regard to this five-year period. As I understand, the Newfoundland fisheries board will operate as a federal agency under the control of the governor in council. If I am correct in that, it does away with some of the worries that the hon. member opposite has in regard to its operation. But I take a wider view of awards than did the hon. member for Cape Breton South, because that Halifax award applies largely to the inshore fishermen. He also raised the question as to the operation of the fishing industry. I think Canada and Newfoundland, or the maritime provinces including Quebec, will be in an exceptionally fortunate position having regard to the future fishing industry of the world. We certainly will be able to take care of a population of 160 million, or all the consumers on the north American continent. In this fisheries development, we should take a long-range view not only of the benefits to Newfoundland, the new province, but of the effect it will have on our Canadian fishing industry. I for one welcome the thought that we are going to be able to join our forces and export in still larger quantities than ever before. I do not expect any trouble between the maritime provinces and Newfoundland in regard to regulations, because they have already shown a willingness to co-operate in developing new and more extensive markets.

May I say a word about the trawler? A number of years ago I was drawn into the trawler question. In fact I was almost crucified by certain groups and papers in the maritimes, but I am just as firmly convinced today as I was when I took my stand, in 1938, if I remember rightly, that the fishing trawler is necessary if we are to develop a large export market. You cannot sell in small quantities in a profitable way. It is all right for the inshore fishermen. I am familiar with the inshore fishermen. In the summer months I live right next door to them. I am friendly with them and am anxious to see them prosper, but they can only prosper by developing and holding a market in central Canada and in foreign countries. Therefore the trawler is necessary. A continuity of supply must be maintained if we are to continue in any developed market. Because of that, I am sure that those who say the trawler must be done away with are unfamiliar with this important question.

I quite agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South that there are differences of opinion in the matter. There are those who say that if you allow the unrestricted use of the trawler it will destroy our fishing grounds. I wish to point out that today the fishing banks of Canada and Newfoundland are quite close. We have an advantage over the United States fishermen. As I said a moment ago, we must continue to operate the fishing trawler if we are to bring in large quantities of fish, process them and ship them to export markets, and in that way bring additional money to this country, which we as a progressive people are seeking. We are seeking increased export markets.
