The residents of southern Alberta have been marking time for many years waiting for irrigation. We have two projects that affect Medicine Hat in particular; the St. Mary-Milk river project and the Bow river development project, which is more familiarly known as the Canada Land and Irrigation project. Before discussing irrigation further, I want to say that, after listening to the right hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) this afternoon, it seems to me it should not be necessary for me to take up any time in this house discussing this subject. After all he told us about what the Liberals had done—

An hon. Member: Twenty-five years ago.

Mr. Wylie: Perhaps it was twenty-five years ago, because we have discussed irrigation for twenty-five years, and if we leave the present Liberal government in power we will be discussing it for another twenty-five years. After listening to that speech this afternoon one would think the Liberals had done almost everything necessary to satisfy every community in western Canada. Certainly they have forgotten many parts of the west.

Mr. Thatcher: Particularly Moose Jaw.

Mr. Wylie: We are not just sure where that is. The speech of the minister this afternoon would lead one to believe that all the farmers were satisfied and that no one had any complaints. That is not the case. In southeastern Alberta, where we need irrigation, the farmers have plenty on their minds. I want to refer for a moment to the Meek report, published back in 1942, which made this finding:

That Canada should construct at an early date the necessary irrigation works to protect by beneficial use its share of the St. Mary and Milk rivers.

I realize the government has made a start on a dam there, but it is a long way from completion and we in that area will not consider that project finished until we have water from that dam running through the city of Medicine Hat. The report goes on:

That there is tributary to the St. Mary and Milk rivers a larger area of good irrigable land than can be irrigated by the total water available from Canada's share of these rivers supplemented by waters of the Belly and Waterton rivers.

That upon the completion of the ultimate development a total of 345,000 acres would be available for post-war settlement and for the re-establishment of many farmers at present on submarginal lands.

How true that is. A short time ago I said that residents of that area have been marking time for many years waiting for the government to do something in the way of irrigation. Today we have many farmers who are ready and willing to settle on irrigated land. Then let me read another section of the report:

That with irrigation, soil and climatic conditions in southern Alberta are highly favourable for the production of livestock and for growing forage crops, sugar beets, corn, and a wide variety of specialty crops.

That the stabilized agriculture and increased production resulting from further irrigation development in southern Alberta would provide for permanent home building, for a higher standard of living, and for improved social advantages and educational facilities.

I think we all realize that is the case. It must be remembered there is never adequate moisture to assure even a good grain crop in the dry areas of southeastern Alberta. The annual average precipitation in that area is 12·70 inches. The average rainfall for the two vital growing months of July and August is only 2·8 inches. Root crops require a great deal more moisture than grain. Further factual data is available to show that the land with which we are concerned is rich in protein-giving elements and capable of greater production if properly irrigated than the irrigated lands in many other parts of the west. I think that is a well-known fact.

In the years in which we have some rain, I could not say sufficient rain, we can grow crops. We can grow wheat in that area with less moisture than is needed in many parts of western Canada. I might add to that by saying that the wheat in that area is of better quality than in many parts of the west. In that area we also have from a minimum of ninety days to as high as one hundred and forty days wholly free from frost, and that is another matter which must be taken into consideration when planning for irrigation.

Mr. Johnston: The Minister of Agriculture takes credit for that.

Mr. Wylie: Perhaps he does, but when he goes out west I do not think he is so hot that he stops the frost. Irrigation would bring diversified agriculture, which is so essential to any community's prosperity. It would cushion the shock of any business recession which we hear so many people predicting is now on its way. It would reduce the cost of living by providing products now imported over long hauls. After listening to some of the discussions on freight rates, I think that is a very important point. Many of these products could be produced right at home.

It would give stability by establishing new enterprises which were not so dependent on generally prosperous business conditions throughout the country. It is wasteful and shortsighted economics to allow these south-eastern lands to remain undeveloped. It was Herbert Hoover who once said:

> Every drop of water that runs to the sea without rendering a commercial return is a public waste.

I think that is a statement of which the Minister of Agriculture should take note, especially after the speech he made this afternoon. There are several good reasons why the government should give serious consideration to completing the Bow river extension with as little delay as possible.

The provincial government completed the agreement between the province and The Canada Land and Irrigation Company over various lands in the area affected. The main ditch has been completed over its entire course to Redcliff. A lot of people do not realize that fact when irrigation projects are being discussed. It will cost less to complete that project than to complete any other project in western Canada under consideration at the present time.

On motion of Mr. Wylie the debate was adjourned.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO SPEECH OF MR. GARDINER ON FEBRUARY 22

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, I wish to rise on a question of privilege. This afternoon I was quite unavoidably absent when the right hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) spoke. I am told he gave a typically inaccurate account of certain events which transpired when his government was defeated at the polls in Saskatchewan in 1929. I understand he charged that I supported the entry into a coalition government of the Progressive and independent members of the legislature under the late Dr. Anderson.

Not only did I not support it, but I opposed it vehemently and strenuously because I disagreed with the type of campaign conducted by Dr. Anderson and his friends. The Progressive party was disbanded when two of its elected representatives entered the government against my advice and that of the other members of the executive. I immediately assisted in the formation of labour and farmer groups which culminated in the C.C.F. party in 1932.

By one of those coincidences that sometimes occur, I received a letter last Wednesday from Dr. Hugh MacLean, a very respected citizen of Regina, now retired and living in Los Angeles, in which he reminds me of the true and quite different story. He speaks of a certain person, who shall be nameless. He says:

> —the henchman who approached me when I wrote him (the present Minister of Agriculture) that he would have to retract his statement in which he denies that anyone had gone to you at his request after the election of 1929 and offered you a position in his government if you could prevail upon the progressives to support him. I insisted that his statement to the press would have to satisfy me and you, else I would tell the whole story.

The statement admitting the facts was given to the press by the minister in the form of a letter. Somewhere, I have an original of that letter. The minister's statement this afternoon is absolutely incorrect for I was bitterly opposed to the Ku Klux Klan and its activities, as were many of my friends. As a matter of fact and record, my advice to the Progressive members was to remain independent and support all good legislation. They did not heed my advice.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the acting leader of the government what the order of business will be for tomorrow?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We shall continue this debate.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on February 22, 1949.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 23, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What is the total amount of prairie farm assistance payments that have been made or have been passed on favourably or accepted in each of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba during the year 1948?

2. In how many cases have requests or applications for payment been denied in each of the said provinces?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. Manitoba, $43,173.75; Saskatchewan, $11,112,671.50; Alberta, $1,637,306.25.

2. Manitoba: 37 townships applied for; 19 found to be ineligible. Saskatchewan: 1592 townships applied for; 249 found to be ineligible. Alberta: 715 townships applied for; 337 found to be ineligible.

HOUSING—CONTRACT TO BOW RIVER CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Mr. Johnston:

1. When was the contract or contracts let for the construction of forty houses under N.H.A. to the Bow River Construction Company of Calgary, Alberta?

2. Who approved the plans and specifications for this contract?

3. Who approved the contractor or contractors for this project?

4. What were the qualifications of these contractors as to building experience and as to financial ability to complete the job?

Mr. Winters:

1. No contract for the construction of houses in Calgary has been let to the Bow River Construction Company by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The company planned to build houses for sale to prospective home owners. The houses were to be constructed on the company's own account and therefore no contract for the construction of houses was involved. However, as it was intended to finance the project under the National Housing Act, the company entered into two agreements with the corporation pursuant to section 4B of the National Housing Act. These agreements provided that:—

(a) The company would finance the construction of the houses it planned to build under the provisions of the National Housing Act.

(b) The company would construct the houses for sale at a price not in excess of a price fixed in the agreement.

(c) The corporation would purchase from the company on the expiration of a fixed period after the date of completion, and at a price fixed in the agreement, any house built pursuant to the agreement that remained unsold.

(d) The houses were to be offered for sale in the first instance to veterans.

The agreements mentioned above were dated July 25th, 1947, and November 4th, 1947. All such agreements entered into pursuant to section 4B of the National Housing Act are known as integrated housing agreements and the plan as "The Integrated Housing Plan".

2. The Bow River Construction Company of Calgary obtained mortgage financing in respect of the houses built under the above-mentioned agreements under the National Housing Act, see (a) above, through the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company. The plans and specifications were approved by the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as joint mortgagees.

3. The Bow River Construction Company of Calgary was approved as a borrower under the National Housing Act by the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as joint mortgagees.

4. Reports obtained on the Bow River Construction Company at the time the Integrated Housing agreements and the National Housing Act loans were approved indicated that the company was in a sound financial position and would be able to carry the project to a successful conclusion.

Questions

IRRIGATION—PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. Probe:

1. What is the estimated number of acres of land in each of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba that have been supplied with potential irrigation through water storage by P.F.R.A. since its inception?
2. What estimated acreages in each of the above provinces have had irrigation facilities authorized to date which are not finally completed?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. Alberta, 123,097; Saskatchewan, 110,461; Manitoba, 656·5.

2. Alberta, 527,500; Saskatchewan, 18,000; Manitoba, 120.

Includes 500,000 acres at the St. Mary-Milk river project where reservoir and main canal construction is now in progress.

MONTREAL-COCHRANE RAILWAY SERVICE

Mr. Caouette:

1. Have any requests been made to the Department of Transport concerning the improvement of the railroad, passenger trains and the railway service between Montreal and Cochrane, via Abitibi?
2. If so, from whom and when?
3. Has any action been taken by the department in this connection and what steps are being taken to make such improvements?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The board of transport commissioners advise that since early last year the board has been dealing with the C.N.R. regarding the conditions in this area, that certain improvements recommended have been effected, and that the situation is being given further study by the board with the object of bringing about satisfactory railway conditions to cope with the rapid development throughout this section of the country.

INCREASES IN FREIGHT RATES

Mrs. Strum:

1. On what date in 1948 were the first increases in freight rates officially authorized?
2. What other increases have taken place since then?
3. What categories do these increases cover?
4. What items are included in express charge increases, and increases in passenger rates on Pullman sleeping car accommodation?
5. What dates did these increases occur?
6. What was the amount of increase in each case?
7. On whose authority were these increases permitted?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. In 1948 the first and only general freight rate increase was authorized on March 30, 1948, by the board of transport commissioners. The tariffs affected were "standard" and "special."

2. No other increases which required the prior authorization of the board of transport commissioners. The railways, however, are constantly adjusting their tariffs filed with the board pursuant to the Railway Act to meet changing conditions.

3. Answered by 2.

4. (a) Some express rates to meet competition of highway transport were increased on September 15, 1948, and cover a large variety of commodities.

(b) Sleeping and parlour car fares.

5. (a) Answered by 4 (a).

(b) January 15, 1949.

6. (a) 15 per cent.

(b) Approximately 25 per cent.

7. No authority was required. Such rates and fares are lower than the "standard" rates and fares and, therefore, were filed in accordance with the provisions of sections 332 and 335 of the Railway Act.

Note: Adjustments have been made wherever possible to place the taxation figures on a calendar year basis and to make them consistent with other national income data. DEVALUATION OF THE CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Cockeram:

Is the government prepared to give early consideration and decision to (a) allowing the Canadian dollar to find its own level in relation to other currencies; (b) devaluing the Canadian dollar in accordance with the Bretton Woods agreement?

Mr. Belzile: It is not customary to forecast policy in giving answers to questions on the order paper.

The government's policy in regard to exchange and monetary matters has been stated from time to time in the House of Commons.

TORONTO DISTRICT—STEAM SUBURBAN SERVICE

Mr. Church:

What has been done since the last session of the house to give the Toronto district a steam suburban service by both railways, similar to that afforded Montreal and suburbs?

Mr. Chevrier:

In so far as the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada is concerned there have been no further developments regarding the Toronto suburban service situation since the last session.

An answer appearing in Hansard of February 18, 1948, pointed out that over the lines of the Canadian National Railways commutation fares were available as follows:

(a) between Toronto and Oakville and intermediate points,

(b) between Toronto and Weston and intermediate points,

(c) between Toronto and Port Union and intermediate points,

(d) between Toronto and Downsview and intermediate points.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—FARM LOANS—SLUM CLEARANCE, ETC.

Mr. Nicholson:

1. How many applications for farm loans have been received under the National Housing Act?

2. How many farm houses for which loans have been approved were completed by December 31, 1948?

3. In what areas have grants for slum clearance been approved?

4. How much money has been appropriated for slum clearing projects?

5. In what centres have land assembly projects been approved under the N.H.A.?

6. How many lots will be developed in each project?

Questions

7. What financial obligations have been made in connection with each project?
8. How many limited dividend companies have applied for loans for the construction of low rental housing?
9. How many units have been completed?
10. What has been the average cost per unit?
11. How many applications for housing loans to co-operatives have been approved?
12. What is the average loan per unit?

Mr. Winters:

1. To date 12 applications for farm housing loans have been received by this corporation.

2. One farm house financed under the National Housing Act, 1944, was completed by December 31, 1948.

3. To date one grant for slum clearance has been approved under the provisions of section 12 of the National Housing Act, the project being Regent Park (North) located in the city of Toronto.

4. Section 12(4) provides for statutory appropriation in the amount of $20 million. The grant for slum clearance in connection with the Regent Park project mentioned above will be $1,150,000.

5. Under the provisions of section 11B of the National Housing Act, land assembly projects have been approved in Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Burlington, St. Boniface, Edmonton and Vancouver.

Location	Name of project	No. of lots provided
Montreal—
	Mount Royal Gardens	147
Ottawa—
	Nepean Township	91
Toronto —
	Yorkminster	403
	Bathurst-Lawrence	650
Burlington—
	Orchard Park	154
St. Boniface—
	Norwood Golf Club	206
Edmonton—
	Parkdale	35
Vancouver—
	Hastings Townsite	96
	Total	1,822

7. Under the provisions of section 11B of the National Housing Act, the corporation guarantees a lending institution sponsoring a land assembly project a return from the sale of lots equal to the lending institution's total investment plus 2 per cent interest. The estimated total investment by lending institutions now stands at $2,201,495. In the two projects completed to date the revenue from the sale of lots has been sufficient to provide the necessary return to the sponsor plus a small balance to the corporation.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

8. Seventeen limited dividend companies (or companies which were prepared to set up limited dividend companies) have applied for loans under section 9 of the National Housing Act.

9. 3,689 units have been completed under section 9 of the National Housing Act.

10. This information is not available as loans made under the provisions of section 9 of the act are based on lending values and not on costs.

11. None.

12. See answer to number 11.

Sixty-two outlets were established and are now in operation. The balance of this sum was expended on normal travel incurred in the United States in connection with national film board theatrical, non-theatrical and television distribution.

United Kingdom—$934.96—Part of this amount was traveling expenses of a visit to the United Kingdom in May and June by the director of distribution on a liaison visit to inspect distribution services. The balance was traveling expenses of distribution officers in connection with servicing Canadian missions in the United Kingdom and maintaining distribution outlets.

France—$764.14—This amount was spent on visits of the director of distribution and London distribution officer in connection with contacting film representatives of the French government and developing commercial outlets for national film board productions.

GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCTION—PRICE LEVELS AND PRODUCTIVITY

Mr. Coldwell:

1. In arriving at the forecast of the gross national production for 1949 given to the house by the Prime Minister on January 28, 1949, what percentage increase in the price levels was taken into account, and what percentage increase in productivity was taken into account?

3. What is the government's forecast of investment income in Canada for 1949?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. The estimate of gross national production for 1949 takes into account an over-all price level about 5 per cent higher on the average in 1949 than in 1948. At the end of 1948 prices were almost 4 per cent above the average level during 1948. Thus the estimate assumes a very slight further rise in the general price level.

Allowance was made for an over-all improvement in productivity of 2 per cent.

2. The estimate of investment income in Canada for 1948 is $2·6 billion.

3. The estimate of investment income in Canada for 1949 is $2·65 billion.

1. (a) Statistics on fatal accidents are compiled by the dominion bureau of statistics, through the co-operation of the provincial vital statistics departments, from death registrations, on which the cause of death is certified by the coroner, attending physician, or other medical authority. All deaths where an accident was involved are classified according to the international list of causes of death and in addition to other cross-classifications are tabulated by sex and place of accident (whether in the home or in industry).

(b) In addition, each steam and electric railway reports annually to the dominion bureau of statistics, accidents in which the railway is involved and in which persons are killed or injured. The form on which these accidents are reported shows the number of persons killed or injured at (1) level crossings, (2) in which motor vehicles are involved, and (3) other headings not pertinent to this question. The dominion bureau of statistics also collects motor vehicle accident statistics from the authorities in each province having jurisdiction over such statistics. These show the number of persons killed or injured in motor vehicle accidents.

For a copy of all agreements for sale and all tenders made by prospective purchasers in respect of Veterans Land Act sales made in the township of Sarnia during the calendar years of 1948 and 1949, where such sales were made to veterans or to others upon special conditions.

Mr. Gregg: As no sales under special conditions have been made to veterans or others during the calendar years 1948 and 1949, the return to this proposed order would be nil. We have explained to the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) the position with regard to pending sales, and perhaps he would agree to withdraw his motion and reword it.

FRASER RIVER BOARD

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all reports submitted to any minister or agency of the federal government by the Fraser river board since its inception.

TRADE WITH BRITAIN

QUESTION AS TO REDUCTION OF TARIFFS, ABOLITION OF EXCISE TAXES, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the government. In view of Sir Stafford Cripps' statement to the Canadian Press yesterday, that British purchases of agricultural and other products must be dependent upon Canada's willingness to purchase more goods in the United Kingdom and the sterling areas, will the government make an early statement of policy in regard to the lowering of tariffs, the abolition of excise taxes, the making of application by Canada to remove our obligations under the non-discriminatory clauses of the Geneva agreement, or any other means to improve our trading prospects with Great Britain? I realize that some of these questions may be considered to be budgetary in character, but there may be some other means which the government may adopt, including the removal of our obligations under the non-discriminatory clauses.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall bring the hon. member's question to the attention of my colleagues and endeavour to have an answer for him as soon as possible.

CHINA

POSITION OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES—TREATMENT OF MISSIONARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, in view of the growing concern over religious persecutions behind the iron curtain, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is prompted by the anxiety which prevails in many parts of Canada with respect to the situation in China.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Ask the question.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker, perhaps—

An hon. Member: Don't make a speech.

Mr. Graydon: If I am to seek advice on questions of procedure I will not seek it from the hon. member who interrupts. There is a great deal at stake, both spiritually and materially, affecting the Christian churches in China.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to ask whether, with the information it now possesses, the government feels that the work of Christian churches in China will be permitted to proceed, having regard to the internal changes which have occurred in that country.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member for Peel was good enough to give me advance notice of his question. In reply all I can say is that it is very difficult in the circumstances that now exist in a large part of China to know whether missionary activities as they have been undertaken in the past will be permitted in the future under the new regime.

The government has had some reports, both official and non-official, from the communist-controlled areas in China concerning the treatment of missionaries there, and also as to the conditions under which they are being permitted to carry on their work. These reports are not conclusive; in fact in some respects they are contradictory. Therefore I think it will be some time before we know how effectively missionaries will be able to work in those parts of China now controlled by the communists.

It might be of some interest to the house if I went on to state in a few words the steps that we have been taking in the last few months to look after the interests of Canadians, including Canadian missionaries in China.

As hon. members may know, there are about 850 Canadians in China at the present time, more than half of whom are in areas outside communist control. As the scope of the civil war in China increased and moved south to the Yangtze river it became necessary in our opinion to get in touch with Canadian missionaries, and other Canadians in the areas north of the Yangtze, to see what we could do to assist them in the emergency which had developed.

For that purpose, as early as January, 1948, Canadian missionaries were advised by the Canadian ambassador that it might become increasingly difficult for them to work in the areas north of the Yangtze and east of the western border of Hupeh, and that consequently they might think it best to withdraw, at least temporarily, from these areas. On November 1 the warning, if you like to call it a warning, was repeated by British consular authorities, and the Canadian embassy associated itself with it. Similarly towards the end of November advice was again given to Canadians in that area to withdraw. Many of them followed the advice and returned to Canada.

Eighty Canadians, who were anxious to return and who had not other available means of transport at the time, were assisted by the Canadian government by the provision of air transport. Apparently about 600 Canadians remain in the areas of China not under communist control, there being about 300 in west China and 150 in south China. This number includes a great many missionaries, and the embassy has kept in touch with them in order to render all possible assistance should they find it necessary to leave. The wives and children of our own Canadian officials, and the female staff, have already been evacuated from Nanking where conditions are not very satisfactory at the moment. The ambassador and the male staff, however, have remained at their posts in Nanking, and will remain there as long as it is possible for them to work there, so as to protect the interests of Canadians to the best of their ability.

IMMIGRATION AND MEDICAL INSPECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Following the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. Has the immigration department more than one immigration inspection and medical inspection office in China. It has one in Hong Kong, but is there any other?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): I am not fully informed, but I believe there is only one at the present time.

IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

RELAXATION OF CONTROLS ON IMPORTATION FROM THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It is based upon letters which I have received in the last day or two from automobile dealers. Can the government give any indication as to the easing of the prohibited list of imports from the United States, particularly American-made automobiles, refrigerators and other such manufactured goods?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I have said on numerous occasions that the import restrictions which were imposed a little over a year ago will be relaxed from time to time as our exchange position justifies such action. It is not the sort of thing, however, as to which it would ever be desirable or appropriate for me to give advance notice.

SHIPBUILDING

WEST COAST—REPORTED STATEMENT OF MAYOR OF VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Press dispatches today from Vancouver indicate that the mayor of that city announced, after an interview with the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), that the dominion government would preserve shipbuilding on the west coast even if it had to subsidize. Can the minister tell us whether that is a correct statement of the policy of the government?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have not seen the statement made by the mayor of Vancouver, but I doubt very much whether my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, had conveyed information to him that it was the intention of the government to subsidize shipbuilding. I can say that I know of no proposal to subsidize directly the shipbuilding or ship-operating industries, and I have no intention of so recommending to the government. As the hon. member knows, the speech from the throne contains a reference to the government's intention to assist the shipbuilding, and ship-operating industries, and legislation to that end is now under consideration.

SALE OF SHIPS UNDER AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND SHIP OPERATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. A certain amount of money has been put in escrow from the sale of ships that were sold under agreement. Is it the intention of the government to use that money in the immediate future for the replacement of some of the ships that were sold?

Mr. Chevrier: The agreement entered into between the government and the ship operators disposing of their ships provides that they must build within a period of five years. There is a further provision in the agreement by which an extension may be obtained, but the understanding is that when the money is paid in escrow it remains in the hands of the government, and it is for the express purpose of building in Canadian yards, and providing work in the shipyards for Canadian labour.

Mr. Rodney Young (Vancouver Centre): In view of the answer given by the Minister of Transport to the question of the member for Vancouver East, will the minister assure the house that everything will be done to expedite the building of the ships rather than allowing the period of five years to elapse that is provided for in the agreement? I ask the question because of the unemployment situation in Vancouver.

Mr. Chevrier: The question seems to be one which might well be put on the order paper. In any event the agreement is there, and it stipulates the time. I can assure my hon. friend that it is the policy of the government to assist to the fullest possible extent the shipbuilding industry, the ship-operating industry, and the Canadian mercantile fleet.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN VANCOUVER—PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FISHERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): There is a further question, arising out of the press dispatch to which I referred earlier, that I should like to direct to the Minister of Labour. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) is quoted as having disclosed in Vancouver that there are between 35,000 and 40,000 unemployed in Vancouver, 7,000 in New Westminster, 3,500 in Victoria and 2,000 more in Nanaimo. Can the Minister of Labour tell us whether his department is taking any steps to meet the situation?

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): Like my hon. friend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), I have not read the newspaper report. A check is being made by my department at the moment in connection with the situation in Vancouver.

Mr. Green: Will the minister make an announcement before the end of the week?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member may rest assured that as soon as I get a report I will make an announcement.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

RETENTION OF INSURABILITY BY SKILLED TRADESMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is consideration being given to the taking of steps to make it possible for skilled tradesmen, such as carpenters and bricklayers, employed at their trades by the federal Department of Agriculture, to retain their insurability under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The answer is yes; the matter is under study.

Mr. Irvine: I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Is he in a position to indicate the procedure to be followed by tradesmen working for the Department of Agriculture to protect their unemployment insurance?

Mr. Mitchell: I do not think I can add anything to the reply I gave the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that at present this matter is under what I might call serious consideration.

Mr. Knowles: That is good.

COARSE GRAINS

INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE WITH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce—I notice that the minister is not in his seat. In view of the conclusion last Monday of the conference on coarse grains between the federal government, provincial governments, and the Canadian federation of agriculture, can the minister indicate when he will give a statement to the house as to what was accomplished, and what decisions were reached?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Perhaps I might take the question as notice, and treat it as a request to the minister to make a statement.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

QUESTION AS TO SALE OF PORTIONS OF LAND PURCHASED UNDER VETERANS LAND ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): On February 16 I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs a question as to a veteran being allowed to sell part of his small holding. At that time the minister said the matter had not been decided. Can he say now whether further consideration has been given this question?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I cannot add anything to what I said the other day.

TORONTO

REQUEST FOR STEAM SUBURBAN SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I want to refer the minister of reconstruction to the question I asked about steam suburban service for the Toronto district. The answer given today to my question as I placed it on the order paper does not deal with the matter at all, because it refers to last year and is not relevant. Has the minister anything further to say on this matter? How can anyone get cheap land in the country nearby without transportation by steam suburban services?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The answer given today by my colleague the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) had to do with the question of steam service for suburban Toronto, but I shall be glad to look further into the matter with him.

MICHEL LUCIEN SEIGNEUR

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN Le Canada OF FEBRUARY 23

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Has the attention of the Minister of Mines and Resources been directed to a statement by Michel Lucien Seigneur appearing in today's issue of Le Canada, to the effect that he reported to the immigration authorities last year, and received his final papers last November, and that all his affairs were cleared by the government? Perhaps the minister would like to comment on this tomorrow, since I was not able to give him notice of the question.

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): I have not seen or heard of the article in question.

JAPANESE

RETURN TO CANADA OF CANADIANS OF JAPANESE ORIGIN REPATRIATED SINCE 1945

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I want to direct to the Minister of Mines and Resources a question of which I have given notice. Are Canadians of Japanese origin who were repatriated to Japan since 1945 being allowed to return to this country upon request? If so, to what extent and under what circumstances?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): Just before coming into the chamber I received notice of the intention of the hon. member to ask this question. Before answering it I should like to look into just what is involved in the question, but I shall do so and bring down an answer as soon as possible.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

AIRPORT SOUTH OF PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Baker (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I should like to answer a question asked on February 11 by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller) about the airport south of Portage la Prairie.

This former R.C.A.F. unit was turned over to the Department of Transport in June, 1948. The property is now surplus to Department of Transport requirements and is in the process of being returned to the Department of National Defence. On completion of the proceedings of transfer the station will be placed on a caretaker basis as an inactive reserve R.C.A.F. base.

HOUSING

REPORTED STOCKPILING OF LUMBER BY CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply whether it is correct that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are now engaged in building up a stockpile of lumber amounting to some 11 million feet, and that they are making or intend to make purchases direct from producers without seeking tenders from retailers?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I have no knowledge of that arrangement.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister look into it and make a statement?

CONTRACT TO BOW RIVER CONSTRUCTION COMPANY, CALGARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): In looking over the answers, tabled today, to questions on the order paper I find that the first part of question No. 4 was not answered at all. In it I asked what were the qualifications of these contractors as far as building experience went. Will the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply answer that part of the question at his convenience?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I do not think I can add anything to the answer tabled today. Each contractor is investigated, and the question of his ability is dealt with on its merits.

Mr. Johnston: But my point is that the part of the question having to do with the experience of the contractor was not answered. Will the minister look into the matter and give me an answer tomorrow?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROCEDURE IN QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Before we proceed to the orders of the day might I express the hope that in future the standing orders of the house with respect to questions will be followed. We have now gone back to the regular procedure of answering questions three times a week, and it would seem to me that in the interests of all it is desirable that the rules be adhered to, and that oral questions be asked on the orders of the day only when their urgency would justify avoidance of the delay involved in placing a question on the order paper.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): When the house rose last evening, Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with the problems of the Medicine Hat area, and was discussing the development of the Bow river extension. I gave several reasons why this project should be completed with the least possible delay. One of those reasons was the cost involved. While that area must be more or less resettled, there are many farmers in it who have been waiting for years to be re-established on irrigated farms. In addition, many young men who moved to the towns and cities during the war years now find employment not so easy to obtain, and they are anxious to get back on good productive land. The government should complete the main canals as soon as possible, on both the Bow river extension and the St. Mary-Milk river project. When that is done the people of the area will believe that the government really means business.

The completion of this work will greatly benefit many ranchers and farmers in that area who are interested in the production of livestock. It will provide water, which they do not have at the present time. Some of the farmers west of Medicine Hat have been in that area for fifty years. I might mention two in particular—Mr. C. D. Ronan and Mr. Nils Stenby. These two farmers were among the first to settle in that area, and for all these years they have been waiting for irrigation. It is about time the government showed that it really means business, by constructing these canals and dams.

I might mention the work done by Mr. A. P. Burns in connection with the Bow river extension. This man, who has been a resident of Medicine Hat for years, has taken an active interest in the development of irrigation in that area. It is now the duty of the dominion government to make its stand clear and to supply the financial assistance necessary to complete this project. It might mean a big saving to the dominion government in the long run, as well as the establishment of many farmers on a self-sustaining basis.

In this connection let me indicate what it cost the dominion government for relief in that area from 1931 to 1938. I shall refer to the Meek report, published in 1942, with which most hon. members are well acquainted. This is what the Meek report has to say:

> During the severe drought years from 1931 to 1938, the relief expenditures in Alberta amounted to $51,968,585, including relief works, direct relief administration and medical aid. The total relief expenditures in Saskatchewan amounted to $134,230,046 during this seven-year period, making a total of $186,198,631 for the two provinces.
> Food, seed, feed and fodder, including freight, were main items of expense. During the winter of 1937-38 some 488,000 tons of feed were supplied in the drought area of Saskatchewan, and 44,000 tons in Alberta. Much greater quantities would have been required had not more than 474,000 cattle been removed from the drought area.

After listening, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) extol the virtues of the Liberal party in his speech yesterday, I wondered what party was in power in 1937. Was it the Liberal government, or just what government was it? One thing we must remember, even after listening to the minister's speech yesterday, and that is that the farmers of western Canada in the drought area still remember the price they received for the 474,000 head of cattle. The amount which the dominion government paid was one cent a pound. I am not surprised at the reference of the Minister of Agriculture yesterday to the increased income of the farmer of this country. His speech, Mr. Speaker, was what I would term a good election speech. It referred to only one side of the case.

We all realize that the income of the farmers is higher today than it was in 1938, 1939 or 1944, but we also know that their costs are considerably higher. Unless you compare the income with the cost, you do not get a proper result.

Mr. Gardiner: I did that yesterday.

Mr. Wylie: I did not read that in the minister's speech. I have not seen it, and I certainly did not hear it. I do not read between the lines, so it might have been there.

Mr. Gardiner: The net returns were all given.

Mr. Wylie: Perhaps they were, but it must be realized that the farmers in this country today are called upon to pay greatly increased prices for tractors as well as all the other things they have to buy.

Since the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was brought into force, it has applied in every township in Alberta east of our irrigation district. The exception to this rule was in 1942 when the average yield of wheat in that area was approximately fourteen bushels per acre. In every other year the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has applied, and this presents a still more cogent reason for an irrigation project in that area. Irrigation will mean much to the people there. I believe there is a possibility that irrigation would even change the climatic conditions. Farming is our basic industry, and farmers must be kept prosperous.

I have mentioned not only the increased cost of living, but also what the farmers have had to pay in the way of increased costs of operation. Taxation has much to do with these increased costs. This matter was dealt with fully and fairly by the leader of this group, the member for Peace River (Mr. Low). For this reason I shall not dwell on that subject. It is about time the government realized that some of these taxes should be discontinued. There is a sales tax, a luxury tax of 25 per cent and many other nuisance taxes.

As has been mentioned in the course of this debate, we also have a two-cent tax on soft drinks. This is another matter which should receive serious consideration. The other day I received a letter from the Shamrock Bottling Works, Medicine Hat, Alberta, explaining that the soft drink is traditionally a five-cent product. When you consider that a two-cent tax is levied on a five-cent drink, you realize that this impost is just what the member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) labeled it, an iniquitous tax. It is time it was removed.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer, and that is the amount paid to the older citizens of this country by way of old age pension. This also was referred to by the member for Red Deer. The time has come when the government should give serious consideration to increasing the old age pension. It is unreasonable to expect anyone to live on $30 a month today. I know that this side of the house will at least have the support of one member sitting on the other side; I refer of course to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I am sure he will do what he can not only to increase the pension but to lower the age of eligibility.

Another group of persons who are really up against it today are the incurables. I should like to refer to a letter which I received the other day, part of which reads as follows:

> I am a member of the Canadian Association of Incurables and am writing you to help us unfortunate incurables and try to get legislation passed to cover a pension for us.
> I am forty years old, with a family of five children, unable to work, and without means of supporting my family, because of the fact five years ago I was stricken with progressive muscular atrophy. Medical men of Canada and Rochester cannot help me.

That is only one of the many letters of the kind that we receive. I think the time has arrived when something should be done for these people. I see that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is in his seat. I know he has a big heart, and I hope that when he brings down his estimates this year they will contain provision for assistance not only for incurables, but for our older people, and many others who are in need of help.

I should also like to refer to another matter that affects the southern part of our province, namely, the transcontinental highway. The speech from the throne contained a reference to this highway, but it was extremely vague. As a matter of fact, this is all that the speech says on the subject:

> A measure for assistance in the provision of a transcontinental highway will also be laid before you.

That was the extent of the statement. Before the provincial election in Alberta, the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. MacKinnon) was out there doing a little bit of campaigning.

An hon. Member: Very little.

Mr. Wylie: Yes, it was very little. It did not help a great deal; we admit that. But he was there just the same, and in Edmonton, on August 12, according to a press report, he had this to say:

> Hon. J. A. MacKinnon said today that a trans-Canada highway is "an absolute necessity from the standpoint of the country's economy."
> The Minister of Mines and Resources has just returned home from the Liberal convention in Ottawa and he will participate in the August 17 Alberta general election.

Mr. MacKinnon said an independent commission to select a route should be set up without "undue delay", and that the highway need not be near the United States border, even though it would help promote the tourist trade.

I realize the significance of that last paragraph. The minister was campaigning in Edmonton, and naturally was working to have the trans-Canada highway go through that city, whereas we in the south of course believe it should go through the southern part of the province. I must say this to the minister, however. After the conference with the provincial premiers and provincial ministers of public works that was held here in Ottawa, the minister suggested that perhaps the government would pay fifty per cent of the cost of the trans-Canada highway. My opinion is that unless the dominion government contributes much more than fifty per cent, we shall be discussing this subject for years to come. I think it is realized by all provincial governments that the dominion government must accept a greater responsibility for the construction of that highway, which would mean a great deal to this country, not only now but in the years to come.

There were some other matters, Mr. Speaker, to which I wished to refer, but I see that my time has almost expired. In closing may I appeal to the government to provide irrigation in the drought areas with as little delay as possible. I urge upon them that they not merely talk about the matter this year, in the event of a federal election coming along, but that they show us they mean business by making a start on the project.

I appeal to the government for an increase in the income tax exemption applicable to individuals. The present exemption is altogether too low, in view of the increased cost of living. I sometimes wonder how the working people can get along on what they are allowed to keep of their earnings.

Last, but not least, may I appeal to the government to give a substantial increase in the pensions to our older citizens, those who pioneered and prepared the way for Canada's development. I appeal to the government to do these things, not only for the benefit of the people of my constituency, but for all the people from one end of Canada to the other.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): This house, Mr. Speaker, will expect me to report on the progress made during the past few months under the national health program inaugurated last year in a memorable statement made by the then Prime Minister. The announcement of this program, with all of its significance for the health and well-being of the people of this country, was made on May 14 last. This house approved that program on June 30. The first provincial request for federal assistance was received on August 25.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that what I have to say to the house this afternoon is a powerful story. It will not be a complete story. That will come at a later date when time alone will afford final appraisal of the great projects that are under way. But the humanitarian effects of the story are now sufficiently before us to indicate the scope of the achievements to date—achievements that, I think, reveal the true perspective of government in a free society, as few other measures in our history have done. I am reporting on a measure that seeks to improve the facilities to relieve human suffering caused by disease and ill health. What I have to say today will show what this government has done so that the provinces—so largely charged with the responsibility of health policy and administration—will be enabled to give the men, women and children of this country, regardless of financial position, the opportunity to share more fully in the advantages of modern health services.

Since the first project was received amazing progress has been made. Projects under the national health program are now flowing into Ottawa at the rate of $200,000 a day! Let us look at the record of monthly totals of projects approved:

August	$ 196,000
September	375,000
October	997,000
November	1,721,000
December	1,112,000
January	4,082,000

The January total was no less than 60 per cent beyond the monthly rate required for our target of $30 million a year. The total for the first three weeks of February—$4,893,000—suggests that this month will exceed $6 million. Already, only seven months since the first project was received, we have approved the expenditure to the provinces of more than $13 million.

The house will recall the broad outline of the national health program:

(1) Federal grants totalling $625,000 have been provided to enable the provinces to make comprehensive surveys of the Canadian health scene.

(2) To strengthen and extend provincial health services, federal grants starting at $16,495,000 will be available each year for public health research and public health projects; to train professional health workers, to help crippled children, to fight venereal disease, to control tuberculosis, to strengthen cancer control campaigns, and to promote mental health.

(3) Great increases in hospital accommodation are being encouraged by annual grants to the provinces, totalling $13 million a year.

These grants make possible an additional expenditure of $30 million or more each year on Canada's hospitals and health services. This is almost as much money as was spent on health by all governments in Canada—federal, provincial and municipal—as recently as 1933. This program of federal health grants is twice as much on a per capita basis as the federal health grants program in the United States.

In recognition of the importance of the national health program, the American Public Health Association—the most authoritative body in this field in North America—paid formal tribute to it when that body resolved as follows—> —that the American Public Health Association extend its hearty congratulations to the government and the people of Canada for a step which makes the year 1948 memorable in the annals of public health on this continent.

Mr. Graham L. Davis, director of the division of hospitals for the Kellogg foundation, in a recent article in the Washington Post wrote:

> Canada is outstripping the United States in its planning for an over-all national health program.

In Canada, as in this house, throughout the country, and everywhere I have gone since the end of the last session, the action taken by parliament, by the government, has everywhere received an enthusiastic reception. Provincial governments, Canadian health leaders, the average Canadian citizen—all recognize this as an historic advance towards good health. The chairman of the Saskatchewan Health Services Planning Commission called it a fine and courageous program. Dr. W. A. Magner, president of the Canadian Medical Association, called it the most important event in Canada's health history.

Apart from a few important federal activities, health administration in Canada is centred in the provinces. The national health program, being worked out in closest co-operation with the provinces, does not in any way disturb their primary responsibility for health services. The centralization of health services would badly serve the Canadian citizen. In working closely with provincial governments to raise public health levels, the federal government is careful not to disturb the proper dominion-provincial balance of health responsibilities.

Access to good health is a fundamental human right. It is a right that every government must guard. When it became evident that our provincial defences against disease and ill health needed strengthening, the federal government backed by the house took determined action. But Canada's health services are a complex of responsibilities, sometimes exclusive, sometimes overlapping. Federal, provincial, municipal governments and voluntary health agencies—all are concerned with Canada's health. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to say that all of the nine Canadian provinces are now collaborating in this plan for the nation's health, Quebec, being the last to come in, having agreed to participate on September 7. In acknowledging the speed with which this great enterprise has got into full operation, I should like—and I know I do this with the full concurrence of every hon. member—to pay tribute to my two deputy ministers; to Dr. Fred Jackson, former deputy minister of health in Manitoba, whose great experience and reputation in the provincial health field makes him one of the great figures on this continent in the work of public health, and who is the administrator of the federal grants; and to all the other officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare and all provincial organizations and agencies who have worked during the past several months with so much enthusiasm and effectiveness.

In my talks with the provincial ministers of health, in my conferences with their deputy ministers at the dominion council of health, and in public statements made in every province in this country, I have reiterated the desire of the government that these federal grants should be utilized as expeditiously and as efficiently as possible. In this connection, to indicate my recognition of the problems that the provinces have to face, I should like to quote from an address I made to the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons in November last:

> It takes time to assess and strengthen provincial programs and this might prevent full and immediate use of the moneys available. When I asked parliament to approve the whole amount for this fiscal year I did so for a deliberate purpose—to indicate how anxious the government was to see its grants fully utilized this year if possible. This year's allotment of $30 million is our target figure—the amount of money that we believe should be expended to bring our health services up to desirable levels.

The provinces have done excellent work in planning and carrying out the health advances made possible by these federal grants to the extent that they were not prevented by the shortages of trained health personnel, of technical equipment, and of hospital construction facilities. I am happy to say that these problems are now being tackled energetically and with considerable success. The house and the country will be interested in knowing that 600 health projects have already been received from the provinces and approved by the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, when this program was announced last year by the then Prime Minister, it was emphasized that these federal grants "would have the added advantage of being fundamental prerequisites of a nationwide system of health insurance." Indeed, they represent the first stages. The new services being developed and the new hospitals being built with these federal grants are hastening the moment when in every province it will be possible to consider further action towards hospital and medical care insurance—for which, of course, the federal government stands ready to provide assistance, under satisfactory agreements for dominion-provincial co-operation. It is of interest to note that in a recent radio address the Prime Minister said:

> It is up to the people and the government in each province to take the initiative in working out health insurance plans in line with their local conditions and their traditions.

This national health program was not merely the fulfilment of the proposals made by the dominion government to the provinces in 1945-46. We went much beyond them. The best proof of this is that $17,123,000 more money is available in federal health grants for the provinces this year than if the health grants contained in the proposals had been implemented. I shall list the major changes since 1945-46:

1. A new annual grant of $3,500,000 has been added for cancer control.

2. The professional training grant has been increased by $250,000 a year.

3. Over a period of years the annual grant for public health research will increase to $500,000 in place of the $100,000 formerly proposed.

4. The federal government has now offered —in place of low-cost loans previously proposed—to give annual grants totalling $65 million over a five-year period to help the provinces increase their hospital accommodation.

I now propose to give the house the highlights of what has been achieved so far under the new federal health plan. I cannot do more than outline what has been done, but with the agreement of the house I shall indicate in more detail some of the lines of achievement by tabling some of the main projects that have been approved. It may be helpful if I remind the house again that this program is divided into three sections. They are as follows:

1. The health survey grant—$625,000 in outright grants.

2. The hospital construction grant—$13 million in cumulative annual grants for a period of five years.

3. National health grants—totalling $16,495,000 this year and later increasing to about $23 million.

All the provinces have well under way the health surveys made possible by the federal grants. The total amount approved by parliament for this purpose has now been allocated. The provinces have established survey teams which are taking inventories of their health facilities and services, as a result of which new programs are being shaped up for their extension and development. In these surveys the provincial health departments are receiving the fullest co-operation from medical associations and other professional and voluntary health bodies. From all sides the most enthusiastic support is forthcoming for Canada's health plans for the future.

One of the urgent reasons for these surveys is to determine provincial requirements for new hospitals. There are obvious difficulties and delays in the planning and building of hospitals, but the total amount of additional hospital accommodation now under construction or in the planning stage, with this federal stimulus, is greater than ever before. The hospital construction grant provided by the federal government is being extensively utilized, as I will briefly indicate. Quebec, for example, has already had projects approved up to one hundred per cent of this year's grant.

I am glad to announce to the house that in this fiscal year federal assistance will be authorized to help build hospitals totalling 13,000 additional beds. This is no mean achievement. This is nearly one-third of the total of 40,000 beds which in my conferences with the provincial governments, I suggested as the government's target for the current five-year period. To summarize, these projects cover new construction totalling 12,983 beds distributed as follows:

1. Federal grants have been approved for construction representing 6,401 hospital beds of all kinds throughout all parts of Canada.

2. Projects for 2,882 new beds are at present under review.

3. Further projects will be submitted, I can now say, before March 31 totalling a further 3,700 beds.

With the permission of the house I should like to place on Hansard a table indicating the institutions that have received approval for beds in the amounts first mentioned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister the permission of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin: The table is as follows:

To ensure that the progress now being made will be continued and that we will reach or surpass our target within the next four years, it is the intention of the government to ask in the coming year's estimates for the re-vote of any unexpended portion of this year's $13 million grant. The hospital construction grant is therefore cumulative, while the health survey grant is outright and the annual national health grants are on a continuing annual basis.

These hospital construction projects cover a wide range, from large general hospitals and hospitals for the mentally ill, down to small rural hospitals and nursing stations. It is not easy to select from a great number of projects that are being approved under this grant more than a few typical examples. By March 31, at least four provinces—Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Alberta and British Columbia —will have submitted projects covering all of their federal grants for hospital construction.

I might, however, make note of one outstanding project to illustrate the operation of this federal grant. In Quebec the federal government has approved the allocation of $1,498,000 to assist towards the cost of a magnificent structure now building at Riviere des Prairies to house 1,269 mentally deficient children. This hospital, modern both in its concept of early care and training and in its design, should be unsurpassed in North America.

The action that is being taken by the federal government to help build new hospitals in every province is far-reaching. At meetings of the Saskatchewan hospital council in Regina and the Ontario hospital association in Toronto, I was struck by the unanimity among executive members and delegates on the tremendous encouragement given them in their work by this federal grant. The extent of this assistance is perhaps best indicated by these two facts:

1. On a per capita basis Canada's federal grant for hospital construction is twice the similar grant provided by the United States.

2. By March 31 we will have paid out in eight months a higher proportion of our hospital construction grant than the United States paid in two years after passing its somewhat similar measure.

With regard to the third section of our federal health program, the national health grants, I should like to review for the house the way in which these grants are divided and the amount of money set aside for each purpose each year, and the results that have followed from their being made available to the provinces.

1. Professional training grant—$500,000.

2. Grant for public health research—$100,000 this year but increasing to $500,000 annually.

3. General public health grant—$4,395,000 in the current fiscal year and rising to $6,500,000 by 1951.

4. Venereal disease control grant—$500,000.

5. Grant for crippled children—$500,000.

6. Mental health grant—$4 million in the current fiscal year and rising to $7 million a year by 1954.

7. Cancer control grant—$3,500,000.

8. Tuberculosis control grant—$3 million in the current year, rising to $4 million by 1950-51.

I have reminded the house of these figures, Mr. Speaker, because from the mere recital of these grants it is clear that the provinces are being given an almost unlimited opportunity to exercise their ingenuity and initiative in moving forward on all sectors of the health front. Where the provinces already had certain well-established programs, such as those for the control of venereal disease, mental illness and tuberculosis, we have provided specially ear-marked grants. Where the provinces had their plans already made or in the formative stage, as for cancer or crippling conditions in children, we have enabled them to put their plans into operation for the first time on a comprehensive scale across Canada. Where, for other serious illnesses such as rheumatism and arthritis, the provinces had not yet devised their plans of attack, we have encouraged them to develop projects on a trial basis for the control and treatment of these illnesses, while urging them to explore the best means of developing all-out attacks. With respect to health research, we have provided special financial assistance to increase the tempo and the scope of research efforts.

I know that this is a detailed statement, but the house has been thus far extremely patient, and if hon. members will follow me now until almost the end of what I have to say they will see the unfolding of a story which I think has been unsurpassed by any federal state in the world.

(i) Grant for Professional Training—$500,000. We are also stepping up the training of health specialists, who are essential to the success of provincial health programs. This shortage of health workers is without question the main obstacle to health advances. I need not tell this house that the finest hospitals, the best medical equipment that money can buy—all these are useless unless we have an adequate body of highly trained and professionally qualified personnel to put these facilities into full service.

The professional training grant is already achieving results: public health doctors, dentists, nurses, laboratory technicians, mental hospital attendants, sanitarians, research workers, psychiatrists—these and many other categories of professional health workers are now being trained under it. In addition, specialists are being given training from funds provided under the grants for cancer control, tuberculosis control, mental health and general public health. Under all these federal grants, 537 professional health workers are receiving training at the expense of the federal government. As a result of the expenditure of almost $400,000 in the current fiscal year we can expect large reinforcements for Canada's army of health and hospital workers.

The most notable training project now underway is one submitted by the province of Ontario for the expenditure of almost $200,000 this year at the university of Toronto to train mental health personnel, such as psychiatrists, psychiatric social workers and psychologists.

If any member of the house does not think that is one of the most important problems on which we should be engaged, let him come with me any time and visit some of these institutions in our provinces and see how badly needed is the kind of assistance we are now giving.

Another project for post-graduate training in clinical psychology, bacteriology and preventive medicine, is going forward at the university of British Columbia, and, as a notable instance of action making for Canadian unity, at the suggestion of the Department of National Health and Welfare the maritime provinces have met together and agreed to back a joint program for mental health training at Dalhousie university.

(ii) Research in Public Health—$100,000 to $500,000. Besides increasing the supply of professional health personnel, we must bring scientific research to support the health services of each province. That purpose is now notably being achieved through the public health research grant, which starts this year at $100,000 and increases—as research workers and research facilities become available—to $500,000 a year. The initial difficulties in getting new research projects under way are now being overcome and it is now certain that the full $200,000 grant for next year will be allocated.

The public health research grant is financing a number of useful investigations. For instance—and I can only give some examples—there is a community research project in preventive dentistry to find the value of the application of sodium fluoride to children's teeth. In British Columbia, a wide-scale study is under way of 8,000 school children to determine the value of a simplified system to gather health and welfare data for each child. In Saskatchewan, there is a study on the nutritive value of milk. Radioactive isotopes are being used to determine the efficiency of commercial detergents and to study the contamination of certain drinking water.

A three-year study is now beginning at Connaught laboratories in Toronto on methods by which the infection of the polio virus spreads. Other public health research projects include research into certain causes of maternal and infant deaths and the gathering of exact and detailed statistics on the extent and nature of illness in a typical Canadian community.

Through this and other grants of the national health program, new impetus is being given to Canada's expanding medical research program. The national research council through its medical division is continuing its medical research projects totalling $350,000 a year; the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society is preparing extensive plans for research, for treatment, and for education. A considerable program is going forward with the support of the medical schools, voluntary organizations, individual donors and private industry; a particularly notable program, about which I shall have something to say later, is also being carried on by the national cancer institute. Since the incorporation of this institute a little more than two years ago, an impressive total of fifty-eight individual fundamental research projects on cancer are under way in many of our universities throughout the country. I thought a list of those projects might be of interest to the house, and with the permission of the house I would ask leave to table a schedule.

I feel I may say that the new energy put into research by the national cancer institute and the national health program brings the money available for health research this year to an all-time record of more than $1,250,000. I believe this represents an effort that is as fundamental and integral to our life as any that we discuss at any time in this national parliament.

(iii) Extension of Public Health Programs —$4,395,000 to $6,500,000. Besides the grants to train professional health workers, and to support research in public health, there is a grant for general public health, which this year stands at $4,395,000 or 35 cents per capita. British Columbia has already been allocated 90 per cent of its public health grant. Here is what this federal grant makes possible: many provinces are extending laboratory facilities by the purchase of new, improved and much needed equipment; no fewer than five provinces are establishing branch laboratories at strategic points; all the provinces are improving local health services by the purchase of new equipment, and by the addition of staff such as public health doctors, sanitarians and public health nurses; Quebec, Alberta, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia are strengthening their district health units.

We are assisting plans for Quebec to immunize children in the province against tuberculosis with B.C.G. vaccine, and to extend immunization for diphtheria to outlying districts in Saskatchewan. Saskatchewan is also being assisted in establishing a very extensive dental health program. A provincial division of dental hygiene is being formed; more dental service will be given to preschool children in Saskatoon; six dental clinic units will be provided, particularly for the rural areas; and four stationary and seven mobile dental units are being fully equipped to care for 40,000 school children, as a result of the grants made to that province by the federal government.

Dental health divisions are also being set up in New Brunswick and British Columbia. Other projects made possible by this federal aid include new public health engineering divisions in Prince Edward Island and British Columbia; a hospital inspection division in New Brunswick; extension of health education in Saskatchewan and British Columbia; and the strengthening of city health departments in Vancouver, Edmonton, Regina, Saskatoon, Winnipeg and Saint John.

(iii a) Campaign Against Arthritis and Rheumatism. Hon. members of the house will, I am sure, be particularly interested in the campaign developing in this country against arthritis and rheumatism, two of the great cripplers. I am glad to report progress to the house in this connection. The first results of recent intensive efforts are beginning to appear. The Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society, formed in 1948 as a result of a conference the government authorized me to call of the provincial governments and leading Canadian authorities, has now firmly established itself. From the federal health grants, funds have been made available to this society backed up, as I say, by the nine provinces. I am informed by this body that the moneys available from this and other sources are sufficient for its immediate needs. As soon as it has completed its planning and organization work the society will, of course, require much greater financial support. This association includes the Canadian counterparts of that great English specialist on arthritis and rheumatism, Lord Horder, who came to Canada last year to assist in planning our attack and who will return again shortly to give the benefit of his vast experience.

These are some of the objectives of the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society to make 1949 a year of great advances:

1. Provincial divisions are to be organized and local branches or campaign committees set up.
2. Programs are to be shaped up for research, professional education and technical leadership for local committees.
3. The first national campaign for public support, supplementing that being given by governments at all levels, is to be carried on later this year.
4. The society's advisory medical board is preparing an over-all plan that will play a role in the Canadian health scheme similar to that of Lord Horder's plan in Great Britain.

I know this announcement will be received by over six hundred thousand people in this country with great interest and acclaim, and I am sure that the house will follow with interest the work of this society and will endorse my determination to give it every necessary support beyond what appropriately, as a voluntary agency, it will ask from the people of Canada for whom arthritis and rheumatism are such major health problems. British Columbia is taking action against these diseases and Alberta, I presume with federal aid, will inaugurate a treatment program for sufferers from these diseases. The British Columbia division of the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society has been allocated funds from the federal public health grant to purchase clinical and other equipment for diagnosis and treatment. I hope to see similar divisions established in every province and to see activity in this field on the part of every provincial health department. I have every confidence that this public campaign now beginning against arthritis and rheumatism will continue to gather momentum until it can match the magnitude of the challenge of these great crippling diseases.

(iv) Grant for venereal disease control—$500,000. The house is already familiar with the federal grant for the control of venereal disease, which was instituted after the first world war and served as an example of dominion-provincial co-operative health action until it was abolished in 1932. The grant was restored in 1938; under the national health program the grant has been raised from $225,000 annually to $500,000. All of the provinces, of course, have programs to expend the original allocation; four provinces —Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan—have submitted projects to use all of the increased allotment; the other provinces are rapidly building expanded programs. Every citizen, regardless of ability to pay, can now secure treatment. Through this federal grant we are making penicillin available free in all the provinces and free treatment services are being greatly extended. From 1944 to 1948, the number of cases reported has decreased by 29 per cent. With the new measures being taken we can expect this decline to be accelerated.

(v) Grant for crippled children—$500,000. The house will, I am sure, be interested in hearing what is being done with the $500,000 that was voted last year to assist the provinces in helping their crippled children. As a result of the federal grant there are encouraging signs that the provincial governments are giving more attention to the special needs of crippled children. Here are some of the developments fostered by the federal grant: New Brunswick is extending its provision for free examination and treatment; Quebec is establishing a new treatment centre at Cartierville; Ontario is converting the Woodeden Hospital for cerebral palsy into a year-round operation; in northern Ontario a new clinic will search out children suffering from crippling conditions and encourage treatment and preventive action; Manitoba is developing a rehabilitation program; Saskatchewan is setting up a new provincial health division for crippled children. All this—and this is important—is being done as a result of the national health program announced in this house less than a year ago.

The federal grant makes possible the extension of services for polio victims in Alberta. It makes possible the purchase of new and modern equipment for three of the British Columbia hospitals that treat crippled children. In all the provinces an accelerated preventive and treatment program to help crippled children can now go forward in full vigour, largely due to the stimulus provided by this national health program.

(vi) Grant for Mental Health—$4 million to $7 million. The problem of mental illness in Canada has become increasingly urgent over the past twenty years. It is a problem that challenges every political party and civilized man in this country, regardless of race or political affiliation, and it is in that spirit that I approach it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Martin: I thank hon. members, because I think the house and the country will be interested in this statement. The fact that there are now 50,000 patients in mental hospitals in Canada is ample evidence of the magnitude of this problem and of its cost in loss of productivity and in human suffering. Mental illness is being countered in many ways. The mental health grant and, to a lesser extent, the professional training grant are helping to provide additional workers in the mental health field; the hospital construction grant is helping to remedy the pressing shortage of some 27,000 hospital beds for the mentally ill; and, finally, the mental health grant itself, which stands at $4 million for the current year but will rise to reach $7 million, is bringing invaluable aid to provincial programs for enlarging hospital staffs, for increasing treatment facilities and extending the work of prevention.

The impact of this grant on mental health programs already is evident. The latest scientific, diagnostic and treatment equipment is being provided in large quantities for mental hospitals, mental health clinics and psychiatric wards in general hospitals. Special X-ray, surgical and laboratory equipment, badly needed in many of the provincial mental hospitals, is now being furnished along with equipment for modern treatment techniques and for occupational therapy. In Saskatchewan, for example, this federal grant has already made possible the allocation of over $50,000 for equipment. In Quebec, the provincial program will be greatly assisted through the federal grant to the Mont Providence hospital for mental defective, although plans have not yet been finalized to take advantage of this year's federal grant of $1,140,000 for mental health.

British Columbia has used a substantial portion of its mental health grant to equip the new Crease Clinic of Psychological Medicine, which will be when completed, among the most modern on this continent. Similar preventive and treatment services are being extended through the establishment, with the help of the federal grants, of fourteen new mental health clinics in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. In the wider extension of these clinics and of all preventive measures, we see the promise that mental illness will be brought under much more effective control in future years. With this federal assistance, as every one of the provinces readily acknowledges, because it is a co-operative effort, it now becomes possible to make a direct attack on this disease that will progressively shift emphasis from custodial hospital care to modern diagnostic, treatment and preventive services.

I have reserved to the last my comments on the progress that is being made under the national health program to bring tuberculosis under control and to combat the ravages of cancer. I link these diseases deliberately because from our victories—when I say "ours", I mean those of the provincial governments, voluntary bodies, tuberculosis associations, this parliament and the people of this country who work in this field—our victories, I say, in connection with tuberculosis, can inspire us to greater efforts to conquer cancer. Of course, final victory over cancer can only follow great research discoveries, but there is much ground that we can win back in the years immediately ahead.

The number of notable projects under the tuberculosis control grant is too great to be noted in the time at my disposal. With the indulgence of the house, I should like therefore to place on Hansard for its information a brief summary of the major activities sponsored so far by this grant.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin: The statement follows:

Projects Approved Under Federal Tuberculosis Control Grant, 1948-49

Prince Edwards Island. Free diagnostic x-ray service, clinical laboratory services, and streptomycin and other drugs have been made available to patients. A medical director has been hired to organize a field tuberculosis service and the provincial tuberculosis control division has been expanded through the addition of new staff and equipment. A rehabilitation program has been commenced, and assistance has been given to the maintenance of a mobile x-ray unit and to the provincial educational program.

Nova Scotia X-ray equipment has been purchased for the Victoria General hospital in Halifax, to enable all admissions to be x-rayed. Equipment has been purchased for the Nova Scotia sanatorium at Kentville and the activities of the rehabilitation division of the sanatorium have been expanded.

New Brunswick. Provision for free streptomycin has been made in sanatoria and an x-ray developing centre has been established to assist traveling units. Equipment has been purchased for the Saint John tuberculosis hospital, the Jordan Memorial sanatorium, the Moncton tuberculosis hospital, Sanatorium Notre Dame de Lourdes and Saint Joseph's sanatorium; and for clinics at Saint John, Fredericton and Moncton. A physician has been added to the staff of the Jordan Memorial sanatorium.

Quebec. Four mobile diagnostic clinics and a permanent clinic at the Hopital Notre Dame have been established. Provision has been made for free streptomycin treatment to sanatoria patients. Equipment has been purchased for sanatoria at Montreal, Mont Joli, Gaspe, Three Rivers, Dorchester and Cartierville. Eighty-five physicians have been given lectures in the use of B.C.G. at the University of Montreal and aid has been given to the Anti-Tuberculosis League of Montreal.

Ontario. Free streptomycin treatment has been made available to sanatoria patients, provision is being made for all patients admitted to hospital to be given routine x-rays and the number of free chest clinics is being expanded. A mobile x-ray unit has been purchased. A rehabilitation scheme has been commenced. Laboratory investigations are being extended in scope and diagnostic procedures developed. The tuberculosis control staff of the province is being expanded and specialists from outside the province are being brought in for advisory services.

Manitoba. Provision has been made for streptomycin and other antibiotics or treatment not covered by ordinary sanatorium rates to be supplied without charge. Free post-sanatorium pneumothorax treatment has been extended. X-ray equipment is being installed in general hospitals. Rehabilitation services are being extended and facilities are being provided for the establishment, at the Manitoba sanatorium, of affiliation courses for nurses. Sanatorium, clinical and laboratory facilities are being extended by the purchase of new equipment.

Saskatchewan. Photofluorographic equipment is being purchased for hospitals and clinics. Hospitals and clinics are being assisted to take x-rays on all admissions and the mass miniature x-ray program is being expanded. Provision has been made for the extension and development of the use of streptomycin. The existing program whereby B.C.G. vaccination is given to persons exposed to tuberculosis is being assisted. Post-graduate training is being given to staff physicians and the present tuberculosis staff is being expanded.

Alberta. Free treatment has been extended to non-pulmonary tuberculosis cases and a free streptomycin service is being provided. Clinical x-ray equipment to extend diagnosis services to remote areas, and technical equipment for the sanatoria in Calgary and Edmonton have been purchased. A short training course for nurses has been established at Calgary and the provincial tuberculosis staff has been expanded.

British Columbia. The province has purchased x-ray survey equipment for general hospitals so that all admissions may be x-rayed. Provision has been made for free distribution of streptomycin. An occupational therapy scheme for outpatients has been set up under the Metropolitan Health Committee of Vancouver. Equipment has been purchased for the Vancouver unit of the provincial tuberculosis control division, refresher courses are being given to various members of the division, and a study is being made of emotional and other factors related to the treatment of tuberculosis.

More than two-thirds of this year's grant for tuberculosis control has already been allocated for new or expanded provincial programs. Let me remind the house that in the last fifty years in this country the death rate from tuberculosis has been reduced by 80 per cent. In the past twenty years it has been reduced by 46 per cent. This is perhaps the greatest single achievement in our public health history. It is certainly a challenge and an inspiration to all of Canada's health workers. The objective of our tuberculosis program for the next generation is nothing less than the elimination of this disease as a major cause of death and illness among our population.

The provinces have shown great energy in moving forward to an all-out attack on tuberculosis under the stimulus of the federal grant, which starts at $3 million and rises to $4 million annually. Already four provinces —New Brunswick, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Ontario—have applied for 90 per cent of their first year's allotment. The federal aid makes it possible for all the provinces to extend the reach of free diagnosis and treatment, and to provide free streptomycin, often effective against this disease. They make it possible for new equipment to be supplied in large quantities, and for new staff to be trained for the provincial sanatoria.

Because of the federal grant, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan are now buying additional X-ray equipment so that general hospitals can examine all admissions. Ontario will be enabled to have every admission to hospital given a chest X-ray. Because of the federal grant, new mobile X-ray units are being established in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Quebec to help discover early cases. As a consequence of these federally-assisted measures, the number of chest X-ray examinations in Canada will be increased by one million a year! This vast increase in anti-tuberculosis activity means a larger number of cases isolated in time to prevent them from spreading their contagion to other members of their family and community. It means shorter stays in sanatorium, more cures, fewer deaths, and ultimately, I am confident, complete and final victory over an illness that at one time ranked very high among causes of death in this country.

What we have done and what we are now doing about tuberculosis, we can and we must do in the other phases of the public health field in Canada. Canada has good reason to be concerned over the steadily growing number of deaths from cancer. The house will recall that shortly after I became Minister of National Health and Welfare, taking advantage of the preparatory work that had been done by my predecessor, the present Minister of National Defence, I called together representatives of the provincial governments, the medical colleges, the Canadian Medical Association, the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, the representatives of public voluntary bodies, to determine what action on a national scale could be taken to co-ordinate activities designed to effect cancer control. As a result, this conference decided to establish the National Cancer Institute, with which the Canadian Cancer Society is now affiliated. The institute was provided with funds to sponsor a large research program of which I have already made mention. I want to pay my tribute today to men who deserve the undying thanks of this generation of Canadians for what they have done in the field of cancer.

History will record what the people of Canada owe to this institute and to those who brought it into being, particularly men like Dr. Blair of Saskatchewan, Dr. Richards and Dr. Boyd of Ontario, Dr. Simard of Quebec and others who joined with me and my officials in a determined all-out attack on cancer. This action was followed by my recommendation to my colleagues in the government that a special grant for cancer be included in the national health program—a grant not included, by the way, in the proposals originally made to the provinces in 1945-46.

I have not mentioned the names of all those who collaborated with us in this enterprise to form the National Cancer Institute, but I have spoken of Blair and Richards and Boyd. Dr. Blair died a few months ago in the prime of life from heart trouble, due to the energy put into his work on behalf of the institute and of cancer generally; Dr. Richards died likewise a few months ago of leukemia, due directly to his work in the treatment of cancer. Dr. Boyd, I am happy to say—and with his approval—has himself recovered from cancer because of early diagnosis and efficient treatment. He is an example of what can be done with an effective program for cancer control.

Mr. Speaker, we will not have fulfilled our obligation until every person suffering from cancer in Canada is assured of the same opportunities for a successful result as that achieved by Dr. Boyd.

Through the cancer control grant, provincial programs can now be strengthened immeasurably. Saskatchewan, with an extensive and excellent program initiated 14 years ago, already has been allocated its full cancer control grant, freeing provincial funds for other purposes, as, for example, to combat arthritis and rheumatism. In most of the provinces, great activity is now developing under the cancer control grant. For example, Prince Edward Island is establishing two free diagnostic clinics and providing free tissue service; New Brunswick is purchasing $50,000 worth of cancer therapy equipment; cancer control activities are being actively supported in Quebec; in Manitoba, the federal grant is partly financing free diagnostic and radiation treatment; Alberta's excellent program for free diagnosis and treatment is being supported. In most of the provinces, money is being set aside from this federal grant to support the research being carried on by the National Cancer Institute.

In every province plans are going forward to take full advantage of the federal grant for cancer control. Our objective should be to have available within reasonable distance of every Canadian citizen a detection and diagnostic service to discover cancer in its earliest stages and to direct the patient to a properly-equipped and well-staffed treatment centre. The establishment of such centres is already being encouraged by the federal grant and in this trend lies much of our hope for further advances.

I have made this summary, and taken advantage of the patience of the house, because I believe that the country is interested in this report. I believe it wants to know how this money is being spent, and with what results. But I would not want to leave in the minds of the members of this house the impression that these new developments in any way reflect on the efforts made in previous years by provincial heatlh authorities to cope with problems that are basically their responsibility. This is too important a matter for political criticism. I feel that I should tell the house that, whatever my disabilities may be, I have thrown all my energies and my offices into this plan because I think that no man in public life in the last quarter of a century has had as great an opportunity for public service as that given to me through my administration of this plan.

For many years the provinces have been struggling with the manifold difficulties that present themselves in the field of public health, and they have developed excellent health services. But rising costs, the increase in our population, the aging of our people—these and other factors have increased intolerably the weight of provincial health programs.

Because of this, the federal government, in view of its national concern for the health of the Canadian people, has provided financial assistance to enable provincial governments, within the framework of our constitution, to carry out better their health responsibilities. Behind our thinking in setting up this national health program was the conviction that the energy our people had shown in war could find full expression in peace through efforts such as this to open to every citizen new opportunities for good healh. On all sides there is evidence of unprecedented activity.

In all efforts to lead this country into an era of better health we can take encouragement from recent progress. Let us compare the period 1945-47 with 1921-25. What do we find in this quarter-century? General mortality has decreased 16 per cent, infant death rates are down by 51 per cent, and maternal death rates by 64 per cent. There are many other encouraging trends. There are also some disheartening figures, but the over-all picture is bright. This is strikingly indicated by the fact that life expectancy at birth for Canadians has increased by 5 years for boys and 7 years for girls in the brief period since 1931.

In all that I have been saying today I feel this house can discern, because of the constructive action it took last year, the true pattern of health progress. The national health program is the latest in an impressive series of major acts of the federal government, in co-operation with provincial and municipal governments and with voluntary health and welfare agencies, to widen in Canada the jurisdiction of social justice. In the working out of this program, the medical, dental and nursing professions, the associations of professional and voluntary health workers and—in particular—the ministers of health and the governments of the provinces have given invaluable assistance and encouragement, indicating their conviction that the federal program represents a major advance in the continuing evolution of better health services for the Canadian people. May I say by way of conclusion—and again I thank the house for its patience—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friends clap. I want the country to know that I am dealing with the national health program which has been called the most important in Canada's health history.

Mr. Casselman: Let us have it all.

Mr. Martin: This house has now heard my account of how—less than half a year since the first provincial request was received in Ottawa—this program is vastly strengthening the entire structure of provincial health services for the people of this country. Let me call the roll of achievement:

One hundred and sixty million dollars in the next five years in federal health grants to the provinces.

Nine province-wide health surveys underway.

Six hundred provincial health projects approved.

New projects coming in at rate of $200,000 a day.

Federal aid this year for building hospitals totalling 13,000 beds.

Five hundred and thirty-seven health workers already being trained.

One million more chest X-rays this year.

Health research raised beyond $1,250,000 a year.

Canada's federal health grant program twice per capita that of United States.

Support for provincial public health programs.

More action against venereal disease.

More care for crippled children.

Great extensions of free treatment for major health scourges.

Campaigns reinforced against cancer, tuberculosis and mental illness.

Campaigns encouraged against arthritis and rheumatism.

Great advances in preventive medicine.

Foundations being firmly laid for hospital and medical care insurance.

The house will remember that all that I have said is but the beginning—part only of what has been done in a few months.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friends apparently do not appreciate the significance of this program to the people of Canada. The full potential of the national health program has yet to be realized. Our long advance towards good health, with the more rapid progress that this program makes possible, now brings us, for the first time, within sight of an age in which the Canadian citizen can be set free from many of the bonds of ill health that now restrict his creative and productive capacities. But there are many obstacles still to overcome. To every Canadian now goes the call to work with a good heart to lessen the dominion of disease so that the killers, the cripplers—all that withers and wastes human life, all that wars against happiness—will be made subject to science and human skill.

In our time we have seen governments increasingly concerned about conditions that only governments can rectify. A transformation has taken place in our thinking: we now accept without question that there are ways to the future that only governments can open. There are hazards to human welfare that only the collective strength of the community of citizens can overcome. We have seen growing in this country the humanitarian conviction that no Canadian should be debarred from adequate health care for lack of money. For we have come to realize the truth that his nation's prosperity, and the welfare and happiness of its people, are inevitably inextricably bound up with this nation's health. This is no new discovery: this is the high concept of public service that has led governments, conscious of their responsibilities, to care for the health of their people. At this time, should we not recall to mind how well Disraeli, same 72 years ago, enshrined this truth in memorable words:

> The health of the people is really the foundation upon which all their happiness and all their powers as a state depend. Take the most beautiful kingdom, give it intelligent and laborious citizens, prosperous manufacturers, productive agriculturists; let the arts flourish, let architecture cover the land with temples and palaces; and in order to defend all these riches, have well-trained armies and a powerful navy—if the population remains stationary, if it decreases yearly in vigour and in stature, the nation must perish. This is why I consider the first duty of statesmen is in the care of the public health.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with keen interest to the previous speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I trust he will pardon me if I do not follow his speech in detail. I am delighted to know that he is so keenly interested in his department, and that he is happily satisfied with its record, as he has given it to the house. I am glad to know, further, that, according to his report, the progress of his department is keeping pace with the general scientific progress this country is making.

May I first of all congratulate hon. members who have preceded me in the debate—whether I have been in agreement with them or not—upon the able presentation of the different points of view they have placed before the house. I would congratulate specially the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) and the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Demers) upon having ably moved and seconded the address in reply.

As this is the first opportunity I have had, perhaps I might be permitted to extend congratulations to the new leader of the historic Liberal party (Mr. St. Laurent), who assumed the prime ministership a comparatively short time after the convention of the Liberal party. I know he brings to the House of Commons a splendid background of Canadian culture, legal training and high character. I trust he may have the good health to permit him to carry the responsibilities which must go with his being head of the government and prime minister of this great dominion.

May I also extend my compliments to the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition (Mr. Drew), the leader of this party. He, too, has a splendid background of similar qualifications, involving legal attainments, experience in municipal and provincial affairs, and high character. I am sure all hon. members hope that in his youthful years he may have the health and strength which will permit him to assume greater responsibilities, as years go by.

I know all will agree that these two cultured gentlemen have brought to their respective parties satisfactory leadership; and I believe they will bring to the House of Commons those qualities which will be an enrichment of our parliamentary life in Canada.

The speech from the throne is a procedure in each session clothed with dignity. It is a dignified presentation. However, there is nothing very mysterious about it. The speech is cautiously written by the government of the day and with exacting regularity it is graciously read to both houses of parliament by His Excellency the Governor General.

Sometimes in our discussion of it we treat it as if it were something quite different. The one now before us is much the same as many others I have heard read in the past. It is full of generalities and excuses for what has not been done. This speech from the throne is more remarkable for what is not in it than for what is in it. It tells about one royal commission which has not reported, and which has dealt with matters the government should have decided. Then it asks the house to adopt a plan to name another royal commission to consider other problems which, if the government were not so tired and weary, it would undertake itself. Therefore I say that I see nothing in it of great concern, and I repeat that it is more notable for its omissions than for what it contains.

In his speech the Minister of National Health and Welfare stuck entirely and solely to his own department—and I am not surprised at that. Had I been he I believe I would have done the same thing, because I would have been prouder of my department than of some of the others. I am surprised that in the speech from the throne we do not find any sign that we might get away from some of the weaknesses the government has demonstrated.

All hon. members desire the prosperity, happiness and welfare of our people. But that is not achieved by legislation; it is not decreed by order in council. However, there are fundamental and basic enterprises in the country which are vitally affected by trade, by taxes, by centralization of power, and by a disregard of enterprise and thrift. And in the time left to me to speak in the debate I shall confine myself to these subjects.

May I point out at once that the crippling burden of taxation in Canada today threatens to stifle the thrift of our people, and is already showing signs of strangling domestic trade as well as hindering overseas trade. Despite what anyone says, that burden of taxation has raised the cost of living in the last year.

We are told that we have adopted a new form of budgeting. I am not just sure what it is called—cyclical, or—

An hon. Member: Sickening.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, someone says "sickening". However, it is a new brain-trust type of budgeting which permits the government of the day to take from the people what it thinks it can spend or save better than the people can spend or save for themselves. The government is probably saving it up—although they spent a good bit of it down in Digby-Annapolis-Kings and Nicolet-Yamaska; and there may be a general election before long. Some say it will be in the fall, and others say it will be in June. The general public is not sure when it will be. I think the government is afraid to go, and afraid not to go.

I do know however that 250 more men were named the other day to go out to investigate people with small incomes. They are to find out if the labouring man has paid his tax. They must find out if he has made his return —the hired man on the farm, the blacksmith, the merchant, the retired school teacher, the retired clergyman. All these are men and women who are having difficulty because of the high cost of living brought about by high taxation. They are having difficulty finding the money to send their children to complete their university education. Now they are hounded by more inspectors—highly-paid inspectors—to find out if the government cannot get more taxes. Little girls and young men working as waitresses and waiters in the hotels are going to have their tips taxed. Probably the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) tips more than many of us farmers can afford to tip. I do not know how they will strike an average because some must collect more than others. There is this continual effort to reduce what is left in the hands of the people by these devious methods of extracting money that the people have earned, in many cases money that they need. Last year the government took $670 million more than they needed, or $200 for every family from coast to coast.

When you stop to think of that, is it any wonder that business is falling? Is it any wonder that unemployment is increasing? Is it any wonder that our overseas markets are disappearing? I can remember how the party that now sits to your right shouted to high heaven when a sales tax of two per cent was put into force in 1920. I can still remember the tears that rolled down the face of the former Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), when the tax was raised to six per cent in 1935. The Minister of Justice of that time and the Minister of Finance said that the people could not stand that tax, that it would add to the cost of living, that it would add to the cost of a pair of baby's shoes or of the furniture needed in the home, that it would stop people from getting married. They thought that there would be thousands who would not get married because the tax was raised to six per cent. But now it is eight per cent. I am rather careful about making prophecies, even though some cabinet ministers are ready to prophesy when the next election will occur; but I venture to say that this government will reduce the sales tax before the next election, or perhaps in its present political desperation they will abolish it. They know that they do not need it. It will depend upon whether the election is to be in June or July or whether they will hang on to the last hour in the afternoon, knowing that they will never return.

Then we have the excise tax, which I believe was put into effect in 1942. I cannot say whether it will be abolished or not. I am not going to prophesy any more because one would have to be a wizard to prophesy what might happen when the brain-trust bureaucrats in the Department of Finance who direct the financial affairs of this country do not themselves know from one day to another. I would not be surprised if some day at eight o'clock the Minister of Finance came in and glibly, with a show of reckless assurance, told us that Canada's dollar is now worth only ninety cents. That would be just as much a shock to people in business as when it was placed at one dollar. Such tactics have strangled enterprise and have taken away our markets for agricultural and other primary products. That has been the result of maintaining our dollar at a dishonest value.

I do not know the inner workings of that department, but I know that many hon. members across the way do not know either. There are very few of those who sit on the front benches who know. I do not know yet why it was done and I am sure that the brain trusters cannot give a clear explanation of why they recommended that it be done.

I am not going to enlarge upon the burden of taxation, because everyone in this country knows what it means. This country was not developed under high taxation and this country cannot expand under it. The people of this country cannot afford to pay the high rates of taxation in vogue. The government know that, whether they will admit it or not. It may not make much difference now because a few hundred million does not seem to be very much in the eyes of the present government. As they are going to be in office for only a short time now I suppose we can stand the inflationary tax structure that we have.

Canada is a strong and powerful country. No country in the world with the same-sized population has ever had the same resources that we have. During the war we showed what a virile people we were. Our people must be strong to have endured this type of administration as long as they have. I am satisfied that they can endure it for a short while longer. As someone said the other day, there is bound to happen what happened in the hungry nineties, in the emergency of 1911 and again in the emergency of the thirties. Each time the Liberal party got the country into a mess, the people called upon the party to which I have the honour to belong.

That is not just a glib political statement, although I heard a lot of statements last night which were quite glib. Last evening we heard a tirade from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who I regret is not in the house at the moment. I have a high regard for him and I enjoy listening to him speak because over the years he has developed the rather happy faculty of being able by the use of a strong voice and experienced eloquence to convince himself and recklessly assure himself that all is well, whether that belief is based on fiction or on fact.

I listened last night with as keen interest as any fellow farmer of his could listen. I heard him tell us about the trade situation in Great Britain. I made some notes at the time but when I read his speech in Hansard I did not recognize my own notes. Knowing that Hansard never makes a mistake I shall not bother referring to them. However, I think I can remember the things that were worth remembering during the noise and bluster of a most eloquent effort.

Despite what the minister has said about our overseas markets I do know, as every hon. member in this house knows, that Great Britain has drastically cut her imports of foodstuffs from Canada. She has drastically cut her importations of salmon. She has abandoned her importations of poultry and apples. She has reduced her timber imports to only a fraction of pre-war quantities. She has reduced her bacon imports to one-quarter what they were in 1943. She has reduced her egg importations from Canada to 62 per cent of what they were last year, and her cheese imports are the lowest in thirty years.

Not long ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said that that will not matter very much because we can sell to the United States. The Minister of Agriculture told us that in selling our wheat to Great Britain for hundreds of millions of dollars less than we could get for it on the world market we were building up a stable market. I think these men should get together. Last night the Minister of Agriculture said that we had not lost anything. About a year ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said that in 1946 Canada sold her wheat for $123 million less than she could have got in the world market, in 1947 for $229 million less, and in the first two months of the following year for $358 million less.

In a press release the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is quoted as saying that the two governments have already agreed that their representatives shall meet again before the 31st July, 1950, to settle any obligation that the United Kingdom owes Canada under clause 2(b) in selling wheat for that much less. Whom are we to believe, Mr. Speaker? One minister says we are building up new markets in the United Kingdom. Another minister says that we have lost them but it does not matter because we have markets in the United States. One says it has made us money; the other says it has lost us money. I am not surprised that the Prime Minister found it necessary to take dancing lessons to keep step with the crowd around him.

Never in the history of the agricultural economy of Canada have we seen such a socialistic state-planning muddle. The situation is muddled and befuddled by one who claims to be a free enterpriser, but he is always looking over his shoulder to satisfy those who recently have been courting so closely that in the next few months, probably before the election, you will see the greatest political marriage Canada has ever seen. That is not by way of prophecy; that is only by way of warning. I want to say to my friends to the left, as I would say to any maiden who is looking at an old politician, "Be very careful whom you marry at the present time".

Mr. Knowles: Do you think Duplessis is a maiden?

Mr. Rowe: You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that last night the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) went back to a time before the war. He went back before 1930, but his remarks were slightly different from the speech he made last year. He mentioned Bennett buggies last year and he did not mention them this year. I have never seen him make a more eloquent attempt; I have never heard him speak more loudly; I have never heard those behind him pound their desks more vigorously, particularly when they thought interruptions might threaten. There is not one within the sound of my voice, including yourself, Mr. Speaker, in your non-political position, who does not know that we have lost the British market. There is not a member in the house who can rise and tell me that we now have a market for as many farm products three years after the last war as we had in 1921, three years after the first great war, despite all the progress reports we have listened to this afternoon.

The Minister of Agriculture says he has been here for fourteen years, but so have I. I know something about the policies of the party to which he belongs. I was amazed last night, despite the experience he has had, that he expected even you, Mr. Speaker, to believe that my party never believed in trade, that it never had respect for the provinces, that it never had trade overseas, that it was his party that championed the old, dusty, free-trade doctrine in the west and protection in the east until the radio came into being and the people of Canada knew that there could no longer be high protection in the east and free trade in the west.

We have the highest protective policy now that this country has ever had, an austerity program, not prohibitive protection but austerity prohibition. Thousands were put out of business. Ten per cent has been put on right across the board, not even in the form of the countervailing duty that the party to your right, Mr. Speaker, planned in 1930. At that time they planned a countervailing duty, and left the determining of our fiscal policies to Washington. I am not so sure that, when they planned to inflict a dishonest dollar on our economy, that was not planned in Washington also.

I should like to reply to the warnings of dangers that I heard in the house last night. Let me refer to 1921, as the Minister of Agriculture did last night. That was the time when the Liberal party assumed power. Three years after the first great war we were selling to the United Kingdom 255 million pounds of bacon. That was the market built up by those who never had any regard for trade. What do we find now? We find that, despite the fact that the Minister of Agriculture told the farmers of Canada that they could depend on Great Britain taking a stable amount of about 450 million pounds, he has recently announced that Great Britain will take only 160 million pounds this year. By all the signs of the times the deliveries will be less than that.

Mr. Bertrand (Prescott): Is that Canada's responsibility?

Mr. Rowe: In 1921 we sold 77 million pounds of beef to Great Britain. In 1930, when the Liberal party went out of power and the Conservative party came into power, we were buying and selling Danish bacon over the counters in Regina and other cities throughout Canada. We were buying canned beef, 18,000 head of cattle in cans, to feed our own people.

Then let us take butter and cheese. In 1921, three years after the first great war, we sold over twice as much cheese as the right hon. Minister of Agriculture has been able to make arrangements to sell. Yet he is the great champion of trade, the great negotiator for agricultural products, the man who has taken unto himself more authority than any other minister has since confederation, the man who can tell you what to sow and who can tell you what to reap, the man who summerfallows the farms one year and summerfallows the farmers the next, the man who has cost the western provinces $300 million to $500 million. If there should have been any cost to anybody in Canada by reason of such muddling because of inexperience, then the cost should have been spread over the whole dominion and not imposed on one class of our people. I know whereof I speak. I do not pretend to be able to say it with the force that was evidenced last night, but for anyone to stand up in this house, let alone a man who has been here for fourteen years, and say that the overseas markets are developed now, and that they were hindered in 1932 by the imperial trade agreements, is something which I could describe but not in parliamentary language.

Not only had we lost our overseas market for mixed farm products, but every elevator in Canada was filled with unsold grain. The Minister of Agriculture led us to believe that he could make these people pay whatever was asked for wheat, and that we would always find a market for our wheat. What happened? The Liberal party negotiated more trade treaties between 1926 and 1930 than any other party has in a similar number of years. They bragged about the number of treaties they negotiated, and yet we find our markets are steadily slipping away. Now we have a repetition of the old song, "twenty-one years is a long, long time." It is a long time since 1921. Canada has made some progress. It is very fine to get up and say we sold ten million dollars' worth in 1928 and that we sell only four hundred million dollars' worth now. That does not mean anything more than a woman saying that in 1929 she bought a better hat for $1.98 than she bought last week for $19.70. You do not compare things that way. If you do, why is our dollar today worth only about fifty cents or one-half of its former value?

As I have said before, Mr. Speaker, we must now face the stark facts. It is no longer fiction as far as the apple growers of the Annapolis valley are concerned. It is no longer fiction as far as the mixed farmers are concerned; and when this government get through "margarining" the dairy industry it will no longer be fiction to them either, when they find they have lost their markets for cheese and other products. I say the hour has struck, and this government should stop, look and listen. I do not want to be unduly critical, and I am not easily alarmed, but never in all my experience have I seen such a fiasco as our negotiations with the United Kingdom. If anyone has any doubt of that, just look at what happened. If those negotiations had been successful the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would have referred to them in very different terms, and would have told us what had happened.

As a kindness to the minister, and in order to help him out, I want to try to explain to the house where I think we have fallen down to a great extent. For many years, both before and after I entered this house, we had those who wanted us to think there was something mysterious about the party of which the minister was speaking last night. On one occasion the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett happened to say that we would blast our way into the markets of the world. That was just a figure of speech; I have heard worse many times from the other side of the house, from both the front and the back benches. What he meant, as he often explained, was that we would try to get those markets, by buying more of their goods, by making trade agreements, or in other ways. The old, historic Liberal party is the one that was in existence, Mr. Speaker, about the time you came into public life. It is not the one that is veering toward socialism, with all these novel doctrines of state planning. It is not the party we see today picking up all the tag ends of other groups who are beginning to lose their identity. It was the old party that believed in free trade, who said, "If we want to sell our products in foreign markets they must be able to buy." In those days we who came from the province of Ontario were regarded almost as enemies of the state because we believed in a fiscal policy which would give reasonable protection, which would provide full dinner pails for the workmen who made agricultural implements for use by our own farmers. Why, those sitting on the government side in those days thought you had almost economic horns if you even mentioned protection. Yet within about three years they brought in what were called countervailing duties. I am not surprised that some hon. gentlemen to your right look astonished, and do not understand what that means. The government which brought them in did not understand them either, until it was pointed out by the then leader of this party that this was a new form of Liberal free trade which from that time on would be amended in Washington, so that whenever Washington put on a tariff of fifty per cent we would increase our tariff to fifty per cent also. As a result we had the highest form of protection ever known in this country.

These doctrines are old now, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps it is unnecessary to talk about them. Even the party to your right have forgotten about them, though by devious means they have maintained the highest protection policy this country has ever known. How my friends to my left can support and love them just the same is beyond the comprehension of those of us who used to be condemned for suggesting reasonable protection. We were asked, "How can you hope to build industries in Ontario and Quebec? How can you hope to make the implements the farmers use if we are to sell in the British market, the greatest market in the world? We must buy from the British market if we hope to sell in it." How many of us have heard that argument. I have heard it ever since I used to go with my father to political meetings. From a fiscal tariff point of view, Mr. Speaker, if the party to your right did not believe that, they did not believe anything.

But have they been consistent in that regard? Even though it was necessary, because of the financial folly of trying to maintain a dishonest dollar, to establish an austerity prohibition policy with respect to United States goods, there was no reason why we could not have bought more British goods. As everyone knows, we were short of iron and steel, to the point we expected to have steel rationing. We were short of implements and instruments. We were short of coal. We bought millions of dollars' worth of coal from the United States, and though the United Kingdom increased its coal production last year fifteen times, Canada imported only about one-seventh of her imports in 1938.

Even though we needed iron and steel hardware and implements, instruments and all the rest of it, we reduced our imports from Britain in 1948 as compared with 1947, despite the fact that the United Kingdom increased her exports to foreign countries by over twenty per cent. We took only one per cent of Britain's production. They greatly increased their exports to Finland, to Sweden, to Spain, to Denmark, to Czechoslovakia, to Poland and to the Netherlands.

Now that the party to your right, Mr. Speaker, seems to be losing confidence in its own policies, I am beginning to think they might have had something when they said that if you want to sell in a market you must enable those people to buy from you. What has happened in Britain? We find that Britain has made forty bilateral trade agreements with foreign countries, under which she has shipped her coal, iron and steel to Russia, the Netherlands, Poland and other countries, whether under the barter system or some other system. But we find that these great champions of trade promotion here, who have made one hundred and twenty-two trade agreements with the United Kingdom since the beginning of the war, are all washed up now except for three agreements other than that with respect to wheat. The one for bacon, as I say, was reduced to one quarter of what it was, and the other contract for eggs was reduced to 62 per cent of what it was. The quota for cheese has been reduced to the lowest amount we have shipped to Britain in over thirty years. We have followed this course after making one hundred and twenty-two agreements with Britain, but we were making them for one year, not for two years. Three or four of these agreements were made for two years.

I sometimes wonder, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Church: They hang their best customer on the sour apple tree.

Mr. Rowe: I do not know whether or not they do, but I know they are paying a lot of money to uproot a lot of trees because markets cannot be found for the products, even though the government tried to give Britain some help. It is not the fault of the apple grower, nor is it the fault of the packer. In view of the Minister of Agriculture's statement last night, I should like to draw to the attention of the house the fact that not only has Britain negotiated forty new bilateral agreements with foreign countries, but many of those agreements were made for ten years. Our three recent contracts were made for only one year, and even the wheat contract terminates in 1950.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time and can only continue with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Church: The Minister of Agriculture spoke for nearly an hour and a half.

Mr. Rowe: I thank you for the courtesy extended to me, Mr. Speaker, although I do not want to copy the weaknesses of the cabinet ministers and speak too long. Since it is close to six o'clock it would spoil a speech to commence it now, so I will continue for a few minutes.

Like the previous speaker, I feel this is of prime importance and I say it with all the sincerity I possess. If this great agricultural country of Canada loses the United Kingdom market, which has been our best market since confederation, then I say it will be a calamity for the Canadian farmer, the fruit producer as well as the wheat producer. In his speech last night the Minister of Agriculture did not tell this house why he lost those markets. He did not tell this house that the markets for which he had been paying so much are now being given to foreign countries. He did say that when he was in England he saw the reason why we could not sell apples from the Annapolis valley. He should have told the people before the Digby-Annapolis-Kings by-election. It remained for the newly elected member for that riding to tell the truth about that. The minister told us that when he was in England he saw every tree loaded with apples. Every apple tree in Britain seemed to be bearing more apples than ever before. Everywhere the minister went, he saw apples. He tried to impress the house with the fact that he did not eat anything but applesauce while he was in Britain. It was for this reason he was unable to sell apples.

I thought this was rather strange. Everyone in this house believed Britain was not importing many apples because the apple trees in Britain were loaded with fruit. We believed the British people did not need to import apples. I wanted to make sure the source of my information was correct, so I secured a copy of the Trade and Navigation Report of the United Kingdom, tabled in the British House of Commons on January 22. I believe this information, Mr. Speaker, more or less justifies the statement I have made about the noise and fiction of last night's speech replacing facts. Last year the United Kingdom imported 466,179 hundredweight more of apples than the year before. Great Britain imported more than a million hundredweight from Australia. Importations from New Zealand the year before had been nil, but in 1948 they imported 357,529 hundredweight. From other British countries, Great Britain imported eighteen times as many apples in 1948 as she did in 1947. From other foreign countries, Mr. Speaker, Britain imported almost four times as many, 121,945 hundredweight in 1947 and 471,883 hundredweight in 1948. In other words, Great Britain imported 466,179 hundredweight more apples and yet Canada, who exported 663,145 hundredweight in 1947, is today spending several million dollars in uprooting the trees. We have not exported a single hundredweight.

When you realize that Great Britain imported 23·5 per cent more apples in 1948, it seems highly unfair to inflict this story on us. I have just mentioned a few of the things the minister should have told this house last night as to why we lost the United Kingdom market. It is because we did not buy from Britain some of the goods that were in short supply in Canada. At one time I was cruel enough to suggest that the Minister of Agriculture would make a better minister of politics. Since we are both interested in agriculture, however, I should like to suggest now that he would make a better minister of applesauce than of agriculture.

I realize that the empire trade agreements have always been matters to which those gentlemen to your right, Mr. Speaker, like to refer. I remember being in the house at the time these agreements were being discussed. I can remember many of the speeches that were made. When I heard the Minister of Agriculture mention that as a reason why Canada could not get into the United Kingdom market—well, that is too fast for me. I do not need to even refer to such a ridiculous statement during the few minutes so courteously allotted to me. I should like to say, however, that at the time the empire trade agreements were being discussed the ex-Minister of Finance and former member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings was in this house. I well recall the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett challenging him to vote against the empire trade agreements. He knew what those trade agreements would mean to the apple growers of the Annapolis valley, and when the vote came he stood up courageously as the only Liberal in this house who voted for the empire trade agreements. Mr. Ilsley is gone, Mr. Speaker, and the preference for Annapolis valley apples is gone too. So far as the government is concerned, the party to your right, Mr. Speaker, is gone too. So we see, Mr. Speaker, that the truth will out in time. I have said that you cannot bring prosperity by legislation, nor can you obtain happiness by order in council. But I believe—and I am glad there are in this country many people who still believe—that by hard work, enterprise, initiative, genius and the skill of our people we can overcome these difficulties.

I shall not, as had been my intention, take further time of the house to deal with centralization as it affects individual enterprise and initiative. But I could not help thinking about what the minister said last night when he was speaking about provincial rights. He waxed eloquent, stood out near the mace so everyone would be impressed, and said that the party to your left, Mr. Speaker, were now provincial-righters, that they had never stood for provincial rights, that he had been here for fourteen years and had never heard that they cared for provincial governments or had any regard or respect for them. He did not say that those better men of his own party and of our party established provincial rights in this country together. He did not say that the speeches that were made by many all down through the years on both sides of the house indicated a belief in provincial rights. I was somewhat amused when in the course of his speech he was critical of the leader of this party. I would ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) to make a note of this page.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): What line?

Mr. Rowe: I will read the lines to the minister, and I think he will be able to find them on that page. I do not want to take undue advantage of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his absence, although he could not change the language today if he were here. He says, at page 785 of Hansard:

> Under the system that is being followed now it is true that we centralize criticism upon the federal government, but when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) gets up and says that is centralizing government in Canada, I say to him that what we are actually doing is allowing the provincial governments to spend enough money to make themselves popular and keep themselves in power.

That was when he was waxing eloquent about provincial rights. Now at this late day in our confederation in Canada we have a great Liberal champion who will allow the provincial governments to spend enough money to keep them in power. It may not matter to him now whether they are Liberal or Conservative or if by chance they are represented by socialists. But the incident recalls to me the days when I sat in the house and heard the ex-Prime Minister say, not a five-cent piece to any Tory government.

I had intended to speak about centralization, but I am satisfied after hearing the returns from Digby-Annapolis-Kings and, again, the louder and more vociferous returns from Nicolet-Yamaska.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member may laugh, but the laugh was the other way; and he who laughs last laughs best. I have seen this country divided and I have seen the olive branch of unity tossed hither and yon. But now at last we find that we have a common purpose in this country, and that no longer can there be raised those issues that should not be raised. If anyone here doubts me when I say that we must restore enterprise, safeguard our individual freedom and revive the national character, in view of the fact that we are one of the last outposts in the world, may I say that I know there are those to your right, Mr. Speaker, who believe the same thing. I will quote only some of the statements that have been made. The Hon. Angus L. Macdonald said:

> . . . the present government has no life-lease on power; that the war psychology should be over; that unelected bureaucracy should no longer govern Canada; that provincial rights should be restored; that we should have nine happy provinces, instead of nine different countries.

Then that congenial, lovable character who has represented Quebec South for so many years and who is an ex-minister of the crown, the Hon. C. G. Power, said this:

> Ministers of the crown must abandon the practice of abdicating their functions, their duties, and shouldering their responsibilities on the shoulders of those irresponsible boards, committees and commissions.
> It is because we have departed from that doctrine that a large part of the unrest in our ranks has developed. Without the existence of an almost all-powerful bureaucracy it is unlikely we would have had budget by radio, restraint of trade by embargoes and prohibitions, bungling of freight rates, and a snarling of interprovincial affairs.

Of his party he said:

> . . . they should be provincial-righters instead of dominion centralizers.

He did not say that they were, but he said that they should be. Then he went on to say also:

> Our party has gone down to defeat in three provinces. This should be testimony enough without further comment.

The further comment, I would say, is in the loss since that time of three ridings in which that type of party muddling has gone down to defeat.

I wish to thank the house for the courtesy extended to me. Before it is too late, Mr. Speaker, I hope the party to your right will return to the ways they intended to take; because even in opposition in the future they will be better off if they act in such a way as to be truer to their former selves.

On motion of Mr. Matthews (Kootenay East) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall continue this debate.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 24, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO LETTER IN "LE DEVOIR" OF FEBRUARY 23

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In Le Devoir of Wednesday, February 23, appears a letter by their correspondent, Pierre Vigeant, of which the translation of one sentence is as follows:

> The C.C.F. party continues a systematic struggle against all French immigration or those who might be susceptible to becoming French.

May I say that the C.C.F. has always urged immigration into this country regardless of race, creed or language, provided that those who come here will become good citizens of Canada. May I say that in a statement issued on October 18, 1948—and this has application to the emigrés who have been the subject of discussion in this house—we said this:

> The C.C.F. fully supports the recent government decision to admit French nationals to Canada on the same basis as British nationals. But this decision must be safeguarded against opening Canada as a haven for ex-nazi collaborators of the Vichy regime.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

WHEAT

INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICE PAID TO WESTERN PRODUCERS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to announce the decision of the government in regard to increasing the initial price being paid to western producers under the Canadian Wheat Board Act. As hon. members of the house know, all wheat delivered to the Canadian wheat board between August 1, 1945 and July 31, 1950 constitutes a five year pool. When this pool was first established, the initial price was set at $1.35 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern wheat in store Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver.

Last March parliament amended the Canadian Wheat Board Act to give the governor in council power to increase the initial price being paid to producers. At that time the Canadian wheat board had a substantial cash surplus on hand arising from its operations during the first two and a half years of the five year pool period. The government decided that at that time the initial price to producers would be increased from $1.35 per bushel to $1.55 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern wheat in store Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver. Accordingly the board was authorized to increase its initial price to $1.55 per bushel effective April 1, 1948. At that time provision was made whereby the board would make the new initial price of $1.55 per bushel effective on all wheat delivered to the board between August 1, 1945 and March 31, 1948. This retroactive payment involved the distribution of 20 cents per bushel on 776 million bushels of wheat and the distribution of about $155 million among producers delivering wheat to the board during the period to which I have referred.

At the end of the crop year ending last July the board again had a substantial operating surplus, and this surplus has been increased substantially as a result of sales made during the present crop year. During 1948-49 the board is selling wheat to the United Kingdom, under the Canada-United Kingdom wheat agreement, at $2 per bushel plus a carrying charge of 5 cents per bushel; the board is selling wheat for domestic purposes at $2 per bushel plus a carrying charge of 5 cents per bushel. Substantial export sales have been made to countries other than the United Kingdom at prices in excess of $2 per bushel. Having regard to these facts, and having regard to the price assurance involved for the crop year 1949-50 as a result of the $2 agreement price already negotiated for the final year of the five year pool, the government has decided that the initial price paid to western wheat producers can now be increased by a further 20 cents per bushel, or to $1.75 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern wheat in store Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver. This increased initial price will apply on all wheat delivered to the Canadian wheat board since August 1, 1945, and all wheat which will be delivered to the board up to and including July 31, 1950.

The government has taken the necessary action under the Canadian Wheat Board Act to increase the initial price of wheat to $1.75 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern in store Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver. This increased initial price will become effective on April 1, 1949. The Canadian wheat board is therefore proceeding to increase its buying price at country points on April 1, 1949. The board is also taking the necessary steps to make the new initial price effective as from August 1, 1945. This involves payment of 20 cents per bushel on all wheat delivered to the board between August 1, 1945 and March 31, 1949. The board estimates that its receipts under the five year pool up to March 31, 1949, will amount to about 1,070 million bushels; consequently producers will receive a total of about $214 million in respect to their deliveries from August 1, 1945, to March 31, 1949. When these adjustment payments have been completed, the initial price under the five year pool will have been increased from $1.35 per bushel to $1.75 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern wheat in store Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver, and as a result of the two adjustments in the initial price authorized by the government, producers will have received retroactive payments of approximately $370 million.

The government has decided that this payment should be made to western wheat producers prior to seeding, and to that end the Canadian wheat board will commence the distribution of cheques on March 31. As a result of the previous adjustment payment, producers' certificates for the period August 1, 1945 to March 31 1948 are now in the hands of the board, and the 20 cent payment on deliveries during this period will be issued at the rate of 40,000 cheques per day commencing on March 31. This rate of distribution is in line with the capacity of the post offices to distribute mail in excess of normal quantities, and the ability of the banks to clear the large number of cheques involved. The rate at which cheques can be mailed, in respect to wheat delivered to the board after March 31, 1948, will depend upon the rate at which producers send their producers' certificates to the board for payment.

In effecting this distribution commencing at the end of March, the government has in mind the expenses which wheat producers incur in seeding their crops and in carrying out their spring and early summer operations on the land. The government also has in mind the fact that a large number of wheat producers in western Saskatchewan and eastern Alberta harvested small crops last year. Over substantial areas yields per acre have been low for the past two seasons. Under these circumstances the government feels that an early payment in respect to deliveries since August 1, 1945 will be most helpful if made prior to seeding.

I might add that the Canadian wheat board is making arrangements to give preference in the mailing of cheques to areas which harvested short crops in 1947 or 1948.

In conclusion I should like to point out that the decision which I have announced means that wheat producers in the prairie provinces are now guaranteed $1.75 per bushel for the five-year period ending July 31, 1950, and they are still entitled to receive any surplus which may be in the hands of the Canadian wheat board after the wheat of the 1949-50 pool period has been sold.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. C. Miller (Portage la Prairie): I should like to ask the minister a question, arising in part out of his statement as to increase of initial price paid to western producers. Does the minister think it is necessary to insist that the producers send in the duplicates of their participation certificates when these payments are made from time to time by the board? The duplicates are not assignable or negotiable, and in view of the fact also—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should realize that this is a question which should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Howe: The answer is that the certificates are all in, up to March 31, 1948. I see no reason to change the procedure of the board, which seems to work very satisfactorily, though I shall be glad to call the attention of the board to the question asked by my hon. friend. Since it is a matter of internal management on the part of the board, in my opinion it is a matter for the board to decide.

INCOME TAX

FARMERS—BASIS OF COMPUTATION—BASIC HERDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Can the Minister of National Revenue explain to the house what is meant by the press comment of this morning that a new tax computation or new tax set-up is to be established for farmers?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I did not see the report, but I shall take the hon. gentleman's question as notice.

Mr. Graydon: If I may ask a supplementary question, has the minister any comment to make with respect to the brief submitted yesterday by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture? It has to do with a revision of farmers' income tax with respect to basic herds, I think.

Mr. McCann: I have no comment to make, other than that the directive in reference to basic herds is being given reconsideration.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask a question arising out of the answer the minister has just given to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). Will the minister say whether he will extend beyond April 1, 1949, the time for filing returns?

Mr. McCann: That is a matter to which we will give consideration.

NATIONAL HEALTH

FEDERAL GRANTS APPROVED AND AMOUNTS EXPENDED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Will the Minister of National Health and Welfare please take a look at the return which was laid on the table in response to a question I asked yesterday? The question was:

How much of the thirty million dollars in health grants has been spent to date by each of the provinces on each of the various types of health grants?

The answer is:

No figures available before the end of the fiscal year.

Order in council P.C. 3402 requires that the amount expended in the development of such projects during the preceding month shall be submitted to the minister, and so on. It seems to me there is a mistake in the answer to that question.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I shall be glad to look into it at once.

FLAX

INQUIRY AS TO SUPPORT PRICE FOR 1949

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): As many farmers are now busy planning their operations for spring seeding, for which they require good seed—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Howe: What is the question?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Will the minister say as soon as possible whether there will be a support price for flax produced in 1949? Many farmers are inquiring now.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The situation as to flax is so uncertain it is not likely that any decision about a support price will be made for some months to come. If any farmer is in doubt whether or not he should plant flax, I would advise him not to plant it.

HOUSING

INTEGRATED HOUSING PLAN—STOCKPILING OF LUMBER BY CENTRAL HOUSING AND MORTGAGE CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply whether the government is continuing or suspending the integrated housing plan.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his question. The answer is that the integrated plan, which is under section 4B of the National Housing Act, is being reviewed in the hope that some modified form can be arrived at to overcome certain of the difficulties which occurred in isolated cases in 1948. An announcement will be made in due course.

While I am on my feet I should like to reply to the question asked by the hon. member yesterday having to do with purchases of lumber by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Contracts for the construction of veterans rental units are asked on two bases: first, that the contractor supply all materials, and second, that Central Mortgage provide materials. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation prefers the former type of contract, but their experience has been that units can be brought in for lower prices under the second form of contract. Most of the projects are proceeding on the latter basis. In order to provide materials to contractors, Central Mortgage is purchasing lumber in specified lengths. Bids have been asked for some eleven million feet for the Ontario area. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation purchases the lumber in the cheapest market, which usually is directly from producers by car lots. However, in this particular order tenders are also being received on the basis of the lumber being stored in the local yards of the bidders, and any retailer who wishes has the opportunity to submit a tender. Tenders have not yet been opened for the transaction referred to by the hon. member.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister give the house his assurance that no purchases will be made except after tender?

Mr. Winters: I can only say it is the policy of the corporation to call for tenders wherever that procedure is practicable.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WAITING PERIOD WITH RESPECT TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodney Young (Vancouver Centre): Is the government taking steps to reduce the nine-day waiting period now required between the time of application for unemployment insurance and its actual payment?

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): The government has received no recommendation in this regard from the unemployment insurance advisory committee or the unemployment insurance commission itself. I have been informed, however, that the unemployment insurance commission is at present considering the matter. I should point out to my hon. friend that the nine-day waiting period is statutory; it is in the basic law, and it is necessary to give some consideration to the actuarial basis of the fund before any change is made.

Mr. Fraser: The Minister of Labour refers to a waiting period in regard to unemployment insurance, and says he had not received any recommendation in this regard from the unemployment insurance office. Has he received any request from municipalities throughout the country?

Mr. Mitchell: The ministers received many requests about many subjects. I should like to point out to the hon. member and to the people who have written him that the unemployment insurance advisory committee is responsible for protecting the contributions made by both parties to the scheme. In effect this is a trust fund. It is the easiest thing in the world to pass resolutions—"Therefore be it resolved that we move the earth"—but let somebody else do the moving.

Mr. Fraser: Responsible persons have written to the minister, as have many municipalities.

CLOSING OF GOVERNMENT-OPERATED FACTORIES IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Julian H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Is the Minister of Labour aware that the premier of Alberta is about to close some government-operated factories, and that he may have to take care of a large number of people who will be on relief in Saskatchewan?

[Mr. Winters.]

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): I think I should correct the hon. member's statement. This is being done in Saskatchewan, not Alberta.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. H. Matthews (Kootenay East): In rising to participate in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I should like to express a few of my personal convictions.

First, I should like to convey my congratulations to both the mover (Mr. Brown) and the seconder (Mr. Demers) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In previous sessions of parliament I have heard the speech from the throne described as innocuous, something devoid of real meaning and significance. No one reading this particular speech from the throne could truthfully refer to it as innocuous. Unquestionably it deals with matters of great importance to the people of Canada. His Excellency the Governor General stated correctly that the first concern of a government is to ensure the peace and security of its people. Certainly no right-thinking person could challenge that statement.

When we come to devise methods of ensuring peace and security, however, divergent views arise. Whatever methods are employed to secure the desired result, they will be conditioned by the state of the world which calls them forth.

In this present session of parliament we are to declare our stand on the north Atlantic pact. I for one give to the north Atlantic pact my wholehearted support. In a speech delivered by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), and reported in Hansard of Monday, January 31, at page 96, I notice a reference to the fact that his group supports the north Atlantic pact. This is evidence of their good judgment. The hon. member goes on to say, however, that the proposal to set up this north Atlantic pact indicates a loss of faith in the United Nations assembly and the security council. With that opinion I certainly do not agree. I believe that for the few years we have had a United Nations organization, it has more than justified its existence. Certainly it has not come up to our expectations, but in point of fact, Mr. Speaker, our realizations rarely ever do come up to our expectations. In the main I believe the actions of that organization have been motivated by good will. I believe also that time will enable us to view the work of the United Nations in a truer perspective than is possible today.

No doubt there are some who look upon this north Atlantic pact as designed to provoke war. Frankly I do not see it in that light at all. My mind goes back, sir, to those memorable years that gave rise to Hitler and the nazi regime. We saw the war clouds gathering; we heard the muttering of the storm in the distance, yet we felt helpless to prevent the war. The fear of war was raised in many hearts, but we could not and did not act, other than to follow a policy of appeasement that did not appease. As we know all too well, a devastating war broke upon the world, and for six long years we fought for our very existence, until victory crowned our arms. Once again we see the war clouds gathering. Nations, our own included, are rearming as quickly as possible. What are we to do? Are we to stand helplessly aside, petrified by fear, or shall we do something before it is too late? The setting up of this north Atlantic pact is, to my mind, the effort of peace-loving nations. It is the combining of their strength to maintain peace in a world that is weary of war.

Since leaving my constituency to attend this session of parliament I have been disturbed by reports in the press that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has decided to convert many locomotives from coal to oil burners, especially locomotives operating through the Crowsnest pass and on the Calgary to Edmonton run. There can be no doubt that the recent discovery of new and extensive oil reserves in Alberta has had something to do with this decision. Coal has steadily increased in price, along with other commodities, both to small and to large consumers. It has been said, and it will be said again, that the steadily increasing wage scales applicable to our miners have brought about this unfortunate situation. In other words the blame is being laid at the door of the coal miners of Alberta and British Columbia. It is true that wages have been increased in order to avoid work stoppages, but those wage demands have been made necessary by the steady increase in the cost of living; and a large part of the responsibility for the increase in the cost of living rests upon this government because of its mistaken policies. Had price controls been retained, these inflationary tendencies could have been curbed. It is easy to blame the coal miners for making legitimate wage demands. To any person who is inclined to do that, I would say this: you had better be prepared to take off your coat and show a willingness to go down into the coal mines and work as these men do, under the same conditions, facing death every hour in many forms.

I have spoken before in this house of the need for ample meals for men engaged in a heavy industry such as coal mining, and I do not intend to repeat those remarks today, except to say this. The housewives who prepare meals today fully realize the difference between meals of the sandwich variety and those which include vegetables, butter, eggs, bacon, cheese, and so on. Such meals cost real money, let no one make any mistake about it.

No doubt there are many who will defend the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's decision to convert their engines from coal to oil burners, but let us look at the picture. They have secured a twenty-one per cent increase in freight rates. They have increased the price of all meals in their dining cars and of all berths in their sleeping cars. What, then, is the purpose of these increases? Is it to show a favourable balance sheet at the end of the year? Is it in order that they may pay higher dividends to their shareholders? If so, I want to say that such a result will be dearly bought if it is to be at the cost of a long-established industry, and if it threatens the security of the men, women and children to whom this industry means so much. Boards of trade in Alberta and British Columbia are vigorously protesting this action on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but the company has declared its unalterable determination to proceed according to plan. I want to tell the government that this is not the last they will hear of this particular matter.

It is only a little better than a year ago that a royal commission on coal presented its report to the government. At that time a nation-wide survey was made looking to the stabilizing of the coal industry. In view of these more recent developments there will soon be no coal industry to stabilize; for I believe that what is now taking place through this action of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is the beginning of the end of our coal mining industry.

Before I leave the question of coal and coal miners, I wish to voice a grievance which to many of our coal miners is a source of much irritation. During the year 1947 many of our coal miners, particularly in the Fernie and Michel areas, worked steadily and qualified themselves for two weeks' holidays with pay in 1948, according to the terms of their working agreement. The house will remember, however, that last spring we suffered disastrous floods in many parts of British Columbia. The Kootenays and the Crowsnest pass areas were terribly unfortunate in this respect. Owing to the damage to railway bridges, traffic on the railways was suspended, with the result that for three weeks our coal mines were idle. When the miners applied for unemployment insurance benefits for that period, it was refused to those who had holidays with pay coming to them. On the other hand, men who had not laboured so diligently as to qualify for holidays with pay, men who had not hesitated to be absentees, received unemployment insurance payments for the whole period during which the mines were idle. It would seem that in the unemployment insurance regulations there are still some kinks which need to be ironed out.

I now want to refer to a situation which exists at Field in British Columbia, a town in the Yoho national park. Field is a railway divisional point. It is here that the time changes from Pacific time to mountain and vice versa. Field is built on a mountainside sloping down to the Kicking Horse river. It has no sewage-disposal system. Each home has its own septic tank. Many of these have served for so many years that they overflow, to the annoyance of those who live on the lower levels. This situation constitutes a threat to the health and well-being of all the people in that particular community. To make matters worse, there is a real need of an effective water supply. Much of the water for household purposes is taken from the Kicking Horse river, which in more recent years has been polluted by the tailings from the base metals mine located farther up the river. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. MacKinnon), on whose department rests responsibility for the care of our national parks, would earn the deep gratitude of the people of Field if appropriate action could be taken with respect to these matters.

We understand that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is now preparing a budget for the fiscal year 1949-50. For two years in succession—at least this will be so when this forthcoming budget is brought down—he will be reporting to the house staggering surpluses. Consequently nearly everyone is demanding tax reductions, and I join in that demand. I want particularly to suggest the dropping of the two cent tax on soft drinks, and the return of the five cent chocolate bar. The government prides itself on its adherence to the principle of free enterprise, but certainly these taxes on the soft drink industry have had the result of almost putting some of these people out of business. It has a strong bearing as well on the question of employment. In June 1947 a tax was put on soft drinks in the state of Pennsylvania in the United States. The result of that tax was responsible for a twenty-five per cent drop in employment in the soft drink industry in that state. Our Canadian tax has had a similar effect in this country.

The 1941 census figures list 61,266 retail stores whose business includes soft drink merchandising. These 61,266 retailers help to distribute to Canadians the profits of the soft drink industry. Let us not forget that a large part of their tax-paying ability depends directly on the revenue from the sale of soft drinks. There can be no question in any person's mind that soft drinks are socially desirable. They do supply refreshment which the public demands. These soft drink taxes were first imposed as a wartime emergency system of taxation. It is high time they were removed.

Speaking of income tax reductions, I wish to point out to the government that in every part of Canada there is a group of people who are not helped by income tax reductions. The people to whom I am referring are the old age pensioners and those who are living on social service allowances. These people have taken a terrific beating during the years of inflated prices. I ask the government to think very seriously about these people and their predicament and to give them a break. The government has condoned rising prices. It has tried to win the good will of business generally. Now it had better reverse the trend or be prepared to pay the price, which will be an electoral defeat. Already the handwriting is on the wall for all to see. Last year this group, the C.C.F., took three federal by-elections in a row. This year the Progressive Conservative party have accomplished the same feat. It would seem that a flood tide is setting in, both for the C.C.F. and for the Progressive Conservative party. That can only mean that it will be an ebb tide so far as the Liberal party is concerned.

In part the speech from the throne says:

> A measure for assistance in the provision of a transcontinental highway will also be laid before you.

When people across the dominion read that sentence, some will be tempted to say, "At long last, thank goodness." But those who better understand the workings of departmental red tape will merely smile and continue to wait and see. There is no greater domestic need in Canada than a trans-Canada highway linking east and west. Such a highway will do more to create national unity than reams of paper or countless speeches could ever do.

At the close of the session last summer I motored from Ottawa to my home in British Columbia. I certainly would have rejoiced if there had been an all-Canadian highway that I could have used. But because we have not an all-Canadian highway I crossed into the United States at Sault Ste. Marie and enjoyed the excellent paved roads provided through the states of Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota, returning to Canada via Winnipeg and proceeding thence west. A trans-Canada highway, paved throughout and built to standard width, would not only keep a host of Canadian motorists in Canada, but would help to bring tens of thousands of United States motorists into the country, all of whom spend their money freely for food, fuel and shelter.

The people of British Columbia have three highways leading into Alberta; the northern route from Edmonton, sometimes spoken of as the Yellowhead route; the central route through Banff and Calgary, and the southern all-year route through the Crowsnest pass. There is no need for new construction on the southern route; it is necessary only to widen it to standard width. The British Columbia government has practically completed what is called the Hope-Princeton cut-off. As a matter of fact, I understand that it is to be opened this year. They have also spent over $1 million on the southern route between Creston and Crowsnest, thus connecting up with a splendid new highway on which the Alberta government spent many hundreds of thousands of dollars in 1948. This southern highway passes through a highly industrialized area, and therefore is of greater value from a commercial point of view. Last but certainly not least, it passes through what is considered to be the most scenic portion of the mountains. It is without question the most readily accessible Canadian east-west highway for United States tourists and businessmen. With the necessary improvements made and maintained on the southern highway, no Canadian motorists should ever again have to go into the United States in order to travel from coast to coast.

Many areas in British Columbia would be benefited by an extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I should like to refer particularly to areas in the Columbia valley which are crying out for water for irrigation purposes. It is not possible for the residents in these areas to provide irrigation facilities for themselves. They need government aid. The district of Wilmer in my constituency is a case in point. Here we have an area that once enjoyed irrigation through a private company. It is now suffering for want of an adequate water supply. The private company has gone out of business. Flumes have broken down and disappeared, and once fertile acres are now reverting to brush. Here, then, is an area which should be served through the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I am not yet in possession of all the details that may be required, but when I get them I intend to take the matter up further with the Department of Agriculture.

Now, sir, I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works—I am glad to see that he is in his seat this afternoon—to the ever-present menace of Ripple rock on the north Pacific coast, and the need for its removal. I know it has been a headache, and it will continue to be a headache until it is dealt with. In this connection I should like to refer to an article which appeared in Saturday Night of February 18, 1948, entitled "Radar and whistle-listen on backstairs to Alaska", by Marjorie Freeman Campbell. The article reads:

> In the event of a third global war, British Columbia's famous inside passage will take on an importance it did not possess in either world wars I or II. For whether war comes to Canada by air, which military strategists consider the most likely method, or by water, its direction will undoubtedly render land bases in Alaska and the Aleutians a prime necessity. To help service these bases, freight will again move in wartime volume up the protected inner channel. Naval vessels will thread its maze of waterways.
> Under these circumstances it is of interest to Canadians to understand the channel, the methods of navigation peculiar to it, its difficulties and dangers, foremost of which is the ill-famed Ripple rock, described in the Pacific Marine Review as "the nightmare of the north Pacific sea lane."
> Representative of the many hazards of the passage is Ripple rock, a twin-headed shoal lying in Seymour narrows, in the region between Vancouver island and the mainland.
> Since as long as Ripple rock remains in the narrows no capital ship of the navy can use the inside passage, its removal was determined upon by the federal government as a war measure.
> Although the government of the United States offered its services, the Canadian government considered the shoal a Canadian responsibility. Consequently two attempts, costing in the neighbourhood of one million dollars, were made, both abortive, the first attacking the rock from a drilling barge anchored by steel cables attached to some 550 tons of concrete, the second from a barge supported by overhead cable. That Ripple rock is partly exposed for only forty-five minutes at extreme low tide explains part of the difficulties met.
> Over the years many millions of dollars of shipping and countless lives have fallen prey to the rock—even in 1944 the Canadian government's own hydrographic survey ship, equipped with a wealth of delicate instruments, and dedicated to locating danger spots for shipping.
> "He who holds Alaska," said the late General William Mitchell, "holds the world."

I want to repeat those words for the benefit of the minister:

> "He who holds Alaska," said the late General William Mitchell, "holds the world."
> Now, in time of peace, would it not seem good policy to eliminate the nightmare of the Alaska sea lane?

I am sure that the minister has not forgotten Ripple rock, or the vast sums of money that have been spent in trying to remove it. It would be foolish of me to presume to tell the minister how to remove it, but in view of the menace of war which now confronts the world I submit he would do well to secure immediately the best engineering advice available in the United States or any other country in the world.

The article which I have just quoted mentions the fact that the government of the United States offered its services some years ago, but they were declined. The United States is deeply interested in the removal of Ripple rock, because the inner channel is used by their shipping as much as, if not more than, ours. In the event of another war their interest would be intensified. Would it not be wisdom and good policy on our part to hand over this problem to the United States to see what they can do with it? We have tried our best, and have failed. I suggest to the minister that it is possible that the United States may be able to adopt other methods and succeed. One thing is certain—Ripple rock must go.

Mr. Rene N. Jutras (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to associate myself with those hon. members who have congratulated the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) upon the manner in which he moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne. He proved that he was fully conscious of the responsibilities that were bestowed upon him and he carried out those responsibilities in the best manner possible.

(Translation):

At the same time, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Demers). Although he was making his maiden speech in the house, and sitting here for the first time, he was, from the very start, a credit to his own people, to his constituents, to his party and to this chamber.

I also take this opportunity of congratulating the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on his acceptance of the honourable but no less exacting responsibility of guiding a state bubbling over with activity and extending to new lands, of leading the greatest political party in this country, and of succeeding the two most eminent political leaders in all our history. I commend him for the high-mindedness, determination and warm sincerity he evinced in taking on these duties.

(Text):

I wish now to offer my congratulations to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). He has begun his duties as leader of the opposition with great vigour and has succeeded in raising the morale of the official opposition.

[Mr. Matthews (Kootenay East).]

I cannot in the time at my disposal extend my congratulations to all the newcomers to this house, but I should like to say one further word to our Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). He has already made a great contribution to the debates in this house. His coming here was a great loss to the provincial government of Manitoba, but by the same token his coming here has been our gain.

I should like to turn briefly to our diplomatic representation throughout the world. I was struck by the story contained in the annual report for 1948 of the Department of External Affairs. This report shows the growth of Canada among the nations of the world, and more particularly does our diplomatic representation throughout the world bring out that fact.

We are told in the annual report that Canada now has twenty-nine diplomatic missions abroad, eleven consular offices, four special missions, and diplomatic missions consisting of fourteen embassies, eight legations and seven high commissioners' offices. Fifty-one countries maintain missions in Canada, which reveals that the other nations of the world recognize the importance of this country and its maturity. The report goes on to state that seven new Canadian posts were established in 1948. There were established a legation in Belgrade; permanent representation to the united nations at New York and Geneva; a consulate general at San Francisco; consulates at Detroit and Boston in the United States, and at Frankfurt in Germany. During the year the legation at Rome was raised to the status of an embassy. Of course we cannot expect to see as much expansion in future years. I should like to add my voice, however, to those who have already requested the government to send a representative to Vatican City. As you know, the matter has been raised throughout the length and breadth of the nation in the last few months. Most, if not all, of the leading newspapers of the country have commented very favourably on such a move.

At this moment there is in Canada a representative of the Holy See. Most of the members must have seen the residence of the apostolic delegate on the Driveway, but I am sure that quite a few of them do not understand the function of such a representative. The office of apostolic delegate has been in existence for nearly fifty years. Although it is in all senses of the word a permanent mission to Canada, nevertheless it is a purely religious one. The apostolic delegate acts in the name of the Pope in relation to the episcopates of the country. That is his only function. If we were to send an ambassador to the Vatican, however, the office of the apostolic delegate would then be raised to the status of a nunciature. Then he would have a twofold mission, the same mission that he has now, to be the representative of the Pope to the episcopates of the country, and secondly, a diplomatic mission to the government, the primary purpose of which would be to improve relations between the state and the church.

To those who might see in this situation an occasion for the church to encroach upon the rights of the state, let me say that they need not have any fear. History proves that the church knows her place. It would be against her traditions and against her interests to do so. If one needs to be convinced he has only to look at China, one of the most pagan countries of the world. China has exchanged representatives with the Vatican for a great many years. The same thing applies to Japan. Surely no countries could be found with views more divergent from those of the Vatican. Yet there has never been an instance of encroachment either way. Therefore the real advantages to the church, in having such a diplomatic exchange with this country, would be very small indeed compared with the advantages that Canada would derive, because I am sure that most members will agree with me that, particularly at this time, the church is the strongest rampart against communism. It is the one force that will never surrender under any circumstances. That is why the church is so ruthlessly and relentlessly attacked in all countries where Russia, if she is not the dominating factor, at least has great influence.

Today, when so many countries are confined behind the iron curtain, the Vatican offers a special vantage point to survey that particular problem, and all other problems of the world. Again, if one is looking for an example, during the war Hitler, even when he was persecuting the church, maintained a diplomatic representative at that vantage point in order to have better knowledge of the situation. I think it is common knowledge that the diplomats of the Holy See have always enjoyed the highest prestige of any diplomatic representatives. Above all, in my opinion, the diplomats of the Holy See epitomize the Christian spirit. On that basis alone, does one need to say anything more? I hope that in the near future we will take our place at this highly cultural, highly intellectual, and highly strategic centre.

I should like to deal more particularly with export trade. I do not claim to be an expert on export trade, but I do claim the ability to read the English language. At the present time there is no doubt that our export trade is very good. There are signs, however, that point to certain dangers at this very moment. If one analyses Canada's export trade for the last year, one finds that half of our export trade has been paid for by loans from Canada and ERP authorizations. Therefore what that means is that, if those two factors are removed, our export trade will drop by at least 50 per cent. When you couple that fact with last winter's announcement that our best buyer of wheat did not have any money to pay for it, it raises a very definite challenge, a challenge similar to the one that was placed before Canada and the United States after the first great war. It is not merely a challenge to the farmers; it is a challenge to the whole nation, because surely nobody will propound the thesis now that there can be prosperity in Canada with no export market for agricultural products. If that part of our economy drops, then the rest of the economy of the country will follow in the wake of it. Therefore I say it raises a definite challenge similar to the one that was raised after the last war.

You remember how we came out of the war with very large production in Canada, and our buyers in Europe practically all broke, and with no facilities to pay for our goods. It was at that time that the Liberal government went to the people. At that very time it made arrangements and it had made arrangements before, to take care of the challenge. We know today that the Liberal government met the challenge very successfully. The official opposition of that day had nothing to offer. They even tried to ridicule the promises made by the government that they would maintain prosperity in the country. They were so sure of themselves that they just sat back complacently, expecting that their hopes would materialize, and that there would be no prosperity in the country. The same thing could be said of our friends of the C.C.F. During that time they put on a frantic act to try and stampede the western people especially into taking cover under their protecting wing.

Mr. Wright: What period are you speaking of?

Mr. Jutras: I am speaking of the period after the last war, when this government went to the people. That was exactly the position your party took at that time. You went throughout the country saying the government had no way of controlling these matters; and you pointed also to this great, black, rolling cloud of depression that was coming and was going to burst upon this nation, saying the government was absolutely helpless to do anything about it. Today your party is singing quite a different tune. They say there were no clouds at all, that all was well; but that was not the story you put out at that time. It was under those circumstances that the United Kingdom wheat agreement was signed. At that time, after the last war, there was quite a feeling of dread and anxiety among farmers throughout the three prairie provinces, and quite a bit of uncertainty as to the future.

Mr. Wright: Is there not today?

Mr. Jutras: I think the hon. member will agree that at that time the farmers were not ready to return to the previous method of marketing. They demanded stability and security. It is one thing not to get the highest price. It is another thing to operate at a loss; to see our farms mortgaged one after the other; to see our children clothed by charity; to see our schools closed; to see our governments staggering under a huge load of public debt and the municipalities with taxes unpaid to the point where they are absolutely stymied. That is an entirely different story. In the last few years we have heard a great deal in this house about losses, but the great propagandists of those losses have been very careful to pick out a few years which suit their own purposes. They did not go over the whole record. We heard nothing about the time the farmers were actually operating at a loss.

I think it should be pointed out particularly at this time that this nation owes a great deal to the farmers of Canada. All through the depression the farmers not only did not get the highest price or even a decent price; they operated at a loss. But they fed this Canadian nation without flinching. They mortgaged their farms; they even mortgaged their provinces, in the case of the west. The farmers did not go on strike but kept on feeding this country at a loss all during the depression years. If one were to try to compute the debt this nation owes the farmers my hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Ross) would not be even close with the figures he obtained from the Winnipeg grain exchange. These are the losses the farmers do not want to have to bear again. If one were to take only the drop in national revenue in 1934, that alone would be sufficient to pay off the total bonded indebtedness of the three prairie provinces and the total bonded indebtedness of all the municipalities in those provinces, and leave over enough money to finance those three provincial governments for practically twenty years. That will give an idea of the contribution the farmers have made to this country.

I am making this statement now for one purpose only; that is, to plead with the other classes of society in other parts of this country that if the day ever comes when they are called upon to recognize that debt of gratitude, they will not hesitate to do so and by doing so help the farmers to help themselves; for I am quite sure no one would attempt to argue that we can have a prosperous country when such a large and important class of society as our farming class are heavily in debt and incapable of doing anything for themselves.

It was under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, that the wheat agreement was signed. It is little wonder that the farmers as a whole held that a bird in the hand was worth two in the bush. Thus came the demand for a long-term agreement. What was the stand of the official opposition on that point? The hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken), then leader of the Progressive Conservative party, is a good farmer. For over twenty years he was premier of Manitoba, and during that time he was recognized in the political field as the spokesman for the farmers of western Canada. He knew the score on that question when it came up, and he stated the position of the Progressive Conservative party. There can be no mistake about it. It was exactly the position taken by the farmers; that in choosing between two evils they would choose the lesser and accept a long-term agreement. Now our friends of the official opposition would like to have us and the farmers believe that they never had anything to do with the United Kingdom agreement and never supported it. The leader gave the stand of that party, and not one member from the western provinces had the guts to stand up and vote against it. That is the position of the official opposition on the wheat agreement.

Mr. Ross (Souris): If the hon. member would permit a question, would he state when the vote on the agreement as such took place? Would he give the reference in Hansard to any vote on the agreement as such?

Mr. Jutras: I am very glad the hon. member has asked that question. It shows clearly that he is trying to jump on the fence. I went to a great deal of trouble—and believe me I took a great deal of punishment—reading all the speeches made by the hon. member for Souris during that session, and he did not say a single word that would show his opposition to the United Kingdom wheat agreement. That was where the hon. member stood.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The hon. member cannot quote one word I ever said in favour of it in this House of Commons.

Mr. Jutras: Not in the session of 1946.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Nor any other session.

Mr. Jutras: You kept very quiet. You never said anything against it. But your chief said he was in favour of it, and that puts you very definitely behind it. That is the stand that was taken at that time.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I know the hon. member wants to be fair. I have referred to that agreement at every session from 1946 on, and he cannot quote a word I ever said in favour of the agreement as such.

Mr. Jutras: I will agree wholeheartedly that I cannot quote a word by the hon. member, because there are no such words. That is exactly what I was saying.

Mr. Ross (Souris): There was a speech at every session.

Mr. Jutras: Then I will answer in another way. There are members of the Progressive Conservative party who would never admit that they supported the wheat agreement, and they can show it on the record.

Mr. Graydon: Did the Free Press?

Mr. Jutras: I am coming to the Free Press, and I am sure you will find it most interesting. These hon. gentlemen did not vote for the wheat agreement. The other day one of them pointed to his vote, to show that he voted against it. The name of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) was not there. Again I say they have been chased out of two pastures, so they are climbing on the fence.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You have not read Hansard very carefully.

Mr. Graydon: You have not read the Winnipeg Free Press, either.

Mr. Jutras: I am coming to the Free Press. After the agreement has been signed and put into operation, the official opposition would like to jump on the grain exchange band wagon. It is a bit late for that.

Since the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) is so anxious to hear what the Free Press has to say, I shall read part of an editorial, which appeared in that paper. The recent stand of the official opposition is not limited to this house, but has also been taken in the other place by their official leader. It has been said they were against the agreements at the time they were discussed in the house, but they cannot point to anything in the official record to substantiate that statement. I shall quote from an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on February 8, 1949, entitled "Empty Criticisms":

> The trouble with Mr. Haig's argument is that it is a reversal of Conservative policy.
> The time for Mr. Haig's party to have denounced the agreement was at the beginning when something might have been done to modify it. Surely, no credit can be gained by denouncing a contract two and a half years too late.
> If it so chooses, the Conservative party can swallow itself today. But it cannot gain credit now by denouncing a bargain which it approved.

For the information of the hon. member for Peel that is what the Winnipeg Free Press has to say.

The official opposition would like the grain exchange and the rest of us to believe they are the great friends of the grain exchange. At the same time they try to make people believe they are also the friends of the wheat board. On the one hand they would like to leave the impression that they are the friends of the grain exchange and, on the other, that they are the friends of the wheat board. This position inevitably leads to double talk. At the moment, I am not directing my remarks to any particular member. This is the policy of the official opposition at the present time. I do not believe it is the policy of every member of that party, but it is the official platform of the Progressive Conservative party. Surely, there is no better way of indicating this than by pointing to the resolutions passed at the convention of the Progressive Conservative party. Some of this double talk originated at that convention.

I shall quote from an article appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press written by a reporter of unquestionable reputation. He was present at that convention, and therefore knew what was happening.

Mr. Graydon: Is that the double talk referred to in the writings of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power)?

Mr. Jutras: You will soon find out by whom it was written; you will recognize it. I do not suppose the hon. member for Peel knows anything about the stand of his own party on wheat, but he will in a few minutes. This is a report of the proceedings of the convention, so I am sure the member for Peel will recognize it. I am quoting from an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on October 5, 1948:

> The Progressive Conservative convention's vote on Saturday to restore the 1935 wheat board on a voluntary basis and also to guarantee producers the right to market grain "by any other means," while refusing to say specifically that means wheat trading on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, touched a new high in political sleight-of-hand.
> Speaker after speaker declared frankly that the resolution as it stood, and no mistake, means wheat trading on the Winnipeg exchange. But with equal frankness, they decided to accept an amendment by John McDowell, Winnipeg, changing the words "by any other means" to read "through the open market."
> Under the grave warnings of M. A. MacPherson, Regina, and Col. J. A. Ross, Souris, that even to mention wheat trading "through the open market" (meaning the Winnipeg Grain Exchange) would be dangerous to the party—"dynamite on the prairies" said Mr. MacPherson—the amendment was shot down the sink. Along with it went what many delegates thought was a very sensible addition by G. S. Thorvaldson, Winnipeg, that with an open market, there should be a supervisor to eliminate irresponsible and unwarranted speculation.

From another part of the same editorial, I quote the following:

But what the committee was anxious to avoid was any imputation that the convention was working for the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. The attempts of Mr. McDowell and Mr. Thorvaldson to amend the skilfully worded resolution let this fighting cat out of the committee bag. There was no good attempting any longer to cover the fact that selling wheat by "any other means" meant wheat trading on the Winnipeg exchange.

So these antics of my hon. friends opposite are carried on not only in this house but before the people of their own party at a national convention. As I said before, they have been chased out of the grain exchange field and out of the wheat board field, so they say, "We want both."

Mr. Weir: Vote both ways.

Mr. Jutras: Yes, vote both ways. They want a free grain exchange, and even the member for Souris (Mr. Ross) applauded when I read that the amendment had been shot down the sink. Apparently the member for Souris wants a free grain exchange—I know that he does not, but this resolution indicates he does and he was instrumental in having it passed. It indicates a desire for a grain exchange as free as a lark and, at the same time, a desire for a wheat board divested of all powers except the administering of a floor price. This is the solution the official opposition offers—have both things.

What have the farmers of this country received for trying to improve their position? The members of the Progressive Conservative party have given them nothing but abuse. Even from the members of the Social Credit group, or should I say the other Tory party, the farmers receive nothing but abuse.

An hon. Member: You are so confused you do not know where you are.

Mr. Jutras: I know where I am and the record will prove it; that is more than you can do. I do not need to quote the record since all members will remember it. When the committee on agriculture was sitting in 1947 the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) rose and made the statement that the leaders of the organized farmers in this country had done a great disservice to the farmers of western Canada in their recommendation to the government. In that committee the hon. member who was representing the Social Credit party rose and said the same thing, and supported the hon. member for Souris.

Mr. Ross (Souris): What was the recommendation?

An hon. Member: Who was the member?

Mr. Jutras: It was the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair).

Mr. Ross (Souris): What was the recommendation?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Who is making the speech?

Mr. Graydon: I am not sure myself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Jutras: I shall take just a moment or two more for the purpose of giving the reference. It is page 97 of the proceedings of the committee on agriculture and colonization. I do not wish to abuse the rules of the house, so I will sit down.

Mr. Ross (Souris): It had to do with the United Kingdom wheat agreement.

Mr. Jutras: I just want to summarize the situation in one word. An attempt was made to discredit the farmers organization. The official opposition tried to make people believe that they were all for the wheat board; but up to now their only contribution on that score has been the suggestion to throw wide open the doors of the Winnipeg grain exchange and allow the farmer to swim by himself when everyone else has a life jacket.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is not a fact.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I should like first, Mr. Speaker, to associate myself with the others who have complimented the mover and the seconder of the motion now before us and especially the mover, because at one time I lived in that part of the city of Windsor which the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) now has the honour to represent.

As the first one of my party to have the occasion to address this house after the ceremony we witnessed this afternoon, I feel that it is only fitting that I should make some comments thereon. To me it was significant —and I do not think I am alone in this feeling—to see our leader, with the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Heon), present to you, Mr. Speaker, the new member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Chapdelaine). The applause came from this side of the house, of course. We enjoyed his presentation and Your Honour's direction to him to take his seat in this House of Commons. We who viewed the opposite side from our grandstand seats here watched in particular the reception the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska received from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), for instance. The latter had a smile which required some forcing to produce. The Solicitor General (Mr. Jean) slumped so low in his seat that I wondered if one chair in this house had short legs. As for the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand), it occurred to me that at one time he may have taken piano lessons or pounded a typewriter with one finger, judging by his applause. He may, of course, have been recalling that famous speech he made on the Friday night, I think it was, prior to this by-election when he predicted to the country that, if this infamous party—the Progressive Conservative party—won the by-election, that would be the forerunner of what they could expect not only from the province of Quebec but from the rest of Canada.

The introduction of the last three members in this house afforded us a great deal of satisfaction. The first was our leader who won a smashing victory in the by-election in Carleton. In addition, the treasury was enriched by $400, I believe. It gave me some satisfaction to know that $200 of it came from the C.C.F.

Mr. Thatcher: Be careful.

Mr. Murphy: They lost a similar amount in a certain riding which I have the honour to represent, and I can assure them that we shall repeat that dose if they attempt the same performance at a later date.

The second by-election was the one in Nova Scotia, as a result of which another member who belonged to our side of the house and to our party was introduced. His election, I think, can be taken to indicate to the people of Canada the expression of the opinion of the maritimes in an unmistakable way. That by-election was a want of confidence in the government and a declaration of confidence in the new leader of our party and in our policies. The hon. member who was introduced this afternoon means a great deal to us. Coming from the province of Quebec he reflects, I think, the views of the people in that province, their confidence in our leader, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew) and in the policies of our party. We welcome him to this house.

Mr. Graydon: The handwriting on the wall.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Says you.

Mr. Murphy: For a moment or two I should like to deal with a quid, and I will take the literal meaning of that term, which I noticed in a recent edition of the Toronto Telegram under date of February 16. It refers to the profits of the Imperial Tobacco Company. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read a short extract from that:

> The Imperial Tobacco Company of Canada net profit after taxes in 1948 was $7,193,011 equal to 66¾ cents per share on the common stock, compared with $5,999,153 or 57½ cents per share in 1947, according to the annual report.

This showed an increase of twenty per cent in 1948 over 1947. I have not, nor has any member of our party—and I think the same applies to a great many who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker—any quarrel with companies which are able to make good profits. In fact, a great part of their surplus goes back into plant expansion, enabling increased employment. We fully realize that companies which continue to work in the red are bound for the bankruptcy courts; and as we know, bankruptcy courts give little employment. In this particular statement there is one point with which I quarrel, and I do not think there will be any dispute in this house on that particular point.

Today the tobacco manufacturers are able to obtain from this country practically 80 to 85 per cent, if not more, of the tobacco which they use in the manufacture of cigarettes and cut tobaccos. In the last fifteen or twenty years in this country we have expanded our tobacco-growing industry. It is a big industry. My quarrel with the Imperial Tobacco Company's statement is that the prices they have paid to the producers of tobacco are not as large as they should have been. This applies not only to the seven or eight counties in western Ontario but in other places as well. Today we find that good quality tobacco is grown as far north as the Bruce peninsula. We also know that in Quebec cigar-leaf tobacco has been grown for a great many years, and is still grown in that province. If any hon. members have any doubt about that, all they have to do is to walk up the corridors of this building and they will get the aroma of the home-grown cigar tobacco.

There is another feature to which I shall refer with disfavour. And I speak with some authority on this matter because, with the exception of the last fifteen years, I have been engaged in the tobacco industry. I grew it. We manufactured it, we jobbed it or wholesaled it and I did have something to say about a few retailers who retailed it. Before I continue I want to make it clear that I am not speaking on behalf of any particular wholesaler or any group of wholesalers because I am not associated with any wholesaler or jobber in this country, notwithstanding the fact that the company name Murphy with which I was associated some years ago is still retained by the company. Up until fifteen years ago the distributors got the unbelievably small margin of 10 per cent to 10½ per cent for the distribution of their products. Many hon. members will wonder how in the world a distributor could handle a product on that margin. Nevertheless, it was done. In passing I may say that if you were a good jobber you turned your product over probably forty or forty-two times a year. Since that time we find the American idea of business creeping into this industry. Over there the distributors have had their margin cut to even less than what we have today in Canada. But it is really alarming when we realize today that distributors are being asked to distribute tobacco products at from 6 per cent to 6½ per cent. That is their total margin, and out of that they must warehouse the goods, sell them, deliver them and take care of all the bookkeeping and administration involved. I have watched the profit grow from $3 million to $3,500,000, to $4 million; from $4,500,000 to $5 million and from $5,500,000 to $6 million. Finally it reached over $7 million in 1948. While I do not quarrel with profits, Mr. Speaker—I agree that a company must have profits—yet it is certainly unfair to the growers of the product in this country when they do not receive from the buyers of tobacco as high a price as that to which they are entitled, and which at the moment is much lower than the price at which the same quality product is sold in the United States.

Furthermore, there is no reason why business firms in this country should have their margin as distributors cut from what it was originally, 10 per cent, which was small enough, to 6 per cent or 6½ per cent.

It is within the memory of some hon. members that an inquiry in the form of a price spreads committee was set up in 1933 and 1934. It is interesting to note that the company to which I referred, and all its involvements, were discussed in some detail; yet anyone who reads the report with some knowledge of the industry will be alarmed at what was not disclosed. It is also interesting to note that shortly after the findings of that particular committee the margin to the distributors was reduced. I sometimes wonder whether in the interests of so many of our tobacco growers, distributors and retailers, it might not be considered feasible or advisable again to consider the business methods of certain tobacco companies.

There is another point I should like to make in this connection. Over the last several years we have had on cigarettes a variety of taxes, known as the excise tax and the excise duty. From 1918 it has varied from $6 a 1,000 to the present tax of $6 excise duty a 1,000 plus $4 which is the excise tax a 1,000. The intervening rates are from $4 up. I recall vividly that in 1922 this tax was raised in the Fielding budget, I believe, from $6 to $9. Representations were made and the tax was immediately reduced to $7.50. I wonder whether it would not be advisable for the government to consider reducing either the excise tax or the excise duty some $2 or $3, or even bringing it back to what it was prior to the rise in March, 1943, because in this period the figures speak for themselves. In many instances the higher tax decreased the revenue. In view of our market being limited and restricted to Great Britain especially at the moment, it might be advisable for the government to consider a reduction in this form of taxation in order to permit a greater sale of the product and a greater price to those who produce it. If that were done it would lend encouragement to the extension of this particular crop.

I am not going to weary the house with any figures of the amount received by the government under the various taxes. I shall leave that for the moment. I may say in passing that the subject may not be finally closed.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer briefly, namely, emigration of our young citizens to the United States. According to the records of the United States, in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1945, 8,583 persons left Canada for the United States. In the following year 18,280 left. In the year ended June 30, 1947, 23,467 left for the United States, and in the year ended June 30, 1948, 24,788. The information available indicates that about 2,000 of the 1947 figure were people who could be described as the managerial or professional class. Of this number about 360 were engineers.

This migration concerns us greatly in this country and its effects are noticeable in Sarnia which, as most people appreciate, is fast becoming the chemical centre of Canada. According to present plans, production there will be materially increased as soon as steel and other materials are available. We are finding that far too many of our young graduates, particularly in the engineering fields, are leaving this country. Many of these young men took up engineering because those with whom they were associated had taken it up previously.

We are all profoundly disturbed about this migration loss which Canada is suffering. We have a sparsely populated land. We have a country that is rich in undeveloped natural resources. We have a country that should by rights be considered a land of opportunity and freedom. We should be attracting more people to Canada to help develop it further, to help to build up diversified industries which will give assurance of a better balanced economy and continued employment for all.

We above all countries in the world should be having a steady flow of immigrants to our shores. However, we find that because of excessive taxes, either by way of personal income tax, excise tax, luxury or sales taxes, too many of our able young citizens are leaving our country to go south where they do not suffer the same injustices of high and excessive taxation in as many forms. It is a tragedy and a national disaster that we should be losing the most ambitious of our young people, those who want most to get ahead but who find that this country limits their chances of improving their condition.

These people represent more than mere population that is leaving Canada. Each and every one represents an investment that has been made by you and me in the youth of this land. We as taxpayers have paid to educate these young people; we as taxpayers have helped to look after their health; we as taxpayers have tried to make them good citizens. Now when they are ready to make a return on this investment as taxpayers themselves, they leave the country.

Furthermore—this is even more serious—investigations show that a large proportion of these young Canadians are business executives, young university graduates, young technicians with special skills and special knowledge. In short, they are the very people who within the next few years should be starting up businesses of their own and giving employment to others; who should be contributing toward making this land of ours a country of diversified industry and industrial stability. They will be starting industries and businesses of their own all right, but it will not be in Canada. Another country will benefit because of our excessive taxation in its various forms.

Many of the young people to whom I refer as leaving Canada in such numbers are frankly bound for the higher brackets of income. We can reverse the flow of migration across our southern border by government policy. We must make it worth while to come to Canada, to stay in Canada, to establish businesses and to give employment here.

When the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was speaking during the early part of the session he referred with some pride, pride which we all appreciate and share, to the exports from this country during 1948, which amounted to $3,075 million. However, he did not refer to the movement of cattle and beef from this country to the United States during the last four months of the year, which contributed substantially to the higher export figures for the year. Nor did he refer to the extent to which ECA purchases were made. I understand the authorization for that year was $593 million, but I do not know how much was shipped. We all appreciate the necessity of exports, but we regret that there should be included in those exports the people to whom I referred a moment ago.

There is located in the county of Lambton the Polymer corporation, a crown company. In 1944, and since, I made reference to the welfare of the employees of that particular crown company. I was concerned, not only with their wage rates but with the security benefits that they were receiving. The minister at that time, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), stated that he considered the Imperial Oil Limited plan for retirement and other security benefits to be the one at which he would aim. Yesterday the minister's department professed ignorance about that particular plan. I agree that it may not have been possible for them to produce the actual figures, but the information was available to me as it was to him, and I assume that it is still available to both of us.

At the present time there is a feeling of disturbance in the minds of the employees of that corporation. They allege that they are not receiving the same rates of pay as are paid by Imperial Oil Limited for the same work. I submit that where we have crown companies they should give leadership and certainly should not pay less than other industries in the same area pay for similar work.

These employees are concerned also about retirement and other security measures. They contend that what they receive is less than is received by the employees of other companies in the area.

I repeat that a crown company should give leadership. Further with regard to the professional men and technicians or skilled employees who are leaving our country to go south, I submit that we in this House of Commons and the people in the country expect the crown companies to give leadership to industry by paying these young men a remuneration which will induce them to remain in this country and become citizens and contributors to our economy. Instead, we find that there is far too great a turnover among these young men, not only in the area in which I reside but elsewhere in Canada. That is revealed by the figures.

I say again that it is the responsibility of crown companies to give leadership in the payment of salaries which are reasonably comparable with what are being paid on the other side. These young men leave our country to go there because of our taxation policies. A young man on the other side who wants to get married can furnish a four-roomed apartment for at least a third less than it would cost here in Canada because of the many taxes imposed on the goods required to set up housekeeping. They are complaining, and rightly so, about the luxury taxes that are imposed on so many goods that are really necessary when they are planning on starting up housekeeping.

To us on the border, and I believe also to those who are not, luxury taxes are more than nuisance taxes, and they are not bringing in the revenue which they might, because of the dissatisfaction they are creating. There are merchants along the border who are returning shipments to manufacturers and jobbers if the merchants are obliged to impose a luxury tax on those articles. Furthermore, for our British goods and for many of our own manufactured goods which today bear a luxury tax, we have at all times enjoyed a good market in their sale to tourists from the United States. Merchants along the border tell me that tourists coming from the United States to purchase these goods now find that certain articles imported from Great Britain are sold more cheaply in United States stores than they are in our own. We are losing a very important market because so many tourists buy quite large quantities of British-made goods. It is alarming to us to find that they are now realizing that they can purchase them for a lesser price in the United States than they can buy them for in Canada, simply because of the luxury tax which the government imposes.

There is another matter I should like to deal with. It is relevant to crown companies. As I have said before in the house, we are very glad that we have the Polymer Corporation in the county of Lambton. I have said that before and I repeat it. The Polymer Corporation and other industries, many of them chemical, have brought a fine type of employee and citizen to our community. But I say this—and it is a plank in our platform—that crown companies should make some contribution by way of taxes to the municipalities in which they do business. I feel very strongly on the matter because in this particular township, which now has about 10,000 people whereas some five or six years ago there were only about 2,500, a great deal of additional expense has been incurred, not only for administration, but also for roads, hospitalization, relief, and everything else that is entailed in municipal administration because of the increased number of people now residing in the township.

I have heard the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) say, and he has said it more than once, that he defies anyone in the house or elsewhere to say that a municipality does not benefit because of the operation therein of a crown company. I must say to him through you, Mr. Speaker, that it is true that the municipalities benefit. We all realize that industry brings in population, and the greater the population the greater the taxes. While the area benefits, the same argument can be advanced as to any industry, but these other industries, which are not crown companies, make their contribution to the municipalities. For instance, we know what the increased cost was in that particular township for roads, schools and administration. I will say that our present leader, when he was premier of the province of Ontario, realized what the problems were, and in his capacity as minister of education he saw to it that several of the school sections received very substantial grants to compensate for the additional costs incurred by the influx of people. Sessions of the house roll around, and while we see resolutions on the order paper, it is about time that we got down to discussing one of them relative to the contributions crown companies should make to the municipalities in which they are located.

The next subject which I should like to discuss for a few minutes is the tourist industry. I sincerely hope that this session the government will set up a special committee to deal with the tourist industry, and to co-operate with the minister in the development thereof. We all read the announcement by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he made the appointment of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) to the portfolio of Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. We recall with some pride that, when the appointment was made, emphasis was placed upon the importance of the tourist industry, and as I recall it that was repeated. Our tourist bureau was instituted in 1934 by a former prime minister. It has seemed to so many of us, who have taken a keen interest in the tourist industry, that the present government hesitated to support a child fathered by a former prime minister. There is one astounding fact that we all admit, and which helps us to realize why the industry has not progressed as it should. Since 1934 the tourist bureau has been under the direction of either ten or eleven different ministers. Since parliament assembled in 1945 we have had four ministers, if we count the present Minister of Trade and Commerce in two different ministries. It is apparent that no bureau, no part of a portfolio which has been treated as an adjunct, can receive continuity of consideration to the extent to which it is entitled in order to bring it up to a high standard, and in order for it to do what we expect it should do. On this side of the house we are very proud of the appointment that has been made; we are very anxious to work with the minister, and to help him to promote the industry. We know that we cannot recover the time that has been lost up till now. The tourist industry is not like the oil or gas business. In any area, including the province of Alberta, what they do not take out today they can take out tomorrow or even a hundred years from tomorrow; but what has been lost up until last night in the tourist industry we do not get back. It is gone forever. I have pointed out on different occasions the necessity of our getting more United States dollars. There is no more effective way to obtain more of the United States exchange that is so needed than through our tourist industry.

We are not the only country that realizes the importance of this industry. Earlier this year I think every hon. member received a memorandum from the United Kingdom travel association, in which we find that the patron is His Majesty the King; the vice-patron is Her Royal Highness the Princess Elizabeth, Duchess of Edinburgh; the president is Right Hon. Viscount Jowitt; and the chairman is Right Hon. Lord Hacking. Then in a news item dated February 15 of this year, which I think appeared in one of the Canadian newspapers, I see the heading, "France opens all-out drive to attract tourist industry," and I quote from the article:

> France is going all-out to attract more tourists this year. Millions of francs and tons of glossy paper are being used to induce more Britons and Americans to spend their sterling and dollars on holidays in "the loveliest pleasure ground in the world."

Then in conclusion the article states:

> France recognizes that tourists provide the greatest single source to cover the deficit which it is anticipated she, like other Marshall-plan countries, will face when dollar aid dries up in 1952.

Then I have another quotation from the New York Herald dated February 8, 1949, from which I shall read only the headlines: "Cheaper franc likely to lure rush of tourists." In the same newspaper I see the statement that in 1947 foreign tours cost the United States some $690 million, which was American money spent in Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean, and I am advised that last year the total spent in those areas was close to a billion dollars.

We have our own records here, and we are said to have received from this source some $270 million in 1948, an increase of twenty odd million dollars over the previous year. There has been an important change recently with respect to the amount of goods Americans can take back from this country after having been here for twelve days. Formerly it was $100; today it is $300, and that is a very important factor.

I should like to mention two other references in that connection. The first appears in the foreign trade publication of January 29 of this year, at page 222:

> Prosperity in Bahamas is largely derived from tourist industry.
> Kingston, January 6, 1949. Tourism and housing construction are contributing substantially to the post-war prosperity of the Bahamas . . .

Then on page 223:

> There is little unemployment in the Bahamas at the present time, owing to the prosperous condition of the tourist industry and the high level of construction . . . As a result of these favourable conditions, labour unrest has not been a problem during the past year.

Another very well written article appears on page 240 of the same journal under the heading, "Tourist industry in Great Britain largest dollar earning export." At the bottom of the second paragraph I find this statement:

> Outside of shipping, no other export industry would seem to hold more promise than the tourist industry.

When the present leader of this party was premier of Ontario he recognized the importance of the tourist industry and appointed a minister to that portfolio. I think it can be said without fear of contradiction that about two-thirds of this amount of $270 million is spent in the province of Ontario. We know that the premier of Quebec has taken under his personal direction the promotion of the tourist industry there. Many members of the House of Commons believe that if we had a committee to work with the minister to develop this industry a great deal could be accomplished. I appreciate, as we all do, that a committee has been set up in another place, but I would suggest that a committee of this house might go into the question from the research angle and call as witnesses men who have been successful in industry and who appreciate the importance of advertising in connection with sales promotion. I believe that today the amount spent in advertising the tourist industry is little more than one-half of one per cent, which is very little when we have in mind what we have to offer. Now that we have the tourist business under a minister so it can be dealt with at the cabinet level I believe the development of the industry should be proceeded with in a businesslike manner with the support of all members of this house.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has unanimous consent he may proceed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Murphy: I thank hon. members for their indulgence. We might call before such a committee some of those who have been successful in promoting big industry, where advertising is an important factor, because this is an advertising sales job. The provinces also will benefit to the extent that they contribute by way of good roads, which are so necessary, and adequate accommodation, which seems to be somewhat lacking. Through this committee I believe more publicity could be given our tourist industry so people would become more tourist conscious. This might give many the idea of making a contribution in one way or another to this most important activity. We might call before the committee men from the Ford company and the oil companies. I mention those in particular because I say in all sincerity that this travel bureau should have been organized when those industries were in their infancy, because they tie in one with the other. I am satisfied that our delay in recognizing the importance of this industry has cost us millions of dollars. Had the dominion government—I do not mean only this government, but any government—recognized the importance of this industry in the early days, I am sure it would have set up committees to co-ordinate the work of the provinces, so the industry might progress as our oil industry and our automobile industry have progressed. We might also call Mr. Berkinshaw, who I think is president of Goodyear Tire, and other men of that kind who have contributed so much to the development of this country, including railway and steamship executives and so on. We might also bring in representatives of the provinces. It is not enough to have those representatives meet here for a two-day session in the fall of the year. Such an important industry deserves more than that. If we are going to make it a billion dollar industry we must proceed with businesslike methods.

Just recently I saw an item in the newspapers with respect to the Alberta oil fields, and it occurred to me that this applied equally well to the tourist industry. We have had oil for years, just as we have had the tourist industry for years, but promoted originally by the railways and steamship companies. Recently in Alberta a huge reservoir of oil has been found in connection with which, incidentally, a group of companies including Imperial Oil are immediately spending some $80 million on development. Here are corporations giving employment to thousands of people, which have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in order to develop the natural resources of this country; and I say the two industries are comparable in this respect.

Our 1948-49 anticipated production in Alberta is 50 per cent greater than in 1948 and 75 per cent greater than it was in 1947. I would suggest that is the figure this tourist industry could use as a guide. There is no reason in the world why the members of this House of Commons could not get together with the minister who could, if he so desired, create a committee to look into this matter. The set-up of the committee would not matter a great deal, so long as it was composed of men who were willing and able to lend their services. God only knows we are not overworked in this house. This would also tie in with the trans-Canada highway, upon which I hope to have the opportunity of speaking at a later date. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and in closing hope that a special tourist committee will be set up immediately.

Mr. Frederic Dorion (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I gave in the house a few days ago, I believe it is my duty to reply to the charges made by the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) against some French persons who came to Canada a few years ago after having fled from France because of the persecutions which took place in that country after the war. The hon. member for Winnipeg North advised us that he wanted to take the opportunity afforded by the amendment to the address to make another speech on the same subject. He went so far as to say that if he did not have sufficient time to put all the information he had on the record in these two speeches, he would make a third speech on the main motion. I wish to state that, after answering his first speech, I intend to reply to any other speech the hon. member might contemplate making on the same subject.

If it were only a matter of discussing the fate of a few individuals, I would refrain from taking up the time of this house to correct the allegations made by the hon. member. Owing to the principle involved, however, all members must see that it is an important matter. It concerns the struggle between the communists on the one hand, and Christianity on the other. As everyone is aware, subversive ideologies are spreading throughout the countries under Russian control as well as other countries in the world. We know that the communists are at work in Canada, and particularly in large centres such as Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg. It is most unfortunate that, even in this chamber, communists so easily find advocates for their cause. I do not hesitate to state that if the French citizens referred to by the member for Winnipeg North were communist Jews instead of French Catholics, we would not have heard about them in this house.

Mr. Coldwell: Shame, shame!

Mr. Dorion: How does it happen that we only hear of the five or six French citizens who have been given shelter in this country? Why do we hear nothing about the six or seven Jews who were admitted to Canada last fall after having entered with false passports? I do not intend to blame anyone for issuing permanent visas to these Jews because I am willing to believe that they, as well as others, were entitled to the protection they received from the authorities. I ask, however, why make it a crime for a French Catholic to seek refuge in this country when no one dares to say a word about the Jews who are in the same situation?

Mr. Thatcher: Were they collaborators?

Mr. Dorion: Listen to my speech and you will find out whether they were collaborators. I repeat, why make it a crime for a French Catholic to seek refuge in this country when no one dares to say a word about the Jews who are in the same situation?

Mr. Coldwell: These men were condemned by the French courts.

Mr. Dorion: If you will listen to my speech you will find out about that.

If there is a fight between Christianity and communism in the world today, everyone is aware that the communists regard the Catholic church as enemy number one. Recent occurrences in several central European countries have demonstrated this fact.

The member for Winnipeg North referred to the question of privilege which I submitted to the house the other day relating to the de Bernonville case. From his remarks at page 794 of Hansard, I quote the following words:

> The hon. member also went on to say he was convinced not only of de Bernonville's innocence, but also of the assistance he has rendered our soldiers during the war. I think the most significant thing then was not the statement of the hon. gentleman, but the applause coming from the Tory benches which greeted it. One of us is wrong. Either the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay is right or I am right, and I am prepared to leave it to the judgment of the house.

I shall deal with the innocence of de Bernonville first and, later on, I shall submit the evidence which I have regarding the assistance he gave to our soldiers during the war. Before reaching that point, I should like to comment on certain remarks the hon. member made about a French citizen by the name of Jean Bonnel, living in Montreal. It is true that, for personal reasons, this man has not yet chosen to apply for his Canadian citizenship. Mr. Bonnel has been living in Canada for over twenty years. He is married to a Canadian woman and is the father of many children born in Canada. During these last twenty years, I am sure Mr. Bonnel has succeeded in acquiring a real Canadian spirit, more so than some new Canadians who have only been in this country since 1930. I would rather depend for Canadianism on a man who has lived in Canada over twenty years than on one who, although he may have his Canadian citizenship, came to Canada more recently.

> I can well understand how a man behind bars for hampering the war effort could feel such a close relationship for a nazi collaborationist.

Before making such a statement the hon. member should have remembered that the late Mr. Woodsworth, the founder of his party, and his present leader were not so favourable to our participation in the war before Russia became our ally.

Mr. Coldwell: I rise on a point of order to correct that statement. The C.C.F. group in this house, with the exception of Mr. Woodsworth, voted on September 9 or 10, the day war was declared, to declare war. Hansard shows that.

Mr. Dorion: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, my reason for making that remark is that I have read Hansard for September, 1939. On the 8th September, 1939, at page 55, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) made a statement concerning the policy of the C.C.F. group. This is what he said:

> Canada should be prepared to defend her own shores but her assistance overseas should be limited to economic aid and must not include the conscription of manpower or the sending of any expeditionary force.

Mr. Coldwell: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Dorion: I am speaking on the point of order—

Mr. Coldwell: I say we voted for the declaration of war and we supported every move to further the war effort once that decision was made.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to remind the members that only one member at a time should speak.

Mr. Dorion: On the same day, September 8, 1939, at page 47 of Hansard, Mr. Woodsworth said this:

We laud the courage of those who go to the front; yes, I have boys of my own, and I hope they are not cowards, but if any one of those boys, not from cowardice but really through belief, is willing to take his stand on this matter and, if necessary, to face a concentration camp or a firing squad, I shall be more proud of that boy than if he enlisted for the war.

Speaking of de Bernonville, the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) said, at page 794 of Hansard:

—the Germans made him military commandant of the Lyons area, a post that would go only to one of the most tried and true supporters of the nazi cause.

Speaking especially of de Bernonville, the hon. member says, as reported at page 794 of Hansard:

This time the Germans made him military commandant of the Lyons area, a post that would go only to one of the most tried and true supporters of the nazi cause. His special task was to set up a counter-resistance police to combat the French maquis. In this he was concerned particularly with identifying British and other allied officers who dropped into France by parachute to aid the resistance movement. His work resulted in the death of many of these allied soldiers, it was said. This information came out during the Toulouse trial at which de Bernonville was convicted in absentia.

First, I must take exception to the statement made by the hon. member to the effect that de Bernonville was given military command by the Germans. Everyone knows that it was the Vichy government which ruled southern France after 1940; and we must not forget that nearly every country recognized the legality of the Vichy government. Our own country, like many others, even had an official representative there. But the part of the statement to which I wish to draw special attention is the one concerning the conviction of de Bernonville by a Toulouse tribunal. Here I wish to report a description of the kinds of tribunals that were supposed to administer justice in southern France, and particularly in Toulouse, after the liberation of France. To make that demonstration, I shall not depend upon unknown and unverified statements, but will quote from an article published in the American Mercury in April, 1946; it was written by Donald B. Robinson and is entitled, Blood Bath in France. The excerpts that I am about to quote will show the hon. member for Winnipeg North what was going on in that part of France when de Bernonville was condemned in absentia. Mr. Robinson writes as follows:

As a member of the civil affairs headquarters of the American seventh army, stationed in Marseilles during and after the liberation, I personally witnessed the communist terror which reigned in southern France after the defeat of the nazi armies . . .

Further on he says:

During those months in the summer and autumn of 1944, revolution almost engulfed the south of France, and the communists were doing everything in their power to foment it. . . Almost immediately, bitter factionalism broke out among the native population, and the watchword "unity" which had been an all lips at the hour of liberation was forgotten. Within ten days a reign of terror was in full swing all the way from Toulouse in the southwest to Nice and the Italian border. The streets of every city and town were thronged with tough-looking civilians carrying every variety of arms, from stilettos to rifles, hand grenades and tommy guns. They raced wildly down the boulevards in automobiles whose doors had been removed to permit the occupants to shoot easily on the move. They scoured all sections, looking not only for the hated Vichy militiamen but for anyone else who had incurred their political enmity. Even the liberating Americans were not immune. American soldiers were killed and wounded. I was shot at myself, more than a dozen times.

Further on he goes on to say this:

What happened in Marseilles was typical. The FFI—

FFI stands for Forces Françaises de l'Intérieur, French forces of the interior.

—totalled about 1,600 members when the city was liberated. Within two weeks, according to a report by American army intelligence officers, this number had swelled to 4,500 as "all the hoodlums and grudge-payers flocked to the colours after the fighting was over." The same report stated that soon thereafter the total membership "dropped to about 3,000 as the original members, mostly reliable citizens, returned to their normal pursuits, leaving the undesirable elements as the great bulk of the organization.

A little further on he says:

At least two allied officers who had been carrying on espionage in Vichy France were killed; their FFI captors refused even to inquire of the nearby American army concerning their claim that they belonged to the allied forces.

On the following page I read this:

In Toulouse—

Always Toulouse, where de Bernonville was condemned.

—where the communist element was very strong, the situation was so tense that residents urged American occupation of the city for a few weeks until "the armed communist element could be brought under control."

Further on I read:

Then American officers and men began to draw FFI fire. These "accidents" coincided with a change in the French communist party line towards the United States. For the first few weeks after the liberation, all Frenchmen were unanimous in fervent gratitude to the Americans. Then the communists, evidently fearing that France would turn against Russia, began sniping at our forces. Since most of the newspapers of southern France were communist-controlled, an almost unanimous tirade of unjustified complaints arose in the press against the American army. There was also a crescendo of word-of-mouth propaganda. Civil affairs officers noted an organized communist-inspired campaign to discredit America and Americans with the French.

I wish to read one more passage. Speaking of General Parkman, the author writes this:

He was soon forced to intervene in another connection. In all parts of the south the FFI established drumhead courts whose judges were usually persons acceptable to the communists. These courts-marital, which had no legal basis whatever, tried thousands of Frenchmen, most of whom were sentenced to death or to long terms of imprisonment. The most notorious of these courts were at Nimes, Perpignan, and Toulouse.

The place where de Bernonville was condemned. To continue:

Such a scandal resulted from their illegal and summary proceedings that General Parkman wrote to General de Gaulle's military delegate, General Henri Cochet, insisting that the courts-martial be discontinued and succeeded by ordinary processes of law.

Mr. Robinson finishes his article by saying:

Such is the fuel under the bubbling cauldron of hate that is France today.

This was written in April, 1946. To continue:

If it boils over into further bloodshed and death, the world should at least know who is responsible.

When I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North vindicating the French maquis, I knew that he was not well acquainted with all the information that could enable him to have an exact idea of that organization.

Regarding the maquis, the hon. member is reported at page 793 of Hansard to have said:

A word about the maquis might be in order. The maquis are men who gave back to France her soul during the war. They are the men who gave back to France her honour after the betrayal of Vichy. They are the men who died, not only to free France from nazi persecution but also to enable us to live in Canada as free men and women. The men of the maquis are heroes whose names will be remembered wherever there are free men.

We know, Mr. Speaker, that the maquis could be classified under three headings, namely, the military maquis; the communist maquis; and the terrorist maquis. Skirmishes, and even pitched battles, took place among members of the various underground movements, although the communist underground and the terrorist underground, outnumbering all others, were practically amalgamated. In a press conference in October, 1948, Mr. Francisque Gay, the present ambassador of France here in Ottawa, admitted that at the outset the resistance movement in France was ninety per cent communist.

Several underground leaders in the maquis were Russians. Their title of soviet agent gave them prestige and a part as leader. May I mention Kadewz Kosinski, in the Pas-de-Calais; Captain Votcharemko, great torturer of the group known as "Captain Marius' gang", who operated in the department of Saone-et-Loire; Captain Alexandre and Lieutenant Sabourov, of the red army, who played an important part in the Auvergne underground, and this band of Georgian killers who controlled the Dordogne underground, as was revealed in the course of a trial.

Sometimes they received orders from Moscow. No doubt this led to the apparently unexplainable assassination of leading personalities, such as General Debeney, army commanding officer during the first great war; or General Noel, former army commanding officer, Grand Officier de la Legion d'Honneur, kidnapped and assassinated with twelve other persons at Dorat, in the Haute-Vienne. There again, it happened that the victims were bona fide members of the resistance movement. Let me mention the case of Baron Henry Reille-Soult, hero of the first war, organizer of a military underground, who during the second world war invented a sighting gear, the plans of which he was able to forward to the allies.

Here is the evidence of Madame Reille-Soult, recently published in newspapers:

On July 21, 1944, Baron Henry Reille-Soult and his wife were arrested at Rancho and handed over to the group called "Le Chouan", which controlled the maquis in the forest of Lussac-les-Chateaux. After twenty-six days of terrible agony, they were compelled, with numerous other Frenchmen, to travel by forced marches across the region, to be then tried by a mock tribunal and locked up in a pig-sty. At the same time, under pretext of requisition, their property was looted, their livestock stolen, and their chambermaid raped by their tormentors, and they were finally freed after handing over a cheque for 60,000 francs.

Raymond Daniel, New York Times correspondent, in September 1944, wrote about the reign of the F.F.I., French forces of the interior, of the snipers and the members of the underground or maquisards in Paris. He described these irregular formations composed mainly of young loafers—such is the expression used by him—using guns, grenades, and machine pistols in the streets of Paris. People were denouncing their neighbours, believed to be collaborationists, to these guttersnipes, not to the police. On a mere denunciation originating from the first comer, members of the resistance movement invaded a house, arresting or killing the occupants. There again it happened that they robbed and killed people who were far better resistants than they were themselves. Pierre Tattinger, president of the municipal council of Paris at the time of the liberation, said, "The liberation committee was a committee of arrest, nothing else".

Here is the opinion of the eminent sociologist Joseph Folliet who, in September last, wrote in Les Etudes, the great Jesuit review:

Repression has taken the aspect of political revenge, and not of serene and universal justice. How can we believe in a purging justice? Depending upon the time and place, the same charge warrants a death sentence here, twenty years' hard labour there, five years of national indignity elsewhere. Under the same general label of "treason" were classified traitors in the technical sense of the word, all the spectrum of "collaboration", every shade of "Petainism" including, sometimes, those who refused the collaboration program.

Now that we know of the mock tribunals existing in Toulouse, France, and it was in Toulouse that Bernonville was condemned in absentia; now that we know of the entire control of the tribunals by the communist maquis; it is worth knowing the type of man Bernonville is. At the age of twenty, he was made Chevalier de la Legion d'Honneur for his military exploits. At the age of twenty-three, he became Officer de la Legion d'Honneur for similar accomplishments. He later on was given seven citations and la Croix de Guerre 1918. He was wounded five times and bears the scars of thirty wounds. In 1940, he was singled out in the army orders of the day and awarded la Croix de Guerre 1940. This citation was published in the official journal of France. This is the record of a man whom the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) wants us to believe to be a traitor to his country.

When he gave evidence before the court in Montreal last fall, he made a sworn declaration which has never been denied, and cannot be denied by anyone, in which he related his actions and conduct during the war.

He accepted from Marshal Petain the functions of military governor of the district of Lyon. He was a full military commandant. He was entrusted with the security of people and supplies which was then in a precarious stage, having barely one day of food supply ahead. He also stated in the course of his sworn evidence that he had a secret mission with the purpose of preserving and saving all the military units and material under his command, to put them at the disposal of the allies at a moment to be decided by the chief of the French state. On August 20, 1944, his functions terminated and he met that day one of the principal leaders of the French underground and informed the latter of his military forces and material which he had salvaged from the Germans. One-half hour later, he was arrested by the gestapo and incarcerated in Nancy. He was released when the Americans reached that city.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at seven-thirty o'clock.

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was reviewing the duties that had been carried out by Count de Bernonville when he was at Lyons. I mentioned that in August, 1944, he was arrested and incarcerated by the German gestapo. I submit that those are facts upon which I would rather rely than on hearsay and gratuitous declarations. I wonder why a man by the name of Jacolson, and Mme. Camet, who are supposed to be actually secret agents of the communists in Montreal, did not come last fall before the court in Montreal during the trial, which lasted many weeks, to present their evidence against de Bernonville. That is the reason why I said the other day that I was convinced of the innocence of de Bernonville.

Coming now to the other point about the assistance given to our soldiers. I shall refer first to the evidence de Bernonville gave before the court in Montreal, and afterward to the testimony of a great Canadian soldier. It was in November, 1942, that he came to Vichy and stated before the court that he had participated with officers of the Vichy army in organizing and supervising a communication line, that is, shelters, relays, et cetera, in order to facilitate the escape of allied officers to Spain.

That sworn statement of de Bernonville was fully corroborated by Captain Antoine Masson of Montreal who, after having been sworn, stated in evidence that he had joined the army in 1940 and had gone to England with the Fusilliers Mont Royal. During his military service he was decorated with the Military Cross. He took part in the Dieppe invasion and was captured by the Germans and hospitalized in a German hospital after being wounded. Afterward he was transferred from place to place until in October, 1942, he was finally stationed at Chambaran. I shall quote the exact words used by Captain Masson when giving his evidence, which were as follows:

In the month of October, 1942, we were transferred to Chambaran. At that time, I mean to answer your question—the commanding officer of the camp was Commandant Lamothe, who at times, in various circumstances, used to come and speak with us and he was very anxious to enquire about our way of thinking and our reactions about the Vichy government. He showed to us, and among others to me personally, a list of fifty divisions of the French army that were ready to gather right in 1942 and help the allies in case of a mass invasion, that is, assist the allies against the Germans.

Here is what happened: We were called—two or three days before, we were called in the office of the commanding officer at the time of the German invasion on November 12, 1942. The commanding officer of the camp took the telephone, in presence of Lieutenant-Commander Michael Redvers Prior, who was also a prisoner of war with myself—a D.S.O. with Bar. He told me at that time: "It is decided, we are letting you go, yourself and Prior. Now sit down for a few minutes." He took the telephone, he asked to speak with Mr. de Bernonville and Mr. de Bernonville was not there then; he then asked to speak with Mr. de Bernonville's assistant, and they had a conversation of a few minutes over the telephone and he said: "The organization of the two I have here in my office is ready and they will leave at two o'clock. Therefore, you will have to notify the authorities accordingly." He then hung up the telephone and what I report now is practically verbatim. And on the following day he supplied us with a bus and then we left for Grenoble, and then, step by step, we reached Spain.

Those are the reasons why I contended that de Bernonville had given assistance to our soldiers. As those facts were clearly established before the court and could not be contradicted, that must have been the reason why the judge expressed the opinion in rendering his judgment that this man should receive asylum in Canada. In his remarks the hon. member for Winnipeg North stated that he was amazed to learn that the judge had so expressed himself, and I quote from page 794 of Hansard:

> The court ordered the count liberated immediately and said it was directing authorities at Ottawa to grant him asylum along with his family.

Then the hon. member went on to state:

> That is an amazing statement, and in it I think the judge went far beyond the bounds of propriety.

I must tell the hon. member that there are precedents in our jurispudence for such a statement and I should like to cite one of them. A case dealing with one Carmichael is reported in 3 Dominion Law Reports, 1942, page 519, where Mr. Justice Coady, of the Supreme Court of British Columbia says:

> While this court has no jurisdiction to interfere with the order made herein by the court, yet one cannot help but express the hope that under all the circumstances here the enforcement of the deportation order may be indefinitely deferred and that the woman and son may be allowed to remain in Canada.

After Count de Bernonville heard of the statements made in the house the other day by the hon. member he authorized me to make a categorical denial because he contends that those statements are absolutely unfounded. Just before three o'clock this afternoon I received a telegram from Paris, but before reading it I would direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that it has been stated that the events referred to took place on June 20 and 21, 1944. Those events are supposed to have taken place at a place called Châlon-sur-Saône. It might be noted in passing that that place is more than 250 miles from Paris. This telegram is dated February 24 and is signed by six persons, one of whom was decorated for his resistance activities. It reads:

> We certify on our honour Jacques de Bernonville was in Paris from the 17th to the 21st June, 1944. We have seen him there.

And the telegram is signed by:

> Abbe Hadot, Professor, Grand Seminary, Versailles.
> Isabelle and Jacqueline Ronin, 80 Ranelagh.
> Madame Lallemant, displaced widow, 26 Faisanderie.
> Madame Deverdelon, 1 Fenelon.
> Landry Lagatinerie, decorated for resistance activities, 1 Dickens, Paris.

Frederic Dorion, M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

I submit that a telegram of that type from six reliable persons is much stronger evidence than the statements reported by the hon. member. In closing I should like to recall that when the United Nations were assembled in Paris in December, 1948, they adopted a declaration of human rights, article XIV of which reads as follows:

> Everyone has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution.

It is the application of that rule that we request in the case of de Bernonville. I will go so far as to say that if it could be established properly and legally that this man is a common-law criminal he would not be able to find anyone to contest an order of deportation. But contending as I do that he is a political refugee, I say to the government that it is their duty to give him shelter in our country because the right of asylum is a sacred right which has always been recognized by all civilized countries of the world.

(Translation):

And now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote two excerpts from a book on international law by a well-known French writer, M. Calvo. Here is what I find on page 574, Vol. 2, No. 1034:

> In 1849, during negotiations conducted by the great powers in connection with Turkey's refusal to hand over to Austria certain individuals who had been involved in the Hungarian insurrection and had taken refuge in Wallachia, Lord Palmerston wrote on October 6: "If there is today a rule which, more than any other, has been observed in modern times by all independent states, large or small, throughout the civilized world, it is the rule whereby a government should not hand over political refugees, unless some positive provisions of a treaty compel it to do so, and His Majesty's government believes that there are few, if any, such agreements. The rules of hospitality, the requirements of humanity, the feelings which are a natural attribute of man combine in ruling out such extraditions, and any independent government which of its own accord would grant one of such a nature would justly and universally be stigmatized as having disgraced itself.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the documents to which I referred and the quotations I submitted this afternoon clearly show what kind of courts existed in France in 1944 and as late as 1946. I have here the testimony of a French author, who wrote in November 1948, in the magazine Conferencia, that practically the same conditions still exist. He writes as follows:

There is yet another crime, but of an essentially moral character. Men and women who, in France and in our empire, have followed Pétain in good faith (I naturally leave out profiteers of the regime, the mob of cowards only too eager to hide their guilty conscience under the mantle of the victor of Verdun, shady politicians and racketeers of all stamps), such men and women were always, yes always, of the French élite. Their unselfishness, courage and patriotism were unquestionable, and I have known many of them. Blinded by the myth of Pétain, deeply convinced as they were, that the old man of Vichy was thinking only of France and that, when the day came, he would pull them out of humiliation and defeat, they allowed themselves to be drawn on the sinuous way where a glorious name guided them, committing themselves to Pétain, entrusting themselves to him body and soul.

Many, at this very moment, are paying dearly for their misplaced trust and their lack of critical judgment. Many were tried by so-called civic chambers, in so-called courts of justice, presided over by magistrates who, not so long ago, were light-heartedly sending our comrades to prison or to the firing-post, aided and abetted by too many so-called "résistants", whose fresh titles would have borne looking into or about whom it would have been nice to know if they were not putting political rancour or personal hatred above equity. Many of those unfortunate Frenchmen and Frenchwomen are now rotting in overcrowded jails or concentration camps. Some are yet waiting to be questioned. Well, I have seen all this happen in Spain, two years after the civil war and, according to press reports, it still prevails on the other side of the Pyrenees. There have been rightful protests against this shame, this challenge to justice and humanity. I say, regretfully, that today Spain can reply that she has no cause to envy us in that respect. It is an outrageous blemish on the name of France, a festering sore that infects everything, poisons everything and which, as long as it is not cleaned up and healed, shall impede any earnest attempt at reconstruction in this country. It is not realized that France emerges, in fact, from a larval civil war, a war, more insidious and therefore more dangerous yet than the war in Spain, because it goes under the false colours of a war of liberation.

Mr. J. G. L. Langlois (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, before opening my remarks, I wish to abide by the tradition of the house as far as the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is concerned. It is with great pleasure that I do so.

I must first congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply, the hon. members for Essex West (Mr. Brown) and for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Demers). Both fulfilled their task with tact and skill.

I have special words of praise for our new colleague from Laval-Two Mountains. As a newcomer in the house he was invited by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to second the motion now being discussed.

[Mr. Dorion.]

Being a new member myself at the opening of the session in September 1945, I had the same experience, having been called upon to second a similar motion. I congratulate the hon. member most heartily on his maiden speech in the house. As was stated this afternoon by another speaker, he was a credit to his constituency and to the house at large on that occasion.

(Text):

I also extend congratulations and best wishes to the new cabinet ministers, the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), and the hon. Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). When they joined the cabinet they already had a substantial and meritorious record of service. I am convinced that their new functions will afford them a better opportunity to continue to serve Canada with equal devotion.

(Translation):

During the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, it is customary also for hon. members to praise the good points of their constituencies and proudly display the development and progress of the industries that flourish in their district.

I too may well extol the natural scenic beauty of my constituency. In fact, I can assert without fear of exaggeration, that I represent a constituency which is one of the loveliest spots not only in the province of Quebec but in the whole country. I refer to the Gaspé peninsula.

I regret to say, however, that, unlike previous speakers in this debate, I cannot praise the development and progress of our local industries.

As a matter of fact, my constituency is now feeling the ill effects of what is apparently the beginning of an economic depression.

Last October, November and part of December I traveled up and down my constituency and, during this comprehensive tour, I saw with deep concern, how far our economic situation has slipped from the peak prosperity it enjoyed during the war.

This kind of talk may sound strange when, admittedly, every part of this country is enjoying a degree of prosperity such as it had never known before. But when I shall tell this house of the very special conditions in my constituency and point out the causes of this incipient economic depression, I am sure my fellow members will all agree I am right.

There are only three industries in my county—I will not call them the chief industries, because they are the only ones—and these are deep-sea fishing, lumbering and the tourist trade.

As early as 1937, if I remember well, about two years before the start of the last war, my district had begun to feel the consequences of the world war that was to follow. Indeed, Canada having agreed to take part in the economic sanctions directed at Italy when Mussolini declared war against Ethiopia, my district lost, as a result, its biggest market for dried fish. This product, needless to say, is the cheapest one to manufacture in my district, as it requires less care than is necessary for the kinds of fish we can produce.

During the war a new market was opened up to us, that of England and of allied nations where, because of a shortage of meat at the time, we could sell frozen fish. Because of this new market, we had to convert our salt and dried fish industry into a frozen fish industry.

To comply with the requirements of this new market, we poured money into the venture, built additional cold storage plants and overhauled our production methods from top to bottom. This market lasted throughout the war and even for about two and half years after the war, under the so-called post-UNRRA plan.

Now that this new market has vanished we have had to reconvert our industry so as to regain our former customers. However, economic conditions in South American countries, in Central America, and in Italy, do not allow us, at the moment, wholly to recover the world market we enjoyed before. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, since the war ended, the price of fish took a frightful plunge.

Furthermore, our fishermen from Gaspe have to compete with the fishermen from the maritimes, who are able to use more modern methods. Indeed, in New Brunswick as in Nova Scotia, fishermen are able to benefit from the federal grants initiated during the war to promote fisheries in Canada.

During the war, indeed, the federal government provided grants to fishermen anxious to build trawlers in order to increase their catches. The building of these trawlers was a rather costly proposition and required especially the preparation of detailed drawings and specifications that had to be approved by the inspection branch of the Department of Transport. The services of architects were required for the drawing of plans. So, in view of the prohibitive cost of these drawings, our fishermen in Gaspe—that is the main reason why they have been unable to benefit from the federal grants—were unable to build their trawlers in accordance with federal requirements.

As far as the fishermen of my province are concerned, I know that the Quebec government could have done as in New Brunswick where they, to supplement federal subsidies, paid for the drawing of plans by naval architects. The Quebec government did not see fit to grant the same privilege to the fishermen of Gaspe.

The second reason why the majority of fishermen of my constituency cannot purchase trawlers is the lack of appropriate fishing harbours to accommodate deep-draught ships. Since my election as representative of Gaspe county in this house, I have constantly urged the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) to provide more fishing harbours in the Gaspe peninsula, so that a larger number of deep-draught vessels may put into port there. I must thank the Minister of Public Works for the courtesy, the sympathy and, might I say, the generosity with which he has always received my requests. However, much remains to be done.

I believe that it is a federal responsibility to provide for more fishing harbours that would enable our fishermen, as I said a moment ago, to build larger boats and increase their catch. They would be in a better position to compete on a fairer basis with the fishermen of the neighbouring provinces, and by that I mean the maritime provinces.

The lack of decent fishing harbours is a serious handicap to our fishermen, compelled as they are to use smaller craft.

All our fishing harbours are tidal harbours. This means that to go out or return the fishermen must wait for the tide. Sometimes they fish all through the night and then find that they cannot put into port because the tide is out. They must therefore wait four or five hours, during which time their catch loses much of its value.

Again, due to the fact that we lack decent fishing harbours in the Gaspé district, our fishermen cannot secure loans to build their boats because these craft, once completed, cannot be insured. I have myself approached various marine insurance companies, but no insurance can be secured for these boats because we lack decent harbours, decent shelters where they might be safely moored during storms. The marine risks are too heavy. That is the reason why private insurance companies refuse to take them. If we had larger fishing harbours, where our fleet could find a haven, our fishermen could take out an insurance policy on the boats and of course, if they can insure their craft, it logically follows that they can obtain credit from our lending institutions.

The other industry we have in Gaspé is the lumbering industry. In the past, we have always made our sales on the European and South African markets. During the war, this industry prospered, as did the ocean fishing industry, but since the end of the war, our activities in this field have reached a rather low mark. After having lost the British and South African lumber markets, we now have to turn to the domestic markets, either in Quebec or Montreal. Even those entirely unacquainted with this region can well imagine the situation that must be faced by Gaspé lumber producers, when we consider how far Gaspé is from Quebec or Montreal.

You can see the predicament of our lumber producers. They have to compete with producers close to the main Quebec markets.

This is not the only problem of our lumbering trade. The Gaspé coast is abrupt and difficult of access. The national highway around the peninsula crosses one mountain range after another. Our commercial wharves are on the average 25 to 30 miles apart. It is easy to imagine how hard it is for our lumbermen to bring their wood down to the ships that take it up to Montreal or Quebec. That is why I again ask the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), as I have repeatedly in the past, that new wharves be built in Gaspé, so as to bring our local industry into line with those of the better developed districts in the province.

[Mr. Langlois.]

Mr. Speaker, a year ago I put a resolution on the order paper requesting that careful consideration be given to a certain project, viz that the Canada Gulf Terminal Railway, now linking Mont Joli to Matane, be extended to Ste. Anne des Monts.

I hope that within a very short time this house will have the opportunity of giving a favourable vote on this proposal but meanwhile I must bring it to the attention of the Minister of Transport asking him, on behalf of my electors, to give it his sympathetic consideration. Such a railway would afford a good part of my constituency a better access to the Montreal and Quebec markets, to which I was referring a few moments ago. If I may mention the benefits which one of our industries would derive from such an extension, I shall say that through the lack of railway facilities we are unable, in that part of my constituency, to sell our lumber on the United States market. Of course, with the extension we are now asking, that market would at once be opened to our local producers.

Before I conclude this part of my remarks relating directly to my constituency, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that in the past it has always been thought that the solving of the economic problems of the Gaspé peninsula might lie solely in the export of our manpower. I now want to correct this false impression and false opinion because I believe that if we in Gaspé were given the means ordinarily afforded any other district, we would be able to provide for our own maintenance without being compelled to leave our little Gaspé country which we love so dearly. To use the words of the great British political leader in the last war: "Give us the tools and we will finish the job."

Mr. Speaker, I shall spend the rest of the time allotted to me this evening in making a few remarks on Canadian politics in general.

First, I heartily approve the wonderful speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) and I approve unreservedly the proposal he made—a suggestion which had already been made by several other members—to the effect that Canada should be represented at the Vatican.

Allow me now to congratulate and thank on behalf of my compatriots of Quebec the right hon. the Prime Minister for the deserving effort he has made and the practical results he has achieved, since his rise to his present position, in order to give a fairer representation to my French-Canadian compatriots in the civil service.

Last year I had the opportunity to discuss this question of the federal civil service and more particularly of our French-Canadian representation in that service. In the speech I made at that time, I answered a so-called nationalist who took a gloomy view of the situation, in so far as our representation in the civil service was concerned. In order not to paint so gloomy a picture for those of my province who might like to enter the civil service in Ottawa, I thought it advisable then to point out to this house that we had had some success in that field in the past.

Besides, my views at the time were justified for, later on, the Jean report acknowledged that one of the reasons why there were not enough French Canadians in the civil service, in Ottawa, was that our prospective applicants had been made timorous and that our citizens from the province of Quebec were afraid to apply for a position in the federal civil service.

However, when making these remarks, I failed to take what is commonly known as a rhetorical precaution—I made what some people consider the serious mistake of forgetting to state that I was not satisfied with the situation at the time, any more than I am with the situation now. Yet I was immediately made a target for abuse and accused of stating, although I had said nothing of the sort, that I was satisfied with the situation in the federal civil service, in so far as the representation of French Canadians was concerned.

I made no effort to correct that impression I did not even attempt to challenge this statement, except that I asked the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche (Mr. Hamel) to quote that part of my speech where I was supposed to have said that "I was satisfied." He then admitted that I had said nothing of the kind. I did not deem it necessary to refer further to that charge. However, I think my hon. friends will be surprised to hear that, a few weeks ago in Quebec, the same nationalist member to whom I replied in this house last year—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Name him.

Mr. Hamel: Name him.

Mr. Langlois: I shall, later. This same nationalist member stated that the question of a larger representation for French Canadians in the dominion civil service was only a minor matter. Now, I think it was the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): The member for Quebec, period.

Mr. Langlois: I must add that in his speech before the legislature this member of the provincial house weighed representation of French Canadians in the dominion civil service against policies of concern to the country at large. However, I can well imagine what those who criticized me last year would have said if, perchance, I had had the misfortune of stating that French-Canadian representation in the dominion civil service was only a matter of secondary importance.

Mr. Speaker, back home, when speaking to the good people of my constituency, people who know me, I am not in the habit of minding my statements to that extent, and I ask to be permitted to do likewise in this house. Besides, I am more inclined to practical patriotism, such as that of the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Langlois: Besides I believe no part of those great problems will be settled, for problems there are, though one is sometimes prone to magnify them, with mere protestations of patriotism or of boundless nationalism.

(Text):

In this debate, on Monday, February 21, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) deemed it necessary, for his own good, to make the following statement as reported at page 732 of Hansard:

In a flattering way hon. members opposite as well as some to my left seem to have been assiduous in reading past speeches of mine to which I pay much less attention today then they seem to. The interesting thing, however, is that throughout all those speeches I was emphasizing a basic principle which has never changed; that is, that I believe under our federal system there should be a strong central government with clearly defined powers and there should be strong local governments with clearly defined powers, all having taxing powers, clearly defined, adequate to carry out their responsibilities. For years I have criticized overlapping as between the dominion government and the provincial governments. I have criticized increased overlapping on the part of the dominion government, as I have criticized overlapping by the provincial governments. By such an inquiry as was urged by myself and others at the dominion-provincial conferences that overlapping could be effectively eliminated.

I know that in the past the leader of the opposition on many occasions has complained of having been misquoted. But if he compares the mild statement to which I have just referred with the following press reports of some of his previous utterances on provincial autonomy, he will surely be obliged to accuse the present leader of the opposition of having misquoted the former premier of Ontario. I refer to the Montreal Gazette of November 13, 1942, page 20, column 1. The Montreal Gazette was giving a fairly substantial report of an address he made to the Mount Royal division electors, community hall, N.D.G., and he is reported to have said:

If a contract is to be binding, both parties to the contract must observe the conditions, and it certainly takes no lawyer to understand that unless the conditions upon which a contract was made are observed, then any special rights which arise out of the contract come to an end, therefore without any misunderstanding—

And this is in quotation marks in the press report.

—"I believe that it is appropriate that we should make it clear that any rights which may be claimed under the British North America Act can only continue so long as the basic condition is recognized, and that the pact, among other things, is for the purpose of promoting the interests of the British empire. That is one of the things we should keep in mind."

In the same press report the Montreal Gazette quotes the leader of the opposition as follows:

Colonel Drew cited the preamble of the British North America Act, with its stipulated consideration that " such a union would promote the interests of the British empire," and he made the points that every right claimed under that contract is dependent and contingent upon that condition and then he said an interesting thing . . . "That should be taught in our schools" . . . whether or not it was so intended that sentence carries explosive implications. It implies federal supervision, if not control, of education. That in turn, implies a change in the Canadian constitution from piecemeal federalism, and in the direction of solid nationhood.

Again, I read the following report in the Toronto Star of February 23, 1935:

London: Digressing from a defence of the capitalist system during which he traced a picture of Canada overrun with "halfbaked theorists spreading plausible lunacies and quick tricks to end the depression" the former commissioner launched upon an attack on the attorney general.

For Canada, harassed by debts, labour troubles and conflict in company, insurance and labour laws, Colonel Drew saw in one strong central government the solution, instead of an utterly mad jig-saw puzzle of ten conflicting governments. If we were starting all over again who would be crazy enough to set up ten governments in Canada? he demanded.

[Mr. Langlois.]

In the Toronto Globe of November 10, 1936, reporting an address at the board of trade club on November 9, 1936, the leader of the opposition is quoted as having said the following:

Canada must eliminate the costly inefficiency of ten governments doing in most cases, the job of one, or else sink in the rising tide of fascism . . . We must decide whether we are one nation or nine.

I have still another quotation made on another occasion when he went so far as to speak of a main office—that is the central government—and nine branch offices; that is, the nine provincial governments. One wonders today what has happened to the branch offices mentioned in his earlier statements, considering his last statements on the same subject. On Monday the hon. member said that he wanted then to point out only the overlapping authority vested in both the central and the provincial governments. But when one speaks of main offices and branch offices one has surely in mind more than the mere problem of conflicting authority and jurisdiction.

Speaking on this important problem of dominion-provincial relations the other day when taking part in the debate on the entry of Newfoundland into confederation, I made a suggestion which I want, in the few minutes left at my disposal, to repeat with some additional details. I said then: If the nine provincial premiers are sincere when they claim that their autonomy is threatened by the past efforts of the central government to come to agreement with them on constitutional problems, why are they prevented today from getting together themselves, on their own initiative, with a view to agreeing on a formula which will be accepted by the nine provinces?

We have been accused—and by "we" I mean the central government—of having strayed from the path laid down by the fathers of confederation. We have heard it said—and among the provincial premiers whom we have heard in this connection has been the premier of Quebec—that the central government is the daughter of the provinces. Well, Mr. Speaker, what is to prevent the premiers of the nine provinces from setting us back onto the path laid down by the fathers of confederation? Why do not the premiers of the provinces follow the example which was followed at the preliminary conferences of Quebec and Charlottetown? The representatives of the then existing provinces or colonies were not afraid to get together and come to a common agreement which served later on as the basis of our confederation of today. They were not afraid to get together and lay before the imperial government of the time what was their idea of a federated Canada.

If the premiers of the provinces would so get together and discuss provincial autonomy, if they would discuss these provincial rights together—and they could include fiscal arrangements in their discussions—and if then they would come to Ottawa with a combined agreement which could serve as the basis of a dominion-provincial conference, I say, Mr. Speaker, without fear of being contradicted by the members of my party, that the central government would then be pleased to meet with the provinces anew after such a procedure had been followed.

May I add this, Mr. Speaker. I believe sincerely that, so long as we are going to mix politics with this most important question of provincial prerogatives or dominion-provincial relations, we are not going to meet with success. I venture another suggestion. When at the end of the 1939-45 conflict the nations of the world joined at San Francisco to draft a constitution for the future United Nations assembly, most of the countries sent bi-partisan delegations. I am sure that if at these preliminary meetings, which I have just suggested, the provincial governments would send bi-partisan representatives, the central government would be ready to do the same thing at the dominion-provincial conference following them. By doing that we would at least be taking this most important problem out of politics. If bi-partisan policy was good when it came to deciding on the constitution of the international body which was to deal with the future of Europe, including countries which were former enemy countries, it surely must be good when it comes to amending the constitution which will govern the future of Canada, our beloved country.

Mr. Graydon: The government does not do that, though.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I begin by paying my compliments to all those who have spoken before me. I intend to direct these compliments a little later to two of the ministers. Before opening as I had intended to, I should like to tell the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Langlois) a little story, the moral of which I hope he may grasp. I am thinking of his attack on my leader in the latter part of his remarks. It is said—I should add, I suppose, sir, that it comes from the usual authoritative sources from which government pronouncements come—that at the time Noah built his ark he gathered the animals together, that they came in by a single strong plank. That was necessary, perhaps, to count them as you count and register cattle through a gate. You see, they had to come by a plank because Noah had to build his ark with a doorway somewhat above the waterline when the ark was loaded. It so happened that the fly preceded the elephant. The fly turned around to the elephant and said: "Whom do you think you are pushing?" I just suggest that to the hon. member for Gaspé.

Because of the latitude which you have allowed in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I want to take the time to pay a compliment to the city of Ottawa, to the people of Ottawa, and to a certain football club in Ottawa which is the second best club in Canada. I mean every word that I say. I think that particularly the sports writers of the papers were fair. I think that in his broadcasts Tommy Shields was both accurate and generous, and therefore my hat is off to this city, to its football players and to its football fans. But I noticed last evening that our brand-new Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) addressed a banquet given to those splendid players. According to the newspapers he said that he had written his speech while listening to a dull address by a member of the Progressive Conservative party. I thought that was rather good. But then I thought that the member of this party who was speaking must have had a particularly soothing voice because, having read the speech of the minister, I am quite sure that he wrote it while he was sound asleep.

I should like now to pay a compliment to the people of Toronto. Two or three hundred people went there, all of them paying their own way, and they did not break a thing in the Royal York hotel. Perhaps some of the members of the universities who were there a week or ten days ago might note that, because at that time the damages ran into thousands of dollars. That excursion, and it was that, did more to bring about understanding between eastern and western Canada than all the speeches that have ever been or ever will be written. My hat is doffed entirely to the people of eastern Canada. As I am essentially a kindly person I should like to include the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the compliments I am paying.

There are three or four things I intend to mention in this debate. I think it is a shame that this debate should be broken up into pieces, as has been done to some extent this year as well as on other occasions during my short sojourn in this parliament. The debate on the address is the only opportunity that private members in all parts of the house have to make suggestions to the government as to the items that should be contained in the budget or as to legislation which it is thought should be brought down by the government in power. So I intend to mention three or four things which in themselves may seem to be small or even insignificant.

My first suggestion is that the government should make a change with respect to the superannuation allowances of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or the Royal North-west Mounted Police, as they were then known. I want to be extremely fair. The answer given by this government is exactly the same as the answer given by the Bennett government. In saying that, I think I clear myself of the charge of having political motives in mentioning this matter. The answer is that this would involve changing all civil service superannuation matters.

These men may be technically civil servants, but only technically. They do not have an eight-hour day; they are on call twenty-four hours, day and night. The old regulations, and I assume they are still the same, made a man subject, not only to criticism but to court martial, if he lost a prisoner in a period of five days during which he would have to stay awake. That is the kind of job they are doing. The argument that you must treat the civil servant, whether on an eight-hour day or not, the same as you do the former mounties does not hold water.

I make the following suggestion to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) and perhaps to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), or in any event to those people who have charge of veterans hospitals. This could be done without any definite statutory authority; it could be done by changing a regulation. There are not a great many of these old men—they are old now—and I suggest they should receive the same hospitalization as the veteran. That would help these poor old chaps who have done a real job for us and who are now unable to take care of themselves.

I turn now to another matter where I think separation in legislation is not only essential but imperative. I refer to the blind. There is no more reason why pensions for the blind and pensions for the aged should be in one act than there is that you should associate any two matters as far apart as the poles. They are asking for that. I am sure that we have all been circularized with respect to this matter. They want to be considered separately and it would be a simple thing to do by way of legislation.

I come now to two matters that have to do with health. I am sure we have all had letters with regard to the arthritics, and I am sure also that many of us have had letters with regard to the incurable. I would crave some of your time in order to read a letter I received this morning, and I might mention that it is not from a constituent of mine. It reads:

Dear sir:
My son—

I will not mention the name.

—has been paralysed since the age of 10 years; he is now 27 years old. He is incurable, he cannot use hands or feet. It's called agitating paralysis and the continual shake troubles him more than the paralysis. His dad died seven years ago at the mine, so I am a widow (his mother). It's impossible for me to leave him except for an hour or so, so I cannot work myself. I have not left him a day in seventeen years. Why is there no pension for incurables?

I know all about provincial jurisdiction, but before now this parliament has made grants in aid in connection with pensions. Last evening the minister expounded that for an hour and a half, and I shall have something brief to say about it in a moment.

With regard to the first subject, it does seem to me that none of us could receive a letter like that without having his heart strings wrung and without feeling that perhaps we are not doing our job. I do not say that critically, I do not mean it in that way at all; but it does seem to me that we have failed in doing a humanitarian job unless we do what we can to alleviate conditions of that kind.

In speaking about arthritis I want to say that I know something about it, having had some difficulty with that ailment not so long ago. I spoke about arthritis in the first session after I came down here and I have spoken about it during each session since then. We have been talking about it since 1945 but we have not done one single thing. There are 600,000 people who today are suffering arthritic and rheumatic pains. Not all of them are cripples, but a great many of them are, and we have done nothing. It is perfectly true that about a year ago the minister gathered together some people who formed an association and had an organization meeting. They have not met since, and the arthritics are in the same condition as they were when I came down here.

Mr. Martin: The hon. gentleman would not want the country to get that impression. They have met. They are meeting repeatedly; as a matter of fact, they met a week ago last Saturday. They have an organization in Ottawa. The hon. gentleman asks what they did. If he will read the speech I made last night, he will see what they did.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am one of those who heard most of the minister's speech last night. I am one of those apparently who read it carefully and accurately this morning.

I repeat that not one thing has been done for arthritics except a lot of talk, and newspaper advertising which has gone across the country. I will tell you somebody who is doing something for the arthritics. Anyone who read the speech from the throne in Alberta a few days ago will find in that speech from the throne that they promise both clinical care and hospitalization for the very young and the very old who are suffering from this illness.

Mr. Martin: Partially with money provided by the federal grants.

Mr. Rowe: Where did you get the money?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am going to tell you about your money in a minute.

Mr. Martin: You said we were not doing anything.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I promise the minister that I will not overlook what he is doing with the people's money, if I may put it that way. In the town of Banff, which is in a national park, there is a doctor by the name of Robinson who has two sons who are also medical men. The three of them are operating a clinic and a hospital. It is the only institution of its kind that I know of in Canada. There, by way of research and treatment, these three men have done more for arthritics than all the government organizations, provincial or dominion, in the whole Dominion of Canada.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am sorry that I did not hear what was said then, but I did think I heard the buzzing of another fly.

Mr. Grant: Tory wit.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Tory what?

Mr. Grant: Wit.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am delighted to be described as a wit by a famous psychiatrist; I don't know whether it is with animals or humans. The business of treatment of this illness is all right, but what we need is a concentrated drive to find the cause, because no one has yet found what causes it.

I turn very briefly now to the speech of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) of last evening. Frankly it was not a speech; it was an oration. Many people's names passed through my mind. I thought he looked a little more like Daniel Webster than Horatius at the bridge, or anything of that sort, but it really was a magnificent oration. A careful examination of it reveals—what? It reveals that his department, because we voted a certain amount of money in parliament, has paid out that money to provincial people who are making use of it. That is the total achievement of the minister's department.

You know, Mr. Speaker, when we sit around in our rooms and chat with one another we discuss many subjects. Very often we talk about one another, and particularly about the cabinet ministers, and we have difficulty deciding just who is a great man. The Minister of National Health and Welfare solved that. I have got to give him the number one prize because we require no proof that he is a great man. He admitted it very frankly last night.

I now turn to the speech made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). It is the best political speech I have heard in this house. I pay him that compliment. While he was speaking my mind was searching for something, and it finally came to me a few minutes ago. It is based on a little article in the Reader's Digest that appeared a year or a year and a half ago. According to this little story three bulls were out in a pasture near Ottawa feeding on the lush grass.

Mr. Howe: A very old story.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am very glad that the minister says it is a very old story, because he knows that his old jokes are the best that he has got, and I am in the same spot. What I am doing is improving on the story in the Reader's Digest, to this extent. While these bulls were eating the lush grass they had one ear cocked on a radio which was in the field. They were listening to a speech by the right hon. Minister of Agriculture. He was telling them what a wonderful country this is, how great agriculture was here, there, and elsewhere. They decided to take him at his word and go on a little trip to see what really was going on. They got on the road, and there was the big bull, the intermediate bull and the little bull. They trotted along the roads, and they came to Toronto. The royal winter fair was on, and the big bull thought that was the spot for him, so he stopped there. Then the intermediate bull and the little bull went on. I may be short of time, and I wish my friends would not give me quite so much help.

Mr. Grant: Go ahead, give us some more bull.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They went on and they came to London. The intermediate bull jumped the fence because he thought London was all right; but the little bull went on to Windsor, passed through the tunnel went across the western states, the dust bowl, and on into the mountains somewhere. In short, he went on and on and on. That is not a funny story, but it seems to me that it has a moral for the Minister of Agriculture, and it is that sometimes a little bull goes a long way.

Mr. Grant: You have a lot of bull in front of you.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Frankly I wish you would keep quiet. I cannot hear you, and if I did hear you it would be silly anyway.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): While the minister was speaking I admired him as a mathematician. He and I graduated from what we were delighted to call an institution of learning. It was not very strong on mathematics. It was not very strong in mathematics. Recently I was somewhat concerned because I heard that the great mathematician Einstein was not well, and I thought what a tragedy it would be if we lost him. Now, however, I think the loss would be only to his own immediate family, because I am sure the minister is ready to take his place. The way he threw those hundreds of thousands and millions and billions up in the air and caught them behind his back, under his leg and all that sort of thing was one of the most amazing pieces of jugglery I have ever seen. When I was a wee lad in Regina, which place he also knows very well, the only entertainment we had was when the Kickapoo Indian medicine show came to town. In the first gaslights I ever saw, too, I watched a fellow called a prestidigitator, a sort of cross between an illusionist and a juggler. He had these metal balls, one of which he would let drop so that it nearly went through the platform they had built outside. He also had iron bars which he got under with a terrific effort and lifted into the air, nearly breaking his back in the process. Then he began to toss these great iron balls around like nobody's business. While he was doing this, at the edge of the platform there was a woman in tights, the first such woman I ever saw. This woman was singing a song, I am quite sure in order to distract the attention of the kids from the man. My attention was distracted already, but this was her song:

> They are large balls, as heavy as lead;
> With a flip of his wrist he gives them a twist
> And throws them right over his head.

That was what the minister did with his millions and billions all through his speech.

Now I intend to discuss that speech, which I have since read, to at least this extent. From what he said I gathered that the Liberal government takes credit, particularly in agriculture, for all the good things that ever happened to us, and that the difficulty in which they find themselves now arises because a man by the name of Bennett made the Ottawa agreements of 1932. I am not going to quote any millions or billions or anything of that sort, but I do assert that what Mr. Bennett said then and what the late Mr. Woodsworth said then, that there were no markets, was absolutely true. The minister did not tell us that under the Hawley-Smoot tariff we had been closed out of the United States market. There is no question about that; and remember, that was in June of 1930. So when our party came into power, with things in chaos and no agricultural markets whatever, what did Mr. Bennett do? He made a market by means of the Ottawa trade agreements. And remember that a very few years before that the then Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, made a similar agreement with Mr. Baldwin. It never came into operation because Mr. Baldwin thought and said that in view of the previous commitments of his party, made by Bonar Law, he should have an election. They had the election and he was defeated; but the agreements of 1932 followed the agreement made by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King with Prime Minister Baldwin just a few years before. That is the true history of this matter of quotas; that is exactly what happened. That, of course, was not mentioned in this oration by the minister, which was second only to the major effort of his junior, the right hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin).

Mr. Martin: Thanks for the promotion, making me an imperial privy councillor.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Well, I do not know anyone I would rather promote, but perhaps we can put it down just to wishful thinking and let it go at that.

What is the answer to the present position? It will be said immediately that it is a dollar problem; and anyone who denies that the dollar situation has a great influence on this and all our other problems would be fair neither to himself nor to anyone else. But if the right hon. minister is going to take all the credit for the good things, as he did last night, then he must accept responsibility for those things which are no good. His government, and no one else, got us into the position we are in at the present time.

Now I want to turn to a few figures, the only ones I intend to use. The minister endeavoured to persuade us, or perhaps it would be better to say to persuade those who might read his speech, that the farmer in this country, particularly the wheat farmer, is better off than he has ever been. That I accept if you keep within the confines of this country, but what is the position as compared with other people? I have a few figures here, not from any outside source but from sessional paper No. 115A, dated Wednesday, February 4, 1948, in reply to a motion by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. McCuaig). On page 2 of that return we have the monthly average prices for wheat to domestic users, to the United Kingdom, and to other purchasers not included in those two classes. I am using the figure $1.55 for the United Kingdom, to which must be added the 20 cents about which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) told us this afternoon. He appeared very anxious to get these cheques out before seeding, but it seemed to me there was more than seed involved. I think this means a June election, but of course they know more about it over there than I do. I take the year 1946-47 and begin with August, the first month in the crop year. The price to the United Kingdom was $1.55, to which must be added the 20 cents. The price elsewhere was:

August	$2.05
September	2.07
October	2.15
November	2.27
December	2.26
January	2.27
February	2.45
March	2.88
April	2.85
May	2.88
June	2.59
July	2.53

Then I go on to the next year and take the $1.55 again plus the 20 cents for the United Kingdom. The other figures are as follows:

August, $2.62; September, $2.94; October, $3.22; November, $3.30; December, $3.29.

I might say that the difference between the agreement price and the last figure is $1.74. If one considers the twenty cents, it makes it $1.54 a bushel. No matter how anyone may be able to juggle figures, and you can prove almost anything by figures, there is $1.54 that the farmer lost. Nobody can laugh that off. The farmer received that amount based on this grain at Fort William.

Another thing one must take into account when considering these figures, especially when the minister mentioned millions and billions, is the value of a dollar today. What is our dollar worth? If it is worth half what it was a year ago, then of course those figures which he gave us would be cut in half. If half is not the correct figure, then take any figure which is the correct one, and you will see that these huge dollar figures do not present a true picture of the position in which we find ourselves with respect to foreign trade. I used the word "foreign" advisedly, but perhaps I should have said "overseas trade with Britain", or foreign trade in so far as other countries are concerned.

I would not want anyone to think I stand here, Mr. Speaker, with a cure-all for our economic difficulties. I do not. I am not as clever as that. I am utterly unable to see my way completely through many of the difficulties which confront us. I do say however that, if we keep trading away British preferences for certain alleviations of the United States tariff, then we shall place ourselves in a position where our throats can be cut in one minute. The history of this government has been just that.

After this tariff of four dollars per thousand on lumber and four cents a pound on copper cut off our natural products, what happened? President Wilson came into office and he gave us a new tariff. This was before the Hawley-Smoot tariff. What happened after that? The United States congress immediately gave the President the right to cut that duty 50 per cent, and that was done. Later it was cut another 50 per cent on many of these natural products. Why was that done? It was done because Bennett's empire trade agreements completely shut the United States out of the British markets. Prior to that time the United States sold infinitely more overseas than did Canada. On this occasion, by the exercise of a little bit of independence, Mr. Bennett restored Canadian trade to its proper position. Prior to his coming into office our trade was completely gone.

Mr. Garson: Tell a big enough one and tell it often enough and people may believe it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Someone does not think that is true. I was going to read an article which appeared in the London Economist, Mr. Speaker, but I know that one of my interrupters never heard of that paper so it would not do him any good. I will make one assertion, and that is that all this story about our being against provincial rights and against trade is just bunkum, as the minister knew it was when he delivered his speech last night.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Assiniboia): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that whenever I have the privilege of speaking in this house, I consider it a very great honour. During the time when nominations were being considered to send our member to this House of Commons, I remember I pledged myself to voice, whenever an opportunity should present itself, those principles in economics and social justice for which our group stands. I would not otherwise take up the time of this house.

Tonight I am speaking on the motion of non-confidence moved by the leader of this party. There can be no doubt in any member's mind where the C.C.F. party stands. We stand for a planned economy. We feel that after five sessions of this twentieth parliament the government has failed to provide for the people of Canada those economic advantages which could have been provided. We have therefore moved a motion of non-confidence in this government.

I have listened attentively to the speeches made by the new leader of the Progressive Conservative party because I felt he might spark-plug that party. I also wanted to find out what sort of leadership he would give that party. My conviction is, sir, and the history of the world proves, that economic conditions throughout the world will bring forth the leadership necessary for the particular time. This was proven to be true when Hitler came to power in Germany to save the large industrial leaders and the vested interests of that country. The same thing happened in Italy. Whether or not I am correct in saying so, I feel that the vested interests of this country can do no better than to choose the leader of the official opposition for their spokesman in this House of Commons. I view with a great deal of concern some of the speeches he has made in this house because, as we all know, history shows that the democratic forms of government have been circumvented and replaced by other forms of government. As a democratic people, we do not want to see that happen in Canada.

In view of that, I was somewhat disturbed about the type of leadership the new leader of the opposition was going to give.

Mr. Graydon: They are disturbed over there, too.

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): I quite admit that a member of the C.C.F. group would be somewhat prejudiced in his point of view on this question. In the Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, February 23, I noticed an article which I believe should be put on the record. It may or may not be correct, sir, but it reads as follows:

Back to Section 98?

In the light of Mr. George Drew's demand for revival of section 98 of the Criminal Code—a clause thoroughly discredited and discarded with the approval of all parties—it can be readily understood why the word "Tory" is increasingly being used to describe the Progressive Conservative party under his leadership. Mr. Drew is apparently determined to search out every reactionary principle and prejudice and exploit them to the limit, if by so doing he can arouse mass fear and hate and thus ride into office.

Section 98 is a relic of those hysterical times when a Tory government sent a detachment of tanks, troops and armoured cars into a western Ontario city to "maintain order" during an industrial strike. It is true that Tim Buck was jailed under that section, as Mr. Drew states. It is equally true that the communist leader was almost killed in his penitentiary cell by shots from outside the building fired by guards during a prison riot in which Buck had no part. The great body of Canadians have been under the impression that those evil days were gone for ever from this dominion.

That comfortable opinion will no longer hold good if Mr. Drew and his co-partner Mr. Duplessis have their way. For the ostensible purpose of eradicating communism they would enact oppressive laws, wide enough to be invoked against all persons and groups of whose activities they do not approve. The careers of Stalin, Tito and other successful communist government heads prove that the mere jailing of communist leaders is not sufficient to defeat communism. But such a course not only commends itself to dictator mentalities; it serves to distract attention from the unwillingness of some politicians to accept the social and economic reforms which are the real bulwarks against communism.

The Criminal Code outlaws all who conspire against the safety of the state and provides suitable penalties. There is no need for section 98 which can be used against labour, even against political opponents, by whatever government happens to be in power. Because of a few economic controls and their enforcement, Mr. Drew calls Canada a "snooper state". Yet he would not hesitate to fasten upon this country the many aspects of a police state inherent in section 98, a provision which unduly limited freedom of speech, freedom of organization and freedom of association—rights that must be jealously preserved unless Canada is to become a hunting ground of oppression for possible reactionary governments of the future. Canadians should be on guard lest, in the guise of protecting them against communism, some of their most cherished liberties are snatched away in the stampede of fear which Mr. Drew and Mr. Duplessis are attempting to incite.

I am disturbed, Mr. Speaker, at that sort of thing being said in this house. We in this group feel that if we are to have the growth of communism in this country it will be because we do not plan in Canada for the security of our people and the full employment of our workers. I do not think, therefore, it was quite proper for the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) to make that type of attack when, as I understand, he cited the city of Toronto, where he was as premier of Ontario, as an illustration of the growth of communism in this country. With him I, and I think all hon. members of this house, feel that there is some fear of communism, and we will do everything we can to stop it. Rather than revert to a thing like section 98, we say that it is only by properly planning the economy of the country that we can stop communism dead in its tracks and prevent its growth in this country.

I want to document what I say tonight because I think that democracy today is on test as never before. We are blessed who live in this country where we have abundance, where we have the possibility of producing as perhaps no other country in the world can. If we fail to give our people full health security and job security—both to our workers and to our farmers—then I am sure that we too will be thrown out of power and that the democratic principles and the freedoms which we now enjoy will go by the board as they have in some other countries.

Here is the record, Mr. Speaker. On the one hand, during the war and since, unprecedented profits have been made by big interests and vested monopolies in this country. Their profits rose right through the war until in 1948 they showed the highest profits in the history of Canada. Not only since the war, but even in the depression, it would seem that big business in this country has always had its mouth at the cream spout of the economic separator while the farmers and workers have taken the skim milk. In this very debate, hon. members have risen and tried to contradict the statements which we have put on record with regard to profits made by corporations. Here in my hand I have a chart illustrating the profits of Canadian corporations for the four years, 1939, 1944, 1946 and partly for 1947. In 1939 corporate profits before taxes were $598 million; in 1944, $1,221 million; in 1946, $1,421 million; and in 1947, $1,821 million.

I want to point out that often, when profits are being shown, a true picture is not given, because the undistributed profits are not always quoted. In this case corporate profits, after taxes standing at $618 million in 1944, rose to $1,017 million in 1947. In addition to that, the undistributed corporate profits amounted to $199 million in 1939 and to $609 million in 1947. From these figures can be seen a true picture of the corporate profits of this country.

I have here statistics for the 1945 taxation year, taken from January 1 to December 31, and showing the profits of 31,807 corporations as recorded by the Department of National Revenue, amounting to $1,212,150,000. In the same year the total of salaries, wages and supplemental labour income was only $4,865 million. Often in this house hon. members give as the reason for the high cost of living the increase in the wages of our people. In this case we find that, for every $4 paid out in wages and salaries in 1945, $1 was paid out in profits to these companies. This information in the first instance is taken from Taxation Statistics, 1947, page 24; and in the second instance, from National Accounts, Income and Expenditure, 1938-1946.

While we should of course pay particular attention to our own economics and our own difficulties, I want to point out that in the United States we have a parallel of what is taking place in Canada. According to Farm Research, U.S.A., we find that there too the farmers are being told that they are to blame for the rise in prices. But here are the facts according to government official figures. The report shows the increase of profits, wages and farm income in 1942 as compared with 1939. They are as follows: net corporation profits, 281 per cent; cash farm income, 85 per cent; wages, 37 per cent. There we find that profits are being made in the United States along with the tremendous profits being made in Canada. I need not quote more figures to prove to this house that we have seen a steady rise in profits to large companies in this country. I believe the Liberal government of this country is before the bar of public opinion.

I should now like to document the contrast to show what is being done to our people. In 1947 we had a national income of $11,887 million. If we could distribute that income among our people in the country it would give to each individual $1,162. That is what they would have received in 1947. In other words, it would have provided $5,810 to the average famliy. If we planned in this country we could certainly underwrite health security and the abolition of poverty so that we would not have the conditions which exist today. When we balance these huge profits on the one hand with what the government is doing for our people on the other, I think hon. members will admit that the government has failed. It has failed under the pressure of the Progressive Conservatives to my right, because they were the loudest in their hue and cry for taking off controls in this country. Whom did it benefit? It benefited only those people who are charging high prices for the things which they produce. We saw the long line of procedure followed by the government in taking off controls. First they took the controls off the price of raw steel and permitted it to go up $5 an ingot ton; then they allowed a 12½ per cent increase on farm machinery; then they took off the subsidy on milk. And that procedure has been followed all down the line.

Between 1946 and 1947 the government found money for other things. We in this group have advocated that the old age pensioners be given a proper supplement so that they could maintain a decent standard of living.

Mr. Fraser: All other groups have advocated that.

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): The government failed to do that. In 1946 and 1947 we had first a subsidy to Dosco of $7,200,000.

Mr. Ferguson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): If it is reasonable and sensible.

Mr. Ferguson: It is reasonable, but I do not believe the hon. member will answer it. Does the hon. member's province believe in increasing old age pensions? It has a C.C.F. government.

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): It certainly does.

Mr. Ferguson: Why have they not done it?

Mr. Bentley: They have done it. Do you know nothing at all?

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): If the hon. member would come out of the bush he would be able to find out that we have already done that. We are the only province which has initiated that sort of thing. What I am saying is that we have to do it on a national scale. We are looking after our old age pensioners in Saskatchewan. Every one of our 28,000 blind and old age pensioners are today receiving free, full health care, glasses, hospitalization and medical care.

May I return to what I was saying, Mr. Speaker. Last night we had a long speech from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I listened to every word he said. I want to say to him that last year a lot of talk was heard about the $30 million given in the way of help to our thirteen million people throughout Canada. It is a drop in the bucket when you consider the revenue of the federal government. Here are two steel companies, Dosco and Algoma, which received $7,200,000 in one instance and $1,600,000 in the other. In these two instances they received an amount equal to one-quarter of what was provided last year for national health care for our people. I think it is a shame that this government cannot provide more for our people. Every day letters come to our office asking that something be done for our incurables. I am sure that all hon. members receive these letters. We also receive letters about giving more to our old age pensioners. I just want to show the house the kind of thing that everybody reads these days. Our people are not protected. I hold in my hand a letter which the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones) gave me and said I could use in the house. This is from an old age pensioner in his own riding. He gives a list of the foods which they were able to buy in 1942 and the amount of food and the price which they paid for it in 1948. When he comes down to some of the staple foods such as bacon, meat and some of the other foods, he finds that he is not able to eat them at all. I have another letter here which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of February 10, 1949. This is from an old age pensioner in the city of Winnipeg, Manitoba. He indicates what he can eat today in the way of daily food. It is as follows: for breakfast, nothing; for dinner, one egg sandwich, 15 cents, toast and coffee, 12 cents; for supper, two sandwiches, 30 cents, coffee 7 cents, the day's total, 64 cents. The article goes on to say:

> That leaves Mr. Martin nothing for clothing, medicine, smoking, laundry or small incidentals. Haircuts, at 65 cents apiece, come once every six months for Mr. Martin.
> "Somebody took my drinking water glass. A new one at the fifteen-cent store cost me 8 cents."
> As Mr. Martin told about the 8-cent purchase and his need for a suit of winter underwear, the pain in his water blue eyes showed he wasn't soliciting sympathy.

These are conditions which these people are facing. I want to impress on hon. members that the government is not doing anything. If we call this democracy, it is not good enough. We have to do better. On the one hand we read of things that are reminiscent of the thirties. Here is an article from Woodland World, a publication in Montreal. Mr. O. A. Buck, past president of the loggers' association, had this to say in the course of a speech:

> Lumber always has been and still is in demand. The present problem was to find markets.

It is the same old story. I hold in my hand one of the papers published in this city, the Evening Citizen of Monday, February 7. It contains a picture entitled "Home sweet Home", and the following:

> Mrs. Clair C. Bilow stands outside old OER bus No. 14.

Alongside the picture we find the following: "Treasury surplus is huge". The Minister of National Revenue said in the report that we have a $750 million surplus. All I can say to that is that it is a negation of justice and democracy. I hold in my hand another clipping taken from the Citizen which says: "Farmhouse fire fatal to three." Another one is contained in the Globe and Mail of Toronto of Saturday, February 19, which states: "Three children die in fire, Woodstock mother, 19, held back from shack." There is not a constituency or town in this country that does not need new houses. Because of the government policy of taking off controls we find that our old age pensioners and home-owners have suffered. We find that the farmers have suffered. We find that the veterans have suffered. The people whom we meet on the train or during the course of our business and everyday life are asking: You have done this for big business; what are you doing for us? Those are the hard facts.

We find that, since controls were taken off, the index of farm living costs has gone up 38 per cent. The general cost of living index has gone up 33 per cent and the general index of wholesale prices by 54 per cent. It is quite clear that the farmer has not been getting his full share. The wholesale price index of farm products has gone up 27 per cent as compared with an increase of 54 per cent in the general wholesale price index. In other words, general wholesale prices have risen twice as much as wholesale farm prices.

I think this is a good time to interject the remark that the net profits of 665 of the largest Canadian corporations, after taxes, increased 64 per cent between 1945 and 1947. Those figures were obtained from the statistical summary for 1948 of the Bank of Canada, page 192. We find that during that period the cash income from the sale of farm products was up only 17 per cent, compared with an increase of 47 per cent in the profits of the largest food companies.

In order to show that these increases were not due to wages it might be noted that weekly wages and salaries in the iron and steel industry increased only nine per cent during that period while profits were up 66 per cent. Wages in the pulp and paper industry were up 23 per cent while profits increased 247 per cent.

Mr. Case: How much have wages increased at the box factory in Prince Albert?

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): The records show that when we took over the box factory in Saskatchewan the employees were getting 11 cents per hour. Today they are some of the best paid workers in the province.

An hon. Member: You are not running it now.

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): We are running it and we are making a profit for the people of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Ferguson: How about the shoe factory?

Mr. Matthews (Kootenay East): Does the hon. member want to buy a pair of shoes? That is a good place to get them.

An hon. Member: They do not make them that big.

Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia): It is quite easy to see who are ready to fight for the interests of big business. I want to say that we in this group are going to fight the black shirts, the white shirts and the stuffed shirts. I have tried to make a simple plea for the common people, particularly for those people who are inarticulate, who have no chance to come to this House of Commons to fight for themselves.

Take the old age pensioners, for instance. After a lot of prodding by hon. members in this house, particularly members of this group, the federal government finally boosted the old age pension by $5 per month, but in terms of real purchasing power today it stands at only $22.50. Surely it is not asking too much to ask this government to do something about that in the immediate future. On February 16 a return was tabled in answer to a question asked by myself as follows:

> What is the estimated cost to the dominion treasury for an old age pension plan of $50 per month at 65 years of age; (a) with a means test; (b) without a means test?

The reply to the first question was that the dominion government's share, which on the present basis would be 75 per cent, would amount to $174,400,000. Surely it is not asking too much to ask that a plan such as that be instituted, especially when we find that this year there will be a surplus of $750 million. I plead with the government to institute such a program, not only for our aged people but along general lines.

We in the C.C.F. recognize that you cannot plan for one phase of our economy without planning for it all. You cannot protect the farmer if you are not going to protect the worker. That is why we are trying to fight for those people. Hon. members to my right indicate in almost every speech they make that they are ready to protect big business. This reminds me of the story of the elephant who danced around in the chicken-coop and thought it was wonderful. It really was fine for the elephant, but it was tough on the chickens. The same thing applies to our people.

I am not going to take up much more time, but I did think that the problems we are facing today are bigger than political issues or political parties. If you asked any hon. member of this house I think he would say that Canada is a land worth fighting for, a land worth going all-out for. It is recognized that war may come at any time and it behooves us in this house to think seriously about these things. We must override political differences in order to plan in such a way that real democracy will work. If the bickerings and foolishness go on I am sure that, while we are fighting, communism will come in through the back door. You are not going to stop it unless you can offer a better ideology than the communists offer.

This is not the time to fool; we should be as serious as possible. We should plan our economy so that we could underwrite job security. By job security I mean that there would be actually more jobs than we have workers. That is what I consider to be full employment. The dominion government should take control of those industries which would be necessary to provide that full employment.

The government should take over those industries which manufacture armaments and which carry on preparations for war. I refer to the large steel corporations and other corporations that can make profits out of war or even out of the fear of war. Those corporations should be owned and controlled by the people. But that is not the picture that has developed since 1945. We in this group have fought against the policy of turning back to private industry those crown corporations which were built up with the money of the taxpayers. I need to name only a few.

There was the Consolidated Smelting plant at Calgary which cost the Canadian taxpayers $18 million and which was handed back for 25 cents on the dollar. There was the Research Enterprise building No. 14 which was turned back to the Corning Glass Company, a company which was indicted in the United States. Here we have the picture of the government once again permitting the entrenchment of big business and vested interests so that they can lead us down the path to another war.

The government has set up the Combines Investigation Act, now under the administration of Mr. McGregor, in order to stop the growth of monopoly in this country. It was recognized by every one that there was a danger from cartelization and monopolies in this country. I have here four publications arising from the work of Mr. McGregor and his associates. In 1945 he published a report entitled "Canada and International Cartels". I want to read one or two of the recommendations of the commissioner. There are some ten recommendations in all. Mr. McGregor has this to say in paragraph No. 2 of his recommendations and conclusions:

> Those examples illustrate the power of cartels to eliminate competition and to control production and distribution in wide areas of trade. The allocation of markets through restrictive arrangements made by private interested parties impinges on government authority over foreign trade and may nullify national trade policies developed to serve wider public interests. Government policies to encourage either imports or exports may prove ineffective if private barriers to such trade are erected by cartels. The reservation of the domestic market to particular producers may be as effective as a prohibitory tariff in barring imports. The allocation of import or export quotas by cartel agreement subjects foreign trade to quantitative limitation although such control may run counter to public policy. Ways must be found to prevent private business organized as cartels from supplanting government in the establishment of such commercial policies.

In paragraph No. 4 he has this to say:

> The post-war period will require flexibility in industrial organization and operations, rather than restrictive arrangements designed to maintain the status quo. Industrial progress will be assisted by government policies directed to the elimination of restrictions on trade and by positive measures to promote expansion of trade and thus prevent the development of demoralized markets.

Today our farmers are facing a decline in their markets. I have a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen of today in which Sir Stafford Cripps intimates that his government will have to cut down on the bacon and eggs imported from Canada. We find that in the United States also the agricultural market is slipping. I think it behooves us to plan for an international agreement, and to break cartelization in the industrial field so that we may have a free exchange of trade.

I advocate among other things, Mr. Speaker, that the government plan a national marketing act for our farmers, and secondly that they institute long-term agreements with other countries on the block trading barter basis if currency difficulties are in the way so that we may have the free flow of Canadian food products to the hungry countries abroad, and in exchange bring back the things which we need in Canada.

I think we have to do something for our veterans. We either have to roll back prices or we have to increase their allowances so that they can rehabilitate themselves. Of the 90,000 student veterans, about 42,000 have either finished university, or through financial difficulties have had to leave university. There are many black spots that have to be cleared away. I am very sorry that the government has failed to remove them, because if we go down we all go down together. Those of us in our little orbit of mankind must gird ourselves and be strong. In the words of the poet:

> We are not here to play, to dream, to drift;
> We have hard work to do and loads to lift.
> Fear not the struggle, 'tis God's gift.
> Be strong.

Mr. Patrick H. Ashby (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, as I was walking down to the chamber this evening an hon. member reminded me that I have spoken on hogs, I have also spoken on sheep, and in fact I have even mentioned turkeys. "But," he said to me, "why not mention horses?" It is a very simple matter for me to mention any kind of living thing because I have not spent my life with artificial things such as pens, pencils, paper and figures. I have been working during the past twenty-five or thirty years with germ cells, with chromosomes and determiners, with living things, with life itself. I have never worked for God, as some of these false preachers claim they are, but I have worked along with God. In fact, I have hobnobbed with Him for some time, figuratively speaking, of course. I said to God one day: "Do you mind my taking your place for a while?" "No, no", He said, "go ahead; you will learn a few things." So I climbed upon a mound, the usual one outside the barn door, and when my feet began to get warm I said, "let there be life", and lo and behold there was life. I could say, "there shall be no life", and there was none; for I determined which animals should mate. I determined whether an animal should breed or whether it should not reproduce itself. I determined whether it should live, whether it should die, or whether it should be enslaved.

When a human being begins to take the place of God upon earth that human being has got to be God Himself. I shall illustrate what I mean. Unfortunately I have to get up early in the morning, and one morning I was waiting for the bus about six o'clock. Shortly after six o'clock, the early morning bus passes the street where I live. It is necessary that I come down here early in the morning because some short-sighted, long-legged, broad-bottomed, narrow-minded bureaucrat neglected to supply members of parliament, the representatives of the people, with sufficient office space. The early morning is the only time I can efficiently do my work undisturbed. We are crowded together in a small room, so crowded that if I lean back in my chair I strike the back of the chair occupied by the other member. It is the most disgraceful condition that exists in this parliament today. I have seen these bureaucrats, with their private secretaries, occupying sumptuous offices. Have I a private secretary? No, I have not. I have done all my own secretarial work, including typing, for the past two and a half years.

I was standing there waiting for the bus. Daylight was just dawning, and thinking of home, my sweetheart—who is my wife—and my children, I heard a slight rustling beside me. I looked down and it was an old tomcat wearily wending his way home. It stopped as it got halfway across the sidewalk, looked up at me, and I will swear it winked at me. It then crossed the road very slowly and disappeared among the garbage cans on its way home, where it would be mauled by the kids. Two slaves were the next form of life that came along. I looked at the face of the first one and found it entirely lacking in expression. I looked at the face of the second one and found it had no expression either. The first was pulling a wagon; the second was on the seat, holding the reins and driving the first. As I said before, I have dealt with life, with living things, and I recognize expressions on animal faces that would not be recognized by those not accustomed to looking for them. If one wants to know what sort of master a slave has, look at the faces of the animals under his control. I have made these tests, and I would like hon. members to make similar tests in any town or city of any Christian country on the face of this earth. You will find that the expression on the faces of young people is hopeful. When they reach the age of eighteen or twenty that expression of hope begins to disappear, and by the time they are forty or forty-five you will not find more than one out of every fifteen people on the streets who smile. The reason is that Christians are being enslaved today.

Unfortunately my time is going very rapidly; if someone would only plug the hands of that clock I would be able to deal with these matters more fully, because they are very important. There is such a thing as what I call natural wisdom. Let me put it this way. The result of God's work is perfection. Did God make living things without endowing them with wisdom? Of course not. When we look at horses we think they are dumb brutes. I remember my neighbour, a poor elderly woman, coming to our house with both eyes blackened, her nose broken and her teeth knocked out. I did not ask what her husband had done to her because I knew he had died some time before and that could not be his fault; but I asked, what in the world had happened to her. She told me that she was looking out the kitchen window while washing the dishes, and saw poor old Nellie, the old mare, standing by the well waiting for a drink. So she dried her hands on her apron and ran out to give the horse a drink of water. No sooner did she get near the animal than it turned and kicked her squarely in the face. Many people would say that horse was vicious, but the fact is that the horse was not to blame because the natural wisdom with which it had been endowed originally had been distorted and rendered dormant, shall we say, by restricting its freedom. It was a slave. When you have an animal like that the only solution is to give it freedom. Crime is a result of slavery.

Now let me give you an illustration of what I mean by natural wisdom. If any hon. member of this house would volunteer for an experiment I will guarantee he would not be able to equal the humble horse when it comes to natural wisdom, for the human mind has been distorted. Take any volunteer, blindfold him and take him a given distance away, in a direction and to an area of which he has no knowledge whatever. He does not know where he is going, nor how far. Then take the blindfold off, if you like; put him in a box car; close the doors; transport him in any direction, north, south, east or west, for a given length of time. He does not know how long he has been traveling, nor at what speed nor in what direction. Take him out of the box car and in another direction for a predetermined distance. Then after a couple of years, without contact with other human beings who might give him instructions, tell him to walk directly to the point from which he started. I do not think a human being alive today could possibly do that; yet I can show you horses that have done it, some of them travelling a distance of up to sixty-five miles, covering an area over which they had never traveled before. That is what I call natural wisdom.

Our troubles today, Mr. Speaker, are due to the fact that the natural wisdom with which we were endowed by God is being interfered with by human beings who deal in false ideas. When our children go to school, to college and university, if they remain there long enough they will be rendered incapable of thinking correctly and sanely. What we call universities are really nothing but elaborate barber schools or training factories, where our youths no longer receive an education but are trained for various professions, and the false and artificial instruction they receive renders the individual incapable of thinking naturally and sanely. Let me give you an illustration of what I mean. I have in my hand a copy of Industry, the official organ of the Canadian Manufacturers Association. I think I know the man who has been writing these articles; I believe I have been in touch with him, and if he keeps it up, one of these days I am going to name that individual because the day is rapidly approaching when we shall have to identify ourselves, just as we do in this parliament. When a vote is called and the bell rings we stand and identify ourselves for or against whatever it may be. I shall have to read this. It is only three or four short paragraphs, and I will hurry through it. The title is, "Money on Trees" and it reads:

Windfalls do occur. As a matter of fact, it's not so long ago that a gentleman in an Ontario industrial centre received the pleasant news that he had won the tidy sum of $34,000 simply because he held a sweepstakes ticket on the winner of the Manchester handicap.

All that happened there, of course, was that one man gained what other men lost.

But the best brains of this and any age still persist that there is no substitute for hard work—

I guarantee that this man has avoided hard work. If he believed in it he would be working on a farm or in a mine or factory; he would be doing hard work. The fact is that he has learned a way of avoiding hard work.

—in the task of getting on in the world, while practically every father has at some time or another come up with the none too original pronouncement to his children that money doesn't grow on trees.

[Mr. Ashby.]

Unfortunately, there is more than a fair share of the globe's population suffering from the delusion that money does grow on trees.

I want all members to pay particular attention to this part because it is very important.

Witness the state of Oregon, which held an autumn referendum on a scheme to pay a pension of $50 a month to all men of 65 and over and the same amount to all women of 60 and over, even without the "means" test. The Oregonians not only approved the plan with a whacking majority, but on the same ballot plumped for higher income tax exemptions.

The people of Oregon were perfectly right. If the people of Oregon would discharge from office every individual who opposes this demand, I would give these individuals thirty days to do it and, if they did not, I would kick out the whole lot of them. It is possible to give this money to the people, as I will show you within the next few minutes.

This man says further:

Came the dawn and a study of practical details.

This man is deliberately lying when he talks about the practical details, for these are impractical, artificial details. This man's mind is polluted, as I will show you before I am through.

Somebody with a flair for mathematics—

That makes me think that if we could take these bureaucrats with a flair for mathematics and place them in an institution where they would be provided with an abundance of paper and pencils, as well as boys who would sharpen pencils for them, they could do all their estimating and planning there. When these plans and estimates were finished, they could be rushed into the next room where another group could tear them apart. This process could be continued until they all died and the world would be far better off. We do not need them.

Somebody with a flair for mathematics discovered to his and the state government's horror, that in 1949 there would be more than 175,000 male and female Oregonians eligible for the pension and that the cost to the state would be in excess of $100 million a year.

That also is a lie because it would not cost the state of Oregon one dollar. Think of that for just a moment. I know there is laughter, but I hope before the hon. members who are here die they will recognize the truth of that statement. The greatest mind in the world today is that possessed by a man now living whose name is Major C. H. Douglas. This man has given us a law which I shall quote to you so it will be on the record. "The true cost of production is the consumption of all production over a given period of time." This law should be written in capital letters and people should read it until they memorize it.

I remember standing in this house some two or three years ago, when I said the cost of this chair was the chair. I am hesitating so my words will be fully appreciated. The price may have been $50 or $100, but the cost is this chair. True, it is not all of the cost, but most of the cost. The cost of production is what is consumed, as well as what is lost, of course, in the form of sawdust. Instead of a tree we have the chair. We still have the chair; it has not been consumed. If we burn the chair, then it is consumed and we have exchanged being able to sit down in the chair for the heat obtained from it. The cost of production is what is consumed.

If you go outside of this building and ask anyone you meet what he thinks this building cost, you will be told it must have cost hundreds of millions of dollars. What is a dollar? I asked this question last year and I received some of the most stupid, imbecile answers it is possible for the human mind to conceive. I received these answers from the official bureaucrats who are employed with the money of which we are robbing the people. I will read one of these answers to you. I asked these questions: Who owns this paper money? Who owns this metal money? Who owns the true dollars created by the banks? In my hand I hold the official answer I received to those questions, and I will read it to you:

> This money is owned by the particular individuals, firms and corporations which have it in their possession.

Oh, rubbish! Let us see if this is true. Last year I copied from the Ottawa Journal of December 18, I think it was, something one of the magistrates had to say. Many of these magistrates and judges are almost as imbecile as these stupid bureaucrats. I am going to begin to mention names. This man is named Strike. Had I been there, I would have said, "Strike, you're out". Yes, sir, he missed the ball. According to the newspaper, this is what he said when sentencing some men:

> One finds it a little difficult to understand how men like the two accused would commit such an offence.

These men were trying to avoid paying income taxes. Perhaps I had better read this article first and leave my remarks until later. The more one studies the works of Major Douglas, the more easily one can pick up any statement made by any Christian and find that his mind has been distorted; he cannot reason properly. In fact, I have found it difficult to do so myself. It is a tremendous relief for me to be able to recognize at least some truths today. Some years ago, I was just as dumb as anyone, for I also came under the influence of these false teachers.

Magistrate Strike goes on to say:

> It would appear that you have a good reputation in the community, that you were good employers and that you were considered to be reasonably good citizens.

My thought at that point is, why not leave them alone then? I shall continue to read the statement.

> It is difficult to understand how you would stoop to commit such an offence as this. If it had not been for this tax investigation, you and your company would have had in your possession (money) the property of the treasury of Canada.

Let me illustrate, in this way, what the magistrate said. I am on my farm and someone comes to ask me for a dozen eggs. I say: "Those eggs do not belong to me, they belong to the hen-house", or the sheep belong to the sheep-shed or the cattle belong to the barn; all of this belongs to the farm, not to me. No one but an individual can own anything. These buildings own nothing. The only way that anything can possibly be owned is by individuals. In this case those in control of the treasury department are the ones that own the money. In other words, this man was a slave.

What is a slave? A slave is a person who has no property of his own and who is forced to toil for those who are his masters. What then is a free man? A free man is one who owns property which no man may take from him without his full will and consent. What right have these tax collectors to enter any home in this country or to take one single cent from any individual? They have no right, and they could never do it except by deceit and fraud. Instead of going as individuals and holding a revolver at the heads of citizens and demanding their money, they wave an order in council sneaked around parliament and say: this is the law; you are forced to hand over your hard-earned money.

Let me tell hon. members this. Merely because an individual is paid by the officials of a department to rob and plunder, and to commit these crimes, is no excuse, and will be no excuse in the hereafter. May I point out that each individual will, and should be, held responsible for his own actions. Yet these bureaucrats will tell you that it is the institution that is to blame, that it is the farm that is to blame, that it is the barns that are to blame. It is this, that and the other thing that is to blame; it is never "we are to blame." There is a key that will unlock the doors to freedom, security and peace on this earth, and this key we might call individual or personal responsibility, where each individual is held responsible for his own actions, which he cannot shirk and place upon any institution.

I have read about half of the quotation. I must get back to this Money on Trees—I forgot all about it—and finish this last paragraph. I had reached the point where these figure experts estimated that the cost would be $100 million a year. This man continues:

This astronomical figure turned out to be three times the state's budget for all purposes. Not only had the get-rich-quick voters ignored the fact that such a sum could not materialize except through ruinous taxes,—

Which is another lie, for taxes are not the only method of obtaining revenue.

—but they have voted for a tax reduction. All in all, the Oregon legislature is in a pretty fair pickle.

That is what he says. I would straighten him out. Let them hire me and give me the authority, and I will see that the Oregonians get their $50 a month. In fact, if the members of this house want our people to live decently, let them put me in charge and give me the authority. That is all I need. I will guarantee that every human being in Canada sixty years of age and over will obtain $50 a month, and I will do it without taxation. In fact, I will gradually abolish taxation altogether for revenue purposes as I will show before I am through.

I want to point out that the writer of this article was trained by these institutions of training to think in terms of what we call money economics—which is an unreal, artificial economics—instead of real, physical economics. This man does not estimate the amount of food, clothing or other essential needs of the people and then determine if we can supply these requirements.

Mr. Blackmore: In Oregon.

Mr. Ashby: In the state of Oregon, in Canada, or anywhere you like. He merely deals in artificial things, not in realities. In Industry for February, which I received in the mail today, I find a similar article. But this one is not nearly as bad. Since I have been in contact with them, they are cutting down a little bit. They are getting wise, because I challenge them. Two thousand years ago Christ said, seek ye the truth. He did not say, get Pat Ashby to seek it for you.

I will hurry through this latter portion although it is important. It will be noticed by all that our greatest industrialists—in fact, our greatest citizens, our real citizens—have grown up with an industry. I refer to Edison, Henry Ford and men of that type—great industrialists, inventors and so forth. They have all started on a farm or somewhere in a small village, and have gone to a small school of not more than twenty-five to thirty pupils. Some of us praise Henry Ford as a great industrialist, and others praise other great men. But really behind those men were good mothers, in the first place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ashby: It is all right to laugh. But I know from experience. I cannot help saying this, because I have such a wonderful wife myself. It does not matter what happens to your children, we men always say to them: you had better go to mother; mother knows best. I mention that for this reason. There perhaps lies the solution to the future problems of this country. But I must hustle along. I am constantly watching that clock. I think I shall have to let this go. It will take too much time. I will just quote rapidly:

The teaching of economics—

What kind of economics? Those unreal, artificial economics or real economics?

—and related subjects in American schools—

And Canadian schools are included.

—and especially in colleges and universities—has a profound influence on the economic life of the nation.

That is true. Our manufacturers are therefore trying to get young men who intend to study economics to work in a factory, to start at the bottom and grow up in it and use real things in order to obtain a contact with realities instead of specializing in all this artificial stuff.

Now I should like to illustrate hurriedly the work of some of these bureaucrats, the uselessness and stupidity of some of these poor imbeciles, because I cannot think of any other name to call them. Hon. members know that in the fall of the year for generations it has been customary for the farmer to butcher a hog or two for himself. A few days before he is ready to butcher the hog, he will gather up his equipment, consisting of a barrel or tank to hold the hot water, his implement to scrape the hair off the hog, basins, pails and all the rest of it. But when they go to get the knives from the kitchen the wife will say sometimes, "I wish you would use something else instead of my good knives". Therefore private enterprise, free enterprise as we call it, provides for everything. It does not matter what it may be. Take traveling equipment, for instance. I bought some beautiful bags for my wife—I mean traveling bags. They were really sturdy suitcases which were made by Cecil Sprigings and Company Limited. The price of these suitcases was between $60 and $70. I discovered that if this firm were free of all these taxes imposed on them and these controls were removed, they could put these suitcases on the market actually better than they are—I could not see how they could become any better—for half that price, or somewhere around $28. Individuals engaged in private enterprise say, "We will provide you with tools for every purpose, even to scrape the hair off the hogs. They manufacture a cheap little instrument. It has merely a wooden handle and a small metal disc on it; that is all. The price is only a few cents. Free enterprise, being what it is, plans months ahead. In July this particular storekeeper sent away and ordered five or six dozen cheap hog scrapers in order to accommodate his customers. I called at the store because one of my boys said, "When you are in town, dad, get a hog scraper; ours is lost. We want to butcher a hog". So I called in at the store and the gentleman came to me immediately and politely asked me what he could do for me. He asked me if he could serve me. I said: "I would like a hog scraper". Anyone would have thought that I had hit him square in the face. "Hog scraper!" he yelled at me, and he turned red in the face. "Don't talk to me about hog scrapers". I said: "I am Pat Ashby, a highfalutin' member of parliament; don't shout at me like that". He said: "You, a member of parliament, allowing these bureaucrats to carry on in this way. Look at this", he said, and he thrust into my hand a whole bundle of papers—and I hold them in my hand now. He ordered those hog scrapers in July but on August 25 he received a letter from these bureaucrats. He had written to them decently, for he said: "Dear Sir", and signed his name: "Yours truly", and so on. But these bureaucrats, these dictatorial scoundrels! I would soon put them all where they belong. If the people of Canada receive from any government department officials letters of any kind not signed "your obedient servant", they should return the letters without postage to the place from which they came. If enough people will do that these officials will learn who is the authority here in Canada and they will sign these letters as they should. What did this man say? He said: "Gentlemen!"

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will give me a few more minutes because I have had to wait so many times until the laughter has subsided before I could continue. The letter goes on:

> This will acknowledge your application dated August 17 to import the following equipment.

The man lists them under three columns as follows: one, "supplier, Edmonton Butchers' and Packers' Supplies." That is a wholesale and retail store on Jasper avenue, Edmonton. But why tell him that? He knows that because he sent for them. In the second column appears the following: "six dozen hog scrapers"—the store keeper knew what he ordered—and under column three, "end users", those who scrape the hair off hogs. Can you imagine that? The letter continues:

> It is noted that the end users are stated to be butchers . . . No letter of essentiality from the end users has been furnished, as required as per instructions on the reverse side of the application under paragraph three.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Ashby: Not yet, sir. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: Ten thirty.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has not unanimous consent.

On motion of Mr. Ashby the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the acting leader of the government what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall continue this debate.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on February 22, 1949.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 25, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT

PUBLIC WORKS—REFERENCE TO ANSWER TO QUESTION ON FEBRUARY 23

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. On Wednesday last, answers were tabled to a question I had asked about unemployment and public works. Part 3 of the question—it is reported at page 818 of Hansard—was as follows:

What is the estimated number of workers who could be employed on such projects within (a) one month; (b) six months; (c) one year?

The minister gave the estimated number who could be employed at the site itself as 17,000 skilled and unskilled workers in six months, and only 5,000 in one year. Since the second figure is so much smaller than the first, I should like to ask the minister if it was a typographical error, or if the government's program actually calls for fewer jobs in one year than in six months, which I cannot believe.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The figures in part 3(a) of the answer were compiled for statistical purposes on the basis that all contracts would be let at the same time, but in actual practice it is expected that they will be staggered or spaced as the economy requires.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has been out of the chamber; I thought he was returning to his seat, and I wanted to ask a supplementary question. I shall put the question now, in any event. I have totalled the figures given in answer to my question about unemployment, and I get this result: skilled workers, 14,500; unskilled, 10,000; off-the-site, 15,700, totalling 40,200. This figure seems to be wrong, having in mind the statement attributed to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) at Vancouver. The minister is reported to have said there were 50,000 unemployed in the Vancouver area alone.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There is something wrong with the answer.

PASSPORTS

QUESTION AS TO RENEWALS BY ISSUE OF NEW PASSPORTS AFTER JANUARY 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): On February 11, as reported at page 470 of Hansard, I asked a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and he promised to give a further answer. Is the minister ready to do so today?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to thank the hon. member for Peterborough West for his patience in waiting for the further information which I am now in a position to give him.

The question asked on February 11 was about the renewal of the old-type Canadian passports. I can now say that instructions have been given to passport issuing officers that persons who apply for renewal of the old-type Canadian passports, issued prior to January 1, 1947, which are now in some respects inappropriate because of the inadequate description of national status, may now be issued with standard Canadian citizen passports for the renewal fee, which is $2. These new passports will expire ten years from the dates of issue of the passports they replace.

It is true that previously there had been a requirement that new passports would have to be issued to those who applied for renewals of the old ones after a certain date, and there have been several cases in which new passports were issued and paid for, in lieu of renewals. To take care of those applicants we are providing that refunds of $3, the difference between the renewal fee and the new passport fee, shall be made to them. The officers of the department are taking steps to advise persons concerned of the availability of these refunds.

It has also been arranged that persons holding the old-type passports may have them renewed without charge for short periods when this is necessary to avoid hardships which might be caused by delays incidental to issuance of new passports.

The hon. member also inquired at that time if the Department of External Affairs had issued instructions to post offices, and other places where passport applications and renewal forms are issued, that the old-type passports were not available after January 1. Written advice of the change was given to a large number of travel agencies, railway and steamship offices, banks and law firms with whom the passport officials of the department are accustomed to deal, but similar advice was not sent to post offices.

The hon. member will recall that the standing committee on external affairs recommended on July 31, 1946, placing application forms for issue and renewal of passports in all appropriate government offices, including post offices, in all centres of population of one thousand or more. Following this, arrangements were made to place such forms in staff and semi-staff post offices, which comprise some two hundred post offices. The Post Office Department agreed that clerks in these offices might furnish the forms to the public upon demand, but expressed the view that such clerks should not be required to provide information as to the completion of the forms or the regulations pertaining to the issuance of passports. For this reason, post offices were not advised of the change in our passport regulations.

FREE TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I wish to direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the statement made by the premier of Prince Edward Island in the legislature of that province the night before last, and reported in the press, that if Canada so desires she may have free trade with the United States, will the minister indicate whether there is any foundation for this statement, and whether the government is making any move in that direction?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I would not be in a position to say whether there is any foundation for it. There is no foundation known to me.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I wanted to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, but I do not see him in his seat at the moment. I notice that the premier of Prince Edward Island made an announcement a day or so ago in Charlottetown to the effect that after the next election we would have complete free trade with the United States. I wonder if the minister is prepared to make a statement on this point.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): He will have my support on it.

Mr. Church: Free trade with the United States would make a Lazarus out of the country that Laurier professed to have made a nation.

INCOME TAX

TAX YEAR TO WHICH ADDITIONAL WHEAT PAYMENTS TO BE APPLICABLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, arising out of the statement yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the effect that, out of the moneys of the farmers held by the wheat board, 20 cents a bushel will be payable on all crops harvested from 1945 to 1948, and that these payments will be made shortly. Will the farmers receiving this 20 cents a bushel have to regard the amount they receive as income for 1949, irrespective of the year in which the wheat was grown and sold to the wheat board?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The answer is yes; it will be regarded as income for the year in which the payment is made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then the government will get back most of it in taxes.

Mr. Wright: May I ask a supplementary question? In 1946, when the five-year contract was entered into, the government gave a definite undertaking that the participation certificates would be chargeable back to the year in which the crop was grown and the income was earned. Why are the interim payments not on the same basis?

Mr. McCann: In view of the varying opinions in the matter, I shall make a statement on Monday as to the exact position. The answer I gave to the member for Lake Centre represented the decision as I understood it.

Mr. Quelch: I should like to ask a question supplementary to those asked by the members for Lake Centre and Melfort. It has been the practice for the farmer to refer back his wheat board payment to the year in which the wheat was grown. Will he be permitted to continue to do that?

Mr. McCann: I shall include the answer to that question in Monday's statement.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY

INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION FOR RATE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon City): Will the Minister of Transport say whether the Bell Telephone Company has recently applied to the board of transport commissioners for permission to increase its rates?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The answer is no.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO ADDITIONAL PAYMENTS ON EASTERN SOFT WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant): In view of the statement yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the initial price paid western wheat producers will be increased to $1.75 per bushel for the entire period from August 1, 1945 to July 31, 1950, I should like to ask whether eastern farmers will receive any further payments for wheat sold between September, 1944, and June 18, 1948, during which time eastern soft wheat was handled by the wheat board.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Eastern soft wheat was never pooled. An appropriate price was set for the wheat, and full settlement has been paid to the grower for each separate crop year.

SHARE OF SMALL FLOUR MILLS IN EXPORT TRADE IN WHEAT FLOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Burton (Humboldt): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicate to the house what provision his department has made to ensure to the small flour mills a fair share of the export trade in flour?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker, has no control over the distribution of the export trade in wheat flour. Each flour mill sells its product in the domestic market or the foreign market as it sees fit. It is a matter of individual enterprise.

CANADIAN PRODUCTION

QUESTION AS TO SUPPLIES—SURPLUS, ADEQUATE AND SHORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce at an early date make a statement to the house setting forth the Canadian products that are now in surplus supply, adequate supply and short supply in Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall endeavour to do so.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

FEDERAL PUBLIC BUILDINGS—WOMEN CLEANERS —QUESTION AS TO WAGE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I want to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works with regard to a wage increase for women cleaners in federal public buildings. Is it not possible for a change to be made, in the case of these employees, from prevailing rates to a status which will make it possible for them to receive increases at the same time as other government employees, instead of always being a year or two behind?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): At the outset I may say that many hon. members have brought this question to the attention of the Minister of Public Works. The last one was the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), and not long ago it was raised by the two hon. members for Ottawa. The first question is whether consideration is being given to a wage increase for women cleaners. Last April their wages were increased to a rate of 64 cents per hour.

Mr. Knowles: In Winnipeg their rate is 50 cents per hour.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That may be; I am speaking of the rates paid in Ottawa. There is pending before the Department of Labour another application for revision. I understand the procedure is for the Department of Public Works to submit to the Department of Labour a request for the revision of these salaries, to come into effect April 1. The rate is not the same all over the country; they are paid according to the prevailing rates in their localities. Actually we have made an application to the Department of Labour for revision.

As to the second question, that is a matter of government policy which has not been considered. If it is considered and a decision reached, I shall inform the house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—DAILY RATE EMPLOYEES— QUESTION OF INCREASED RATES OF PAY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I rise on a question of privilege. May I express the hope that the announcement made to this house on March 24, 1948, concerning wage and pay increases for employees of this House of Commons, may yet be implemented in full with respect to the daily rate employees.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that this is not a question of privilege. The purpose of a question of privilege is to protect the privileges of the members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: But, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: I worded my question in that fashion because I know it is not a question to be directed to the government. I merely express the hope that Your Honour will make a statement within a few days.

VEGETABLE OILS

QUESTION AS TO REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): I am told that last week all restrictions on vegetable oils in Canada were removed by order in council. Would the Minister of Trade and Commerce care to make a statement as to why this was made necessary?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Vegetable oils were formerly under international allocation. During a period of short supply an international board fixed the allocation for each country. To carry out our obligations to the international board it was necessary to regulate the export and import of vegetable oils. About two or three weeks ago the allocation of vegetable oils was discontinued. Parliament has not given the Department of Trade and Commerce authority to regulate imports or exports, except in order to carry out an international agreement or to carry out a support price policy of this government. Since our legal authority lapsed with the discontinuance of allocation of oils and fats, we have lifted export and import regulations, as we were bound to do.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

COLLECTION OF TOLLS AT ENTRANCE TO PARK AREA —USE OF PARK HIGHWAY BY COMMERCIAL VEHICLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Matthews (Kootenay East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. In the event of the Kicking Horse pass route being chosen for the trans-Canada highway, will the collection of tolls at the east and west entrances to the park be discontinued? Will commercial vehicles be permitted to use this highway?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): I did not hear the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker. May I look at the question in Hansard and answer it later?

DIVORCE

QUESTION AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF FEDERAL COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Garfield Case (Grey North): Will the Prime Minister indicate what progress, if any, has been made towards the establishment of a national divorce court for the benefit of the one province which has none?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I would not care to go beyond saying that the government does not intend to introduce any legislation with respect to divorce.

BERLIN

QUESTION AS TO CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN AIRLIFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): About two weeks ago I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether Canada would join Great Britain, the United States and Australia in the airlift into Berlin. Has he any statement to make about it?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I remember that the hon. member did ask that question, Mr. Speaker. This question of the Berlin airlift is now before the United Nations for consideration. Efforts are being made by the security council to arrive at a solution of the problem by way of raising the blockade of Berlin. This would make the airlift unnecessary. I had hoped the results of those discussions before the security council would be available before I answered that question, so that the answer would be more illuminating. The report of the security council subcommittee to the full security council has just been completed. Pending consideration of this matter by the security council, I would prefer to postpone answering the question, if that is agreeable to the hon. member.

Mr. Church: I wanted to say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that unless Canada takes part in the airlift into Berlin the western powers will lose command of the seas.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

(Translation):

Mr. David Gourd (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate you for the faultless manner in which you have discharged your important duties during the four years of our twentieth parliament.

I am glad of this opportunity to renew my congratulations to the Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent who, after assuming the leadership of the great Liberal party, undertook to everyone's satisfaction the heavy responsibilities of governing the country as prime minister. All who are anxious to ensure the prosperity and future of this country rejoiced on seeing such great responsibilities entrusted to a man so able to assume them. Fortunately, the great majority of the people appreciate the importance of responsible leaders who wish to preserve the people's freedom while guaranteeing its economic security and stability. I join my distinguished colleagues in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. members for Essex West (Mr. Brown) and for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Demers).

At this session, the house will discuss several important matters and take decisions of far-reaching consequences.

As far as the speech from the throne is concerned, I wish to draw to the attention of the government a few points which I believe to be of the utmost importance for the constituency I represent, as well as for the country at large.

First, I was greatly pleased, Mr. Speaker, to learn of the government's intention of supplementing the present Family Allowances Act, which we owe to the cabinet of our illustrious former prime minister. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) showed once again, in putting forth that legislation, that he has a profound understanding of social justice. Since this legislation has proved effective, it should now be stripped of as many restrictions as possible. I congratulate the government on its proposal in this respect.

Obviously, estimated budget expenditures are thus increased, but can a state spend more wisely than by providing for its human heritage?

In troubled times such as ours when so many false, destructive and subversive ideas are spread throughout the world, steps should be taken to ensure that future generations will be physically, intellectually and morally sound. The best Canadians we can hope for are still those who are taught, on their mother's lap, to love Canada. For them, moral values are part and parcel of their family heritage. In planning first of all for them, we plan for the future.

It is in the newer regions especially, such as Chapleau county which I am privileged to represent, that the benefits of this Family Allowances Act are more easily observed. The families of settlers and pioneers of that district, who pride themselves on having lived in this country for three centuries, whose forebears cleared uninhabited tracts of land and who, in their turn, are now building an entirely new country, are quite deserving of some encouragement by the government in carrying out the superhuman task of pushing the frontiers of civilization beyond their present limits and of making new wealth accessible to all.

I pay tribute to those builders, to those fathers and mothers who are rearing strong and healthy children to help us face an uncertain future.

May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to again submit to this house how important it is, in my estimation, in order to co-ordinate good will and to maintain peace, that a country such as Canada be represented at the Vatican, stronghold of Christianity and a moral force so necessary at all times.

I also submit that the official recognition of a distinctive national flag would answer the wish of a great majority of Canadians. I am happy to congratulate also the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) for his excellent remarks. I join him in thanking the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) for the adoption of legislation so useful to humanity.

In a constituency as new as the one I have the honour of representing, we already have a sanatorium, and a new hospital now nearing completion. Similar facilities exist in Val d'Or, in the constituency next to mine.

To show the usefulness of this act to our people, let me give an example. A few days ago I received a letter of thanks from the chairman of the board of the Macamic sanatorium, Mr. Jacques Bouchard, acknowledging the receipt of a $256,680 grant to his institution.

Since the second hospital to which I referred has not yet been completed, I do not know what portion of the grant it will receive, but I am nevertheless convinced that it will be a fair share.

Mr. Speaker, before dealing more particularly with my constituency, I wish to suggest that measures should be taken for the relief of low-income taxpayers. I am convinced that if all incomes lower than $2,500 were exempt from taxation, the economic prosperity of this country would become more and more stabilized.

Ever since the victory of our armies, allied to those of other nations, that is to say for more than four years, we have experienced wonderful prosperity, as a result of the wise administration of our government. Once more, our national balance-sheet shows a considerable surplus. Through the competence and ability of our minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) Canada has secured a financial position which is one of the soundest in the world. I therefore suggest that the tax burden which Canadian citizens have to bear should now be lightened.

I wish to congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) for his vision and ability in building a branch line from Barraute towards Kiask falls. I must again mention the important reports prepared by Mr. Keith Ralston, C.N.R. engineer, on the natural resources of that district. I must recall too the many resolutions passed by the boards of trade and other organizations in my constituency asking that this railway line be extended over a further eleven miles, so that it may reach Cedar rapids at Kiask falls. Navigation would then be possible over a stretch of about sixty miles north of these rapids.

At the time I discussed this matter at length, on March 6, 1947, this line was only in the blueprint stage. Today it is being completed and results already apparent, particularly at Bachelor lake, are an incentive for the building of this line on the 11 mile stretch I have mentioned and, before long, for its extension to Chibougamau.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the house to a rather extraordinary fact in northern Quebec and Ontario. Our provincial highways reach the boundaries, or nearly, whilst the Ontario roads are 50 miles remote from our boundaries, a stretch that has never been built. There has been so much talk about unity that it seems unbelievable that such conditions exist and that our communication system should not be more efficient.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that it is not always easy for the dominion government to obtain the co-operation of the provincial governments. However, I urge the federal authorities to do everything in their power to open up the 50 miles of road which I have mentioned and to build a highway connecting my district with northern Ontario. Those two areas have several things in common and the relations of their citizens will consolidate their common interests, wipe out their disagreements and strengthen unity between the two provinces.

I would also suggest that the necessary steps be taken so that the trans-Canada highway may have approximately the following layout; going east from Cochrane, running somewhat parallel to the C.N.R. tracks, passing through La Reine and crossing my constituency to Mont Laurier. Such a layout would greatly reduce the distance between Montreal and Cochrane.

In plotting the highway in that manner, the present roads could be used for the greater part of the way, which would save time in building the highway. The layout would be advantageous to tourists who could take one road going north and another one coming south, thus making a loop.

I should like to stress the fact that the present highway, leaving the Manitoba boundary at 35 miles from Kenora and passing through Fort William, Kapuskasing, Cochrane and Ottawa, is 1,390 miles long. I would also point out that the highway from Point Fortune in the province of Quebec to the New Brunswick boundary, near Edmundston, covers a distance of 388 miles. That means a total of 1,778 miles from the Manitoba to the New Brunswick boundary. The present highway is located in Ontario to the extent of 75 per cent. If my proposal were carried out, the road starting at Kenora would still pass through Fort William, Hearst, Kapuskasing and Cochrane. It would cover a distance of 894 miles in Ontario. From Cochrane, it would head for La Reine in the province of Quebec and thence through La Sarre, Louvicourt, Mont Laurier, Montreal and so on until it reached the New Brunswick boundary. The highway would then cover a distance of 828 miles in the province of Quebec. The present road stretches over 1,778 miles while the alternative I suggest would be only 1,722 miles long. Not only would the latter be 56 miles shorter, but it would be more evenly distributed between Ontario and Quebec.

Since the dominion government will pay half the cost incurred in building the trans-Canada highway, I suggest that a joint committee, consisting of dominion government representatives and of delegates from the provinces concerned, be authorized to act on this matter.

Before I resume my seat, I would like to draw the attention of the house to a problem of great importance to the farmers of my constituency. I would like to voice, for the benefit of all members, the protests of my constituents against any measure designed to promote the free sale of margarine.

There are not a few people in this country who claim that the farmers have been reaping profits during the last few years. If such arguments are to be used to justify the free marketing of margarine, I wish to state in reply that the present situation of the farmers, in general, is not very profitable and that it would be economically unsound to increase their difficulties by forcing a drop in the price of butter and by making it harder for them to sell their product. At the very least, legislation is necessary to preclude margarine from being sold with the same colouring as that of butter.

I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that in my constituency of Chapleau there are a great many Indians. It would be advisable to build a special school in order that they may be trained and educated, so that they may take an active part in our public affairs and contribute to the development of our vast region.

I also suggest the establishment by the federal government of an experimental farm in northwestern Quebec. The great expanse of fine, cultivated land of which we are the proud owners and the constant advances made in the clearing of land mean that this farm would be of great service to our farmers and settlers.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it to be my duty, in order that justice and truth may prevail, to correct the statements made in this house by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Caouette) on February the 1st last.

I must say that I do not intend to match insult with insult. I have far too much respect for the house to stoop to that. The respect I have for myself, for my electors and for the mandate which they have given me, prevents me from doing so. I will therefore restrict myself to stating the actual truth.

I have always thought that we are elected to serve the best interests of all but especially those of our constituents. I was therefore quite surprised when the member for Pontiac took me to task for having secured a post office for his constituents of Val d'Or. I shall not deny the part I played in this matter. I have also helped to secure grants for the mines located in the constituency of Pontiac and elsewhere. I am sure that the farmers of his constituency or of my own do not bear me ill will for having thus helped the development of the district, because this makes it easier for them to market their products. I may add that, for my part, I shall always be happy to see colleagues of mine in this house do a service to my constituents.

The member for Pontiac saw fit to add that nothing was being done in the Chapleau constituency. I must say in this connection that I am prepared to let my electors, who have witnessed my efforts during the last four years, be the judges in this matter.

The member for Pontiac also referred to a meeting which was held at Senneterre on January 14. As he was not present, and since he has to rely on inaccurate secondhand information, I may say that at that meeting three matters were discussed. The first related to the refund of tax overpayments on electricity. I have requested my constituents to send me all documents and details pertaining to that matter, and the hon. member for Pontiac may be assured that as soon as I receive them I will give the matter the attention I always devote to matters which concern my constituency. The second point had to do with the opening of a school for Indians. I have dealt with that question in my present speech and I am requesting the establishment of such a school. At the said meeting I informed the people of Senneterre that I was in favour of that project, but that in my opinion before deciding on a site for that school the department should have a survey made so that the most suitable site might be chosen. In so doing, I was following a policy which is that of the Liberal party as well as my own, and which consists in avoiding wholesale promises not meant to be kept. Whenever I have made a promise to my constituents, I have kept it.

The third matter discussed was the building of a post office. The postal revenue at Senneterre is $7,800. The department cannot build a post office when revenue from such a source is less than $10,000. The member for Pontiac should know it. This I have explained to my electors of Senneterre. I also told them that Val d'Or had secured its post office because the revenue there was $45,000. On the other hand, La Sarre, whose post office yields over $16,000, can expect to obtain one also.

The member for Pontiac is blaming me because I said that a member must use tact. I submit that tact and politeness are qualities all of us should strive to acquire.

That hon. member has said that I had boasted that I did not have to be a member of parliament to make a living. Mr. Speaker, what I said is that I am not in politics to make money but only to help all I can towards the development of northwestern Quebec. I have been in that part of the country for 37 years; I saw the first tree that was felled there, the first ploughing, the first crop, the first train, and I am indeed happy to have witnessed the extraordinary development that has taken place in Abitibi. When I think that there were only about ten people when I first got there and that Chapleau now has a population of 75,000, I am as proud as if it were a personal achievement. There is no doubt that a member of parliament would make more money by staying home to look after his business, but I am amply rewarded by the knowledge that I contribute to the development of my constituency of Chapleau, of my province and of my country.

(Text):

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, before entering into a discussion of the matters contained in the speech from the throne, I wish to add my congratulations to those which have already been expressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and to the other cabinet ministers who have been appointed since the last session of the house. I also wish to extend congratulations to my leader (Mr. Drew) and express my pride and pleasure in his appointment as the head of the Progressive Conservative party. I am sure that all hon. members, no matter what their politics, have realized that the leader of the Progressive Conservative party is not only a man who has already gone far but one who is going to go much farther in the history of this dominion of ours.

During the debate on the speech from the throne an opportunity is given to hon. members, as representatives of the people, to discuss the country's conditions generally, and to present to parliament the views of their own constituencies and the needs of the country as they see them. I shall only touch on a few of these this afternoon since there will be many other opportunities to bring up these matters.

We have already discussed the question of bringing Newfoundland into confederation. No objection has been taken by any member in this party. All members of the Progressive Conservative party are pleased indeed to welcome this new province to confederation. As a matter of fact I doubt if there are many members in the House of Commons opposed to their coming in. We did object to the manner in which their joining was being brought about. However, that matter has been discussed fully, and I do not intend to weary the house by discussing it again at this time.

We in the maritime provinces are particularly proud to welcome this new province. We have much in common with the people of Newfoundland. They are our near neighbour; their people are much the same as our people; their basic industries are much the same as ours. That is, they get their living from the sea, the forests and the mines. Those of us in the three little provinces by the sea are pleased indeed to welcome another sister.

May I express the hope that this new maritime province will not have to travel as hard a road as have the three provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island since the time they joined confederation. As was said in the house a few days ago, this matter of bringing Newfoundland into the fold is the fulfilment of the dream of confederation as expressed many years ago by Sir John A. Macdonald. It is the uniting of two great countries of the British commonwealth of nations. I was pleased indeed to hear the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette)—who, unfortunately, is not in his seat this afternoon—make his eloquent appeal for unity within this country. He stated that a united Canada is one of the great essentials, so far as the future prosperity of the country is concerned. He went on to say that a united commonwealth and empire is also a great essential, not only for the future welfare of this country but for the future peace of the world.

This is no idle dream, Mr. Speaker. History has proved in two great wars just how necessary the British commonwealth is to the welfare of the world. It is true that in the house we often hear in speeches, questions asked of the ministry or through notices of motions placed on the order paper, statements which might seem to weaken those ties which bind together the different members of the commonwealth. However, I have been in the house now for fourteen years and have learned to pay very little attention to such statements.

The great problem agitating the minds of the people of Canada, as well as those of other freedom-loving countries today, is security for the future. I have said that the British commonwealth of nations is one of the requisites for the procurement and maintenance of peace in the world. In the war of 1914-18 the British commonwealth stood as a bulwark preserving the liberties of freedom-loving people. We did not lose sight of the fact that our great neighbour to the south played an important part in that war. But, as has been said on many occasions, the war did not commence in 1917; it commenced in 1914. And if we had had to wait for a year or so, until the United States came in, I doubt very much what position the world would have been in by that time.

Then, the second great world war from 1939 to 1945 did not begin after Pearl Harbor. It began in 1939; and had it not been for the British commonwealth at that time one might wonder in what position the world would be today. In saying these things I am not in any way belittling the great part played by the United States. But the point I would emphasize is that it is essential and necessary that this great organization, this British commonwealth of nations which, on two occasions, has preserved the freedom and peace of the world, continue to keep itself as strong as possible.

We had hoped that after the last war, when so many nations had fought for the preservation of peace, and after so many had perished in those countries which had been overrun, the United Nations would have been the source to which we might turn for the preservation of peace and for the future security of the world. But, as was stated only a few days ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), it is unreasonable and would be unreasoning if today we were to depend upon and place our hopes in the United Nations. We must remember what has happened. Fifty nations met at San Francisco; but the ink was hardly dry on the signatures of many of their representatives before trouble arose in different parts of the world, and particularly trouble with one of those great nations which, we all admit, had played a magnificent part in the war of 1939-45.

It became necessary therefore, in order to preserve peace and security, for the freedom-loving peoples of the world to look around for the purpose of forming some other pact, or arriving at some other solution. The speech from the throne mentions the north Atlantic pact. Let me say at the outset that I and, I am satisfied, all hon. members in the house and all others interested in the preservation of the peace of the world, are in favour of the north Atlantic pact. We realize of course the difficulties involved in bringing this pact to a successful conclusion, and the difficulty of bringing all nations within its sphere. First of all, those countries in Europe which were devastated and torn by war must be put on their feet; they are not in a position today to bear the great burdens they would have to bear in the event of future hostilities. Countries such as France, Belgium, Holland and other European countries, all of which suffered devastation, must be placed in a position where they can bear their share of the burden. Then, nations such as the Scandinavian group must be brought into the pact; and we recognize the great difficulty involved in this procedure. Perhaps we do not realize as clearly as we should the difficulty this presents to smaller countries such as Norway. They have terrific problems to solve. In Canada we do not find it hard to decide on which side we would place our strength. But for a little country like Norway, situated on the very border of one of those nations from which we expect our chief trouble, the difficulty is most acute. We must respect the stand taken by this small nation within the last few weeks.

We realize, too, the difficulty confronting a country such as Eire. I am not concerned with nor am I competent to discuss the internal politics of that country. It would seem to me, however, that the salvation of a country like Eire, in the event of trouble, would depend upon an agreement such as the north Atlantic pact. This country feels that it is impossible for it to enter such a pact until certain internal arrangements have been made. I simply mention these things to show how difficult the problems are that are involved in bringing about security in the world.

The other day the minister, when speaking about security, praised the airlift, but he mentioned something which caught my attention at that time. He said it represented a paradox. The paradox was that young men who had fought in the last war, who had carried bombs to Berlin for the destruction of that city, today were using the same bombers to carry food for the preservation of the people of the same city. The thought that struck me was that not all the young men and not all the bombers are being used for this purpose. I have wondered why it is that Canadian bombers and Canadian young men have not been employed to assist Great Britain and the United States in the task. We are told that the maintaining of the sections of Berlin occupied by Great Britain, France, and the United States is very essential as far as the future preservation of peace is concerned. If it is so essential it seems to me it is another paradox that we in Canada are not bearing our full share in carrying that burden.

In the speech from the throne there is a section which is of great interest to the people of Canada, and which I think will be of particular interest to the people of the maritime provinces. It reads:

> You will be asked to approve, subject to the approval of the United States authorities, the agreement concluded in 1941 for the development of navigation and power in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin.

That is the St. Lawrence waterway. I listened to the speech of the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Mr. Brown), and may I at this time congratulate him on a very excellent effort. In his speech he pointed out the great benefit that the St. Lawrence waterway would be to certain parts of Canada and the United States. He pointed out that the dream, not only of people of the present day, but of people of Canada and the United States for a great many years, has been that grain and products shipped at the head of the lakes might be conveyed by water right through to the sea. He also spoke about the merchandise that could be moved from Montreal, Toronto and other parts of Canada into the great central areas of the North American continent. That is something which will be of great benefit to those sections of Canada, but there are certain parts of the dominion, as there are certain sections of the United States, which are not going to benefit very materially from the development of the St. Lawrence waterway.

In the three maritime provinces we feel that it will not be of very much, if any, benefit to us. In saying that I am not intimating that we are not in favour of anything that will assist in the development of our great country as a whole, or that is for the benefit of other sections of the Dominion of Canada. History will disprove that. We have always borne our full share of the development of all parts of Canada. Our money and our people have helped to develop them. We have helped to develop the great railways that cross the country. Some three or four hundred million dollars have been spent by Canada in the development of canals in Ontario and other parts of the nation. We helped to build the Hudson Bay railway, which has never been, and never will be, of any benefit to the people of the maritime provinces.

Therefore I say we are not opposed to anything which is for the benefit of the whole. I think there are certain ways in which the St. Lawrence waterway can be of benefit to the maritime provinces. Perhaps we might get cheaper feed for our farmers inasmuch as it would be conveyed by water all the way from the west. The way in which the most benefit would be derived would be, I believe, from the development of the Chignecto canal. In this house on previous occasions I have mentioned the development of the Chignecto canal. I want to say to hon. members that, while it is a very old subject, while it has been discussed since long before the days of confederation, it is still a very burning question in our provinces.

This afternoon it is not necessary for me to weary the house with the history of the Chignecto canal. It is sufficient to say that by its construction over 400 miles will be eliminated from the water route of ships traveling from the St. Lawrence river to Saint John, Digby, and other ports on the bay of Fundy.

As far as coastal service is concerned, it would help to shorten the distance for ships wishing to trade with Boston, New York, and ports of the New England states. The gypsum that we produce in the region of the bay of Fundy could be shipped through the Chignecto canal to the central part of Canada, and that industry would benefit greatly. The construction of the canal would benefit our lumbering industry, our fishing industry, and practically every other industry in our provinces.

There is another benefit which I think might be derived from the construction of a canal. I refer to the great iron finds in Labrador. Now that Newfoundland is coming into confederation the Hollinger-Hanna concessions in Labrador and Quebec are to be developed. A railway is to be built from the mines to Seven Islands, a port on the St. Lawrence river. There is no doubt that the New England states will expect much of the ore to be shipped to Boston, New York and other places in the New England states. I repeat that by constructing the Chignecto canal you will link the bay of Fundy with the St. Lawrence waterway, and over 400 miles, as can be seen from this map, will be saved in transporting iron ore from the port of Seven Islands to different points in the United States.

I hope that, when the question of the St. Lawrence waterway is being discussed, members of the house will bear in mind that, as we will be called upon to help to pay for the development of the St. Lawrence waterway, we should be given some consideration as far as the development of the Chignecto canal is concerned, for it is something that was promised to the people of the maritime provinces many years ago.

There is another point about the development of the Chignecto canal. I am not an engineer, but I have been told that through the construction of the Chignecto canal hydro power can also be developed. The maritime provinces need hydro power. As a matter of fact, our people are starving for electrical power. One of the main reasons why we have no comparable industry in that section of the nation is the fact that we have not cheap power. I hope that consideration will be given to that side of the question when the matter is being discussed. Just a few days ago I read that locations were being sought in Canada for some four hundred factories from Great Britain. A few of these may be coming to the maritime provinces; I do not know of any, but I believe one or two have come to Nova Scotia. If four or five hundred industries from the old country are to be located in Canada, certainly we should have some of them down on the eastern coast. As a matter of fact if these English companies, or any other companies, wish to export goods overseas, what better place would there be to establish factories than down in the provinces by the sea?

There is another development on which I want to say a few words; that is the Passamaquoddy project. Last summer I saw an article in the newspapers saying this matter was being discussed again, that it was being brought up in the United States by Senator Brewster of Maine, and I wrote to the Department of External Affairs about it. Many years ago, I think in 1920, an engineer named Cooper first thought of developing power by harnessing the tides. Millions of dollars were spent at that time; as a matter of fact I believe Mr. Cooper spent some $300,000 of his own money. As hon. members know, tides in the bay of Fundy rise sometimes as high as 40 feet. In Passamaquoddy bay and Penobscot bay in Maine the tides are very high, and Mr. Cooper's idea was to use these two bays for the development of power by letting the water out of one and holding it in the other to form a head, and vice versa. This project was not very popular in New Brunswick when it was first introduced, because at that time it was said that it would be injurious to the fisheries of that province. Since that time the matter has been thoroughly investigated, however, and I believe the fear that it might injure our fisheries has been proved groundless. So I hope the Canadian government will give this matter serious consideration. It is being investigated at the present time by a commission, and if it is found practicable I hope the government will take whatever steps may be necessary to carry it out.

Much has been said during this debate on the question of taxes. I am not going to make any extended remarks, but I believe we in New Brunswick are paying the highest taxes anywhere on the North American continent. I might mention taxes on tobacco, for instance, as a result of which we pay 39 cents for a package of cigarettes which costs 35 cents in Ottawa and other parts of Canada. The gasoline tax in New Brunswick is higher than anywhere in Canada, and I believe higher than anywhere on this continent.

A day or so ago I was interested to learn that the farmers were to receive some consideration in the matter of basic herds. I think this is a step in the right direction. The previous ruling was that if a basic herd was sold or slaughtered in a single year the proceeds were looked upon as income and the owner of the herd had to pay the full income tax. There is another question that is very closely associated with that of the basic herds, and that is of great interest to the farmers of New Brunswick. Most of them have woodlots. They go out and cut lumber or pulpwood, sometimes completing their cutting all in one year or sometimes extending it over a period of years. As we all know it takes thirty or forty years for a tree to grow. If these farmers sell all the lumber off their farms in one year the proceeds have been taken as income for that particular year, and they have had to pay the full income tax on it. This is the same principle as the basic herd, and when the minister is giving consideration to these income tax reforms I hope he will consider this matter of lumber cut by farmers. In this connection, if the house will bear with me I should like to read a resolution offered at the convention of farmers and dairymen held at Fredericton in January of this year, as follows:

Whereas the farmers owning woodlots and cutting therefrom have no allowance made them for the annual growth when being assessed income tax;

And whereas they are assessed in full for all stumpage value received over and above original investment;

And whereas this has the effect of discouraging continued ownership of farmers' woodlots due to the fact that he has to pay tax to the extent indicated in the foregoing. In fact, in many cases, this taxation is the reason for farmers selling and moving off their farms;

And whereas it is in the interest of the country as a whole to offer every encouragement to farmers to stay upon their farms and continue to produce food for Canadian consumption and export;

Now therefore be it resolved that this farmers' and dairymen's convention in session assembled do recommend that farmers be allowed a reasonable stumpage value for logs, pulpwood, etc., cut on their lots deductible from tax notwithstanding write-offs which may have been previously made with a view of encouraging the farmer to stay upon his farm;

And further resolved that a copy of this resolution be mailed to the Minister of Agriculture of New Brunswick with a request that he take immediate action with the Department of Finance at Ottawa with a view of having its provisions implemented at the first opportunity.

I hope the Minister of National Revenue will take this matter into consideration also, because the situation is very unfair and should be corrected at once. While I am dealing with taxes I must say that I consider our young people are being taxed much too heavily. We often say, "Oh, he is a young, unmarried man with a fairly good salary; he can afford to pay a high tax". These young men are trying to build up their incomes. They hope to get money with which to get married and build homes, but with the taxes they have to pay it is impossible for them to build up their bank accounts for these purposes. That is a very bad thing for the country, and it also has the effect of driving these young men out of Canada. We suffer from this in New Brunswick to a great extent, and I am satisfied that one of the great reasons for our young people leaving the country is the heavy taxation imposed upon them. So I would hope the minister might be able to increase the exemption allowed our young people.

I see that my time is fast slipping by, but I should like to say just a few words in connection with veterans affairs. On numerous occasions I have recommended that a standing committee on veterans affairs be set up by this house, and I take this opportunity of repeating that recommendation. I know of no committee which would have a more beneficial effect. We have a number of standing committees of this house, and I have been a member of many of them in the past fourteen years. Some of these committees never meet, and some of them meet once or twice a year. If there were a veterans affairs committee, it would meet very often.

Upon looking at the record, I find that the first veterans affairs committee met in 1916. From 1916 until shortly before the last war, there were thirteen veterans affairs committees. Since the last war, there have been five such committees, making a total of eighteen committees in the past thirty-two or thirty-three years. When these veterans affairs committees meet, they meet almost daily. During the last session, no committee was busier than the veterans affairs committee. If that committee were sitting today, many problems could be considered by it. I will not take the time to enumerate those problems, but the veterans consider that committee as their forum. It is a place to which they can come and present their grievances to sympathetic ears. I do ask that the veterans affairs committee be again set up.

While I am mentioning veterans affairs, Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay a tribute to a gentleman who passed away a few days ago. I refer to the late John Herwig, who was the secretary of the Canadian legion. The returned men of this country have lost a great advocate in the death of this man. For many years, Mr. Herwig has fought and worked on behalf of the veterans of this country and, on many occasions, he appeared before the veterans affairs committee. Since other opportunities will be afforded for speaking of veterans affairs, Mr. Speaker, I shall have more to say on that subject at a later time.

I should like now to say a few words about conservation. A few moments ago I spoke of the woodlots of the farmers in my own province. The lumbering interests of this country are becoming very much concerned, and I think rightly so, about a situation which is developing in the depletion of our forests. In my own province there has been a great need for conservation for many years. The financial position of the province does not permit the province to undertake it. It is time the federal government gave some assistance. I was pleased to see some mention of conservation in the speech from the throne. The time has come when the federal government should assist the small provinces, or assist all the provinces for that matter, in their conservation problems.

Some people may say the federal government has no interest in this matter, except in the northern parts of the dominion. The federal government has an interest, however, because these lumbering areas provide employment for many of our people. In places where there is little manufacturing, as in the province of New Brunswick, the lumbering industry is the greatest industry we have. I was very much surprised to read in the February issue of a publication issued by the Canadian Forestry Association that there are very few Canadian films which can be used to educate the people on forest conservation. This article reads as follows:

Motion pictures as an aid to forestry education are an important medium employed by the Canadian Forestry Association. During 1948, Canadian Forestry Association's own motion picture and lecture tours, its film libraries and co-operative tours recorded an attendance in all Canadian provinces of 400,000 men, women and youths, French and English.

It is regrettable to report that all the major motion pictures, in the 1948 program, dealing with forest management, forest protection, soil erosion, water and wild life were purchased by Canadian Forestry Association in the United States and adapted (and translated for Quebec) in Canada. The principal producer of forest conservation films on this continent is the United States Department of Agriculture.

This article goes on to say that this is one field in which our Canadian film board could very properly take a prominent part. The production of films on conservation to educate our people would be of great assistance. The article also says that, so far as the association's program for this year is concerned, they must again depend on the United States for films.

My time has run out, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to say a word about crippled persons. The member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) made an eloquent plea on their behalf the other day. It was gratifying to hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) say that approximately $500,000 had been set aside to aid crippled children. There are other cripples, Mr. Speaker, who are not children. I refer to those young men and young women whom we see in every town and village across the country who have suffered from some incurable disease and who are forced to drag their bodies along on crutches. As was pointed out last night, these people receive no assistance. They are not old enough to receive the old age pension, and they are not blind. They are helpless, however. I have received letters from some of my own constituents about this matter. I do hope this parliament will consider helping these people. There is no more deserving class of people in this country, to my way of thinking.

Mr. Arthur Williams (Ontario): During the time at my disposal, Mr. Speaker, I intend to direct my remarks to just two subjects which are only briefly mentioned in the speech from the throne. These two subjects are health and housing. As I looked very carefully through the speech from the throne, I noticed that it dealt with some thirty-nine items. Of the thirty-nine items only two referred to health and housing. Housing was referred to in just twenty-six words and health was referred to in forty-four. I was disappointed that the speech from the throne should be so sparse in its reference to these two important matters.

Two of the most pressing problems of the nation at the present time are health and housing. These are the two things that weigh most heavily on the people of this country. It is true the people are concerned about prices, and in the speech from the throne there is a very brief reference to the question of prices. It is to the effect that present controls will be continued. Some time was spent on that question when the resolution concerning it was before the house, so it is not necessary to refer to it again. I hope some serious attention will be paid to these two particular questions. On the question of health itself, may I say that it was with a great deal of interest and some degree of pleasure that I listened to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) when he addressed the house. The hon. gentleman made an effective speech and clearly outlined the steps that are being taken in those particular fields. But the fields are extremely limited. To me the minister was just describing the skeleton of a health program. After all the years that Canada has been a country, I think it is about time that we had something more than a skeleton and that we began to put flesh on it.

It is true that what the government is doing is highly commendable. With the exception of one who wished to indulge in carping criticism, nobody would offer any word of condemnation of the government's activities in connection with cancer, for instance. It is most desirable that something concrete and effective should be done to deal with that scourge. In her speech my colleague the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) referred to the seriousness of arthritis. I agree entirely with what she said. The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), who just sat down, referred to the condition in which incurables find themselves. During this session most members of parliament have received a circular letter from the head office of the incurables association in Calgary. We have also received letters from our constituents who are suffering from "polio" and other diseases. It is necessary that concrete steps should be taken by the government to remove these people from the position of being a burden of responsibility on other members of their family. Instead of these unfortunate sufferers feeling that they were dependent upon other members of their family—though the latter gladly accept the responsibility—and being obliged to endure not only the suffering occasioned by these diseases but also the embarrassment of being dependent on other members of the family, many of whom cannot stand the strain, I think it would be commendable if the government undertook responsibility for them.

All these things are highly commendable. But if they were all done, there still would remain just a skeleton of a health program. I sometimes wonder whether people who are in positions of authority in this country really know a great deal about a health program —and I am not thinking now merely of members of the federal government but of other people too. Some of us have had the fortunate experience of living in a country with a complete health program. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is one of them, and I know other gentlemen in this house who have had that great advantage. I am sure that every one of them would agree with me that such a health program provides not only for the things that the Minister of National Health and Welfare says this present government is providing for, but for all the other things that so many hundreds of thousands of our people in Canada have not the opportunity of enjoying. All kinds of sicknesses and illnesses are still being endured by the people of this country because of the fact that they are not able to afford medical attention. They just sit down and continue to suffer. In this connection I should like to quote the words of the former Prime Minister, the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he introduced in this house on May 14 of last year what was then described as a national health program. As reported at page 3935 of Hansard, the right hon. gentleman said:

> No doubt it will seem to hon. members that in presenting this health program to parliament the government is pursuing a policy which over the years will involve the expenditure of considerable sums of money. That is apparent. But what these expenditures may mean in the preservation of health, in the saving of human life, to say nothing of the lessening of human suffering and misery and not infrequently despair, is beyond calculation.

For all the years before this statement was made by the right hon. gentleman—and even since it was made—the people have continued to endure this "human suffering and misery and not infrequently despair" merely because we still have only the skeleton of a health program; there is no flesh on it.

A moment or two ago I expressed wonder whether the responsible people of this country knew much about health programs. I have noticed on their part a great tendency always to enlist the assistance, advice and professional experience of people who are termed "experts". Through the years shoals of information have been compiled on this subject. Yet the most effective steps toward the introduction of the best health plan that was ever introduced and devised were taken when people who were not experts, who were not professionals, undertook to do the work. Sometimes I think we can get so bogged down with expert and professional opinion that we are not able to see the wood for trees.

In matters of health we have before our eyes in Great Britain the most magnificent exhibition on the part of a government that can be found anywhere in the world. Hon. gentlemen in this house have had occasion to know at first hand about such a program. The Prime Minister knows about it for he went to England quite recently. Other hon. gentlemen know about it; they went later as a delegation from this parliament to the old country, including even the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who the other day spoke so scathingly about Britain. When these gentlemen landed in England, about the first thing that happened was that they were given a little yellow card. On that yellow card the instructions were printed. They did not have to be in the country any length of time; they did not have to be contributors to the plan. Irrespective of where you come from or what ailment may befall you while you are in the old country, or what accident may occur to you, without any other concern, consideration or requirement, that yellow card provides you with complete health, medical and hospital facilities.

Last Friday when I spoke in this house on the resolution dealing with price control I referred to the fact that the people of Britain were getting something for their taxes; that they were paying four shillings and eleven pence for this huge social program which the people are getting in Britain. All they paid was a paltry four shillings and eleven pence or $1.25 of their pay, for their whole social security plan. Of this amount eight pence halfpenny, or seventeen cents a person was taken for the health plan.

Mr. Mitchell: A week.

Mr. Williams: Yes, a week, about $35 a year, to get everything that the medical and hospital profession can possibly give them. You get the doctor without any further charge. I have heard some people say that you have to take the doctor that you are ordered to take. That is just so much political bunkum. That is said in this country deliberately to gain a mean political advantage at the expense of a tremendously worthwhile project in the old country. You do not have to take the doctor that anybody recommends. You take the doctor you want; and if you are over sixteen years of age, and perchance your mother and father have one doctor and you want another doctor, under the plan you are perfectly entitled to your choice. There is no compulsion about it.

Another interesting thing about the whole plan, despite the fact that here in Canada we are told that you must join it, is that there is no such thing as "must" about it. You can join it or stay out of it, whichever you like; but it is such a wonderful thing that practically all of the 48,000,000 people in Britain are members of it, even the Tories.

I am very proud of one fact, namely, that the man who is responsible for the administration of the health program in the old country is an associate of mine. He and I worked in the same pit back in the old country, Ni Bevan. Please do not spell that N-y-e. An hon. member to my left, who is a member of the Social Credit party, is always correcting hon. gentlemen. On two occasions I have heard him correct the pronunciation of hon. members and yesterday I noticed that he tried to correct the spelling of a particular place in his riding. I follow his example in this respect and say please spell the name N-i. That is the way Ni spells it himself, so I would say that he is right. He and I worked in the same pit, and when all this fuss was being publicized in the Canadian papers about the introduction, or the contemplated introduction, of the health plan in the old country, I wrote to Ni and asked him if he would kindly send me a copy of his proposed bill in order that I could understand what it was all about, and Ni wrote back to me and said: "You don't want a copy of the bill, Arthur; just think of the Tredegar medical aid society." The Tredegar medical aid society is an organization which was started many years ago not by experts, not by professionals, but by a bunch of miners. Back home we call them colliers. They are the chaps who dig the coal for one shilling and two pence a ton, which the capitalists sell for sixteen shillings a ton. These miners got together. The coal companies, although they were tremendously wealthy, did not provide health plans, did not provide hospitals, did not provide any medical facilities, and the miners, in their desperation, got together and started to hammer out a program for themselves. I shall never forget one Saturday afternoon back in our town hall, after we had gone through the laborious and sometimes tedious process of fashioning this thing. This Saturday afternoon we came to the point of putting it in action. The first job was to select a secretary of the medical committee and we got the secretary. We employed doctors; we bought a hospital, the Tredegar cottage hospital. We set up what we called surgeries, which was a place as big as this chamber. In the centre was the dispensing room where all the medicine, pills, bandages and the rest of it were stored. Along each side of the room were the private offices of the doctors. If I wanted to see Dr. Davis I would go along the corridor where his office was and walk in and tell him what was the trouble. He would give me the prescription and I would go to this dispensing room in the centre of the building, put my prescription in through the window and get my medicine and it did not cost me one single cent beyond the four pence in the pound, the eight cents in the pound, which was deducted from my wages each week.

If our children met with accidents on the road, they went to the hospital, and they were treated without any further bother about payment of doctors or hospital bills. It was all set up by a bunch of miners, just ordinary people. If miners, or a group of workers anywhere, can fashion a plan of that kind out of their extremely limited resources, what wonderful possibilities there are for the government of this country, with the wonderful resources of the nation at its disposal. What a wonderful and thrilling thing it could do too to take this burden of human suffering and oftentimes despair from the shoulders of the people. I do not know whether it will be done. I wish the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) were in the house this afternoon. I would not care if nobody was in this chamber but the minister. If I could talk to him, and plead with him, if necessary, to set an example of that kind of thing, I am as certain as I stand here this Friday afternoon that if he set aside a block of money out of his $30 million and said to me, "Set up that example of a health and hospital plan in your riding," I could guarantee that in five years the thing would be self-supporting. But you must have the resources to start with, and I do wish the Minister of National Health and Welfare would do it.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Williams: Don't indulge in these jeering laughs, particularly you Tories, because you have in Ontario a government that is not doing the very thing that you say this government ought to do.

An hon. Member: They are trying to do it.

Mr. Williams: Don't tell me that, because I hold in my hand a copy of the bill which was introduced by the minister of health for the province of Ontario, and it is not worth the paper on which it is written. So you do not know anything about it; and, if you are possessed of the intelligence that I think you have, you will keep quiet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Williams: Anyone, if he likes, can see this bill of Dr. Vivian, former Ontario minister of health. I could easily describe it. However, I have only forty minutes in which to speak, and I want to talk about housing. I do not wish to waste my time describing something which, after all, is really no good.

Mr. Case: I thought you were asking this government to do it.

Mr. Williams: Oh, sit down, sit down.

I was at the convention of the Canadian Congress of Labour held last October and sat through twelve sittings throughout the week.

I found people at that convention doing exactly the same thing as I see the Tories doing here. Up there we called them communists; down here we call them Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Well, I will not bother rising to a point of order on such absolute nonsense as that.

Mr. Williams: There you are. He just says, "I will not bother to rise to a point of order, because it is nonsense"—but he rises, nevertheless.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): And it was nonsense, nevertheless.

Mr. Irvine: That brought him up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I at least have been brought up.

Mr. Williams: Then, as to housing, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in his speech, following the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), made reference to the 278,000 houses that had been built. I do not believe the Prime Minister intended to leave the impression that this government had been responsible for the building of 278,000 housing units.

On the very evening of the day this session opened, January 26, in the C.B.C. broadcast called News Roundup, a gentleman to whom I shall refer later used that same figure of 278,000, but left the impression—at least what he said was possible of this construction—that the private enterprise organization he represented was responsible for the building of those 278,000 houses.

In case there is any impression of that kind prevailing, let me point out just what has been accomplished by both public and private enterprise. While it is true that, including conversions, 278,000 units have been built, all the government has built or provided from 1945 until December of 1948 is 24,763 units. These were provided through the medium of veterans housing, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, Veterans Land Act, and armed services married quarters. In other words, the government, with the national resources of the country behind it, has furnished an average of about 6,000 units per year. I cannot bring myself to believe that it is proud of that accomplishment. I am certain it would want to do better than that; and it can do much better if it will step into the picture boldly.

Why is it that when we ask why we do not have more houses built we are always told there is a shortage of materials or a shortage of labour? That is not true; it just is not true. Because while the claim has been made that there have been shortages of both labour and materials, the fact remains that all kinds of materials and plenty of labour have been diverted into other channels, such as the building of theatres, pool rooms and the like.

In the city of Toronto—and perhaps it would be useful if hon. members sitting to my right would remember this about that city—in 1947 the sum of $16,500,000 was spent on construction; but of that huge sum only $1,250,000 was spent on housing. Surely this gives an answer to those who say that there have been shortages of materials and labour, when they see that there were plenty of materials and labour to complete the balance of this construction totalling $16,500,000. There was plenty of labour; but apparently no one was interested enough to stop all the unnecessary building and turn that labour to housing. No wonder there is such an outcry about this kind of thing.

The Toronto Daily Star of February 14, 1949, gives an account of a meeting of veterans held in the Earlscourt area of that city. According to this report Hec Carter, one of the veterans, said:

> "This meeting's the first real indication we're going to fight this situation. The Legion has taken its first stride toward making itself felt in the land."
> Col. Harvey Lyons, blind chairman of the citizens' rehabilitation committee, said: "I hang my head in shame. I'm Canadian-born, and I say Canada can never claim a leading place among the nations so long as it tolerates the chaos and despair that I find among veterans.
> These lads feel unwanted. They see the federal government invest in anything but Canadians . . . subsidize anything but human beings. They haven't the courage to invest in Canadians in peace as they willingly do in war."
> Col. Joe Finney, veterans' information officer at city hall, said: "Two thousand families will have to be out of their Toronto homes by May, evicted by landlords taking advantage of relaxed controls. To those veterans under notice I say, 'sit tight.' Try to get a home, and if you can't, sit tight.
>
> By June this year, landlords will be forced to wait months for their applications to be heard. Sit tight, and you may be there to Christmas.
> Fifty thousand need homes here. Five thousand are veterans living in crowded conditions. Shysters are exploiting them to the limit.
> Cheapjacks call me with offers of accommodation. Yesterday it was a Gerrard St. E. man who wanted to help a poor veteran—offered two rooms at $15 a week. He wasn't looking for some poor veteran to help; he wanted some poor veteran to help him.

At the same meeting two hon. members of the house were present. The newspaper report refers to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) as follows:

> "I'll see your case gets presented to the House of Commons," promised J. R. MacNicol, M.P. for Davenport. "I just can't understand why the federal government hasn't done more."

Another hon. member of the house is referred to as follows:

> "I'm convinced we've got to have a housing program right now," emphasized Harold Timmins,

M.P. for Parkdale. "The government has to be convinced of it; just now it takes things in its stride, quite content with what's been done. I'm ready to adopt any methods you put forward that will get houses built within the income range of average veterans. Small builders in this city are only waiting for the chance."

I could go on and quote from reports about other people who are similarly distressed at the lack of housing in this country, but time will not permit me to do so. I want to assure the house that, if anybody believes for a single moment that this is a problem that can be left to private enterprise, they are making a big mistake. Private enterprise never has solved the problem of housing. I know that, and all hon. members of the house know it. If any further confirmation is required, let me refer to the words of Senator Taft, which may be rather impressive. Senator Taft has this to say:

I am a great believer in free enterprise, but this happens to be one field where it has failed to find a solution.

There was a time years ago, a time we like to forget, when we did not have housing and did not have a housing program, but carpenters, bricklayers, and plumbers were a dime a dozen. They were sitting in their labour halls throughout the country waiting, hoping and praying that they might hear of a house being built somewhere where they could get a job. Private enterprise had scores of opportunities at that particular time to go ahead with a housing program, but it did not do so. Now it is trying to excuse itself on the ground that materials are scarce and labour is scarce, on the ground that materials are expensive and labour is expensive.

The gentleman to whom I referred earlier, when taking part in a C.B.C. news roundup broadcast, was asked certain questions about housing by Bill Beatty of the C.B.C. Mr. Beatty asked him this question:

What are the chief things that affect these home prices?

Mr. Johnson, the general manager of the Canadian Construction Association, had this to say:

There are a lot of factors. Material prices have gone up 60 per cent since 1945.

Sixty per cent since 1945.

Wages for construction workers are up 33 per cent in the same period.

To those who are always claiming, as I heard some do quite recently in the house, that wages are the cause of high prices, I say, let them remember that here is a statement by a man who ought to know, the general manager of the Canadian Construction Association, and he says that the increase in materials is 100 per cent higher than the increase in wages.

The government can take examples from housing programs in other lands if it wishes to do so. I am as certain as I stand here that the government cannot solve the housing problem overnight because the backlog of housing needs is so tremendous, but it could do such a big job that it would rapidly begin to catch up on the shortage of houses. It is not enough merely to lend money. Step into it yourselves and build houses. There is nothing new about that.

During this session of parliament I have been rather interested to hear the criticism leveled by my hon. friends to the right against the government for its lack of co-operation with the provinces. I think the account of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) about what is being done in co-operation with the provinces throws the lie back in the teeth of the official opposition. As far as lending money on houses is concerned, the federal government was doing that long before the Ontario government started to do so. There is a degree of co-operation between the federal government and the province of Ontario, but in no instance have either the federal government or the Ontario government actually built houses. They can do it. There is an enormous scope in this field. Speaking of low-rental houses, one way in which it can be done is through building by direct labour and not bringing in contractors and subcontractors. Surely the experiment at Antigonish, in Nova Scotia, is an amazing example. The guild system of building houses in the old country is something that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is familiar with. That is another example of how it can be done. All kinds of avenues for direct building are open to the government if it will only follow them.

If the government do not look after the health and housing of the people then they deserve the severest condemnation, even at election time, of the people of the country. I am certain that the people will not continue to tolerate a government which has such a grand field before it and fails to avail itself of the opportunity. I plead with the government to take active, vigorous and bold steps in the fields of health and housing.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in what I am about to say with reference to the speech from the throne I too must confine myself to a smaller number of subjects than would ordinarily be the case if I had more time at my disposal. There are many things that I should like to discuss in this debate which are of concern to the people of Canada. High prices is one; rising unemployment is another; high taxation is another; housing is another; agriculture is another; assistance to disabled persons is another. And there are many more. Time will not permit me to deal with these various subjects as fully as I should like. The members of my party have very capably put on record the stand of the Social Credit party on many of these subjects. Therefore I wish to confine my remarks at the outset to the matter of housing.

The member who preceded me also spoke on the subject of housing. I agree with him that there is a great need for housing in Canada. I do not agree with him that the government is the best organization to build houses—for reasons which I will give in my address. We recall that a few years ago the government undertook the construction of houses under the V.L.A., and within six months after that project was concluded tremendous repairs had to be undertaken, costing the government something in the neighbourhood of $2,500,000, which had to be paid out of the public treasury. Now we have another housing scheme in operation under the National Housing Act. At the outset let me say that I am not going to condemn all these houses. Some of them are well constructed, and naturally we do not hear so much about those. We do hear a great deal about those not properly built. Even though out of a thousand houses only some fifty are not as well built as they should be, it should be remembered that the owners of those fifty houses have a legitimate complaint.

The project I want to discuss for a short time is a part of the national housing program which was carried on by the Bow River Construction Company in Calgary. I would not bring up this question on this occasion if it were not extremely urgent. The urgency arises because some forty house owners, about eighty to eighty-five per cent of whom are returned men, are about to lose everything they possess by way of savings owing to the foreclosures being carried on by the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company and the government, because the government also entered into this enterprise.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Johnston: It is a shame, as one hon. member has just indicated, because these veterans have put into their houses every cent they possess in the world, and a good share of those savings represents what they or their wives saved while they were away fighting. I am sure these men did not expect to go overseas and fight and then receive the treatment they are now getting. I do not think Canadians generally would expect that to happen. I want to read a short extract I cut out of the Calgary Albertan just yesterday:

> Bow River Construction Faces Second Action
> Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Manufacturers Life Insurance have filed in supreme court their second statement of claim against the Bow River Construction Company Limited in connection with an unfinished housing project on North Hill.

The next paragraph is the important one:

> In this action Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Thomas, 801 23rd avenue N.W., who are living in the unfinished house, are named as co-defendants with the Bow River company.
> The claim is for $5,541.30 alleged to be owing on a mortgage on the unfinished house.

So there can be no doubt that the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are definitely taking legal action to foreclose on these houses one at a time. This is the second instance, and eventually the mortgages on all these houses will be foreclosed, the owners being liable to lose everything they have in the world.

I want to make it clear that I am not taking part in this debate and dealing with this particular subject because I hope to obtain any political advantage. In the first place this project is not in my constituency; therefore I can get no votes whatever from it. In the second place I did not go out looking for trouble. These owners formed themselves into an organization and came to my house to see what assistance they could get. My advice to them in this case was the advice I gave a couple of years ago in connection with the V.L.A. houses in Calgary. I said we would try every possible means to get a settlement without giving any publicity at all to this concern, and in fact without any unnecessary publicity of any kind. Having that in mind, together with some of the members of the organization I visited Central Mortgage and Housing to see if we could get some satisfaction from them by way of having the houses completed according to specification, but we had no results. I visited the Manufacturers Life, with no results. I visited the Bow River Construction Company, the contractors in this case, with no results. I even wrote to both the preceding and the present minister of reconstruction, but no action was taken.

Now let me give a little of the history of this organization, so hon. members may be in a position to judge for themselves. It is not my intention to go into great detail with respect to the construction of these houses. If I can, though, I want to point out where I think responsibility lies for proper construction and who should have discharged that responsibility. Then I want to show, with some evidence, whether or not these houses have been built in accordance with sound construction practices as outlined in the act and the agreement. When the Bow River Construction Company was first formed, under the act Central Mortgage and Housing was supposed to investigate the company to see whether or not it was in a financial position to carry out the project. That was done, according to officials of Central Mortgage and Housing in Calgary; but when I visited the contractor himself I was amazed when he told me they did not have a five-cent piece to start the work, that they began on a shoestring. The only equipment the company owned was a dragline and a used light-delivery truck belonging to one of the contractors, who at that time was running Ware's taxi, and which was turned over to the company. One of the contractors was in the hospital; the other, Mr. Orr, told me that was everything they had to start with; yet the government say that according to their information the financial position of the company was sound. When I asked a question in the house the other day as to their financial standing, this was the answer I received:

> The Bow River Construction Company of Calgary was approved as a borrower under the National Housing Act by the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as joint mortgagees.

But of course there was no mention as to whether or not they had building experience. Under the act it is also obligatory on the part of the government to see that the men who get these contracts have experience in this field. Paragraph 4 of my question read:

> What were the qualifications of these contractors as to building experience and as to financial ability to complete the job?

They very conveniently left out the answer entirely as to the experience of these builders. They should have, Mr. Speaker, because the contractors had no building experience whatever. One of the partners in the contracting company ran a taxi business and told me he had no experience in building. The other partner in the company had only dug a few basements. Neither of them had any building experience whatever; yet a quarter of a million dollar project was entrusted to these men as builders. Do you mean to tell me, Mr. Speaker, the government handled the matter efficiently?

An hon. Member: They must have had friends at court.

Mr. Johnston: I would not be surprised if they had, although I could not prove that. When this project was started, Mr. Speaker, the Bow River Construction Company had some plans and specifications for houses. The partners in the venture had no experience and no money. They went to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company and said they wanted to build so many houses. Of course, the government approved the plans and specifications; but let me point out, Mr. Speaker, no one else had seen the plans. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Manufacturers Life and the Bow River Construction Company were the only ones who had seen the plans and specifications. To the extent of 25 per cent of the mortgage, the government is a joint lender for this project. The contractors did not even have sufficient money to pay for the building permit until they received an advance from the mortgage company.

Mr. Fair: What do those permits cost?

Mr. Johnston: It depends on the type of house. So far as I am aware, the owners of the houses have not, nor has anyone else, a constructual contract with the Bow River Construction Company. Why? Because they assumed this was a government project. In advertising these houses for sale the real estate company inserted "N.H.A." in the newspaper advertisement. The impression everyone received was that this was a national housing project and that the houses would therefore be constructed according to the act. It is a peculiar thing, but I have heard the statement by government officials that, if anyone gets himself in the position of having no contract with the builder, he deserves what happens to him. It is odd, Mr. Speaker, that not one of the owners has a contract. The reason for that is, as I pointed out, that these people believed this to be a government-sponsored project and the home owners were assured they needed no further protection.

I should like to refer to the National Housing Act for a moment, particularly as it relates to the construction of these houses. At page 8 of the 1947 office consolidation of the National Housing Act, 1944, I read from subsection (b):

> A joint loan shall be made only for the purpose of assisting in the construction of a house according to sound standards approved by the corporation and under such supervision as the corporation may prescribe.

I point out to you, sir, that according to the act the loan is to be made for the purpose of assisting in the construction, and not for encouraging construction or anything else. Construction is supposed to take place under such supervision as the corporation may prescribe. Under this act the housing project is bound to be built according to sound construction principles and under proper supervision.

May I refer for a moment to the memorandum of agreement made between the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Bow River Construction Company Limited. It says:

Whereas pursuant to the National Housing Act, 1944, the corporation may, on behalf of His Majesty, enter into contracts with builders, to encourage the construction of houses to be sold to prospective home owners.

This is an agreement between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Bow River Construction Company. According to the National Housing Act, and pursuant to the agreement between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Bow River Construction Company, these houses were to be of sound construction. As I pointed out a moment ago, the only persons who had access to the plans and specifications for this project were Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company and the Bow River Construction Company. The prospective home owners complained about not having access to the plans and specifications. I went to see Mr. Lillie of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and he said he would do everything in his power to assist these men. I sent them down to the corporation's office to see if they could look at the plans and specifications. Surely that was not asking very much. Upon their arrival at the office of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, Mr. Lillie refused to let them see the specifications. I recall that in one house there were seventeen violations of the specifications by the Bow River Construction Company.

Let me refer once more to the agreement between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Bow River Construction Company. On page 2 the agreement says:

—and to build all of the said houses in accordance with the plans and specifications approved by the corporation, for which individual loan approvals have been granted by the corporation.

Let me repeat that:

—and to build all of the said houses in accordance with the plans and specifications—

Not one of those houses, Mr. Speaker, has been built according to the plans and specifications. When I say that, I do not mean there has been a slight variation. Some of the basements are already crumbling. The cement block footings upon which the chimney rests in some of these houses are so bad that one can reach down and pick up a whole handful of the cement. I will deal with that specifically at a later stage.

I shall refer once more to the agreement between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Bow River Construction Company. On page 3 the agreement says:

—any house which has been built by the builder under the terms of this agreement and which remains unsold; the price of such house shall be the selling price to the corporation shown in schedule A attached hereto, plus any increase in price under article 3—

Of course there is an escalator clause. Once again I point out that, under the National Housing Act, these houses were to be built according to sound construction methods; yet the government says it has no responsibility in the matter and will do nothing. If the government has no responsibility, who has? If there is no responsibility on the government to see that this project is properly carried out, who is to safeguard the use of public moneys entrusted to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? If the government has no responsibility, then I am afraid public moneys are being carelessly spent.

I wish to refer for just a moment to another section of the agreement. The act says that these houses shall be sold at a certain stipulated figure. At page 10 the act says:

The builder shall offer each of the said houses for sale at a price not in excess of the price fixed in the said contract.

That is according to the act. The price is set. When these people bought their houses they paid a certain sum for each house, and apparently for a completed house. That price is set out in the agreement. In the schedule to the agreement there are set out the prices at which these houses must be sold to the owners. There is provision for the escalator clause, which amounts to only $200 or $250. The agreement also states the price at which the government will take over these houses from the builders, provided that they cannot sell them within six months after completion. But in this one particular case the price set out in the agreement was $7,150. Yet not one of these houses is being sold for the price as stated in the agreement. Who else can force the contractors to sell according to the agreement and according to the act, if it is not the government? They are the ones who stipulated the price, and they are the ones who permit the loaning company to charge a building inspector's fee to see that these houses are properly constructed. Against every loan there is a $20 charge for inspector's fee. Yet when I saw the head of the mortgage company, Mr. Lyne, he told me that they were not concerned with seeing whether or not these buildings were properly built. All they were concerned with was to see that the money which they had loaned was properly protected. Central Mortgage and Housing also have a building inspector, and they told me his only duty is to be a policeman on the mortgage company's inspector. The city of Calgary also has a building inspector.

An hon. Member: Fleas on fleas.

Mr. Johnston: And they did not do their job either. I will refer to that matter in a minute. The act and the agreement were violated as was everything else connected with them. The houses are so poorly built that the city of Calgary has already condemned some of them, although they are not even completed.

We therefore went to the city inspectors to see what could be done in order to safeguard the interests of these owners. I was appointed to appear before the city council on behalf of these home owners, of whom there were some forty. I addressed the city council in Calgary on this subject. As a result, a great number of the aldermen of Calgary went up and inspected these houses themselves. As a consequence of their inspection and my appearing before the council, this is what happened. I had addressed the city council, not from the standpoint of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation's lack of inspection or failure to complete this project properly, but to see why Calgary's building bylaws had not been carried out. In almost every instance there was a violation of the building bylaws. As a result of all this, the engineer for the city of Calgary wrote a letter to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It is dated July 27, 1948, and reads as follows:

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation,
214 - 5th Ave., E.,
Calgary.

Dear Sirs:

Attached hereto is a report on the piece of concrete taken from the residence at 601-25th Avenue N.W. This house is one being built by the Bow River Construction Co.

I would advise that we were not notified at the time of pouring concrete of any of the six houses in the 600 block on 24th Avenue N.W., or the six houses in the 600 block on 25th Avenue, N.W.

Under these circumstances we cannot feel responsible for the concrete in these basements.

The recommendation of this department—

I would ask you to note this, Mr. Speaker. This is on the basement, and this is the recommendation that the city engineers made to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on a house which had just the basement, the walls and the roof completed.

—is that an 8" concrete block wall be built on the inside of the existing foundation and carried up to the under side of the floor joists and thus support the weight of the house, or beams and posts to support the bearing walls and the main beam.

As the concrete tests definitely show an unsafe foundation would you please see that one of the above recommendations is carried out.

Yours truly,

P. Aumonier,
Building Inspector.

Can you tell me, Mr. Speaker, that this project was properly inspected by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the Manufacturers Life, which is charging a $20 fee for that purpose? Here the city recommends that they build an eight-inch concrete wall inside the main foundation. What a terrible mess.

Mr. McCuaig: Was that free enterprise or socialism?

Mr. Johnston: That was government enterprise.

Mr. Fraser: That is the kind of thing you get under the C.C.F.

Mr. McCuaig: How do you know? They have never done it.

Mr. Johnston: That was a contract amounting to a quarter of a million dollars and it was government-supervised. Let there be no mistake about that. I am not saying that some of the houses under the National Housing Act and under the integrated housing plan are not good ones. It depends on the contractor. My point is that the government and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation did not carry out their obligations under the agreement or under the National Housing Act.

The city council passed a motion, moved by Alderman Mackay, which I should like to read to the house. It is as follows:

That the commissioners be instructed to go to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the dominion government and the Manufacturers Life and urgently request that the problem affecting the Bow River Construction Company be satisfactorily answered without additional expense to the present owners and that the work be proceeded with as quickly as possible.

As I say, that motion was put to the council and was carried. I would ask you to notice the words "without additional expense to the present owners". Why was that recommendation made? Because in the agreement the price is so stated. Now the government, along with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, says: We will allow you sufficient increase in your mortgage to take care of any additional expense that might be incurred by you to finish those houses, to pay for the liens that have been put on there—through negligence of the Manufacturers Life, because they make progress payments and are supposed to see that the money is spent on this contract. Again they neglected to do that. As a result, in some cases liens and encumbrances registered against the title run as high as $15,000 per house. Then the Manufacturers Life has the audacity to say to an individual: We will advance you an increased loan; we will amortize your loan over a longer period but you must pay off those encumbrances—for which they, the Manufacturers Life, were responsible.

A motion was moved by Alderman Colborne and carried. It reads as follows:

That this committee of the whole recommend to council "that the necessary bylaws of the city of Calgary be amended to provide that a bond in the amount of the full value of the contract be posted upon the granting of any building permit in excess of $1,000, such bond to be maintained for a period of one year.

When I was speaking to the council I may say that I recommended similar procedure myself.

I now want to read another letter. I am reading it even at the expense of being monotonous, to show that I am not the only one who condemns this project. I could not give a better authority than that of the city of Calgary where over one hundred thousand people are concerned about this project. This was a letter sent by Mayor J. C. Watson to Mr. C. S. Chapman, who is head of the insurance company, and Mr. A. McClaskey, who was western superintendent for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It is dated December 1, 1948, and reads as follows:

The city commissioners have been instructed by the city council of Calgary to urgently request that work be proceeded with at the earliest possible time on those houses not yet completed by the Bow River Construction Company in Calgary, and that the problem be brought to a satisfactory conclusion for the present owners at no additional expense to them.

We understand that there are approximately twenty of these houses that are in various stages of incompletion at present. There are nine basements which appear to be in violation of the building by-law as well as thirteen nonapproved furnaces in which burner units must be replaced.

Incidentally some of these exploded, and the occupants were burned quite seriously.

In several houses posts are required under trimmer and main beams for adequate support. To enforce city by-laws at this time will only create a worse condition and place additional hardships on the present occupants.

The faith of many citizens has been placed in your institution to protect their interests and we feel that a corporation of your magnitude will not hesitate in rectifying the adverse conditions that now exist. The money that has already been advanced by many of these citizens represents their life savings. We feel that you have a definite moral responsibility to protect the interests of those citizens.

It has been drawn to our attention that there are not sufficient funds withheld from the contractor to satisfactorily complete the houses. In view of the fact that you had inspectors on the work to safeguard the financial part of the program, for which the individual owner is being charged a fee, we cannot understand your attitude in not following up this responsibility and completing the homes as speedily as possible.

We are given to understand that certain individuals have been able to take over these houses and finish them at their own expense, while others may agree to the completion of the house by permitting an increase in the mortgage. If this is so we feel it is an injustice to the individual and that the original mortgage or arrangement should be followed.

On behalf of the citizens concerned your earliest possible solution is requested.

Yours very truly,

J. C. Watson,
Mayor.

I want to read one more letter before I conclude. It seems very significant, Mr. Speaker, that a corporation the size of the city of Calgary would take such an interest in this matter as to direct their correspondence to those concerned. I hold in my hand a letter dated December 1, 1948, addressed to the Hon. Douglas Abbott, P.C., Minister of Finance, Ottawa, which reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Abbott:

Some time ago a number of Calgary residents entered into a contract with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company for the construction of homes under the national housing plan. The contract for the construction of these houses was let to the Bow River Construction Company of Calgary, which has since gone out of business through financial difficulties and the work on the houses has ceased.

Construction to date is of poor quality, and I understand there are not sufficient funds left on the mortgages to complete the houses and make them habitable.

The matter has been before our city council on several occasions, and efforts have been made to have C.M.H.C. and the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company complete these homes, which are badly needed.

In this connection, I am enclosing copy of a letter which I have today forwarded to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and to the western supervisor of the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company, which is self-explanatory.

We are of the opinion that the citizens concerned are entitled to every consideration and that the houses should be completed at the earliest possible date according to the original contract. Further, as C.M.H.C. is a dominion government corporation, it is the opinion of our council that the dominion government has some responsibility to see that the unfortunate purchasers of these houses are protected and that the houses are completed as soon as possible.

Any assistance you can render in persuading C.M.H.C. and the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company to assume what is at least their moral obligation to see that these homes are completed at an early date will be appreciated.

Yours very truly,

J. C. Watson,
Mayor.

I have a great deal of proof, Mr. Speaker. I have extracts and photographs taken by the Calgary Herald, by the Albertan and by the Financial Post, which all go to prove the very thing about which I have been speaking; therefore it is not my personal opinion. Before I conclude my remarks I want to read one more letter to show that this difficulty is not confined only to the city of Calgary. Under the national housing plan these difficulties are prevalent all across the country. They are found in Halifax, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Calgary and at other points. A letter appeared in the Legionary, the voice of the Canadian legion, of January 1949, which reads as follows:

A timely warning

Editor, the Legionary:

The legion in Halifax is anxious to make inquiries regarding certain cases where veterans have endeavoured to purchase homes under the integrated housing plan operated by the government-sponsored Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

From the enclosed photo and cutlines (published on this page.—Ed.) you can see that instances have occurred in this city in which the veterans concerned may lose large sums of money—money deposited as a down payment for a home.

We ask the Legionary to draw attention to the matter so that if similar cases have occurred across Canada, other legion branches can bring the matter to the attention of the dominion government as we have done.

The Halifax district council of the Canadian legion has requested the Prime Minister to make an investigation into the matter in order that the veterans will not lose the thousands of dollars which they have paid out towards their new homes.

S. Thomas, President, Halifax district council, Canadian legion, Halifax, N.S.

This is not a problem peculiar to the city of Calgary, Mr. Speaker; it is a problem which is peculiar to the housing project. Let me emphasize that the same difficulties arose when the government was building houses in Calgary under the V.L.A. In almost every instance it is caused by negligence on the part of the government or the Manufacturers Life in not seeing that proper building inspection was carried out. Every one of the men concerned was charged a $20 inspection fee. When you multiply that by forty houses it amounts to a fairly substantial inspection fee which was charged to these home owners, yet the inspection was not properly carried out. It is a shocking scandal, Mr. Speaker. This would not have happened had the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Manufacturers Life taken the proper precaution which was their responsibility under the act and under the agreement which they signed. They have now decided to foreclose on these people, who had no say whatever in the choice of a contractor. They were poor contractors; in fact, they were not contractors at all. They had no money and they had no experience. In the face of that the government say that they are going to wash their hands of the whole thing and let the owner take the blame. Had proper precautions been taken, this situation would never have arisen. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the government is not only morally but legally responsible under the act to see that these men do not lose their life savings. Surely they did not go overseas to fight for free enterprise in this country and to protect the Manufacturers Life, only to be treated in this way. Surely they did not go overseas to fight for the Manufacturers Life and then come back and be bled of the very last cent they have saved. If that is to be the justice handed out to our returned men, then I am afraid that this government will find it a difficult job to get men to fight in another war.

I trust that the government will take this warning and see that these men who have their life savings invested in these houses will get the proper protection immediately, because the foreclosure proceedings are now in progress.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at seven-thirty o'clock.

(Translation):

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, since the very outset of the debate on the address in reply, I have heard the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and several members of the various parties in this house complain, and rightfully, about the income tax, ask that it be drastically reduced and, in some cases, abolished altogether, to be replaced by other forms of revenue.

I fully agree with them. However, if I recall for a moment September 1939, I find that most of those who thunder forth against the Income Tax Act, are the same who voted for the declaration of war, who required our participation and who, during the war, considered that the government was never doing enough. What inconsequence and what a colossal joke! For if today our taxes are astronomical, is it not due to our participation in the last war?

In September 1939, after consulting my electors at a large public meeting held at Loretteville, chief town of my constituency, I voted against the declaration of war. In doing so, I warned my colleagues of what is now happening. I insisted that we limit our contribution to material production, stressing that we had a population of barely eleven million, although our territory was as large as that of Europe. We could have followed the example of Ireland and Switzerland. At the end of the conflict we would have been free from the huge war debt that now weighs upon us and that we are required to pay by way of taxes. I told the house that the declaration of war would inevitably bring about conscription and taxes which the Canadian people would be unable to pay.

Everyone will remember, I am sure, the imperialistic statements of the present leader of the opposition who called vehemently for increasingly active participation and asked that conscription be applied as soon as war was declared. In his imperialistic indignation, he accused Quebec of isolationism, as can be seen from the following excerpt taken from the Montreal Star of August 10, 1944, which reported him as saying, and I quote:

The time has come for the people of this and every other province in Canada to say that Quebec is not going to receive a preferred treatment while it refuses to bear its full share of the burden of war.

In the next declaration, he only reaffirmed the hatred he had already expressed towards my fellow citizens. After my people had requested fair representation in the dominion civil service, he stated, according to the Toronto Star of November 27, 1936, that it is not unfair to recall to French Canadians that they are a conquered people and that their rights exist only because of the tolerance shown by the English-speaking community which, though it respects the minority group, must still be considered as the dominant race.

Still later, in an attempt to stem the ever increasing influence wielded by my fellow citizens in this country which belongs to us from the Atlantic to the Pacific, he stated, according to the September 30, 1944, issue of a London publication, Everybody's Weekly, that: I want people of British stock for Ontario. We can receive thousands and thousands of your people. The only thing that can contain the growing French-Canadian pressure is a powerful Ontario, peopled with Britishers.

Furthermore, at a time when a few friends and I were battling in Quebec to ask the people to answer "no" in the plebiscite, he made the following statement, as reported in the Montreal Star of August 10, 1944. I quote:

Prime Minister Drew asks: "Are we going to permit one isolationist province to dominate the destiny of a divided Canada?" He hopes that every one of you will answer by "a resounding 'no', which will be heard in every part of the province of Quebec".

And furthermore, when the Liberal party sought to help the large families of this country to obtain the necessities of life, by means of generous family allowances, he made the following statement concerning my province, as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of August 10, 1944, and I quote:

But I assure you that the government of Ontario intends to do everything within its power to make sure that this iniquitous bill (Family Allowances Act) does not go into effect. It is not this bill alone but the whole principle involved that we intend to resist.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, having quoted these statements by the leader of the opposition, to say to his face here, in the House of Commons, that the province of Quebec's motto is "I remember", and that in spite of his purchased propaganda in Quebec newspapers that seek to set him up as a friend of French Canadians, an advocate of family allowances, etc., I have never known, in all my political career, an actor with such gall, obviously inclined to think that my fellow-Quebeckers are fools. No, Mr. Speaker, despite the paid advertisements currently appearing in Quebec dailies, to create the impression that Mr. Drew will be the saviour of the French Canadians, despite those advertisements which amount to a big joke, the province of Quebec will never forget that before the hon. leader of the opposition became the leader of the Conservative party in Ottawa my compatriots never had a worse enemy here in Canada. So much did they consider him public enemy No. 1 that, in the last federal election, in 1945, fifteen days after he had been elected as Prime Minister of Ontario, the people of my province, fearing that his ever-growing influence with the Conservative party, and even his election as Prime Minister of Ontario, would return the Conservative party to power, the people of my province, I say, voted as one man to prevent Drew's influence from dominating in Ottawa.

The people of Quebec will also recall that during the last provincial election in Ontario, the leader of the opposition promised my fellow citizens of that province that he would settle the Catholic school problem. Instead of doing so, however, he eagerly extricated himself from his administrative responsibilities in Ontario to seek refuge in Ottawa where he took over the duties of leader of the opposition, leaving to someone else the task of settling nothing at all.

Now, there are those who would once again catch unawares my honest thinking fellow citizens by telling them tales that completely discountenance the political record of the leader of the opposition. No, Mr. Speaker, the citizens of Quebec will have none of this man who, I repeat, stated in London, on September 30, 1944, that he wanted people of British stock for Ontario and that we could absorb thousands and thousands of their people. He added that only a powerful Ontario, peopled with Britishers, could contain the growing French-Canadian pressure —who has wanted, as I said, through his attitude in favour of mass immigration, to make himself the spokesman of those who, in this country, are constantly endeavouring, by shady means, to prevent the spread of France's beautiful language and thus break the unity that is so indispensable to this country, forgetting, in their unbounded hatred for the French language, the truths strikingly expressed by a poet who, referring to that language, wrote verses which may be rendered as follows:

Whoever tries to stop its expansion might as well endeavour to prevent the opening of buds and the blooming of roses; whoever would attempt to destroy its charm and its power could more easily suppress the beams of dawn.

Mr. Speaker, let me remind the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will never be heard making in the province of Quebec statements he would not repeat in the English-speaking provinces of Canada. Everyone recognizes his frankness and his sincerity.

The right hon. the Prime Minister was not a member of this house when war was declared, but I am sure that if he had voted for the declaration of war, he would at least have had the frankness to tell the people of his country that conscription was an unavoidable consequence, as I stated myself when, in September 1939, I voted against the declaration of war.

I never believed in moderate war, because everyone knows that when two nations or two individuals are fighting, if one of them slows down, he is knocked down. And I blame all those who, whatever their party, have lead the population to believe otherwise.

Probably following this school of thought and wishing others to forget entirely his political past, the leader of the opposition, since he became head of the Conservative party, has shown eagerness to adopt that same strategy towards the province of Quebec.

May I remind the leader of the opposition that in this country there is no victor nor vanquished but solely Canadians who deserve to be treated as such and on a basis of equality, as the right hon. the Prime Minister said recently.

I fought against the war policy of the former leader of the government, sometimes violently, and I have no regrets about it, because I am convinced that it prevented some excesses and at least enabled conscription to be delayed until the end of the war. It is true I voted against all gifts and loans to England, because I then thought, just as I do today, that instead of giving our money to England to buy our products, it was more advisable to distribute this money among our own people so as to enable them, in a period of abundance, to obtain what they cannot get, for want of financial resources. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I think it is preferable that the balance between the production consumed in Canada and our total production, that is our surplus production, be distributed to agricultural and industrial workers and to each citizen in the form of allowances, of old age pensions at sixty-five, of dividends or any other form of social security which would thus allow them to obtain a legitimate share of the profits of industry, where they are gradually being replaced by machines. The allowances would enable them to obtain goods which only monopolists can get in a country where public wealth is so badly apportioned.

I believe it would be more advisable to follow the policy just stated than to give money to England for the purchase of our surplus production, so that this surplus may be distributed among the suffering people who need it. The more we contribute, through social security, to increase the purchasing power of our great working and agricultural masses, the surer we will be that our production will be consumed at home.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to express an opinion with regard to the income tax.

I believe it is urgent and necessary to grant full income tax exemptions to the wage-earner getting $3,000 a year, if married, and $1,500, if single. Why? Because the wage-earner has carried practically alone the income tax burden during and since the war. He is the only one to pay on 100 per cent of his income. Companies and big-business men avoid a large part of the income tax through the following means:

Inventories: the classical and safe enough means of reducing the visible profits (by decreasing the value of stocks on hand at the end of the financial year).

Expenses: everything is charged to that account, personal expenses, traveling expenses, representation expenses and a lot of improvements and repairs which, in the end, reduce the profits and increase the assets.

Fictitious transactions: Large amounts are apparently paid out to people who do not exist. One can guess who gets that money in the end.

Subsidiaries: The working of the subsidiaries, by dividing the profits, is singularly beneficial to the corporations who create them. Everyone is aware that the tax rate increases with the profits.

This is where "capital gains" come in. Corporations find a way to conceal their profits by capitalizing them as shares, which are exchanged between the parent company and the subsidiaries; thus huge profits are undisclosed and converted into capitalization.

As a result, those who are able to pay do not pay. That, Mr. Speaker, is the game of Toronto's two hundred millionaires, those very people who have asked the hon. leader of the opposition to come to Ottawa to protect them because, since a year ago, the government is making them repay what they did not pay and also, because they expect a budget that will protect the little men and make the big fellow shell out. That is the reason why these distraught millionaires subscribe so generously to the electoral fund of the Progressive Conservatives, thus making possible this splurge of paid and mendacious publicity we can read in the newspapers and that explains the request in the hon. leader of the opposition's last speech that elections take place immediately, even before the budget is brought down.

In view of this, for the reasons I have just given, Mr. Speaker, I shall gladly lose no time in voting against the amendment of the leader of the opposition, for I have not the slightest intention to put him in power as I am convinced that the wage-earner's lot would be a sorry one if, heaven forbid, the next budget were to be prepared by the Progressive Conservatives.

(Text):

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to comment on the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just finished, except to say that from what I understood he was not only jealous of the ability and leadership of the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition (Mr. Drew)—

Mr. LaCroix: I do not think anybody is jealous of him.

Mr. Fraser: —but he was also afraid.

Mr. Graydon: That is the word.

[Mr. LaCroix.]

Mr. LaCroix: Afraid of what?

Mr. Fraser: That when the next election comes along his party is certainly going to be defeated.

Mr. MacKinnon: Wishful thinking.

Mr. Fraser: I not only say that, but I will put it down in writing if the hon. gentleman would like to have it in writing in order to see it. I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition on his election to the house. At the same time I should like to congratulate the people of Canada, and Canada itself, on having a leader of the opposition with the ability and statesmanship possessed by the member for Carleton. At this time I should also like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Brown) and seconder (Mr. Demers) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on their selection for that honour, which comes to very few members of this house and which I am sure these hon. gentlemen will remember as long as they live.

This year, as in all the years I have been a member of this house, the speech from the throne contains a number of words. Whether or not these words will mean anything we do not know, but we hope they will. In past years they have not, but this being an election year there is a possibility that this government will show a little action and try to carry out some of their promises. One thing mentioned in the throne speech is of the greatest importance to everyone in Canada. This is the reference: "The St. Lawrence power and navigation development is to be brought before parliament this session." In my opinion the sooner this matter is brought before parliament the better for Canada; and the sooner ways and means are found to develop this project the better it will be for everyone, because the St. Lawrence waterway will benefit every man, woman and child in Canada no matter where they live. I know it will benefit Peterborough, the city I represent. Peterborough is often called the electrical city, or the city beautiful. There we have the finest electric-wire mill on the continent, where wire can be made ranging from six inches or more in diameter down to less than the thickness of a human hair. We also have plants capable of making generators as large as those made in any country in the world. One of the largest of those generators would more than fill this chamber. After they are built in that plant they are taken apart in sections small enough to fit on flat cars; and some of these generators will require an entire train to transport them to their destination. We expect that Peterborough will get some of the construction work incidental to the development of the St. Lawrence waterway. In order that parliament may better understand this project, I feel that a committee of the house should be set up to go into the plans and details, because I do not believe many hon. members have been up and down the shores of the St. Lawrence, into and out of the various channels and harbours, through the rapids and so on. Some have, but very few; and I feel that every hon. member should be one hundred per cent behind this undertaking.

The speech from the throne also says approval will be asked for the renewal of controls. I am not going into that matter because it is the subject of a debate at the present time, but there are many administrative bugs in connection with these controls which could and should be ironed out. These are matters which at present are worrying and inconveniencing businessmen from coast to coast. If an individual or a company finds that a machine is broken down and needs a small repair part which must be imported from the United States, no matter whether that man or concern is located in British Columbia, Yukon or Newfoundland, after Newfoundland is taken into confederation, permission must be obtained from Ottawa to import the necessary part. That is so whether the article costs fifty cents, a dollar or a hundred dollars. It causes weeks of delay, and in some cases the loss of many man-hours of work. I believe those in charge of this department should give a businessman or a business concern a permit to bring in perhaps $25 or $100 worth of repair parts without having to apply to Ottawa. Let the collector of customs at the port through which the article must enter look after the details. I am sure this would save a great deal of time, not only to business people across Canada but also to those administering these controls.

The speech from the throne also mentions that the government is going to give assistance to the production of steel. This is really sound in principle, and I hope it is carried out. You know, Mr. Speaker, on more than one occasion in this house I have risen and asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) where we are going to get the nails with which to put up houses for the veterans. I have had remarks directed at me from the other side of the house; I have had wires, phone calls and letters from all across the country, showing that this condition exists from coast to coast. Last year the minister said my riding evidently was not on the nail pipe line. I quite agree; I think the pipe line took a detour there. But I do not know of any other places in Ontario that are on the pipe line, and if the minister knows I would like him to tell us. Nails can be had, but you must pay a bootleg price of 20 cents a pound. Throughout the country reliable hardware men object to selling nails at more than the proper price. They are trying to sell them at ten and twelve cents. They will not go into the bootleg market, and I do not blame them. Two, three and four inch nails cannot be had except under priority, as I told the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day. The farmer is unable to get them, and the builder cannot get them except with a priority. There are none for the little fellow; none for the man trying to repair his own home. I believe building in this country would go ahead faster if some of these priorities were kicked out, because they are not given in the right way.

Then last year we were short of cement. It is plentiful right now, but it will be in short supply again during the spring, summer and fall of this year. It was almost impossible to get cement last year except under priority. We had United States cement coming in. At first it sold at about 95 cents a bag. Then it started to climb up to $1.10, to $1.20, to $1.40, to $1.50 and on up to $2.60.

Mr. Murphy: $2.90.

Mr. Fraser: I hear $2.90 bid. The socialist party to my left talk about free enterprise and try to ridicule it, but there was a C.C.F. trucker just outside my riding selling cement at $2.60. I do not know what kind of enterprise you call that, but he certainly was gouging the poor old veteran.

Mr. McCuaig: When in Rome do as the Romans do.

Mr. Fraser: If that is the policy of the C.C.F. party, God help Canada should they come to power.

Speaking of building materials, Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Before the recess the member for Bow River spoke about this matter. At the present time, houses are needed in every part of Canada. There is a desperate shortage, and has been for some time. Throughout Canada this is causing hardships and heartaches for many people who have to suffer because there are five or six persons in one or two rooms. The shortage of houses has been the cause of family trouble, court action and sickness. I know that everyone is anxious to see more homes built.

I know that you, Mr. Speaker, have heard reports on the radio and seen reports in the newspapers about landlords being brought into court and even getting jail sentences for attempting to charge a higher rental than that permitted by the wartime prices and trade board. These landlords should of course be fined and, if the evidence warrants it, even go to jail. But the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are in what is called a privileged or protected class. They impose the same kind of squeeze, only a little different from those cases we see reported in the newspapers. I will give you an idea of what they do.

A veteran returns from the last war and, perhaps, has to take his wife and children to live with his parents. Owing to the crowded conditions, the veteran is anxious to get a home of his own. Eventually, he does get a wartime house. These houses are comfortable, although very poorly built. The veteran stays in the wartime house two, three or four years. At that time he receives a letter from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation asking him if he would like one of the corporation's brick houses. The veteran indicates that is just what he wants. He goes to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and they say, "Why, certainly, you can have one of these houses." After looking at the house he goes back to the office to sign the agreement, and what does Central Mortgage Corporation say? This is where the squeeze operates. The veteran is told, "You can have that house, but you have been living in one of our wartime houses, so you will have to fix up that wartime house. You will have to pay one-half the cost of putting that house in first-class shape for the next tenant." This might amount to $25, $50 or $100. The veteran is then allowed to have the other house. Now is that not putting on the squeeze? I think so, and the veterans do too.

The excuse given by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for this procedure is that, if the veteran moves out of that house and the corporation allows another tenant to occupy it, the corporation will have to pay the full cost of renovating it. If the veteran remained in occupation, the corporation would be put to no expense. In most cases these veterans have made their own repairs.

Personally, I feel that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has put blinkers on all its inspectors, but instead of putting the blinkers on the side, as one does for horses, it has put them right in front of the inspector's eyes. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) mentioned the inspectors, but I hope the inspection service in his constituency is better than it is in Peterborough. In Peterborough chimneys have been built by putting a tile pipe at the top and a tile pipe at the bottom, the intervening space being covered with tin. After the tin rots the fumes from the furnace seep through the house. This is not an approved practice, according to the municipal regulations or the building code. It is criminal for an inspector to permit anything like that. If he does, he should be put in jail. Not only that, but the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been getting away with murder in connection with sewers, plumbing and other things by not complying with municipal regulations.

The question most veterans want answered is, who is going to pay for having these things corrected? The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has a set figure for repairs on these wartime houses. The corporation will not go out to repair anything until $2.50 is charged for the man going out. On top of that, there are the charges for the repair work. I remember one instance of the corporation charging four dollars for repairing a pane of glass about twenty inches by fifteen inches.

I have asked in this house a question about the protection afforded these veterans when they buy a house under the government plan. The question that is being asked is, what protection have the veterans if there is a slump or sickness and they cannot make their payments? Will the veteran be allowed a fair equity in his home? This is worrying these veterans, and rightly so. I feel something could be done about that, and this government should do it.

In the speech from the throne there is mention of a transcontinental highway. It says:

> A measure for assistance in the provision of a transcontinental highway will also be laid before you.

Pay attention to that word "laid". If this government had been awake, the pavement would be laid today. It would not be just a measure that is going to be laid on the table of the house. Every year this highway is delayed, Canada is losing millions of dollars in tourist business. I mentioned this last year and I mentioned it the year before. According to reports I have received, the United States has ten transcontinental highways, while Canada has none. I just wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the defence department has been asleep for the past ten years —or has it been the government? If you ask anyone on the street he will tell you that is not the sixty-four dollar question because there is only one answer to it and that is yes.

The plans for this transcontinental highway should be complete by now and provision should be made for other highways, not only for tourist purposes but for transport and military purposes as well. If a transcontinental highway were completed our tourist bureau would be able to do a little more advertising. The bureau could tell the Britishers or the people on the other side of the Atlantic that they could see Canada from the comfort of their own car. As I have said, the speech from the throne mentions this transcontinental highway. But, as far back as March 24 of last year, this government had no more idea of planning for a trans-Canada highway than Donald Duck.

On March 24 of last year I asked the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply about the transcontinental highway. From page 2595 of Hansard I read the following answer by the minister:

> All things in their time. At the present time manpower in Canada is being used to the full in other ways. As soon as we have surplus manpower we shall certainly undertake that.

I said:

> I am suggesting that the government should now have a plan, with the different provinces, in deciding where the highway will go. Then, when we have plenty of manpower and materials, let the road be built. But that plan should be drawn up now.
> Mr. Howe: I think there is a lot in what you say.

The government never woke up until the day it was mentioned in the speech from the throne. With Newfoundland coming into Canada as the tenth province, there is all the more reason why this highway should be built and why the spanning of the Canso gut should be an accomplished fact. These things should be done right away, not fifty years from now, because they mean so much in case we have another war; and no one knows what will happen tomorrow.

I believe that a committee of this house should be set up to study not only the St. Lawrence waterway project and this highway, but also the tourist business. I believe this parliament should be more conversant with what should and must be done; and in my opinion the sooner these committees are set up, the better it will be for everyone concerned.

I should like to say one more thing about the highway. I believe it should be uniform in construction. It should be supervised by the provinces under one general, all-Canadian plan. It must be an all-weather highway and should retain its natural beauty. Trees should be left along the highway from coast to coast. There should be no cutting of trees except by permit. Trees along the highway will be blown down or will fall down soon enough, and new trees will need to be planted.

Mr. Knowles: And no billboards.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. gentleman is perfectly right. There should be no unsightly billboards to act as eyesores. We have too many of them in the country now. Forest conservation is mentioned in the throne speech. But even before the war this government was not practising it at all. Out of an appropriation in 1940 of over $240,000, I believe it was spending only about $45,000 on the planting of trees. Something must be done. This highway should be all planned out now, as should this conservation program; because if a slump should come—and it will come—projects of this kind will take up the slack.

Another reason for the building of the highway is the fact that every year we are losing trade to central and south America. People are going down to Mexico. We could have them here just as well as not. I know that you, Mr. Speaker, have been in Mexico. I have been down there too. It is a beautiful country. But why not let those dollars come up here? There is another reason, also. I should perhaps mention this when we are on foreign exchange control, but I will do it now. In my opinion the foreign exchange control board is hindering pleasure across this Canada of ours. We spend hundreds of thousands of dollars in advertising, asking tourists to come here and asking our own Canadian citizens to travel from coast to coast. But when a Canadian tries to travel across the country and finds that, in order to be assured of decent roads, he must detour into the United States, what happens? If he has over $25 in Canadian funds—or whatever his H-form calls for, if he has one—the official at the border will take away any extra Canadian funds he has. I know of a man who had travelers' cheques which had stamped right on them the words "good only in the Dominion of Canada." The government officials took the money away from him and sent it back to his home. The man was obliged to curtail his whole trip owing to fool regulations by that department. But, Mr. Speaker, they perhaps saved in that way a dollar or a couple of dollars in foreign exchange. I used the term "fool regulations." Yet that same foreign exchange control board issues permits, involving thousands and thousands of dollars, for the importation into Canada of anti-freeze which is injurious to any water-cooled automobile engine. That fact was found out and publicized in the papers from coast to coast. Thousands of dollars' worth of anti-freeze of that type was brought in here. It should have been inspected first. What are the inspectors for?

I know that this house would not be satisfied unless I spoke about something to which I always refer, and which I have criticized. Three years ago I called it a white elephant. Last year I called it a herd of white elephants. This year I shall talk about only one of those white elephants, one of the herd.

Before doing so, however, I should just like to say that the throne speech mentions the fact that a royal commission is to be set up to examine into their activities, and in my opinion it is about time some of them were examined into. In commenting on the throne speech the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said that some time ago he had seen a film which greatly impressed him. I am pleased to hear that. I am pleased to hear that the national film board films are improving. I have heard that suggestion from other sources. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that my criticism of that outfit is worth while if we get better films? That is my objective. No one in this parliament enjoys more than I do seeing motion pictures, taking them, or showing them; but I want them to be good pictures. I want them to have educational value and to be worth while. As a matter of fact, as long as I can see that they are improving, I am satisfied. But if they do not keep on improving, I intend to do a great deal of criticizing.

I feel, however, that the financial picture of this national film board is not a real one. They do not give the true picture of the set-up. The taxpayer is not getting value for his money. If a royal commission is set up, I am afraid hon. members in the house will be prevented from asking questions about the film board. I hope that is not so; but you know, Mr. Speaker, that in the past, whenever a royal commission or a committee was set up, we were just out of luck.

The situation in the United States, with regard to their film unit, is quite different from the one here. In the United States the various government departments have documentary films made. The making of the films is turned over to commercial companies. There is no overhead to the government. The pictures are made by these commercial companies, and they are generally satisfactory because these companies have not only real motion picture producers but their own engineers, the best that can be obtained, and their own technicians. They really do a good job. Here in this country we just have a motion picture board without any direction at all. No one knows just what is the set-up. Our system of control of film production is under a socialistic policy. It curtails expansion of the motion picture industry. In this country a motion picture firm is afraid to expand because it does not know what might happen the next day. Curtailments might be put on such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has put on radio. In Canada we have three motion picture firms and they are all trying to do a good job. They are doing a good job. They make splendid pictures in spite of the fact that they have opposition from the national film board, which is financed out of the taxpayers' money.

Among this herd of white elephants there is one about which I am going to speak tonight. I refer to the stills department of the national film board. This department is injuring every commercial photographer and every press photographer in Canada. Many veterans were taught their trade in the navy, army and the air force. They have come back and have started in business, but the national film board tries to take their business away from them and is succeeding. I have letters from veterans. Here is one from a veteran who said:

> However, I prefer to work on my own, even though the going is a bit hard at times. All I and the others in my profession want is a chance to earn an honest living. We didn't go overseas in the recent war to assure us of a handout, but we did believe that in serving this country we would assure the Canadian way of life in regard to earning a living. But it is hard, nay, almost impossible to sell a thing when another chap is giving it away.

That is exactly what the national film board is doing with portraits and photographs of all kinds. I hold in my hand another letter from a veteran, which reads in part as follows:

> Each year the national film board takes business away from the commercial photographers. After taking a series of pictures in an industrial plant, they give a set to the management "courtesy of the taxpayer of Canada".

It is not right, Mr. Speaker. I have another letter which reads in part as follows:

> The fact that the national film board is actually subsidized by all commercial photographers, through their taxes, is a point which is overlooked by many persons. This subsidization, of course, allows the national film board to turn out photographs at prices which no commercial studio, privately owned, could ever hope to meet. This eventually will mean ruin for many photographers, and certainly will not help the country as a whole in these times of readjustment.

A return was tabled in answer to a question of mine on February 3. This return showed that 167,854 photographs were turned out by the national film board; that is, ordinary photographs. They might be photographs of members of parliament or of people on the street, in different parts of Canada. That means that the national film board took almost 500 photographs every day, including Saturdays, Sundays and holidays. They certainly are making inroads on the commercial photographer. They even made photographs six and a half feet wide by twelve feet long. Your guess is as good as mine, Mr. Speaker, as to whose photographs these were. I will not go any further than that. They made photographs eight by ten to the number of 29,139, and sold them at thirty-five cents each. You could not get the photographic material for that amount. They sold another 18,454 at fifty cents each. They have even gone into the developing of rolls of film and charged twenty cents a roll for that work. They made 129 portraits last year. They made 166 passport photographs. That is all right if they are for government officials; but would it not be a whole lot cheaper if these government officials were permitted to go to a commercial photographer and have their passport pictures taken, which would cost the government $2 or $3 each. It would be a whole lot better.

I hold in my hand another return of the stills department of the national film board. Last year this division cost the taxpayers of Canada $55,152 in salaries. Materials cost $24,826 and $2,206.50. They have five telephones in their offices. They occupy 4,742 square feet of space on Sparks street, the busiest street in Ottawa. Their traveling and hotel expenses amounted to $4,287.17 and $6,476. Salaries and materials amounted to almost $93,000. That does not include the telephones which are paid for by the public works department. It does not include the 4,742 square feet of space which is also paid for by the public works department. It does not include long distance calls, cost of stationery and management, if there is any management, and I have my doubts on that. It is like Paddy's pig; it runs where it likes, feeds in the taxpayer's pocket all the time. These extra costs, including the floor space and one thing and another, would add up to more than $100,000, and this $100,000 is not authorized by the National Film Board Act, which was enacted in 1939. You cannot find anything in that act to authorize the stills department unless you stretch your imagination, Mr. Speaker, as long as the elephant's trunk.

I can see that you are ready, Mr. Speaker, to tell me that my time is exhausted. The poor taxpayer does not like extravagance of this kind. I believe the time has come for the taxpayer to rise and demand an investigation into the national film board, especially the stills department, because it certainly is stepping on the taxpayer. In 1939 Mr. Euler, who was minister at that time, said:

> I may add, in conclusion, that this board is not being established with the intention of providing jobs for anybody.

Goodness knows how many are there now. There were seven hundred and some odd there last year. Mr. Euler continued:

> There is really to be only one paid man in the organization.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Euler goes on:

> That has not been considered.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member but I should like to know whether he has the unanimous consent of the house to continue.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Knowles: Two minutes.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Euler continued:

> That has not been considered. But the only other paid official might be a clerk or stenographer. It is not a board or organization that is going to require the expenditure of a great deal of public money.

But in this Grierson report for the year 1939—I have his report here, but because of a shortage of time I shall not read it—it says they want only $80,000. I do feel that this national film board should be investigated.

The socialist party to my left has been lauding New Zealand, and the government of that country, both in the house and in election campaigns. I notice in a press report however that the premier of that country is asking that the New Zealand film board be investigated. They have communists in there —and I am not saying whether we have them or not. I do know however that there was a question I put on the order paper a couple of years ago regarding a certain party, and at that time I asked the question, "Are there any known communists in the film board?" A week after that, this person was fired, thank goodness. How many more there are, I do not know.

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Fraser: If the hon. member wishes me to sit down, I will do so.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Go ahead.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, just before I rose, the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton), who sits to my left, reminded me that the Humboldt high school curling team won the Canadian high school curling championship yesterday at Edmonton. To do that they had to beat a Manitoba team. We in Manitoba are good losers, and I congratulate the Humboldt high school curling team and wish them every success in the future; but let them watch for Manitoba the next time.

I wish this evening to speak about a few matters brought to my attention by my constituents. I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is in the house. He had something to say about me the other evening, in connection with Liberalism. While I had not intended to say anything about this matter, as he is now in his seat I believe I shall do so. He speaks about the Liberal party as a reform party—and I must say I do enjoy those speeches of his, even though I am not a Liberal.

Mr. Mitchell: A pretty good Liberal.

Mr. Bryce: I was raised in the same school as he was. Perhaps when he was listening to Sir Wilfrid Laurier I was listening to Lloyd George. I had the pleasure of meeting Lloyd George on a number of occasions. But the Liberal party the Minister of Agriculture talks about is no more the Liberal party we had when we were boys than night is day. It is entirely different. In those days the Liberal party was known as a party of reform.

Mr. MacNicol: In the old days, not these days.

Mr. Bryce: It was known as the political group which championed the less fortunate and underprivileged. Those were the times of Pitt, Bright and Gladstone and, in my own time, Lloyd George. Theirs was a continuous struggle against reaction of every kind.

But what do we find today? The Liberal party has changed. More and more it is legislating for the more privileged group. Less and less it is legislating for the poor generally.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Bryce: Oh yes. And I am going to prove it to you.

Mr. Grant: What about family allowances? What about old age pensions?

Mr. Bryce: I hope my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island is going to give me a chance to speak. I have been tempted many times to interject when he has been speaking, because he says so many things that are not just according to Hoyle, one might say.

Let us look at the record. One of the first taxes to be removed was the excess profits tax. That was not looking after the poor people. From that source $277 million was collected last year. Why did not the government take it off a little at a time? Instead of doing that, it made a clean sweep of taking it off—to help big business.

Let us look at the plight of the old age pensioner. Pensions have never been large enough. But when people are earning wages they even find it hard to make ends meet these days. Our old citizens are getting $30 a month. The Winnipeg Tribune has published a series of articles on the plight of some of these old age pensioners. One of my colleagues has already put some of this on record, and I would strongly recommend that hon. members look at the Tribune regularly to see what is written there. However, I should like to place this on record again because I do not think it was covered fully.

This evening I am dealing with the issue of February 10, 1949, where, at page 17, we find this:

> How Pensioners "Get By" on $30 a Month
> Can't Afford to Fix Glasses
> Edward Martin, an old age pensioner, broke the frame of his spectacles four weeks ago.
> He's been helpless ever since—street signs, even billboards, are blurs. Reading's impossible and shaving is more hazardous than the high trapeze.
> He plans to wait a few more weeks before getting the broken frame repaired. He knows the bill will only be "a matter of a few pennies," but he hasn't saved sufficient money.
> That's because he's living on 64 cents a day.
> Like other old age pensioners in Manitoba, he receives $30 in pension money monthly. Although physically unable to subsidize that income through part-time employment, his keen mind worked out a down-to-the-last-cent budget.
> The Salvation Army charges him $10 a month for his room in the local hostel.
> With the remaining $20, he adheres to the following daily diet:
> No breakfast
> Dinner:
> One egg sandwich ..... .15
> Toast and coffee ..... .12
> Supper:
> Two sandwiches ..... .30
> Coffee ..... .07
> Day's total ..... .64
> That leaves Mr. Martin nothing for clothing, medicine, smoking, laundry or small incidentals.
> Right now grey hair is woolly on his head. Haircuts, at 65 cents apiece, come once every six months for Mr. Martin—and the expense means forfeiture of the second supper sandwich.

I am sure that is bound to impress someone here who has sympathy for these elderly people. This man had to do without his breakfast, and lives on two meals a day.

Mr. Blackmore: Two snacks a day.

Mr. Bryce: I was going to say that, if they were substantial, I could live on two meals each day, if I had plenty to eat each time; but when you have only 64 cents a day on which to live, it is a deplorable condition. If the Liberal party want to be the reform party, here is their opportunity. They can do something about this situation.

That is the condition of the man who has only himself to look after. But let us look at the circumstances of the married male pensioner who has reached seventy years of age and is receiving a pension, but whose wife has not reached that age. He gets a pension for himself but nothing for his wife. You have two people trying to live on $30 per month. Surely it is not thought that women over sixty years of age can go out and work to provide extra income to maintain the home. I think the time has come for the amount of the pension to be increased, and I believe that women should receive the pension at an earlier age than men. Personally I think that the pension should be paid to women at sixty years of age, and that it should be paid to men at sixty-five. Other countries can do it, and I do not think Canada should take second place to any country in the care of her aged citizens who have helped to make her what she is today.

I am sure that if I turn to my right to the Progressive Conservatives, to my left to the Social Crediters, to the members of my own party, or even the members on the Liberal side, there is not a man who would not vote for better pensions. If any hon. member thinks I am wrong, let him say so. It rests with the men on the front government benches. It is their responsibility. If they say that these people are to get better pensions, they will have them, because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has the money. You could find money for war; then find money to look after the aged pensioners. I am sorry I have to put this so bluntly to the government, but they are the people who are holding up the matter. Everybody else is agreeable. Let them bring the measure in tomorrow and they will see the support they will receive. The deplorable thing is that so many makeshift methods are adopted to try to help them when, if the matter was handled properly, we could cure the ill.

In the province of Manitoba—and I can talk better about Manitoba than anywhere else—they have brought in a scheme. They are going to give these pensioners another $10 per month if the municipalities will pay half of it. The municipalities have never had enough money in the past to do the things needed to be done, to provide necessary public works; yet the government of the province of Manitoba wants to saddle the municipalities with this additional responsibility, and another means test. I know that the man or woman who has been thrifty during his or her lifetime, and has been able to provide for a rainy day, cannot receive any assistance because they have provided for themselves. It is only the man who has never paid any taxes, the man who has been a waster during his lifetime, or who has had some misfortune, who is entitled to it. People who are trying to get the pension today are encouraged—I do not know whether that is the right word—to do things they should not do. They fill out different forms, and they are not too truthful because they are trying to obtain something to eke out their existence for the rest of their lives. I think the means test should be abolished. If somebody gets the old age pension and does not really need it, or is not entitled to it, then it is in the power of the government to tax it back from them. But, for goodness sake, do not leave people in dire starvation because somebody may receive it whom you do not want to get it.

If the government thinks a contributory scheme will be better, I am quite agreeable to that. I am agreeable to anything that will aid these people. I do not think I need to say anything more. I cannot appeal too strongly to the hon. gentlemen on the government benches. They have the final say on what the old people of the country are going to receive, and I do hope they will think the same about it as I do.

I want to turn for a few minutes to the coarse grain situation. It has been uppermost in the minds of western farmers. The interest of organized and unorganized farmers in matters pertaining to marketing has been continuous and consistent for the last thirty years. Since 1919 the belief has persisted throughout the west that only a wheat board or a grain board, handling the whole of the western crop, will give efficient and satisfactory service, and secure a square deal for the farmer.

I wish to assure hon. members that I am as anxious for justice to consumers as to producers. As co-operators, the C.C.F. group believe that the proper organization of the marketing and distribution of all products would give recognition in a mutual way to the rights of both. There is no need for me to put on the record at this time the details of the fight in the early twenties. On August 18, 1920, wheat sold at $2.73, and on November 18, 1921, it sold for $1.11. On March 18, 1922, by which time practically all of the 1921 crop was out of the farmers' hands, the price had returned to $1.48, but again we find on October 18, 1922, in the peak month for deliveries by farmers, the price had gone down to $1.02. On April 18, 1923, when most of the wheat was out of the farmers' hands, the price had risen to $1.22, but on October 23 the price was back to 95 cents.

At this time both individual farmers and farm organizations were protesting strongly about the discontinuance of the wheat board. The idea of including coarse grains under the wheat board is not new, because at the convention of the United Farmers of Manitoba, held in January, 1922, the following resolution was passed:

> Whereas there is general dissatisfaction with the present system of marketing our grain;
> And whereas the deplorable condition of our agricultural industry is such that it demands the attention of the federal government to the need for national marketing of wheat and other grains;

Therefore be it resolved that we urge upon the dominion government the necessity of re-establishing the Canada wheat board under the former management with the wide powers to sell wheat and other grains.

Let us look at what happened. In 1935 the Bennett government introduced legislation setting up a compulsory wheat board which would handle all wheat. That policy was objected to by the Liberals, who brought in an amendment. I understand that they were the official opposition at that time. I was not here then, but from what I have read they were in the opposition. They brought in an amendment to provide that delivery to the wheat board would be on a voluntary basis. That meant a dual method of marketing wheat. You could either sell through the wheat board or put your grain on the open market. That was the policy until 1943 when the wheat board became the sole agency for the marketing of wheat.

During the war years and up to October 21, 1947, the price of coarse grains was fixed, and it was not very high. Then the federal government removed the ceiling on coarse grains, at a time when probably two-thirds of the crop already had been disposed of by the prairie farmers. I do not know how much the farmers lost in that transaction, but it was a great deal of money, which somebody else made. The farm organizations and others complained bitterly about that action by the government, and the upshot was that the government finally gave the farmers compensation to the extent of five cents a bushel on oats and eleven cents a bushel on barley, which compensation I understand cost the federal government approximately $4 million. But I still think the farmers lost more than that.

Mr. Gardiner: The farmers did not lose anything.

Mr. Bryce: Just wait, now. The farmer lost far more than $4 million.

Mr. Gardiner: He got 18 cents on his oats and 27 cents on his barley.

Mr. Bryce: Let me finish. Don't get me away on another tack or the first thing we know we will be back on the Liberal party. Those who were fortunate enough to belong to the wheat pools received 13 cents a bushel for oats and 16 cents a bushel for barley. A number of the line elevator companies made additional payments; but the farmers were victims of the apparent idea of the federal government that it would be a good thing to throw coarse grains back into the speculative market. Take the farmer who sold his grain to the feed houses around Winnipeg or any other large city. His first payment was also his last payment, because these feed houses claimed they worked on a day-to-day basis and had nobody to come back on.

Look at what has happened to barley. There has been a variation of approximately 41 cents in the price of barley since it went on the open market. Somebody got 41 cents more than the other fellow, and somebody got 41 cents less than he got. That is one of the things Bill No. 135 would do away with if it were proclaimed. Certainly we should have that legislation in operation; and now that the three hon. gentlemen who had most to do with it are sitting quite close together they should be able to agree on it. I refer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). Those three hon. gentlemen all had different opinions last fall. I need not go into that; I think every hon. member knows what their ideas were. The Minister of Trade and Commerce gave us the bill because we asked for it, but said he would only proclaim it if the provinces would agree. The Minister of Agriculture was not so sure about it; according to the Winnipeg Free Press he did not know whether we needed it, because he thought we had enough legislation in the province to do the job. But I am doubtful as to that.

One could not find a better example than rye—the grain, I mean. During the war it was allowed to remain on the speculative market. I have not the exact figures before me, but at one time I think it was around $4.47. Today it is a little over $1. How can any man plan his agricultural economy on a basis like that? He buys seed when the grain is over $4, and when he comes to sell his crop he finds that it has dropped by at least $2.13. The speculative market system has been advertised all over the prairie provinces in the newspapers and by radio. It has been said that such a system provides farmers with the most efficient and economical means of selling their grain. The chief complaint of the farmers in regard to the speculative system of marketing is its insecurity. That system provides protection for the elevator companies, the flour mills, the exporters, the bakers and so on, but it provides no price security for the man at the bottom, the man who grows the grain. The farmer is only asking for security in the marketing of his products. He is only asking that farmers be on the same basis as carpenters, plumbers, electricians and so on, who make arrangements about their wages for a year or two in advance.

As we travel through the country we find that the greatest opponents of Bill No. 135 are people who do no farming at all. Surely it should be left to the farmers to settle this thing for themselves. Today we have groups advocating that we should retain the wheat board but that it should not be compulsory, and that we should have the speculative market along with it so the farmer might maintain his independence. Such a system would only benefit the speculative market. If a majority of the farmers want this act then the majority should rule, just as the majority rules in all other organizations such as the bar association, the doctors' union and many others. Democracy works there; it should work for the farmer, too. I have a clipping here from one of the western newspapers dealing with coarse grains, as the matter was considered by the western agricultural conference at Saskatoon. It says:

> Without an opposing vote the conference endorsed the following resolution on coarse grains: "that a joint effort be made to enable the Canadian wheat board to be the sole marketing agency for coarse grains and that any legislation giving the Canadian wheat board the same exclusive powers over the marketing of other grains as it now exercises over wheat, should be based on the principle that the Canadian wheat board should be an agency operating in the interests of grain producers, with a duty at all times to sell grain for the best available price whether in export or domestic markets, and should not be used as an instrument of government policy to limit domestic prices.

I am sure it is good news that everyone has agreed on that, and I hope the three ministers who could not agree last year will agree now and have this act proclaimed, because if you do not proclaim it you are going to be in trouble. It is most unfortunate that this bill was not proclaimed last year. I do not know who is to blame, because there seem to be faults on all sides. The Minister of Trade and Commerce brought in a bill demanding that we have complementary legislation from the provinces. The premier of the province of Manitoba told us there was no need for it, and the law officers of his government told us it was not necessary. According to the Winnipeg Free Press, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said the provinces could handle it under their natural products marketing acts.

Mr. Gardiner: You are not suggesting the Winnipeg Free Press speaks for me, are you?

Mr. Bryce: I know the Winnipeg Free Press has blamed the minister for a lot of things, but I am believing it this time. I do not think this would work without dominion legislation. I remember that, when the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett brought in the dominion Natural Products Marketing Act, he failed to get the enabling legislation from the provinces. The act was challenged and declared ultra vires. It is no doubt for this reason the officers of the crown consider enabling legislation necessary.

The premier of Manitoba wanted to do everything the farmer wanted him to do, but he had to consider his own welfare first; so he picked holes in Bill 135, as only a lawyer could. No doubt he sought to satisfy his coalition government, but he deprived the farmer of the benefits that Bill 135 would have given him. It is a well-known fact that the coalition government in Manitoba contains many members who detest the sight of Bill 135 and have openly sworn that it will never be proclaimed if they can help it. No doubt that had an effect on the arguments the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) put forward. Now that he is rid of that entanglement, I suppose he can be a good Liberal again. Perhaps he can approach the subject with an open mind without offending the gentlemen in his former coalition government. I hope the government will make sure that this legislation is in operation before the next crop is harvested. I would suggest that neither rye nor flax be left outside its sphere of operation. The day has come when no farm produce should be sold on a speculative market. I have urged that in the past, and I shall continue to do so until farm products are no longer objects for speculators and profit seekers to play with, but are put into the channels of consumption in the most efficient and economical manner to the benefit of both producers and consumers.

I should like to say a word to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) about the income tax. With the present high cost of living, I consider the exemptions are too low and something should be done about them. I have my old grievance. There should be some other basis for levying income tax upon farmers. The farmer works as a unit. If he has boys old enough he can charge their wages against his income tax. There are on the farm, however, many young people who do a man's work long before they reach the age of sixteen. Unfortunately, although the farmer works as a unit he is taxed as an individual. This unfair method of taxation reflects itself in the production of cream, in the production of eggs and in the production of hogs. Perhaps "unfair" is not the right word, but there is something unfair about it. When the income tax inspectors came around in Manitoba they assessed the farmer's income. The farmer said, "If I had not sold these hogs or bothered milking these cows, I would not have had to pay any income tax".

When I consulted the Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley about this matter he told me that, while my argument might be sound enough, if he did that for the farmer he would have to do it for the small storekeeper who claims that his wife too works. If the small storekeeper's wife works, he is entitled to an exemption just as the farmer is for his wife. This should not be offered as a reason why the farmer's whole unit should be taxed and one man be forced then to pay that tax. I have exhausted my time, but I hope the minister will read these remarks and give some consideration to them. At another time I will continue what I have to say.

(Translation):

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to extend my congratulations to the mover of the address in reply, the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown). I do not need to praise him, for many have done so before me. Long before making this speech he had been known as a worthy member of parliament who is a credit to his beautiful constituency and to his party.

I am also pleased to join those who have already praised the seconder of the address, the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Demers). May I say to him that his first appearance in this house has been most auspicious because of his wisdom and his integrity. His constituents are rightfully proud of him. He may be assured that we, the Liberals, are pleased with this lucky choice they have made.

I also wish to offer public thanks to Divine Providence for placing at the helm of the Liberal party, for the last half century, such great statesmen as the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. Both have been recognized as very great men not only in this country but throughout the world. We are today as privileged as we were before in having the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent as prime minister of Canada, as he has shown himself to be worthy of his predecessors. What has happened since the opening of this session indicates that he will perhaps surpass them, if that were humanly possible. On behalf of the electors of Russell whom I have the honour of representing, I wish to tender him my most sincere congratulations on his speeches, so full of wisdom and firmness, and worthy of the greatest men this country has ever had the honour of producing.

I would not forgive myself if I failed to offer my congratulations also to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), on the splendid speech he delivered before the Canadian Board of Trade in London. It was necessary that they should be told these truths there, in view of the need for mutual understanding between the two countries. We have always been grateful to the nations who have wished us well, but they should not forget our benefactions.

I therefore ask the Minister of Agriculture to believe that all Canadians appreciate the immense benefits he has brought and will continue to bring to this country.

I also wish to thank all the ministers of the crown for the beneficent administration they have given the country. We must thank Providence for having so guided and protected them, for never has Canada known such prosperity.

I therefore ask the Minister of Agriculture whether it would be possible to give a subsidy of 5 cents a pound on butter and 2 cents a quart on milk, provided the provinces contribute an equal amount, even if some petty politicians accuse us of assailing their autonomy. Low income earners could thus obtain a product which is worth twice as much, so far as flavour, quality and usefulness is concerned, as this substitute called oleomargarine or any other name. We could also pass another law, should the provinces decline to do so, requiring that this product be coloured, chocolate or otherwise, to prevent the unscrupulous from mixing this product with butter, in which case the swindled consumer might be led to believe there is not much difference between this mixture called "butter and oleomargarine" and genuine butter.

Moreover, such subsidy on butter and milk would reduce the sale price, increase the consumption of a wholesome and necessary product and allow farmers to produce more of it. I should also like the government, if this entailed no financial difficulty, to reduce the sales tax on working clothes used by our labourers and our farmers, because after all they are those who earn their money the hardest way.

Mr. Speaker, nothing has been funnier to me, since I have had the honour of sitting in this house, than the requests of all kinds made by the hon. members of the opposition, and even by members on this side, asking for bridges, wharves, railways, bonuses, subsidies, pensions, even requesting that rivers be dug or filled, etc., etc., and thousands of the requests which, according to certain experts, would cost the government at least 4 to 5 billion dollars a year. In addition, most of those members ask the government to reduce taxes to a point that would leave us less than a billion dollars of revenue. There is even a certain group of the Social Credit party who want to abolish all taxes, which means that we would be deprived completely of revenue.

However, I am particularly critical of the official opposition. During the war they urged the government to spend twice as much as it did. Those same people now wish to have low taxes and criticize the government's policy.

Who will refund Canada's debt and pay the interest and at the same time provide enough money to run this country and carry out the social legislation which we want to extend?

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, because of the present prosperous conditions of our country and our increasing revenue, I believe it would be possible this year for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to exempt from income tax single persons earning between $1,000 and $1,200. In the case of people with one dependent, the exemption should be between $2,000 and $2,500. In addition, the allowance should be increased by $100 for each child.

I regret that I am unable to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) as I should like to. All I can do is to commend him on the enlightened pre-election campaign he conducted in Ontario. He heaped pledge upon pledge up and down the province, promising either the sun or the moon, according to the section he was dealing with. Banking on victory, he hoped this would help him be chosen leader of the opposition in Ottawa.

I thoroughly enjoyed hearing him criticize the paragraph of the speech from the throne which mentions the appointment of a royal commission. His words are reported on page 46 of Hansard for January 28. Of course, the leader of the opposition knows all about royal commissions since, during his short term of office as premier of Ontario, he appointed eleven. They are the royal commissions on: 1. Milk; 2. Forestry; 3. Public Halls; 4. Mining; 5. Investigation of the Gestapo charges on the C.C.F.; 6. Agricultural Committee of Inquiry; 7. New Departments; 8. Reform Institution; 9. Planning and Development; 10. Travel and Publicity; 11. Education. The royal commission on separate schools which has been sitting for over four years now and which has cost the province more than $100,000 to date served no other purpose than to refuse several school boards a permit to establish a separate school. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the royal commission on schools was denying, throughout the province, the rights of school boards, where Catholics of all racial origins but especially French-Canadians, are represented in a proportion of from 72 to 99 per cent, and that at a time when he was minister of education and prime minister of the province. Yet he is pleased to say in this house that the French Canadian ridings voted for the Conservatives 6 to 7, although 4 to 6 would be a truer proportion.

No, Mr. Speaker, the French Canadians, by a wide majority, did not vote for the member for Carleton (Mr. Drew) or for his Tory party. We, the French Canadians of Ontario, also have our motto; it is the same as that of the province of Quebec, "I remember". To be sure, we well remember regulation XVII, which was passed by the same Tory clique, supported by whatever influence the leader of the official opposition in this house had at that time, regulation XVII which deprived the French Canadians of the right to teach their mother tongue and their religion in their schools.

Mr. Gagnon: How did they vote?

Mr. Gour (Russell): The French Canadians of that day would have never accepted, under any circumstances, a regulation of that kind, and I am one of them. Never will French Canadians accept such iniquitous school laws.

Mr. Gagnon: Whom did they vote for? Out with it.

Mr. Gour (Russell): No, French Canadians did not vote Conservative because they believed in the promises of the then Prime Minister, apart from a small number of gullible partisans, like the one who is interrupting just now, who remained staunch Conservatives come what may. Many knew that he would quit the provincial field in order to escape his promises and that his ambition was to be the eternal leader of the opposition in Ottawa, as long as the other opposition parties did not deprive him of this rank.

It is not because of grants to our institutions, since, to be fair, they deserve twice as much. That has had but little influence. The real reason was the royal commission on education suspended over our schools like the sword of Damocles. I warn the Ontario Progressive Conservatives that if the settlement of the separate school problem is not what it should be, they cannot expect to have one single member re-elected in French-Canadian constituencies for centuries to come.

The people reasoned thus: "While doing it reluctantly, we are going to vote for the Tories this time and if they remain in power—which is what unfortunately did happen—the government will have no excuse to give for maintaining the unfair laws which affect the separate schools. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Ontario separate schools are still treated with rank injustice, because under the law no part of the taxes paid by public utilities and the like can be given to the separate schools. On the other hand, the electors reflected that in the case of a Liberal victory they would not have to worry because even though they did not return a single Liberal member they would still be treated fairly inasmuch as the Liberals have always dealt equitably with all people when they were in power. They did respect all races in the province, as regards language and creed, and their policy was to promote in this country unity, prosperity and freedom from agitation.

No, let me say to the hon. member for Carleton that the Ontario French Canadians remember the statements he made on the occasion of a by-election in Hastings East, when he said in a speech that the French Canadians were a vanquished race. They recall the statements he made in London, England, his comments on family allowances and the words he has uttered as a public man against the French Canadians and which have been quoted in this house, although others were not. A good many people believe that if a French Canadian was given a portfolio in the Ontario cabinet—one of the minor portfolios—it is because he—I mean my good friend the provincial member for Prescott—has accepted to make over the radio and to the newspapers this naive and unconsidered statement that the leader of the official opposition was the saviour and protector of the four million French Canadians of this country.

I feel sorry for my good friend that he was not more fortunate because according to what I read in the newspapers, he has been ridiculed and quite justifiably. The newspapermen who criticized him have been approved by 99 per cent of the French Canadians of the counties of Prescott and Russell and of all the province of Ontario. I can understand that it was mainly to supply electoral matter to the Conservative leader of the province of Quebec. The statement was used over the radio and in the newspapers, because such leaders have remained Tories despite all the insults leveled against the province of Quebec by the leader of the official opposition. I shall mention only one, which dates back to the 1944 provincial election.

I therefore considered it my duty, Mr. Speaker, that these statements be made in the house. I challenge the leader of the opposition to repeat the suggestions he made in his speech to the house on February 4, to the effect that we, French Canadians, were playing a dangerous game in recalling to the people these idle statements he made at the time for political motives. But today, anxious to secure the support of the province of Quebec, he does not want those statements recalled, hoping that the Canadian people might forget.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister and his cabinet to appoint during this session a diplomatic representative to the Vatican.

I also feel it would now be advisable to have a national flag. I have two designs here that would be very acceptable to the people I have the honour to represent and, I am sure, throughout Canada. I was happy to find it suggested in the throne speech that we no longer appeal to the privy council in Great Britain but, instead, transfer to the Supreme Court of Canada the functions exercised by that body. It is also to be hoped that where rights pertaining to provincial autonomy or rights involving any particular province are at stake, such a province will appoint half of the judges sitting on the case.

I urge and request that during this session, if at all possible, legislation be enacted to replace His Majesty the King as governor general of Canada by a Canadian incumbent. In the person of the former Prime Minister of Canada, now member for Glengarry (Mr. King) we have a man best suited for this outstanding position.

(Text):

Mr. C. C. I. Merritt (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, in this want of confidence debate we have been discussing three points: first, the failure of the government to reconvene a dominion-provincial conference and bring about agreement with the provinces on the division of their various tax fields and responsibilities; second, the continued bureaucratic control that this government is exercising over production and trade in Canada; and third, the continued crippling rates of taxation which they are leveling on the people of Canada.

It is not going to be my purpose to depart far from that pattern. Those are the important points; those are the reasons why the Canadian people have no longer confidence in this government. Those are the principal reasons and they are important ones. My purpose in this debate, Mr. Speaker, will be to draw to your attention, by way of illustration, one practical example which exists now in British Columbia of what happens when a government pursues the kind of policies which they have been following in the past few years. I refer of course to our very serious unemployment situation and which is particularly centred in the Vancouver area. I am not going to give many figures to the house. I believe any figures one would give would be uncertain; but in the last issue of the Financial Post it is stated that in January there were 41,500 claims for unemployment insurance in British Columbia. The figures of unemployed in the province are much greater than that because a very large number of people there do not come under unemployment insurance and would have no occasion to make claims. It is likely that in the Vancouver area alone there are over 50,000 people out of work. Because that is close to 10 per cent of the population of that area we have a very serious situation indeed.

I am quite surprised that although the Vancouver members have questioned the government on the situation in British Columbia on several occasions, and now more than a week ago, we have had no statement from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as to what is to be done to meet the situation. I have a strong suspicion that they have no ideas of what they are going to do, and they are just hoping that the unemployment will blow over in course of time. However, that is the situation.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that in a practical and personal way this raises the failure of the government to bring about an agreement between the provinces and itself so as to take care of these fields of responsibilities which are not at present clearly and properly allotted between the jurisdiction of this parliament and the jurisdiction of the provinces. I say it raises it directly and personally because it is not simply a political issue as hon. members on the government side of the house seem to try to make it this session. In this matter of unemployment, the failure to provide for one class of the unemployed in British Columbia comes right home to many individuals living in that province.

The situation there, of course, is that there are three classes affected by this unemployment. First of all, there are the unemployables, who are the responsibility of the city and province and who, I should imagine, are being taken care of under the usual provisions of the city and province in that regard.

Secondly, there are those who are in insured occupations, and who therefore draw unemployment insurance. So far as that kind of assistance is concerned, they are properly taken care of.

But there is a third class of which I wish to speak, the class known as the employable unemployed. For that class no authority takes any responsibility. The provinces have long contended that the employable unemployed are a responsibility of this government, which has its unemployment insurance set-up, and its employment service. They have held for a large number of years that this is the jurisdiction which should look after that group. Naturally the provinces have not provided funds or machinery to take care of that class of persons.

The whole responsibility for the employable unemployed in Vancouver at this time is falling upon the red feather organizations, those groups of private social security organizations which function together under the sign of the red feather. But the strain of caring for the employable unemployed in Vancouver at this time is much too much for that authority to look after. Not only are their financial resources quite inadequate for the purpose, but a large number of those who are unemployed in Vancouver are not residents of Vancouver, nor are they residents of British Columbia. A large number of them have come to the coast from points east of the Rockies.

A survey taken by the red feather organization a year ago—I have not the figure for this year—showed that about 50 per cent of the people being taken care of in the seasonal unemployment crisis a year ago were from outside British Columbia. It is not proper that a municipal organization, or a private organization drawing its resources from within a municipality, should be called upon to look after a serious unemployment situation which affects a large number of people who do not live within the borders of that municipality.

Yet this very class for whom, as I have pointed out, no government authority accepts any responsibility—and I am referring of course to the employable unemployed—is the class for which in the green book proposals of 1945 the dominion government undertook to care. The proposals in that regard are to be found at page 44 of the green book, at which point it is indicated that the dominion government, in addition to unemployment insurance, would undertake to provide unemployment assistance in respect of the class about whom I am talking, up to 85 per cent of the rates paid for unemployment insurance. It seems to me too bad that, where that responsibility was recognized and virtually accepted in 1945, we should find in 1949 a large number of Canadians who are in need of this assistance but who are being done out of it. They are done out of it because this government has not had the will to bring about a dominion-provincial agreement which would have settled not only matters of taxation, but also this vital question of care of the unemployed, which affects personally so many people.

I was little short of amazed when in this debate, as reported at page 86 of Hansard, I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) say that an attempt to reach a dominion-provincial agreement was a waste of his time. I do not think that remark will be well received or appreciated either by those people who are now in want in British Columbia, or by those who are giving their money and their time on an entirely voluntary basis in an attempt to do something for people who have not resources.

I am sure those people do not feel they are wasting their time in trying to carry out a public service; and I believe they will be greatly disappointed that the Prime Minister should have made use of those words. The real reason, of course, why the Prime Minister would find a further attempt to bring about an agreement a waste of time is that he knows that in 1945 and 1946 the government was wrong, and that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) was right in the stand he took at the time at the conference. The Prime Minister and members of his government know that, were a conference reconvened, the agreement which would come out of it would be one along the lines proposed by the leader of the opposition. This would be a tremendous political defeat for the government. That is the reason they do not reconvene the conference and bring it to a satisfactory conclusion.

I say, in short, that the government has no will for agreement. We in this party have a will for agreement—we have a will for agreement with the provinces which will make it possible for the provinces and municipalities to discharge their responsibilities in their proper fields. And not the least of these responsibilities which require assumption by someone is the one to which I have been making reference, namely, the caring for the employable unemployed.

If the government does not see fit, as apparently it does not, to reconvene the conference, I say that at least it should carry out the responsibility it was willing to undertake in 1945 and provide unemployment assistance for those who do not qualify for unemployment insurance.

I want to say further that this is not an unexpected situation. This year conditions in Vancouver are much worse because of the bad weather we have been experiencing, but every year we have a seasonal unemployment problem. Every year a large number of people are out of work at this time in the province, and they come into Vancouver. The problem I have been discussing was brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) last year. I brought it to his attention myself in connection with the burden it throws upon the red feather organizations. Apparently nothing whatever has been done about it.

I do not think that when the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) was in Vancouver the other day he showed a proper realization of this problem. He is reported in the Province as having suggested as cures for the unemployment situation there such things as the speeding up of shipbuilding, the building of some naval craft in Vancouver, the building of a highway to the airport, and a good home-building program. None of these projects can be put under way in time to take care of the kind of problem that we are facing now. The government should have known that it was coming. If they wanted to carry out such measures they should have laid their plans months and months ago. Then they would be useful now. But this talk is just to put the matter off and to avoid responsibility.

Everything I have said so far has been in reference to the provision of unemployment assistance. I have illustrated how, in failing to bring about a dominion-provincial agreement, the government is causing difficulties to a large number of the Canadian people. I want to turn now to other points of criticism that have been aimed at the government during this debate. I want to illustrate by this same unemployment situation how their taxation policy, and their interference with the ordinary flow of production and trade in Canada, are stultifying the growth of industry, particularly in British Columbia, and are leading to the very serious pockets of unemployment that we now see appearing.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the economy of British Columbia is based principally upon development of our natural resources. You have heard many times that the chief of those are lumber, fish, fruit, and products of our mines. From our very rich resources we produce a great amount of wealth each year. We market a large amount of that wealth through the port of Vancouver to export markets overseas. We have had our troubles finding markets in the past, but since the Ottawa agreements of 1932 markets have been pretty well assured for our main exports of natural products in the British commonwealth countries, and particularly in Great Britain.

As a result of assured markets we have been able to build up our industry and to establish it on a pretty firm basis. I think all the people who are engaged in active industry in the province of British Columbia, and indeed all the people of British Columbia, saw at the end of the war that our opportunity for expansion, development, and diversification of our industry was just beginning. They saw that we had one of the least tapped reserves of valuable natural resources in the world, and they were prepared to go all-out and take advantage of their opportunity to expand our production and to diversify it by branching off into secondary industry, all-year-round industry, which would do a great deal to prevent these ebbs and flows of employment.

I think these people know—and they are very active people—that the best way to get rid of unemployment is not through assistance by the government but rather through the production of new opportunities for employment by private industry. They were quite ready and able to go out and, by establishing new sources of production, make available new jobs to take care of a large number of people who wanted to go and live on the coast and who have been coming there steadily since the end of the war.

In order that the people active in industry in British Columbia might carry out that expansion they needed three things. First of all they needed very large amounts of new capital from outside the province. In order to establish their new industries they needed new people to work in them, to produce the wealth and to earn the rewards of that production. Finally they needed assured markets so that increased production of wealth would be worth while. All these ideas were very important to the people of Vancouver, and particularly to the people of my constituency. The city of Vancouver, which is growing apace, and now is approaching the half-million mark in the case of greater Vancouver, is dependent for its prosperity upon the continued flow of our natural resources from our rich province into the markets of the world. The constituency of Vancouver-Burrard, which I have the honour to represent, consists primarily of a residential area in which live a very large number of people who are engaged in the industries and services of Vancouver based upon export markets. It includes also a considerable number of retail stores which provide services for the people of the city and in so doing earn a livelihood for their proprietors. At the same time there are in my constituency some sawmills and a large number of machine shops and other establishments which service the natural products industries of the province.

You will therefore see, Mr. Speaker, that the success of our industrial leaders in expanding production in the province will mean very much to the people of my riding. It is from the continuous flow of wealth from our resources that they make their livelihood, and unless that flow of wealth is kept up and increased there is no power on earth, and particularly no government power, that can keep those people from distress. With that opportunity and with such a large number of willing people available to go out and take advantage of the opportunity and increase the production of wealth, one would have expected government policies to be of some assistance. But as a matter of fact the fiscal policies pursued by this government since the end of the war have been a direct, centralist, bureaucratic interference with the aspirations of the people of whom I have been speaking. The policies put forward principally by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), whom I am glad to see in the house at the moment, in almost every case have been a drag upon the initiative and enterprise of the leaders of industry in British Columbia.

Mr. Abbott: With the national income at an all-time high.

Mr. Merritt: These policies, with which the minister seems so satisfied, are not an attempt at expansion but an attempt only to maintain the status quo. They consist principally of the Foreign Exchange Control Act, the import and export restrictions, and of course the minister's budget decisions which have amounted to almost confiscatory taxation upon the people. The policies he is following—whether he knows no others I cannot imagine—are precisely those a socialist government would follow.

Mr. Abbott: I would not know anything about that.

Mr. Merritt: It is quite possible the minister does not know anything about that, but the people of British Columbia know quite a good deal about it, because they are very much exercised over this whole question of socialism. At the moment the opposition in the British Columbia house is socialist, and it is doing in a major key exactly what the Minister of Finance is doing.

Mr. Abbott: I did not think they were as good as that.

Mr. Merritt: The socialists in British Columbia are breathing very heavily down the neck of anyone who is thinking of investing capital in the province, doing everything they can to drive out capital and prevent expansion, and everything possible to set back the progress of British Columbia.

Mr. Archibald: What about the three per per cent sales tax put on by the Tories?

Mr. Merritt: Well, you know, there is probably a direct connection between that three per cent sales tax and the attitude of this government with respect to dominion-provincial relations.

Mr. Knowles: You mean the Liberals are running that coalition out there?

Mr. Merritt: In respect of dominion-provincial relations that could be possible. But I want to get back to the question of the fiscal policies of this government, because fortunately at the present time what my friends to the left would do to British Columbia is only a threat, while what the Minister of Finance is doing to my province is a fact, and I am more interested in the fact than in the threat.

I want to take these three requirements for progress in British Columbia—capital, people and markets—and show by one or two illustrations how this government is holding back that progress and hurting rather than helping us in our endeavour to diversify and expand our industry and thereby to get rid of the serious pocket of unemployment we are experiencing now. First I will take capital. Everyone knows you cannot build up a new and rich area without outside capital. It is quite impossible to expand the economy of British Columbia as we would like to see it expand unless we can get outside capital.

Mr. Abbott: Ontario is the place to go.

Mr. Merritt: The minister says Ontario is the place to go.

Mr. Graydon: Apparently you will have to get out of Quebec.

Mr. Abbott: I am all right in Quebec.

Mr. Knowles: Keep Ontario strong.

Mr. Abbott: That is the thing.

Mr. Merritt: For a moment I want to refer to what an outside authority has to say as to the effect of the minister's foreign exchange control upon the expansion of British Columbia. I have here a clipping from the Vancouver News-Herald of some time last year, and I do not believe the present situation will have changed. It refers to a visit to British Columbia by Francis Adams Truslow, president of the New York curb exchange. He gave an interview to this newspaper, in the course of which he said that after having studied the situation in British Columbia he was satisfied there were no greater opportunities for risk capital in all the world. I quote from this clipping:

> Canada, however, he found, had set up man-made barriers against the flow of capital from U.S.A. . . .

> Canada requires vast amounts of risk capital, but its regulations scare capital away . . . He did not suggest that it would be possible for Canada to remove all restrictions at once, but it was vital that this should be the objective, because, he said, "You can't expect capital to walk into a trap."

That is the opinion of a very good authority on the Foreign Exchange Control Act of the Minister of Finance. He calls it a trap.

Mr. Abbott: Did he refer to the Foreign Exchange Control Act?

Mr. Merritt: He refers to the fiscal policy of the government and says it is a trap into which capital would be too wise to put its foot.

I should like to say a word about the other possible sources of capital that are available for expansion, one of which is savings. In British Columbia there is a large number of small businesses that have been built up over the years and which rely for their expansion capital on the savings of the proprietor. You know, Mr. Speaker, that all through the war the standard profits for this type of business under the Excess Profits Tax Act were set unusually low. This meant that expansion capital could not be obtained from that source. You know, too, how the jewelry tax, the soft drinks tax and all these other unusual taxes were levied during the war for the sole purpose of slowing down the particular businesses to which those taxes applied. Probably that was a very good thing for the war effort, but it is a very bad thing for the prosperity of the people today. They cannot increase their savings. The same remarks apply to the general rates of income tax which have the effect of making it difficult to acquire capital for expansion. By reason of these two measures, the restrictions upon capital coming into this country and the rates of taxation imposed by the government, the opportunity for expansion in our province is being held back.

Let me turn, sir, to the second requirement we have in British Columbia, and that is people. We have experienced a considerable influx of people in the past few years. Our population is still not large enough to do all the things we would like to do. How in the world are we going to handle a larger number of people and do the things we want to do, while the government is unable to do more than it has been doing about housing? In a newspaper report dated January 29 of this year, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, who is responsible for housing, is quoted as saying that he hoped 100,000 houses would be built in Canada in 1949. Then he said this:

> If we had 100,000 additional housing units available right now, there would be occupants for every one of them.

If during the course of the next year all the minister hopes to do is provide 100,000 houses which could be used right now, what chance is there for the expansion of our population in the next few years? If we are to be prosperous economically, if we are to be secure from the point of view of national defence, then we should expand our population. It is not sufficient for the government to say how difficult it is to build houses and to be satisfied with increases such as we have seen over the past few years, from 60,000 units to 70,000, to 80,000 and now to a target of 100,000 units. Broadly speaking, there is something wrong with the whole manner in which this government is conducting the economic affairs of this country. If after four years of trying to make provision for a very much greater quantity of housing than will simply meet our needs our building trades cannot meet those requirements, then something should be done.

I see my time has expired, but I should like to refer to a third requirement of which I spoke, and that is markets. I assure you I shall not be more than a moment. I have a report from the Pacific lumber inspection bureau of Seattle which points out that the water-borne shipments of lumber from British Columbia declined 24·1 per cent in 1948 as compared with the year before. From this you will see that this government is losing those markets which are important to British Columbia. Nothing is being done to restore them.

I did intend, Mr. Speaker, to expand on the question of markets, but since my time has expired I shall bring my remarks to a close. I simply want to say this, that if by these policies—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member would permit me, since he has exhausted his time, I would ask the house whether he has unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Merritt: I thank the house for its courtesy.

Mr. Abbott: Solve this question of markets while you are at it.

Mr. Merritt: Since the minister and his colleagues are so obviously unable to do so, perhaps I might have a try at it. I have referred to the fact that the water-borne shipments of lumber from British Columbia have declined 24·1 per cent over the last year. This is not a matter about which anyone who has lived in British Columbia could be happy. We have had experience before in trying to market our lumber in the United States, and it has not been a happy experience. We are very properly alarmed at the present trend in the commonwealth countries, particularly Great Britain, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand, which have always been our best markets for lumber. These markets have been shut off because of the dollar shortage.

In British Columbia we do not like the way this government has thrown away our empire preferences. In the Geneva trade agreements of last year the government was very generous with these preferences. It gave away half the preference on lumber, half the preference on fish and the whole of our preference on apples. We do not like the cavalier fashion in which that was done. No matter what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) may have said the other night about the Ottawa agreements, in British Columbia we know that they were the salvation of our economy. We know that they have been the background and the basis for our economy every year since 1932. We particularly do not like the declaration of the right hon. the Minister of Agriculture the other night against the whole principle of empire preferences. We do not like the manner in which the government has handled either the freight rate policy or the question of the trans-Canada highway because those are two matters which vitally affect our possibilities of markets. If we are not to have these overseas markets, upon which we have principally relied, then we should like to have a better entry into the home markets.

I was greatly disappointed that, despite the promises made by the ministers in the Vancouver Centre by-election of last year, the government has not seen fit to deal with the mountain differential as a question of government policy rather than as a question which will be determined simply by the board of transport commissioners. The differential should have been taken off in order that we might have some alternative market in place of the markets overseas which the government seems quite content to allow to be given away.

In my view it is the home market to which Canadian industry should be turning now. The home market in Canada, in this difficult world, will be our surest and most secure market. Anything the government can do to build up that home market will be well done; and where they fail to build it up and make it possible for us to sell a greater amount of our produce within our own borders, they will be doing our country and our people great harm. I believe that Canada's new preferential trade policy should be one of preference for people. The minister wanted to know if I could suggest to him some way whereby he might have other markets for the ones he is allowing to slip away. I am suggesting to him that if he must maintain—and I do not think he must—all the socialist policies which he is now pursuing, and—

Mr. Abbott: Which ones would the hon. member discontinue?

Mr. Merritt: —if he must try to put an iron curtain around this country to keep capital out—

Mr. Abbott: No answer.

Mr. Merritt: —and prevent us from exporting our goods to our usual markets, then I suggest to him that he should seriously consider bringing people here so that our industries can sell to the people within our own borders.

Mr. Abbott: Would my hon. friend allow a question?

Mr. Merritt: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Abbott: To which markets does my hon. friend suggest that government policy is preventing us from exporting our products?

Mr. Merritt: The markets of the whole sterling area.

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend will allow another question, I would ask him this. In what respect is government policy preventing these exports to the sterling area?

Mr. Merritt: It is government policy, as the minister well knows—

Mr. Abbott: I am just asking for information.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Merritt: —because he is the chief one who expresses these policies in this house, although the policies probably are not made by him—

Mr. Abbott: I asked a simple question. It is an easy one to answer, if my hon. friend knows the answer; but I do not think he does.

Mr. Drew: The minister does not.

Mr. Abbott: I do know the answer, but my hon. friend does not. That is just the difference between us.

Mr. Drew: The minister does what he is told.

Mr. Abbott: I do not do what I am told, but my hon. friend does do what he is told.

An hon. Member: Give him a chance to answer.

Mr. Abbott: I should like to know the answer.

Mr. Merritt: The minister is talking so much that I cannot get a chance.

[Mr. Merritt.]

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member is not answering the question. He is trying to skate around it. I should just like to know the answer.

Mr. Merritt: As I understand it, it is government policy to maintain in the world, in respect of Canada's dollar and in respect of the currencies of all other countries, a rate of exchange which does not represent the terms of trade between the countries.

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Merritt: I do not want the minister to interrupt me again.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member is getting extra time. I will not, however, ask the question.

Mr. Merritt: The minister may ask another question when I finish my answer. It is government policy to keep that rigid exchange rate in existence, no matter what happens to the flow of goods between countries.

Mr. Abbott: Would my hon. friend now allow a question?

Mr. Merritt: Most certainly, yes.

Mr. Abbott: Does my hon. friend think that depreciation of the Canadian exchange rate would facilitate the import of products from sterling areas to Canada?

Mr. Merritt: I think that by allowing the Canadian dollar to find its true level—

Mr. Abbott: I asked if the hon. member thinks that by depreciating the Canadian dollar—

Mr. Green: Let the hon. member answer the question.

Mr. Abbott: All right. I put to the hon. member an easy question to answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: It is half past ten.

Mr. Merritt: I think that if the Canadian government would get out of its head—

An hon. Member: It is out of its head now.

Mr. Abbott: Suppose the hon. member try to answer the question, and never mind these generalities.

Mr. Merritt: If the minister tomorrow, when he is not so talkative and when he has some time in which to give the matter some thought, will read the answers I have given, I think he may understand them better.

Mr. Abbott: I have asked a few short questions, and my hon. friend has been extremely verbose in refraining from answering them.

Mr. Knowles: Order for return.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, order for return; I think that is right.

An hon. Member: Tabled herewith.

Mr. Abbott: No, not tabled herewith.

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, next sitting of the house.

Mr. Merritt: If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will allow me to go on and try to answer his questions, I will do so.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend may have a hard time in doing it, but I will allow him to go on.

Mr. Merritt: I do not think that I shall have such a hard time.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Merritt: Surely, Mr. Speaker, when we see country after country putting on import restrictions—South Africa is the most recent one, whose restrictions greatly affect us in British Columbia—it must be plain that the cause of these restrictions on goods is the rigid exchange rate maintained by the countries which signed the Bretton Woods agreement. What I am suggesting to the minister is that, as a matter of government policy, this country should let its own currency find its proper level.

Mr. Abbott: What level is that?

Mr. Merritt: And that it should bring its influence to bear upon the other countries which are signatories to that agreement, with a view to their doing the same thing, so that we may bring about a proper relationship between our rates of exchange and our terms of trade and those of the countries of the world, and get back to some kind of normal flow of trade.

Mr. Abbott: Would my hon. friend allow a question?

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Abbott: Just one more question.

Mr. Merritt: One more when I have finished.

Mr. Abbott: One more, and I will not ask anything further.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member getting time and a half on this, as overtime?

Mr. Abbott: Just one more question; will my hon. friend allow it?

Mr. Merritt: Yes.

Mr. Abbott: Has he read the Bretton Woods agreement?

Mr. Merritt: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I read the Bretton Woods agreement. I read it in 1945 when my hon. friends of the Social Credit party were putting on quite a filibuster against it. I will tell the Minister of Finance the clause in the Bretton Woods agreement which I liked best of all when I read it, after listening to the speeches of my hon. friends of the Social Credit party. It was the clause which said that any country could withdraw from the Bretton Woods agreement without any lengthy notice.

Mr. Abbott: I should like to ask another question but I said I would not. Does my hon. friend suggest that we should withdraw from the Bretton Woods agreement? I should not ask the question.

Mr. Merritt: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is the wish of the hon. member who is to follow me to start his speech at this late hour; therefore perhaps I might say one word and then conclude. To get back to what I had intended to say when the Minister of Finance interrupted me, and in conclusion, I wish to say to him that in British Columbia we believe that we have a tremendous opportunity for progress and prosperity if we can attract to our province large amounts of outside capital to expand our industry, and of course a large number of new people to work in that production and to provide the additional market for our goods. I believe that people and capital alike, because capital is only savings in the hands of the people, are attracted by freedom, and not by restriction. No matter how proud the government and the Minister of Finance may be of his present restrictive policy—

Mr. Abbott: He hates it as much as the hon. member does.

Mr. Merritt: —I am sure that they will do nothing to enable us in this country to go ahead to the expanded future which we see before us under freedom. I suggest to the minister that he take seriously some of what I have said this evening. If he does, I think he will find in it the kernel of what is wrong with his policy, and some useful suggestions as to how we, when we come into power in a very short time, will set things right.

On motion of Mr. Knight the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacInnis: What is the business for Monday?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we shall continue this debate.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on February 22, 1949.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 28, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO REPORTED STATEMENT OF MR. DREW AT MCGILL UNIVERSITY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege affecting my position as leader of the government in this house.

The question of privilege arises out of a statement the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is reported in this morning's Montreal Gazette to have made at McGill university on Saturday afternoon. The statement, which is in very sweeping terms, refers to certain measures the government is seeking to introduce in this house, measures which the leader of the opposition has not yet seen but which nevertheless he condemns unseen.

There are two sentences in the reported statement which cannot be allowed to pass without an immediate challenge. They are as follows:

Make no mistake about it; we are fighting for personal and economic freedom here in Canada today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is edifying to hear this applause.

We are in a very real danger of losing that fight to the bureaucrats who accept the basic philosophy of Karl Marx no matter what political name they may adopt.

By bureaucrats the public is apt to understand the senior members of the public service and to regard that statement as an indiscriminate attack upon them. It will also no doubt be regarded as an attack on the government which is responsible—and alone responsible—for the measures brought before this house. That aspect of the matter, however, is one about which I make no complaint, because we are prepared and able to defend the government at all times, no matter what charges are leveled against us. But if the leader of the opposition has proof that deputy ministers or any other senior civil servants "accept the basic philosophy of Karl Marx", let him name the individuals and produce his proofs.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: A political speech!

Mr. Graydon: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. St. Laurent: My privilege is to be advised by reliable public servants; and if the leader of the opposition has any information which would discredit any of the senior public servants who advise the government it is my privilege, the privilege of parliament and the privilege of my country to have him name them and offer his proof.

Those of us who know our conscientious and hardworking public servants are apt to regard as absurd any such general charge. But the general public do not and cannot know the members of the public service as we do. I feel I would be failing in my duty if I did not publicly repudiate as irresponsible and unwarranted such an attack on a group of people who, by our constitutional practice, are not in a position to defend themselves unless charged individually and specifically.

In the long run I do not think our people will be much impressed by sweeping and irresponsible statements which are not backed up by the slightest bit of evidence. That is not the Canadian tradition of justice and fair play.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has invited an answer to his political speech, and I accept that invitation. If he had taken the trouble to read the speech, even as reported in the limited space given it in the press, he would have seen that I was referring to the appointment of controllers, priority officials and people who are not his senior civil servants but who under these acts have powers equal to any powers conferred by any authoritarian state in the world today.

Since the Prime Minister has challenged my remarks as ridiculous, I accept the challenge and say that the last man in Canada who should challenge me in regard to the abuse of power is the Prime Minister himself. I have not forgotten that, as Minister of Justice, the present Prime Minister laid charges against public men that had no relation to the law. He had neither the courage to proceed nor the decency to apologize.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister raised a question of privilege and the leader of the opposition may reply, but I would ask him to be kind enough to confine his remarks to the question of privilege.

Mr. Drew: I am very happy to do so. The Prime Minister has prepared a statement—it is in the hands of all the representatives of the press. It creates an impression that bears no relation to any careful reading of the speech I made on Saturday. He has challenged the evidence of the abuse of powers. I say that no man in Canada has abused power more than the present Prime Minister.

I have a particular reason for remembering that he it was who, as minister of justice, laid a charge against a man then in public office and, I repeat, he had neither the courage to proceed nor the decency to withdraw or apologize for that charge. Then, in order that his position might not be exposed, he used the power of censorship under his department to prevent the publication of a letter which would have shown indecent and improper use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police by his department while he was the minister of justice.

Mr. St. Laurent: The leader of the opposition charges that this is politics, Mr. Speaker. If it is politics to ensure the proper administration of the affairs of the country, then I admit his assertion. I make no apology for defending here the good repute of the senior servants of Canada.

Mr. Drew: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. St. Laurent: He cannot take it, but I can.

Mr. Abbott: This reminds me of Acadia university.

Mr. Garson: Or Carleton county.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to keep order. The Prime Minister has raised a question of privilege, and the leader of the opposition has answered. I was quite generous about that. He challenged the Prime Minister, and I believe it is only fair that the Prime Minister be permitted to answer the accusation.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the leader of the opposition does not venture to name any public servant, or to bring any charges against anyone. As to the charges he makes against me, I make no complaint whatever; I am prepared to meet them at any time and at all times. If the leader of the opposition thinks he can convince the Canadian public that there is a vestige of truth in what he has stated here this afternoon, he is welcome to the opportunity of doing so.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. St. Laurent: I completely and unreservedly deny the charges he has made here. An incident occurred some years ago that seemed to constitute a violation of the defence of Canada regulations. I consulted two of the most prominent lawyers of the bar of Toronto, and I followed their advice in everything that was done about that matter.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I challenged—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask hon. members on both sides of the house to abide by the rules. It is the duty of the Speaker to protect freedom of speech. The leader of the opposition should be allowed to say a word, but I suggest to him that he do not start another debate.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has taken the position that he is prepared to challenge the truth of what I have said. I shall tomorrow, therefore, lay on the table a letter written to the Prime Minister of Canada, referring to this subject, which deals fully with the Prime Minister's position in that matter.

Mr. Abbott: How about naming the bureaucrats, too?

HOUSING—ALBERTA—BOW RIVER CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Mr. Johnston:

In view of the foreclosure proceedings by the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company of Calgary, Alberta, against home owners who have houses under construction by the Bow River Construction Company, will the government see to it that these veterans and some civilians will not lose their financial equity in their property as a result of these foreclosures?

Mr. Winters: There is no contractual relationship between the purchasers of these houses and either the government or the government agency, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The foreclosure proceedings now in progress against the Bow River Construction Company and its purchasers fall into two general classes. Some actions are being taken because purchasers in possession of their properties have refused to make payments on their mortgage accounts. The second class of action consists of those taken on unfinished houses, and the actions are necessary to clear the title status so that construction may be resumed.

BOW RIVER CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Mr. Johnston:

What are the qualifications of the contractors of the Bow River Construction Company, Calgary, Alberta, as to building experience?

Mr. Winters: The Bow River Construction Company was a new company formed early in 1947. The Bow River company, therefore, as such entered its first building operations in 1947.

It is not unusual in the construction business for a number of principals with the necessary capital to form a new company.

The customary plan usually followed following the formation of a new company is for the company to arrange either to let contracts to regular building contractors for the building of their houses, or to appoint a construction superintendent to supervise the construction of the houses. Subcontracts are usually let for plumbing, heating, wiring, etc.

The Bow River company proved to the satisfaction of the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company that it had the necessary working capital to finance its building program. Individual loan approvals were granted for the various houses on the understanding that the houses would be built according to National Housing Act minimum standards of construction. It was the obligation of the Bow River Construction Company to ensure the employment of competent construction personnel to carry out its commitments under the loan approvals granted to it by the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company.

FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS AND ADMINISTRATIVE STAFFS ABROAD—LEAVE AND ALLOWANCE REGULATIONS

Mr. Fulton:

1. Under what authority were orders in council P.C. 209/2166, and P.C. 210/2166, dated May 14, 1948, passed?

2. When were these orders in council published in the Canada Gazette?

Mr. St. Laurent:

1. These minutes of treasury board set up leave and allowance regulations for foreign service officers and administrative staffs abroad.

Provision for special leave and allowances had been made in the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Trade and Commerce ever since the opening of our first foreign diplomatic mission in 1927. The minutes of treasury board referred to above were an attempt to consolidate and clarify these provisions and, in addition, to extend them to other departments having personnel abroad in order to provide for uniformity of treatment.

In so far as allowances are concerned, the governor in council, under his general executive authority, can prescribe allowances in lieu of expenses for government employees. These allowances are provided out of parliamentary votes for administrative expenses.

A certain number of the government employees in missions abroad are exempt from the provisions of the Civil Service Act. In so far as this category of employee is concerned, the governor in council can prescribe special leave regulations. In the case of employees coming under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, however, special leave regulations can only be approved by the governor in council on the recommendation of the civil service commission. In passing treasury board minutes P.C. 209/2166 and P.C. 210/2166 this provision of the Civil Service Act was apparently overlooked, no doubt in view of the fact that this practice had been followed for many years under various administrations. This matter was first brought to our attention by the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1948, and the necessary steps will be taken to have the position regularized.

2. These treasury board minutes were not published in the Canada Gazette, since it is not the practice to publish minutes dealing exclusively with the internal administration of government departments.

Mr. MacKinnon: There is very little that I can add to the reply made by me in the house on February 15 last to a similar question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). All the information which we requested from the provinces has not yet been received. I expect we shall be asked to treat some of it as confidential. I have written to all the provinces asking whether there is objection on their part to making any or all of the information public. Until their wishes are ascertained and the complete information is available, it will be impossible to answer this question further. We have recently sent follow-up letters to some of the provinces which did not reply to our first letters.

PRIVILEGE

NOTICES OF MOTIONS STRUCK OFF THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, notices of motions Nos. 26 and 32 which appear on the order paper for Friday, February 25 last, have been struck off today's order paper. The right hon. leader of the government might perhaps tell me why and under whose authority this was done?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I was not aware that anything had been struck off the order paper. I will note the hon. member's remarks and see to it that this mistake is corrected if necessary.

Mr. Gagnon: Thank you.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

AGRICULTURAL PRICES SUPPORT BOARD—STARCH AND POTATO SUPPORT PROGRAM, 1948-49

Mr. Hatfield:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and agreements, exchanged between Washington and Ottawa by the agricultural prices support board and the Department of Trade and Commerce regarding potatoes, potato support program and embargoes for the years 1948 and 1949.

WHEAT BOARD—OATS AND BARLEY

Mr. Bentley:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the premier of Manitoba or any department of the government of Manitoba and any minister or department of the federal government, from March 11, 1948, to February 21, 1949, with respect to the need of enabling legislation by the provinces regarding the inclusion of oats and barley in the operation of the wheat board.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN ADOPTED IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mrs. Strum:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, agreements and other documents, exchanged since 1946 between officials of the government of New Brunswick, and/or other persons, and the various departments of the federal government, with regard to the existing protection afforded Canadian children available for adoption in that province.

INCOME TAX

PAYMENT BY FARMERS THROUGH CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is he aware that where income tax is owing for any one of the crop years for which additional payments are to be made by the Canadian wheat board, the income tax department is forwarding a letter to be signed by the farmer and sent to the Canadian wheat board, authorizing the board to mail to the director of income tax, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, any cheques covering the proceeds of payments to the farmer? An accompanying letter contains one sentence which reads as follows:

It would not appear that the proceeds of your 1948 crop will permit the liquidation of your income tax indebtedness at this time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

The farmer who writes to me is relying on the additional payments to meet his cost of living and farming operations this spring. Is not the suggestion of the department an interference with the right of the individual to dispose of his funds as may be most beneficial to him?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. gentleman was good enough to give me notice of his question. I would think that, either in the typing or writing of it, an error has been made. As the hon. member read it, it states: "It would not appear that the proceeds," and so on. The logical reading of it would seem to be, "It would now appear . . ."

Mr. Coldwell: There may have been a typographical error; I will check that.

Mr. McCann: Then the sentence would read:

It would now appear that the proceeds of your 1948 crop will permit the liquidation of your income tax indebtedness at this time.

My answer is that I am aware of the practice that is being followed. It is an ordinary business practice that is followed every day in every line of business throughout the country. It simply means that the department indicates to the taxpayer that the payment coming to him from the wheat board will permit him to liquidate his indebtedness so far as income tax is concerned. He is asked to give us an order on the wheat board for the amount owing him. It is not obligatory.

There is no suggestion of any interference with the right of the individual to dispose of his funds in any way he pleases.

TAX YEAR TO WHICH ADDITIONAL WHEAT PAYMENTS SHOULD BE APPLICABLE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): On Friday last some questions were asked, by the hon. members for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), Melfort (Mr. Wright) and Acadia (Mr. Quelch), with reference to the tax year in which additional wheat payments were applicable for income tax purposes.

The answer is that, as was done in former years, appropriate action will be taken to ensure that the farmer will not have to pay more tax by reason of including this payment as income in this year than he would have paid if that amount had been included in his income in the year in which he delivered the wheat.

Mr. Fair: I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he will make a statement tomorrow clarifying the statement he has just made. When he does so, will he keep in mind the practice of the past of farmers paying taxes on these wheat payments in the year in which they are received?

Mr. McCann: I do not quite agree with the hon. gentleman that the statement needs any clarification. I think if he will read it he will find that it can be easily understood; but if at this time tomorrow he does not understand it, I shall attempt to clarify it.

Mr. Miller: Will the minister indicate how the executors or administrators of an estate should show the distribution of participation certificates now being made, as announced the other day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce? There is a mix-up between the two acts, the one that came into force on January 1, 1949, and the old act. Income taxes will soon have to be paid, and these participation payments are now going out. The question how executors and administrators should deal with these payments in the various years should be cleared up.

Mr. McCann: I do not attempt to answer legal questions. I shall refer this one to the legal advisers of my department.

RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Can he tell the house when the report of his department will be available? I ask that question because on the last day of the session of 1948 I brought the matter up in the house and pointed out that since the fiscal year 1944-45 no report of the department had been tabled. At that time the then prime minister promised that the report would be mailed out to the various members. I believe that so far no report has been tabled, either for 1947-48 or for the two years prior to that. The minister will find my question and the answer thereto at page 6143 of last year's Hansard.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I received notice of this question just as I was coming into the house, and have not had time to look into the matter. I shall be pleased to do that and answer the question later.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

FRASER RIVER BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. On Wednesday last, following a motion of mine, an order of the house was issued for a copy of all reports submitted by the Fraser river board. I should appreciate it if the minister could have these reports expedited, because the matter will be probably coming up soon.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I shall do my best to have the matter expedited.

ALASKA

RAIL CONNECTION TO BORDER BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Have any arrangements been made with the United States government about the proposed Alaska-United States railway to the United States-Canadian border? I ask the question because bills having to do with the matter have been introduced in the United States senate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I was not fortunate enough to have received notice of this question before coming into the house. My understanding is that no such arrangements have been made with the United States government, but I shall look into the matter and make sure that my information is accurate.

HOGS

PRESS REPORTS AS TO WITHDRAWAL OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): According to the press, Ontario has withdrawn the hog subsidy of $1 million as of December 31. My question to the Minister of Agriculture is this: Judging from what we have heard, why should it have been necessary for Ontario to have a hog subsidy?

UNEMPLOYMENT

PUBLIC WORKS—REFERENCE TO ANSWER TO QUESTION ON FEBRUARY 25

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce? I note that on page 903 of Friday's Hansard the Minister of Trade and Commerce, referring to the reply given to me by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, said: "There is something wrong with the answer." Will the minister tell the house what is wrong with the answer, and what the correct answer is?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I was talking to myself at that time. However, I was basing my remark to myself on the fact that as I remembered the shelf of projects they amounted to $350 million. It is my experience that the on-site labour for construction work of the type included in the shelf amounted to about thirty per cent of the cost, therefore the figures given did not seem to add up.

Mr. Coldwell: May I get the accurate figure?

Mr. Howe: Not from me.

Mr. Coldwell: Perhaps the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has the accurate figure.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I should like to amplify the answer given by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It is true that a large number of projects are under consideration. The figures I tabled were only for projects on which plans and specifications are completed. The engineering work is proceeding on many others, but plans are not yet complete.

Mr. Coldwell: None are in effect yet?

Mr. Winters: No.

EMMA MOIR

EXPRESSIONS OF CONGRATULATION ON HER 105TH BIRTHDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John T. Hackett (Stanstead): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Mrs. Emma Moir, of Beebe, Quebec, today celebrates, in good health and in full possession of her faculties, her 105th birthday. I wish to ask the minister whether the records of his department disclose another instance of equal or greater longevity.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman has only lately ascertained the remarkable longevity of this woman and was not able to give me notice of his question; consequently I cannot give him an answer now, but I shall do so tomorrow.

May I take this opportunity to express to the lady in question the sincere congratulations of the government.

MERCHANT NAVY

ELIGIBLE AGE FOR VOCATIONAL TRAINING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodney Young (Vancouver Centre): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Will the minister consider taking steps to raise the thirty-year age limit, now stipulated by P.C. 5983, under which Canadian merchant navy veterans are to receive vocational training?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): This question more particularly concerns my colleague the Minister of Transport.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Application for vocational training is made to the Department of Transport, but administered by the Department of Veterans Affairs. I may say that the age limit was based on a recommendation made by the special committee on veterans affairs which was set up by this house. I have no information at this time that the age limit is to be changed.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, I may be incorrect assuming the contrary, but I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if it is definitely so that the veterans affairs committee recommended the age of thirty years?

Mr. Chevrier: The statement I made was that the age limit as recommended by the veterans affairs committee was thirty years, and that I had no information that it was to be increased.

Mr. Cruickshank: A supplementary question: is that from the veterans affairs committee or some other committee?

Mr. Chevrier: My information is that it was a recommendation of the special committee on veterans affairs.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

TREATMENT OF OUTPATIENTS IN D.V.A. HOSPITALS —DEER LODGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Maybank (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is some change being made in the manner of giving treatment to outpatients at the Deer Lodge hospital, or in the Winnipeg area? If so, what is the change? If there is no change, will the minister make a statement in the matter?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre for giving me notice of this question.

This matter has been given careful study by the treatment services of our department. It is the considered opinion of our department that better treatment for outpatients can be given in a D.V.A. hospital than separately in a downtown centre. Since the general pressure of work across Canada has passed the post-demobilization peak, we have been able to make moves of outpatient clinics into the D.V.A. hospitals in several centres in Canada.

We believe that this method is working out for the better treatment of the veteran patients, and it has presented few administrative difficulties. In Winnipeg there has been no intention to change the existing arrangements until June 1, at which time it is planned that an increasing number of outpatients be received at Deer Lodge.

These outpatients will be in two categories: (1) after June, Deer Lodge inpatients will, when discharged, be requested to return for any future checkup to the clinic at Deer Lodge hospital; (2) an increasing number of outpatients applying at the clinic in the Commercial building downtown will be sent to Deer Lodge for outpatient treatment. The decision as to how many will be sent to the hospital will depend upon the condition of the patients.

Facilities will be maintained in the Commercial building, where minor ailments will receive treatment. For the necessary numbers to be transferred to Deer Lodge, transportation will be provided. With the gradual contraction of this clinic, starting next summer, it is expected that the plan will cause little inconvenience and will result in better medical care for the veterans.

The general idea here, as elsewhere, is to have the patient go where treatment can best be given.

NATIONAL HEALTH

FEDERAL GRANTS APPROVED AND AMOUNTS EXPENDED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Last Thursday, as recorded at page 861 of Hansard, I asked the minister how there could be no figures available as to the expenditure on the health grants plan when the orders in council required accounting by the provinces at the end of each month. The minister at that time offered to look into it at once. Can he tell the house now whether there are figures available as to the amount of money the dominion has actually given to each of the provinces under the health grants program, whether the orders in council have been completely disregarded by the dominion and the provinces, or whether any money has actually gone from the dominion to the provinces?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his question. I am afraid that in a private conversation I may have misled him with respect to what appeared to be a discrepancy in the orders in council.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Martin: His question was as to the amount of money spent by the provinces. I had misunderstood it, and on that account I gave the interpretation indicated. The amount of money actually given, apart altogether from the allocations and commitments made to the provinces by the federal government, can be given to the house, and in view of what my hon. friend has now asked, I shall see that it is done. There have been no discrepancies on the part of the provinces and the dominion government with regard to the orders in council.

WHITE BEANS

INQUIRY AS TO ADVISABILITY OF PLANTING THIS YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the statement made in the house on Thursday last about the planting of flax in 1949, will the minister give some advice to the farmers as to the planting of white beans this year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am not familiar with the situation as it applies to white beans. I understand there has been an exceptionally heavy crop and there has been some difficulty in marketing it. I am not, however, in a position to advise the farmers. My colleague the Minister of Agriculture may be in a position to do so.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Then may I ask the Minister of Agriculture, or his parliamentary assistant?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): In Ontario white beans are marketed under a marketing board set up by the Ontario government under the Natural Products Marketing Act. Those who are associated with that organization will be in a much better position than I am to advise the farmers. I am told there has been considerable difficulty in marketing the beans grown not only last year but in other years. I am sure the farmers in the area to which the hon. member refers are capable of making up their own minds whether they should grow as many beans this year as they did last year.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS AND CHOICE OF ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources. Can he tell the house what progress is being made with regard to the completion of the trans-Canada highway, and, if possible, the route proposed?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member could not have been in the house earlier this afternoon when I answered a question asked by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black). The answer I gave will appear in Hansard, and I believe it answers sufficiently the question the hon. member now asks. The choice of a route for the trans-Canada highway is a matter for the various provinces.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ARTILLERY RANGES—HALIBURTON COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Baker (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I should like to answer a question asked on Monday, February 21, by the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Mr. Hodgson) with respect to an artillery range in Haliburton county. The answer is that no consideration is being given by the army for the establishment at this time of an artillery range in the Haliburton region.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, February 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to deal with agriculture today, and I still intend to do so. But, in view of the discussion which has arisen in regard to the employment shelf of works, I feel I must devote at least a few minutes to that particular topic. I managed today to hear the questions being asked, but I must say I did not hear clearly either of the answers given by the ministers. Therefore I shall proceed from the point I had intended in the first instance. The discussion arose as a result of certain questions asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F., with regard to a shelf of works the government is supposed to be holding in readiness for a period of unemployment.

These questions with the answers may be found in Hansard of February 23, at page 818, and also of February 25 at page 903.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on this later occasion was so amazed at the answer he had received on the previous occasion that he raised the matter again on Friday. The famous white paper on reconstruction held out hope of a tremendous program of public works for any possible period of unemployment. The then Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, and present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), made this statement on the matter on April 12, 1945, during the first session of that year, as reported at page 810 of Hansard as follows:

> The purpose will be to have on hand at all times a shelf of public projects already planned and available when needed to stimulate employment in any given area.

We have been given to understand time and again that, if serious unemployment threatened Canada, the government had a score of projects for which contracts could be let at a moment's notice, to employ perhaps hundreds of thousands of workers. Then, in the last year or two, we have understood that plans had been made for such works as irrigation projects, roads, reforestation, and the like. We have been told that the government has been holding up needed development until employment dropped. Now, let us return to the answer given by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). It is an amazing answer. In the first place, it is not clear. Depending upon one's interpretation, it would appear that in one year only 32,700 or 40,200 men would be put to work on public projects. Is it any wonder that the former minister of reconstruction said last Friday that there was something the matter with that answer? He might have added that there was something wrong with the plan. It is a meagre, puny and inadequate plan to deal with the potential unemployment in this country.

If this answer is correct, it means that this government has practically no plan to meet such unemployment. Even giving the government the benefit of the doubt and accepting the figure of 40,200, let us compare that figure with the 50,000 unemployed in the urban districts of British Columbia at this very moment. There are also large numbers unemployed in the maritime provinces and I understand also in Toronto as well as in other places.

This disclosure of the meagreness of the plan is the most amazing thing that has been brought forward in this House of Commons in the short time I have been here. During the years before the war the unemployed tramped from municipality to municipality in search of work or relief. They were told that the federal government had no power to do anything. The provinces said that although they had the power, they had no money. The junior governments, the municipalities, had neither the money nor the power, and these young men were simply passed on from camp to camp or from jail to jail, these men whose only crime was that at that particular time they had no job. I ask if this Liberal government is prepared to allow conditions similar to those to return.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) does a lot of talking about provincial rights. It would seem that he would like the power and the money to which I have referred to remain in separate hands, the way they were before the war. Perhaps he might say where he stands on this particular matter of public works in Canada.

Since the dominion government can raise the money, since it has the power to initiate public works, responsibility for the unemployed of this nation must fall squarely upon its shoulders. It has the sole responsibility for the employment of the working people of this nation. The only alternative would be to have ten separate nations. May I remind the house that prior to the war the provinces had all the taxing powers which our constitution allowed them, but the programs which they were financially able to initiate were totally inadequate to meet the unemployment problem. Let me repeat that in my opinion this blueprint of the plan of government public works is totally and miserably inadequate.

I had intended to say something about agriculture. While I live in a city, there are a goodly number of farmers in my constituency. Someone has said that without the country our cities could not be. The prosperity of my own city of Saskatoon and of the other towns in that vicinity certainly depends upon the prosperity of the farmer. I am glad to say something about agriculture today especially since we in the C.C.F. group have just moved an amendment expressing non-confidence in the Liberal government because of its failure to make provision for an adequate natural products marketing act.

This is something for which the farm organizations of this country have been asking, whether the members of those organizations grow apples or wheat or livestock. A fairly definite consensus has emerged from all the farmers conventions which have met in late years. What they want is a degree of stability and security in agriculture. So frequently at farmers meetings we have heard demands for parity prices, planned marketing, bilateral and international agreements. Requests have been made that the operations of the wheat board be extended to cover the marketing of coarse grains. I am pleased to hear a rumour around the corridors that oats and barley are to be brought under the jurisdiction of the wheat board. I hope that is true in spite of the report that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not in favour of such a move. I have an extract in my hand here to prove that latter fact but I shall not read it as I assume that the minister probably knows about it.

During the almost forty years of my observation, agriculture has passed through a period of progress, although there has been much hardship and poverty and suffering during that time. One may look back with longing, and perhaps some nostalgia to the early pioneering days. There may have been some romance in those early days. There may have been romance in that long two-day trek to town. There may have been some romance in the clear sunrise of an early morning, in the sharp frost that sent the prairie chickens up into the poplars, or in such little things as the rush of warm steam out of the barn at the stopping-house which you reached long after dark on your first day out on your way to the distant town. There may have been romance in the smell of wild mint in the hay.

But all romance ended when a little later in your expedition you were told by the line elevator man that he could pay you only fourteen cents per bushel for your load of oats. Those were the days of heavy and indiscriminate dockage, the days of iniquitous differences between street and track prices for wheat and all other kinds of grain. Those were the days when the grain company agent told you that the elevator was full, that he was sorry he could not take your good No. 2 C.W. oats, but if you liked to dump them he would pay you for No. 3 feed. So you slept in the livery barn instead of an hotel room and you spent the proceeds from your sale of grain on one pair of shoes and one sack of flour. When you rattled down Main street and out of town, as your team settled down into their stride for the forty-two mile journey home, you had lots of time to consider whether your No. 1 enemy was the grain company or the early frosts.

But out of such experiences were born great things. The farmers, who were helpless individually, began to organize; they began to come together. Grain growers associations and various farm organizations sprang up. It is true that sometimes their leaders betrayed them, bought out by money or by positions of power, but the rank and file persevered. So we have the grain growers association, the united farmers, the wheat pools and other such organizations.

There was also some organization along political lines. There was the old U.F.A., there was the old Progressive party and its outcrop, the C.C.F. This movement to which I belong and for which I speak had its roots in the early agrarian injustices on the prairies. In its early years in Saskatchewan it drew and has since continued to draw its support from the farmers, organized and unorganized. Its agricultural platform is in line with the policy expressed by the great farm organizations. Compare it for yourself with the resolutions passed by the western agricultural conference and the Canadian federation of agriculture.

I have not the time to put on the record the complete agricultural plaform of this party, but I should like to refer to one or two of the highlights which were made public at the C.C.F. convention in Winnipeg last August when the agricultural platform was revised. These are:

1. A system of guaranteed or forward prices so that a farmer will know, well ahead of seeding, what price he will receive.
2. Enactment of a national marketing act and the creation of marketing boards with producer representation.
3. Orderly world marketing by international agreement.
4. Encouragement of the development of co-operatives.
5. No more speculation in marketing of food products.
6. Adoption of the ever-normal granary principle with the necessary storage facilities to carry it out.
7. Elimination of monopolies in things like farm machinery, meat packing, and fertilizers.
8. A program of crop insurance.
9. A system of long-term credits.
10. Extension of P.F.R.A. to all Canada, with extensive irrigation projects.
11. For international trade we would set up import-export trade boards responsible to parliament, to make international agreements in the sale of grain and livestock products.

These and other measures are designed to ensure to the farmer his fair share of the national income. There are those who, this last year or two, have been wont to look askance at the prosperity of the man on the prairie farm. Why in the world should he not be prosperous? It will take a deal of prosperity to make up for all those lean, hard years. And in attempting to show the so-called prosperity of the farmer, government supporters have been unfairly comparing recent years with the base year 1935, when prices were extremely low. If you compare the present set-up with the years from 1925 to 1929 you will get an entirely different picture. I would point out, also, that millions of the dollars which are supposed to have gone into the pockets of the prairie farmers actually landed in the pockets of the farmers of the farmers, meaning the mortgage companies whose headquarters for the most part are in these central provinces, and whose funds are taxed for the benefit of these provinces rather than the benefit of the provinces in which that money was made. I say a great deal of this money was used in paying up principal and interest owed by the farmers, which had been accumulating for a good many years, and it was the mortgage companies rather than the farmers who got that cash.

I do not say the farmers are poorly off. A few of them have established bank accounts, but thousands are carrying on in a much smaller way out there on the marginal lands, out along the edge of the bush, in dried-out country and so on. They are living precariously enough. I am thinking of a group in my own constituency, from Beaver Creek on down south and west. They have been burned out year after year. Last year they had a terrific plague of grasshoppers, and the prospect is that this year the grasshoppers will be even worse. When people are in this position for a number of years they have very little capital left, and that capital disappears in a depression. So they are never able to re-equip their farms because of the high prices they must pay for their needs, notably, of course, for farm machinery.

That these prices have been allowed to rise is to some extent the responsibility of this government, and this has taken away from the farmers the satisfaction generally felt because of the wheat agreements which guaranteed a reasonably fair price per bushel. I might interject that a fair price per bushel is not a great deal of good if you have not the bushels of wheat to sell. I can never forget that this government gave in to the machinery companies. As a matter of fact the action of the government in allowing a 12½ per cent increase in prices of farm machinery began this merry-go-round of inflation in which we are caught up today, which has resulted in further increases in the prices of all commodities and brought about inflation generally.

There are those who would take advantage of this situation. One such, may I say, is the Winnipeg grain exchange; and I would warn my friends of the Conservative party that they are generally coming to be regarded as belonging to that same group. The private grain trade is trying to wean the farmer away from his own organizations. Have you noticed these little farm organizations which are being mysteriously formed around Winnipeg? They seem to have funds for unlimited pamphlets with which they deluge farmers in other parts of the country, lauding the private system of marketing grain and trying to drive a wedge between the farmer and the organizations he has created. The private grain trade is trying to wean the farmer away from the pools and from wheat board principles, back to the open market, back to the grain exchange where the gamblers can make a killing when times are good and where they can pass the whole problem over to the government when times are bad. I get these circulars every day and put them in my wastepaper basket, which I deem to be their proper destination. Some of these grain exchange firms are the same people who used to rob us in the early pioneer days which I have attempted to describe.

The export trade in agricultural products looks a bit uncertain at the moment. Were it not for United States payments for Canadian goods for European shipment, and were it not for the fact that we in this country have unfrozen the remainder of our loan to Britain, we would be in the midst of a slump at the present time. Don't forget that. Britain is showing signs of inability or unwillingness to keep on buying from us four or five times as much as we buy from her. She just has not the necessary dollars. I think it is a sad commentary on human ingenuity that we should have a surplus of primary products and still be unable to do business with those who very much desire those products and who have a surplus of the things we need. It is time to investigate this matter, and do away with any restraints on such trade. Britain has been forced into the arms of Poland, Denmark and other countries which will accept her goods, and we should try to retain those European markets.

But you may say we can sell in the United States market. Yes, we can for the moment, as long as the American people supply us with vast sums of money to pay for our Canadian goods to be sent to Europe, because they have not those products themselves in sufficient quantities to export. But let us not forget that the United States produces and exports much the same things we do as far as agricultural products go, and when times return to normal we shall find the United States our rival for the European market. I need not remind hon. members that the United States already has declared flax to be surplus, and that there is an agitation in that country at the present moment to have wheat declared surplus, in which event we would be in rather a difficult position. I shall leave that for the time being.

Apart from the national program of our party which I have outlined, here are some of the things in which we in this group believe in relation to agriculture. We deplore the fact that hog production is decreasing. I had a long talk about that matter with officials of Intercontinental Pork Packers in my own city. I feel that at least one of the reasons for the reduction is the income tax farmers have to pay upon their receipts from the sale of hogs. We welcome the adoption of the basic herd idea, which we have so long advocated, in connection with income tax. We understand that the term "basic herd" is going to be defined to the satisfaction of the farmer; at least we have that promise from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). Then we want the wheat board to pay out promptly the participation payments due the farmers. There seems to be some misunderstanding throughout the country on this point. Like the P.F.A.A. payments, this is largely the farmers' own money that is being handed out. This is not government money. This is not the government or the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) declaring that these men shall receive certain moneys from this government. These men are receiving money which they have earned.

Mr. Gardiner: Just one-third of prairie farm assistance.

Mr. Knight: It is my belief that irrigation would permit an increased rural population. I shall say a word about that at a later time. Irrigation would encourage a revival of the livestock industry. It is our belief that an irrigation scheme of some proportions should be put into effect now, and I underline the word "now". Such a scheme should not be saved for use as Liberal propaganda on the eve of an election. The people will soon be seeing that water-map which was plastered all over the front page of the Star-Phoenix during the Rosthern by-election. I do not know whether or not it had any result.

Mr. Gardiner: It was your speech that produced results.

Mr. Knight: The minister makes a lot of speeches and I shall now make mine. We do urge that compensatory payments be made to the farmers who, during the war, took these lower prices in order to subsidize the bread production of this nation. If Great Britain is unwilling or unable to pay this extra amount, it should be a charge on the national treasury of Canada.

Looking at agriculture as a whole, I would say that the west is confronted with a tremendous problem in the form of the mechanization of agriculture. The need for manpower is decreasing. This is a long-term problem but it is perhaps the greatest problem with which the west is faced. In other words, to carry on the industry of wheat farming, less and less manpower is necessary. The minister who enjoys interrupting me will remember that when he and I used to thresh with one of those big Reeves engines and a correspondingly large separator, twenty-six men were needed to do the work. Today, however, if conditions are good, an old man and a boy will produce the bread requirements of from three to six thousand people in one season. What is the significance of that in regard to these prairies?

Efficiency, judged by the cost per bushel, requires larger machinery. Larger machinery requires a larger acreage and may start the ambitious in pursuit of more land. Whether we know it or not, we are in the midst of an agrarian revolution which is changing the face of the country and changing life on the prairies. As I have said, I think this is the greatest agricultural problem with which this country is faced, except the problem of the destruction of our natural resources and the destruction of our top soil by wind and water erosion. The latter, of course, is largely our own fault.

A great country cannot be built without people. Cities become unnecessary if there are no people in the country to use the services they provide. If non-agricultural industries are to exist, there must be people to operate them and to use their products. I have not sufficient time at my disposal to discuss alternative remedies, but obviously one remedy is irrigation. With irrigation there would be more people on the land and the holdings would be smaller. Dairy and beef cattle industries would be possible in regions now barren or given over solely to grain growing.

This dominion government has not done much about irrigation except to talk about it. For the most part, the talking has been done by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I have the greatest respect for the Minister of Agriculture, and I have said so both publicly and privately on occasion. There is only one subject on which I do not trust him, and that is elections. The minister always reminds me of David Harum, the famous horse trader. He was a man of great integrity and honesty in his private life, and a good fellow, just as the minister is, but in a horse trade he would take advantage of his own grandfather.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the kind of speech you made up there that helped win us the seat.

Mr. Knight: This western irrigation is one trading horse that the minister has in his barn. He is a bit over in the knees through old age, but he gets rested up between elections and may make a brave enough show when the minister trots him out again before the next federal election. In tribute to the minister, may I say there is no man who can show off a horse better than he can. Let me warn you, however: if you buy him you will get no guarantees with him. You will have to buy him on the end of the halter and you will not even get close enough to him to look at his teeth.

At a meeting in the Technical school in Saskatoon before the 1945 election I heard the minister talk of the vast sums of money to be spent on irrigation. I sat in a front seat. The minister did not know me in those days, but I knew him. In spite of the talk, this section of the country is as dry as ever, and the only surface water I have seen there in the past few years was marked on a map which the minister or some of his friends prepared for the Rosthern by-election. This is the map which appeared on the front page of the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix. On this map the water was marked in black. I notice that several of those black patches had been conveniently moved up into the Rosthern constituency at that time. Owing to electoral redistribution, next year those black patches will be in the Saskatoon territory; but I doubt very much whether the duck population will be much increased thereby.

This irrigation problem is too important to be used as a political football. There is a danger that the people will look upon it as nothing more than that. If the minister keeps using this irrigation project as a political football, there is a danger that the old story of "Wolf, wolf" may be exemplified. To my way of thinking, this would be a tragedy. Irrespective of what party is in power, I think something will be done. If the project is sound from an engineering point of view, this government is to be censured for not carrying out its promises. The government party is the only party that has had an opportunity of doing anything, and it has failed.

One of the greatest problems facing the Canadian farmer today is the uncertainty of world markets for agricultural products. In his speech the other night, the minister covered up that uncertainty in a pæan of self praise for the accomplishments in the past. Would it not be a fair question to ask, "What of the future?" As seeding time approaches, it is the answer to that question in which the farmer is interested.

An extension of the powers which the Agricultural Products Act gives the minister is being requested. I hope to say a word about that at the proper time, so for the moment I will say I believe those powers should be renewed. Some marketing agency is necessary, but it should be an agency operated solely for the benefit of the producers. I do not think this present arrangement is the best possible one because it gives too much power to the minister and none at all to local or provincial growers groups.

We remember the coarse grains fiasco. We remember how the farmer and not the treasury subsidized the price of wheat to the millers. We look upon the dwindling contracts for farm products with the United Kingdom. We note that such contracts as there are in operation are for one year only. We remember that the wheat agreement with Britain ends in 1950. We have seen the decline in the price of rye, the declaration of a surplus of flax on the part of the United States; while, as I said a moment ago, there are mutterings in that country to the effect that wheat should be declared surplus too. Is it any wonder that the farmers, with this prospect in view, say "What of the future?"

The other day, in a burst of oratory at which he is so good, the minister said that he was no prophet. In view of the prospect, perhaps that is just as well. May I say that bursts of oratory seldom if ever settle any problem; and there is not necessarily logic in a loud voice.

The ability of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) as a debater is conceded. I do not like his style of debate. I know enough about debating—I mean in a theoretical way; I am not much good at it myself—to detect some of the minister's little tricks. Let me give hon. members an example. The minister sets out to disprove A. Instead, he proceeds to prove B, and at the end of half an hour everyone is so spellbound—I shall not be unkind enough to say "so weary"—that they just do not see the difference.

Mr. Irvine: And he puts over C.

Mr. Knight: Let me give a concrete example. The other night he dealt with a statement made by some of the C.C.F. members of the house; he disagreed with the statement that the dollar had only the purchasing power of fifty-nine cents or sixty-two cents, or whatever it currently is. I do not know whether it is fifty-nine cents or sixty-two cents; it fluctuates here and there. He set out to disprove this statement but instead he proceeded to prove that the farmer, with less wheat, fewer chickens, less produce of various kinds, could buy more manufactured goods. But that is not the thing he is proving. He says not a word about the actual depreciation in money values, which was the question propounded and the one which the minister was supposed to be debating.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member has not read the debate.

Mr. Knight: I will challenge the minister here and now to apply his argument to the $30 fixed income which the old age pensioners receive or to the purchasing power, in terms of manufactured goods, of the $100 bond which we bought during the war.

Mr. Gardiner: In my speech I said definitely that I was not discussing the question which the hon. member now says I was discussing.

Mr. Knight: That these matters I have been discussing—agricultural production and marketing—are vital to the farm people in my territory is not open to question; that they have a definite bearing on the prosperity of the citizens of Saskatoon city itself is also indisputable, for our industry is based upon agricultural products. The uncertainty of the moment is being reflected in those industries.

I shall finish in a minute or two, Mr. Speaker, but I want to say this in order to prove the point that I have just made. There is in my constituency a great packing plant, Intercontinental Packers, which is working at only one-third of capacity. The Saskatchewan Producers' oil mill has ceased, temporarily at least, to extract oil from flax. When the great new flour mill opened the other day, Mr. Fisher, the manager, said that, owing to uncertainty in the markets and in the exchange situation, no export business was in sight. Thus it is that agriculture and industry are intermingled. The prosperity of one means prosperity for the other, and that material prosperity is in turn translated into terms of human well-being and happiness. If our whole Canadian economy is to be prosperous, the well-being of agriculture must be maintained.

Mr. Fernand Viau (St. Boniface): Like the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), Mr. Speaker, I should like to make my remarks within the forty minutes allotted to each member of the House of Commons. If there is one thing which should be respected, I believe it is the constitution of this house. I noticed that last week the forty-minute rule was abused a number of times by some hon. members carrying on for periods varying from fifteen to twenty minutes over the allotted time.

First of all I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown), who moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Everyone will have appreciated the words he used in describing the progress of this nation with regard to the development of the St. Lawrence waterway and the Atlantic pact, which will be signed within a short time by the democratic nations of the western hemisphere. By expressing himself so well in this house I feel that the hon. member has rendered a tribute to the riding which he represents.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I should like also to tender my most sincere congratulations to the new member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Demers) who had the honour of seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

His speech showed his perfect knowledge of those economic problems which affect our nation. A specialist in agricultural science with a wealth of experience, he will I am sure take an active part in the debates of the house, and continue to prove worthy of the confidence his constituents placed in him last December, when they elected him as member for Laval-Two Mountains.

In the fall of 1947, at St. Boniface, we had the pleasure of meeting the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, then Minister of Justice, who was visiting for the first time the Manitoba electors. On that occasion, he was welcomed by his French-Canadian fellow citizens from that province, and a tribute was also paid to him in connection with his entry into a new political career in 1943, when he came here to succeed the late Ernest Lapointe.

In August last, the French Canadians, who support the greatest political party in the land, chose him to lead the Liberal party. In the following November he became Prime Minister of Canada, and I can assure him that he has the respect of all the citizens of western Canada, whether English or French speaking, or even of foreign extraction, and that naturally in the next general election such respect and confidence on their part will be shown by a support through which he will have many representatives from that part of the country on this side of the house, as was the case in 1945.

(Text):

I should also like to congratulate the government on the appointments of the two new ministers. One of these is the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson), who left a secure position in order to assume the responsibility of Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is hardly necessary for me to mention that he had already, not only in this country but in other countries of the world, established a reputation as an able diplomat. I feel that his appointment to the cabinet is a matter on which the Prime Minister of Canada is to be congratulated, and is proof of the wisdom of his counsel within the cabinet.

I should also like to pay a tribute to our former premier of Manitoba who has also, I may say sincerely, left a secure position in that province in order to assume the responsibility of Minister of Justice in the federal cabinet. His record as a statesman, particularly in the great struggle which had to be fought in this country to try to bring about a solution of our dominion-provincial difficulties, and his stand at the dominion-provincial conference, will never be forgotten. I was happy that he was able to come into this house to defend the stand which was taken not only by Manitoba but by the other six provinces in Canada in support of the federal government, and help to prove the way that the former premier of Ontario, with the help of the present premier of Quebec, scuttled that very important dominion-provincial conference.

I wish also to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on his appointment as leader of a great political party. I am one of those who are in favour of the maintenance of the great two-party system in this country. It is the only way to maintain a strong democratic way of life. The new leader of the opposition has proved himself aggressive in assuming his responsibilities in this House of Commons; but having heard of the new policies which they were going to present to the people of Canada after their great convention of last fall, I was greatly disappointed to find that the new leader of the opposition had abused his office in this parliament by taking up a great deal of time in making long speeches, in which he never once mentioned the wonderful policies of his party. He took time simply to defend the attitude that he had taken in the dominion-provincial conference when he was the premier of Ontario.

Furthermore, in his great speech the other day, he dealt with the important matter of communism. If that is to be the policy of his party it will have to be cleared up. I took his speech as a grave warning to indicate that if the Tory regime ever came into office in this country, those who seek employment and criticize the administration will find that the government then in office will reinstate a section of the Criminal Code which would label everyone who criticized the administration a communist.

As a member from western Canada, where I was raised and educated, where I have taken part in politics ever since I was quite young, and where I have been a close student of the history of my country, not only politically but economically, I may say that there is one thing I have noted with sad regret. This applies not only to the government now in office but to all governments who have been in office since confederation. I refer to the lack of attention which has been given to our western provinces in so far as industry is concerned, or anything which affects their economy. We all know that Canada extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but if one makes a careful study of public accounts in this house every year he will realize the amount of expenditures which are made within the confines of Ontario and Quebec. It must be admitted that when the dominion government called together the all-important dominion-provincial conference support was received not from Ontario and Quebec but from the seven other provinces which do not receive the same benefits economically as do the two great provinces to which I have referred. The history of western Canada is a story of a long struggle. I have made a careful study of the arrival of the pioneers on the plains of the Red river. I have carefully studied the growth of the colony on the banks of the Red river and the Assiniboine, where the cities of St. Boniface and Winnipeg now stand. One of our greatest primary products in western Canada is wheat. Over a century ago all the trading was done by navigation on the Red river, starting from a point which is now situated in the state of Minnesota and continuing north to beyond St. Andrew's lodge. It is related in the notes of the Manitoba historical society, in an article written by a certain Mr. William Murdoch in the year 1884, that there was a possibility of having a navigation route on the Red river through lake Winnipeg, through the Nelson river and through Hudson bay to important markets in Europe. Why this has been neglected in the past I do not know; but I feel that if today this problem is given consideration by the government it can still be achieved and the transportation of our goods to foreign markets, not only wheat, but our lumber and many other primary products, could be carried out through that important navigation route which could be developed. Naturally the cost would be pretty high, but if one recalls the money which has been spent in the two great provinces of Ontario and Quebec to help the development of navigation, railroads and many other resources, he will see that the development of a route through the Red river, lake Winnipeg, the Nelson river and Hudson bay to the European markets would be a small item.

After all, one must not pay too great attention to the population of the western prairies at the present time. There are reasons why our population has gone down. All our industries are concentrated in the two large provinces in eastern Canada. It is easily understood that the government has done nothing to help the establishment of these industries in western Canada. I could give many examples. I shall refer to the withdrawal of the personnel of the administrative headquarters of the Trans-Canada Air Lines from Winnipeg to Montreal. On what ground is this change justified? We know that it is impossible to get a definite answer from the responsible minister of this government. It is said that although Trans-Canada Air Lines are publicly owned, the policies of the company are decided by a board of directors. That is quite all right, but this change will mean the removal from Winnipeg to Montreal of two or three hundred families, and that in spite of the fact that there is a housing shortage in Montreal. I do not want to burden the house this afternoon with any facts and figures, but I do wish to refer to the principle of the thing. The removal of the Trans-Canada Air Lines to Montreal is not justified, and I am sure that the government, either through the Department of Transport or through the Department of Trade and Commerce, will see that the decision of the board of directors of the Trans-Canada Air Lines is reconsidered.

Another important factor which concerns employment and the establishment of industries in western Canada is the refusal of the British government to buy flour from our western mills. We know that a great number of the small mills cannot compete with the large mills of eastern Canada. In Saskatchewan and Manitoba we have seen many small mills closed down. However, there is one in my own constituency—and I believe there are others—which has competed with the large mills of the east.

When this matter was brought to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton), the minister answered that the export of flour was a matter relating to private enterprise and that it was no concern of the Department of Trade and Commerce. He pointed out that contracts being made by foreign firms with our industry in Canada were the concern only of those individuals. I am referring in this connection to the export of flour under the Anglo-Canadian wheat agreement.

At the present time it is impossible for anyone to operate in the face of the monopoly so well established in Canada by such men as Mr. Dunning and Mr. Short, who sit in Montreal, watching all the highways and byways connected with the export of flour, and who make sure that all contracts go through their hands before reaching any western mills in western Canada.

Mr. Bryce: Under a Liberal government.

Mr. Viau: That has nothing to do with the present Liberal government. I am speaking of those individuals who represent the British Socialist government. One of them is also a director of the eastern flour mills, who has helped make the arrangements to see that the monopoly in connection with the export of flour is kept within the hands of the Canadian millers association. That organization has no federal or provincial charter. It is a group of individuals who represent the five great milling companies of Canada, and who make sure that they monopolize the export of all flour from this country.

Mr. Bryce: That is monopoly for you.

Mr. Viau: And the socialists are with it, also. This is a most important industry which could be established and maintained in western Canada. At the present time however nothing is being done to help it either in Manitoba or in Saskatchewan. With the help of the federal departments in Ottawa, including the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Transport and the Department of Mines and Resources, I can visualize that in future years, through the development of our natural resources in western Canada, we will have in that section of the country a large population and an increase in industry.

The development of those resources will involve the shipping of our goods to foreign markets. That is why I ask the government to reconsider what was so well understood years ago by the pioneers on the western prairies when they referred to the opening of the Hudson bay route—and not by railways; we have at the present time from Winnipeg to Churchill, a railway which is a burden to the country. This would be a navigation route through the Red river, lake Winnipeg and Nelson river, and could be developed at a low cost, when compared with the value of goods which would be forwarded by the producers of western Canada over that route.

A century ago we read that 31,900 traveled by boat on the Red river, and a century ago only, 25 million pounds of freight daily were shipped through that route. It is true—although there is no chart to show it—that a century ago the Red river was narrow. I have read that there are now living in St. Boniface people who sixty years ago crossed it on horse back. It is related however that a few years later that river was 150 feet wide. The channel is there, and despite the cost of building a few dams and locks beyond lake Winnipeg, to the estuary of the Nelson river, I believe the expenditure would be warranted to help in the development of western Canada. May I ask the government to give this matter its most careful consideration?

As I said earlier, I shall refrain from making a lengthy speech. I have felt however that as a western member I should bring these matters to the attention of the government. As a young man I can visualize the industrial growth of western Canada. As one who knows the history of our forefathers, who left security in eastern Canada to establish themselves in the west, I should hope that before leaving this world I might know that the government has seen fit to follow the plan which was desired centuries ago, and that the efforts of that past generation had not been in vain.

Mr. W. Garfield Case (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, may I begin my remarks by suggesting to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau) that he ought not to be too concerned about the length of the speeches delivered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I noted his reference to the position taken by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), formerly premier of Manitoba; and all I can say is that the matter of who broke up the dominion-provincial conference is certainly no concern of mine. It rested within the province of the administration to reassemble the conference. Indeed, had the fathers of confederation taken the position now taken by this administration we would never have had confederaton in Canada.

My first words would be those of congratulation to the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) and the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Demers), the mover and the seconder of the address in reply. I happen to know very well the hon. member for Essex West, having spent a good deal of time in his company in connection with the committee on Indian affairs. While I felt he did his best to create an impression of admiration of the government's administration, he overlooked one thing in which I am sure we are all vitally interested.

The speech from the throne contains no reference to the introduction of a bill to amend the Indian Act. As a matter of fact, at the last session of parliament, a bill respecting Indians was introduced and received first reading. We are now wondering just what is going to happen. Rumour has it that the committee will not be called to complete its work. Yet in the sessions of the last three years members of that committee laboured long hours in an effort to correct a situation to a point which they felt would be in the best interests of the Indian population of this country.

It was my privilege to serve on a royal commission and to travel throughout the maritime provinces and part of Quebec taking evidence from the Indians on the reserves, with a view to making it possible to correct a situation which in our opinion was detrimental to the Indian population. If the rumours are true that the committee will not be set up, having regard to the fact that we have redrafted the Indian Act and that the bill has received first reading, then I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the hon. members of this House of Commons, that it will be nothing short of a public scandal.

The Indians of this country have made representations indicating their desire to have a greater voice in their own affairs. I recall the compliments that have been paid to these splendid people for their contribution during the first and second world wars. In the second great war, not only did their male members offer their services, the Indian girls came forward and offered themselves. One Indian reserve, Cape Croker, adjacent to my riding, showed an enlistment in relation to population larger than any other community in Canada.

I feel that we would indeed be remiss in our duty if we did not proceed with the work of the Indian affairs committee. It has been considered to be possibly the most important committee ever set up to deal with a problem which had not received the attention of the government for many long years. In fact, it is said that the Indian Act has not been properly revised since confederation.

The hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) is the House of Commons chairman of the committee, which is a joint committee of the House of Commons and the other place. I am sure that he must share my views that the work of the committee will go for naught if no further reference is made to it. It will be a terrible let-down for the Indian population of Canada if they are not now to receive the benefits of the deliberations of the committee which were aimed at placing them in a better position to help themselves.

The Indians are expecting this. I am sure they will be greatly alarmed when they learn that possibly what is the last session of the twentieth parliament is going to be allowed to pass without this important phase of our national life being dealt with. The committee was set up through the Department of Mines and Resources and witnesses were brought from points all over Canada. Deliberations continued during the past three sessions and during the parliamentary recesses. If the committee is not to be reinstituted it will mean that its work will be forgotten, because there will be no hope of a similar committee being constituted until the next parliament. It would then mean going through the process again; it would mean the retaking of evidence and the drafting of another bill when one is all ready to be presented to this House of Commons.

I have had the opportunity of visiting Indians on their reserves and I know many of them. A great number of these Indians have made progress in spite of the handicaps they face. I plead with this house to give consideration to their problems and to reconstitute the Indian affairs committee. Let us get on with our work so that before this session ends we can present to this House of Commons a new Indian Act, an act already prepared, which can be approved by the house. We would thus show our regard for the problems which the Indians face today.

Having said that, let me proceed to other matters referred to in the speech from the throne. First, I should like to pay my compliments to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). He has been called upon to assume a most important office in the affairs of this nation. I should like to wish him good health and success as long as he is charged with that responsibility. Just how long he may be charged with that responsibility is very problematical. He is a fine type of Canadian and is possessed of a wealth of talent, but just how good his political judgment may be remains to be seen. The trend of the times would indicate that the Canadian people are not altogether satisfied and they are awaiting their opportunity to express their feelings.

I should like also to compliment an old friend of mine, the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King). I can think back many years to a time when the chief stock in trade of the right hon. member was Senate reform. I submit that after his long years of service to this nation there is another opportunity for him to serve still further. I am not thinking now of the writing of his memoirs; rather I am conscious of the fact that the Liberal members in the upper chamber were in large measure appointed by himself. They were his colleagues and they know something of his ideas of reform in the other place.

I think it would be most fitting if the present administration were to obtain his consent to his appointment to the red chamber where, with his former colleagues, he could introduce that measure of Senate reform which he professed to admire in days gone by. As a matter of fact I would say that it would be to the king's taste. In any event, the opportunity is there to render further service.

While we in this house appreciate the stabilizing influence of the experience of the older statesmen in the upper chamber, I think we realize that there is great need for reform. I believe most hon. members feel that it should be an elected chamber where possibly one-third of the members would come up for election at each federal election. In the ordinary course of events that would mean that they would be elected for from ten to fifteen years which would give them a certain sense of security but a greater appreciation of their responsibilities.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would the hon. member recommend that all the leaders of the Conservative party during the past few years should be in the other place?

Mr. Case: I would rather leave that to their own good judgment.

Mr. Cruickshank: They would be as effective there as they are here.

Mr. Case: I think in the not too distant future the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) will discover that appointments to the Senate will rest in hands other than those on his side of the chamber.

I should like also to pay my compliments to my very good friend the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken). He has indeed rendered a service to this nation. He made a great contribution to this parliament, and I was one of those who deeply regretted that his condition of health forced him to retire from the leadership of the party. But the Progressive Conservative party has always been resourceful, like democracy, and it found a man to take his place. From a wealth of talent the party was able to select a man who in my opinion will make a tremendous contribution to the national welfare. I am impressed indeed with his background and his experience at all levels of government. As a very young man he was an alderman of his native city of Guelph, and later mayor of that city. A little later he was leader of the opposition in Ontario; and at the first opportunity which presented itself, when an appeal was made to the intelligent electors of that province, he became premier. That was not just by chance, either, because they confirmed his administration on two subsequent occasions. So when we were seeking a leader we invited the hon. gentleman to accept that responsibility; and he has acquitted himself in this house with distinction to himself and with credit to his party. He has had perhaps a unique opportunity to gain experience denied to many of us; and when the present administration finds the courage to go to the country we are confident that he will be charged with the responsibility of carrying on government in this country.

Mr. Cruickshank: Wishful thinking.

Mr. Case: It may be wishful thinking. The man who whistles in the dark is only trying to convince himself that there are no dangers abroad, so when I hear my hon. friend interrupt I know that he too feels the skids are under the present administration and that before long we will have in Canada a new government, which after all will be good not only for the country but also for the Liberal party. This government has grown old and weary and is still suffering from the war complex, and thus acting contrary to the best tenets of Liberalism.

It is my privilege to represent part of the great county of Grey, which has a tremendous stake in the future of this nation. Our people are resourceful. Our farmers are among the most progressive in Canada. As a matter of fact—though I say this at the risk of being interrupted by my own colleagues—we lead all counties in the province of Ontario in the production of livestock. In the city of Owen Sound we have had a large industrial development. The city is growing at a substantial rate; and following the remarks the other evening of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) I want to say that we have one of the finest harbours on the upper great lakes. We do need a great deal of work done there, however, and I have been glad to enjoy the co-operation of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) in having some of that work done at the present time. I wish he would do more, because it means a great deal to our people.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The other day you told me you were satisfied.

Mr. Case: Well, Mr. Speaker, after all, if you get part of what you ask for, you are inclined to say you are satisfied; but this world has made its greatest progress because of the people who were never satisfied. Through the efforts of the Owen Sound board of trade I believe improvements will be made over a period of years which will be of benefit not only to our own community but to shipping facilities on the great lakes generally.

Mr. Cruickshank: Thanks to a Liberal government.

Mr. Case: You may say thanks to a Liberal government, but if the time ever comes when the government, charged with responsibility for the administration of this nation's affairs, fails to look after the public services in a riding just because the member happens to sit in opposition, then you will have a unitary system of government and there will be no democracy. So I say I appreciate that measure of co-operation I have received, and I hope it will continue to be extended. I might refer also in passing to the town of Meaford, where we have one of the finest fishing fleets in that area. There the Department of Public Works put up a fine retaining wall in the inner harbour, which will be of great benefit to that fleet.

My concern, Mr. Speaker, is not for my own people alone but for the people of Canada. My riding comprises thirteen municipalities, of which four are urban and nine rural. At Shallow Lake, one of the urban municipalities, we have one of the finest fur farms in Canada. Mr. Percy Noble, the owner of this ranch, has made a great contribution to that industry by developing special breeds of mink and silver foxes. Then the harbour at Thornbury requires attention, and I hope some consideration may be given to it in the estimates which will be presented in this house before very long. There we have an apple district second to none in Ontario. Over three thousand acres are now planted in orchards; and in the town of Thornbury and the village of Clarksburg we have warehouses, cold storage plants and processing plants capable of taking care of these apples and processing them for sale throughout the country.

An hon. Member: Including British Columbia?

Mr. Case: Yes, including British Columbia. Now I want to speak in a little broader vein, inasmuch as I feel that the administration should be concerned with the conservation of the natural resources of our country. In our county there is the highest point in the province of Ontario, at Dundalk, which is 1,735 feet above sea level. Here is the great divide or great watershed, indeed; but during the course of time, with settlers coming in, the whole countryside has been denuded of forest. Open ditches have been dug to drain off the surface water from Grey county and the other adjacent counties into the Grand river.

In recognition of the sanitation problem of the cities of Galt and Brantford the federal authority, in association with other legislative bodies, built what is known as the Shand dam on the Grand river near Fergus, Ontario. This cost $2 million and the object of it was to catch the spring freshets and hold them in an artificial lake. As the season progressed, these waters could be released for sanitary purposes. The effort to achieve this has failed, inasmuch as the spring freshets have not yet filled the basin to the satisfaction of those concerned. It is now proposed to build a dam on the Conestoga river at a cost of approximately $4 million. I present this to the House of Commons because I feel that a survey should be made of the conservation potentialities of this province of Ontario, as well as the other provinces of the dominion.

This great ridge I have mentioned should be reforested. By acquiring approximately 35,000 acres of land, reforestation could be carried out and, in due time, this great watershed would restore the natural flow to the Grand river, the Humber, the Credit and all the streams flowing north to Georgian bay. It would be a self-liquidating project and would pay substantial dividends on the money thus expended. I hope the time will come when this matter will be given most serious consideration by this house. It would mean a tremendous contribution to the welfare of agriculture in the counties of Grey, Bruce, Dufferin and the other counties lying on the south side of the great watershed.

I have been asked to make a reference to an irrigation development on the south Saskatchewan river. This is a considerable distance from my own riding, but realizing how much the general prosperity of the nation depends upon the prosperity of its various parts, I am only too happy to plead with this administration for the development of the irrigation scheme on the south Saskatchewan river. It has been represented to me that millions upon millions of dollars have been paid out in relief in that area. The average farm today is about 480 acres; but, with proper irrigation, farms would be reduced to about 100 acres with beneficial results to the community and the nation as a whole. I do hope that these will not be mere matters of election appeals, but that they will be matters which will receive the serious consideration of the dominion government and will be proceeded with at once. This would bring a sense of security to the farmers in that area of Saskatchewan who need the benefit of everything we can do for them.

I should like to say that in my view the C.C.F. socialist party would be better employed in making an appeal of this kind than in seeking to stimulate our interest in stepping up the amount of social security. After all, that is a very good thing, but the productive capacity of the nation is the sole security our people have.

Mr. Martin: That is what your own program, adopted at the national convention, recommends.

Mr. Case: Our national convention program will stand on its own feet, and I am not going to review it at this time. If it contains anything which you feel is worth while, you bring it in and you can depend upon our supporting it.

Premier Douglas was very frank the other day, in my view, when he was reported as having said his government had reached the limit of its social security program until more wealth can be produced. We do not need to be reminded that no government can give the people anything which the people themselves do not produce.

We find that events have brought about a decided change. Miss Agnes MacPhail, now a member of the legislature of the province of Ontario, says she is a social democrat, whatever that means. At any rate, it is a far cry from the days when she said the C.C.F. could mean, "Come, comrades, forward." As I review the events which have taken place and the deliberations of the C.C.F. socialist party's Winnipeg convention, in which they took fifteen minutes to consider and move a resolution to nationalize the banks and the Canadian Pacific Railway, I am amazed at their lack of judgment and their desire to take—

Mr. Young: I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member says—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member should not be interrupted unless he permits a question.

Mr. Young: I am rising on a question of privilege. A misstatement has been made by the member. The resolution to nationalize the banks took up four hours in the C.C.F. convention, not half an hour or fifteen minutes.

Mr. Case: Considering the type of people that would be discussing it, I would not care whether it took four hours or forty hours. I doubt if any one of them was trained in the art of finance or railroad management or anything else having to do with our national economy. As a matter of fact, since the days of the Regina convention, the C.C.F. has changed its position so often that C.C.F. no longer stands for what it used to stand, but now stands for Canada's comical fellows. This group is trying to discover some means of making an appeal to the people by appealing to prejudice, by setting class against class and by endeavouring to make the labour element discontented.

Mr. Matthews (Kootenay East): The hon. member is appealing to prejudice right now.

Mr. Case: The real challenge to labour today is to share the responsibilities of management; the challenge to industry is to share the profit which labour created. As an illustration of the sharing of responsibility, I mention a bulletin issued regularly by Dofasco, Dominion Foundries and Steel Limited at Hamilton, in which you will find that profit-sharing by that firm resulted in the distribution of $699,000 amongst the workers in 1948. I am convinced you do not need legislation to improve the social security position of the people of Canada when you find they are prepared to put their shoulder to the wheel to improve their own position.

To my friends on my left who are interrupting, the C.C.F. socialists, who have to all intents and purposes shaken off communism—I do not think the term communism should be applied to any respectable group in this house—I want to say that they have quite a long way to go yet before they are entirely free of their web, because you cannot accept communist money and deny communism. But that is what my C.C.F. friends are doing.

Mr. Matthews (Kootenay East): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am asking the hon. member a question. Can he prove that any member of the C.C.F. has accepted communist money?

Mr. Case: All right.

Mr. Matthews (Kootenay East): I want an answer on the question of privilege.

Mr. Case: I intend to speak on the question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order. I understand that the hon. member for Kootenay East wishes to ask a question of the hon. member who has the floor. But, unless the hon. member who has the floor sits down, the hon. member for Kootenay East should not press his question.

Mr. Case: I shall speak to the question of privilege. I shall answer my friend's question. It is a well-known fact that the labour unions of this country, the C.C.L. and the C.I.O., have in their ranks many communists. Many of them are led by communists. It is a well-known fact that those groups, by a simple majority vote, make a contribution to the welfare of the C.C.F. party as their political arm. So if my hon. friends are not receiving communist funds, let them deny that.

Mr. Matthews (Kootenay East): I still say that we are not taking communist funds, and the hon. member knows it. That is a lie if ever there was one.

Mr. Case: My hon. friends are receiving funds from the unions by simple majority vote. Can you separate the communist contribution paid to your party?

Mr. Young: Doesn't that make you mad?

Mr. Case: No, it does not make me mad. I am glad to see my hon. friends getting a little help from somewhere, because they will need it before long.

Mr. Young: And we will use it.

Mr. Case: As the man who pays the piper calls the tune, the communists must expect the people they are paying to be their spokesmen in this house and in the country. I say that with all kindness because I think my friends can shake this old man of the sea off their backs.

Mr. Nicholson: Name one communist contributor to the C.C.F.

Mr. Case: How about the electrical workers union, whose president, Mr. Jackson, was denied admittance to the United States?

Mr. Nicholson: They have never given a five-cent piece to the C.C.F.

Mr. Case: I am only giving my friends an opportunity to correct the error of their ways and get out from under this position into which they have worked themselves.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. Case: I am pleased that we now have as the leader of our party a man of vision and one who has faith in the future of Canada. When I review the past, I think about the initiative displayed in the province of Ontario in putting into effect the first major mass immigration scheme by air in the world. That scheme resulted from the efforts of a man of vision and a man of courage. I think of the vast industrial developments that have taken place since he became premier of Ontario in 1943, when he hastened to open Ontario House. I think of the vast development of the province of Ontario. Having all these things in mind, I feel that our leader is the logical man to lead the Dominion of Canada to better days, to great expansion and great realization.

I now want to ask one question: What of the British empire?—because after all, we are part and parcel of the empire. I am greatly concerned when I read in a Canadian press dispatch from Bristol, England, dated November 1, 1948, a statement by a member of the British government, a responsible minister of the crown. I wish to say that I do not believe it is any of our business what type of government the people of England have; that is their own business. But we all have a great stake in the empire. The press dispatch to which I referred reads in part as follows:

> Sir Stafford Cripps, Chancellor of the Exchequer, said Sunday he has not changed his opinion expressed in 1935 that it is "essential" to socialism that the British empire be liquidated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Case: My hon. friends of the C.C.F. say "hear, hear". I do not doubt that they would like to see the empire liquidated, but I for one would not because it offers to us the greatest sense of security we have. Even during the espionage trials, when Russia stood on the threshold behind the iron curtain, if we had been just a single nation, we could easily have been pushed around to our own detriment. I recall the tremendous contribution the British empire has made to the world in general. I think we should all pay a tribute, as did the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), to this gallant people who preferred to die on their feet rather than take orders on their knees, and who saved democracy and freedom throughout the civilized world.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Nicholson: Time.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Case: Go ahead.

Mr. Cruickshank: Did he approve the action of a man called Sauriol, whom the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) wanted interned during the war?

Mr. Case: The hon. member's knowledge of ancient history is greater than mine, and I do not intend to express an opinion about something of which I know nothing.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member does not want to know anything about it.

Mr. Case: I might like to know something about it.

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Case: I want to deal for a few moments with the problem we face with respect to exorbitant taxation. I feel that it is an important question. I have here before me a resolution passed by the city council of Owen Sound appealing for grants in aid to assist them with their educational problems, hospitals and social services, because taxation has reached such a high level in the Dominion of Canada that they find it impossible to maintain their civic services and still retain among the citizens an interest in home ownership or in real estate. After all, home owners are the backbone of the nation. I have a similar resolution from the Canadian School Trustees Association, also appealing for grants in aid to assist with educational and other problems.

Mr. Cruickshank: What about my question?

Mr. Case: We feel that the time has come when the government should give consideration to easing the burden of taxation. On more than one occasion I appealed to the ministers of finance when they presented their budgets. In the speech from the throne this year there is a reference to the budget. This reference is a departure from established practice, inasmuch as it indicates that in the budget there is likely to be some relief from taxation, and it results in furthering the confusion which we have been experiencing for some time. I believe that our hope, if we have faith in Canada, rests upon our ability to introduce greater efficiency into our governmental administrative branches and to cut taxation to the bone in order that we may encourage industry and agriculture to produce to their utmost.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time is exhausted.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member should be able to complete this speech by telling us about Duplessis.

Mr. Case: If I have the consent of the house, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: May I take this occasion to ask hon. members to do their best to confine their remarks to the forty minutes which are allotted by the rules of the house. After all, hon. members may be deprived of half an hour of their dinner recess at night in order to permit speeches of more than forty minutes. That remark does not actually apply to the hon. member who has the floor, but I would ask hon. members to try to limit their speeches to the forty minutes allotted.

Mr. Case: I will not abuse the privilege accorded to me, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, I was interrupted several times, and probably my time passed a little bit more quickly than I expected.

Mr. Cruickshank: What about Sauriol?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Case: I shall simply conclude by saying this. The quicker the government of Canada gets out of business, allows our dollar to seek an honest level, and allows our Canadian businessmen and others to seek markets for our goods, the better it will be for this nation. We then shall enjoy a greater sense of freedom than we have experienced in the last number of years.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): May I say a word on behalf of Canadian agriculture? On February 23, 1949, the Canadian federation of agriculture submitted to the cabinet their annual presentation. There were several of the passages in the presentation which I thought were of particular importance to the country and to this parliament. The first one of these deals with the dangers of fluctuations in our economic system as these dangers will affect the farmers. The second one deals with the need of maximum exchange of goods and services between countries. The third one deals with a recommendation that the government explore every means of maintaining consumer demand, I take it, both within the country and outside; and the fourth strongly recommends that the government work out a satisfactory formula for setting floor prices under agricultural products.

I think it only fair that I should read the quotations so that hon. members will see that I have paraphrased them correctly. They are as follows:

> We feel that if the economic system in the immediate future functions as in the past, without any attempts to control its more violent fluctuations, farmers along with other groups will suffer severely, as they did in the deflation of 1920 and the prolonged depression of the 1930's.
> For the maintenance of a successful agriculture it is essential that there be a maximum exchange of goods and services between all countries.
> Therefore as a means of reducing instability in the demand of consumers for food we recommend that without delay the government explore ways and means of maintaining this consumer demand.
> We therefore strongly recommend that the government should take immediate steps to work out a satisfactory formula for setting floor prices for farm products.

Briefly paraphrased, what the farmers want is this: they want markets at encouraging prices both at home and abroad for all the goods they can produce and offer for sale. The farmers want ample consumer purchasing power at home and abroad and the farmers want just prices.

I notice that there is a tendency on the part of many who speak in the house to cry out against the conditions which obtain in the country, to rail against the government for what it has or has not done; but I listen day after day and month after month for one single solitary solution as to how the matter may be made better. With 245 members paid by this country at the rate of $6,000 a year I maintain that it is a scandalous state of affairs that what is supposed to be the choicest men that this nation can produce should be sent here to spend their time for months and months just whining and complaining.

It is one thing to complain against the conditions being imposed upon agriculture; it is one thing to demand more suitable conditions for agriculture; but it is entirely another thing to prescribe a logical remedy for the ills which have afflicted agriculture for ages. I propose to suggest a feasible solution for Canadian agriculture. May I tell the farmers —and perhaps there will be those who will read my remarks—that the solution to their problems as set forth in the passages which I have read into Hansard can be found only through the principles of social credit. May I illustrate social credit so that the ordinary farmer on his farm and in his kitchen at night can understand it.

In the year 1815 the Guernsey islanders wanted to build a market house. The market house was going to cost £3,000. They debated whether or not they should raise taxes or whether they should borrow money and go into debt to build this market house. They finally decided that they would print 3,000 one-pound notes, government notes. You may call them government treasury bills, if you wish, such as the government Bradburys, used in Britain in world war I. Well, they printed the 3,000 one-pound notes and they bought the stone from their quarry and transported it to the place where the market house was to stand. They built the market house and it cost them financially not one single penny. The details are all given in "An Example of Communal Currency" by J. Theodore Harris. It can be found in the library of parliament. It is referred to as being authentic by Sir Norman Angell in the book "The Story of Money" at page 266, published in 1929, and also found in the library of parliament.

There can be no doubt that the experiment was conducted; there can be no doubt that it worked, because it is set forth in detail in that book.

The question will be raised, how was it that the 3,000 one-pound notes did not cause inflation? The reason was that there was a surplus of goods on the markets of the Guernsey islanders, sufficient to absorb 3,000 one-pound notes. When the 3,000 one-pound notes were spent, therefore, they merely consumed the goods which were waiting on the markets, many of which would have been destroyed, paving the way for more goods to be brought into the markets from the farmers and other producers. This experiment was carried on for fourteen years. It just revolutionized the economics of the Guernsey islanders, paying off debts, building roads, and so forth, and creating a state of prosperity which could have been the envy of the whole British empire. There is no doubt this happened. I am telling the farmers who will read this not to let a shyster tell them that it did not happen or could not happen. It did happen. It is history.

The principle which was used by Guernsey island could be used by the Dominion of Canada today, or by any of the provinces, if they had the constitutional authority which, under the British North America Act, they have not, and that principle would revolutionize the economy of Canada.

May I just deal with three questions which the farmer will be asked to answer. Could the Guernsey islanders have controlled prices with the Guernsey island system? Yes; if they desired to bring down the prices of shoes, or clothes or food or any other commodity in the island, they could have used part of the £3,000 of current currency to pay a part of the price, giving what is called by social crediters a compensating discount, so that if for example a pair of shoes were offered for sale at $5, they could be sold to the consumer for $4 a pair. That is a system of controlling prices which has not been discussed to any great extent in this chamber. But it is the social credit proposal for controlling prices. At least, it is part of what is known as the social credit just price mechanism.

How could the Guernsey islanders have sold, say, a surplus of Guernsey island butter to a country such as the Argentine, for example, which had products similar to those of the Guernsey island? It therefore could not repay the Guernsey islanders with the goods that the Guernsey islanders could accept. This is a problem which vitally affects Canada.

This kind of question requires an answer. And the answer is that the Guernsey islanders could have taken part of the 3,000 one-pound notes and could have bought a surplus of butter, sent it to the Argentine, and sold it on a time basis. They could have allowed the Argentinians to take ten years to pay it back, if they desired. All the Guernsey island producers and distributors would have received their pay, and the Guernsey islanders would not have been a bit worse off because they sold those goods abroad on those terms.

That illustrates the principle upon which we must solve the problem of international trade, as it faces us today. And if that principle is not adopted we shall never solve the problem of international trade when we undertake to deal with have-not nations like Java, India, China, Japan, Britain and others which cannot possibly repay us, or whose goods we will not see fit to accept.

How would the Guernsey islanders have managed when they wanted to buy, we will say, a hammer which was not manufactured in the Guernsey island? Britain would not accept one of the Guernsey island notes. The answer is that a Guernsey islander would have purchased one pound's worth of Guernsey island butter and traded it to Great Britain for a hammer.

Those three questions are vital ones which will be asked by people throughout the country concerning social credit. I have given the farmers' answer. I will tell you that, if this Guernsey island system were applied throughout the Dominion of Canada, the answer to this problem would be found, as I have indicated. The fundamental monetary principle underlying the Guernsey island market-house experiment can be applied to Canada as a whole, and with great success.

We face a world struggling in the grip of circumstances new and bewildering to the average citizen. That is why people feel so frustrated throughout the country; that is why people in the House of Commons are so frustrated. We hear the official opposition railing about provincial rights and railing about communism—because they have nothing else to talk about. We hear the Liberals talking about equally useless things, so far as solving the problems which face the nation is concerned.

There are vast and far-reaching developments which have been going on for many years. The trend finally culminated between 1913 and 1928, or thereabouts, when the world whirled into an age of abundance from an age of scarcity. What is causing us confusion, frustration, bewilderment and disaster is the fact that we have allowed our old economic system used in scarcity to continue to be used under the new economic conditions of abundance. You might as well try to run an ox-cart up Broadway, New York, among the automobiles, as try to run an economic system of scarcity in an age of plenty. There are breakdowns in every direction; there is confusion and disaster unlimited.

Along with this abundance came also a shortage of purchasing power. How did that come about? Simply because great machines were brought in doing the work of scores of men, and producing far more than had been produced before. But it did not give men the money with which to buy the goods produced. The result was an accumulated surplus which in the thirties we called overproduction when, as a matter of fact, it was underconsumption brought about by the fact that we were using machines and technological skills to produce the goods which people were unable to buy, owing to the limited purchasing power which came into their hands.

In 1918, as an illustration of this, United States produced $60 billion worth of goods. But when one counted up all the money which went into the people's hands through wages, salaries, dividends, interest and every other means, it amounted to only $45 billion. Of the $45 billion the sum of $5 billion was reinvested by the people in life insurance and in other ways, thereby taking it out of circulation. It left the United States with $60 billion worth of goods to sell for $40 billion, which was impossible. Out of that situation developed world war II, indirectly, a matter which I do not intend at the moment to discuss.

In the United States in 1935 they could have produced $135 billion worth of goods. That was enough to give every family in that country $4,400 per year. But only twenty-one persons out of every one hundred in the United States in 1935 were able to get the bare necessities of life, amounting to about $1,350 a year. There were seventy-nine people out of every one hundred in that country who were short of the necessities of life—in a nation able to produce such an abundance of goods. Numerous dislocations were the result of this condition. People were bewildered—and still are—both in Canada and in the United States.

World wars I and II seriously aggravated the situation because they produced further dislocations. For example, until 1914 Great Britain had financial supremacy of the world. That is, the world used British pounds for money. At that time it was easy to get British pounds; all a nation had to do was to produce goods and offer them to Britain for sale. Britain was open to buy almost any kind of primary product. This meant that almost any nation able to produce at all was able to secure British pounds.

As a result of world war I the United States took over financial supremacy of the world, making it necessary for people to get United States dollars with which to do business. It was not as easy to get United States dollars as to get British pounds, because the United States had a high tariff wall. She was able to produce virtually everything she needed.

Not nearly enough attention has been given to this important fact, one which has disturbed the whole economic system internationally, from the very foundation stone. A disturbance such as that cannot be adjusted without the deepest kind of readjustment.

That was the first problem. Then, after world war II, Great Britain was impoverished. Not only had she lost international financial supremacy, but she had almost entirely lost the ability to get the things she needed. The United States had grown into a prodigious financial and economic giant; so that it simply dominated every aspect of world affairs. That aggravated the situation still more. I say that, when we face a world in which such disturbances have taken place, we are simply fatuous if we imagine we can go on using the same system we used before world war I.

How is that going to affect Canada and most other nations of the world? They will suffer from a shortage of American dollars. What is the meaning of this in the United States and Canada? We are unable to sell our goods because the people such as Britain's who formerly bought our goods are no longer able to get the dollars with which to buy them. If we are going to survive, and if we are going to enable our neighbours to survive, we must make adjustments, because we alone are able to do it. We have the productive power.

Discussions in the house up to now have been largely about symptoms, never about causes. As I said a while ago, they have been about complaints rather than remedies. In this, my fourteenth year in the House of Commons, I almost despair when I think how little I have heard from hon. members indicating any desire whatsoever to approach these causes and do something about them. This year we are not even discussing plans; we are discussing largely red herrings and smokescreens. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) opened the session with an elaborate smokescreen which we have been trying for a long time to clear away. Then the other day we found the Liberal party, led by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), introducing a whole school of red herrings for us to chase about in the political pond. How in the world can a nation like Canada be adequately served by its members of parliament when they waste their time doing such nonsensical things? I suppose the next election will be fought on the question of whether George Drew or Mr. St. Laurent is the better fighter. Can you beat that for a platform? Yet that is just about what the platform will be. That is just about the issue.

An hon. Member: What about social credit?

Mr. Blackmore: Social credit will be lied about and misrepresented by the Liberals and the Conservatives until the people will not have the slightest idea of the truth about social credit. I shall be dealing with that in a minute or two. Social credit has no access to the radio; social credit has no access to the press.

Mr. Johnston: Or to the slush fund.

Mr. Blackmore: Or to the slush fund, as the hon. member for Bow River so aptly observes. What will happen in regard to social credit will depend entirely upon how many people read these words of mine or similar words in Hansard. Those people will be able to think for themselves with regard to the two great parties in the house whose business it is to enlighten the people, but who are busying themselves beclouding the issues.

We need to ask ourselves as members a straightforward and frank question: Does this house meet to register complaints or to find solutions? Do members come here to rail against the performance of the government in power; or to offer constructive suggestions in a sincere co-operative endeavour to concentrate the abilities and energies of all men of good will, striving to sketch for ourselves the general outlines and nature of the kind of new world order desirable for a free people. When those inside the house and outside the house get down to answering that question frankly, if we face up honestly to the situation we shall do much better than we have done up to the present time in the present session.

Let me urge upon everyone the desperate seriousness of the times in which we live. We hear outbursts against the communists. You may as well deliver outbursts against the west wind or against one of these waves of cold weather that we have had. Of course if you do not do anything about the cause of communists, communism will come—it will come by default.

We of our generation must effect a change from the old world order of say thirty years ago or even earlier to a new world order suitable for tomorrow. Do we suppose that an acceptable new world order will create itself just because we need it urgently? Do men ever assume that a new type of machine, a new mowing machine or a new type of technological skill such as that having to do with plastics, will design, devise and construct itself? Have we left to chance the working out of new techniques of warfare? Certainly not. Why should we leave to accident the fabrication of effective new techniques of peacetime? One essential technique of peace must surely be our economic system. How can we content ourselves in leaving the needful changes in our economic system to drift? We must not so neglect our economic system.

Here is an example of the typical attitude to be found on the government benches. They held a Liberal convention of all Alberta in Calgary in February and our dashing young man-about-town, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), went out there full of exuberance and oratorical skill. This is what he said, and I quote from The Albertan of February 3, 1949, front page:

> In Ottawa very few of us understand what the Social Credit party stands for, what it means or what it represents.

The minister did not say that any of them understood what social credit meant.

Mr. Johnston: There are only a few of them over there now.

Mr. Blackmore: Their failure to understand is certainly not due to any lack of effort on the part of the Social Credit party to explain nor to any lack of literature that would make perfectly clear the meaning of social credit.

I hereby invite the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to study social credit.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at seven-thirty o'clock.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was arguing that the only way it will be possible for the Canadian federation of agriculture to attain the objectives it set forth as desirable in its presentation to the cabinet on February 23 is by the implementation and use of social credit principles.

Social credit is based upon the proposition that the power of a government to create money representing surplus goods already on the markets and coming upon the markets can be utilized by a sovereign government as an important source of revenue.

The key to an understanding of social credit and its proposals is the understanding of money. I hereby invite the members of parliament to begin at once to study the important question of money. I hereby invite any member of the house to answer the following questions about money.

1. Has Canada now sound money?

2. If so, what makes a nation's money sound? Is it gold backing? Is it price control? Is it having money all borrowed into circulation? Is it having abundant production? Is it having much trade; or is it a combination of these, together with some other factors? We find a great many people running around the country sneering about "funny money." We are giving them a chance now to either put up or shut up.

3. When is it likely to be harder to keep a nation's money sound, in peacetime or in wartime, and why?

4. Was Canada's money sound before the Bank of Canada was established, and why?

5. Before the Bank of Canada was formed, did the dominion treasury print a proportion of Canada's paper currency?

6. Was a two-dollar bill printed by the dominion treasury before 1934 unsound? If not, why not; and if so, why so?

7. Was the Finance Act of 1923 unsound, and why?

8. Was the Finance Act of 1915 unsound, and why?

9. Did the dominion treasury in world war I create and use in the prosecution of the war $26 million of debt-free money? See the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, published in 1933.

10. Were those dollars unsound or sound, and why?

11. Did Great Britain, in world war I, create hundreds of millions of pounds of Bradburys, and with them win the war? See Dr. William A. Shaw, "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges."

12. Were those pounds sound money or unsound money?

13. If unsound, how did Britain win the war with them?

14. If sound, was there any sufficient reason why Britain should have turned the redemption of those pounds over to the Bank of England?

15. Were British sterling pounds sound international money prior to 1914?

16. Were they sound before 1939?

17. Why, in the case of questions 15 and 16?

When hon. members of this house, or any of them, get the answers to these questions they will know something about money. If the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) will study these questions and get the answers, he will not go out to Calgary again and make inane remarks.

I particularly challenge five members of this house to answer those questions on the floor of this house. They are the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who I understand poses as the financial expert of the Conservative party. I want to see just how much of the financial expert there is in him.

I defy any member of this house to show in this house that the social credit concept of money is fallacious in any respect. I defy any one of the five above mentioned gentlemen to accept my challenge of today, some time during the present session of parliament. If any one of the five indicated fails to accept this challenge or to meet this defiance, I will announce his failure by whatever means and in whatever place can be made available to me. That will be taken as clear evidence that the government and the opposition cannot possibly explain away social credit, and that is why they devote themselves so much to a lot of silly remarks about it, such as "rubber money" and all that kind of thing.

This challenge and this defiance are extended to include specifically the Montreal Star, the Montreal Gazette, the Toronto Telegram, the Toronto Daily Star and the Winnipeg Free Press, as well as each of the Alberta daily newspapers. Each of these organs has been loud in its denunciation of social credit. Here is a chance for them to put up or shut up. They can answer in their editorials and send me the editorials. That is all I ask; I will carry on from there. This defiance also includes any other newspaper, person or agency that feels disposed to enter the fray.

This challenge and this defiance also include specifically the whole dominion Department of Finance, from the deputy minister, Dr. W. C. Clark, all the way down the list of his advisers and experts. Evidently the poison which has been affecting the whole attitude of the Liberal party in Canada concerning money has been emanating from that department. Here is a good chance for them to put up or shut up. They can advise members of the house, and those hon. members can report here.

As soon as this house determines the soundness of social credit's monetary proposals the Canadian nation will be in a position to give Canadian agriculture a real fair deal, for the first time in the history of the country.

No industry in Canada has been so disgracefully abused, so kicked about, so disregarded, so ignored and so maltreated as has the industry of agriculture. The time is long past and gone when that sort of thing should stop. Once the house takes a proper attitude on money we shall have a real chance of doing for the farmers what they asked in the four excerpts I read into Hansard.

We shall be in a position also to devise and construct a new order, acceptable to free men. We shall not be in danger of drifting into communism, which is the thing we are drifting into. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal government's method of dealing with the farmers in respect of income taxes smacks of communism to such an extent that I believe even the Russians would be ashamed to have that sort of thing happen to their farmers. That may sound like a wide and sweeping statement, but I can bring plenty of evidence to back it up, and before this session is over I shall probably do so. The thing that is important to bear in mind is that we do not need to wait until some party that has the name of communist comes into power. You can have a party with the good name Liberal or the respectable name Conservative still communistic in its thinking and in every act it performs.

I expect the replies of the five hon. members I have mentioned, and the sooner they get those replies in, the better because I am going to be reminding them quite regularly in this house of what I have said.

The simple fact is that we are just playing with governing this country. The Liberals know perfectly well that under the present financial system they cannot govern the country as it should be governed. They know they cannot possibly distribute enough purchasing power, for example, to permit the children of this nation to have the milk they need. They know perfectly well they cannot give the old age pensioners anything like the amount they ought to have. They know they have cheated the veterans at every turn of the road. Already, they are beginning to take away part of the pensions that have been granted to the veterans, notwithstanding the conditions in which the veterans find themselves.

Just to illustrate how pathetically their policy is working out, even on the eve of an election, let me quote from an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of February 26, 1949. This information comes from the milk foundation of Ottawa.

A survey recently made by the Department of National Health and Welfare reveals the startling fact that 27 out of every 100 of our school children are definitely undernourished. An additional 23 out of every 100 children revealed signs of probable malnutrition.

In Ottawa milk is now 18 cents a quart and every child is supposed to have a quart a day. Mr. Speaker, there is not a member on the Liberal side—in fact I will defy any member to question what I have to say—who can maintain that that illustrates good government. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) can come in here and scatter his red herrings, even though he knows this is the ghastly sort of thing that is being done in this Canada of ours, even in an election year. So, Mr. Speaker, I say you do not need to have a communist government in power to get communist government. We can get that, and we get it automatically, unless we take safe and sane measures to guarantee our way of life.

(Translation):

Mr. Lionel Bertrand (Terrebonne): I do not intend to speak at any length; I shall need but a few minutes to state my views and those of my constituents on some matters of a general character.

First I wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) has to his credit an experience and a parliamentary ability which do him great honour. As regards the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Demers), he is already commanding the attention of his fellow members. As we represent neighbouring constituencies I was glad, in the December election, to give him my co-operation and I do not regret having done so.

I would not want to refrain from commenting on the retirement of the Right Hon. Mackenzie King and emphasizing his long years of service to Canada. His name and his work will go down in history. May I also, on behalf of my constituents, wish to the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent the success he has every right to expect. His task is a heavy one, but God has endowed him with all the qualities necessary for its successful accomplishment. Besides, the way he has steered the ship of state since assuming the high position of prime minister ranks him among the most outstanding of our statesmen.

I represent a constituency in the southern part of which agriculture and industry are proudly competing for supremacy.

The central and northern parts are exclusively tourist areas. My constituency belongs to that wonderful district called Canada's Switzerland, which is renowned throughout the American continent. So I insist, as I did in 1948, upon the appointment of a minister of travel and I propose to bring up the same subject again when the dominion travel bureau estimates are brought down. I am in favour of the appointment of an ambassador to the Vatican. The world is troubled by constant threats of war and by spreading and increasing confusion. Above human frays and political disputes, His Holiness the Pope preaches peace and love among all peoples. Rome is a beacon in the storm and the Pope's utterances leave unconcerned neither Catholics, of whom he is the spiritual leader, nor the faithful of other religions who see in him one of the greatest figures in world diplomacy. His diplomacy originates from God and when he begs men to place God at the basis of their lives, when he asks nations not to forsake spiritual values, the only ones which really count, His Holiness is showing the world the only formula for true progress, for real security and enduring peace. About thirty countries are represented at the Vatican. Canada, a nation which now counts in the world organization, must also make it a point to have an ambassador to a state which is above all states, to a sovereign who has no army other than his moral strength but who can be, through this strength and with God's help, a powerful and unbiased counsellor to the whole world.

I am in favour of allowances to crippled and disabled persons. I hope the resolution which appears on the order paper will be discussed at the present session. The crippled or disabled persons are a neglected and forgotten class, and I suggest immediate consideration of a plan whereby the government alone could give the underprivileged the place in the sun to which they are entitled, should the provinces refuse to co-operate after being duly approached.

Along with the people of Terrebonne and all citizens who believe in God and respect human freedom, I reprove those who, in Hungary, plotted against Cardinal Mindszenty and other members of the clergy, organized their trial and shared in their conviction. I urge the government to keep on protesting to Hungary and again request the release of the distinguished prelate. And should nothing come of it, should Hungary resist the pressure from all the countries in the world, let the case be referred to the United Nations. The world also has evidence that communism is resolved to control men's souls as well as their bodies. Every means then should be taken to check any outbreak or the progress of communism. Legislation alone will surely not stop the diabolical workings of this insidious doctrine. In addition to necessary legislation, let there be improved social security measures. Let us put an end to poverty, spread happiness, remove the causes of social injustice, provide employment. These are sure ways to destroy communism.

If the north Atlantic pact is to be a union of nations who wish to pool their power, for the ultimate purpose of ensuring peace, averting war, checking war-mongering and effectively fighting communism throughout the world, it will be the most opportune and practical action ever taken by democracy in our time. I believe, for my part, that every country which is a party to the pact must be at liberty to decide, when the conflict begins, if at all, the part it will take in it.

Mr. Speaker, I favour the adoption of a distinctively Canadian flag, which will owe nothing to France or Great Britain, or to any other nation in the world, and, being entirely Canadian, will become the rallying standard of a people which must shape its own destinies, as it is quite capable of doing.

There is another matter about which I particularly wish to express my opinion, which is that of all our people. I am speaking of a tax reduction, with special reference to income tax.

[Mr. Bertrand (Terrebonne).]

I very much admire the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), and I feel it unfortunate that his position has compelled him to accept the entire responsibility for the last few budgets, that responsibility being that of the whole government. I admire him very much, as I have said before, but I do not have quite the same feeling for some of the officials in his department, whose ability I do not doubt, but who, not being responsible to the people, are not quite close enough to them to understand them. They will perhaps say that taxes must remain high in order to conform to great principles of economics, but the public will no longer, in 1949, accept this view, which, though its soundness may be argued, no longer matches the needs or the wishes of the people. The Minister of Finance, himself a member of parliament, is acquainted with his constituents' wishes. I have confidence in him. What the people want is not merely to exist; it is to breathe, it is to live!

From 1941 to 1946 the Canadian people were so heavily taxed that it would have been foolhardy to increase the taxes. In wartime sacrifices were necessary in order to win the war and to save democracy. Taxes were deducted at the source. The lowest of wages were taxed, compulsory savings were set up, and the people accepted that taxation burden. They were told that at war's end everything would revert to normal; already they could visualize all the comforts that would be theirs after the war, the long happy carefree days of peace and contentment. During the war, from one session to the other, the iron-collar was tightened, but the people were willing to pay to win the war, even if they grumbled about the gifts and grants to Great Britain which, incidentally professes her love for us when she is in a spot but too often even lacks the decency to show us a mite of gratitude when it comes to preferential treatment in matters of trade.

The war is over. But the income tax has not been substantially reduced compared to the fantastic increase in the cost of living. The average taxpayer, the ordinary worker, the man who lives on a pension do not live nowadays, they simply exist. And what amazes me most is the publicity given to our surpluses. In December the press announced in bold headlines a surplus of $900 million for the first nine months of the fiscal year.

That is a lot of money, and I am glad Séraphin is not living today.

Experts may have the best reasons in the world for wanting to set up reserves, reduce the national debt and ensure financial stability in this country but let us not forget that the people in turn have reasons for wanting, after eight years of efforts and true co-operation, to be treated with a consideration which would really please them. I was moved recently when a worker told me, in his own rough but truly sincere language: "All we have been served these last few years in the way of tax reductions are sandwiches, while we wanted a full meal". These hopes for a sizeable income tax reduction are shared by thousands of employees and they are legitimate hopes which, if left unfulfilled, will be a source of acute disappointment. There are thousands of industrial workers in my constituency and all share the same views. This government must keep the confidence of the people. A sizeable income tax reduction would be in order now that general business conditions are becoming normal again and that the country has carried out its post-war responsibilities. The Liberal party is the party which, according to public opinion, best embodies the yearnings of the Canadian people and that is why, during the course of this session, it should grant the demands of the people in general. Let there be luxury taxes; that is all right, but homes and families should not be taxed further. Let us do away with the tax on soft drinks. It might be alleged that soft drinks are harmful to health but nevertheless, even if that dubious allegation is accepted as true, soft drinks are the beverage of the low-income families. Let the government abolish the tax on the chocolate bar, which is the favourite candy of most families. Let them raise to $2,400 and even to a higher figure the basic income tax exemption, which will enable low-income families to live in greater comfort. Let them also grant a special concession to the young men and women attending colleges or universities. Many talents remain undeveloped through the scantiness of family resources. In short, let the government forget the small taxpayer and concentrate on the one with ample means. Wage earners can hide nothing; the deduction at the source even deprives them of the satisfaction of handling the money they earn, and of putting it to good use during the year. On the other hand, wealthy people can mention a lot of expenditures, they can conceal securities, do transactions, resort to speculation, and so on. Two weeks ago the newspapers reported the case of a business man who, it was said, had eluded payment of taxes amounting to a few million dollars. Let the department of income tax concentrate on powerful companies which are playing hide and seek with it. What it will thus recover from them will more than compensate for the small sums it would obtain from a multitude of people in the normal everyday welfare of whom pennies play an indispensable part.

The Liberal party has always been recognized as the only protector of the people, which the Progressive Conservative party cannot boast of being, for it always has been known as the protector of big interests and large businesses. The Liberal party has to its credit popular achievements which cannot be denied. In the realm of social security, for example, has it not led the way? What changes have gone on in that field since the day when, in 1927, it brought down the Old Age Pensions Act! All the provinces did not accept it at once, but not one of them would do away with it today, even for the sake of autonomy. Even those provinces for whom autonomy is the theme of the hour would be much embarrassed if Ottawa did not pay 75 per cent of the cost. Among the measures are one granting pensions to the blind and administered on the same basis as the Old Age Pensions Act, with the lion's share being paid by Ottawa; the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, which I consider deficient in numerous respects, too slow in its application, too arbitrary in numerous cases where a decision should be based on circumstances alone, but nevertheless essential at certain times for the protection of the labourer temporarily out of work; the Family Allowances Act, 1945, so bitterly criticized by the present leader of the opposition and the upholders of autonomy at the time, but which the people consider as a refund wholly provided by Ottawa from the financial resources of the country and applied, without any political considerations whatsoever, to the full development of our young people. The latter, once grown up, will carry on the task of keeping the country big, strong and free. There is also the national health program still in its initial stage, and the grants to the provinces for the building of hospitals, for the prevention of all kinds of illnesses, which grants the provinces may accept without sacrificing any of their rights. And tomorrow we shall have disability insurance, destined to protect the workingman against the hazards and insecurity of life, to assure him, all day long, that should he become an invalid, his wife and children will not be destitute or dependent upon public relief. In short, the Liberal party has shown the way and made it easier. However, for the sake of the people's security, the Liberal party must have the country's confidence. The people ask for a reduction of taxes. Circumstances and the financial position of the country warrant it. Let us comply with the people's wish!

That is my opinion. I should have been ungrateful to the people who proved their friendship for me in so many ways in 1940 and 1945 had I not spoken in their name as I did just now. A member should be the spokesman of his electors. What the people want is a good standard of living, wages that will provide for their family a normal cost of living, full employment, labour legislation to protect the workers, a little sunshine and security in their daily work. They also need to feel, deep down in their hearts, that in their daily work and in special circumstances, they can count on the co-operation, the support and the friendship of the government they elected. In Canada, I repeat that the Liberal party is considered the party of the people. Let it prove itself worthy of their confidence during the present session, and they will keep on supporting it.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): In my remarks the only reference I shall make to the speech from the throne is this: I should like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply. I am particularly pleased to congratulate the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) because I have been fairly closely associated with him for the past three years on the Indian affairs committee. This committee was engaged for that long period in trying to determine how a better deal could be provided for the aboriginal inhabitants of this country. The committee heard a mass of evidence from Indians, from departmental officials, from church representatives and from other people on what has been wrong with our past treatment of the Indians and our present treatment of them. We also heard evidence in connection with changes which should be made in the Indian Act, and the administration of that branch of the government to improve the situation. Perhaps the evidence which we heard was too voluminous to be well digested by the committee, but in any event we made a tentative revision of the act which it was thought would remove at least some of the injustices and disabilities under which our Indians are labouring.

My understanding was that this recommended revised act would be submitted to the law officers of the crown, who would remove the kinks in the wording, and things of that kind, during the parliamentary recess, and when parliament reconvened for this session the act as reworded would be submitted to the Indian affairs committee for final study and amendment, and then introduced in the house. Thus it was with considerable surprise that I heard the Minister of Mines and Resources, in reply to a question from the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden), make the statement which appears at page 184 of Hansard of this year, and which reads as follows:

> It has not yet been decided when the bill will be introduced. It may be that we shall reconstitute the committee and ask its members to make a final survey of the bill when it comes from the Department of Justice. This procedure may facilitate agreement between all parties when the bill is returned to parliament. However, this is just my thought and no official decision has been made.

I am surprised, first of all, that in the seven months of the parliamentary recess the law officers of the crown were not able to revise the draft act which was submitted to them. I am surprised that they have not yet finished this revision. As a matter of fact, I have heard rumours to the effect that they have not yet done any appreciable amount of work on it, if any. I have also heard rumours that the bill is not to be introduced this year. I sincerely trust that these rumours are false. I think the minister should immediately make a statement as to what are the government's intentions in this matter. That is necessary in order to quell the fears which have been raised that nothing is to be done. After the large amount of work which was done on revising the Indian Act by members of both houses of parliament, by departmental officials, by literally hundreds of Indians and by many other people, and after the high hopes which have been raised in connection with the matter, it would be deplorable if things were just allowed to drift on as they are, and nothing further was done in the matter before this parliament comes to an end.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I should like to warn the government that if that is the position which they intend to take it will have very bad effects from the political point of view. It is well known that Indians cannot vote. But in this country there are many thousands of people who are sincerely interested in the welfare of our Indian population, and if this matter is not brought to a conclusion during this session of parliament, the political effects will be serious for this government.

I should now like to turn to another subject. On Friday last the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) brought up in the house a matter which is of great importance in the city of Calgary, and which I think is a matter of national importance. I refer to the housing mess under the National Housing Act and the Bow River Construction Company project in Calgary. I believe it is of national importance because the mistakes made there, the injustices and the hardships imposed on veterans, have also occurred, I believe, in other parts of Canada.

This particular housing project happens to be in my own constituency, and I was asked to look into the matter by a considerable number of the victims. The hon. member for Bow River has covered the situation very well and in considerable detail. I do not propose to repeat what he has said, but there are some points which I should like to emphasize. The people who got houses under this project bought what they were given to understand would be a completed house for a specific sum of money. The way in which it was done was as follows: They went to a real estate agent and paid to him the difference between the mortgage held by the Manufacturers Life and the sale price of the house. None of these purchasers had anything to do with the arrangements made between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Manufacturers Life and the Bow River Construction Company. As a matter of fact, subsequently they were not even allowed to look at the plans and specifications and thus be able to determine for themselves whether the houses being built were actually being constructed according to the plans and specifications or not. These people were told by the real estate agents and so forth that the houses were being built under the National Housing Act, and that inspection of these houses to guarantee proper construction would be carried out by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and by the Manufacturers Life.

In other words, they were given to understand that all they had to do was to put up their money, and when the house was completed move into it; and since it was a government-sponsored project they had nothing to worry about. In the letters which I received from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and in the conversations which I had with their local manager in Calgary and so on, the corporation always emphasized the fact that they had no legal responsibility for the deficiencies which have developed in these houses. Whether that is so or not I do not know, but if it is so then certainly there is a deficiency in the law which enables these corporations or the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Manufacturers Life to deceive—I think that is the only word which can be used—the men who bought these houses, and to leave them in the lurch.

If the corporation and this government—the corporation, of course, is an agency of the government—have no legal responsibility, they certainly have a strong moral responsibility, and that moral responsibility they should assume. The only solution put forward by the government and by the corporation is the one stated last week or the week before in the house by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), namely, to increase the amount of the mortgage.

This is no solution at all. I should like to give an example in that connection. A young air force veteran, whom I know well, and who spent four or five years in the air force during the war, bought one of these houses. He is now told that the cost of putting it in a state of reasonable repair, so that it will be livable, will be about $3,500. At the present time he has an equity in the house of between $2,000 and $3,000. He said to me that if he assumed a further mortgage of $3,500 it would mean his entire equity would be wiped out, and in addition he would be several hundred dollars worse off than if he threw up the whole thing and went out to buy a new house.

Of course the catch in his going out and taking that course of action is that his money is gone, in this particular housing project. He is stuck. He can see that if he assumes this further mortgage of $3,500 he is not only paying for a dead horse, but he is paying interest on a dead horse, as well as several other charges. What can he do? He sits there, practically helpless; and many other people are in the same situation. Some are worse off and some not as bad, depending upon how much it will cost to put each house in reasonable condition.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are responsible for the shameful condition of affairs existing. The reason they are responsible is that they selected and approved the contractor who carried out this housing project. This was a firm of contractors without the experience necessary to construct houses of any kind, a firm without any financial backing sufficient to make good any deficiencies which might develop.

I cannot see how the government and the corporation can get out from under that responsibility by any legal quibbling, or anything else of that nature. That being so, I call upon the government to appoint a special committee of the house to investigate the activities of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, with special reference to the Bow River construction project in Calgary. This committee should have power to recommend to the government the action to be taken to relieve the distress of these people who have been victimized in the project—and not only in this project but, I suggest, in others of a somewhat similar nature which will be discovered across Canada.

Furthermore, the committee should be appointed just as quickly as it can be done.

The matter is urgent and for this reason: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) on Friday last said that foreclosure proceedings had already been taken against two of the holders of these houses. Then I found in a Calgary paper last week that several more have had foreclosure proceedings instituted against them. Apparently the plan of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company is to proceed against these people piecemeal, to close them out one at a time, and thus prevent what one might call a mass complaint at any one time.

Next I should like to say something about oil. This is an important subject upon which I have spoken in the house at every session since I have been here. I am sorry to say, however, the government does not seem to have become aware of its importance, and has not taken most of the steps to encourage the search for oil recommended by the Alberta Petroleum Association, now known as the Western Canada Petroleum Association, and by others who are familiar with the oil industry.

I should like again at this time to draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), whilst he is engaged in the preparation of the budget, the recommendations I first made in the house on July 18, 1946, and have repeated at every session since that time. I shall not go into these recommendations in detail. They are concerned with the tax deduction for deep test wells, with increased depletion allowances for oil wells, with placing the present tax concessions on a permanent basis, and various other technical income tax matters. I have drawn all these matters to the attention of the minister so often in the past that I am sure he knows what they are. If he does not remember, then I suggest he refer to my speeches of July 18, 1946, and February 13, 1948.

The oil industry has received very little attention from the government; and in my opinion it is time they took at least some steps to encourage what is becoming in western Canada one of our most important industries. Since the trip to Alberta in January of this year by the Minister of Finance I should hope that he would now have a better appreciation of the importance of the oil development taking place. As a result I should hope that he would be prepared to incorporate in the budget some of the suggestions made to encourage and to increase that development.

He was reported in the Calgary Herald of January 5 as saying:

> Alberta's oil and cattle have contributed greatly to the bettering of Canada's position in regard to United States dollars.

[Mr. Harkness.]

In addition to improving our dollar position, oil production in Alberta has, by the production of new wealth, put a great deal of money into circulation in this country, and has provided a great deal of employment, not only for those directly engaged in the search for oil, but for workmen of all kinds engaged in producing materials used, and in building pipe lines and refineries.

I should like to give briefly something of the picture of what has been happening in the past year in Alberta in connection with the search for oil. In 1948 some 365 wells were completed, of which 133 were dry holes. That indicates of course that this is still a risky business, requiring large amounts of risk capital. The rapid increase in drilling which has taken place can best be illustrated perhaps by comparing the increase in drilling footage. Hundreds of thousands, and millions, do not mean much to most of us. So, instead of expressing this in terms of feet, I have reduced the figures to miles.

In 1946 wells were drilled aggregating a little more than 75 miles; in 1947 this was increased to just over 166 miles, or more than twice as much. In 1948 the wells drilled amounted to more than 322 miles, or almost twice as much as in the previous year, and four times the figure of 1946. In 1948 we produced in Alberta nearly 12 million barrels of oil, an increase of over 4,500,000 over 1947. The significant fact, which is often lost sight of, is that nearly half the 1948 production came from the old established field of Turner valley in my own constituency, which up until 1947 produced nearly all the oil recovered in Canada.

However, this picture is rapidly changing and last week Turner valley was responsible for just over one-quarter the oil produced. The amount of this production is now approximately 50,000 barrels a day, which is a new record in our oil production. The latest week for which I have figures for the various fields is the first week in February when production was approximately 46,000 barrels per day. As I indicated a minute ago, that has since been increased to 50,000 barrels a day. The 46,000 barrels per day was distributed among the various fields as follows:

Turner Valley	13,000
Leduc-Woodbend	25,000
Redwater	5,000
Lloydminster	1,100
Other fields combined	1,900

Those are approximate figures to the nearest hundred. The consumption of oil in the prairie provinces is upwards of 45,000 barrels per day at the present time so that Alberta is able to supply all that market and have some left over for eastern British Columbia and other places.

I should like to mention that pipe lines and refining facilities have not been equal to the great increase in production which has taken place. This is a condition generally met with in the development of oil fields. Once production begins to increase rapidly, pipe lines and facilities for marketing are not equal to the production. We are just getting into that stage at the present time. When that happens the wells will have to be rationed and production will have to be cut down so that each well may gets its fair share of what market is available or of what can be taken out.

The construction of pipe lines and refineries is going forward rapidly. A pipe line from Edmonton to Regina is now assured and Imperial Oil Limited are going ahead with construction this year. I understand it is to be 16 inches in diameter and will have a capacity of 100,000 barrels a day. With the present production of all Alberta fields being only 50,000 barrels per day, it will be seen that it is anticipated that production is going to be increased materially.

As more wells are brought in I am sure the pipe line will be extended eastward to Winnipeg and the head of the lakes. The day is rapidly approaching when the oil fields of Alberta will be able to supply the entire Canadian market. At the middle of February there were 105 wells being drilled in Alberta, exclusive of the Lloydminster field. I left that out because that field produces a very heavy type of crude oil which is suitable only for locomotive use, the making of asphalt and things like that. In addition the wells are mostly small producers.

Perhaps I should note that these wells are distributed throughout some 54 separate areas, and only a few of those 54 areas are proven fields. In other words, a large number of wells are what are known as wildcats, any one of which may bring in a new field. The rate at which new fields are being brought in is indicated by the fact that in the past two weeks five new fields were brought into production in Alberta by the bringing in of successful wildcat wells in each case. It is estimated that in 1949 some 450 wells will be drilled. If the ratio of success is as large as it was last year, the resulting production will be materially increased.

All of this gives some idea of what has been accomplished and of the enormous possibilities which exist. Oil men in Alberta believe that the oil resources of that province have merely been scratched up to the present time. The fact that successful wells have been brought in in widely scattered areas would indicate a strong possibility, in fact I would say almost a certainty, that scores of new fields will be found in the intervening areas.

If you take a map of Alberta on which the present oil fields are indicated, you will see that there is a tremendous rectangle of territory on the edges of which oil fields have been discovered. Starting at the southeast corner, there are the oil wells at Pincher Creek. Then leaving there and going up along the line of the mountains you have the wells in the Turner valley, and then up beyond that again you have the wells at Leduc, south of Edmonton. Northwest of Edmonton there is the Barrhead field which was brought in just last week. Beyond that again are the McMurray tar sands, and then away to the north outside the province are the Fort Norman wells.

Coming back northeast of Edmonton you have the Redwater field and then going east to the Alberta-Saskatchewan boundary you have the Lloydminster field. From there you go south where you find another field that has been brought in at Hanna which is northeast of Calgary and southwest of Lloydminster. South of there again you have another field at Princess, and then down at the Montana border there are wells near Coutts. That gives a large rectangle of territory with oil fields around its edges. It is almost a certainty that the intervening area can be developed to produce a large amount of oil.

Some oil men are of the opinion that even more oil will eventually be discovered in Saskatchewan than has been discovered in Alberta. Of course little development is going on in that province because there is a C.C.F. government in power. Surveying and drilling expenditures in Alberta are running to about $4 million per month, but oil men are not going to spend money like that in a province where the government in power is likely to seize the fruits of their efforts.

In this connection I should like to say something about the benefits which the government and the people of Alberta have received from the policy which has been followed in the development of oil in the province. Nearly all the mineral rights in Alberta are owned by the crown in the right of the provincial government, which retains a twelve and a half per cent royalty on all oil produced from those lands. I would estimate that at the present time this gives Alberta a revenue in excess of $15,000 a day, which amount of course is increasing every week. In addition, however, the government retains a portion of every exploration lease granted an oil company, and that land, or rather the mineral rights on it, have become available to the government for sale. In the present month the Alberta government sold the mineral rights on two sections of this land in the Redwater field, that is 1,280 acres, for over $5 million. In the eleven months of the present fiscal year the government of Alberta has collected over $11 million from leases, royalties, rentals and other fees in connection with oil exploration and production.

This is only the beginning, Mr. Speaker. If this development continues, as it seems certain it will, I am convinced that soon the province will be in the happy position of having so much revenue from oil that it will be unnecessary to impose any taxes if it does not wish to do so. The way in which these oil revenues are mounting and are likely to mount is simply stupendous.

It has been said many times that Alberta has more resources than any other province in Canada, but the truth of this statement is only now becoming apparent. In that connection I should like to emphasize that oil is only one of the potential sources of enormous wealth. We also have tremendous quantities of natural gas; we have greater known coal reserves than all the rest of the dominion put together and, even more important, we have about the largest area of arable land, with a favourable rainfall for the continued production of farm products of all kinds, of any province in Canada. Up to the present we have had comparatively little manufacturing. That will come, however, and I think very rapidly. In my opinion Alberta is indeed the land of opportunity and will continue to be such as long as we keep the dead hand of socialism off it, with the stultifying effects that philosophy always produces.

I now turn to another subject: the protection of the population of Canada in the event of a third world war—an atomic war. This threat does not appear so ominous or imminent at the present time as it did some months ago; nevertheless it exists, and I believe the first duty of the Canadian government is to take whatever steps may be open to it to minimize the loss of life which would take place if such a war occurred. I am not referring so much to the purely military preparations we should make, and I hope are making to some extent. Rather I am referring to what in England during the last war were called passive defence measures for the civilian population against air attack.

The atomic bomb is primarily a weapon to be used against the cities and industrial areas of an enemy; and if a war should come between the western democracies and Russia there is very little question but that this terrible weapon would be used against such targets in this country. I believe a large number of people have lulled themselves into a false sense of security in the belief that Russia does not have the so-called "secret" of the atomic bomb and will not discover it for a long time. From what I can learn by reading the published opinions of a considerable number of the best known nuclear physicists, there is no such thing as a "secret" of the atomic bomb; it just does not exist. The principles of nuclear fission were known to scientists in all countries of the world before the last war, and all that is necessary to produce an atomic bomb is a sufficient number of these scientists, with the large plant required, and sufficient time. As far as I can learn, any industrialized country can produce an atomic bomb if it has the scientists and is able to provide the money, plant and time. That is what we did during the war, and by "we" I mean the United States, Great Britain and Canada. From what I can learn, at the time the first atomic bombs were dropped on Japan the men who know most about this sort of thing estimated that it would take the Russians anywhere from three to ten years to produce atomic bombs in quantity, and most of those scientists believed it would take from five to six years. I would point out that nearly four years have passed already since the first atomic bombs were dropped, and the probability is that Russia will have a supply by 1950 or 1951, if indeed she does not have them now.

The question for us, then, is what steps we have taken or should take for the protection of the civilian population of this country. I believe the government should make a statement on this important matter without delay. For security reasons no one would expect the government to announce what military steps have been taken, but security considerations do not prevent the disclosure of what has been done and what is projected to minimize the effect of attacks on the civilian population.

Mr. Cruickshank: If the hon. member will permit a question, would we have to consult the provinces on that matter?

Mr. Harkness: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would welcome a serious interjection by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), but unfortunately he never makes any. It is true that a start has been made in tackling this problem. As I understand it, General Worthington was appointed by the government to survey the situation and submit plans for passive defence measures for this country. In my opinion this should have been done long before it was, and some of these measures should have been undertaken already. It is generally accepted, I think, that there is no effective defence against atomic bombs. Some are bound to reach their target, no matter what is done. The best method of minimizing their effect is the dispersal of our population and industries. Unfortunately our industries are not well dispersed; they are nearly all concentrated in the manufacturing centres of Ontario and Quebec. I suggest that one way in which this could be corrected would be by encouraging the establishment of new industries in the smaller cities and towns across Canada. This would have other good results, apart from giving us greater protection in case of an atomic war. A definite method for accomplishing that would be for the government to refuse loans from the Industrial Development bank to firms wishing to build in the present congested industrial areas, and to extend loans more freely to firms establishing elsewhere.

Pressure could also be put on other lending institutions to the same end. Another avenue open to the government to accomplish this dispersion of the population is to refuse to lend money for home building or to put up government-sponsored housing projects in the large centres of population. I refer particularly to Toronto and Montreal, since those places would have to be evacuated by a large percentage of the population if atomic attack ever came to this country. I can see no indication that the government's housing program is being conducted with any of these ideas in mind, and it is my contention that it should be.

Precautionary measures to meet the threat of atomic war are a long-term planning proposition, and government action of the sort I have spoken about should be undertaken at once. If atomic attack on Canada were imminent, a scheme of evacuation from all large cities to country towns and camps for all people not needed in the cities would be necessary. To make such a dispersion plan practical, existing accommodation in country areas needs to be surveyed. The stock piling of food, medical supplies and other necessaries must be arranged. Perhaps depots will have to be built for that purpose.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): I am sorry, but I have to remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Harkness: I can finish in about one minute.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Harkness: There is probably a need for a large number of tents to be distributed about the country for use as emergency shelters. These are just a few of the things involved in measures to protect the civilian population of this country. I should like to be informed by this government as to what has been done along these lines, and what is planned. A workable set-up will take a long time to produce, and now is the time to be getting at it.

Mr. T. J. Bentley (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to follow the example of other speakers and congratulate the mover (Mr. Brown) and the seconder (Mr. Demers) on the excellence of their speeches in moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne. If I may, I should like to congratulate the leader of the opposition on his speech on that occasion and to say how much I enjoyed it. How gratifying it is to us in this corner to know the stand he has taken every time he has risen to his feet in the house. He is an excellent debater; we all have to admit that. He has a most marvellous memory; we have to admit that. He knows history so well that his memory gives him a splendid advantage, for he knows exactly what to leave out as well as what to put in. His regard for the truth is expansive and generous. He has a great avidity for power, but it will be a sad day for the people of Canada, especially in my part of Canada, if by some unfortunate circumstance he ever achieves the position of Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Too bad you won't be here with him.

Mr. Bentley: My hon. friends have changed directions so often, Mr. Speaker, that one can almost believe they are different one time from another. No matter how much they change, however, they remain the same. They always expose their hole card in the finish, and it is usually a deuce.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): This time deuces are wild.

Mr. Bentley: These deuces are always wild, and they never really amount to anything if you play the game according to Hoyle. It is only in a game where you make up the rules as you go along that they count.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Do you want to take that game on some time?

Mr. Bentley: We have it on right now, and we will be prepared to meet you gentlemen on any kind of ground you want, any time you tell us the day.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) also entered the debate and proceeded to chastise the leader of the opposition. Many of the things I have said about the leader of the opposition could very well be applied to the Minister of Agriculture. His memory is equally good; his regard for the truth is equal, and his ability to remember what to leave out is equal, to that of the leader of the opposition.

Away back in 1935, after the Tory government had been in power for five years, under pressure from the people of western Canada they came to the conclusion it would be better to do some of these things the western people were asking them to do. At that time, the government introduced the wheat board. The Liberals were the official opposition and opposed some of the most important features of the wheat board brought forward by the then Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Weir, who unfortunately came to an untimely death. He was a man highly regarded in western Canada.

We move along to the present and we find the positions reversed. The Liberals are in power and they are doing certain things through the wheat board. The opposition now comes from the Progressive Conservative party. Both of these parties have changed their views according to whether they were over there or over here on this side of the house.

An hon. Member: With which position do you agree?

Mr. Bentley: We will let you know before the session is over with which one we agree. At the present time, I am dealing with the manner in which these two parties can change direction when it suits political expediency to do so.

Mr. Fraser: You are waiting to see which way the wind blows.

Mr. Bentley: No, I am not waiting for anything. I was indicating the inconsistency of the Progressive Conservative party. I usually refer to them as "Tories", but I understand they object to that, so that is another way in which they have changed. They have changed their name without any fundamental change of party policy.

Back in 1944, they were extremely loyal people, the Progressive Conservatives. They were extremely incensed by speeches made by a member of the Bloc Populaire, Jacques Sauriol. I do not know whether I have pronounced the name properly but I shall spell it if necessary. If one were to look at pages 5118-19, 5233, 5245, 5443-44 and 5514-16 of Hansard one would find—

Mr. Mitchell: Of what year?

Mr. Bentley: In 1944.

An hon. Member: Telephone numbers?

[Mr. Bentley.]

Mr. Bentley: You do not need them. You are presumed to have eyes and your statements are there. The late R. B. Hanson, then Conservative leader in the commons, demanded the internment of Mr. Sauriol. The member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) took the same stand at that time. Yet this same man, whom they were condemning in 1944 for having said the English soldier was the rottenest in the world, is being folded to the bosom of these Tories down in the Nicolet-Yamaska constituency.

Mr. Graydon: Sour grapes.

Mr. Bentley: No, it is not sour grapes. At no time has anyone in this party sought the support of anyone who showed disloyalty to this country.

Mr. Ross (Souris): What about some of the 1939 speeches of your party—no men overseas.

Mr. Graydon: Helping the government again; your allies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order. I would ask hon. members not to interrupt the member who has the floor.

Mr. Bentley: I do not mind when the wits, the near wits, or the other kind of wits get going. Let them have fun. I just wanted to remind my hon. friends opposite who jeer, and my other friends over on this side of the house, that they are much the same.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, no.

Mr. Bentley: We are not at all misled by these sham battles. The Progressive Conservatives and the Liberals believe in the same things. They believe in the right of the mightiest to be the victor. They believe that to the victor belong the spoils. There are no fundamental differences between the two parties. I would make an exception of one or two members of the Liberal party who, in my opinion, do not have that philosophy. But the administration of the affairs of this country under the Liberals has indicated that they have the same basic philosophy as have the members of the Progressive Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

An hon. Member: Where have you been?

Mr. Bentley: And when they try to tell us that the C.C.F. is giving its support to one party or the other, they are wrong.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Graydon: Just the other party.

Mr. Bentley: It so happens that occasionally we find it necessary to make up our minds whether something is good or bad; and since I have been in this house, slightly better legislation has been proposed from the government benches than we would have had from the Tories if they had been in power. But any time my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party can get up in this House of Commons and offer something constructive—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Do not ask for the impossible.

Mr. Bentley: —and not something ethereal, as the leader of the opposition does when he gets up and talks about his great desire for provincial rights, I shall be glad of it. In fact, in his speech the other night the leader of the opposition spent half of his time telling the government and the country how they should apply the iron heel to all the subversive elements. The remainder of it he spent in telling us that we should not apply the iron heel to anybody else in the country or apply any kind of control, or even have a federal government. I do not think the Progressive Conservatives know what they want any more than do the Liberals.

I will give you, Mr. Speaker, another illustration of the same kind of thing. All during the debate on Newfoundland we found that our friends the Progressive Conservatives were determined that the government should submit the matter to the provinces for consultation. What they intended to do after they consulted, I do not know. It is like consulting the boss for a raise in wages; and if he says no, you do not get it. Or it is like making love to a young lady; if she says no, it is all over.

Mr. McCann: Sometimes.

Mr. Bentley: They want the government to consult the provinces about that matter because they are so greatly concerned about the rights of provincial governments.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The hon. member had better consult St. Paul.

Mr. Bentley: My hon. friends opposite, the Liberals, do not want to consult the provinces on this matter, because this was one occasion on which they wanted to have their own way without consultation of the provinces. But last year about this time when the government, through the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), introduced bill No. 135, to amend the Wheat Board Act, which measure would have the effect of bringing oats and barley, or oats or barley, under the operations of the wheat board, they wanted to consult the provinces about their own legislation because they did not have what it took to put it into operation without that consultation.

I wish to say a little more about that matter, Mr. Speaker. On several occasions I have asked the present Minister of Justice to tell us the difference between Premier Garson of Manitoba and the law officers of the crown down here. He finally answered me by saying what is recorded in Hansard. I asked him if he intended to give a ruling now, as Minister of Justice, as to legislation passed when he was premier of the province. The minister replied in this way, as reported in Hansard of February 21 of this year, at page 723:

> The minister has not been asked for a ruling as to the need for provincial legislation to make effective the amendments to the wheat board act passed at the last session of parliament.

Technically he is correct. Being a lawyer and a politician, he could not possibly overlook, I suppose, a little technicality and come out with an honest answer. But here is a letter that he wrote. While I admit the question is technically incorrect, the purpose of the question was there, and the minister knew it. On March 16, 1948, Premier Garson wrote a letter to Right Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, Ottawa, which reads in part as follows:

> We would like to have a copy of the legal opinion upon which you base your view that provincial legislation complementary to your own is necessary. If the present dominion legislation controlling interprovincial and export trade in wheat be valid without complementary provincial legislation we find some difficulty in understanding why legislation controlling interprovincial and export trade in oats and barley and providing also for control of local marketing as ancillary to control of interprovincial and export trade, should not also be valid. We would like you to assure us that in passing complementary legislation we would not be invoking the provincial jurisdiction unnecessarily.

Why could he not have given me the answer to the question he asked of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, referring the Minister of Trade and Commerce to a legal opinion from the law officers of the Department of Justice? Yet when I asked him a simple question, he dodged the issue by saying that the question was never asked. I think the Minister of Justice should be a little bit more just when he is replying to questions from this side of the house, when we are seeking information.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say this. In view of the length of time that my hon. friend has been in the house, I am sure he must be well aware of the practice that the Department of Justice produces opinions only when it is asked for them by other departments. If it is not asked, it does not produce the opinions. That is all the answer that question needs.

Mr. Bentley: It is precisely the same answer as I received before.

Mr. Burton: And just about as intelligent a one as we can expect.

Mr. Bentley: I come to another little quotation. I wish the Minister of Trade and Commerce were in his seat, because these are words he used in conversation with a group of people who were greatly interested in this matter. He said:

> I don't care whether we have the power to do this or not. I want to know through the legislatures whether all the farmers in western Canada are behind this.

I agree with the present Minister of Justice, that when he was Premier Garson of Manitoba he was correct that there was no occasion for any provincial enabling legislation, or whatever it is called. I refer to legislation that is supposed to be concurrent; I believe there is a particular word for it.

An hon. Member: Ancillary.

Mr. Bentley: "Ancillary" may be the word. I believe, as he did at that time, and I think he still believes it, that it was not necessary, because there is the proof. They did not have the courage to put into effect the very bill for an amendment to the wheat board act that they brought in then, they have not had the courage to do so since, and there is no indication that they intend to do it in the near future.

In the speech from the throne the first sentence reads:

> The first concern of government in world affairs is to ensure peace and security.

Those words indicate that the government have a sense of responsibility and a conscience. If that assumption is correct, I want to ask them if they honestly think they have done all they might have done to make the people of Canada feel peaceful and secure. Surely peace and security, like charity, should begin at home. Yet we have the farmers in a state of unrest. They do not know what their marketing conditions are to be. The government we have today have been utterly incapable of finding a way around this money block that is in the way of our trade policies. Lately they have had to rely entirely on money from ECA, and nobody has any assurance that it will continue to be forthcoming; and if it is not forthcoming what are we to do with wheat? How are we to sell our surplus wheat and other farm products and get something in return that we can use in our stores and other businesses to provide for us in Canada? As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is aware—he told us so when he spoke to the Canadian chamber of commerce early in the winter—the government know that they have not been capable of devising a way of arranging some kind of trade agreements. I know we have depended on ECA. I think that was wrong. Certainly they have left the agricultural people of this country in a very uncertain condition.

The workers are not feeling secure. They do not know what is going to happen. I know there was a big backlog of public works. When I came down here in 1945 we were told that that was going to take care of all contingencies that might arise. When unemployment appeared the government were going to take out their little blueprint, a road was to be built here, a public building there, and they were going to take up the slack. They have not done that, and the slack is showing up more and more all the time. There are a number of people unemployed not only in Vancouver, where they went to enjoy the pleasant weather, but right here in Ottawa. Today's press tells us how many there are drawing unemployment insurance in the city of Ottawa, and it also tells us how glad the city administration is because it does not have them on relief. They are very glad of unemployment insurance, but if they are drawing unemployment insurance they are unemployed and they are worried because some day the unemployment insurance will come to an end. Yet nothing has been hauled out of the pigeonhole by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), by the government, or by any department to take care of those people when their unemployment insurance has run out.

These workers are not feeling secure, and are not feeling at peace by a long way. The smaller businessmen throughout the villages and small towns of this country are not feeling peaceful and secure. They have their shelves stocked with high-priced goods which they are committed to pay for, if they have not already paid. They do not know whether they are going to be able to sell these goods at prices which will give them the necessary margin to keep their businesses going and give them something for the management and operation of their businesses and their investment. They are not feeling a bit good at the present time. They are feeling very insecure and very unpeaceful in our Canadian economy.

The veteran is not feeling very good, Mr. Speaker. Many, many veterans are worried and are feeling insecure at the present time, and this for various reasons. For instance, some of them have had to struggle very hard, and they have managed to get some kind of a domicile in the days when prices are high, as they have been these last few years. They have managed to purchase their homes, or most of them have got them on time. Now they are wondering what will happen if there is deflation, or if a depression sets in. They are wondering how much of the investment they have in those houses is actually going to belong to them if a depression or a recession comes along. They are not feeling a bit secure. As a matter of fact they are feeling insecure. Many others have not got homes, and some of them are living in houses built by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I stayed in one of these houses with a young veteran and his family this winter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Johnston: Did the roof fall in on you?

Mr. Bentley: No, it did not. It is an ice house in the winter, but I am convinced it will be a flytrap in the summer. There is only one difference between these houses and a tent. On a windy day the tent walls will move a bit more than the walls of these houses.

Mr. Johnston: And the mortgage plaster.

Mr. Bentley: Yes, and a variety of other things; and yet the price of these houses is above what used to be the price for a pretty reasonable and well built house in this country. If Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, their contractors and the administrators down here cannot find a way of doing a better job than that, they should get some more experts or get a bunch of old farmers or working people to give some real expert opinion on how the job should be done.

The old soldier settlers are not feeling very secure. For a number of years the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) has been endeavouring to have the old soldier settlers granted free title to their lands. He has been supported by this group continuously and consistently, both in the house and when we had an opportunity on the veterans affairs committee, which used to sit here before the government decided not to call it together again. During these years it was always refused. The government knew that they had to give way, and they did give way, but they gave way in a manner of which they should not be proud. What are they doing today, Mr. Speaker? Instead of being generous, instead of saying to the public, "we are going to give a free title", they are going out there with their agents, with their travelers, and calling on the old soldier settlers and saying: "Now, look, Mr. or Mrs."—if she happens to be the widow of a veteran soldier settler—"how much would you be able to give in cash right now and get a free title?" They are taking the last nickel that the soldier settler finds he is able to dig out of his pocket. That is not something of which the government should be proud. The government should have been more generous than that. It will cost them as much, or nearly as much, to get what they are going to get and then grant a free title on the individual basis, by that chiselling method, as it would have cost to wipe the whole thing off and give these people what they should have had at this time. But no; even though it will cost more they would rather do it in this way because they have not the courage to stand up and say, "We were wrong".

The chairman of the veterans committee was wrong in 1945 and in 1946. When he was chairman of the committee, Mr. Tucker opposed this, and the government did not want to do it. They opposed it in the house, and they have not the courage to stand up and say, "We were wrong; we should have done it at that time, but we will do the best we can now; we will make amends and give them free title at this time." They go out and try to square themselves by this petty little chiselling method that they are using at the present time.

Who is feeling happy and secure? Not the consumers of the country; they are not happy. They are not happy out in our part of the country, where they cannot buy the things that they would like to have because of the restriction on civilian goods coming from the United States. I know that restrictions have been lifted a little recently, but there are still many goods that you cannot get, which you would like to have, and which they would like to have, Mr. Speaker. Yet they see trainloads of military equipment coming up there. Surely to goodness, at this stage of the game, there should be some evening up. There should not be trainloads of military equipment moving in here while at the same time there are restrictions on necessary civilian goods. Certainly that military equipment does not make them feel secure, and not being able to get the things that they want does not make them feel that they are secure or even comfortable in their lives.

When I mention these things I mean that our people are not feeling secure or peaceful today; yet in His Excellency's words, which I presume were handed to him by his advisers, we find this:

> The first concern of government in world affairs is to ensure peace and security.

If we are to have peace and security in world affairs we must have some demonstration that our government knows how to produce something along that line at home.

The next paragraph in the speech from the throne, which struck me as a rather unfortunate statement, reads as follows:

> Employment is at higher levels than ever before. In striking contrast with communist countries, the free economy of our country is demonstrating its ability to provide for all a high standard of living, social justice and individual freedom.

That is a pretty cheap comparison, Mr. Speaker. We have not had a shooting revolution in Canada for a hundred years. We live in the garden of Eden, not because of our own ability but because we were lucky enough to be born here or because some of our forefathers had the good fortune to come here. We have everything that a people can require; whereas those people in the communist countries have never had a free economy. They have had anything but freedom, and they do not rejoice in the riches and the natural resources that we have. Every one of these countries has been war-torn and battle-torn in the last few years, and yet the government has the effrontery to compare us with them. If we were not immeasurably better off than they are we should be highly ashamed of the way in which we have managed the riches that Canada has made available to us. If it is right to make a comparison of that kind, why not compare us with non-communist countries such as South Africa, and South America, or India, or European countries which are not communist. Are we not better off than all of them? And should we not be thankful we had no shooting war here? Should we not be thankful that, bad as it was, when we lost many of our young men from this country by death, and when others were disabled, there were not more of our civilian population hurt. Should we not be thankful, instead of bragging about it?

There is only one comparison we have a right to make in this country, and that is the comparison between what we are able to do and what we do. We are not doing all we are able to do in this country to make our own people more secure. It is stated in the speech from the throne that employment is at a higher level than ever before. That is correct. I believe it is at a higher level, generally speaking, with the exception perhaps of the most important war years. I am not quarreling with that statement. But that is poor comfort to the fellows who are not employed.

There should not be any unemployment in this country. Jobs should be going begging —and well-paid jobs, at that. There is plenty to do. There is an endless amount of work. There should never be any unemployment in Canada, in the foreseeable future, with the amount of work necessary to be done here to develop our public and private enterprise.

There is no excuse for any unemployment in this country on the part of anyone who wants to work. I am not concerned about the fellow who does not want to work. I am like a great many other people; if anyone does not wish to earn a living, then I am not much concerned about him. He can go from door to door, or can live in a jungle, if he wishes. But for those willing to work and who cannot get a job, that is not good enough. We should not have any bragging. We should brag only when we can say that there is no unemployment, and not likely to be any unemployment in the foreseeable future.

Mr. Cruickshank: We have to look out for Saskatchewan, you know.

Mr. Bentley: No; you do not have to look out for Saskatchewan, at all. We keep them pretty busy out there. In Saskatchewan the only unemployment we have of any kind is among those engaged in types of business or trade wherein the products of the factories are shipped to the export market; and those products are not allowed to be shipped because of the type of exchange we must receive for them. For that reason about 200 people were laid off in a co-operative horse-packing plant in my city of Swift Current.

Why was that? Simply because the ECA funds have run out. Our horse meat was being purchased with American dollars. The people in the areas they administered were not able to buy the horse meat. No other country has Canadian dollars with which to buy it, and the result is that we have unemployment there. It is not because of anything the Saskatchewan government has done, but because of things the government of Ottawa has not done in the way of trade relations and monetary arrangements to make it possible.

Mr. Cruickshank: Blame the horse meat on George Drew.

Mr. Bentley: Even though we have high employment in the country at the present time, according to the words last year of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who is not in his seat tonight, half the earning people in this country do not pay income tax. It is not good enough to say that we have high employment. How much are employees getting for their labour? How much is being paid in wages? If they are not getting enough to come within the income tax brackets—low as the exemptions are—then certainly there is not much to brag about in that type of employment.

The only difference between some of those fellows and the unemployed of the thirties is that in the thirties they were the idle poor, while today they are the very busy poor. But, as for being able to buy the amenities of life and the good things which we in this country should be able to buy, they are just as unable to buy them today as they were in those days. In the matter of employment I would urge upon the government that much should be done to correct that situation.

I believe that a good deal of this could have been avoided. In 1945 this group, supported by some others—and I shall not mention them all—at this end of the house, tried to get the government to see that the wartime controls they had brought into effect during the bitter days of war should be retained. They said they were wise, and that they had the wisdom to relax those controls, gradually. The then minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, said in the house at the time, "We will release these controls in such an orderly manner that we never will repeat the inflation that we had after world war I".

But the wisdom was not there. We had higher inflation than at any time after world war I, because of the decontrol methods used by the present government. I know some will say that foresight is better than hindsight, or give some other excuse, but I am convinced that if our advice had been taken we would not have found the uneasiness and unrest which one finds throughout the country at the present time.

I know my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party, and many in the Liberal party, will say that if those controls had been kept on there would not have been production. But there was production in wartime. You do not have to promise a farmer an inflated price for his goods. All you have to promise is a square deal, and he will produce to the limit of his ability.

I believe the coal miners and the other industrial workers would do the same thing, as would many industrial plants—not the monopolies, of course. Probably they would want nothing but profit. But I believe there are many conscientious private enterprisers in this country, owning small production plants, who would have responded to an appeal of that kind. As long as they were allowed their standard profits, they would have continued to produce to the extent of their ability, both individually and in their plants, despite the retention of the excess profits tax, the subsidies, and price controls —if they had known how important it was to retain them.

We tried to tell the House of Commons and the country how important it was to do that; but our suggestion was not followed. Today the government has this difficulty on its hands. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stood up one day and made a boastful speech about the high national level of income. I believe he said it was $15,500 million. But in reading a statement made by the governor of the industrial bank I find he says that the higher income is not attributable to the greater production of physical goods, but rather to the increased price of the physical goods produced. He points out there is very little difference in the over-all unit production of physical goods in this country.

So that, if the national income is higher than ever before, all one has to do is to take the biggest year and double it, giving $31 billion as a national income, and double that again—make it any figure you like.

Someone said this afternoon—and I thought it was a wise statement—that the things which make up national income are the goods produced and distributed among the people. There is no use saying that our national income is a great income if it has not found its way into the production of consumer goods, and other things needed by the people of Canada. And that has not happened, despite the so-called high income of the last year.

The government are now beginning to see their mistake. We wanted them to extend the subsidies on steel, coal and all the rest of it in those years. They did not do it. Now they are going to do it. But how? They are going to lend money to any steel company, dollar for dollar. If a steel company will put up a dollar, the government will put up another dollar, and they will expand in that way. If that turns out all right, and if the industry is prosperous, then the owners of the industry make bigger profits than ever before, to be placed in the hands of a few people. But if it is not prosperous, what happens?

Well, one of two things would happen. The government would give them the right to wipe off a good deal of their capital cost, which would include some of the government's investment, and charge it against the public treasury of this country. Or, on the other hand, they might say to them, "Go bankrupt; we will take you over and wipe this out ourselves. We will guarantee your bondholders for every cent of their interest in the bonded investment, as we have in connection with the Canadian National Railways."

But we should not go about it in that way. The steel business of this country and other national resources are too big to be left in the hands of private people who have no responsibility to the House of Commons or to the people generally. They should be kept in the hands of people who, if they did not administer them properly, could be changed by popular election at some time in the near future.

I want to mention the Marshall plan and ERP. We welcomed that when it was first announced because we thought it was a grand thing that the plentiful supply of goods on the North American continent should be made available in some form or other to our war-torn brothers and sisters across the seas. We expected great things would come from that, but they have not happened although we hope they will.

Canada has depended to too great an extent for her prosperity upon ERP and ECA moneys from the United States. We are big enough to have an ERP and ECA program of our own. There is no earthly reason why we could not have developed some plan to help those countries that needed help and then in ten, fifteen or twenty years take back from them the goods that we wanted. But we did not do it. Why? One reason was that the experts in the government apparently could not devise a way to do it. The second reason was that we did not dare to say to those people: When you can make enough jack-knives, motorcars, radios and so on, we will take them.

They were afraid of those people in this country who have enjoyed such tremendous protection that they now consider that what was granted as a privilege in the baby days of their industries is now a right that they should be permitted to enjoy for ever.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are getting ready to call me to order and I shall not strain your patience one bit. I do not see why we could not adopt the same principle that we adopted during the war, because this country is facing problems just as serious if not so acute as those faced during the war. During the war we drained off the surplus spending power of the people in order to prevent inflation and to prevent people from buying those things which were not available. That was done by means of tremendous publicity campaigns which let the people know that they were doing a patriotic duty and which told them why it was necessary for the welfare of Canada. The people responded and they invested their money.

The same thing could be done today by any government that had the courage to put on the same kind of campaign. Money could be raised to provide an ERP program of our own. I will not impose upon your patience any further, but I shall have more to say on the Progressive Conservative amendment and the main motion.

Mr. J. M. Dechene (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, I appear on the scene in the role of a replacement and therefore I shall throw myself on the generosity of hon. members, of which I have so often taken advantage. The majority of hon. members know that only recently I escaped from the scalpel of the surgeon and the drugs of the physician. When the opportunity presented itself for me to address this august assembly this evening, I did so because I felt that perhaps I had a message to convey to the members of parliament and through them to the people of Canada. This House of Commons is considered to be the forum of the people. No matter whether we have a great deal of ability, the message that we are able to deliver should be one of encouragement in these days when often the skies are clouded.

Before I refer to the clouds that I see upon the horizon; before I refer to the organization work which is being carried on so skilfully against what is left of the democratic peoples of this world; before I point out to the hon. members of this assembly who are here tonight, as well as to those who are present in other free parliaments, the danger of the situation until the north Atlantic security pact has been concluded; before I refer to the activities of the leader of communism in France, Thorez; before I refer to the activities of the communist leader in Italy, Togliatti; or to the activities of the communist leader in Great Britain, Pollitt; before I refer to the activities that have been carried on to create distrust of those who are still endeavouring to ensure peace and security for the Canadian people, I should like to discuss one other matter.

As I said, I consider that this is the forum of the people. I am going to ask the members of this house to listen to something of a local nature, something in the nature of an action d'éclat that happened in my own country but which unfortunately you will not find set out in the columns of the great metropolitan newspapers although it was referred to in the local press of the constituency of Athabaska.

Quite often over the radio and in the press we hear and read of great rescues that have been performed by airmen flying into the far north to bring out someone who is sick or to perform some other great task. We are used to that sort of thing in Athabaska and Edmonton. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that since the first days of aviation in the far north the people of Edmonton and the constituency which I represent were the first to organize expeditions of this character.

I remember years ago when Gorman and May of Edmonton, who originally came from Athabaska, flew members of the R.C.M.P. in a plane, an old flying box car, to the shores of the Arctic ocean to capture a mad trapper who had murdered many people. No flier or aviator of today would dare to do what I am about to relate: The incident I should like to relate has to do with George Rault and another young returned man, Georges Ouimet, of Bonnyville, Alberta. These two men left by plane to look over the country north of Cold Lake where some fishing company was prepared to carry out fishing operations. They were considering the possibility of carrying the fish by airplane to the railhead. For some reason or other something happened to the airplane they were flying and they had to crash-land it some seventy-five miles away from the nearest hamlet or habitation, in country that is as rough as anything outside the Rocky mountains. Fortunately Rault, who was flying the machine, was able to pick out a place where the trees were not too thick and he managed to land. He was unfortunate enough to break his leg and a couple of ribs, while young Ouimet suffered a broken arm.

They had no food. Ouimet fixed up his partner as comfortably as he could, considering his broken leg and broken ribs, and built a little fire so well that when they got back six days later there were still some embers burning. He covered him with part of the wings and other things that he found in the bush in order to give him some shelter from the below-zero weather. He then started out to walk the seventy-five miles to Cold Lake to get help, and he did walk that seventy-five miles through the roughest kind of country. It was a long walk, over fallen timbers, up hill and down. He walked all the way to Cold Lake, which took him about 30 hours, and then he did not get treated until he reported to the police in my home town, Bonnyville, telling about the accident and asking for succour for his companion lying wounded out there in the bush.

I want also to pay tribute to those two constables of the mounted police who organized the rescue. I wrote to the Minister of Justice in regard to them, because they set to work at once to gather some men together, obtain what they thought would be necessary and start out to the rescue. By that time the arm of this young man Ouimet had been treated at the hospital, he had been given some food, and he was ready to go back to show them the trail as far as he could, which was about thirty miles. They took with them an old Indian named Piché, an old friend of mine; he has no vote but still is a friend of mine, and is one of the best trackers I ever knew. In the meantime five inches of snow had fallen. I hope those listening to me have some imagination, and can visualize what that meant. In that country there were no habitations whatever; no trappers; nothing. Young Ouimet took them for twenty-five or thirty miles, until the trail ended. Everything was covered with snow, but Piché the tracker did a wonderful job, an incredible job, and picked up the trail. He found it and they followed it until they came upon the wounded man, forty miles into that bush. He was still alive and still cheerful. He had had nothing to eat or drink, yet he had a smile for his rescuers when they reached him. I do not know what kind of conveyance the mounted police constables and the men with them had, but they brought this young man all the way back without causing him any extra suffering at all; and after many hours of painful and laborious effort they got him to the hospital. Both these young men are alive and well today.

I mention this incident in this house, where so often we hear stories of despair and discouragement, as a lesson to the younger people of this country. I believe there is plenty of courage left in Canada. I believe there are plenty of real he-men in this country, and many of them in the constituency of Athabaska. I thought those concerned in this matter were entitled to this tribute, which would be spread across Canada if my voice could carry beyond the walls of this chamber.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would not like to tell this house how old I am getting to be, but the other day I was reminding myself that it is forty-eight years since I undertook my first political activities in northern Alberta. At that time there was only one seat for the whole province, except the extreme eastern portion which formed part of Saskatchewan and Assiniboia. I worked on behalf of Hon. Frank Oliver, at that time just old Frank Oliver, a man who had gone to Edmonton and on to our country from Winnipeg in a Red River cart; and I was working for one of the greatest leaders this country has ever seen or heard of, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. After he passed from the scene, leaving memories which will be ever fresh in the hearts of the Canadian people, another great man came upon the scene. He is still with us, and I hope will be with us for a long time yet. I refer to his successor, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. I was proud to continue to serve humbly and to the best of my ability in the ranks of the Liberal party under his leadership. Then last summer this party, in a great convention, again chose a leader, and again chose a son of the old province of Quebec, to which my ancestors came in 1632. I do not say that to brag, but I really do belong in Canada. Now I am prouder than ever that God has spared me enough strength to continue to serve; and I hope to be able to fight with him and for him when the next election is called, when I am sure he will win. I believe the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) already has proved himself worthy of a place beside the other two great leaders who have preceded him.

I have said something, sir, about political history. Well, I have just heard a fine address by a fluent speaker. At one time I thought he would be sure to admit, in spite of all the faults he had to find with this government, that they have done pretty well for the farmers of western Canada. I have in mind the cheques that are going out in a few weeks for over $200 million, made possible by wise administration of the wheat grown by the farmers of the west. I am reminded of a little story from my days in the Alberta legislature, away back in the years when the Bennett buggy became prominent. Perhaps you know what a Bennett buggy was, Mr. Speaker; and I do not want to ever go back to that situation and have a Drew buggy or any other kind of buggy. Many farmers could not afford to run their cars; they had no money with which to buy gasoline. So they took the body off the axles, put a box on top and hitched the old horses to it. Then they had a nice light rig to get around in, and that is what they called a Bennett buggy. I remember sitting in the Alberta legislature and doing my best, with all the other members there, to find some remedy for the terrible conditions which existed in Alberta and throughout western Canada. At one time in my own town wheat went down to 19 cents a bushel for No. 2 northern. Farmers brought hogs from fifteen or twenty miles in the country and sold them for $1.75 a hundred.

I am speaking of wheat, however; and I was discussing that matter with a friend of mine. We were both much younger then than we are now, and we still had confidence that something would happen, that a Liberal government would come back into office and remedy the situation. We were always talking about wheat. Here in this house I often hear my hon. friends from Quebec, Ontario and the maritimes say they are a little fed up with all this talk about wheat, and they ask if we cannot ever talk about anything else. When I was talking with this friend of mine in Alberta we decided to tell the people what the wheat actually was that created all this talk, and I hope I can remember it: "Wheat is a cereal which is grown to keep the farmer broke and the buyer crazy. It is planted in the spring, mortgaged in the summer and lost in the fall. It varies in quality according to the rain and sunshine in the season; and the man who can best guess its quality is called a grain grader by the trade and a damned fool by the farmers." This reminds me of the story of the big wheat firm down east, of which the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau) was speaking this afternoon, which sent a man out west in August to study the situation. You know, in the old days they used to do that; the Free Press and all the big grain companies would send men to survey the western crop because, you see, Ontario and Quebec cashed in so heavily on our wheat, as they still do. After studying the situation this man wrote back to his firm and said: "Some say wheat will go up and some say it will go down. I believe so, too. Whatever you do is wrong, so act right away."

Well, that is all by the way, and not very serious. While I am speaking about wheat—I hope my voice does not leave me—I should like to take the opportunity to discuss another matter which has been the object of resolutions of mine for a number of years, and which was touched upon briefly by the hon. member for St. Boniface this afternoon. I refer to the Hudson Bay railroad. I am not going to make any joke about that. I have thought about it for years. In 1924, in the legislature in Edmonton I moved a resolution petitioning the federal government to make the terminus of the Hudson Bay railway, whenever completed, a free port of entry. What does that mean?

Mr. Speaker, no matter what we do or say, it is a fact that we are growing wheat in Alberta and Saskatchewan farther away from the world markets than any other nation in the world engaged in the export of wheat. The cost is tremendous. The cost of importing the heavy machinery necessary for these operations in Alberta and Saskatchewan is also tremendous. You can form new parties; you can talk socialism or social credit; you can get the people interested in trying to form a new party; but this great distance will remain and the cost of operation will remain. What is to be done?

I know that almost within the sound of my voice a tremendous amount of money is being spent for the transportation of western wheat. It is well known that hundreds of millions of dollars have been invested in the great lakes route. We know that hundreds of millions of dollars have been used in the construction of railroads to take our wheat to the seaboard during the winter. I do not want to ruin these enterprises. We now know we cannot talk free trade. During the years that we talked about free trade we did not know that some nations in Europe would disrupt the whole world with two costly and terrifying wars, thus making it impossible for any government in the free world to rely on the ideas they had. I say to you therefore, sir, for the relief of the western importer and exporter, do not interfere with these interests. There is so much at stake that they should be left alone.

I am not one of those westerners who feel or express any antagonism towards the eastern people. This is Canada. If I may divert my thoughts for a moment, I should like to say that I have always preached that you may have two-dollar wheat; you may have cattle selling for $300 a head; you may have $40 hogs and you may have eighty cents a pound butter, but you will not have lasting prosperity until you have union based on understanding between all the parts of this vast country.

To any man who is not prejudiced and who is willing to listen, I wish to say that the Hudson Bay railroad is there. The feasibility of navigation in the great Hudson bay during many months of the year has been proven. This is particularly true since the invention of radar, which enables the detection of icebergs and other impediments to navigation. The port of Churchill is hundreds of miles closer to the European market than the Atlantic seaboard is. This brings the western farmer eight or nine hundred miles closer to the markets of the world. This cool northern route would enable our cattle to reach the old country in first-class shape. It is a much cheaper route by which to ship. I say, sir, that the insurance rates have been kept up by the vested interests at Port Arthur and Fort William. This government could very easily see to it that the rates on shipping via the Hudson bay route would be fair rates to compete with this other route. A hundred million bushels of wheat could be exported to Europe, and goods which the farmers of western Canada need could be brought back from Britain through this free port of which I have spoken.

Mr. Wylie: Shame on the Liberals!

Mr. Dechene: If my hon. friend wants me to tell him something, Mr. Speaker, let him interrupt just once more and I shall tell him a story he will remember for a while. I am too serious at the moment to allow any interruptions. Of course, Social Crediters have become a part of the Tory party. We know that now, and you cannot deny it any longer. These men have become what Arthur Meighen would have described as the dilapidated annex of the Tory party.

Mr. Wylie: I would sooner have that than communists, anyway.

Mr. Dechene: I may tell my friend that now he is known as a Tory he will not receive nearly as many votes in Alberta as he received when he was running under false pretences and hiding his colours until they apparently became more popular.

I was speaking in a serious vein because I have lived in Alberta for over half a century, nearly sixty years. I know what the trouble is. I understand that there is no philosophy, there is no preaching, that will reduce the distance between the Alberta farmer and the markets of the world unless we can use that shorter route through Churchill. We should also be allowed to import into our great western plain the things we need from Great Britain, France and the other countries, through the port of Churchill without paying tribute to anybody. This would make the economy of western Canada strong without the necessity of asking for aid from the people in the rest of Canada.

Mr. Wylie: Change the Liberal government.

Mr. Dechene: Mr. Speaker, I have sat here during the last month listening patiently to some of the rottenest things I have ever heard in my life, to some of the most absurd speeches to which any man of my age could be compelled to listen. I never interrupted anyone. May I ask for a hearing, Mr. Speaker, since I am speaking only sparingly and I am trying to speak on behalf of the people who sent me here.

Mr. Wylie: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I have sat here longer than anyone in this end of the house, and I have heard the hon. member interrupt more than I have.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. Dechene: I have something more to say, and I do not want to be interrupted.

Mr. Wylie: I hope you have; you have not said anything yet.

Mr. Dechene: Mr. Speaker, I think I have some time remaining and I hope to be allowed—

Mr. Wylie: You only think.

Mr. Dechene: I hope the members of this house who do not understand the French language will bear with me while I address my compatriots in that tongue I love so well.

(Translation):

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I wish to tell Quebec members how happy I have been to make their acquaintance and to have enjoyed both their friendship and support for the past ten years I have had the pleasure of sitting in the house.

I noticed with delight, particularly in 1945, how many talented and promising young men joined the Liberal ranks to help their fellow citizens to continue representing old Quebec in the house. May I, in turn, speak a word of friendship and good will and ask them to remember, on occasion—they who represent a majority in their venerable province—that where I come from, we are a minority community that will not despair and often needs their help. That is why we hope that, gradually, they will give us even more assistance than they have kindly done in the past and send us their surplus population who wish to leave their great province to strengthen the ranks of their own folk in Alberta and Saskatchewan where French Canadians will not say die.

(Text):

I show you, Mr. Speaker, the picture of a fine looking young fellow which appeared in the Edmonton Journal of March, 1924, twenty-five years ago. It is a picture of yours truly in his prime—and it was some prime, if I do say it myself—telling the people of Alberta that there was oil under their feet and asking the government to take measures to encourage that development to the extent of making grants, if necessary, to produce this wealth, greater than all the gold that may ever be found in the hills of northern Canada. Today it has been found. Leduc is producing thousands of barrels of oil, as is Redwater, which is at the boundary of Athabaska. I know we have only tapped the fringe of the great lake of oil which lies under the province of Alberta.

Mr. Hansell: It has a social credit government.

Mr. Dechene: I take pride in the developments because I was the prophet of something that actually happened, and am still alive to see my prophecy come true. I will predict something more. I will say that, as exploration is pushed farther north, right in the centre of the great constituency of Athabaska will be found the largest pool of oil. I am not speaking for political gain, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid I may be too old to offer myself again to the people.

An hon. Member: Oh, no; you are wrong.

Mr. Dechene: I wish to speak on behalf of my constituents. In those days I advocated returning the mineral rights to the owners of the surface. I demanded that our government return the ownership of the minerals to those who own the surface. Last year I mentioned this matter in this house. I know those rights now belong to the province of Alberta. I mention this because this government is doing as much as it can in that line by giving to the returned soldiers, to the veterans who have purchased land on which to settle, the rights of which the government has ownership. The Department of Veterans Affairs is now engaged in looking at those mineral rights, and those rights are to be turned over to the settlers.

What happened in Redwater the other day? Some government parcels of land, or rather mineral rights, were sold for over $5 million and the farmers of the district will not get fifty cents. They may get a bridge or a road.

Mr. Low: That is not true. I am sure the hon. member for Athabaska would want to be correct. The farmers get an adjustment when they make their appeal to the arbitration board.

Mr. Dechene: We are not talking about the same thing at all, Mr. Speaker. I say that if the farmers had the ownership of the mineral rights, the millions of dollars which are now being paid to the Imperial Oil, Standard Oil and the other large companies would be paid to these farmers and there would be a wealthy yeomanry in Alberta. As I said before, I know that there is a great lake of oil in that north country. Almost every farmer in Athabaska would be a wealthy man within a few years.

I wanted to speak about the tar sands in the northern part of Athabaska at Fort McMurray and Waterways. I shall have to go a little bit faster, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hansell: There is plenty of time.

Mr. Dechene: I have often spoken in this house about these tar sands. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) is in his place tonight. He saw the possibilities of these resources. Last year I told the house that the geologists from the Department of Mines and Resources two years ago had found a new field some distance from Abasand and the other places that were known before; it is some eighteen miles west of Fort McMurray, and Waterways, across the Athabaska river. The plans are here on file, and they can be seen. You can see where the pipes were sunk and discovery was made of the immense possibilities which we knew of but did not think were so valuable or easy of access. In some places were found hundreds of feet of clear bitumen, enough to pave the streets of all the cities in western Canada and also in eastern Canada, if transportation to bring it in is made cheaper. This discovery forms part of the grant by the provincial government of Alberta to some oil companies of some four million acres of land in northern Alberta, the greater portion of it in the riding of Athabaska.

I have no quarrel with this grant. But as a resident of Athabaska for all these years, as a man who has fought to develop this oil, as a man who has fought for the return of the rights to the farmers so that they could benefit by the wealth under their feet rather than have it go to some large oil company, and keep the monopoly of oil in this country, I want to serve notice that we shall hold them to strict accountability for what happens in the tar sands. Because oil is found in the flowing wells of Leduc and Redwater, we do not want the development of these tar sands to be retarded. This development must go on because these sands constitute, as is known everywhere, the greatest reserve of oil and its by-products that is known not only in Canada but in the whole world, including Arabia or the Near East or Asia. There are billions of barrels of oil to be produced there.

It is said that this development will cost money, that it is too far away. You, Mr. Speaker, know the terrible condition which the bolshevists and communists are trying to create in the world, not only outside of Canada but inside. They are organizing right here in this service in this country at this moment. There is a campaign on everywhere to try to scare—as if we could be scared—the free nations of the west from the conclusion of the north Atlantic security pact. Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, that if this unfortunate war should ever come—and I hope it never will—the battleground will be right here in Canada? If Germany, under the kaiser or later under Hitler, had had within its boundaries such immense resources of oil, gas and by-products—this material without which you cannot be productive in peace or successful in war—do you think for one moment she would not have developed them? No, Mr. Speaker, the Germans would have been producing millions of barrels right now; and we would have had a hard time to keep their planes down if they had had that oil within their boundaries.

The reason that I took the floor tonight is this. I am not a man living in the past. While I may have referred to what happened in the past, it was just in order to give the younger people of this country an inkling of what will happen to them if they again make the mistake of changing government. I am speaking on behalf of the young men and young women of this country. There are many in my own home right now. I have raised a family. They know I would not do anything to their detriment. They will not depend on the government, they will not depend on an allowance, but they will try to create something, to produce something out of the soil of this country, out of its resources, out of this Canada to which God has been so bountiful and so generous. Do you think that our scientists will be stumped by the development of these tar sands? No. It is up to us to encourage them and to see that as soon as possible, in view of what may happen in the world, a way is discovered to develop those resources at a fair price, and that it is pressed forward as promptly as possible to ensure that, should anything happen in this troublous world, we and our allies will never be short of that motive power without which you cannot fly in the air nor run on the ground.

Before I take my seat, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express a thought to you. For some reason or other, nature did not smile on Athabaska last year. I do not know whether it was because there were too many sinners out there or too many Social Crediters. We had a poor crop, and for the first time in our history we had to take advantage of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Our farmers are not discouraged—no, sir! They belong to a race of pioneers, of strong men. I can envision most of them now. I know them so well, of all political faiths. I can see them at this time. Tomorrow is the first of March. I can see them standing outside watching the sky for the first sign of the first crow or the first bird of spring. They are listening carefully to nature working on their land, the rich, strong, fertile soil of Alberta. In a few days it will break through the shroud of ice and snow which have held it prisoner for some months now. It will expose its bosom, as it were, to the glorious warmth of the sun of Alberta. Our farmers will work, sir. Their machinery and implements are all ready. I know most of them. The wheat is cleaned and the other grains are ready, cleaned and treated, and they will go on the land and plant a larger acreage than ever before.

May I, sir, in the august assembly of all the representatives of the people of Canada, of all parties assembled here to serve those people, say a prayer, that this year nature be kind to them and Providence bless their labour so that they shall have a bumper crop, a greater crop than ever before.

Before I take my seat I should like to say a word about the trans-Canada highway. I told you, sir, that I come from the Edmonton district, the city which now stands on the threshold of the greatest development which has ever taken place in this country, a city which is built over a coal field. I remember that we had to stop mining at the city limits some years ago. It is now in the middle of a sea of oil, and all the land to the far north is beckoning to settlers, beckoning to the young men and the young women of Canada to follow the tracks of those of us who now must lay off the burden that we have carried for some time. There is lots of room yet, lots of opportunity in that part of Canada; but we must have a good highway through Edmonton, sir. I know that my friends from Calgary will possibly not agree with me, but Edmonton is the logical place for the trans-Canada highway, because it would run through the best portion of Alberta. It would touch every park in Saskatchewan and Alberta, connecting with Jasper park and with the highway on the top of the world from Jasper to Banff.

I say, sir, that the logical location for the trans-Canada highway is through the city of Edmonton and the Yellowhead pass. I hope that when the powers that be come finally to decide on the location they will decide to put the highway through Edmonton and that north country. I remember when the Canadian Pacific railway was under construction. The company made a survey in the area. I saw the survey myself when I was a boy. I saw the posts along the line drawn northwest of Edmonton, and then traveling toward the Peace river and the Pine river pass and west to the Yellowhead pass. Later they switched around and went to Calgary and the Kicking Horse pass. We were left alone without transportation for many years. I do not want that mistake to be repeated at this time, and I plead with the government to see that this trans-Canada highway goes through Edmonton and the central and northern part of Alberta.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, one of the objects of the debate on the speech from the throne is, I understand, to give private members an opportunity to place before this house some matters which they may consider of importance. I wish to take full advantage of that opportunity and to discuss measures which are at present in existence, and measures which might be introduced in order to safeguard and make safer the lives of those who find their occupation on the seas around Canada. I do not intend to engage in this subject from a controversial point of view. I know that it is not entirely a new subject because it has been hinted at in this session and in previous sessions by hon. members on both sides of the house, but I hope that by assembling the facts as I see them I shall be able to suggest some improvements in legislation as it exists today, and in the manner in which that legislation is being administered. I shall draw my examples from my own constituency, because I am familiar with the conditions and details in that part of Canada. I do not claim that the conditions existing there are any different from those which exist in any other constituency either on the Atlantic or on the Pacific coast.

I cannot speak with authority regarding the maritime provinces, which border the Atlantic ocean, but I have been informed—and I have discussed this with other hon. members—that the conditions there are, in the main, similar to those which exist on the Pacific coast. I am quite certain that the importance of this subject is enhanced by the fact that we are now taking into our family the tenth province—Newfoundland.

In order to give you some idea, Mr. Speaker, of the importance of the sea to the people who live in our coastal provinces, I might say that the constituency which I represent is approximately seventy-five miles from the most easterly point to the most westerly point, and about the same distance from the most southerly to the most northerly point; but in that whole area there is hardly a resident who is more than twenty miles from salt water.

In the north there is the port of Nanaimo through which the passengers and the trade of at least two-thirds of Vancouver island pass. During last summer no fewer than 200,000 passengers entered that port, coming from the mainland in some of the biggest steamers of the C.P.R. fleet, which made seven trips a day from Nanaimo to Vancouver and back again. Over 75,000 tons of freight were moved through that port. At the government assembly wharf there one may see freighters taking to the European markets the lumber which is cut from our forests. One would see other deep-sea ships loaded with coal going to China and other parts of the orient.

A few miles south of there you come to the important fishing and lumber towns of Ladysmith and Chemainus. Then, going down beyond that, you come to the Cowichan Bay area where you may see, at any time during the summer months, hundreds of yachts which have brought tourists and sportsmen to fish in those waters.

Farther down you come to the great Canada Cement factory. Some of the ingredients to make the cement are brought by barge from other islands, and the product is taken away by ships to all parts of the west coast of British Columbia and western United States. Still farther south one comes to Sidney, where there are ferry services running from Vancouver island to the mainland of British Columbia and to the state of Washington. Any time during the summer months one can see many hundreds of cars being loaded daily onto those ferries.

At the southern end of the constituency there is the port of Victoria, through which is served all the southern part of Vancouver island. A little farther around you come to the great naval base of Esquimalt. Then as you proceed farther west along the northern shore of the strait of San Juan you come first of all to the quarantine station where the ships coming from the orient are detained so that the immigrants may be inspected. Still farther west you come to other fishing villages, such as Sooke and Port Renfrew. Then even beyond that there are small hamlets which the steamers cannot approach, and at which points all supplies have to be landed in Indian canoes.

Between the island of Vancouver and the mainland there is the whole archipelago of the Gulf islands. The whole domestic, industrial and social life of the residents of those islands depends entirely upon water-borne transport. It is correct to say that many and varied are the occasions by which men must go down to the sea in ships. As I said before, the conditions there are similar to the conditions elsewhere. But I wish particularly to illustrate the number and variety of occupations which require men to spend the greater part of their working hours at sea.

The volume of traffic involved is very considerable. Let us consider the fishing industry alone. In British Columbia there are some 15,000 to 20,000 men employed in the crews of our fishing vessels. Last year, I believe, the equipment used by these fishing vessels ran to something over $20 million. So far as the catch is concerned, last year our salmon pack up to October of 1948 was estimated at 1,280,000 cases. Of halibut the catch was valued at $3 million. The herring taken amounted to 38 million pounds, which was converted into meal and oil. Then, after having lapsed for a number of years, the whaling industry was revived on the Pacific coast in the past season, and a successful catch reported. Tuna fish are caught sometimes as far as 500 miles out into the Pacific, and also may be caught off the Queen Charlotte islands. Thousands of tons of that valuable fish were taken.

I wish to stress that these men who go out to catch the fish and who serve these fishing vessels, which are small craft, do so at considerable risk to their lives. The crews are small, the waters are extensive, and the opportunities for rescue are extremely limited. I feel that the people in other parts of Canada who benefit from the labours of these men should appreciate the risks they run each day. Those risks are increased if, when the catching season is over, or when the vessels must put into port even for a short time, there is not safe berthing. If during rough weather the vessels tied up in harbours, where there is not adequate protection, become damaged, it is quite obvious that when they must put to sea again there is greater danger of loss of life and equipment. Also during those periods when they have their vessels berthed in harbours the fishermen have to stay up night after night watching their ships, to see that they are not damaged, owing to the fact that insufficient protection is provided in the harbours. Therefore one of the main factors in ensuring safety of life at sea is the provision of adequate and safe berthing places in the harbours of any coast.

But of course fishing is only one of the many occupations Canadians follow on the sea. Along the Pacific coast the passenger service of coastwise vessels only—and I am not talking about the trans-Pacific vessels—carried last year something over two million persons.

Then the most important industry of British Columbia, namely that of logging and lumbering, is to a large extent dependent upon sea transport. The logs are cut high up on the mountainside, and are brought down to the sea either by rail or by truck. There they are worked into booms and tugs take them to the mills. Again the distances are frequently great. Logs cut on the Queen Charlotte islands will perhaps come down to a mill at Vancouver. Logs cut on the west coast of Vancouver island are taken great distances to mills either in Washington or in British Columbia. It will be seen that many men engaged in the logging industry spend a good deal of their time on the sea, either forming booms or operating the tugboats which take these great booms of logs to the mills. It is no exaggeration to say that thousands of men are employed on the sea and that the equipment used is valued at many millions of dollars.

I shall not weary the house by reciting the long list of marine accidents that have occurred in recent years. The number of accidents is increasing all the time. I should like to mention just a few which have occurred on the Pacific coast in the last two years. Five lives were lost from the ship Gulf Stream. The Northholm went down with a loss of fifteen lives. The Clarksdale Victory suffered disaster with a loss of fifty-one lives. A few weeks ago the captain of the Passing Cloud was drowned although the rest of his crew were saved. Just before Christmas three men on the St. Clair lost their lives.

I should like to direct attention to the facilities that exist for sending help to ships in distress and for sending distress signals. We have a good ship-to-shore telephone system on the Pacific coast, but it could be improved by the maintaining of a more continuous watch and by putting the land lines in better condition. In the main, the land lines are government-operated, but owing to the nature of the terrain and the limited personnel employed they are not always kept in first-class condition. I know that recommendations have been made for their improvement, but the lives of men at sea are jeopardized because an efficient and rapid system of communication is not available in all cases.

There are other means by which men at sea are helped and warnings sent. I refer to the various direction-finding stations which permit ships to get a fix on their location. The network of such stations is not yet complete. I was told by the minister responsible that it was the intention to erect two additional automatic radio beacons. These beacons automatically send out, at short intervals, signals which enable a vessel to obtain its location.

It has been recognized for some time that gaps exist in this system but for some reason or other the beacons which were to have been in place last year are not yet operating. While I understand that they are now on their way to the Pacific coast I should like to urge that no steps be left untaken in order to provide both our Pacific and our Atlantic coasts with a complete network of radio beacons so that there will be no gaps in the system. I want to stress again the necessity of providing a continuous watch so that, when a ship is in distress, word may be sent immediately to some central place.

One of the tragedies of army life is broken service.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are anxious to declare that it is time for the house to rise and I have reached the point where perhaps I could break off my remarks.

On motion of Mr. Pearkes the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue this debate.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on February 22, 1949.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, March 1, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT OF MR. DREW AT MCGILL UNIVERSITY —REFERENCE TO LETTER OF JULY 11, 1942, WITH RESPECT TO HONG KONG INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are called, Mr. Speaker, in accordance with my undertaking of yesterday, I offer, with the consent of the house, to table the letter of July 11, 1942, to which I referred at that time.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand this is a lengthy letter that the hon. member wrote in 1942 to the then prime minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) about the Hong Kong inquiry. He suggests that with the consent of the house he would like to table it. So far as I am concerned that consent cannot be given, because the tabling of the letter would involve making public certain confidential communications between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom. The government of the United Kingdom was asked repeatedly whether it would consent to these communications being made public. The last exchange of correspondence in that connection took place in April, 1948, and is printed on pages 3429 and 3430 of Hansard of that year. Since the information was communicated confidentially to the government of Canada, the government of Canada cannot permit its being made public without the consent of the government of the United Kingdom, and that consent, though requested, has been refused.

Mr. Drew: The then prime minister made it quite clear last year that at no time was there any communication—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I would call the attention of the leader of the opposition to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, page 145. Section 385 reads as follows:

> Papers are laid before the house in pursuance of > (1) Provisions of an act of parliament;
> (2) An order of the house;
> (3) An address to the crown;
> (4) The command of the crown;
> (5) Standing orders of the house.

In view of this rule, I must refuse permission to table the document in question.

Mr. Drew: I do not intend to debate your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but may I say this: I made it quite clear that I recognized the fact that the letter could not be tabled without the consent of the house. The explanation given by the Prime Minister is entirely remote from the facts, but I do not intend to pursue that point.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: I would call the attention of the leader of the opposition to the fact that I have given a ruling, and he must abide by it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: I am not challenging your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I simply wish to make it clear that I offered the letter for tabling. It has been handed to the press for release.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that the Speaker's rulings are not debatable.

Mr. Drew: That is right.

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN "GLOBE AND MAIL" OF MARCH 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On page 3 of today's Globe and Mail, under the headline, "Ottawa briefs", I am referred to as the C.C.F. member for Middlesex East. There are some things which I pass over lightly, but this is not one of them.

FISHERIES

SUPPLY OF BAIT TO LOBSTER FISHERMEN, DIGBY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has he received information that herring seiners are interfering with winter weir fishing in Digby basin, Nova Scotia? Is the minister aware that no herring have been taken in Digby weir, with the result that the supply of bait to lobster fishermen is seriously affected? What steps does the minister intend to take to remedy the situation?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member did not send me notice of his question. I arrived in my office only this morning, after a trip to the west but I shall look into the matter immediately and see what the answer is.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I am glad to see the Minister of Fisheries back in the house after his visit to the west coast. As I understand it, he went to British Columbia to look into the unemployment situation. Is he now prepared to make a report and to indicate what the government is prepared to do?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): I went to the coast for several reasons, one of them being that I felt it was my duty, as minister coming from that province, to know what the labour situation was like and how serious it was. I have not yet had an opportunity of discussing the matter with my colleagues, and my colleagues have not had any opportunity of saying what they intend to do about it. A report will be made, however, as soon as possible.

COMBINES

ACQUITTAL OF DENTAL SUPPLY COMPANIES—QUESTION AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the action of the Ontario appeal court in dismissing the federal government's appeal against the acquittal of eighteen dental supply companies, will the government consider introducing at this session legislation under which combines may be effectively prosecuted when the results of an inquiry warrant such action?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I understand that this judgment is under consideration by the Minister of Justice, who has not yet had an opportunity of making his recommendations to council. As soon as he makes his recommendations, and a decision is made upon them, that decision will be announced.

HOUSING

QUESTION AS TO PURCHASE OF PROPERTY IN ESQUIMALT, B.C.—HOUSES FOR NAVAL RATINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, to whom I have sent notice. Has additional property been purchased in the municipality of Esquimalt, upon which to build houses for naval ratings?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I received the hon. member's notice just before coming into the house, and I can give him an answer with regard to the Department of National Defence. We have not acquired any additional land at Esquimalt. I am making inquiry to see if Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation may be considering that step.

TRADE WITH BRITAIN

SHIPMENT OF CARGO OF LUMBER THROUGH CHURCHILL, MAN.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon City): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Have negotiations by way of financial arrangements been completed with the British authorities in order to permit the shipment to Britain of a cargo of lumber available for export at Churchill, Manitoba?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I understand that the British ministry has indicated a willingness to move a cargo of spruce through Churchill to the United Kingdom, but that the offer stated a price that was not acceptable to the sellers in Saskatchewan. I understand that negotiations have not been broken off, and I hope that they may be brought to a satisfactory conclusion.

COAL

BRANCH RAILWAY LINE TO BURNS MINE IN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. MacNicol (Davenport): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Many cars of coal have been arriving monthly at Toronto from the Burns hard coal mine on Sheep river in Alberta. Is the minister in a position to assure hard coal users in Toronto that a branch line of railway will be constructed to this mine during the present year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I regret that I am able to give no such assurance. I am aware of the fact that coal is being mined on the Burns property, and that it is a good quality of coal. I am also aware of the fact that this property is many miles away from the nearest railroad. Negotiations for the construction of a branch line must necessarily be between the owners of the mine and the railway itself.

NEWFOUNDLAND

REQUEST FOR DECLARATION OF MARCH 31 AS NATIONAL HOLIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. Tustin (Prince Edward-Lennox): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It arises out of a letter I received this morning from the Lennox and Addington chamber of commerce, in which attention is drawn to the fact that an historic event will take place on March 31 next. Has the government considered or will it give consideration to declaring March 31 a national holiday, so that all Canada may join in celebrating the entry of Newfoundland into confederation?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I think it would be a little bit premature to announce a celebration at this time. The bill before the parliament of the United Kingdom is, as I understand it, to come up for second reading tomorrow, and in the House of Lords I believe proceedings are being taken to retard its adoption. I can assure the hon. member that as soon as it becomes certain that the statute enacted here will be implemented, consideration will be given to proper notice being taken of that historic occasion.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will there be a Duplessis day?

An hon. Member: No, a Cruickshank day.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

COLLECTION OF TOLLS AT ENTRANCE TO PARK AREA—USE OF PARK HIGHWAY BY COMMERCIAL VEHICLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Matthews (Kootenay East): On Friday last I asked two questions of the Minister of Mines and Resources. At that time the minister indicated that he would read the questions in Hansard and give an answer later. Is he ready to do so now?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): I shall combine the answers to two questions asked by the hon. member for Kootenay East.

The department has been studying the matter of reconstruction of the existing water supply system and sewage disposal for the village of Field in Yoho national park. This village is largely inhabited by employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, where the company maintains a divisional point. In these studies co-operation has been had from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Department of National Health and Welfare. A number of suggestions have been made, and these are being explored as rapidly as possible. In the meantime, steps have been taken to rectify the contamination by the mining company of the Kicking Horse river. Other sources of water supply have been studied, and an investigation is now under way to determine whether it is possible to obtain a safe and adequate water supply and make a water storage reservoir at a site above the village. It is hoped that money will be available in the estimates this year for work on the water system. The engineering studies in connection with the sewage system will take some time. Moreover, it will be necessary to carry on certain discussions with the C.P.R. about both the water system and the sewage system.

It is expected that it will take some time to reconstruct the main road through Yoho park and approach roads to a standard that would permit safe operation of modern freighting trucks, particularly during the months when this main artery of transportation is needed to handle the tourist traffic. There is no amount in the parks estimates for 1949-50 for the widening and setting up for hard-surfacing of the main road through Yoho park.

It is to be expected that when the trans-Canada highway is ready for travel to and through national parks, the policy with respect to charges for the use of that part of the road in national parks will be in accordance with whatever policy is adopted for the remainder of the trans-Canada highway.

ORDER PAPER

ANSWER TO A QUESTION BY THE MEMBER FOR CHICOUTIMI

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) asked me yesterday if I could explain why two notices of motion still appearing on the order paper for February 15th had been struck off. These were, I believe, Nos. 30 and 36.

Evidently such matters are under your control, but in order to save the member the trouble of finding out how he could put the question to you, Mr. Speaker, I made inquiries and was told that these motions had been struck off at the actual request of the members who had them placed on the order paper. A member who has given a notice of motion has a right to withdraw it so long as the house has not been called upon to take it under consideration.

Mr. Gagnon: Thank you very much.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

YUKON TERRITORY: TAXATION AND GRANTS AGREEMENT—YUKON AND MACKENZIE DISTRICT: FEDERAL GRANTS, 1946-48

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Black (Yukon): On February 9 two motions of mine were passed by the house. The information required had to do with the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. It is all readily available in the Department of Mines and Resources, and should not take more than an hour to prepare. I should like to have the information before the debate on the address is completed. I hope it will be forthcoming without any further delay.

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): I shall look into the matter immediately.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. D. F. Brown for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, before the house rose last night I was discussing certain measures which I thought should be introduced in order to ensure the safety of life and property at sea. After indicating the extent to which Canadians are interested in travel on the oceans, I described the system of direction-finding used to guide ships into the approaches to our harbours, and the means of transmitting information in the event of a marine disaster. But it is essential to any system of collection of information that there be a central room in which the information may be collated and passed out to the authorities who will have to act upon it. In spite of the sea-air search activities of the R.C.A.F., the absence of such central rooms is one of the great handicaps of the present system. It is a weakness which I believe could be rectified without a great deal of expense. What is required is something in the nature of an operational room.

Mr. Claxton: If the hon. member will excuse me, we have such a room in Halifax, and I rather think on the west coast as well.

Mr. Pearkes: If the minister will just wait, such a room—

Mr. Claxton: I should think that the hon. member would want to get the facts.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

Mr. Pearkes: Had the minister been in the house last night, or had he read Hansard, he would have seen that I was drawing my examples from the Pacific coast. I admitted that I did not know the details in respect to the Atlantic coast, although I am told that similar conditions exist there. On the Pacific coast, and, so far as I know, in many other parts of the seaboard of Canada, there is no central room from which information as to a marine disaster may be relayed from outlying parts, and from which instructions could be sent out readily to the various agencies whose activities need to be co-ordinated in order to assist in the rescue work.

I know that in the sea-air rescue squads of the R.C.A.F. some attempt is made to maintain such rooms, but on the Pacific coast they are small and inadequate. By the nature of their training the R.C.A.F. cannot help being more concerned about accidents to aircraft than about accidents to ships, although they do their best to deal with sea disasters as they do with air accidents. I do emphasize the fact that, although there may be exceptions, in the majority of places in Canada there is urgent need for a central room to which information can be sent direct from a ship in distress, or relayed by other ships, so that appropriate action may be taken.

In order to illustrate how necessary it is to co-ordinate these activities, I think we should examine for a minute the various facilities which are available for the rescue of a ship which may be in distress. First of all, on the Pacific coast, and I believe elsewhere, there are the marine service vessels, which carry supplies to the lighthouses, charge the lights around our coasts and look after the aids to navigation. I know that the government is constructing, or is intending to construct, two new lifeboats, but these two vessels have to look after a coast line of some 12,000 miles. I think hon. members will see that these two vessels will be inadequate for that vast extent of coast. Then there are the fishery patrol vessels—three, of reasonable tonnage; the vessels of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; the search and rescue, or sea-air search, of the R.C.A.F. squadrons; the hydrographic survey vessels, such as the William J. Stewart, which is operated by the Department of Mines and Resources, and the naval vessels which are available. All this should be tied in with the most efficient coastguard service maintained by the United States, which frequently comes to the assistance of Canadian vessels in distress in Canadian waters. This becomes necessary because we have no coastguard service of our own, and because of a time lag under the present system our vessels are unable to reach a Canadian vessel in distress in Canadian waters. Although the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has informed the house that it is too expensive for Canada to establish a coastguard service, I do suggest that initial steps be taken to the end that better co-ordinating rooms may be provided.

The majority of accidents occur at those nodal points where sea lanes converge, particularly at the entrances to our harbours. The modern method of directing navigation inside a harbour is by the use of radar. At the commencement of the last war Canada led all nations in the development of radar and radar equipment. I am afraid, however, that today we are lagging behind. While there is a world-wide system of radar control in harbours, I believe I am correct in saying that the only radar at present established in Canada for the control of shipping within our harbours is a set at Halifax, and it is too far out to be of practical use in the control of shipping within that harbour. Had sets been placed close to the ferry between Dartmouth and Halifax, I question whether the accidents would have occurred which took place a month ago, when naval vessels collided with the ferry. As an example of what is being done elsewhere I would refer to the Mersey ferry. In thick weather that ferry is radar-controlled and is thus able to maintain its schedule.

Shortly before Christmas an experimental set was placed at the Lion's gate bridge, Vancouver. I hope these experiments will be followed up, and that we may soon see the establishment of an operational set. I do not believe, however, that the placing of a set at the outside of a harbour is all that is required. Sets should be placed right by the ferry slips so that the ferries between Vancouver and North Vancouver may run on schedule, whether in thick weather or not. One radar set established by the ferry slips would do the work of six placed on the ferries themselves.

Canadian Arsenals Limited, in co-operation with the national research council, have done a good deal of research work in connection with radar. Their new Mariner sets, No. 268, are in my opinion efficient. Many of them, however, are being sold to countries outside Canada. Surely our first duty would be to set up similar sets in every Canadian harbour —on the Atlantic and the Pacific, and on the great lakes—to ensure the safety of shipping entering our harbours.

I would urge that investigations be made looking to the establishment of radar sets at the points I have indicated. I do not care whether they are produced by Canadian Arsenals Limited, by Marconi, by Cossor (Canada) Limited, or by some other organization; that is not important. Radar is the modern means of directing vessels to harbours in thick weather.

In connection with the radar sets established on our own Canadian merchant vessels, I have seen vessels entering our west coast ports the operators on which have complained about their sets being out of order. They have spoken of the great difficulty of having the radar sets serviced. May I offer the suggestion that this is an opportunity for vocational training courses which could be given veterans of the merchant marine, so that we might have sufficient trained personnel in all our ports to service the radar equipment of our Canadian merchantmen upon their return from long voyages.

Radar equipment is not expensive. The sets produced by Canadian Arsenals Limited are comparatively light in weight—about two hundred pounds. These would be suitable for use in vessels.

I should like to touch upon one other point. I refer to the international convention on the safety of life at sea, to which a Canadian delegation was sent last year. While I have not yet had an opportunity to read the report —and I hope it will be tabled in due course— press reports have appeared setting out some of its recommendations. These reports have emphasized the importance of having all passenger-carrying vessels equipped with radio communication, and of the watch at such radio equipment being continuous, not only in order that early notice may be given of any disaster to the vessel itself, but also in order that disaster befalling other vessels which may have sent out SOS signals may be reported.

The Canada Shipping Act presents certain limitations. In it we find drawn a distinction between vessels plying on an international route and those on a purely domestic or coastwise service. So far as I know, no such distinction is drawn in the United Kingdom regulations. I submit there is very little difference in this respect between a vessel sailing from Vancouver to Victoria and one which sails from Vancouver to Seattle, or one leaving Vancouver for Prince Rupert and another from Vancouver to Ketchikan, Alaska.

I would ask that as soon as possible a review be made of the Canada Shipping Act to see that it complies with the recommendations of the international convention to which I have referred. I regret to see no mention in the speech from the throne of any proposed amendments to the Canada Shipping Act.

The last matter to which I wish to direct the attention of the house is the need for still further markings of dangerous rocks and reefs which abound along our coasts. Much has been done; much more requires to be done. I offer these suggestions, and the ones I made last night, because I believe they are of intense importance to many Canadian citizens who live along our coasts. The importance of these problems has been enhanced by the fact that we hope shortly to have Newfoundland join the family of Canadian provinces.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate primarily to carry out a promise made to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that I would answer a question which he asked on February 15. Before proceeding I should like to join with others in congratulating the mover (Mr. Brown) and the seconder (Mr. Demers) of the address on the thoughtful and excellent speeches they have made. The question asked by the hon. member for Lethbridge, as reported on page 536 of Hansard of February 15, is as follows:

> Will the minister make a statement to the house some time soon giving an account of the progress the government has made since January 1, 1946, toward making Canada more self-sufficient. Will he deal in some detail with the progress that was made in 1948, and that is being made in 1949?

That is not a question that can be answered simply. It is not the policy of the present government to attempt to bring about economic self-sufficiency in Canada. It is the policy of the government to encourage the production of those things that Canada can produce economically and efficiently, to encourage new industries that can thrive in the kind of economy we have here in Canada, and to discourage those industries that can live only with the help of high tariff protection.

There are many countries in the world that are adopting policies of economic self-sufficiency. Some of them are doing so through necessity brought about by exchange difficulties and some because of their belief that that basic policy is the correct policy. I know of no country that is prospering as a consequence of following such a program of economic self-sufficiency.

In the early days of this country, it was the policy of the government to build a high protective wall around the country and to encourage industries which could not operate on an economic competitive basis. The change throughout the years has been toward a lowering of tariff barriers and a building up of industries in Canada that are efficient and able to sell goods in the market places of the world at prices competitive with those of other countries.

In saying that, I would not want the hon. member to believe that great progress has not been made toward economic self-sufficiency as far as Canadian production is concerned. Our economy is being rounded out and filled in with new industries and more complete processes for existing industries. This is a matter that I shall cover as I proceed with my discussion. In short, our policy is to improve industrial efficiency and general productive efficiency and to fortify and expand our foreign trade.

In pursuance of that end we are carrying out a policy of maintaining a high level of employment and a high level of income. Quite obviously a high level of employment tends to bring about the highest possible production by our working force. By pursuing that policy we can protect our economic welfare and the security of the Canadian people to the best advantage.

This country, far from attempting to be economically self-sufficient, is a great trading nation. The trade of Canada is the third greatest trade in the world, a position that we became heir to during the war years and which we have maintained up to the present time. The trade of Canada on a per capita basis is about twice the trade of the United States and about twice the trade of the United Kingdom. The trade of Canada today is greater than the total trade of the United States ten years ago.

Mr. Hackett: In volume or in dollars?

Mr. Howe: I am talking about dollars, but I rather think our position would be the same in terms of production. This happy situation has been brought about by following a policy of high production, high employment, high income and high consumption.

The economy of Canada rests on two foundations, domestic investments and export trade. There has been great progress in building up our domestic investments. During the war years, from 1939 to the end of 1945, over $8 billion was invested in Canadian plant and equipment, a little more than a third of such investment being provided by direct government expenditures.

During the war years we strained Canada's economy to the limit to produce the munitions of war. By 1944 we had reached an export level which was an all-time record and which we are only now equalling in peacetime years. During the war years we were expanding our factory production, as we were expanding the production of our mines, of our fields and of our forests. During the war years essential material was being guided into productive channels by a very tight system of controls. I can say that in spite of our high production, in spite of the strain on our supplies of raw materials, I know of no industrial war production that was interfered with through lack of material requirements. Of course, I am talking of production essential to the war.

While I am referring to controls I might say a word about the remarks made on Saturday last by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I believe the following was his statement:

> We are in a very real danger of losing that fight to the bureaucrats who accept the basic philosophy of Karl Marx no matter what political name they may adopt.

Then he said later:

> —I was referring to the appointment of controllers, priority officials and the people who are not his senior civil servants.

Inasmuch as the controllers and priorities officers are officers of my department, I should like to tell the house who they are and ask the leader of the opposition to pick out those who are followers of Karl Marx. At the present time there are four officers in that category.

One is W. E. Uren, who for the past eight years has been director of priorities. I have not noticed any tendency on his part to follow the doctrines of Karl Marx. The steel controller is Fred Ashbaugh, who has been associated with this work during the war period and subsequently. The timber controller is Gordon Rochester, a permanent civil servant, who has been administering the control since the war years. There is one other officer who might be classed as a controller. I refer to John Berry, the director of part III of the emergency conservation program.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) may have referred to an earlier period. Perhaps it may be of interest to the members of the house if I give him a list of former controllers. The first is H. R. MacMillan, timber controller. Then there are George Cottrelle, oil controller; Allan Williamson, of Wood Gundy and Company, controller of supply; R. C. Berkinshaw, president and general manager of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company; Gerald Godsoe; Henry Borden, co-ordinator of controls for a considerable period; Fred Kilbourn, steel controller; Hugh Scully, also at one time steel controller; Mr. Nicholson, who was a defeated Conservative candidate in the last election; the late Tillie Sterne, who was chemicals controller; J. R. Donald, controller of explosives, and George Gray. When I finish the list I shall ask the hon. gentleman to rise and tell me which ones he was referring to. George Bateman was metals controller; Fred Connell, metals controller; E. J. Brunning, coal controller; Martin Hoey, steel controller; J. A. Martin, rubber controller. That is the list of controllers, past and present.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Name them.

Mr. Graydon: You fellows keep quiet.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Graydon: The wailing of the lost.

Mr. Drew: It is quite obvious that the minister knows as little about this as he does about electricity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: The minister quite obviously did not take the trouble to find out what had been said, because what I was pointing out was that these controllers have the right to delegate authority without any responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howe: And I delegated authority to the controllers.

Mr. Drew: As far as that is concerned, the minister, in a very kind way, pointed out certain men who were Conservatives, and that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that the leader of the opposition should take this opportunity to make a statement. I understand he has been invited by the minister, who has the floor, to answer the question put to him.

Mr. Graydon: He is answering the question.

Mr. Howe: I see my hon. friend is not going to make an answer.

Mr. Graydon: Sit down; you cannot take it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows perfectly well that the rule is that a member who is speaking may not be interrupted without his permission. If the minister, who has the floor, wants to extend to the leader of the opposition an opportunity to answer the question it is his privilege. If the leader of the opposition does not want to do so, then the minister may carry on with his speech.

Mr. Graydon: That is a hit and run business.

An hon. Member: He is getting cold feet.

Mr. Drew: Now tell us about water power.

Mr. Howe: I asked him for names; I did not ask him to make a speech, which he has done on every occasion in this debate.

Mr. Drew: Tell us about water power.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Graydon: As soon as you mention hydro he wants to get up again.

Mr. Rowe: He is afraid the light will go out.

Mr. Howe: Thank heaven the lights are on.

Mr. Casselman: Why are you talking to yourself rather than to the house?

Mr. Howe: If I may resume my dissertation on foreign trade—

Mr. Graydon: Get away from hydro.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howe: —I spoke of the investment program during the war years, a program that called for an investment in productive facilities exceeding $8 billion.

Mr. Drew: You were not speaking to yourself that time, were you?

Mr. Howe: I might as well be from the point of view of getting any intelligence out of my hon. friend. If he will keep quiet now—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howe: —has occupied the time of the house for five times as many minutes as any other member. Perhaps he will keep quiet now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howe: The gallery will have to be disappointed this time.

Mr. Speaker: I ask hon. members not to interrupt the right hon. minister, who has the floor. Again I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that it is the duty of the Speaker to preserve order in the house.

Mr. Howe: The high level of investment policy did not end with the ending of the war. Monetary and fiscal policies assisted industry to convert its factories from war to peace, and conversion was followed by a further great expansion of industry. Between January, 1946, and December 31, 1948, capital was invested in plant and equipment exceeding $7 billion. This represents the highest rate of capital investment in relation to either income or population in the western world during that period.

That investment resulted in the establishment of many industries that were new to Canada, industries that tended to round out our economy, and to make Canada more self-sufficient as far as industrial production is concerned.

In November, 1947, as hon. members will remember, we found it necessary to introduce the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act. That was necessary to stop the drain on our American dollar balances which resulted from buying in cash in the United States and selling on credit in European countries. The operation of the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act has further tended to round out our economy. It was necessary to limit expenditures, for the purchase of goods in the United States, to those goods which were essential to the maintenance of our economy in an efficient state. The restrictions had the very decided effect of stimulating the manufacture of components and completed articles which had previously been imported, not because they could not have been made just as well in Canada, but because it was easier to import them than it was to organize their production in this country.

Increased exports of manufactured products did not stop during that period. Even though imports were reduced, our manufacturers were able to provide from Canadian sources the components that they formerly imported, and continued to step up production. All conservation measures were introduced only after consultation with industries to make sure that the measures, even though they were stringent in character, were not introduced in a way that would upset normal manufacturing practice. I shall speak later about the improved position of the dollar arising from that program and the manner in which the dollar saving was brought about.

I should like to mention foreign trade. I know that the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) does not believe in foreign trade. He believes in economic self-sufficiency.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member knows nothing of the sort.

Mr. Howe: All I know is what I hear, and that is what I have gathered.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member has never heard that from me in his life.

Mr. Howe: A high level of foreign trade does not coincide with the theory of economic self-sufficiency. If it is economically self-sufficient, a country produces all it requires, and neither has goods to sell nor requires to import goods from abroad. That is my understanding of economic self-sufficiency.

Mr. Rowe: Would the minister name some of those countries?

Mr. Howe: I could give an example. I suppose at the time of Champlain the Algonquin Indians were in that position. They were not exposed to foreign trade. They were not particularly prosperous either, so far as I have been able to ascertain.

Mr. Rowe: That was before you were in Canada.

Mr. Howe: The present level of trade, Mr. Speaker, is the highest in Canadian history. Last year it reached a figure of five and three quarter billion dollars or four hundred and sixty dollars for every man, woman and child in Canada.

I spoke of our exchange conservation program and the effect of that program in remedying our adverse balance of trade with the United States. Our adverse balance of trade with the United States of $920 million in 1947 was reduced to $285 million in 1948. This represented a net improvement in our United States trade balance of $635 million within that period.

Mr. Cockeram: How much of that was ERP?

Mr. Howe: The significant thing is the manner in which this improvement was achieved. It was accomplished by an increase in exports of $465 million and a decrease in imports from the United States of $170 million. In reply to the question of my hon. friend about ERP, it added not at all to either our exports to the United States or our imports from the United States.

This $170 million decrease in imports from the United States greatly underestimates the exchange savings resulting from conservation control, because a higher level of domestic development coupled with a much higher level of exports would ordinarily have called for a still greater import of United States goods. I am particularly pleased about the success of the program in correcting our trade balance at a high level, by increasing exports to the United States by $465 million during the year 1948. It seems to me it is a real accomplishment for our manufacturers, our farmers and our producers of lumber and fish, who can all take a share of the credit. It was a magnificent response to a call from the government to increase our exports to the United States.

Another important change during 1948 was in our trade with the United Kingdom, and this shift was also in the right direction. Our imports from the United Kingdom rose from $190 million to $300 million. Our exports to the United Kingdom dropped by $65 million, but the United Kingdom trade deficit with Canada was reduced by $175 million.

An hon. Member: What were the figures?

Mr. Howe: Someone has asked a question concerning the figures; in 1947 our exports to the United Kingdom were $753,700,000, and in 1948 they were $688,700,000.

Mr. Hackett: Were those figures not increased by ERP?

Mr. Howe: I do not know about that. My hon. friend seems to have ERP on his mind. All I can tell him is that our exports to the United Kingdom were paid for by the United Kingdom. From what source the money was obtained, I do not know.

Our total exports for 1948 increased by $300 million over 1947 figures. The principal increases were in beef and cattle, $87 million; wood pulp and newsprint, $75 million; metals, $128 million; farm machinery, $32 million.

I might mention wheat. In this house we have heard a good deal about wheat but I think we are going to hear less about it in the future, because any mention of wheat is going to remind the farmer that his return for 1949 and for 1950 will be higher than the returns to any farmer in any other corner of the world.

Mr. Ross (Souris): He will still be short $600 million.

Mr. Howe: I can tell the members of this house that our wheat for the crop year of 1948 is 95 per cent sold at the present time.

Mr. Hackett: At a loss of over a dollar a bushel.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend never saw a kernel of wheat in his life.

Mr. Rowe: He knows the price of it better than you do.

Mr. Howe: When the farmer plants his wheat this spring, he will know just what the returns from that particular wheat will be. He knows that 140 million bushels of the 1949 crop have been sold to our traditional customer, the United Kingdom, at a price of two dollars per bushel. Much has been said about the United Kingdom wheat contract, but too little has been said about the importance of having a place reserved for Canada in the market of the United Kingdom. I can tell the members of the house that, had it not been for the firm contract for 140 million bushels of wheat to the United Kingdom from the 1948 crop, there would be a great deal of unsold wheat in Canada today, just as there is in the country to the south of us. As the minister responsible for the export sale of our wheat, I am very happy indeed to know that 140 million bushels of the 1949 crop have been sold at a firm price, a price that in these days of falling markets appears to be an excellent one for Canada.

I suggest that, before we talk any more about losses from the United Kingdom wheat contract, we remind ourselves that only two and a half years of the four-year period have passed. It may be well to look at the final results before counting our losses. I am sorry I have ruined my friend's favourite speech.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You wait until he has the next opportunity of talking for forty minutes.

Mr. Howe: My time has almost expired, but I should like to say a word about the economic outlook. As I have said before the prosperity of a country can be gauged fairly well by the annual volume of its exports plus the annual volume of its investment. In Canada, our capital investment program for the year 1948 stood at about $3 billion. By a coincidence, our exports from Canada during the year 1948 were also at about the level of $3 billion. At the same time our gross national product—that is, the value of everything produced in Canada during 1948—was in excess of $15 billion. I might say to hon. gentlemen that each of those figures is just about three times the comparable figures of ten years ago and about six times the comparable figures of the period 1930-35 which hon. gentlemen opposite know something about.

In our department it is customary to attempt a forecast of the current economic period. Earlier today I tabled the results of a questionnaire that is sent out by the department to some eighteen thousand business firms in Canada. It is sent to municipalities, to provinces and to every agency that carries on construction work. It is a type of survey that has been made for the past several years which has proven to be remarkably accurate. Its importance has been recognized by business, and each year we are getting better co-operation from business in working out that survey. The survey reveals that the total investment intentions for 1949 exceed those of 1948 by about eight per cent. That is eight per cent in value, which means by about three per cent in volume. There are some changes in the pattern for 1949 investments. There is a higher proportion of investment, on the part of institutions, in utilities and in housing and a somewhat lower proportion in the manufacturing industries. That is indeed an exceedingly large investment program for a country of our size, but the supply situation has improved considerably and there is every reason to believe that Canada will be able to complete the program that is there indicated.

A study of the gross national product figures indicates that the gross national product for 1949 promises to be about $1 billion higher than the $15,500 million estimate for 1948. There is an indication that the general level of business will be about the same as in 1949, with a leveling off in prices that will relieve the economy of the inflationary pressures that were caused in part by the short supply position. As a result of the survey, and of the studies that have been conducted by officers of my department who are competent to make such studies, I think I can say that, barring earthquakes, serious labour-management troubles or a change in government, the position of our economy during 1949 will not deteriorate, and the people of Canada can be assured that 1949 will be as prosperous a year as was 1948.

Mr. Adamson: May I ask the minister a question? He said there was an increase of eight per cent in value and three per cent in volume as between the years 1948 and 1949?

Mr. Howe: Talking about investment, yes.

Mr. Adamson: The expected investment will have an increase of eight per cent in value which, according to the minister's figure, is three per cent in volume?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Adamson: That is, in that period we have fallen that much in the relative purchasing power of the dollar.

Mr. Howe: That is from a comparable period in 1948 to a comparable period in 1949.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the house found the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) most interesting, but I wonder if a great many of the Canadian people will not also find it a bit disappointing.

Mr. Cruickshank: This one certainly will be disappointing.

Mr. Thatcher: I wonder if the minister had cause to be as optimistic as he appeared to be. He made the statement that the condition of Canadian trade at the present time is healthy. I do not see how he can arrive at that conclusion, because a good deal of our trade at the moment is based on loans or credits that we have made to Great Britain, or on ERP aid; and I understand that there is every possibility that those loans will soon be used up, and that ERP aid will soon be gone. When that time comes, I wonder in what kind of position we Canadians will find ourselves.

This afternoon the minister talked, it seemed to me, a little bit too much about the present. He did not talk about the future. He did not tell us what he plans to do to increase British imports into this country, or what he plans to do to remedy the deteriorating position of our British-Canadian trade. I plan, for about fifteen minutes this afternoon, to talk about that subject. During the past year we have seen our exports to Britain shrink rapidly in almost every line. This has been true particularly of manufactured and processed goods, on which we depend so heavily to maintain full employment; but it has also been true of such pre-war staples as bacon, livestock, agricultural products, timber and newsprint. Our apple markets in Britain are today practically gone. I understand that the apple growers on both coasts are facing virtual ruin.

Our exports to Britain have shrunk despite the fact that in the past several years we have given substantial loans to Britain. Our exports have shrunk despite the fact that in the past year the Americans have given to Britain more than $500 million in ERP aid directly, to finance Canadian purchases. As a matter of fact our trade relations with Great Britain have been strained practically since the end of the war. I do not think the minister was fair with the house this afternoon. Putting it bluntly, the way in which we have kept our exports to Great Britain, even at their present level, was only due to the fact that for the last two years—perhaps this is exaggerating slightly—we have virtually been giving many of those goods away.

The causes of our present trade difficulties with Great Britain are well known to every hon. member. Prior to the war Britain, year in and year out, was able to buy three times as much from Canada as we bought from her. Since the war, the financial position of Britain has been such that this trade relationship has no longer been possible. Britain has been forced by harsh realities to buy from those countries that bought from her. In other words, she has not been able to trade on the old basis, simply because she has lacked Canadian dollars to do so. Therefore I think the trade situation of Canada is much more serious than the minister a few moments ago gave us to believe. Unless we can do something to increase British imports into this country, and do it soon, we face the real prospect of losing in Great Britain many of our markets for our primary products.

Mr. Cruickshank: Do you want to bring horse meat in here?

Mr. Thatcher: If the present situation is serious, then I think the future situation appears even more difficult; because, should that artificial and temporary prop of ERP aid be removed, the bottom could fall out of our British market almost overnight, not twelve months from now, not six months from now. It could fall out in a month. There is apparently a strong possibility that ERP aid may be removed. I shall quote a few lines from the Financial Post of February 19, which reads as follows:

> Canada stands in grave danger of losing ECA support for her wheat agreement with the United Kingdom—a trade which totalled $304 million in the ten months ended January 31, 1949. It's the biggest and most ominous problem Canadians have faced since the war. . . there is little doubt that unless there is intervention at the highest level, likelihood of Canada getting further ECA funds for the United Kingdom wheat deal is highly uncertain.

In the house the other day the Prime Minister was asked whether, while he was in Washington, he was given any assurance by the President that ERP aid would be continued. The best assurance that the Prime Minister could give the people of Canada was that he felt certain the President had a "friendly understanding" of our problem. That will help, but nevertheless we must face the possibility that ERP aid may soon be removed.

Recently, London concluded a billion-dollar barter agreement with Poland, and the products which Britain obtained from Poland were livestock, cheese, and other agricultural products. I believe I am not exaggerating, Mr. Speaker, when I say that that deal caused consternation in agricultural circles in Canada. We know that that is not the only barter deal that England has concluded with European countries. There have been dozens of others of a similar nature. Mr. Speaker, in almost every case, the products which Britain is securing from these countries are the products which formerly she obtained from Canada. In other words, as time goes on we are seeing the markets for our primary products evaporate.

In addition, today the United Kingdom authorities are spending substantial sums of money in developing the continent of Africa. When these food-producing areas commence to produce, it is reasonable to assume that in the future Great Britain will be even less dependent upon Canada for food than she is today. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, no matter in what way we look at it, the primary producers of this country are facing very serious marketing difficulties, and I do not see how these facts justify the speech made by the minister this afternoon that the future trade prospects of Canada are rosy.

We could look for markets elsewhere. Probably we could sell some of our farm surpluses to the United States. Yet, in the past, the United States has always been insecure so far as markets for Canadian primary products were concerned.

It would seem to me that the most sensible solution for this parliament to attempt would be to hold our British markets. In some way we must find methods of increasing British imports into this country. It seems to me that in the last few years the government has been most apathetic in devising ways and means to increase British imports. Far too often we Canadians forget that in order to be an exporting country we have to buy. If you want to sell to a customer you must give him the means to pay for the goods. Sir Stafford Cripps warned this parliament and the Dominion of Canada about two weeks ago, in a manner that we cannot overlook. Sir Stafford made this statement in Great Britain. Probably hon. members have read it but I should like to quote it from the Canadian Press.

> Cripps issues warning Canada to lose exports unless it "buys British."
> Britain will buy less food from Canada unless Canada buys more from Britain, Sir Stafford Cripps, chancellor of the exchequer, said Thursday.
> . . . he said the crux of the post-war Anglo-Canadian trading problem is expansion of British exports to Canada.
> He said the present difficulties in Anglo-Canadian trade could be eased by greater Canadian purchases in other sterling areas in addition to the United Kingdom.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, that statement puts our trade problem right up to this parliament. If we want to continue to hold our markets in Britain we have to increase our British imports. As a parliament, perhaps there are several methods we could adopt which would accomplish that objective. I think one of the first would be tariff concessions on British imports. The government should thoroughly explore the possibility of giving fairly substantial tariff concessions to the English on British merchandise. We have not yet passed the Geneva trade agreement. It may not be wise for this parliament to pass it. I was concerned the other day to read an article about tariffs in the same issue of the Financial Post which I quoted a moment ago. This is what it said:

> Tariff rates on cotton and rayon textiles are expected to be restored after June 30.
> . . . it is expected that the government will announce these decisions at least three months ahead of the effective date.
> The British trade has been warned, it is understood, that the government is no longer able to permit suspension of rate, which gave British suppliers free entry to the market.

I questioned the Minister of Finance the other day as to the veracity of that report, and he denied that such notice had been given. Notwithstanding that denial, the next day an article appeared in the Ottawa Citizen, written by Ross Munro, which was headed up:

> To reimpose tariffs on United Kingdom cottons.
> The government intends to reimpose the British preferential tariff on British cottons and rayon textiles after next June 30.

I sincerely hope that that statement is not correct, Mr. Speaker, because it would be economic lunacy to put higher tariffs on British goods, at a time when Canada should be trying to encourage British imports. Therefore the first step that this parliament should take would be to explore the possibility of reducing tariffs on British goods; but I hasten to say at once that I do not think that that step in itself would be sufficient to remedy our trade difficulties.

In recent months more and more Canadians have commenced to wonder whether a barter deal, or a bilateral deal between Britain and Canada might not be the solution to our problem. If European countries can make workable exchanges with Britain, it is difficult to understand why Canada cannot do likewise. Personally, I believe that in most cases barter is a retrogressive step. I think that, if most Canadians had any choice in the matter, they would prefer to retain multilateral trade; but it is beginning to appear in the world today that we may not have any choice.

I should like to quote another paragraph from the same issue of the Financial Post:

> Records compiled from official sources by the Department of Trade and Commerce at Ottawa, reveal that there are betweeen 100 and 150 barter or bilateral deals now in existence, mostly between the countries of Europe.

Apparently the British have decided that in the future they are going to conduct most of their trade on a bilateral basis. If we wish to continue trading with Britain, it looks as if we are going to be forced to deal in that way.

On February 9 I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) whether he had explored the possibilities of barter trade with Great Britain, and he made this reply, as reported on page 393 of Hansard:

> The Canadian government is not favourably disposed toward barter agreements between governments . . . It believes in multilateral trade and is opposed to any system of trading which tends to interfere with multilateral trade.

That is a pretty brusque statement, and at the risk of appearing presumptuous I would say that it was not a wise one. The minister should admit that there is something wrong with our trading system between Great Britain and Canada. If the old system will not work, perhaps we are going to have to try something new. We read a good deal about the rumours of another barter deal, this time concerning wheat, between Great Britain and Russia. This afternoon the minister was optimistic. He said that we have an assured market. That assured market will continue only for a few more months. If by some chance we should wake up some afternoon in this parliament, and find that Great Britain had concluded with Russia a barter deal for wheat, I think the whole economic structure, not only of the prairies but of this country, would be shaken to its very foundations. I say therefore that if barter or bilateral trade is the only way we can keep our British market, then by all means let us adopt barter. It is not a question of whether or not we like barter—not a question of that at all. It is a question of whether in order to maintain our British market—indeed, in order to survive economically—we are prepared to adopt that method of trading, if the British ask or force us to do so.

As a matter of fact I found somewhat strange the aversion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to state trading. After all, I remember that the first year I was in Ottawa he and his ministers played a leading role in negotiating, between Canada and Great Britain, a wheat agreement under which the Dominion of Canada sold Great Britain 600 million bushels of wheat. If he could do it then, why is he afraid to do something like that at the present time?

I believe there are many Liberals across Canada who are not afraid of that kind of trading agreement. For instance, Premier Byron Johnson of British Columbia only a few weeks ago, in a letter to the London Times, openly suggested that British Columbia would be interested in exchanging British Columbia lumber for British steel.

I say a decision in respect of trade is pressing; it cannot wait indefinitely. In my home city of Moose Jaw we have a plant of the Swift Canadian Company in which normally five hundred men are employed. Today approximately two hundred are out of work because Great Britain no longer buys as much meat from us as she did formerly. Then, we have flour mills across Canada. Today many of them are either closed down or have laid men off because Great Britain is not buying as much flour as she did formerly.

I have already mentioned the position of the apple growers.

Mr. Cruickshank: In Saskatchewan?

An hon. Member: Horse feathers!

Mr. Cruickshank: Apple growers in Saskatchewan!

Mr. Thatcher: I say that our marketing difficulties are already upon us, whether we wish to admit it or not. It is not enough for parliament to continue to do nothing, to drift, and to hope something will turn up which will give us back our British market.

As Canadians we must understand the position of the British. One cannot help admiring the wonderful economic recovery they have made in the last several years.

Only last Saturday I picked up the Ottawa Citizen and noticed that one of the leading editorials dealt with the subject of the British government and trade. The editorial says this:

> The truth is that the Labour government has proved a magnificent success. It was elected to power in one of the most difficult hours of Britain's history. But it has measured up to the grave tasks imposed upon it in a fashion that has won the admiration and reluctant approval even of individuals and publications which ordinarily would be expected to be among its bitterest critics.

A good deal of the success of which the Citizen speaks was accomplished by the British through these bilateral trade agreements. Using such trading methods the United Kingdom has achieved a degree of rehabilitation and recovery which is almost incredible. Therefore if today they are somewhat reluctant to relinquish those trading methods, we can scarcely blame them. Nor can we blame the British government entirely if they maintain that the final answer to our trading impasse lies with the parliament of Canada.

After all, from the figures the minister gave us a few moments ago, the fact remains that Great Britain is still buying at least two and a half times more from Canada than we are buying from her. It is one of the main duties of parliament at this session to face up to that situation. While we are looking for a solution we must hope that the British will give us sympathetic and generous understanding, particularly when they remember the billions of dollars we poured into Great Britain in our joint war effort, when they remember the billions of dollars we have given them in loans, credits and gifts since the war, and when they remember the hundreds of millions of dollars which our primary producers have given them through selling our products at sacrifice prices. With those things in mind I feel sure the British will give the people of Canada every consideration.

I would urge the government of Canada immediately to adopt the following steps, in order to improve British-Canadian trade:

1. Call an immediate trade conference between top-level Canadian and British governmental authorities, at either Ottawa or London, to explore the trade situation thoroughly and completely. I believe the Canadian delegation should include representatives from all the major political parties of the House of Commons.

2. The Canadian government at that conference should be prepared to make major tariff concessions to Britain, in order to encourage British imports.

3. The Canadian delegation should express complete willingness to enter bilateral or barter agreements with the British, if they desire it.

4. Import boards should be established immediately in Canada to direct the disposition of British goods in this country, and to encourage British imports generally.

5. Long-term agreements for primary products such as wheat, apples, fish, lumber, et cetera, should be particularly sought by the Canadian delegation.

I emphasize once again that I believe the time for action of that sort is limited. Some may deplore the fact that it might be necessary to use barter trade. We must realize however that, in the world as it is today, that type of trading is being carried on more and more extensively. If we wish to protect our British markets, then I suggest these steps be taken soon by parliament.

On February 8, Harold Wilson, president of the British board of trade, said:

> The British government is prepared to examine any suggestion "however unorthodox" to increase exports to Canada.

The British government is desirous and willing to co-operate. I suggest therefore that this parliament should proceed—and let us proceed soon before, as I said a moment ago, some morning we awaken to find that Britain has concluded a wheat agreement with Russia.

Mr. G. R. Webb (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, may I add my voice by way of congratulation of the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. May I also add a word of welcome to those new members who have taken their seats at this session, and an especially enthusiastic welcome to my leader, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew). Not only has he given a great deal of inspiration to hon. members on this side of the house, but he has created a sense of interest throughout the house and has given high hopes to men and women in all walks of life for a greater and more united Canada. His presence here portrays vividly great changes, one being the fact that it has created a housing problem within the seating arrangement for hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party. Every available seat is now taken. I think it only fair to give notice at this time that, should any further by-elections be fought, further seating arrangement be made accordingly.

The speech from the throne begins with these words:

> The first concern of government in world affairs is to ensure peace and security.

May I hasten to say that I am fully in accord with those sentiments and I believe all hon. members of the house and in fact all people across Canada are also in accord with those sentiments. After spending many days listening to the speeches that have been delivered in this house, some good and some not good—probably mine will not be so good—I have not as yet been able to develop any great feeling of comfort, especially from what has been said on the government side of the house. I realize that there are many problems that present themselves in carrying out those high aims and achievements and I should like to deal with a few of those problems as I see them as well as with some of the things that have come to my attention as I have gone across the country. It seems to me that there are two things, both closely linked together, which are spoken of more than anything else, namely, the high cost of living and the very high taxation.

We hear a lot about the need of keeping down prices, but we do not hear so much, especially from some quarters, about the need of keeping down all kinds of government taxes. In my opinion the various government taxes, direct and indirect, are as much a part of the high cost of living as are prices. High prices are sometimes escapable, but I have yet to find a way to escape high taxes. Therefore, to my way of thinking, high taxes are in reality a greater factor in the high cost of living which affects the people of Canada so much at the present time.

Not only are high taxes hard on the individual, not only do they constitute an important factor in the high cost of living; they affect adversely the whole economy of Canada. High taxation adds to the cost of production, which in turn means higher price tags on the things we have to sell. For a country which must sell about one-third of what it produces in order to keep prosperous, that does not seem to me to be a healthy situation. The nations that buy our goods are not particularly interested in our high taxes, in our production or other costs. If our prices are too high, it follows that they are going to buy from other countries whose price tags are lower. I think we must accept that as being reasonable.

Therefore I submit that something must be done to overcome these extremely high taxes. They are crippling enterprise, stifling development and denying adventure. More and more capital is shrinking from too great risk. More and more businessmen, including farmers, are asking themselves whether it is worth while to work for the state by extending their efforts or whether it is not better just to coast along. High taxes affect people in all walks of life. While it is not my purpose to pick out any particular class, for just a moment I should like to refer to the effect high taxes have had upon the farmers. May I say right here that I have had very close connections with farmers all my life and I know something of their ways.

I have never found farmers to be opposed to the payment of taxes provided they are applied on a fair basis, but they are certainly opposed to the present government's method and basis of taxation and the manner in which the laws governing taxation are being enforced. On February 1 the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) went into this matter in some detail and I need hardly say that I am heartily in accord with everything he said at that time. It is not my purpose to take up the time of the house by repeating what he said, but I would direct the attention of hon. members to his remarks as reported on pages 150 and 151 of Hansard. I suggest that anyone who has not given particular attention to what the hon. member said, in so far as his remarks applied to farmers, would find his time well spent by reading his speech. What he said applies to farmers in general, and certainly to the farmers in my district.

I believe that if the farmers were approached in the proper way, if the tax form they are required to fill out did not require such an extensive bookkeeping system, if they were allowed the exemptions to which they are justly entitled, if the government would eliminate the present questionable and mysterious method of enforcing the income tax laws, they would be ready to pay just the same as anyone else. I submit that a large portion of the present vast army of tax collectors and what-have-you might be dispensed with and the Department of National Revenue would thus be able to save some money.

Just in passing, may I enlarge upon what I mean by just exemptions, to which I think the farmer is entitled. Anyone inside or outside the house who has had any experience in farming knows that the farmer works anywhere from ten to fifteen hours a day. That is not a three or four day week, it is a seven day week. Then consideration should be given to the assistance which he receives from his wife, not only in connection with running the household but also in connection with outside work. Then assistance is provided by any sons and daughters, in fact by everyone connected with the farm household.

As far as I can figure out, our farmers do not get the exemptions I have just referred to. They are not given consideration for the hours of work they put in. If that were considered, and if consideration were given to the exemptions to which they are justly entitled, then I think you would have an entirely different situation in connection with the collecting of income taxes from farmers. In addition it seems to me that, in the result, you would have a much happier and more satisfied people. Urban and rural people would be brought more closely together, and would eventually understand one another much better; but in my opinion the farmer has done a great deal, especially during the war years, to bring about a balanced economy. We read in the press, and in fact we hear from many other sources, about the possibility of a reduction in income tax this year. We are led to believe that we should expect one when the budget is presented to the house. I hope this is not only wishful thinking, because it is long overdue. I can only say that I believe the Canadian people are, and have been, very suspicious of the government withholding relief from taxation until a time when they might hold it out as an inducement to the people of Canada to return the present government to power. That is hardly fair, but from the reports I receive from people right across Canada it would seem that any relief in taxation which may be forthcoming in the budget will probably be too little, and definitely too late, to accomplish the desired result.

There are many taxes to which I might refer, but it is pretty hard to pick out one tax which seems to be more discriminatory than another. I believe that almost all members of the house have been receiving letters, and have been approached on many occasions, about the tax on jewelry. That is only one article, and I am not going to spend very much time on it at the moment because other speakers have dealt with the matter. I refer particularly to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), who made a speech the other night. I have read his speech, and I should like to refer members to page 751 of Hansard where it seems to me that he has set out the situation very well. I believe that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has been pressed on many occasions with representations about this tax. Therefore we can only hope that some consideration will be given to this particular business, because we are all anxious to have businesses in our respective communities carry on in a prosperous way. I know they are very much affected at this time.

I had intended to say a good deal about the wartime prices and trade board, but I do not want to repeat any more than is necessary. At this stage of the debate it is pretty hard to talk about anything that has not already been referred to. Dealing with the activities of the wartime prices and trade board in my community, I cannot do better than to refer you to the remarks that the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) made not long ago. After listening to his speech and reading it, I can only say that my experience in the constituency of Leeds has been very similar. I refer the members of the house to pages 152 and 153 of Hansard, where the hon. member states his experiences. I only wish to add that I concur in his remarks. It seems to me that it is about time that drastic changes were made.

I want to turn to another matter to which I have referred on different occasions when the estimates were before the house, the question of rural postal service. At the beginning of my remarks I said I was going to mention several items, and this is one of them. On several occasions I have brought to the attention of the postal department the fact that a large number of families in our rural areas are not receiving postal service. It has always been my contention that, if one person is going to receive postal delivery in a rural district, then everyone within that area should receive the same service, if at all possible. I know of cases in my part of the country where there seems to be definite discrimination, and for reasons that are pretty hard to understand. I suggested in the house at one time that I thought it would be reasonable to make a survey of the various postal routes. I know there are some of them that are much shorter than others but which really should get more money. The condition of roads varies, and there are many other conditions which should be taken into consideration. Until such time as a survey is made, may I say that I cannot see how anyone can possibly sit in an office in Ottawa and know the type of delivery that should be made, how often it should be made, and what the cost of the delivery should be on a reasonable basis. I am not going to say anything more on that subject.

There is another matter that is of great interest to me, and on which I have spoken on different occasions. In passing I want to bring to your attention again my opinion about national parks. I believe the government—and I will give them a little credit here—are on sound ground in increasing the expenditure on national parks. In my view such parks constitute a great Canadian asset which should return dividends from year to year. As time passes, and the number of tourists increases, they will prove immensely valuable. I feel that very soon eastern Ontario—and incidentally I think it would be quite in order for me to suggest the county of Leeds, which after all is the most popular resort area in eastern Ontario—should also have a national park on a basis that is really worthy of this country, and in keeping with the natural beauties and attractions of this section of Canada.

Closely linked with that subject, of course, is the tourist business. Every session since I have come to the house I have spoken about the value of tourists to our country, not only because we need hard currency, but also because we need the friendship of those who come here. People with whom we have played golf, fished, and possibly sailed, and whom we consider as personal friends, will feel favourably disposed to trade with us if we extend the right hand of fellowship, and if we do not withdraw the hand too quickly to count the tourist dollars which we hope repose therein.

The tourist industry has been kicked around in various departments of the government since I have been here, but I do not think it should be regarded any longer as a sideline. I think it should take a major place in some department of the government which will be able to familiarize itself with it, and carry on year after year, instead of having it turned over to a different department every year or two. I think that our efforts in this direction certainly should be increased, because after all it is a very important factor in our everyday life, especially in my particular part of the country. The hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) touched on this question in his speech the other day. He asked for a commission. I have not had an opportunity of talking with him since, but I think last year we both asked for something a little different from what we have had. This might be the answer. In closing this particular portion of my address, I should like to say that I no longer consider this a sideline of this government and I hope the department concerned will give the matter special consideration.

I should like to mention one other item which seems very important to me and which has not been mentioned in the present debate. It concerns accidents at level crossings, about which we read every day in our newspapers. In this modern age, nothing is more antiquated than the average level crossing. Most of these crossings were constructed in the horse and buggy days. The tremendous increase in the pace and volume of traffic today has made these crossings entirely inadequate and extremely dangerous. I made a survey of the accidents at these crossings during the last two years and although I did not bring the figures with me, I can tell you they were shocking. A large number of people lost their lives or were maimed for life in level-crossing accidents throughout this country. This week I read a newspaper report of five people who were killed at a level crossing near Kirkland Lake. Within the last two days two more people have been killed. So often when we pick up our morning newspaper we read of another accident at one of these dangerous railway crossings.

Most of these crossings are going to be with us for a long time. I realize that the elimination of all level crossings within a short period of time is quite impossible. All we can do in the immediate future is to eliminate the more dangerous crossings which exist on the heavily traveled highways and streets. I trust you will bear with me if I give you an example of one of the most dangerous level crossings in the province of Ontario. This crossing is located on the main line of the Canadian National Railways close to the railway station in the town of Brockville. At this point the railway line intersects Perth street, which is the street used by most north and south bound traffic in the town of Brockville. I travel this highway frequently and it is a very rare occasion when I am not halted at this crossing for a considerable length of time. I am not going into too much detail at the moment, but this is the main east and west line of the Canadian National Railways and is consequently heavily traveled. Incidentally, the railway yards are also in that area. A considerable portion of the town is on the north side of the track and it is not unusual to see hundreds of school children waiting to cross at this point. On many occasions the fire department has been delayed at that crossing, with very serious results.

I am sorry the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is not in his seat at the moment because I believe he is familiar with this particular crossing. If he were here I am sure he would agree with me when I say that this crossing is one of the most dangerous in this province; in fact, I would not be surprised if it were one of the most dangerous in Canada. I have described this particular crossing and tried to tell you of the inconveniences and the hazards that prevail there. I firmly believe that the correction of this situation would be a great relief to the railway men who have the responsibility of handling rail and road traffic at this busy point, and it would add to the safety and convenience of the pedestrians and vehicles using the crossing.

In discussing possible solutions with the local citizens, I have been informed that vigorous complaints have already been lodged with the representatives of the Canadian National Railways. So far this has brought no results. For the present I must be content to let my case rest at this point, but I feel this is an important matter. While I have mentioned a specific case in my own constituency, I would not want anyone in the house to feel I am selfish about this, because I know there are many equally dangerous crossings in other parts of Canada. As I said before, I do not believe all level crossings can be eliminated at once, but I do feel that some of the more dangerous ones, at which accidents have been frequent, should receive some special consideration by the Department of Transport.

It is not my intention to labour this question, but I should like the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to note that I have not finished with it. I trust that, before the minister's estimates are before the house, he will be able to give me some sort of satisfactory reply as to the possibility of improvement at this particular crossing. I believe it is important to the people in my constituency.

In conclusion, I submit that the immediate necessity is for a revolution in the government's thinking. Whether such apprehension can come to this government, which seems entirely out of touch with the man on the street, is of course another matter. It may be that no redress can be hoped for without a deeper and more drastic change.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): In rising to speak in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take the time of the house to analyse all that the speech from the throne contained. I am going to confine myself to one line of thought which I believe is paramount in the world today. I shall of course direct my remarks to the present administration. I recall on one occasion hearing of a young doctor who said: "I do not understand why that patient died; I gave him every kind of medicine I could think of." If the story be true, obviously the young medico was frustrated, and his frustration resulted in his trying anything and everything. As I listen to much that is said in this house, particularly by those whose words should mean something—I mean those who sit in the seats of the mighty, those whom I call head-cheese politicians who sometimes appear, politically, to be neither fish, flesh nor fowl—those in authority over us, I wonder if they are not like the young doctor. To me at least one thing seems to be certain; that is, that they could not have properly diagnosed the ills of the nation or of the world. If those in power had correctly diagnosed the world's headache, they would have discovered something of the enemy behind the scenes.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I shall suggest that no administration of any nation on the face of the earth can adequately solve the problems of that nation if they do not properly search out the enemy behind the scenes. Have our government done that? I think not. Instead, they have assumed that all is well with the human race. And so they strut around with their heads in the clouds, still believing that the moon is made of green cheese; they assume that the Canadian people are what some people term "a bunch of suckers", and proceed to spread it on thick.

I do not believe that we shall recognize the seriousness of the world situation until we also recognize that there is a tremendous battle going on behind the scenes of human affairs, and that battle is between the forces of right and the forces of wrong. That battle is between the forces of righteousness and unrighteousness, Christianity and anti-Christianity, Christ and anti-Christ. The sooner we understand that, the better. Then we shall recognize something of the tremendous struggle that is taking place for the survival of the human race. The battle that we must fight, if we are to be known as a Christian democracy, is a battle against evil, ungodly and satanic forces. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that the prize to be won in the battle is the human race. The ultimate objective of these forces of evil is the complete enslavement of the human race.

It appears to me that some of us are a bit lax in our thinking as we attempt to trace through the movements of the world and see in them the processes taking place, even before our very eyes, for the ultimate enslavement of the world. That is one reason I personally am against this clamour for world government. World government means only one thing—world enslavement.

What are the processes that are taking place? I shall mention one. I believe it was mentioned the other night by one of the other members of this group. These forces that are out to enslave the human race attempt to do so by dispossessing man of all that is rightfully his. One thing in our social credit movement that charms me is the fact that our one great plank is the establishment of man in his own right. How is this process of dispossession taking place? I shall mention a number of ways. In the first place, there is this terrible system imposed upon us by almost every government, the system of taxation which I will designate as legalized robbery or legalized dispossession.

We ask why governments tax, and they say: We must have money, and the only way in which we can get it is by taxation. Who said that was the only way we could get money? Mr. Abbott. Who told him so? Where has he been, and who has moulded his thinking? He might say: We have been taught that by the economists. If that is so, Mr. Speaker, these men who adhere to this taxation system have been taught to believe one colossal, gigantic lie. I would say that it is a national disgrace that learned professors of history, economics, money, banking and political economy, in our high schools and in our higher schools of learning, have not been and are not now telling us the truth. These so-called higher schools of learning have within them professors who have been taught by professors who in turn have been taught by professors; and over the decades of time one great big lie has been propagated.

To the question, where does money come from, ninety-nine out of one hundred of those you ask will give you the wrong answer. I say that the so-called higher education has degenerated into a system of colossal falsehoods perpetrated by professional, muddle-headed robots. I ask this question. Does the present Liberal administration believe that the only source from which they can get money with which to run this country is taxation? If they believe that, then they are a party to the lie. I turn to my Conservative friends and I ask them: Do you believe that the only source from which governments can get money is taxation? I ask our socialist friends to my right if they believe that.

I say to you that if political parties believe that that is the only source from which they can get money, then they are accessories after the lie. And all lies are evil, all lies are anti-Christ. This process of dispossession is gradually but surely taking place. I pose taxation as one of these methods of dispossession. It is gradually but surely taking place. The failure of the masses to sense the approach of their own doom is in accord with historical precedents. It was ever thus. Perhaps it is not expected that the people en masse will understand. Masses are swayed by emotional appeal, not by studious technical logic. The destructive forces know that and have already designated the people as the common herd. But we who sit in this house, men who are supposed to have intelligence, men who sit on the treasury benches guiding the affairs of the nation, men who have been highly regarded as those who ought to know; we men who sit in the house and in whom the masses have placed their confidence, are we so stupid as to fail to sense this situation and to see that, over the processes of time, eventually this taxation will dispossess each and every individual of that which is rightfully his?

Take our social service schemes, Mr. Speaker. Many of them are coming into operation. Some of them may appear to be legitimate and schemes which should be given legislative sanction, but in order to make these schemes effective they will eventually dispossess us of that which we have.

The other day we listened to the interesting speech of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). Undoubtedly he has in mind a great program. Undoubtedly he has been able to filch from the people of Canada by way of taxation enough money to give certain grants to the provinces in order to bring into existence a better health scheme. It is hailed as a progressive step; but let us not forget that in that progressive step, because of the adherence by this government to a taxation system, a process of dispossession is taking place. Take our old age pension scheme. I do not even like to mention that they are old age pension schemes; they are glorified relief schemes, glossing them over with a certain respectability. I shall prophesy something. I prophesy that, when the Minister of National Health and Welfare brings in a new old age pension scheme, under which the old age pensions may be larger, and under which there may be some attempt to grant them without a means test, any new legislation he brings in along that line will be on a contributory basis. I make that prophecy, and I shall turn to this particular page of Hansard and read it to him when that day comes. If his scheme is to be on a contributory basis, then it will mean that this process of dispossession is gradually fastening itself upon the people.

During this session we have heard a good deal about pensions for the incurables. I happen to be greatly interested in that, for a couple of years ago I was instrumental in having something to do with the organization which now numbers its membership in the thousands, and is growing rapidly throughout Canada. I know something of what the minister will have in mind when he brings down some sort of relief for incurables. What he has in mind is that it must be on a contributory basis. In the first place, an incurable has not the wherewithal to contribute. Nevertheless, if it is to be on a contributory basis, then the process of dispossession is taking place.

We have other schemes. There is unemployment insurance. I am not going to say that under the present system of taxation an unemployment insurance scheme has not some merit in it; but I do say that that is also a part of the process of dispossession. We hear a familiar phrase being used in labour circles with respect to their pay envelopes. The phrase is "take home pay". We have so much "take home pay". All I ask is: "What is the matter? What do you mean by take home pay? Don't you take it all home?" My answer is: "Why not; is it not yours?" The answer I get is: "There is a deduction for this and a deduction for that and a deduction for the other thing. And now that our union has gone into politics there is a deduction for this and a deduction for something else", and so on and so forth. "All I have now is my take home pay." I ask: "What has happened to the rest?" The answer I get is that it has been taken from the labourer legally. But he did not say that they could take it. Did they consult the labourer? Do they consult the populace when they want to take this money from them? No, of course they do not. I say that the process of dispossession is taking place. If it goes far enough the take home pay will result in an empty envelope. There will not be anything for us to take home. If the process goes still further and we are dispossessed of our homes we shall take nothing home because we shall not have any homes to take nothing home to. That will be the situation.

Unless we get at the basic and fundamental origin of what all this fight is about, we shall never solve anything. It is a little secret. We have to learn that these forces which are out to wreck humanity are, in the first place, out to dispossess us of that which we have; and, when once we are dispossessed, we, the human race, become the slaves of a huge bureaucratic state. Let us make no mistake about that. Dispossession by means of debt, interest and taxation is a deep-seated plot to enslave the human race. Look at what we are headed for: state medicine. That is what we are headed for. State distribution of foods; that is what we are headed for. State labour; that is what we are headed for, if it keeps on. Under the socialization of industry, labour toils for the state. Let us make no mistake about that. When that process is complete, you have the human race in a state of slavery.

I do not wish to go out of my way to refer to socialist Britain. I am going to refer to it, however, because it appears to me that Britain, which we once called Great Britain, is no longer great. At least she is not great in the sense of being a great economic factor in the world.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Hansell: My hon. friend says "nonsense". I shall not break up my speech to answer all the interjections; but I have heard them often. These socialist gentlemen who say that should have been sitting in the house thirteen or fourteen years ago, when some of us first came here. I am not going to take time to reply to these interjections; but the debate on controls is not yet over. The last word has not yet been said. Someone will answer my socialist friends who sit immediately to my right.

I am not blaming them for Great Britain's state. I do not know that we should place too much blame upon the British socialist government today; I want to be fair. But what I am saying is that in this battle of the ages one of the objectives in the minds of these forces of evil has been the destruction of a great empire. Let us not fool ourselves about that. And they are on their way; do not forget it. A socialized Britain is one step in the process.

Only the other day I read—and I had to smile when I read it—where a butcher in England was arrested for putting too much meat in his sausage.

Mr. Fraser: A skin game.

An hon. Member: You can read anything these days.

Mr. Hansell: That may be true. But what made me smile was that there was a day when men were arrested for giving short weight. Here is the case where a man gives more than he should. I know the reason; we all know it. Britain is in economic straits today.

Mr. Cruickshank: What about the horse meat of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Hansell: Food must be distributed adequately among the people. Furthermore, who has been one of the guiding lights in Great Britain for the past number of years? I know someone will say that Professor Harold Laski has nothing to do with the government of Britain today. But those who say that are not fooling me; he is one of the intellectuals who helped to mould socialist policy in Britain—yes, sir. This is the intellect who at one time was president of the British atheist rationalist free press association. This is the man who wrote the foreword to the communist manifesto by Karl Marx, the edition of the socialist party of America. This is the gentleman who wrote on the subject Why I Am a Marxist—and that is to be found in The Nation of November 3, 1939. This is the man who said that the defence of the soviet union is one of the highest duties a socialist can fulfil. And, if hon. members want to know where he said that, they may read it in the New Republic of October 30, 1935, page 339.

The Masses, a communist organ, in its issue of March 3, 1940, referred to Laski as a Marxist who acknowledges Lenin as one of the great leaders and thinkers of all times. May I read what was reported of a speech he made in the International Review of January, 1931. This is part of an address he delivered before the Royal Institute of International Affairs, at London:

> It follows there must be constructed in the state a revolutionary party, that this revolutionary party must be prepared to take over the reins of power, that it can only maintain itself in office as a result of dictatorship, that the strategy of dictatorship is the organized control of the whole machinery of social life; religion, which is merely the opium of the people; education, which is the clear foundation upon which the minds of the people can be controlled; the whole of these social services, which in their prewar form could not be trusted to serve the revolutionary state; the army, which is now the mere executive arm of the capitalist class; the navy, the air force, and other matters of that kind. That dictatorship, being a revolutionary dictatorship, will deal with all opposition so as to annihilate its consequences.

That is the mentality of those who are perpetrating a great scheme for the eventual enslavement of the human race.

The question arises: What are we going to do about it? It is not enough to cry Thief, thief! It is not enough to rave against communism, and to speak against it. Communism is the political philosophy used by the enemy behind the scene. It is what I call the anti-Christ front. I say again it is not enough to rave against communism. I heard the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition (Mr. Drew) speak only a few days ago. He made a good speech, in which he warned the country against communism; but warning the country against communism is not enough.

My Progressive Conservative friends should learn a lesson from the by-election which took place in Hammersmith the other day. Mr. Churchill went out, hammer and tongs. What did he do? What did he say? He used a lot of highfalutin phrases. He used his Churchillian oratory to move the masses. But there was one thing Churchill failed to do: he failed to present to the voters any effective alternative. And because he failed to present that alternative, the people were taking no chances.

That is the situation. Let us face these things fairly and squarely. I say it is not enough to rave against communism. The only way to stop the enemy dead in his tracks is to make our way of life what it ought to be. My friends who sit on the treasury benches have not learned yet the method they must follow if they wish to make this country what it ought to be. And let me say this: When we oppose communism let us remember the events of civilization never reverse themselves. They may vary up and down like the waves of the sea. But let me tell the house this, that you will never drive communism back from the advances they have now made in the world. Civilization has not marched throughout the centuries of time in that way. If all we are going to try to do is to simply rave against this evil thing, then I am afraid we are attempting a task that is doomed to failure. As I said before, the only way to stop it is to make Canada what it ought to be.

I have recently been reading a book entitled "World Communism Today" by Martin Ebon, who I fancy is a communist and who certainly is not afraid to remove the mask. The question is asked, "Can communism win the battle for world domination?" and the author replies, "Let us be frank. Yes, it can". He then proceeds to show that the coming test of communist strength will develop when the next serious economic crisis spreads across the globe, and this is what he says on page 464:

> Communism is organized desperation. It does not need the weapons of war to achieve its aims, although it may use them as collateral or alternative tools of revolution. Hunger and despair can be as effective as the most devastating weapon of war. As President Harry S. Truman said on March 12, 1947, when he asked the United States Congress to support Greece against communism, "The seeds of totalitarian regimes are nurtured by misery and want. They spread and grow in the evil soil of poverty and strife. They reach their full growth when the hope of people for a better life has died."

The author continues to assert that when the next depression comes communism will be ready for it. In the long-range view of the intellectual communist, together with the strategists, the machine is already geared and set for when that time comes. The author of this book quotes from an article in Pravda by Dr. Eugene Varga, who is director of the soviet institute for world economics and world politics. Dr. Varga said:

> The fear of a new approaching economic crisis is beginning to be felt in the capitalist world . . .
> The general crisis of the capitalist system, as pointed out by Comrade Stalin, has changed the cyclical process of capitalist production in the sense that the phases of crises and depressions have become longer, and that a depression is followed only by a phase of revival, but not by a phase of full prosperity.

And then again, continuing the quotation from Dr. Varga:

> The coming economic crisis in the United States will inevitably have a tremendous effect upon the situation in other capitalist countries. . . In capitalist countries the transition from war to peace is always bound up with narrowing markets, decline of production, closing down of industrial enterprises, and growth of unemployment. Only the Soviet union does not know such phenomena. In the Soviet union there is no anarchy of production, characteristic of capitalism, which leads to the rotation of periods of boom and crisis, which shake the very foundation of the economic system and create a constant uncertainty among the working masses as to their future.

It might be well if we paid just a little attention to what some of the intellectuals in the Marxist machine are thinking and are even warning the democratic world about. Our government carries on the same old laissez-faire sort of administration.

Mr. Blackmore: Unteachable.

Mr. Hansell: It is an unteachable government, a government that will not answer direct questions when they are put to it. How often have we heard the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) put one, two, three, four, five, six or more direct questions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and say, "Answer those." But he has turned a deaf ear.

Mr. Blackmore: Two deaf ears.

Mr. Hansell: He remained silent. Why? Because he did not know. Because he is a victim of lying propaganda.

Mr. Blackmore: Because he did not care.

Mr. Hansell: Because he did not care. One of these days it will be too late. Let us remember that, when once a nation is enslaved, it is enslaved forever.

Mr. Blackmore: The Minister of Finance will be enslaved along with the others.

Mr. Hansell: Let us remember that the communist high command, the communist intellectuals, have their hands on the pulse of the world's heart throb. They stand in readiness while we let things move along and take their course. What are we going to do about it? A year ago I heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) make a remark. I have great respect for the Minister of Labour but I do not regard him as one of the intellectuals.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: I want to tell you that if you listen to the intellectuals you will go wrong every time. My regard for the Minister of Labour is based upon my belief that he is a practical man with a great deal of common sense, a man with a sort of homespun philosophy. He said that we are on the verge of a new civilization. If we are on the verge of a new civilization, what kind of civilization is it going to be? It is going to be either a civilization of slaves or a civilization of free but economically secure people. It must be one or the other.

Since the Liberal government are in power it is their duty to see that we move into that age of freedom and security, an age where men can live, where men are free, where men will be in possession of the good things, of the good earth which has been abundantly bestowed upon us by a good God. Is this government able to bring us into that age? Judging by past experience, I think the answer would be, "Absolutely no."

If I were to ask the same question of my Conservative friends I would first tell them that it cannot be done by simply paring a bit of taxation off here and firing a few hundred civil servants, and putting something somewhere else, patching up here and patching up there. The old system needs no patching; the old system needs to be superseded by something that will bring on that glorious age.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, you have your hands on the arms of your chair, which is indicative that you are about to rise and tell me that my time has expired. The subject matter that I have at hand is almost endless, for the battle of the ages has been taking place since the dawn of mankind and will continue until we learn what it is all about. Otherwise we shall never be able to solve this nation's problems or the problems that face a befuddled world.

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, it is really too bad that the people who were here at three o'clock were not present a moment ago to listen to the hon. member who preceded me. They would have learned that at least one party in the house has a monopoly on knowledge, and a monopoly on prophecy.

Mr. Hansell: You could give some indication you have some.

Mr. Picard: The galleries were filled with people who came here expecting fireworks, but the fireworks did not materialize, and the fire petered out—

Mr. Low: You are putting water on it now.

Mr. Picard: —as will the bonfire that has been lit before, and is being lit again throughout the country by propagandists of the Progressive Conservative party. As Confucius said, "glamour is exciting to some but it is oftentimes shortlived".

The mover (Mr. Brown) and seconder (Mr. Demers) of the address having discharged their tasks well, it is fitting that I join my voice with those who have preceded me in extending to them my sincere congratulations. To the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who has assumed office since we last met, I wish to pay a tribute of admiration, and to give assurance of my loyal support as a member of the party that he has been selected to lead. The Prime Minister succeeds a man whose name will be associated in history with those who made confederation possible, like Macdonald and Cartier; he succeeds a man whose name will be associated with those who led it on its path toward complete autonomy, like Laurier; he succeeds a man who held office for the longest period known in the countries of the commonwealth, and who, more than any other Canadian, contributed to make Canada a sovereign state. As leader of his party he succeeds two great men, Laurier and King, who for sixty years guided its destinies with rare sagacity. As chief exponent of the views of Canadians of French descent, he succeeds Laurier and Lapointe, whose broad views have helped to build unity and a better understanding among the descendants of the two great races of the country. The Prime Minister has the talent, the ability, the courage, the inspiration, and the breadth of vision that make of him their worthy successor. It is with great pleasure that I offer him my sincere congratulations and my cordial wishes for a long tenure of office.

My congratulations also go to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who have already made a valuable contribution to the public life of the country in their respective provinces. I also want to associate with this tribute another newcomer to the house, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), who has ably served the country in high diplomatic posts. All these men have already taken part in our debates, and have proven valuable additions to parliament. In my opinion, the brilliant speeches of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this debate, as well as on the Newfoundland issue, have justified the confidence put in him by the former and the present prime ministers.

At this point I wish to avail myself of the opportunity to thank my good friend and colleague from Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) for having noted, during his speech on the Newfoundland bill, that I had been the first among the members now sitting in this house to advocate the return to Canada of all or part of Newfoundland. His words were all the more appreciated as it is indeed rare that a member pays any tribute to a colleague in this manner, and I wish to thank him. In order not to delay the passing of the bill for the union of Newfoundland with Canada I forsook the opportunity to speak on the question, but for the record may I refer hon. members to Hansard of February 17 and May 11, 1943, when I expressed my views on the matter.

The two main points of the speech from the throne deal with our position in world affairs, and the economic situation facing the country. I intended today to devote my time to certain aspects of these two questions, considering them of the utmost importance, and transcending all other questions of no less interest to the electors of the country, but certainly of less bearing on the future of Canada. In view of the trend of the speeches delivered by members of the Progressive Conservative party, I feel that it is my duty to deal with some of the issues they have raised in the present debate.

I think it is highly indicative of the methods employed by their party that a man of the reputation and the standing of the leader of the official opposition should find nothing better, at a moment of great importance in the history of this country and of the world at large, to choose as the ground for his first attack on the government after his arrival in this chamber, than a question decidedly more intended to draw votes than pertinent to the importance of the hour. It is fortunate, however, that it gave the Prime Minister an opportunity of administering an appropriate rebuke to the propaganda methods of the Tory party which have not failed in the past to distort facts and displace issues just as they have done on the question of dominion-provincial relations.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at seven-thirty o'clock.

Mr. Picard: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was about to say that, in his first contribution to federal parliamentary life, the Conservative leader did not give his attention to problems related to the security and economic stability of our country. By the scope of his approach to the problems facing Canada at this moment or lurking as the problems of the future, a man's contribution to parliamentary institutions should be judged. On this score, after hearing the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), I have not gained the impression, nor do I think the country has gained the impression, that he is the mental giant his propagandists have pictured him.

I might say that, on the same basis of judgment, the leaders of the two other opposition parties, although I do not share all the views they expressed, have shown themselves far superior in their approach to the vital problems of the hour and in their concern for the questions which at the moment should be foremost in our mind. They appeared to understand that above petty political tactics they had to consider the fate of our country as affected by the turmoil of world politics and the precarious position we might find ourselves in within a not too distant future if we cannot bring about a correction to the insecure economic position we are gradually heading for owing to the complete collapse of the present means of exchange among nations and to the chaos prevailing in world economy.

By his speech in this house, the leader of the opposition has shown the country he is not so interested in the vital issues that should be the subject of our attention as he is in stirring up issues which he hopes will help him to be regarded by some sections of the country as the defender of their rights, rather than as the man who uttered so many statements he would today prefer to forget. The leader of the opposition evidently did not grasp the objections raised by some members about the choice of his line of attack, when he took great pains to explain on Monday, February 21, that he had the right to raise points which were not mentioned in the speech from the throne. He referred to the question of dominion-provincial relations. No one questioned his right to do so, but we did question the propriety of doing it when there were so many questions to be considered of vital importance to the country.

His second line of attack derived from the first, and contained references to threats to the autonomy of the provinces—another warhorse he shares with his friend Duplessis. I must point out to the few Conservative members who are in the house that, in speaking thus, I am not taking anyone by surprise. I commenced my speech before six o'clock when the leader of the opposition was in his seat and he knew I would be continuing in this vein after the recess.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Picard: I usually do not permit questions from the Conservative side because they turn out to be long-winded speeches, but if the hon. member has a short question to ask I will accept it.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Would the gentleman be kind enough to tell us from what he is reading?

Mr. Picard: I am reading from notes I have prepared for this speech, and in doing so I am not doing more than has been done by the members on the other side of the house. I dare the member to read as well as I am doing.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) reverses himself without changing from his previous stand, hoping that people will believe in the conversion proclaimed by him. I would ask the member who interrupted me to inform me the next time he makes a speech so that I can make sure he really does make a speech and does not read from something prepared by his leader. No one in public life has been caught in so many contradictions as has the leader of the opposition since the opening of this session. What faith can the people of Canada have in a man, no matter how clever he may be depicted by his propagandists, who in such a short period of his life has put himself on record with so many conflicting and contradictory professions of faith on national issues.

I need not go into details. The house and the country still have fresh in their mind all the questions on which the leader of the opposition has been shown his inconsistencies since this session has started. His trying to make the people of Canada, and in particular the people of Quebec, believe that the Prime Minister has sinister intentions against the autonomy of the provinces and his attempt to build himself up as the hero defender of minorities remind me of the story of the man who, after looting a store, was pursued by the owner and his clerk. Seeing a policeman at the corner, the thief pointed to his pursuers and shouted: "Arrest these men, they have robbed me!"

The leader of the opposition after having proven himself, in company with Premier Duplessis, as the man who did the most to scuttle the dominion-provincial conferences, now turns to the Canadian people and says, pointing to the past and present prime ministers: "They did it." And his cohorts repeat as one man, "They did it." But that is not enough for the member for Carleton (Mr. Drew), so he asks his supporters to depict the Prime Minister as the enemy of his own racial group. This is done in the hope that he—the man whose publicists must work hard to explain or refute some of his bright sayings of a few years ago, which he never denied at the time—might emerge from this as the new saviour of the rights of minorities and the new friend of the same province of Quebec.

This is just a farce, Mr. Speaker, but a sad one when you see the leader of the opposition interrupt the Prime Minister during a quotation he was giving the house on January 31, and say in a most insinuating way: Mr. Prime Minister, was it not in the same speech that you dealt with the subject of language and the right of this parliament to deprive any group in this country of a particular language if it was felt that should be done? What a method, Mr. Speaker! What a system of deliberate insinuation! Yet the statement made by the Prime Minister after the insinuating question by the member for Carleton was clear and well-defined, and his stand consistent with the terms of the constitution and the intentions of the fathers of confederation.

I need not go into details of the masterful exposé of the question the Prime Minister gave earlier in this session as it is still present in the minds of hon. gentlemen of this house, as it is in the minds of those who read its terms in the daily press.

The Prime Minister spoke with courage in 1946, as he did in this debate. The people of Canada will see the difference between his straightforward answer and the dubious methods of the Tory party. The more he is attacked by such methods, the more the Prime Minister will gain the respect and confidence of the country by his truly national attitude.

(Translation):

As for his fellow citizens in the province of Quebec, they will not be taken in by such deceitful tactics. At almost the very moment when Mr. Duplessis' spokesman and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) were being moved to pity at the very thought of the dangers that the Prime Minister's attitude might cause to the French language, two important associations of the province of Quebec, the Société Saint-Jean Baptiste of Montreal and the Société de la Survivance française expressed their confidence in the Prime Minister in no uncertain terms and acknowledged his fondness for the French language. I now wish to read the text of the messages which were forwarded to the Prime Minister:

The general president and general directors of the société Saint-Jean Baptiste of Montreal were very pleased to learn about your official visit to the Canadian metropolis. The Société Saint Jean Baptiste of Montreal, the national organization of the French Canadians, would very much appreciate the honour of an hour's visit with the general council on March 5 or 6 next on the occasion of a reception organized in tribute to a compatriot who, having become the Prime Minister of Canada, proclaimed through his energetic example the rights of the French language in the House of Commons.

Please accept our warm congratulations and our cordial invitation.

(Signed) Arthur Tremblay,
General President of the Société Saint-Jean Baptiste of Montreal.

And here is the one from the Société du Bon Parler français:

To the Hon. the Prime Minister:

The Société du Bon Parler français deems it a privilege and a most pleasant duty to congratulate you for having recognized the bilingual character of Canada in giving more prominence to the French language in the House of Commons when the new session of parliament was opened.

We are confident that we express the feelings of all French Canadians in assuring you of our most sincere and patriotic gratitude.

Most respectfully yours,
(Signed) Jules Massé,
General President.

Such an answer from the province of Quebec ought to satisfy those who, in this house or elsewhere, try to represent the Prime Minister as an enemy of the French language.

Does not that prove that the Prime Minister's compatriots are aware that he has at heart the safeguarding of their rights and that he will not fail to uphold them should they ever be seriously threatened?

(Text):

As to possible threats to rights given to them by article 133 of the British North America Act, from which party would they come in this house and in parliaments to come? It surely could not be from the Liberal party, which has been for more than sixty years their haven of refuge when they were attacked and ignored elsewhere. It surely could not be from the Liberal party, which has twice in its history since confederation entrusted its leadership to men of their race who have shown, and again show, an extraordinary sense of national spirit and understanding and a broad outlook on national and external affairs. The first of these has by his strong personality and his foresighted vision led Canada from the status of a colony to that of a dominion; the second has gained, since his entry into politics, the respect and admiration of his fellow citizens from the Atlantic to the Pacific, having promptly demonstrated since his accession to the premiership that he has all the qualities of a truly great national leader. It surely could not be from the Liberal party, whose aim has always been never to discriminate against any element of the population and to give all a fair representation in the councils of state. Canadians of French origin know that they have nothing to fear from the Liberal party in the matter of rights given to them under article 133. I do not think they need to fear, either, any encroachments on their rights by the C.C.F. party. Although this party has no representatives of French origin in this parliament, it has followers among French-speaking Canadians; and they have shown a broad enough outlook on national questions not to have their sincerity and good faith on such matters questioned. Neither do I think they need to fear the Social Credit party, be it only because of the fact that a certain sect of the same political creed is making a bid for support in many parts of Quebec.

Could it be that my hon. friends feel remorse for the past of their own party, and think that Canadians of French descent might come to share the uncomfortable feelings of the Conservative Quebeckers as expressed in this house by the former member for Gaspe, whose pronouncement on the matter was quoted in this house lately by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle)? Could it be that they believe their fellow Canadians of French origin will long hesitate before trusting the new deal offered by their new leader to Quebec in an attempt to gain their support?

If one looks back to the attitudes of so many Tories in past parliaments, it would be enough, of course, to make French-speaking Canadians ill at ease as to the fate of their language. The remarkable thing is the manner in which history tends to repeat itself at times. The leader of the opposition and his advisers are evidently working on this assumption. Fortunately, however, the patterns of historical events may vary in their shape. It is with the object of preventing a repetition of past mistakes that we on this side of the house must now fight to open the eyes of our own fellow citizens so that they may not remain blind to the artifices of the Tory party. It is evident from their behaviour since their last convention that the Tory party had set its hope on having at this time a repetition of 1911. From one end of the country to the other a publicity campaign tries to sell the new leader to the people, and the air waves are resounding with grandiloquent phrases of the man and his gift for solving all our problems; but nowhere more than in Quebec has this outburst taken the shape of a concerted effort to show the man as the hero of minority rights.

Mr. Brooks: How about Nicolet-Yamaska?

Mr. Picard: My hon. friends will get the answer of Nicolet-Yamaska when the general election comes along.

Mr. Brooks: We have already had it.

Mr. Picard: You will then not have a man who says: I will not show my leader. You will have a man who will be obliged to show his leader. When he shows him, he will have the whole of the people of Quebec answering him in a proper way, and you will see the result.

It is evident from the behaviour of the members of the party opposite that since their convention they think they have obtained a new strength and think they may make the people of Canada believe they are new people. But neither the people of Quebec nor the people of Canada will be caught off guard.

On the other hand, a powerful attempt is being made to try to discredit the Prime Minister in the eyes of the inhabitants of his own province, as was shown in Nicolet-Yamaska, to which my hon. friend referred, when the Conservative candidate was surrounded by isolationists like Sauriol. These people who claim to be Tories and Conservatives ought to be ashamed to mention the name of Nicolet-Yamaska when the campaign in Nicolet-Yamaska was not fought on Conservative grounds but on isolationist and nationalist grounds, with the help of the isolationists in Quebec and with the help of Sauriol, who at one time might have been in jail instead of being free.

Mr. Brooks: That is something hon. members opposite have been doing for years.

Mr. Picard: The strongest alliances and the strangest alliances have been made in Quebec. In Quebec you see Mr. Chaloult, whose extremist views are known to everyone in this house, saying from his seat in the legislature that, although Mr. Drew was an "imperialist", he was confident that the fate of French Canada was safer in his hands than in those of the Prime Minister whom he called a "colonialist". It is the same line of attack as was hurled at Laurier in his own province in 1911. But let not my hon. friends be deluded. The people of Quebec have so greatly regretted the ingratitude they showed Laurier at that time that they will not be duped today. They have now learned their lesson, and they know that the men who are leading the two major parties now can be known to the country just by the way they have behaved in this house since we opened our deliberations. They can distinguish very well between the Prime Minister, who has shown himself to be a statesman of the first ability and of the first magnitude, and the leader of the opposition, who has tried at all times to raise prejudices and to bring about in Quebec a sentiment that would make him appear—after what he had said in the past—what he would very much like to be, the saviour of Quebec. It is a shame and a farce, and my hon. friends know it.

The method of amending the British North America Act, which has been criticized in this house during the recent debate, and which during the past two years has been made a political issue by the Conservative opposition, has been covered authoritatively by so many on this side of the house that I do not need to repeat their arguments. But, when they want to pose as saviours of minority rights and of provincial rights, it is interesting to note that of the ten amendments that have been made to the British North America Act, strange as it may seem, five have been brought in under a Conservative administration and five under a Liberal administration.

Of the five amendments under a Conservative administration, in no single case was the consent of the provinces obtained; yet today my hon. friends are trying to invoke the pretext that we should ask the provinces to approve of everything that is done in the house in the way of amendments to the constitution. In 1871 the question of establishing the western provinces arose, but nobody on the Conservative side in the house asked that the question be referred to the provinces. Halton and Mackenzie, both Liberals, asked as a first safeguard that the house should pronounce its views before any representations were sent to London. David Mills, another Liberal, representing the constituency of Bothwell at the time, asked that the provinces be consulted, but they were not, and that was under a Conservative regime. In 1886 the question of representation of the territories came up and the Conservatives did not consult the provinces. Another important question came up in 1915. Hon. members will say that I previously referred to matters dealt with long ago, but 1915 was not so long ago, and my hon. friends were in power. An amendment to the British North America Act was asked for to increase the number of senators and to provide for Newfoundland senators. That was a question exactly similar to the question of 1946, the redistribution of seats in this house, and yet no consultation was held, and none of the provinces were asked to consent. The same thing happened in 1916 when the question of lengthening the term of parliament was under discussion. There was no question then of having the consent of the provinces. My hon. friends will say that that was during the war and that we had to do it by act of parliament. But we, the Liberal party, went twice to the people during the war and twice we were returned to power by the people of Canada.

It is also to be remembered that when my hon. friends opposite discovered there was a question of provincial rights it was in 1946 when the question of allowing more equitable representation to Quebec came up. Those who claim to be the friends of Quebec today will say, of course, that it is just a coincidence. It is evidently just a coincidence that they suddenly took such care for the welfare of the provinces when the government had decided to establish representation in the house according to population. It is to be noted that this bill corrected a grave injustice as far as Quebec is concerned and gave that province eight more seats. Could it be that the concern of the hon. gentlemen opposite for the rights of the provinces sprang from a desire to have this bill submitted for the approval of all provincial legislatures and thus prevent its coming into force? Is it not within the scope of normal deduction to believe that the then premier of Ontario would have opposed the bill giving eight seats to a province upon which he had been showering aspersions barely two years before?

I am willing to let impartial students of history decide whether this great concern for provincial rights did not come exactly from the opposite intention, that of preventing Quebec from getting its due proportional representation.

At this point I think it is opportune that I make my stand clear as to the advisability of Canada having a constitution more in keeping with its dignity as a sovereign state, member of the council of nations. I have already expressed my views in this house. I did so in July, 1946, and I refer hon. members to pages 2482 and 2483 of Hansard of that year, where I said:

A constitution is the basic and most important feature of legislation that any country may enact.

A constitution is the foundation-stone of a state; it is the compound of general principles that govern the political life of a country.

"The constitution of each state is always the result of a compromise between existing political traditions and the general principles of constitutional law, and its elaboration and drafting are of the competence of juridical science. Constitutional law is not something immovable; it is modified by the march of ideas and of political events."

It is evident that as long as Canada does not have a constitution enacted in Canada by Canadians there will be international jurists to argue that we lack one of the elements of sovereignty. It is also true that until in that new constitution provisions are made for amending it, situations such as the one which existed in 1946 and today will surge in this house and in the provincial legislatures. It is also evident that, unless this problem is tackled seriously in the near future, the question of provincial prerogatives will be made a political football by parties who can find no better issue to court the favour of the public.

The constitution, needless to say, should not be the work of this parliament alone, and I do not think either that we should proceed by adopting a draft constitution and then refer it to the provinces. The drafting of the constitution should be entrusted to a special constituent assembly formed for that purpose. An opinion on the matter which I quoted in 1946 is that of Dr. Beauchesne, who said in 1935 before a committee of this house:

I submit that a constituent assembly, chosen by the provincial legislatures and by the House of Commons, representing the main political parties and groups in proportion to the votes given at the last general elections, should meet in session and discuss the constitution from all its angles.

It appears to be a wish generally expressed that the British North America Act serve as a basis for this new constitution. One of the important decisions then to be given will concern the method of amending such a constitution.

Numerous constitutional authorities have dealt with this question. I commend particularly the splendid book of Dr. Maurice Ollivier, "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty". Whichever way the problem is approached, whatever may be the concrete proposals for the enactment of a constitution, whatever the method provided to amend it in later years, the most important consideration will have to be given to the forging of a charter that, while respecting the principles of the act of 1867, while upholding the guarantee given to minorities, shall permit the development of a strong and united Canada, free of the grounds for petty argument such as we have had so often and which we have witnessed in the present session in the ranks of the Conservative party.

May I conclude this part of my remarks with the words I used in 1946:

In conclusion, may I say that Canada has reached the adult stage. She has emerged from the war as one of the very few creditor nations. She is now the third largest trader in the world. She has a role to play in the after-war commensurate with her new stature. She has outgrown her outmoded, colonial style constitution, and it is time for her to assert her national will and to take her place among those nations of the world which have elaborated constitutional monuments as their basic law. Canada owes it to herself to nominate a constituent assembly and to draft a new constitution. How fitting it would be if the party which has always been to the forefront in the enactment of forward and emancipated measures and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who has attached his name to so many progressive moves and who has for longer than anyone led our country through war and peace with such ability, should initiate the necessary steps to give the people of Canada a long-awaited Canadian constitution.

Time, and the pressing urgency of the war and of other matters, have not permitted the former Prime Minister to realize this project. It is my hope today that the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will attach his name to that great work, namely, the negotiation and enactment of a truly Canadian constitution.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. Picard: With all due respect, I have a few more minutes coming to me.

Some hon. Members: Time. Unanimous consent is not given.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but unless the hon. member has unanimous consent he cannot continue.

Mr. Picard: A move of the leader of the opposition came to light last week, and it is quite in line—

Mr. Lennard: Time.

Mr. Picard: Thanks ever so much for the broadmindedness.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in the past year many important events have taken place. One of those here at home which most impressed itself upon the people of British Columbia, and possibly the people of Canada, was the flooding and devastation caused by the great rivers of British Columbia overflowing their banks last May and June.

I have mentioned this at the outset for two reasons; first, because later in my remarks I want to draw attention to the matter of floods and the necessity for flood control; and also because the fact that these floods occurred at all last year, and are apt to occur again this year, is the result of one more failure of this government to deal positively with the issues confronting it. I say that advisedly; because if the record is consulted it will be found that for two years prior to last spring I had spoken on the necessity of having a survey made of the Fraser river system through the joint operation of dominion and provincial authorities, with a view to developing a project or projects to provide under one scheme for power, irrigation and flood control.

I have urged for several years that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be extended in a large way to our province, and that the engineers under that act, in conjunction with engineers of the federal Department of Public Works and provincial engineers, should undertake a full-scale survey, and the construction of projects which would serve the three purposes I have mentioned. Had we done that we would have provided at one and the same time for national development and national safety. But until this last fall, when we had a national disaster, nothing was done.

Even today, what is being done is likely to be another example of "too little and too late". I shall return later on in my remarks to deal in detail with the requirements in connection with power and flood control projects. At this moment I mention the government's failure in the matter as one of the most glaring examples of that lack of action and lack of leadership which so clearly afflicts them, and which so strongly supports the amendment we are discussing tonight, one of want of confidence in the government.

Other failures of the government could be mentioned, after a reading of the speech from the throne. For instance, there is the failure to indicate any intention to set up a standing committee on veterans affairs. There is the fact that again for another year there is to be no provision for a standing committee on national defence. It has been urged by hon. members of this party that both these branches of public activity should be the subject matter of the deliberations of standing committees of the house, so that these continuing national problems would not be left to be dealt with in a haphazard manner by way of emergency developments, but on the contrary would be the subject of continuing scrutiny, development and attention in accordance with their needs.

Then, the speech from the throne makes no reference to any program for the development of resources. I have referred to the power, flood control and irrigation requirements of our own province. The speech makes no mention of a national marketing act. True, we have before the house at the present time a scheme to extend the arbitrary powers of the Minister of Agriculture in respect of certain commodities; but we have no indication with respect to the Natural Products Marketing Act which is so widely demanded and needed by the agricultural producers in every field of agriculture in Canada.

There is no mention of necessary tax reform; no mention of reform in the method of collection of taxes, or in the method of assessment—and particularly with respect to agriculture. There has been no amendment, so necessary and so just, in the manner of assessing and collecting penalties—assessing the interest on arrears when the only fault has been that the department had been late in making its assessment. Finally, there has been no mention of a provision to implement what we have been awaiting for three years, namely the principle of the basic herd. It is true that, as a result of conferences which have just been taking place, this matter may have finally been ironed out. But we must remember that the matter has been under consideration for at least five years, and has been under active debate in the house for three years. Yet the principle has not yet been applied; with the result that many farmers, elderly men, who have contributed so much to the development of this country, have been unable to sell out and unable to retire; or, if they have taken that step, and have retired, they have had to hand over by way of income tax anything up to 50 per cent of the proceeds. It is gratifying to hope that the basic herd principle has been finally worked out; I should hope we would hear a statement clarifying the situation in the course of the next week—and not later than that—from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann).

Then, again, there is nothing definite in the speech from the throne about the trans-Canada highway. It is true that we have announcements from time to time, pried as it were out of the minister by a shoehorn process. These are announcements with respect to meagre developments in the construction of a trans-Canada highway. But there is no indication that the government has a trans-Canada highway policy.

I should like to refer to that matter in some detail. For three years there has been standing in my name on the order paper a resolution advocating the development by the federal government of a highway policy, the appointment of a highways commission, and the commencement of immediate negotiations with the provinces leading to dominion-provincial co-operation on the construction and maintenance of trans-Canada roads. Then, there has been another resolution, in the name of the hon. member for Cochrane

(Mr. Bradette), which has stood on the order paper for three years with respect to a particular road.

I first tried to discuss the matter three years ago when the estimates of the Department of Transport were under consideration. I mention this only to show what a reversal there has been in government policy on this point. When I sought to bring it up in the discussion of those estimates the suggestion was made by the minister that such discussion was entirely out of order. He said there was nothing in his department which provided for trans-Canada roads, and that therefore nothing could be discussed. I pointed out that what I wanted to discuss was not what might or might not be in the estimates, but the fact that there should be a provision for the construction of a trans-Canada road. However, as suggested by the minister at that time, the discussion was ruled out of order.

So, for the next two years, I placed the subject matter before the house by way of a substantive resolution on the order paper. It will be recalled, however, that for the last three years the government has felt that it has been so much better qualified than the people themselves, not only to spend the people's money, but to direct every phase of the national life, that no time has been provided for the discussion of private members' resolutions. For the last two years debates on private members' resolutions have not been allowed in the house. For that reason it has not been possible to discuss this matter as a separate problem.

Last year, however, another attempt was made to discuss it when the estimates of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply were before the committee. That discussion was reported at page 5497 of Hansard for June 19, 1948. The minister, who is now the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), was questioned by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller), the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), and other hon. members on this side of the house, including myself. In answer to our questions, he took this position:

> There is no policy which provides for contributions from the federal government toward the building of any highway at the present time—except by special arrangement; and that is usually confined to the opening up of new areas.

That was the position he took then. In reply to a further question he said:

> If we see any sign of widespread unemployment we will proceed to make a blueprint. But at the present time we have not a blueprint and we do not think one is necessary.

If those words are taken at their face value it must be assumed that last June the federal government had no plan for a trans-Canada highway or indeed any sort of federal road system. Then, as a result of further questioning, the minister became somewhat more definite in his replies and somewhat more disinclined to give any countenance to the discussion, and he ended by saying:

> I can give no commitment about any highway, and I do not intend to answer any questions.

From that time onward he remained silent until the matter of the trans-Canada highway was no longer under discussion, at which time he became alive again and answered questions dealing with other matters. That was the government policy up to June, 1948. Bear in mind that hon. members on this side, and the public generally across Canada, were expressing an increasing demand for the construction of a trans-Canada road and the development of a system of federal aid for highways.

The suggestions which we made, which I believe were sound then and are still sound, were in effect that there should be established a system of federal aid along the line of that prevailing in the United States of America. Under that system the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces, would work out a system of roads to be constructed and maintained by the provinces, with the dominion bearing part of the cost.

Then we find that in December the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. MacKinnon) called a conference of public works officials from the provinces to discuss a trans-Canada road. One might ask the reason for this change in policy. Are they opening up new areas? There is no sign that this is what they have in contemplation. Is it because they see signs of widespread unemployment? Those were the criteria laid down last year by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is it merely to serve these two purposes that they have now decided to build a trans-Canada road? I doubt if any minister who is present or who heard that statement last year would make that answer at the present time.

I suggest that the change in policy has come about as a result of the pressure which has developed owing to the lack of action on the part of the government. It has come about as a result of a widespread demand which even they can no longer ignore. The government has finally realized that it is time to proceed with this program. This is just another example of the time lag which occurs when the government is dealing with national need and the demands of the people.

Even here we find that they are only going about it in a half-hearted manner. What did they do? They called the provincial authorities here last winter, and as far as we can make out, from the limited information we have been able to pry out of the government, they said, "We will make a certain contribution toward the construction of a trans-Canada road; you go home and make your subsequent proposals."

As far as one can make out, there has been no lead by the dominion government. There has been only the barest degree of co-operation toward meeting what is a widespread demand and a real necessity. They have not developed a trans-Canada highway policy. There is no suggestion of a continuing commission. There is no suggestion of the working out of an integrated system of federal-aid highways. There has been nothing but the minimum of concessions in connection with this important matter, which would mean so much to the development of this country.

The very fact that trans-Canada roads are ignored in the speech from the throne, the fact that on this question the government still is not aware of the needs of this country with respect to the development of our resources, with respect to national defence, with respect to the tourist trade, with respect to co-operation with the provinces, supports fully the motion of lack of confidence which is before us.

Another important omission in the speech from the throne is the complete failure to mention dominion-provincial relations. I mention this not for the purpose of going into the details of the controversy as to who was responsible for the breakdown of the conference in 1946; I do it because there is a genuine need for a further dominion-provincial conference to consider and settle matters left outstanding at the last conference.

Matters have become confused and an increasingly unbearable burden has been imposed upon the financial resources of the provinces because all the major tax resources have been gathered exclusively into the hands of the federal government and the provinces are finding themselves more and more unable to meet their authorized requirements without recourse to unnatural and unpopular modes of taxation.

One might just mention in passing that there is a good deal to be said as to the responsibility for the unsuccessful ending of the conference in 1946. As I said, I am not going into details, because they have been discussed fully already; but there are quotations from two authorities I should like to lay before the house for its consideration in assessing the responsibility. I do so because we find that virtually every province is requesting the resumption of dominion-provincial relations. If they had been responsible for ending that conference there might be some slight shade of justification for the dominion saying, "Until you change your attitude we will not reconvene the conference." But that is not the fact. The dominion ended the conference and they must bear the entire responsibility. The necessity for a change in attitude rests with the dominion, and theirs is the responsibility of calling a fresh conference.

One of the two quotations I wish to refer to is that of Premier Manning of Alberta, to be found at page 536 of the report of the dominion-provincial conference. Speaking on May 1, when the conference was discussing the last and final proposals of the dominion government as submitted by the Minister of Finance, and the speech made by the minister in dealing with the provincial proposals, Mr. Manning said:

> May I say that Mr. Ilsley's emphatic and completely negative reply this morning was a surprising and a bitter disappointment.

It might be suggested by some that Mr. Manning was a partial observer, so I will turn to one who—as between the provincial governments, which were Conservative in character and the provincial governments which were Liberal in character, and the federal government, which was Liberal—would be recognized as an impartial observer. I refer to the C.C.F. premier of Saskatchewan, who holds no brief for either side. Mr. Douglas, referring to the same statement by the Minister of Finance, which finally led to the impasse and the breaking up of the conference, said this:

> The Minister of Finance—

That was Mr. Ilsley.

> —cannot say yes, and his answer to every proposal that was placed before him for consideration was a most emphatic no.

Later, on May 2, after the then premier of Ontario had made further proposals, Premier Douglas made a statement which is very revealing in enabling us to decide who it was who was intransigent, and who it was who showed willingness to negotiate. His statement is to be found at page 577 of the conference proceedings, and is as follows:

> And I want to say just in passing, that those who are gloomy about this conference should remember that Ontario has come a very long way from last January.

I give these quotations in passing, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of enabling us to assess whether or not the provinces, and in particular one or two of the provinces, were responsible for the breakdown of the conference, as has been suggested. I do it because I think it shows clearly that the responsibility for the breakdown of the conference rests squarely on the dominion government.

That being the case, there can be no excuse for the failure of the dominion government to reconvene the conference, particularly in the light of the fact that virtually every province has requested in writing a resumption of the conference to adjust important and pressing matters which have been long outstanding. No province more urgently requires a resumption of discussion and adjustment of detail than the province of British Columbia, the province from which I come. I said that every province desires a resumption of the conference. One has only to refer to the white paper, "Correspondence since the budget of 1946 on matters of substance regarding tax agreements with the provinces", to see that this is true. I should like to refer again to the remarks of the premier of Saskatchewan as recorded at page 53 of that document. The premier wired the Prime Minister of Canada on July 12, 1946, and in his wire there is this passage:

> Therefore urge reconvening of dominion-provincial conference in order to work out social security plans on national basis.

The premier of Nova Scotia has urged on many occasions the reconvening of the conference. The premier of Prince Edward Island has urged the reconvening of the conference. I think that the wire from Premier Jones, and the reply of the then Prime Minister of Canada, are particularly interesting as illustrations of the manner in which this matter is being dealt with by the federal government. On January 7, 1947, Premier Jones of Prince Edward Island wired to the Prime Minister of Canada as follows:

> I suggest that five provinces which have made agreements should get together at once and review the agreements made and adjust them to their mutual satisfaction with the concurrence of your government.

The following reply was sent:

> My dear Premier:
>
> I duly received your telegram suggesting that the five provinces which have made agreements should get together at once and review the agreements made, and adjust them to their mutual satisfaction with the concurrence of the dominion government.
> I shall be pleased to see that careful consideration is given to this suggestion.
>
> Yours sincerely,
> W. L. Mackenzie King.

That was two years ago! The premier of Alberta has asked for the reconvening of the conference; the premier of Ontario has asked for the reconvening of the conference; and no one has suggested more urgent reasons for the reconvening of the conference than the premier of British Columbia. The situation in which provincial governments, and particularly the government of my province, find themselves today, is that there is an ever-increasing pressure on provincial expenditures on those matters which are properly within the sphere of provincial authority, and expenditures which should properly be made by the provinces in fields of social security, development of resources, and so on, within the province. But as a result of the tax concessions made in the individual agreements reached, the province of British Columbia, along with others, finds itself increasingly unable to carry out its responsibilities without resorting to tax measures unpopular, uneconomic, unscientific, and undesirable. The premiers themselves agreed that these taxes would not have been imposed had they not been driven to that necessity by the assumption by the federal government of exclusive taxing powers in the major fields, while at the same time the federal government refuses to implement the financial undertakings it gave when the conference was first called, and on which the tax agreements themselves are based.

We see here a deliberate attempt to starve the provinces into submission so that no province will be able to carry out its own responsibilities without coming to the federal government for handouts, without making further agreements with the federal government, at the dictation of the federal government with respect to their taxing powers. I make that statement quite deliberately because it is fully supported by the words of the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). Speaking in this house, in the course of this debate on February 2, he spoke with favour of the theory of the financial starvation of the provincial governments. Discussing what he regarded as the financial scheme at the time of confederation, he said, as reported at page 165 of Hansard:

> The provinces were deliberately left with small revenues, which in some provinces were inadequate from the start, in order that the legal powers which they received under the constitution would be supported as little as possible by revenues wherewith to pay for exercising them.

That is a very clear statement of the policy being deliberately pursued by the present government in its attitude to the provinces. We might be inclined to say that it is a matter of little consequence, but let us consider the practical application of what the dominion government is doing. I am referring to matters of interest to every one of us here as citizens of Canada, and as citizens of the areas in Canada from which we come, because our areas, the lives we live, the prosperity and welfare of every one of our fellow citizens, depends upon our local government, our provincial governments, being able to give to our provinces the services which they require.

Here is what is happening in British Columbia. I wish to quote from the speech of the premier of British Columbia at the opening of the legislature of that province in March of 1948. The Kamloops Sentinel of March 10 of that year summarizes Premier Johnson's speech in part as follows:

> Existing tax agreements between dominion and province cannot be considered fair unless social security proposals outlined in green book are put into effect.

He instances some of the burdens thrown on the province of British Columbia by failure of the dominion government to implement its proposals.

In this same article he is reported as having said:

> Of 2079 old age pension cases assumed in the past five months, 423 or 20 per cent are from other provinces and not really British Columbia cases in the true sense.

At another point Premier Johnson said:

> The dominion government has yet to assume full responsibility for unemployment.

Then he pointed out that, while the dominion was collecting enormous revenues within the province and was repaying only a very small proportion of what it collected, his government had urged that the dominion bear a larger share of old age pensions, institute compulsory contributory superannuation, give financial assistance in the cost of hospitals and implement a system of health insurance.

That matter was followed up, Mr. Speaker, by the budget speech delivered in the British Columbia legislature this year by the Minister of Finance. He pointed out that, as a result of the failure of the federal government to implement its undertaking at the time the tax agreements were first negotiated, the province had to impose a sales tax of 3 per cent on retail sales. This interesting fact was also pointed out by Mr. Anscomb, according to the Vancouver Sun of February 26:

> British Columbia will receive from Ottawa 24·2 million dollars in the fiscal year 1949-50 as rent for its personal income, corporation and succession duties. British Columbia will give its own municipalities 21·9 million dollars in the same year. The difference available for provincial services is only 2·3 million dollars.

By the time the province has enabled the municipalities to carry out their responsibilities for social services, only $2·3 million remains out of the grant received from the dominion government, and the dominion government has not assumed the share of social security costs which it undertook to assume when the agreement was made.

The editorial continues:

> Mr. Anscomb referred to the fact that the province either had to impose the sales tax or give up its social security program. To avoid giving up this social security program, British Columbia is raising $18 million annually by levying a tax on retail purchases. Mr. Anscomb also observed that the time is long past due for the implementation of the implied federal responsibilities upon which the tax agreement was predicated. The delay would be understandable if the federal government were financially embarrassed, but the postponement of action with the enormous revenue surplus materializing is beyond understanding.

We have only to remember that this year the federal government has a surplus of over $600 million for the first nine months, and then to realize that the provinces, like British Columbia, with increasing costs for social security, are driven to impose sales taxes to meet their obligations, to see the results of this deliberate program by the dominion government of centralizing financial power.

One sometimes hears it said even in my province, Mr. Speaker, when we criticize the federal government for failure to implement the social security program, that it is due to the fact that Ontario and Quebec have not signed tax agreements. This is the excuse offered by the Liberals. Let us examine that argument for a moment. Dominion-provincial financial relations at present are as follows: As a result of the agreement made with British Columbia, Ottawa collects from the taxpayers in that province approximately $144 million in the form of personal and corporation income taxes and succession duties. Under the agreement the dominion government pays British Columbia approximately $20 million, or one for seven to what they collect. At the moment the dominion government collects, from the same fields of personal income and corporation taxes in Ontario and Quebec, $674 million. This is based on a return to a question I asked last year. The dominion government does not pay Ontario or Quebec any subsidy, as would have been the case if those provinces had signed the agreement. On the basis of that return, if those two provinces had signed the agreement, they would be entitled to a subsidy of $143 million per year between them. The dominion government collects $674 million within those provinces, and it is $143 million per year better off because those provinces have not signed the agreement. To use the fact that Ontario and Quebec have not signed as an argument for not implementing the social security promises to British Columbia is plain unadulterated nonsense and my Liberal friends here and at home know it. They know they are trying to mislead the public when they give that as an excuse for the failure to implement the promise as demanded by the government of British Columbia.

Let me give you one other result, Mr. Speaker, of this sort of method of bleeding the provinces. The taxing power is concentrated in the hands of the federal government. The federal government refuses to implement its social security promises. The province of British Columbia is driven to imposing the sales tax to carry out what it regards as a basic level of social security for the people of that province. The municipal governments are unable to finance their proper responsibilities and the provinces are unable to help them further. To give you an example, I might cite what happened in my own district this past year. Nothing is more necessary for the people of Kamloops than adequate school facilities, yet nothing is in shorter supply. Last fall a bylaw was presented which called for the expenditure of about a million and a half dollars to provide needed school accommodation for that district. Approximately half of that amount would be contributed by the provincial government. The only way in which the municipality could raise the balance was by means of a further tax on property. I did not hear a single person deny that the increased school accommodation was necessary. Both the city and the rural areas turned down the bylaw. It was turned down, Mr. Speaker, for one reason and one reason only, and that is the crushing burden of taxation already imposed by the dominion government. The people said, "We cannot stand any more taxes".

Unfortunately, the people do not often have an opportunity of voting directly against federal tax laws. Such an opportunity will be afforded them at the next election and then my friends who impose these taxes will find out how the people feel about them. The people do have the opportunity of voting against municipal tax laws. It is the only chance they have of showing they cannot stand any more taxes even though it be for urgently needed school accommodation.

I suggest that this question of dominion-provincial relations is not of merely academic or political interest. It is of vital, everyday interest to the people in the various parts of the country from which we come. This gathering into federal government hands of all taxing powers for some theory of budgeting which has been referred to—and correctly—as more like a political theory of budgeting than a cyclical theory, and the imposition of heavy taxes to be used for a variety of non-essential purposes, some of them constitutional and some unconstitutional, yet refusing to fulfil the undertakings given to the provinces or to call a conference to sort out these matters, is resulting in our provincial governments and our municipalities being unable to provide the services which should be provided for their people.

I had intended, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the somewhat related subject of the development of our natural resources, but I see that I am within a minute or two of the expiry of my time and therefore I will not go into detail on that subject. As I indicated earlier, I had intended to refer to the necessity of a flood control, power and irrigation project in British Columbia, especially with reference to the Fraser river system. Here is another sphere where the expenditure of provincial funds is called for. A large expenditure is called for, and the province will be hamstrung and handicapped because it has not the tax resources with which to carry out the project. I hope however that another opportunity will be afforded to deal with that matter more completely, so I will only say this in conclusion: I urge on the federal government and on the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier)—who incidentally has not yet tabled the copy of the report of the Fraser river board, for which I asked—to get his engineers busy and to get construction started now. All our lakes and rivers were full last fall. We had a wet fall. We have had a heavy snowfall this winter. If we should have a hot or a sudden spring, we shall have floods out there worse than those we had last year. I urge that the government proceed immediately with the construction of this project under the three heads of flood control, power for irrigation, and power for developing the resources of the province.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I trust that you will pardon me, Mr. Speaker, if I talk this evening about the next generation rather than the next general election. It may be somewhat of a change for a house which is probably in its last session.

Today Canada is faced with many problems, and I shall deal first with what in our opinion is the most important one facing the government and the people today. I refer to the problem of how to prevent a depression which is already looming up on the horizon as an imminent possibility immediately in the path of the Canadian people, if not in the path of people in other parts of the world as well.

The growing list of unemployed within our own country, the piling up already of a surplus of agricultural and other products within Canada, and the reports of the failure of the ministers of the government to make certain trade agreements for the disposal of our surpluses, are unmistakable signs that all is not well with Canada for the next few years. If that depression is to be prevented—and I think the matter is worthy of the consideration of this house—it will be agreed by all hon. members that it will be necessary for us to take action now.

I know there are some who will maintain that our trade situation was never better, and that the situation gives no cause for alarm. But it is the belief of the members of this party, at least, that the last depression through which we went was largely due to the failure in international trade throughout the world.

Our system of private enterprise—which is rapidly becoming a system of monopoly enterprise—was given a free hand in the 1920's and up to and during the 1930's. It led us directly into the demoralizing depression which most of the people of Canada have not forgotten. It is a matter of record that the only solution of which we have ever had experience for a depression of that kind has been the preparation for war, or the declaration of war. I can remember—and this fact can be verified from the records—when the leader of this group in 1936 asked the government of this country to start a program which would cost about $5 million. That request was for a work and wages program, to provide work for the millions of people in Canada who were unemployed, and to provide an opportunity for the young men who could not make homes for themselves. He was told that it could not be done, that the money did not grow on gooseberry bushes. Yet all he asked for was a $5 million program. As I said before, we have today a piling up of surplus products within Canada. The fact that the apple growers of Nova Scotia can no longer sell their apples in the markets of Great Britain and the fact that the Okanagan fruit growers, as we were told the other night, are not able to sell their surplus apple products, are among the signs that point to a depression.

There is one basic contradiction in our economic system which the people of Canada, and the other people of the world too, who live under this system, will have to face. It is this. Although there is a need for food throughout the world, the more food that is produced by those engaged in its production, the lower becomes their price, the less becomes the reward for their production. In a short time they face the situation of not being able to get even the cost of production. Why? Because there is no exchange for their products; there is no market abroad for them. It is about the problem of providing that market that I wish to speak tonight, because the Canadians of tomorrow will have to face it, and face it in an extremely real way, unless something is done about it, and done soon.

Surely there is something wrong when a system, which can produce as much as ours can, cannot distribute its production. Surely there is something wrong when the only solution that we have for our overproduction, in a world that needs production and needs food, is that of paying farmers to root up trees, of taking surpluses and destroying them, of throwing bananas and oranges into the sea, and of burning coffee. Why? Because countries will not exchange these products.

These lost markets are causing apprehension across Canada. The western grain growers, who have been fortunate enough to have had crops in the last four or five years, have had some prosperity and a measure of security which they never experienced before. This was largely the result of (1) a world shortage of wheat and agricultural products; (2) a five-year agreement with Great Britain, which made minimum prices possible; and (3) a wheat board organization which returned to the farmer the net selling price of his grain. That is something he did not have before.

An hon. Member: A Liberal government.

Mr. Castleden: There are abroad in the west certain forces who would like that agreement type of thing to be done away with and who would like to return to the speculative market system of handling grain so that they would get the net return on the farmer's grain and he would not. These farmers have been able to pay off their debts. The number of mortgages is small. The farmers have been able to expand their farms and to provide themselves with some measure of modern machinery with which to produce. I want to say that they appreciate the fact that in the year 1949, when other agriculturalists across Canada find it difficult to sell their products, they have a market for their 1949 crop.

An hon. Member: What about 1950?

Mr. Castleden: It is about the 1950 crop that they are wondering. They have seen prices collapse before. This is what happens. In spite of the fact that the price of the commodity which they produce goes down, the cost of production continues to rise. Farm implements do not drop in price overnight. They will continue to rise in costs. The farmer is caught in between that price squeeze and is prevented from getting back his cost of production.

How was this five-year agreement with Great Britain made possible? It was made possible because ERP funds were available and provided United States dollars to Britain for the purchase of Canadian goods. Europe is beginning to come out of its emergency condition. According to reports, France is going to become a wheat exporting nation this year. In some quarters wheat is already becoming recognized as a burdensome surplus.

It is being so called by some people who support our system. Imagine such a thing in a world hungry for food. But it does mean, as far as ERP or ECA is concerned, that no more American dollars will be available to Great Britain to purchase Canadian grain. That is the reason why the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was unable to make any agreement with the British government for the 1950 crop. Great Britain cannot purchase our surplus commodities, such as wheat, without ERP dollars or Canadian dollars. If they do not come from ERP or ECA, then there is only one way she can get them, and that is by selling goods in Canada.

The hope for a long-term agreement today rests with the committee which I believe is sitting at this hour in Washington trying to arrange some international basis for the exchange of the world's wheat, on an international level, to share on a quota basis those markets of the world which will be available and which we believe will require these foods. If that conference fails, then the future is indeed dark for us.

The other day it was discouraging to read that the Argentine, which is one of the great wheat exporting nations, had withdrawn from that conference. That will mean that the Argentine, producing soft wheat, which is used to a larger extent in milling in the British markets and in Europe, will be forming a competitive factor against the world's exchange of goods on a barter basis. Our hope for fighting off a depression rests entirely on the ability of the governments of the world today to agree on an international basis to exchange their goods at whatever costs—to exchange their goods and overcome the things which are preventing an exchange of goods.

In the past we were told that we could not sell our agriculture surplus because of the value of Canadian exchange as compared with the British pound in the sterling bloc, the soft currency bloc, and the American hard-dollar bloc. The flow of goods must not be stopped this time by exchange values. If the exchange situation is going to be allowed to stop the flow of goods, then I think we will face, in the near future, the suicidal action of governments, who wish to continue governing their countries, following down the trail which leads to the inevitable position where they will not be able to get rid of their surplus goods. Then they must of necessity face a depression and bring others down along with them.

Although our government has expressed no opinion on the matter, and has expressed no policy, I hope that it is willing to exchange goods on a barter basis with a country which will take our products. I do not know whether this government is willing to break with the great nation to the south of us. As we watch the trend recently, it appears that this government is making of Canada more and more a sort of dependent appendage of the United States, tying us up with the American dollar, tying us up in so many fields that we are now almost a minor state of that union. Are we to be free to make a break so far as the American dollar and the Canadian dollar are concerned? Individual farmers and farm organizations have cause for serious thinking on this matter. It has become the greatest single peacetime problem which faces Canada. Probably for that reason it has been the subject of more than one speech in this debate.

The farmer knows that the value of his products can fall overnight, but the cost of the things which he must buy does not. He is put in a position where he must buy them. He is always in the position where those who are selling these products to him tell him the price that he must pay for them; but he is not in a position to tell them the price at which they must buy his commodities. He makes his living out of that production. He cannot change it. He may be forced to continue to produce away below the cost of production, as he did in the thirties. He will then be forced to load himself down with a debt burden himself, and his family after him. It happened to hundreds and hundreds in the western provinces in the thirties. The farmer lost his farm to the mortgage company, his home and his life savings.

There is one feature of the present system of handling grain and agricultural commodities throughout Canada which, with the seriousness of the situation which faces us, is of the utmost importance. It is quite clear that the farmers themselves have made up their minds that it will go. I refer to the speculative system of marketing. Those who control our commodities plan daily what price they will pay for them. It is going to be necessary for us to negotiate and to plan our markets for the future. Our distribution must be organized democratically. I do not think the contention that you cannot have orderly marketing without regimentation and the loss of freedom, will stand examination; because logically, and already practically, farmers or organizations have shown that through democratic organization they can represent the will and the wishes of the people, and through farm organizations they can get together, plan their production, and plan their exchange of goods. The farmers pool organizations in the west, the united farmers, the great co-operatives, the provincial federations of agriculture, the Canadian federation of agriculture and the Co-operative Union of Canada show that the farmers of Canada have the capacity to organize and to work together. They can work together with similar democratic groups, with people chosen in their own field, to sit down and discuss the problems which face them and to find a solution satisfactory to those people whom they democratically represent.

It is not necessary to have regimentation. It is not necessary to have bureaucratic government officials operate the wheat board; but it will require a government favourable to the ideas of those people who believe in some of the basic principles which they represent, to make possible through legislation the organization of our trade, our production and distribution through such boards.

In recent years the development of farm organizations has been a remarkable and a very healthy advancement in the Canadian economy. They have shown a fine capacity to organize and to work together. They have grown in recent years until now they exercise a tremendous influence in an organized way, and with a humanitarian objective, which is very important, and which commends itself to people of good will not only in this country but abroad. In my estimation, much of the hope for the world of tomorrow lies in the growth of this co-operative effort, and it must have scope in a world-wide way.

In spite of protests from our group in this house against the speculative marketing and the handling of coarse grains in 1947, this government proceeded to ignore our recommendations and our offered amendments to the wheat board act to bring coarse grains under it, and in the fall of 1947 they threw coarse grains out into the open market. Again in 1948 the government brought down an amendment to the wheat board act and passed the buck to the three provincial governments of the west. What was the result? The Liberal coalition government of Manitoba and the Social Credit government in Alberta refused to pass enabling legislation, and the result was that the grain exchange carried on the handling in 1948. But now the powers of the farm organizations are having some effect and they are beginning to win their point. From press reports already out, I believe it is evident that an amendment to the wheat board act will be brought forward in this session, which will finally bring coarse grains under the orderly marketing system of the wheat board.

With Canada's livestock and dairy industry and with our production of meat, eggs, cheese and other dairy products dependent upon the production of coarse grains within this country, Canada's policy for the production of these products is tied up completely with the production of coarse grains. A proper floor price is an essential part of any over-all agricultural program.

It may be necessary within the next few years to do what is being done in the United States at this time. They have organized, and have recognized the need of a national program for the allotment of food, to make it possible for those people in the low-income brackets—and we have many such in Canada—to purchase essential foods. I suggest a program of that kind should be under survey at the present time to take care of the situation when distribution in Canada and abroad begins to fail.

Such a program would also be necessary in the international field. The stability which would result from its establishment is essential for the prevention of another depression. It may require as much ingenuity, work and detail as was required in the preparation for war. This will be a war on poverty and on depression.

We in this Co-operative Commonwealth Federation believe that some of the basic principles in the co-operative movement will have to replace some of those principles, if they may be so described, which operate within the economic system under which we live, before a solution of this problem will be possible.

We join with the Canadian co-operative union in asking that the government remove the taxation against the three per cent of savings, which is treated by the government as a basis for taxation. We realize that sometimes the government has difficulty in recognizing what are and what are not co-operative organizations. If it would pass a federal co-operatives act, something which is needed very badly, it could define in that act what a co-operative is. It would permit the formation of co-operatives throughout the whole of Canada, permitting them to do business interprovincially rather than confining their efforts within the boundaries of a province. Such an act would make it possible for people to organize co-operative corporations so that they might operate in any province, and throughout the whole of the dominion.

Under present legislation, co-operative organizations which organize on a commercial basis or for commercial purposes are compelled to operate on a share capital basis. That method is contrary to the principles of many co-operative organizations, and is opposed by them.

I have the honour, Mr. Speaker, to represent a constituency in the eastern part of Saskatchewan second to none in Canada. The people of that constituency come from many different countries of the world. Despite that fact, we live together there as one family. We share our troubles; we share our joys; and we work in unity together. During the depression we suffered, and resolved to do something to prevent the recurrence of such conditions. When the war came many of our young men enlisted. Many never returned. Some, who did not return, had known very little in their lives, up to 1940, except poverty, relief and unemployment.

During and since the war we have had a few years of security and we have been able to expand some of our holdings. We have been blessed with fairly good crops. The people cleared off their debts, paying every cent they could. They bought farm equipment. These people have been able to live together because they have exercised the principles of tolerance; and they are Canadians first.

They appreciate the program put out by a young man who, I believe, should be honoured in this House of Commons for the work he is doing for Canadians. I refer to Mr. John Fisher, who makes his reports on the C.B.C. The work that man is doing toward promoting unity and understanding among Canadians is certainly in great contrast with some of the things we sometimes see in our political life here, those things which tend to separate Canada and prevent her becoming a great nation.

Mr. Brooks: A New Brunswicker.

Mr. Castleden: I care not from what province he comes; he is doing a great service for Canada.

In my constituency we recognize the right of the people to freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom from fear and freedom from want. They work together. We may differ in our religious and political beliefs; but we respect the rights of all people to have their beliefs. There is no padlock law; there is no racial or religious intolerance. Our religious freedom is real.

The centre of that constituency is a city of about 7,000 people. A recent survey shows that it is growing and expanding, and also shows that among the people are twenty-three different religious denominations. But they work together in freedom, without fear of persecution, and without scorn of their fellow men. The people in the town work with the people in the rural community. If trouble comes in one section, they help each other. They realize that they depend one upon the other for their existence and welfare. They know that their prosperity depends one upon the other.

Over two hundred new houses have been built lately in Yorkton, but this does not begin to meet the housing problem. I would say this about that government housing program, that while they are producing houses in Yorkton, the cost of those houses is so high that it fails to relieve the requirements of those in the lower-income brackets who need housing accommodation most. Many of the people who would like to go into those houses find that the regulations and requirements of income are so high that they cannot undertake either to rent or to purchase them.

Even less fortunate are the people in another town in my constituency, the town of Kamsack, where, on account of certain regulations under which the housing program of this government is being operated, the big business firms in Winnipeg who decide how much money will be lent for the construction of houses have determined that this town is not a good risk—or have given some other reasons. Apparently they are afraid they might not get all their money back, with the result that veterans and others living in that community are unable to have even those advantages of the housing scheme the government is now putting forward.

The people in that community feel the need of an amendment to the National Housing Act to make it possible for a group of people to organize themselves co-operatively for the purpose of building their own nouses for their own use. I do not know why the National Housing Act prevents such action among people who really need houses. These loans must be made available to the co-operative corporations on the same terms as such loans are made available to the limited dividend housing corporations, notwithstanding the fact that, upon repayment of the loans, titles to such houses may pass directly or indirectly to the lessee.

A number of years ago I had the pleasure of visiting Nova Scotia. Down in Cape Breton island I watched the development of the best housing program I have seen in Canada. I saw people who were workers in steel plants and in mines working together in co-operative groups to establish homes for themselves. A system was established there whereby such people working co-operatively could get money at about three per cent. These workers, previously condemned to live in company houses without sanitation or modern conveniences, had planned through the years to build these homes. They built themselves lovely six-roomed and seven-roomed homes, fully modern, well spaced, well constructed; they allowed plenty of playground space and they had proper town planning. They moved into those homes and had to pay a rental of $13 per month, which covered not only the rent for the building but insurance, taxes, water and light and protection. It gave them good homes. Within a period of twenty years, by working through this co-operative organization, they will have sufficient money to pay for those homes out of that rental.

Those were families that appreciated such homes. For generations they had been compelled to pay $16 and more per month for company houses without proper sanitation or conveniences and they never owned them. But their families had been forced to live in them because they could not afford to build their own homes. I went from that project across to Sydney Mines and I saw people living in houses that had been long condemned. Such a project as that is one of the best ways to develop good citizens and good Canadians. Similar projects should be made available to all the people of Canada. We must make such houses available.

People in the west resent order-in-council government. They want this government to know that order-in-council government is abhorrent to them because they believe it is contrary to some of the fundamental and basic principles of democracy. They resent the discrimination in freight rates which this government failed to wipe out when they granted the increase to the railway companies. But there is one thing which has struck them hard in recent years. In the years before, these people had never experienced the necessity of paying income tax. Since the war, when they had some prosperity and became taxable, they were not even told that they were supposed to pay income tax. I do not think they are protesting so much against the payment of the tax as they are against the methods of collection used by the representatives of this government.

They protest strongly against some of the actions and methods of the tax collectors sent out as representatives of the federal government. It is the method they object to, because they appreciate that the income tax is one of our fairest taxes if it is imposed in a proper way, since it taxes those in the higher-income brackets. If you wiped out the inequalities and the injustices I do not think you would have much complaint; but as long as you continue in the course that has been followed for the past three or four years you will have continued complaints from these people.

I should like to read a copy of a resolution which was sent by the Yorkton and district board of trade to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I am going to read this because it represents the opinion of the people in that area and gives an accurate idea of what they are thinking. I understand that similar protests have come in from all over Canada and it is hoped that they will have some effect upon the government. I am reading this now because I have no doubt the Minister of Finance will be preparing his budget and it would be well for him to know what the people are thinking. At any rate, we can register our protests and wait for the budget to find out whether they are heeded. The resolution addressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) reads:

> Representing as we do, a cross-section of Canadian citizens, labourers, wage earners, salaried men, professional men, farmers, business executives and business owners, we feel that the facts expressed herein are applicable to the great majority of Canadians.
> We submit that:
> 1. Canada is the richest nation in the world in per capita natural resources and productive ability, but her citizens are condemned to a lifetime of mediocrity through our present income tax laws. The normal savings of our people are being taken for income tax.
> 2. The natural inclination of Canadians is to save and to accumulate property and wealth. Income tax laws have nullified this desire.
> 3. Canadians are a thrifty and industrious people. Our income tax laws have killed their incentive. The tendency today is to do less, for example—
>
> Our labourers and wage earners will not work overtime or to maximum efficiency. Overtime work usually results in less than regular take-home pay and the tendency of workers is to work down to a minimum standard.
> Our business men do not expand. There is no incentive and little opportunity to grow.
> Our professional men do less than they are capable of, take plenty of holidays and hire extra staff. Again no incentive to do their best.
> Our farmers are on strike—literally, and disastrously. This year we have a butter and milk shortage, next year it could be a butter, milk, beef, pork, egg and poultry shortage. Thousands of our best mixed farmers have gone out of livestock. Why—simply because they will not work overtime to produce food to pay too high income taxes.
> 4. We, the people, are in real danger of losing our freedom through the workings of income tax laws. An army of inspectors, instructed that everyone is evading taxation, are becoming increasingly autocratic and the trend is to bring everyone down to one common level. We are too tax conscious; every business move, change or sale is influenced and flavoured by the extent to which income tax will affect the deal, or how the tax may be evaded.
> 5. An additional expense borne by the taxpayer is the toll taken by the large number of auditors and so-called tax experts who are necessary to the average citizen in the compilation of his returns.
> 6. We consider that the net result of all the above is an intolerable situation which must be remedied.
> We therefore resolve that our government be urged to grant a reasonable reduction on personal income tax at this session of parliament, giving particular thought to granting special concessions and exemptions to small businesses in order that they may expand in a normal way. We also ask that special consideration and exemptions be given to farmers in such a way as to promote an increase in the production of milk, butter, poultry, eggs and livestock.

Respectfully submitted,

W. D. Lightbody, president,
F. C. Matheson, secretary,
Yorkton and district Board of Trade.

Similar resolutions asking for the reduction of the farm income tax have come from many of the rural municipalities in my constituency. They protest against the discriminatory features of farm income tax collections and urge that the exemptions be raised to at least $1,200 for single men and $2,400 for married men.

There is a further injustice that should be removed, in that no allowance is made for the unpaid labour on the farm. When that allowance is not made, surely the products that are consumed on the farm should not be considered as farm income. Another rank injustice exists in this field. We find employees of the federal taxation branches in the provincial centres charging farmers as much as $1,000 for their living expenses on the farm, and in other cases raising this to $1,200 or $1,500. Apparently the amount depends upon what they wish to try to collect from the different farmers. Such discrimination brings the deepest of resentment.

In closing, I should like to reassert our contention that the success of an economic system is measured by the extent to which it can take care of the welfare of human beings within the nation. The welfare of the people within the country is more important than the right of any particular group to extract excessive profits from those who toil. If the Canadian people are ever denied the right to obtain a living in return for their toil, and an opportunity for toil in this land of abundance, then our system will stand doomed, and it has failed once already. The real importance to the people of the present situation is not just a matter of the trade of tomorrow, or even a depression. I hope we appreciate the fact that our democratic system is on trial today as it never was before. We must prove that this land of abundance is able to provide for all. We must produce the greatest security with the highest degree of freedom. If we provide that, then no kind of totalitarianism will ever replace our Canadian democracy.

(Translation):

Mr. Marcel Boivin (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, January 26, when the fifth session of the 20th parliament was officially opened, I went to the Senate with the object of paying close attention to the speech of His Excellency the Governor General. Let me tell you in all sincerity that for the fifth time I was greatly disappointed in the acoustics in the upper house, especially when solemn ceremonies take place. This is probably due to the noise and special formalities. Despite their good will, most members did not hear anything and they had to wait until the next day to find out what the speech was about, by reading it in Hansard.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, through the medium of newspapers and radio, the whole population of Canada heard about the contents of the speech from the throne at the same time as their representatives, if not before them. That event has again shown the importance of putting in a system of loud-speakers in another place and I believe it also demonstrates the importance of a system of microphones with loud-speakers in this house. If after due investigation, your consulting engineers should report that this is not possible, as they will probably do, I am almost sure that after serious consideration they will suggest the adoption of a system of microphones with receiving sets, such as found in the United Nations assembly halls at Lake Success. This system has been entirely satisfactory to the representatives of various countries who are presently in session and particularly to the public who attend those proceedings. I may add that I am conversant with the matter since I have had, like many others, the privilege of attending one of these meetings and of seeing for myself the advantages of such a system.

We must admit that during the war we accomplished things which the public considered impossible. We were able to accomplish them and to that end, these achievements being indispensable, the price was never a consideration. Well, I feel that for many years now such a system has been necessary and essential. It would allow the members from this part of the house to hear those sitting at the other end and who turn their backs to us when addressing you, Mr. Speaker. We could dispense then with reading the reports and still be informed on matters dealt with on the orders of the day. We would also be able to hear a member's speech even if the latter's voice is rather faint. We could thus keep really up to date.

Members of the press gallery would be able to prepare their reports while the member is speaking. They wouldn't have to wait many hours, until they can get copies from the Hansard reporters. The public attending our proceedings would also be able to hear the speeches. You will agree, Mr. Speaker, that such a system would not be too costly. In my opinion, it should be installed regardless of costs, because of all the advantages it would bring. My suggestion should be taken into consideration without further delay, for as a result of the redistribution of seats and of the entry of Newfoundland into confederation, the number of members will increase and the need will be more strongly felt.

Mr. Speaker, after reading the speech from the throne I beg you to convey my most sincere congratulations to His Excellency the Governor General, whose words show the importance of the present session.

I also wish, without further delay, to congratulate most heartily the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in my own name and on behalf of my constituency, on his appointment as leader of our party. He now holds in his hands the destinies of our country. The people of the constituency of Shefford, which I represent here, had reason to rejoice over his election, since it is part of the eastern townships, of the region where the minister was born, i.e. the county of Compton.

About a year ago, prior to his appointment as prime minister, the member for Quebec East was the guest of his Alma Mater. On that occasion, one of our most prominent personalities spoke in the following terms:

> Tonight, I found, once again, that Mr. St. Laurent lived up to my expectations which were based not only on what others have said and on his own speeches but on confidential information purporting that by his sincerity of purpose and upright behaviour he has long since made his mark. Your sincerity, Mr. St. Laurent, explains why you have met with such success. You have shown that those who convince others and who are listened to in the long run are the very ones who toiled honestly and spoke the truth, except when circumstances compelled them to keep it to themselves.
> Since it has become a habit with you to climb gradually, you have come to study great problems, to ponder over broad considerations. By your behaviour, by the uprightness of your conduct, by your honesty, by your love of truth, you have set a fine example for all to follow.

These words, spoken before Mr. St. Laurent had assumed his high office, were quite justifiable at the time but have since proved even more to the point.

In asking me to wish Mr. St. Laurent on their behalf good health and ever-increasing success, the people of my constituency of Shefford entrusted me with a very pleasant task.

For quite some time, the papers had mentioned rumours that no one would credit in reporting that the member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) would resign as prime minister because of ill health. These rumours were accurate, as we learned with deep feeling and regret, when he resigned some time after the last session. It is only fitting that I congratulate him on all he accomplished during the many years he was leader of the party and Prime Minister of Canada. There were dark days, indeed, but better times as well. We are very happy that his health allows him to remain among us in the house and hope that Providence will keep him with us for a long time to come.

The speech from the throne hints that the hope expressed by my colleague, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) and by myself last year, may come true. Please believe that if it does, the people of Canada, irrespective of party affiliations, will rejoice over such an appointment.

We also learned that the member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken) retired as leader of the opposition. On his doctors' advice, he relinquished leadership of his party. May I assure him of our highest consideration and wish him good health and success.

I should like to welcome the new leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) who took his seat in the house recently. Although he has been with us but a short while, I feel sure he already sees the difference between the Legislative Assembly and the House of Commons. To use a well-known Quebec saying, I might add: he has finally met his "Quebec".

May I also extend greetings to our new colleagues from Algoma East (Mr. Pearson), Marquette (Mr. Garson) and Rosthern (Mr. Boucher) who have joined the members sitting on the right hand side of the house. I wish them every success in their new duties.

In listening carefully to the mover of the address, my friend and colleague the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown), I felt, as I am sure others did, that he acquitted himself very creditably of his task and that his constituents have every reason to be proud of him.

As to my colleague and friend, the member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Demers), who seconded the motion, I also bid him welcome and extend my most sincere congratulations. A better seconder of the address could hardly have been selected. His speech was brief but to the point and he rendered unto Caesar the things that were Caesar's. He has kindled our admiration and he can count on our entire co-operation at all times.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention to something that my constituents are asking, as I have myself, since July 12, 1946, for a distinctive Canadian flag which, as such, would be in accordance with the aspirations of the whole Canadian nation. I would like to quote Mr. Maurice Ollivier, legal adviser of this house. The quotation is taken from his excellent book on problems of Canadian sovereignty:

> If, as Lord Tweedsmuir once stated, the first loyalty of a Canadian belongs to Canada and not to the British commonwealth of nations, there seems to be no valid reason why this country, like all the other countries of the commonwealth, should not adopt a distinctive national emblem. It would serve to unite Canadians, whatever their origin, in time of war as in times of peace, during a depression and during normal times. They would find it easier to work hand in hand towards the greatness and progress of our nation.

The same holds true for our national anthem "O Canada" and any Canadian who loves his country should not find it in him to oppose it.

Mr. Speaker, we who sit on your right sincerely wish to give this country peace and security. I might add that we would have better success in that undertaking if the parties that are represented here could only forget their political fanaticism and work together with those who have been chosen to preside over the destinies of our country.

Mr. Speaker, reference was made, on our arrival here, to the communist menace. I know that everybody in this country now realizes that not enough attention has been paid up to now to this movement. A healthy reaction to it having taken place in numerous European countries, it has turned towards us, in the hope of succeeding here. It must be admitted that, though it does constitute a threat, it has not gone beyond its preliminary organizational stage. I congratulate the government on the close watch that has been and is being kept in order to fight this evil movement. I am convinced that our people understand now the true meaning of this revolutionary ideology. It will therefore be easier to fight it since the people will not leave that responsibility to the federal government alone, especially after the events of the past few years, but will co-operate, I am sure, by communicating to the proper authorities any information or any doubts they may have concerning those who abhor order, liberty and religion.

It is true that we have had good crops, that industrial expansion goes on at a rate we have never known before, that inflationary forces are less active, and I would add that it is true that employment is at a level heretofore unknown. But I would point out that we experienced a more or less serious regression since December last, due to seasonal factors as well as to limitations on the exportation of our products. In the city of Granby where I live, to give only that example, unemployment affects more than 1,500 people. I hope that these people as well as the country in general will admit that the federal government gave them two good acts when it enacted the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Family Allowances Act.

This brings me to deal with another question, a very controversial question and one to which I want to call the attention of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. MacKinnon), that of immigration. On March 1, 1949, I called the attention of his predecessor to the danger of mass immigration, and events have proved that I was right in what I said then. I read only a few weeks ago that we received in 1948, 125,414 immigrants, that is twice the number we admitted in 1947. I have come to the conclusion that had we been more careful and admitted less immigrants our people who are today out of work would be employed in the majority of cases.

Mr. Speaker, some time ago I became acquainted with a report dealing with a lecture given by Mr. Watson Kirkconnell before the Empire Club of Canada in Toronto on March 23, 1944, and which interested me deeply. I would now like to quote the following from the said lecture:

> The history of immigration in this country may be relied upon to approve those principles which should be the guide of our future policy.

Mr. Kirkconnell sums up such a policy as follows:

> During this total period (from 1851 to 1931) Canada has always had half as much again as many immigrants as it could absorb. For example between 1871 and 1881 the number of immigrants was doubled but only one out of five remained in Canada. Between 1881 and 1891 the immigration became two and a half times as intense but only one-ninth of the immigrants remained in this country. Between 1891 and 1901 six out of ten immigrants left Canada. During the most intense immigration period, 1,848,000 foreigners were admitted to Canada but the emigration was about one million. From 1921 to 1931 we received one and a half million new citizens but we lost one and a quarter million. During the whole period between 1851 and 1931 we have lost 6,110,000 persons who left for the United States, 1,740,000 of whom were born in this country and 4,370,000 were immigrants who had found it impossible to establish themselves in our economic life. Not for a single moment during the last 90 years, except for the temporary requirements of the war, has Canada been affected by a shortage of manpower. We have no business to bring here large numbers of immigrants before we have reasonably insured full employment and social security to our own people, whatever their racial origin may be—

And further on the same lecturer said this:

New immigrants should not be chosen exclusively among the British people.

He does not share the views of the leader of the opposition.

Our national revenue has reached a higher level this year and consequently the remarks made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in his last budget speech are still more justified and truthful. I recall that he said:

This year I can again report, so far as Canada is concerned, an unprecedented rate of economic activity and a new record of progress in our government accounts.

Mr. Speaker, I rejoiced with the Minister of Finance when I heard on different occasions this year that we would again have an unexpected surplus nearly as substantial as that of last year, if not greater. The news item which appeared but a few months ago announcing that we would have to increase our expenses for national defence was accepted without any recrimination throughout the country because the people understood our government's attitude.

Mr. Speaker, with such a surplus this year, I hope the Minister of Finance will remember the words he spoke on April 29, 1947 and which are to be found at page 2554 of Hansard of that year. So that he may not forget them, I will take the liberty of quoting him:

I am consequently proposing to make a substantial reduction in taxation in this budget. Moreover, I am proposing to concentrate this reduction almost entirely in the field of personal income tax. This is the tax that at present levels is proving so unpopular and is causing difficulty. To overcome the situation which I have described a substantial reduction is necessary.

We trust therefore that the Minister of Finance, faithful to his word, will increase the tax exemptions requested more than once, by myself, and many other members. We all know that the Minister of Finance was not invested with his responsibilities to please the people nor to apply only those regulations which are agreeable to the people. We know that his chief responsibility is to ensure a fair proportion between revenues and expenses. I hope his task will prove less ungrateful this year. I do not consider I have asked for anything unreasonable when in my speech on May 22, 1947 I suggested the exemption should be from $1,200 to $2,000. At that time, I submitted statistics to show that a single person earning $1,200 was short $99 at the end of the year and that a head of family with two dependent children and earning $2,000 had a deficit of $215.

We must unfortunately recognize the fact that since 1947 the cost of living has considerably increased and if I were to compute again my figures in accordance with the present cost of living, the deficit for each would be twice or even three times as high. The head of family has had to cope with an increased rent, the power companies do not allow discounts, the price of clothing has considerably increased, and a minimum of $3 a day for food would be absurd. For these reasons, I have to ask more this year and request on behalf of my constituents, an exemption of at least $1,500 for a single person, and $2,500 for a married man, with $200 exemption for each child in receipt of family allowances and $400 for the other children. Moreover, all children should be considered as dependents as long as they attend school. Everyone knows that classical studies and a university course cost the parents more money. I also ask that income tax deductions at the source, inaugurated in September 1942 and which still affect the average wage earner, be abolished.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, that you could be present at a distribution of pay envelopes in any industry. You would then realize the feelings of the average workers when they receive their money. After deductions for income tax, unemployment insurance and retirement fund, the amount actually received is far less than they really earned and should be getting.

Storekeepers, dealers, manufacturers and professional men submit their report four months after the end of the year. In my opinion, it would be only fair to treat the average wage earners on the same footing.

The unemployment insurance commission should pay benefits as of the date the contributor ceased to work because those people need the money, having used up all their savings owing to the rise in the cost of living and to the heavy taxes they have been forced to pay.

People of the middle classes still have to pay taxes levied in May, 1942. I refer to the tax on soft drinks. I have stated that this tax is levied against people of the middle classes, because they are the heaviest buyers of this commodity. To ascertain this fact, it is only necessary to inquire from the manufacturers or from the corner store. It will be seen that three-quarters of this tax, if not more, is paid by the middle classes. These taxes must also be considered from the viewpoint of the soft drink manufacturers in our respective constituencies. I have already urged in this house the removal of this tax and I have sent my request directly to the minister concerned. I am told that several of my colleagues have made similar representations. I was informed later on that an investigation had shown that income from this source had not decreased, on the whole, during the last fiscal year.

Mr. Speaker, in order to stay within the time allotted to me, I would like, with your permission, to include two comparative statements, that will supplement my remarks.

Total tax on soft drinks for 1948 actually $26,892,817.55

The first sets out the comparative figures, month by month, covering income from the 25 per cent excise tax and the one cent a bottle tax for the year 1947. In the first column you will find the percentage of rationing imposed upon the manufacturers during 1947, that is, from January to October, 1947. The second sets out the income for 1947, and the third, income for 1948. The fourth column shows the increase or decrease in terms of dollars, and the fifth gives the percentage of that increase or decrease over two years.

The second table is even more instructive since I have added a column to show what the 1947 income would have been had the manufacturers not had to suffer from rationing. By the same token I show a decrease for 1948.

Since sugar rationing has been removed, the large companies which represent 11 per cent of the soft drink trade have begun an intensive publicity drive which has resulted in an increased volume of their sales while reducing the output of smaller concerns, which represent 89 per cent of the trade. Small concerns have had a lot to suffer during the war because of rationing of their raw materials. A few of them had to use substitutes in order to survive. This led to an inferior product which caused them to lose sales and forced them to cease operating. We know a number of them, even around Ottawa.

Looking further into this matter we find that 67·61 per cent of the manufacturers had a turnover of less than $25,000. This represents a production of about 69 cases per day, which are sold to the retailer at $1.20 per case, tax included. When we consider that these taxes are 8 per cent and 25 per cent, i.e. 21·1 cents per case and that a surtax of one cent gives an added revenue of 24 cents, totaling 45·1 cents per case which the manufacturers pay the government, I admit, Mr. Speaker, that one would have to seek for a long time before finding manufacturers in other categories who have to pay three taxes representing one-third of the wholesale price. Many of my colleagues are inclined to believe that this industry is making large profits. The figures prove the opposite. Wholesale price, $1.20 per case, less the tax amounting to 45·1 cents; cost price, 74·9 cents. Wholesale price before the war, 80 cents per case less discount, 5·12 cents; cost price, 74·88 cents. This industry since the beginning of the war has been making a profit of 0·1 per cent to meet the rising costs of materials and the rise in wages. Today it is requested to relieve them of the taxes which were imposed on them so that soft drinks may sell at the former retail price of five cents per bottle. As the hon. minister is sure that this will be done, I believe that such a request is justifiable and will be appreciated by both the consumers and the manufacturers we represent.

I shall now deal with another tax which has been the object of much criticism. I refer to the luxury tax imposed on the jewelers in our respective constituencies. Let us consider this tax from these two angles. First, let us take the customer's point of view and in this I wish to quote the words used by the hon. Minister of Finance in his last budget speech and which may be found in the debates of May 18, 1948. I quote:

> Again having in mind the needs of the average household, I am proposing that the 25 per cent retail purchase tax be lifted tomorrow from silver-plated knives, forks and spoons and from alarm clocks of a retail value of $10 or less. This change will remove from the scope of the retail sales tax items of common use in the home.

Mr. Speaker, even if the minister pretends to have discriminated in favour of the middle class, I say he did not and I might add that the middle class, in 90 per cent of all cases, uses none but ordinary utensils; had the government thought of it sooner, they would have abolished the tax on watches, fountain pens, automatic pencils and even on rings, which in my estimation are not luxuries but essential articles.

With further reference to merchants or jewelers, everyone will admit with me that the latter have, since June 24, 1942, acted as unpaid employees of the government in collecting that tax. They have done that task during the war, considering that it was their duty to do so, even though that was harmful to their business, but now that war is over I believe that the government should no longer claim that tax and that they should stop interfering with the middle class. That tax was established with a view to limiting wartime purchases and permitting the general public to purchase war savings certificates and victory bonds. In view of the surplus the government had last year and has again this year, and inasmuch as that tax has yielded $8,165,293 for 1946-47 and $8,413,875 for 1947-48, it must be admitted that it was imposed for the restriction of purchases rather than for revenue purposes.

Mr. Speaker, I would like, in conclusion, to thank the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) who have finally taken into consideration a request I have submitted repeatedly. The government having purposely restricted expenditures for building purposes, thus delaying as much as possible the execution of useful projects, they none the less applied in their own department an austerity program. Indeed, the town of Granby is in need mostly of a post office. The request for it was submitted long ago. While looking through the reports, I found out that on June 4, 1920, my late father, then member for the constituency I have the honour to represent, had made the request. This request, supported by proofs, had been made to the then Postmaster General concerning the urgent need of alterations to the Granby post office building, built about 1900, when the population was only 4,000 and postal revenue merely $4,063.07. I again mention 1920, because at that time the population was double that of 1900, having increased to 8,000. Following the 1920 request, an additional story was built over the annex which measured approximately 21 feet by 37 feet. Yes, Mr. Speaker, an additional story 21 by 37 feet so as to compensate for the margin in turnover which had increased by $10,611.46, because gross revenue in 1920 amounted to $14,674.53.

Since 1920, the city of Granby where I live has been left with its antiquated post office, despite the fact that the population has increased threefold, that there are 68 diversified industries. Its gross postal revenue amounts to $73,909.62, outside of post office money orders and postal notes. Mr. Speaker, this request was taken into consideration when it was obviously realized that such a building, due to the increased turnover, the number of office employees and postmen, no longer met the requirements over many years and that this request on my part was more than justified.

On behalf of the agricultural society of Shefford county, I wish to offer my most sincere thanks to the Minister of Agriculture for his co-operation during the fiscal year coming to a close. The agricultural class as well as all the people of my constituency are very grateful to him.

I want to tell the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) how very grateful I am for his co-operation in giving to the people of my constituency an adequate railway service.

I wish also to offer my thanks to all the ministers who have always helped me and supported me in one way or another.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for your indulgence and for your kindness in listening to my rather long speech.

(Text):

Mr. H. G. Archibald (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks this evening I do not intend to indulge in the popular pastime of baiting the Tories. History has taught us that attempts to revive and maintain the past have proved futile; and, when future generations read of such things, it is usually under such titles as "Gone with the wind". What interests me is the fact that the government shows obvious fear of the official opposition. They can see themselves transplanted from the seats of the mighty and put across the floor of the house in the forthcoming election. I can understand why. It is because they have not been able to produce anything that would differentiate them from a Tory. But even at that, they have not been able to show the qualifications of a real Conservative, inasmuch as they have not got what one might call that Victorian look. I would suggest to them that, if they want to make a real job of being a Tory, and obviously they have been attempting it, they make a serious study and become imbued with such a modern and up-to-date development as the battle of the Boyne.

Never having had the leisure time, nor the means, to be a traditionalist, I have come to the conclusion that to a large extent the speech from the throne is indeed a waste of time. It has been outdated. The real speech is now made a month or so prior to the session opening, and it is made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in New York. Last year he gave his beets-and-turnips address to a group of newspapermen, telling them how Canada could eat these vegetables instead of lettuce and so on. In other words, he outlined the austerity program. This year, prior to the opening of the session, he gave to the women's Canadian club of New York the general economic trend that the country intended to follow. It is becoming obvious to me that, before this Canadian parliament can make up its mind what direction it intends to follow along economic lines, it must get the O.K. of Wall street. That trend of following the advice of the Americans is bringing its rewards.

Sometimes the Minister of Finance reminds me of Bing Crosby in the "Road to Zanzibar". Bing was exploiting Bob Hope as Fearless Fraser in a sideshow, and when one of the events went haywire he wanted Bob to get into a glass tank filled with live alligators. Bob became so nervous that he said he wished he was back on relief in Paducah, Indiana, where he would have a sense of security. Whether the people will realize security on relief is another story, but they are going back on relief at the present time, especially on the Pacific coast, whether they like it or not. There are 35,000 unemployed out there, and there may be far more than that who are not listed. That is the evidence of the policies that the government has been following.

I have listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) giving us a glowing picture up to the present. I have heard the same thing from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). He is beautiful at the job. He skates right up to the present and then backs away from it, but he will not deal with the market situation and how we are to ship and export our huge surpluses of natural products in the near future.

Once again in this country we are facing piles of fish, piles of lumber, piles of apples, piles of wheat and cheese and a growing list of manufactured products, and the worker is unemployed. He has again produced too much. The government is suggesting that it has a public works program which will absorb the unemployed. Even if it went in for a full-scale program of public works it would not even scratch the problem. The great agrarian revolution on the land, such as on the prairies where everything is going into machine production, is throwing more thousands on the labour market each day. What we need is a public works program, along with full production, and the means to enjoy that full production.

Obviously the real fault at present is the government's policy of following the advice of the United States in demanding gold or United States dollars for all goods that are sold on the international markets. It so happens that the world is revolting against that form of economy, because that United States dollar charges its toll on every item of trade that is transacted. Countries the world over are now going in for managed economy and managed currencies. The currencies are based on production, with fixed prices as a basis to maintain their values. These currencies are developing the same value as if they were backed by gold. In the last eighteen months on the open market the pound sterling has increased in value from 30 to 40 per cent, because the productivity of the British has risen to such an extent that it is reflecting itself in the value of the pound sterling.

Further than that, the countries of Europe, such as Great Britain, are going in for what is now known as barter arrangements, long-term agreements on trade. They import as much as they export, or rather that is their objective. The more trading that takes place, the greater the standard of living of the people. By the very nature of our economy we must export more than we import; otherwise the economy as a whole does not make a profit. Whether we like it or not, if we want to increase our standard of living we will have to accept the barter system of trading. That is the fact that faces us today.

Some criticism has been expressed in the press—and I see it is beginning to grow—of the economy Great Britain has developed. It is expressed in an editorial appearing in today's issue of the Globe and Mail, the important part of which states:

> Britain may think it politically desirable to keep some trade connections with all European countries, including those behind the iron curtain. The idea of neat and tidy barter arrangements with them may also appeal to the socialist mind. But these precious bargains of Sir Stafford's are liable to cancellation at the whim of untrustworthy governments. They are placing in jeopardy the whole future development of British-Canadian trade, which is much more reliable and more valuable in both political and ecoonmic terms than the connections Sir Stafford is striving to build or retain. Obsessed with day-to-day socialist planning, he is jeopardizing the long-term interests of both countries.

Well, the government with which Sir Stafford Cripps is making these long-term arrangements might be unstable; but, believe you me, our economy on this continent is far more unstable than those governments.

I have another clipping from the Globe and Mail of March 1, headed Bill Collectors Find It Tougher To Get Their Man, and stating:

> If the volume of business coming the way of debt collection agencies is anything like an accurate barometer of economic conditions, then times are getting tough.
> The men who devote their working hours to going after debtors met in convention at the Royal York yesterday. They reported more business than in any year since 1938. But they also agreed they have to work considerably harder than was the case in the war years to extract the money from those who bought but omitted to pay.
> Collections haven't fallen to the level of the depression 30's, but these professional collectors agreed that money is tight, which is just another way of saying that the so-called average wage earner isn't piling up any bank reserves these days.

He certainly is not. He has had all his reserves taken by the inflationary period we have just been going through, and in which we still find ourselves. Now he faces a depression, completely broke. He faces a depression with only his hands and his brains to make his day-to-day living. Once again, if we allow this condition to develop, our society will go back to that condition which brought about riots and upheavals.

That is the position the government faces. They dare not allow unemployment to increase to any degree, because the nations around us—New Zealand, Australia and Great Britain—are operating on a planned basis. The day is not far distant—it is already here—when we will have unemployment. In Great Britain they might be on rations, but they are working and they are receiving meals three times a day. In this country our workers on the Pacific coast are once again going back on rations because they produce too much. Surely that is a pitiful state of affairs.

That is what I have to say on the economic side of the picture. I believe the government would be well advised to begin thinking in terms of a general over-all trade policy which would be along the lines of barter. Granted, it would not solve our difficulties today or tomorrow, but the general tendency would be in the right direction, inasmuch as the rest of the world is also going in that direction. Now I would like to deal with the attitude of the government as expressed in terms of dealing with human beings in this country.

Last fall the weather conditions on the Pacific coast were rough; it was the worst year on that coast experienced in this generation. On the northerly part of the coast line we had what could be described as an accident. A storm came up and destroyed a lighthouse. I should like to go through the history of what happened after that lighthouse was destroyed. I read about it first in the Prince Rupert Daily News of November 8, under the heading, "Gale Blows Lighthouse Away", and the subheading, "Harrowing Experience for Family". Then it goes on to say that Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins of Egg island are safe in a hospital at Bella Bella.

Then, on November 13, the full story was printed in the Daily News and goes on to say this:

Window Smashing Wave Was Life Saving Signal

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Wilkins Reach City After Terrifying Experiences Following Lighthouse Destruction

Uncertain as to what the future holds and still shaken and unsettled after their arduous experiences following the destruction of their lighthouse home by a tidal wave which suddenly swept stormy Egg Island in the middle of Queen Charlotte Sound in the dark and early hours of the morning of November 3, Robert L. Wilkins, the lighthouse keeper, his pretty auburn-haired wife, Marie, their ten-year-old son, Dennis, and the latter's six-month-old cocker spaniel pup, Boots, reached Prince Rupert safely this morning with Captain Norman McKay aboard the lighthouse tender Birnie. A week ago today they were still huddled in a crude shelter on their lonely island lashed by gale winds, driving rains, hail, thunder and lightning, gradually being worn down by near starvation and exposure.

The article goes on to say that they were on that island completely exposed to the elements for four days, at the end of which time they were picked up by a passing fishing boat which took them down to the hospital at Bella Bella. This one experience alone is sufficient to show the necessity for a coast-guard on the British Columbia coast.

However, let us go on with the story. The family left the hospital at Bella Bella after the boys around the Namu cannery had taken up a collection to help them. They went up to Prince Rupert, and were on charity. The women's auxiliary of the Canadian Legion voted them $50, and the I.O.D.E. voted them a like sum, or even more. They were driven to going to the Red Cross to get shoes for their little boy, but were turned down on a technicality.

When I left home on December 27 the rumour was going around Prince Rupert that they had been asked to make out a list of the belongings they had lost, with the approximate value; then they were to cut that amount in half. That was the general rumour among the citizens of Prince Rupert, those who were interested in looking after the family.

During this same period of time the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), under whose jurisdiction this department comes, was over in Europe making speeches about the horrors of a communistic dictatorship as compared with the glories of democracy. I must say he left a profound impression upon the fishermen and loggers of the British Columbia coast—a most profound impression indeed. That is one sample of outright brutality and disregard of the individual—and an employee of the government at that. I believe action could still be taken to rectify the situation. I have never met these people; I do not know them. I just took the story as I read it in the press from day to day—and it does not make pleasant reading.

Then another case I should like to bring to the attention of the house has to do with the injustice in connection with the Premier miners. I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) for an outline of the developments which took place in that mine. I should like to place on record the details as they were set out in the letter to me:

1. The strike vote took place on July 12, 1948.

2. The local union 694 of the united mine, mill and smelter workers advised the company that it would call a strike on Monday, July 19.

3. In the meantime the company closed the mine on July 16, three days prior to the threatened strike.

4. The claimant, a waitress, was employed at the mine and filed her claim on July 30.

5. The claimant was notified that she had been disqualified by the insurance officer on August 13 on the ground that she was directly interested in the outcome of the labour dispute which had caused the stoppage of work.

6. On August 23 the appeal of the claimant against the insurance officer's decision was heard by the Vancouver board of referees and the claimant was represented by three officials of the united mine, mill and smelter workers. The court set aside the insurance officer's decision and allowed the claim.

7. As the company had not been represented at the session and requested an opportunity of giving its version of the stoppage of work, the claim was referred back to the court of referees. On September 10 the court reaffirmed its decision to allow the claim, the claimant being represented by officials of the united mine, mill and smelter workers. The commission, exercising its right, appealed the decision of the court of referees to the umpire. The umpire heard the appeal on October 28 and rendered his decision on December 7, the following being the pertinent portion of the decision:

> My decision, therefore, is that the claimant lost her employment by reason of a stoppage of work due to a labour dispute at the Silbak Premier Mines Limited. As her conditions of work stood to be affected by the proposed collective bargaining agreement, she was directly interested in that dispute and was, therefore, rightly disqualified by the insurance officer in the first instance, under section 39(1) of the act.
> It has been suggested by the chief claims officer that I give some guidance as "to the way in which we are to decide whether or not the stoppage of work is deemed to be still existing" or if it can be assumed that at some date "there was a definite abandonment of the project for economic or other reason." As indicated by Mr. Dowd, at the hearing, other gold mines have closed or are in the process of closing in the province of British Columbia, due to economic conditions. It may, therefore, be found that the stoppage of work, within the meaning of the act, has ceased at the Silbak Premier Mines Limited and that the mine is closed permanently. This, however, is entirely a question of fact which should be determined by the insurance officer after having communicated with the interested parties and investigated the prevailing circumstances.
> The appeal is allowed.

The commission, not being in a position to obtain any information in regard to the possibilities of a general resumption of work or the permanent closing down of the mine, decided that the stoppage of work had ceased on December 7, date of the umpire's decision. Therefore they would get their unemployment insurance nine days later. I should like to point out that this matter came up before the board of referees twice and on both occasions the appeal was allowed. Then by arbitrary action it was thrown into the hands of an umpire. In the first place we had an example of arrogance on the part of the mine operators when they did not appear before the court of referees when it first sat. It showed that they were interested only in intimidating the workers.

The labour record of this boss is well known from 1919 on. He is anti-labour all the way through. He had an experience in Australia that taught him a sharp lesson. They would not stand for that kind of nonsense down there and he had to come back here where he would have the protection of rules such as this. This action has created bitterness in the mining camps of British Columbia and has worked against democracy and this government. It was an example of outright bowing to the will of the mining bosses of British Columbia. These are two samples of injustices that are bound to have an effect on the working of democracy.

Over and above that, there is the general policy of the government in granting refuge to former nazi sympathizers which action does not go down at all well with those who contributed in world war II. I should like to point out the difference between the treatment given to these nazis and to ordinary people, and I refer to a paragraph which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of February 26 in the column headed On and Off the Record. It reads:

> Justice for all, privileges for none: While Ottawa allows de Bernonvilles and Seigneurs to remain in Canada, with records questionable to say the least, little time is being lost in moves to deport two merchant marine veterans, brothers from Belfast, Ireland, without a single black mark on their records. Gordon and William West have been in immigration detention quarters for the past three weeks awaiting a ship for Manchester, where they stowed away last fall. They worked for a while in a hotel, and earned a good record. Then they sought to have their entry legalized, to bring in their families. Instead, their deportation was ordered. They have little money, and cannot fight deportation, as can others. A Liberal lawyer is working on their case, but it looks as though they would be deported without benefit of order in council.

I remember listening last session to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) when he stated that it was necessary to have a good bank roll before you dared show yourself in a court room if you wanted to get justice. To a large extent this clipping outlining this little human tragedy backs up that position quite clearly.

If modern government hopes to carry on and gain the support of the people it must be government of the people, for the people and by the people. It is certain that north Atlantic pacts, military pacts and so on, without a staple social order that gives the people a guaranteed place in society, will not protect them in the struggles that lie ahead. I believe we are facing a social upheaval much like that which occurred during the Napoleonic wars. I remember once seeing the show Anthony Adverse, which started off with a scroll which read something like this: People born in times of social upheaval are unlucky. They can contemplate neither the past nor the future with equanimity. They are a race of lost souls.

If we can build real morale and develop a real society in this country that will stand out as an example, then we can progress and continue with the development of this country. But if we allow it to deteriorate, according to the examples I have cited tonight, then we are going to have to face inevitable trouble in the days ahead. In the past, nations have fallen because of dry rot from within. Let us see if we cannot develop a modern state that will give us a high standard of living and a high order of democracy.

On motion of Mr. Stephenson the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will continue this debate.

Motion agreed to, and the house adjourned at 10.25 p.m.
